Some people feel themselves moving towards something. What are you moving towards? Or in a different conception, what are you opening to, or hoping to open to, to receive even? These different images—active and receptive—offer various ways to approach the question.

So what do you want? Where are you going? What are you moving towards? What are you opening to?

We could use different words here—your sense, conception, image of the goal, the destination, the aim. Or if you prefer, the result or fruit of the path, or simply the direction you're moving in. Whatever words or way of articulating it helps you. What is it that you're after? What is it that you want?

Again, feel into the effects of that question, the effects of the responses in the different dimensions of your being—in the body, in the energy body, in the heart, in the soul, in the mind. You can linger with the answers and feel their resonances, sense their effect on you.

Perhaps some responses have come to each of these questions—what you love about the path, and what you want from the path. But let me ask you this as well: Do the responses that have come so far feel complete, exhaustive? Or is there the feeling that yes, that's part of it, but there's something left over, something you haven't quite articulated yet, or perhaps even discerned or identified? There's no right or wrong here; I'm simply asking.

You can return to these questions and reflect on them anytime you want, for as long as you want. But let me now bring to bear a few perspectives on all this—on path, on goal—from the point of view involving many of the ideas and directions of inquiry and exploration we're focusing on in this retreat.

I don't know if you realize this, but to some extent, the conception we harbor or entertain of the path and of the goal—let's call it awakening—and the fantasy of the path and of awakening, are going to be conditioned by what we read and hear.

The very way I think of the path and the goal, what it includes or what it is, what direction it's going to take me or supposed to take me, what it includes and what it doesn't—all that will to some extent be conditioned by what I'm exposed to: reading, hearing, teachers, friends, and others.

Some of this is dependent simply on the era, the age we live in, the time we are in. The sense of self we have now, that we just feel or most people would feel is completely obvious—this is what my self involves, this is what my self includes, this is the kind of interiority I have, this is the way I not just think of the self but feel the self, experience the self—that sense of self and also the freedoms I conceive or feel or hope or aspire to for that self, the kinds of freedom and the ranges and directions of freedom for that self, are different now than they were in the time of the Buddha in India.

One has only to read the suttas to notice the complete absence of certain kinds of relationships with the self, both difficult and exhilarating or interesting or opening or complex.

So that our very sense of freedom—the freedom for that self, or the freedoms, plural, for that self and of that self—are actually different. They're conditioned by the age that we live in and what comes to us from the outside, from the era, and so forth. To me, it's interesting to realize that. It does something to realize that.

Then we might ask, on the back of such a realization: if our views of all this and our fantasies of path and awakening are conditioned to some extent by my environment, what is a conception and a fantasy that is, so to speak, authentic for me? Or am I just a kind of puppet pulled this way by what I'm hearing or reading and what's in the air around me in my culture, in my time, in my society, in my spiritual fashions, for want of a better word? What would be an authentic conception and fantasy of path and awakening for me—authentic to me? I mean, authentic means like born of myself, in independence, actually related to the meaning of independence.

Now that question—what's an authentic conception of fantasy of the path—is not a question that the Buddha and other spiritual teachers of different ages would ever even have thought to ask. It would never even have occurred to them to ask it. Partly because we live in a very individualist culture now that didn't exist back then. That whole way of conceiving self and choice just didn't exist. The Buddha would never have asked, "What's an authentic conception for you of path or of awakening?"

So that's interesting too. And I wonder whether even for us these days it's really a helpful question. Perhaps a better question—I think a better question—would be: which ways of conceiving and fantasizing path and awakening are soul-making for you? That's different. Again, it's related, but it's a different question.

So what ways of conceiving and fantasizing and imagining path and awakening are soul-making for you? That's actually quite a radical difference in approach and questioning.

Now, notice that if we come back to this point about our being to some extent conditioned—our views of what we can conceive of as a path and what awakening is, is to some degree conditioned by the culture—whether it's conditioned to a great degree for me or to a very small degree, my views and my conceptions, my images of path and awakening, how much it is conditioned for me by the culture is actually not the important factor.

So it might be a lot, or it might be a little, but what's important is not the so-called authenticity or independence. It's the soul-making. That's the test.

Just like when we talked about in imaginal practice: it doesn't matter if you deliberately introduce an image or change an image in some way and you think, "Oh, is that just my ego? I shouldn't be doing this." It doesn't matter. The test is in the soul-making. So here too, the degree or the extent to which it feels like "Well, this is just conditioned from my culture, from what I've heard"—that doesn't matter. From this point of view, the question is: is it soul-making? How soul-making is it? Is it supportive of soul-making or not? You understand?

But notice, too, a more radical distinction from the ways we usually think about these things. The goal—aim, destination, direction, result, fruit, whatever word you favor there—the goal that you conceive or fantasize is not just conceived of. The question is not just "Is that helpful for you to conceive and imagine that way? Is it healing or is it freeing?" Whatever those words mean, but "Is it soul-making?"

So that's quite, I would say, a radical difference of approach, of orientation, of entering into these questions.

Traditionally, in the Buddhist tradition at least, what seems to me unavoidable if you read the suttas—but actually I really don't care whether it's so-called historically accurate or not; it's not important, especially not important for what I want to unfold in this talk—but let's say traditionally, in the Pali Canon, the goal, destination, aim, fruit, et cetera, the path, was a realization of the transcendent unfabricated, meaning this transcending of the world of perception itself. Not just the world of labeling, but the world of sense experience, and the world of any kind of sense of experience of subject, any kind of experience of object, of space and time.

And this dimension, āyatana, realm of the unfabricated or the deathless, transcendent realm, was something the Buddha put a lot of emphasis on, and one way of intuiting, sensing, understanding the coherence of the whole Pali Canon: it's all a movement of lessening fabrication, culminating in this opening to the unfabricated.

Something utterly beyond anything that we can say of it or describe it, except by talking about it for the most part in the negative, as the Buddha mostly does: not this, not that, beyond this, know this there, know that there, et cetera. Something utterly, utterly mystical and transcendent there.

Now, I'm not spending a long time talking about that in this talk, but I have in other places. Some people, in my experience, are very interested in this. And they hear about this realm, this dimension, this possibility, this opening of the transcendent, unfabricated, the deathless—whatever you want to call it—and it really sparks their interest. There's a fire there. Some people yearn for this opening, to move towards that, to know it in this lifetime, et cetera. And it's actually a central yearning and thrust of the whole way they feel the path, as it seems to me it really is in the Pali Canon as well.

And some people, other people, hear about this or read about it and are not interested in it at all, for different reasons. So that's just something to notice. And in the tradition, this realization or opening to the transcendent unfabricated was intimately tied up with the end of suffering.

So that in the moment of—let's say—experiencing that, for want of a better word, opening to that, the moment of unfabricated, that comes about through a complete dying down in the moment of the factors of clinging, push, pull, including avijjā, ignorance. In the moment, so that the clinging and the avijjā propel fabrication—if you know the teachings of dependent origination—in the moment when those are completely quieted, there is no fabrication of perception happening of self, other, subject, object, world, time, space, et cetera.

The arahant, the so-called completely awakened person, has just erased or eroded or cut off all clinging and all avijjā, and so at the end of their life they are not reborn. In other words, there's not the propulsion to create more fabrication of perception. So no perception, no world is reborn, if you like, put it that way.

They are not reborn into the world. This movement toward the unfabricated is intimately tied up with the view of ending suffering because one ends rebirth - getting off the wheel of rebirth, ending that whole cycle of death and rebirth.

Returning to our opening talk, some people have a yearning to know this unfabricated, this transcendent - a deep desire for that. Yet it's not completely captured or described as a movement where all they want is to end suffering. Wrapped up in that yearning is the desire and the longing of the mystic. It's not only captured by, or even primarily described as, a desire to end suffering.

There's a whole range here for people at different times in their practice. How much desire do you or I have for this? How much does any practitioner have for this opening, this realization?

Another thing to point out: other kinds of mystical experiences, including experiences of universal oneness - whether oneness of awareness, cosmic consciousness, infinite consciousness, universal awareness, universal love, or the universal ocean of being - are all connected on a spectrum of lessening fabrication, which has its endpoint in a complete cessation of fabrication. They're all degrees of less fabrication, grouped together along a thread of lessening fabrication.

In practicing different ways of letting go of clinging, one moves on that spectrum of fabrication, opens to these different perceptions of less fabrication, which involve less fabrication of subject and object, self and world, and that split and concreteness. One knows and experiences all the different kinds of beauty of those universal onenesses.

One thing this movement has in common is that there is a beyond. In all these openings, before I've fully opened to them - whether to universal love permeating the fabric of all existence, universal awareness, or this transcendent unfabricated - it constitutes for me a beyond. Beyond what I already know and have experienced. I might intuit it, have heard about it, or had glimpses, but it's still a beyond.

Recalling what we've been saying about the soul-making dynamic: where there is a beyond, one possibility that constellates in relation to that beyond is eros. Eros involves a beyond. This whole sense of possibility - opening to realizing different kinds of universal oneness, mystical experiences, this transcendent unfabricated - becomes something in relation to which eros constellates.

With eros allowed to do its work, it will constitute and constellate fantasies and images in regard to that beyond and the movement toward it - what it includes and involves, what's around it and associated with it. There is the erotic imaginal involving fantasy and image of awakening, of enlightenment, of realization, of the Buddha who showed the way or other teachers past and present who have realized what I haven't yet fully realized. Images of those who are showing the way, living that, exemplifying that. Fantasies and images of the path and of the self on that path.

All of this is soul-making rather than something negative. There is beauty that comes with that filling out of the erotic imaginal, that constellation. Beauty comes with it, meaningfulness, a sense of depth - soul-making.

Another possibility is that it constellates craving rather than eros. What determines whether it constellates craving or eros? What guides it one way or another, conditions it, sends it into craving rather than eros, into eros rather than craving?

When there is craving and its pain, a teacher will often say to a student who has this aspiration to realize the unfabricated but is struggling: "Drop it. Drop desire. Drop striving. It's not about getting anywhere or achieving anything. Nowhere to go, nothing to do."

This is crucial: What determines what happens? Is there a tendency when desire arises to emphasize the sense of lack rather than the desire and its beauty? Does a self-view become very reified and solidified in relation to what I desire? Perhaps I assume I'm not going to be able to realize this.

Or the self-view constellates and hardens in some kind of relationship or construction of self-measurement in relation to this. Where am I on the ladder towards awakening or on this experience or that unfabricated or this thing? And measurement comes to be the dominant flavor and all the pain of a realistically conceived self-measurement. And the contraction of that.

Then what happens when we have that contraction? What do we do with it? And is one of the possibilities, the issues from a sense of contraction at some point or other, that I drop it. I just drop it. And I go into some other kind of relationship that has just dropped that desire and that view and that sense of possibility.

Or perhaps there is what we touched on when I was telling you about the psychoanalyst Douglas Fairbairn, and he talked about the anti-libidinal ego defense. That when we fear not being able to have what we desire, or being rejected, or the impossibility of getting it, there are structures in us that kick into place that actually prevent us from even wanting it. Anti-libidinal, they prevent the libido, the eros from constituting to even want that and come into relationship. They would just cut it off. Sometimes to the extent we don't even feel the desire at all.

So interesting to me and complex is so important. What goes on for us? What constellates out of that possibility of any kind of beyond? Beyond what I know, beyond what I already know, what I already experience. What happens with us in relation to that?

So a sense of the beyond can constellate eros, as we say. When it's a desirable beyond, it constellates eros as a possibility. But the reverse is also true, as is so often the case with these dependent origination things, that where there is, let's say, a lot of eros in a person's being, in their soul, as it's flowing in their life, that lot of eros, that fire, that movement of water, if you like, that eros will constellate a beyond. It, as we've said, needs eros needs a beyond. And it will discover and create a beyond.

So the beyond constellates the eros, the eros constellates the beyond. The transcendent, unfabricated, or any of these kinds of stages on the way to that—of some kind of perception of universal onenesses—are one possibility of beyond, one direction of possibility beyond, of possibilities of beyond.

If dimensionality is allowed to the sense of existence, to the sense of consciousness, but also to the sense of the fabric of the world, if one allows dimensionality, one of the possibilities is that it moves in this direction—different kinds of onenesses, along the spectrum of lessening fabrication until eventually it's the unfabricated, opens the unfabricated.

So if dimensionality is allowed, this constellation of a beyond that comes from the eros, one possibility is that. If dimensionality is not allowed, it's not something that the psyche or consciousness or the logos or whatever allows, admits is possible. But then what happens to the eros?

Here is a person with a fair degree of eros, in the small sense, and it cannot open up into, or it cannot open up, other dimensions of perception. So there is just a one-dimensional world—this is it—and then that eros, in its wanting more, can't open, discover its more, get its more, have the beauty of the satisfaction, the fulfillment of more and an endless more in the opening of the perceptions of dimensionalities. It must go, so to speak, flatly outwards, horizontally, and move in one dimension, wider and wider. I need more, I need more, I need more. The eros wants more always.

And so more this, more that, in the one-dimensional world, more acquiring, endless acquiring of experiences or possessions or whatever it is. It's only got one way to go, and that's horizontal. It has no depth of beyond to move into. The beyond is just beyond, flatly, in terms of more that I can acquire, in terms of conquests or relationships or possessions or experiences or whatever it is. Facebook friends. Endless, wider and wider horizontal movement that eros has driven into what we call greed and craving in the Dharma language.

And conversely to all this, if there's not much eros in a being—and that could be because it's blocked for the different reasons that we've touched on and we can keep going into that and exploring that, how does it get blocked or limited in different ways, the eros and that whole dynamic. Or it could just be, you know, some people, just natural to their being, natural to their soul, is that there's just less eros.

Some people really have a lot of fire, a lot of rivers, torrents of water. There's a lot of eros moving in the soul. There's a soul with a lot of eros, and some less so. And there's no judgment here, or more or less. It's just natural to a being, because I'm certainly open to that point of view.

The question is whether it's natural to me, this much eros, whatever that much is, or whether it's blocked, or whether it's kind of forced and I'm straining for an eros, or a torrent or a fire that's actually not natural to the being.

But sometimes there's not that much eros, and so there's not enough eros to constellate much of a beyond. You understand? Not much eros, not much sense of a beyond, that which I haven't yet known and experienced and opened to and penetrated, and the excitement of that and the attraction and the beauty and the longing for that.

Not that much eros, therefore not much beyond constellated.

But with regard to this transcendent and that whole spectrum of lessening fabrication, the different kinds of mystical experiences of universal onenesses and the like—in regard to that, one of the questions and investigations for us as practitioners is whether we can notice if there is a sense, a relationship with the transcendent, and that eros for it, and desire for it. How does it move, when does it move, and why does it move between eros and craving?

Coming out of that question and investigation is: how do I take care? What is involved in taking care of the soul making and the eros in my relationship with the transcendent—this thing, this dimension, whatever dimension it is that I haven't opened to yet?

This is a very different way of thinking about this. Can I take care of the eros here? Implicit in that means: can I take care of the soul-making? Which means: can I take care of the image in all this with its different aspects?

So it means in relation to that object—that erotic object, that whatever specific beyond that I have heard about and I intuit and I've glimpsed and I want to open to—the object, but also the self. Remember this imaginal constellation: object, self, world, and eros. So can I take care of the eros and the soul-making? Can I take care of the soul-making in relationship to this kind of beyond, a transcendent beyond, or whatever, in that direction—the object, the self, and the eros itself? How do I do that? What's involved in that? How do I care for that?

So that's one possibility—let's call it the traditional one, the movement towards transcendence.

The second possibility, which we've already touched on, is that dimensionality—any sense of dimensionality to existence, to the way that the world is—is blocked. It's absolutely refused, or at least not supported in the worldview, or for whatever reason it's blocked. Then what we get, from our small definition of eros as wanting more, wanting more contact, can only move in one dimension, and the "more" will just push it wider.

So I need, if it's in relation to a certain lover or whatever, more contact. And then at a certain point that's exhausted because I can't have any more contact with you, or I get tired because you're just one-dimensional. There's not more to discover in you, so I go chasing someone else, or I have affairs. Or I have this car and then I need another car. Whatever it is—I've been on holiday here, now I need to go there. And it's not coming from a limitation in the self; it's coming from a limitation of the soul-making dynamic.

So it becomes this kind of chasing of experiences or trying to accumulate and acquire experiences. And because it's flat and doesn't have the other dimensionalities to open up, to create, discover, to be revealed, to move into, it becomes in some way or another just a chasing of pleasantness, pleasant sensations, and a kind of avoiding of the unpleasant, and this movement to somehow prop up through this accumulation of experience the ego moving in a one-dimensional world.

Part of the tragedy of all this is that in our contemporary Western society, it's actually nowadays quite possible to keep chasing this quite a long time, even for people who don't conceive themselves as in the rich portion of society. Even people who, relatively speaking in terms of Western society, are not of greater means financially can still pursue this. How many TV stations are available? How much different kind of food experience is available? How many cheap holidays are available?

So it's actually, unfortunately, quite possible—with all the effects this has on the environment and all kinds of other consequences—it's actually quite possible, unfortunately, to keep chasing this really quite far down the line. And there's an endlessness possible here, but it's flat.

What's not recognized is that this one dimension doesn't come alive as fantasy. It's all conceived as real—a real self having a possibility of accumulating or possessing real objects or real experiences in a real world. And if we are viewing it critically from a Dharma perspective, the eros there, or the desire—the craving there, better—is also viewed as a real thing.

Of course, some people from a Buddhist perspective say, well, that's not a path. That's samsara, this endless flowing on. Sara means "to flow"—this endless flowing on, this endless chasing, endless thirst of tanha. But that's one possibility of what happens with the germ of eros, so to speak.

Coming back to what people would consider—because that is a kind of path, I suppose, but people would generally not consider that a path. Buddhist people would not consider it a legitimate path.

But if we come back to Buddhist versions of the path, there are some approaches—particularly what some people might call secular Buddhism or mindfulness-based practices—that would state right away that there is no beyond. And certainly not a beyond that's anything other than fantasy in the pejorative sense: mere hope, wishful thinking, consolation. There's no real beyond. Any transcendence you might conceive of or harbor is dismissed as "just metaphysics"—in other words, nonsense.

In this view, the path is the goal. There's very little difference between path and goal. Both are characterized simply by this life, this experience of finite existence. This finite life—limited in so many ways—is the path. The goal is simply meeting this life: being open to it, letting it touch us, coping with that encounter repeatedly and endlessly until death brings the extinction of consciousness.

From this perspective, there's just an endless repetition of meeting life with its finitude, its tragedy, its existential limitations. We're asked to meet and cope endlessly with what life is—conceived quite flatly, one-dimensionally, bounded by strong existential limits. Eventually we might arrive at a stance of resignation, or what some would call equanimity, in the face of what's construed as reality—what contemporary philosophers call "facticity," avoiding words like truth.

This is what's conceived as real: this life, what I perceive through the senses. Life is just what it seems to be—what most people would agree upon. In this understanding, there's not much more than what appears obvious through sensory experience and conventional understanding of existence. There's not much beyond what I already know to discover or open to. Awakening doesn't constitute or involve much more than I already realize and experience. There's not much of a beyond there to discover.

Yet notice what happens when eros enters the soul. Life begins to acquire a capital L. It becomes somewhat romanticized and elevated in various ways—perhaps through celebrating the touch of breeze on cheek or the moment-to-moment flow of existence.

Whether this romantic view preceded the path or eros later impregnated these elements with its elevating quality, something gets lifted up, though always constrained by the limitations of the worldview.

One possibility is that Life with a capital L encompasses the Sublime with a capital S. This concept, originating with Romantic poets and painters like William Turner, describes something simultaneously beautiful and terrifying—beautiful to the senses yet overwhelming because of its vastness compared to the small, fragile self. The sublime combines aesthetic sensibility with existential trembling before the hugeness of things, wrapped up with the tragedy of impermanence.

This becomes what life is: the sublime and the tragedy of impermanence. The path asks us to face this, to open to it, to feel its poignancy. These elements become central aspects of practice.

This does constitute a kind of beyond—beyond the fragile me, beyond my existence. The possibility of erasure in non-existence at death, which could happen anytime, anywhere, and the tragedy of that disappearance, this too becomes a beyond. So there is a beyond here, allowed by this limited logos, though any other beyond either doesn't occur to the practitioner, doesn't interest them, or is flatly disallowed a priori—completely disqualified as possibility. The very conception and image of a more expansive path or awakening is ruled out from the beginning.

The path becomes about, principally about coping with this—life conceived and sensed in a certain way with its existential limits, with its inherent meaninglessness and inherent tragedy. These factors, these aspects come to the fore, and that's what the path becomes about: coping with this.

In this kind of approach, the eros and the soul-making dynamic—the eros and the eros-psyche-logos dynamic—are limited. They're quite limited here, partly because of the realism. It's just that this is real. Nothing else is allowed. This view is what reality is—the facticity, if those words are used. Oftentimes words like "truth" are avoided, but this is real.

Because of that realist basis, and because of the refusal of any more dimensions to existence—to discover, to open to, to know, to penetrate—there's a one-dimensionality. That one-dimensionality and the realism at the base of the view limits the eros-psyche-logos and also how much eros may constellate or gather from that.

So in this view, there's a kind of rhetoric of being in touch with this, and everything that we said, but not the rhetoric or the invitation to any kind of opening or knowing or experiencing of what is beyond what is already pretty obvious. There's a little bit of that, but not much.

There are many possible reasons why that kind of view, for many people, has gained a lot of traction and is even attractive or seems inevitable or the only one they can get behind. The rise of secularism, of course. The domination of views of scientific materialism, the movement of existentialism in philosophy and psychology and psychoanalysis in the twentieth century. There are many reasons—we don't have to go into that.

I know you've heard me speak quite critically of this kind of thing in the past. But I really want to say: this is perfectly valid and okay for some. For some people, it really suits their soul. Maybe for them that view of the path, that concept of the path and awakening, is actually soul-making to the degree that satisfies their soul and their eros. Maybe a set of fantasies of the self and the path and the Buddha and what awakening is constellate around that whole view, imbue that view and form that view in a way that's, to some degree, soul-making, or to the degree that satisfies their soul. So I really want to say: it's completely okay.

Again, the question is: is it soul-making? Is it soul-making for you? Is it soul-making for me or someone else? It might be that such a view satisfies because there's not much eros in that particular soul, and that's completely okay. Why should there be? Who's to say that's a good thing or a bad thing? It's fine. It's just natural, maybe. And so there's not that much eros-psyche-logos dynamic, expansion, the fire of that.

But the question is really: why? And is it soul-making? Or are there anti-libidinal patterns or blocks in the logos, or rigidity or fear, that's actually coming in and blocking the whole thing? So it's not actually as soul-making as it could be, or not, so to speak, genuine, authentic to that soul. These, to me, are the more important questions. Not: is it right, is it wrong, is it what the Buddha said? This is all a whole other level of view and story and soul-making fantasy that comes in around that.

The other possibility is what can happen when someone starts with that kind of view and that sense and that concept of the path. That's what they're given to understand from what they've encountered or read or what they've been taught. But that person has a lot of eros in their soul, so to speak, and the eros is not being blocked. Or rather, the blocks are not sufficiently rigid. The walls there are not sufficiently rigid enough to prevent the eros, the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, pushing on those walls and stretching the view and stretching the possibilities of experience that then that person opens to—stretching the logos and the conception, the whole sense of what awakening can be and what the path then is.

Either stretching it gradually or in stages, or shattering that view, breaking those walls—this breaking of the vessels I've talked about before, the shevirat hakelim they talk about in certain streams of Kabbalistic teaching. And because of the eros and the aliveness of the eros...

The expansion of that, the breaking of those walls, requires a new conception to be consolidated and constructed—a bigger conception that allows more, a bigger fantasy that allows more. Because some people do have a lot of fire, a lot of soul, a lot of eros, and there will be this movement toward expansion. Often there's a quickness with that, along with all the multi-dimensional, multi-aspected fertility of the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic. They need, or they create, or they discover, or they open to more.

So a fourth possibility is what we might call classically a kind of tantric view, or a set of views that we might call tantric, as a way of conceiving the path and awakening. If you've seen a lot of those tantric thangkas or icons—paintings or sometimes sculptures—there's the depiction of a Buddha as actually a couple in sexual union, erotic sexual union. There's the yab-yum. Usually it's male and female, the Buddha and the consort, but the totality is actually conceived as the Buddha. It's not only the Buddha and something else—the totality of that union is the Buddha, or is a Buddha. This represents and conveys through an image a vision and a conception of awakening.

There is the union, depicted sexually—the union of emptiness and appearances. Sometimes it's conceived that way. Emptiness in that view, often in the tantric view, doesn't only mean emptiness of inherent existence in the way that I've mostly explained it in the past. It means really a transcendent, non-dual awareness—a non-dual wisdom awareness, a gnosis, a jñāna, a non-dual wisdom awareness that is not separate from appearances, that is empty in itself and that knows the emptiness of all things. So that jñāna is actually what emptiness means in some tantric traditions, not just the emptiness of inherent existence.

And that is, as I said, in erotic union, in sexual union—we're not separate from the senses, the world, experience of the senses, appearances. Those appearances are empty and divine.

Or in some explanations, this yab-yum, this erotic union, sexual union that's depicted there, represents the union of prajñā and upāya—wisdom and skillful means. Wisdom, which again is this wisdom consciousness, this wisdom awareness, this gnosis of a Buddha, of a fully enlightened being—what I said before, this jñāna, this empty, knowing, pervasive, universal, cosmic awareness of emptiness that is non-dual, not separate from means.

So there's wisdom and means, the two treasures of a fully enlightened being. The means is not just skill in teaching—it actually refers, in its deeper meaning, to the upāya as the mandala, which is the world, the world of divine appearances that appears to that wisdom awareness. So there's this union of wisdom and means, which effectively means the union of subject and object, of wisdom awareness and world, of psyche and physis, of soul and the world, soul and the world of the senses, the world of appearances.

Now in classic Tantra, at least in some streams that I'm familiar with, that constitutes a beyondness—something that I'm not quite fully realized yet that I want to know, want to experience. But notice that the divinity there and the beyondness there is both in the divine appearances, but they also have a place for the transcendent, the non-fabrication of perception and experience. Both are there.

There's the tantric instruction, the instruction in the Vajrayāna—the thrust for me, the central thrust of that whole yāna, really, of Vajrayāna—of seeing, sensing, knowing, recognizing all experiences as divine. Not just empty of inherent existence, but divine and empty of inherent existence. Knowing all experiences—not just some experiences, all experiences. So there are these radical teachings about eating feces and eating semen, about seeing unethical actions—all of it as divine. Can I see all of that as divine?

Now you're probably aware by now that what we're teaching here, what we call imaginal practice or soul-making, that whole movement, has a lot of parallels and connection points with that whole direction and movement of Vajrayāna teaching and tantric teaching. They're not the same, and I wouldn't want to equate them or claim that, but there are a lot of parallels there, obviously, with what we're teaching.

Both of those streams—just like the tantric—the soul-making direction, the sense of the path as a path of soul-making, the sense of awakening as a movement into soul-making, the movement of soul-making, gives place to and gives an important place to the imaginal. That's characteristic of both tantric practice and soul-making practice, of course. And that includes the intra-psychic imaginal, of course, but also the imaginal pervading the world and opening up the world of the senses.

So there's not just this transcendence—there's this opening to the senses and the inclusion of the senses as part of the path. And there's the possibility of divinity not just transcendent to the senses, but in and through the senses in what we've talked about:

theophany and cosmopoiesis. So the possibilities of beyondness here—to open to, to know, to fully penetrate, to fully explore and become intimate with—are many. In fact, they're unlimited, they're infinite. Do you get that? There are infinite possibilities of beyondnesses, because the ways that theophanies can manifest, the possibilities for theophany and the possibilities for cosmopoiesis, are unlimited. And the possibilities for imaginal divinity are just infinite. There's no limit on the soul-making creativity there and discovery there.

Notice too that in this way of conceiving things, awakening or the goal or fruit of the path becomes or is something infinite and something open-ended. In the Vajrayāna conception, because only a Buddha has that kind of awareness, is actually able to fully—for example, able to fully see the emptiness of things without that perception of whatever thing they're perceiving fading.

So only a Buddha, not an Arahant, not anyone else, is able to both fully perceive and cognize the emptiness of something and perceive that something at the same time. And so they have this full awareness of emptiness and divinity simultaneously—only a Buddha. And no one's going to say, "I'm a Buddha," or "I have reached," or even think they have reached that. So there's a kind of open-endedness that effectively constellates the path as part of the path itself. It becomes open-ended: "I'm not there yet, I'm not there yet." Do you see what I mean?

And from the soul-making conception, in that understanding of path and movement, because of the infinitude of possibilities of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic and what it creates and discovers and what is revealed and opened there, the path is also, and awakening is also, open-ended. At what point in this soul-making dynamic am I going to draw a line and say, "That's awakening now—finished"?

Notice, too, something even more radical. In different ways with the tantric conception and with the soul-making conception—let's focus on the soul-making conception now—there's a primacy given, as I've talked about before, a primacy granted or recognized to image, to fantasy. And so we come to recognize at a certain point that our sense of the path, our conception of it, our fantasy of the path, of awakening, of Buddha, of self on the path, is fantasy, is grounded in image. That's a really radical reframing of the whole venture—a really radical realization, a really radical reconstitution.

With this soul-making, as I touched on just now, what happens then, if you get the sense of this movement, to the whole idea of attainment? There's just this infinite possibility of opening of the soul-making. It's endless, potentially unlimited. What happens to the idea of attainment? What happens to the self-sense in relationship to whatever happens to the idea of attainment? What happens to that whole self-measurement construction? Do you understand?

So there's quite a lot to notice here. I'll just point out a few things—they're all connected, so it's not in any particular order, but I want to highlight a few things in addition to what I've already pointed out. Some of them we've already touched on, but I want to draw them out a bit more and make sure you realize them, recognize them.

This I've already said, but just to reiterate: In what I was calling the traditional perspective on things, this movement either towards the transcendent, unfabricated, or to some point of oneness—universal oneness of some different kind on that spectrum of lessening fabrication—the stages on that thread, on that spectrum, are actually limited in one direction. There's just a movement of lessening fabrication. We could probably enumerate the typical experiences, the different kinds of oneness and so forth, and eventually this transcendent unfabricated. There's a kind of finite series of perceptions, of openings to different dimensions, different kinds of senses of divinity that go with those openings when they're very strong and deep for the being, for the opening of consciousness there.

But there's a finite series, and that series moves in one direction—the direction of lessening fabrication. It might get flavored a little bit differently, with tender compassion versus awareness or whatever. There are a few different flavors, but they tend to be a finite series that are grouped together around this spectrum of lessening fabrication.

In contrast to that, we're trying to open up a path that really places soul-making quite centrally, or at least has a place for soul-making, that would allow and give a place to all that—definitely that movement along the spectrum of lessening fabrication, all the different finite series of perceptions of oneness and less fabrication and eventually non-fabrication that happen along that spectrum. But in addition, there is an infinity of other possible directions because of the endless diversity and creativity of the imaginal faculty, the imaginal dimensions.

So theophany can happen—theophanies can take this form, or that form, or this character, or that flavor. Instead of just going along one line into less fabrication, having a few similar-ish kind of experiences that are quite common for spiritual practitioners who practice with a lot of dedication and depth, there's actually a kind of movement out in every possible direction. All the creativity and discovery that can happen in different kinds of cosmic places, different kinds of theophany. You understand?

Second thing, and again, I've touched on this too, just briefly: Some conceptions of the path—actually probably often, but some more than others—some fantasies of the path more than others, don't realize or would be very reluctant to admit or refuse to admit that fantasy is part of the whole movement there and part of what's constellated there. That there is fantasy of the Buddha, fantasy of what awakening is, fantasies of the self in relationship with tradition, in relationship to what the path is and moving on the path—not realizing that or admitting that. And I'm thinking particularly of the third conception where there's no beyond, this kind of almost existentialist Buddhism that's popular among some people who conceive themselves as secular Buddhists.

that the whole thing is kind of dependent on realism—that the world really is like this, that the existential limitations are real as I perceive them, that this is the facticity. I might avoid the word truth, but the whole kind of sense of what would happen to the sense of tragedy, what would happen to the bravery that's required there, to open to that and feel the poignancy of it.

If I acknowledge that it may not be real, that this is just one view, one way of looking, one perception, the whole thing collapses without the realism that underpins it and the belief in the reality of this difficult existential situation. That's the reality of things. The whole thing collapses. It can have no traction and no kind of power. And it's hard then to create a fantasy around it. Hard for it to become really sustaining.

Third thing to point out right now. And again, I touched on this before, or hinted at it before. Notice that in each of these four possibilities I gave—the traditional possibility of moving towards the unfabricated or different kinds of oneness; the possibility of just moving in the world, really acquiring more experiences because there is no dimensionality; the third possibility of insisting on one-dimensionality but then the path is coping with that and being resigned and having some equanimity in relation to that, opening to that reality of the one-dimensionality of existence; and the fourth possibility, what we call the tantric or soul-making vision and conception.

In each of those four, notice that each implies something with respect to the senses and the world, to how we then view and relate to the senses and the world as part of the path or as not part of the path, or just how the path situates itself, and awakening—however it's conceived in each of those four types—how it situates itself in regard to the senses.

So for example, what I was calling the traditional view, that whole movement to the transcendent, unfabricated—beyond the senses, beyond anything remotely like sense experience, and that movement towards the ending of rebirth, if it's really classically conceived—that says something about the world of the senses, and you get this in the Pali Canon. It's something to be let go of. It has nothing really to do with the path. There's nothing good in the world of the senses. It's just something to be put up with in this lifetime, but eventually to be transcended.

In the one-dimensional view, in the craving, samsaric, non-path kind of view, the senses are just something one is trying to acquire. You see, they all imply something about the senses and the relationship we have, or the path has, and then the view and the attitude constellated with respect to the senses in the world.

In the soul-making or tantric view, there is a beyond, but that beyond includes, yes, a transcendent beyond, but also the beyond in and through the senses. So there's a beyond, so to speak, that's not beyond the senses. In and through this experience of this beloved other—this tree, nature, the world, my body, whatever it is—when we come into erotic, imaginal relationship with that thing, that sense experience, there is a beyondness. There's more to it, there's more to fathom, to connect with, to open to, to discover, to be revealed, to enjoy, to penetrate.

So we'll come back to this more, the implications for the senses. And related to that, there's an implication of each of these conceptions of the path with the whole movement of fabrication. So again, in the transcendent model, the movement is to end fabrication. The whole thrust is towards less and less fabrication. Everything on the path in a classically conceived model moves in the direction of less fabrication—pretty much everything on the path. And eventually one wants to not fabricate at all, have that experience enough that there's this complete non-fabrication of the world of experience. And there's the elevation of that.

Whereas in the soul-making view or the tantric view, there's the recognition of the importance of that, but also the recognition of skillful, or let's say soul-making fabrication, beautiful fabrication. One knows it's empty, sees image as image, and one consents to, allows, opens to, supports that beauty of the soul-making fabrication.

Can you see, do you realize how the questions that I asked you right at the beginning of this talk were potentially questions about eros? I don't know if you see too implied in what I've just been saying in the last few minutes that if the eros is strong and if it's allowed, then the one-dimensional view won't be enough. It will, as I said, crack at a certain point or be expanded at a certain point.

If the eros is strong and if the eros is allowed, it will expand the actual view and conception and image, if you like, of path and awakening and all of that beyond. It has to open up more dimensions and thus more possibilities and more of a sense of beyond to discover.

And if eros is allowed to impregnate and catalyze the eros-psyche-logos dynamic and the soul-making dynamic, the view of a one-dimensionality where I'm just endlessly chasing more experiences and pleasure for the ego, horizontally, wider and wider—that also won't be enough. Something will open up and we'll realize, oh, I can get, there's another kind of more, other kinds of more I can get as I go deeper, as the dimensionality opens, the facets of things open.

But actually, what I want to say more than that right now is that if the eros is strong and if it's allowed and if it's allowed to galvanize that eros-psyche-logos dynamic, and if that's allowed to self-fertilize and do its thing, then both the eros for the transcendent and the eros for what we might call the immanent—the sense of beyondness in and through the world of sense experience, the sense of divinity in and through the world and the world of sense experiences—both the transcendent thrust, the transcendent opening, and the immanent, or the opening to the immanence, the divine immanence, both will eventually be open to, just because of the tendency to...

unlimited and multi-directional expansion of the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic. Do you understand?

And that could happen in any order. Someone might be really at the beginning, you know, really wanting to know the transcendent, and that's really what they want to move towards. But when they've opened to that, when they've experienced that and, so to speak, drunk from that well and that whole spectrum, then something might turn around back to the world of the senses, and that might start opening up in its imminence, in the sense of divine imminence there, and the whole soul-making dynamic with relationship to the senses.

Or someone else might do it the other way around, and the soul-making happens first with the imaginal and the whole world of the senses, and then at a certain point, the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic also recognizes that another kind of dimensionality can be had in the progressive lessening of fabrication of perception.

But if the eros is full enough, it will actually eventually want both. And why not have both? Why not be able to move into both? Not in any particular order necessarily. It could happen both ways.

These four possibilities that I've described a little bit are not intended to be an exhaustive list. But there are possibilities for the ways we conceive or imagine the direction and the aim of our path, or that anyone conceives or fantasizes the direction or aim of the path.

Now I know this is a lot and I really don't want to overload you here. But as much as there are, or as well as there being conceptions and fantasies of the direction and the aim, we can also open up an investigation of the fantasies of the self on the path. Now this is connected with what we've just been through. And again, I don't mean to be exhaustive here, but I just want to mention this because we'll actually come back to it tomorrow.

We could, for example, delineate a few possibilities of different fantasies—the way the self imagines or conceives what it's doing on the path, its relationship with tradition, with the job that it has to do, if you like. So this is a little bit different, but related to what we just talked about. And again, this list is not exhaustive.

We could—and most people do, I think—conceive of the path in what I might call the fantasy or the conception of the medical patient or the medical doctor. This is actually how the Buddha originally presented his path, in what was then the language of the doctor's diagnosis, prognosis, and prescription. So basically, we tend to talk and conceive of the path as a movement towards either eradicating suffering, or for most people, just reducing suffering, so that it's the increase of peace, calmness, and well-being, and getting rid of or reducing suffering.

And so we are the patient, so to speak, receiving the medicine, the prescription from the Buddha, from the teacher. Or some of you are teaching already, and in that case you are the doctor prescribing. So there's this very—this is extremely common because it's the language of the Four Noble Truths, which is the principle building block of Buddhism. It's conceived and presented as a movement about what? About the First Noble Truth, about suffering, and the investigation of the cause of it, and the movement beyond, or to lessen it in the Third Truth, and how that happens in the Fourth Truth. So the whole structure of Buddhism, the whole language and conception of it is very much planted in or imbued with a whole medical patient, medical doctor image and conception.

A second possibility that's very common is to have what I would call a religious fantasy of the path and the self on the path, in which, as is characteristic of religious movements, the authority is in the past. So there's a great emphasis on tradition, and what one is doing—the self then in this path, in this fantasy of the path, in the religious fantasy—is really attempting to reproduce an awakening that has been achieved and taught by some religious figure, authority in the past. So it looks to the past, and in its tendency to scrutinize texts and seek authority in the past, in the text, in the explanation of the Buddha. The Buddha said this, the Buddha this, the Buddha that. And then what I'm trying to do is have some kind of awakening that's, to some extent, replicating the awakening the Buddha had. That's the kind of awakening I'm going for.

Moving through these very briefly—we're going to come back to it. So this is the medical patient, this is the religious fantasy, the second one.

The third fantasy, and I think this is quite unusual, is the fantasy of the scientific researcher. So that one is on the path, but one is perhaps motivated more by curiosity. I'm curious about consciousness. I'm curious about states of consciousness. I'm curious about perception. I'm curious about what can be discovered there. I'm open to the fantasy and the possibility that I might discover new things about consciousness, and we might discover new possibilities of perception and conception and experience and theories and all of that. In that model, the ending of suffering, or even the reduction of suffering, may at times not be the primary thing. The primary thing is interest, curiosity, understanding, opening of discovery.

A fourth possibility is what I call the artist fantasy. And again here—and I've talked about this in the past—what's the point of art? What's art for? I don't think there's an answer to that question.

Human beings cannot fully circumscribe or define or capture what motivates us, what motivates an artist, what motivates our love of art. Why is the artist doing what they do? Some art makes a political statement or tries to alleviate suffering in some way, but most art has nothing to do with that. It goes well beyond the medical fantasy – the artist fantasy.

This relates to beauty, yes. To creativity, yes. And what's the relationship with the past then? We might, as an artist, imitate past masters and know how to work in this style or that style, but the conception of art more generally is of something open-ended, just as some conceptions of science are. They look more to the future rather than the past in the religious fantasies. Art is open – I don't know what new forms, what new ways of thinking about art, what new creations will come. It's not just that we're trying to reproduce something from the past. And what's it for? What part does beauty, in the range of that word, play in that?

So there are four. When a person might have an adventure fantasy, the path is just an adventure. Maybe I'm slaying demons, or maybe I'm just – I don't know what. Or it could be – that could be a fifth one or a sixth one – a lover. The whole path is fantasied as a lover. And what is a lover? What's the movement of a lover or the fantasy or the sense of self? The path as lover. Lover of what? And what do lovers want? And what do lovers do?

We're going to talk more about this, but I don't know if you can get the sense – I've alluded to it already – how each of these casts into the larger imaginal constellation that each one of these fantasies creates. The past is cast in a certain way. How I view authority, the past of the Buddha, the tradition – my relationship with that. And also the future and the direction. Also cast differently is what the self does. What is the job of the self? What is the interest or the priority of the self? What gives joy, and what supports eros. So all of these are different depending on the fantasy. Eros and image go together, so of course it's dependent on that.

So here are some questions. Again, unfair, too quick, and so forth. But do you realize that you have a fantasy of the path and of the self on the path and of awakening? Do you realize that there's fantasy operating there? Maybe that's a better way of putting it.

Can you – and implicit in my usage of the word "fantasy" is not that it's a bad thing at all, quite the opposite: important thing, necessary thing, beautiful thing that gives rise to beauty. But do you realize that it's there? The fantasy is there. Do you recognize what it is? Or let's say what are the dominant fantasies? It might be more than one. Do you recognize what they are for you? Or what it is for you? What's dominant? What fantasy dominates? Tends to dominate?

And this can be complex. I'm aware of this because they can be mixed, or different periods or times in our practice where one or the other is the dominant fantasy, or different in relationship to different streams of practice. But can you start to get a feel for this? Are you aware of it?

More importantly, I'd say – am I, are you, locked into a certain fantasy? Just locked into that medical model?

I'm trying to fit everything into that, and the whole way I construe the path and the self and my movement is caught within that framework—or perhaps trapped within the religious model, or whatever pattern has taken hold.

Where am I in relation to how well I have replicated what I hear my teacher or other teachers talk about or describe—what they seem to be living, embodying? Am I locked into a certain fantasy, or is there flexibility? Is there some creativity in the whole way I imagine myself in relation to the tradition, in relation to the goal or the aim or the direction? Locked in or flexible? We want flexibility.

And again—I know this is moving quickly—is it authentic? In other words, where has this fantasy come from? Am I simply adopting the medical fantasy and fitting myself into that framework because that's how ninety-nine percent of teachings are presented, not just in Buddhism either? We talk about freedom, talk about liberation, talk about healing, talk about meeting suffering or easing pain or peace or well-being—different flavors, and that's so much the tenor of the language, so much the presentation that we can't help thinking that way. And there's also this sense of "Well, he was the Buddha, or they are this teacher, and they must know, and therefore I'm trying to replicate that."

But is it authentic? I'm not saying these approaches are bad at all, but the question we might ask—perhaps more appropriately now—is: Is it authentic to you? And again, the deeper question: Is it soul-making?

Are the fantasies that are in play, the fantasies in which you move and in which your path moves, and which, if you like, cast the path before you—are they soul-making for you? Do we realize, do you realize the implications of simply the fact that there is fantasy operating in our construal, in our relationship, in our conception of path, of awakening, of Buddha, of teacher, of self on the path? Do you realize the implications of that?

And more questions, but going back to what we asked at the beginning about what you want from the path—if you answered those original questions by saying you wanted peace, or ease, or less suffering, or whatever it was—just to check, and I asked this at the beginning: Is it only that that you want? Is it only ease or peace or less suffering?

Certainly at times that's the dominant thing we want, and probably appropriately. I'm not saying it should be or shouldn't be. Just check: Is that all you want? The ending, or even just the reduction, of suffering? If you want just peace, just ease?

I think it's worth pointing out—and I know this is quite radical—that if we emphasize the medical patient or medical doctor fantasy as the most fundamental one... It's fine to have a bit of the artist, or a bit of the adventurer, or a bit of the lover, or the scientific researcher, whatever it is. But if most fundamental is this medical patient, medical doctor fantasy, I think it's worth pointing out that giving it fundamental status—even if you're not usually conscious of this—will probably limit the soul-making potential.

If that medical patient fantasy is too fundamental in how you're conceiving your path or how you're teaching, soul-making may be allowed, of course, but it's somehow always within or in service of the medical fantasy or the medical model. Soul-making is valued because it presents different ways of healing, or whatever.

Of course, we could ask: What does healing mean? And we could talk about the healing of the soul in a bigger sense than just healing of suffering. What does that mean—the healing of perception? I've touched on this before: tikkun olam, the restoration, the healing of the world, the healing of perception through soul-making, the opening of soul-making.

And with the artist, of course—what does the artist make? The artist is creating what? One answer could be: they're making soul. In the poetry of perception, they're making soul. The artist makes soul, creates soul. We could construe that as the purpose of the artist. And the researcher is researching soul. So you could construe it this way.

And the lover—what does the lover want? What does the lover love? Not an abstract lover, but your lover. The lover in you. Or the hermit in you.

So again, you can take these questions away, or if you're listening to a recording, press pause at any time and sit with them if they feel fruitful, if they're interesting and opening. But what is your response, or what responses are triggered in you when you realize that your love and your devotion... to the path, your love of the path, your devotion to the path, and all that's involved in that, when you realize that it's partly at least based on and imbued with fantasy, how does your heart respond to that?

How does your thinking respond?

How does your body respond?

How does your soul respond?

You realize there's a certain basis in fantasy, a certain inextricable involvement of fantasy. What's the response of the soul, the response in the body?

And if you feel like somehow this takes the rug out from underneath things, and there's a kind of deconstruction of the fantasy and the concept of the path, that doesn't last—if that's even what happens. But that won't last, because we need to construct, and we do construct.

So the question becomes: what is constructed in the aftermath of that deconstruction? There will be a construction. What is constructed? And is what's constructed a realist construction, given a kind of realist belief and conception as a basis, or not?

So if there's a deconstruction, what is constructed in the aftermath? And is it a realist construction or not?

With all this, we could ask: what is driving and pulling me? What is driving and pulling all this love and dedication? Well, it's Eros. That's a big part of it. Eros is involved. And where does that come from?

We can say the soul loves soul-making. We said that as a kind of axiom: the soul loves soul-making. So the Eros is for soul-making. The Eros of the soul is for soul-making. The soul loves soul-making. But whose Eros is it? Whose soul-making is it?

Whose soul-making is it? Whose soul is getting made, so to speak?

So then with all those questions, what is the view that I have of this Eros? What is my relationship with this Eros? Those questions have a large bearing.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 96

Energy Body and Image (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 45 min

> In this Q&A session from the 'Of Hermits and Lovers' retreat, Rob Burbea addresses several profound questions about embodied practice and perception. He explores the concept of the 'energy body' not as a separate reality but as a particular way of looking and relating to experience - a fabricated perception that can range from dense and contracted to light and expansive. When students encounter difficult sensations like breathlessness or 'drowning' feelings during meditation, Burbea offers multiple approaches: inclining attention toward pleasant sensations to allow them to wash over difficulties, exploring what the stuck energy wants to do and allowing movement, or practicing radical acceptance with minimal aversion.
>
> The discussion moves into imaginal practice, examining how ordinary perceptions can become infused with sacred dimensionality. Burbea explains that this shift requires a loosening of conceptual grip, inclusion of the energy body, and an attitude of reverent humility. He addresses concerns about images that seem to deliver messages and then disappear, suggesting that reducing images to utilitarian functions drains their sacredness. Instead, he advocates for relationship-based engagement that honors the inexhaustible nature of imaginal perception.
>
> Throughout, Burbea emphasizes that all experience - whether samādhi, energy body sensations, or imaginal visions - arises through dependent origination and is shaped by our ways of looking. This understanding liberates practitioners from rigid conceptual frameworks while supporting both calming samādhi practice and soul-making imaginal work.

Bye.

What are the useful distinctions around physical or gross body and energy body? Where do we put down one and pick up the other? And what to do with this mixture of feelings that's going on?

You're asking about experiencing the energy body as light and pleasant, while the physical body has more gross sensations. You've also heard of things like the astral body. What's the distinction there? Is there even a distinction?

Practically speaking, sometimes it feels like the energy body extends quite far out—yesterday in the hall, maybe 8 or 10 feet. You were even experimenting with reaching it out to the tree through the window. Out there, it feels really quite nice and rarefied and subtle and pleasant. But something in here feels difficult, particularly around breathing and sometimes jerky sensations, with the physical breath very shallow and stuttery.

In terms of conceptual distinctions, I don't know the answer in a way. I'm not sure how much it matters. I feel like we're a little bit stuck with this word "energy body," which maybe if I go back a few years, I would come up with something different, because it's more a way of seeing, like everything else—a way of relating.

Sometimes this space feels more like a field of energy and light and pleasant, and maybe that's where it got its name. But that partly comes from a way of paying attention to it. It partly comes as a reflection of what's going on emotionally and energetically. But at other times it can be very dense—dense in a problematic way, and dense also in a lovely way. There's a whole spectrum to what it can feel like in terms of density or insubstantiality. All of that's energy body.

So energy body is more a way of relating, a way of seeing, a way of sensing. It's not confining my experience to just the range of the usual kind of sensations we have or the usual ideas of the body. It's a way of perceiving, a way of looking.

As for astral body and all that—you can have all kinds of experiences. What the truth is about that, I'm more inclined to say the truth depends on how I'm looking at it and the divisions I make. It's interesting when you see different people's systems. This system has four chakras, that system has seven, that system has nine, that system has eight. This one's red. No, no, it's purple. It kind of goes to show that the way I'm looking at the body, what's going on conceptually, what's going on in my relationship to it, fabricates and constructs what's happening to it.

Is that a problem? No.

No. It doesn't matter. So I don't know the answers, if there even are any, other than it's a dependent arising. Do you feel like you need—and this is the first part of the question—do you feel like you need to know the answers to that? What's behind the question?

With the breath, it's very subtle. There's something going on here. It's called dukkha. So if we come back to that in just a second, the problem and how we can relate to it and work with it. You said something very lovely: it's an exploration. So what you're exploring is experience. With that experience, there will be certain conceptions of what the energy body is, but explore.

What I would feel wary of is getting too stuck in one kind of experience. I'm always dense and I'm always focused on dukkha, or I'm always really wide because that's the cosmic consciousness or whatever. It's like all these ranges of experiences are available. Can it be related to the breath? Absolutely.

So there's breath and they talk about subtle breath. I could use those words interchangeably: breath body and energy body, subtle body—it's all good. Or you can have an experience where the experience of the energy body and the perception of the energy body doesn't seem to have anything to do with the breath. You stop breathing and you're still—there's all the vitality and you're alive.

I tend to be more fluid with these kinds of divisions. Divisions, delineations, concepts—they're only useful insofar as they're useful. And they're not realities. So it's like you can pick up a delineation, create a delineation, and if it's helpful for you, go for it. Just don't get locked into it. If it's not helpful, leave it.

But if you view the whole thing as an exploration of experience—which means perception—and all reality is in the realm of experience and perception, which is bound up with ways of looking, dependent on ways... You understand? So if you view it that way, then... Do you understand what I'm getting at? It's like the conceptions are not realities outside of you. The whole thing is just in the service of exploration of experience, either what's helpful, what eases dukkha, or what's soul-making. Or both.

So in terms of this thing that you're feeling, I don't know—maybe if we have time together we can do a little bit. But what I will say is... Sometimes what happens is, let me work the other way around. If it's pleasant out here, it depends on your intention. If my intention is to have some samadhi, some well-being, then first port of call would be to go to where it's pleasant.

In the stream of that intention, that's not the time to get entangled in the difficult. So the difficulty—you're not ignoring it, but you give more attention and nuzzle up and enjoy the pleasant. Most people have a habit of getting pulled into the unpleasant in ways that are not helpful.

So the first port of call—what you'll often find is that inclining the attention towards the pleasant and just again and again enjoying it... So just, let's find the pleasant again and again. What can happen then is that the pleasant begins to wash over the unpleasant. It's the subtly unskillful attention to the unpleasant that's keeping generating unpleasantness sometimes. You understand?

So there's just one kind of—if you can incline the mind that way again and again in the moment, just very, very relaxed. Your job is just to find the pleasure and just subtly enjoy it and keep doing that. And sometimes you don't need to bother about this. It will blend over if the intention is towards samadhi.

Sometimes that, still within the intention towards samadhi, doesn't help. So then you can see: does this thing want to move in any way? Now you mentioned restlessness and it seemed like it was a bit... so then you might get the sense that somehow it wants to—you know, could be—go out the top of the head, or out the throat, or this way, or... It's like, what does it want to do? And kind of allow it to do that.

So the energy body is dependent on perception—it's a fabrication, that whole structure. You can either imagine it doing that, or just kind of open it. Open the energy body to allow it to move how it wants to move.

As a principle, and I'm speaking to everyone here, sometimes contraction, pain, these difficult sensations are, in energetic terms, just stuck energy. They want to move in a certain way, and we simply need to help allow them to move. So you can use your imagination, whatever works. You can use the breath.

What is it? If it's here in this particular place, maybe it wants to breathe in and out this way, or in and out through the back, or up and down, and out through the head, or in through the head, or out through your heart—you know, whatever. There's some way of bringing the dynamism of the felt and imagined breath energy into play with this stuck place, including it, and that allows it to move more.

The thing I say about samadhi is: anything goes. Anything. If it works, great. It doesn't matter. We're just in the business of—here's this field, let's try and get some well-being without struggling too much. So if it's the imagination, great. If it's a more energetic approach, fantastic.

There's a third possibility, still in the realm of the intention of samadhi. Okay, those two didn't work, and then you go to this stuck place, this contracted place, this difficult place, and actually move into a mode of hyper-allowing.

So it's unpleasant, and then you say, "This moment I just completely open to that unpleasantness. I completely..." There's this kind of open, open, open. What's happening then is you're entering into a way of looking that has minimal aversion. You have to get to 120% opening, allowing, welcoming to this thing. Because what's keeping it in place is the aversion—there's a subtle aversion to it.

There are so many different responses and things you could try. Sometimes it's a matter of caring for the being who feels like they're drowning. So drop the "I'm trying for samadhi" agenda. Something needs care there. There's vulnerability, and breath is so primary. If you feel like you can't get your breath—I mean, you're not going to asphyxiate, I can tell you that. But still, that might not be enough reassurance.

So something needs some care there, in terms of that experience. With this way of approaching it, you would more gently focus in on that and want to hold it. And it's not just the sensations, because you can kind of laser beam those unpleasant sensations with mindfulness. We want also to care about the person who feels like they're drowning. It's not just sensations reduced from a person—it's sensations with the person, with the self.

When I teach people to work with the breath in these moments of intensity or discomfort, I emphasize that there are so many different possibilities—endless approaches from many different angles, moving in many different directions.

Sometimes, as Andrew mentioned, you can actually use the breath to smooth out these difficult sensations. But you have to be very gentle; you're not forcing anything. If you're coming from a place of "Come on, change this," it won't work. It's really like you would stroke a wounded cat or something tender. You're just easing something with the breath—with kindness and with the breath. Sometimes this can really shift the energy, heal it, calm it, open it. There are so many possibilities.

Andrea raised a question related to what Sampo asked the other day about feeding the practice or leaning in a particular direction. "I've been noticing that I might be taking a breath that feels rather lovely, but is not necessarily desire, but I've been perceiving it as desire in the moment, which leads to more breaths or more currents that feel like eros, not necessarily with an image attached to them. And then sometimes an image does come up as a result of perceiving in that way. So the question was more around if there are ways of looking that allow more imaginal to come through—like with metta, sometimes feeling the sun on your face and suddenly feeling that that's metta coming to you helped me lean into metta. Can you do that with desire, this perceiving lovely sensations that may not have that relationship as desire?"

I understood the example about metta and the sun, but I asked her to clarify the connection with breath and desire.

She explained: "You might suddenly take a breath in the hall that goes from the nostrils all the way down to the perineum and feels wide and open and lovely. There isn't an image in your mind at that moment—it's just the body opening. But the next breath, the head's tilted back and there's more sensuousness with the breath. It could be just words that you or Catherine uttered that suddenly sends the body into a little bit of an 'ooh,' and not necessarily an image, but a leaning into that sort of 'ooh,' having a momentum that would propel."

Let me try something, if I understand. If we go back to the sunlight on the face—sometimes one can feel that warmth and that light, but essentially it's an imaginal perception of the sun that's fused with metta. All that's an imaginal constellation: sun, skin, warmth, metta. These things—if you go to Newton Abbot High Street and say, "Do you know that the sun radiates loving-kindness?"—it's not a usual perception. So it's an imaginal perception.

So there's something that arises in a moment, and then you can gently encourage that or deliberately return to it at a different time. The same with the experience of body and breath—actually, the experience of anything.

I was wondering—it's actually quite hard to articulate what it is that... you know, when we talk about intrapsychic images, for most people that's relatively easy to understand. Some people say, "Oh, I don't get any," but that's a different kind of thing. But when we talk about—like the other day when I said this is an imaginal hat—it's not an imaginary hat. Actually, it's not imaginal, but it could be imaginal. It's not imaginary in the sense that there is a thing here. But it can be an imaginal hat.

So it's quite hard to articulate what it is that moves the material perception of anything—what is it that infuses it with the imaginal? And how do we make ourselves available to that? And how do we support that?

A lot of the time, what happens is actually what you're describing already—we catch things on the breeze. We are in a receptive mode, relatively speaking, and something... a current just comes and a perception begins to open and we just ride it. In time that gets more—depending on a lot of conditions—that kind of receptivity and sensitivity gets more and more encouraged.

But apart from that, it's actually quite difficult to pinpoint what we can do in the moment to encourage that opening. I think part of it is listening to poetry—there's something Catherine mentioned that illuminates this. Ideas and words and other images function as drops of some kind of poetic potion that goes into the mix and sparks an imaginal perception. It's not just visual—it could be sound, it could be absolutely anything. Something starts to function as a kind of poetic, alchemical elixir.

What else is happening there? I haven't quite articulated this fully, but I can identify several elements. There's a loosening that's happening—a loosening of my ideas about what things are, of how things are. This involves the logos. It doesn't have to be a big deal, but I've relaxed the idea that the sun is only a massive ball of hydrogen undergoing nuclear fusion. It is that, but I've loosened my conceptual grip.

There's also more looseness in the perception itself, so that images can move. The energy body becomes involved again—this is another crucial aspect. The more the energy body is total and engaged, the more openness there will be to catching those currents.

There's also this sense of something being bigger than—and sometimes that's hard to pinpoint. What exactly is bigger than what? But there's this quality of humility and reverence, and the heart is involved with that. All these aspects arise together.

What this means is that we can consciously loosen some of these elements or cultivate certain attitudes—like coming into heartful humility and reverence—and that will support the opening. Sometimes what happens practically is that you've had that experience before, and you gently remember it and open and loosen in this way, and it returns. You can ride it again or open to it again.

But yes, it's actually quite difficult to formularize. I would be wary of creating a step-by-step process, although there are certain elements that consistently support this opening. Related to what Catherine was discussing, this represents a principal direction we're moving toward.

Sometimes people want an image, or they hear about someone else's fantastical encounter—a monster that arose in meditation with nine heads, purple skin, green flames coming from its mouth. That's an image, and it might be really meaningful. The test is in the soul-making. But even more important, I believe, is when the world itself becomes imaginally alive, imaginally perceived, opening up this dimensionality of sacredness. Some people will start there. This capacity to support that opening is really crucial.

Rachel had a question about this process. She described being in a receptive mode where images come that are very beautiful, definitely feeling like she's in the realm of the imaginal. After some time, the image delivers its message—it offers an insight or something important. Then it goes quickly, and the next image comes flickering in. In this receptive mode, it feels quite flickery. If she stays with an image longer, it feels like it's offering something up, and once she receives that, the next thing comes.

So Rachel is describing how images sometimes arise, and there's definitely the quality of the imaginal—she recognizes that. Then the image delivers its message, conveys whatever it came to communicate, and simply goes away as another image arrives. This process doesn't necessarily happen super quickly; it could unfold at any rhythm.

Okay.

When you feel like you try and hang on to the image, does it feel a little, what—forced, contracted?

"Yeah, it feels like the sacredness is falling away."

So when she tries to hold on to it, the sacredness is falling away. I wonder if I'm trying to hold on to this image because either I think I should, or because there might be something else it has to tell me. In other words, why am I trying to hold on to it? It might be that the intention is making the difference, draining the sacredness out of it.

Is it possible to start with the sense of sacredness itself? That the sense of sacredness is not exhausted by the message you've already received? If you think of an image like a person, then the person could rightfully feel insulted and not respected if you just view them as being there to give you this one thing, and then when that's done, they can go.

There's a way of entertaining the sense that the image is inexhaustible. That message was important and part of it, but it doesn't exhaust the image. The sacredness is always bigger than that message. What's really happening is we're granting an image its sacredness—entering into that posture, that relationship with it, and seeing what that does. This is different than trying to make it stay.

If that's possible, then if it goes, it goes. But I'm not entering into—what's the word? Utilitarian relationship. If I reduce an image to one meaning or one communication, it dies. It's like entering into a kind of relationship and attitude that doesn't do that.

"I mean, I feel like on some level I get that, and in a way that's why I'm opening to it, because I don't want to reduce it just to one message—like give me the message and go."

Maybe it's like getting away from the whole message idea. More just being in relationship. What about just loving it? What about just hanging out? What does relationship mean? There's a different relationship with the relationship itself.

It might be that there's the obvious thing, and then there are more subtle communications—but they might not be messages or instructions or insights. There's a rapport, a back and forth, a communication in the broader sense of the word: from the image to you, from you to the image. Some of that stuff is much more subtle. It might be a matter of quieting and taking the pressure off, just attuning more.

Having said all that, some images do just come and go. Sometimes it's just the restless mind. Sometimes it's just the nature of things. It depends on a lot. Sometimes you're skidding around and images are moving very fast. Then one becomes meaningful, more long-lived.

But it might be a matter of granting it that sacredness and that moreness, then easing into more sensitivity without grasping. There's something about the rapport, the relationship.

Yeah, so I would say yes, absolutely. But I would also say—and I think I mentioned this here the other day, I can't remember—but when you do imaginal practice, generally speaking, there's some release or opening or harmonization in the energy body that comes with the image. This is your indicator that you're on the right track. There might be agitation in the sense of excitement, but something in the energy body... You know, pīti is also agitating, right? So it's not so much the presence of agitation as the presence of some kind of harmonizing in the body. That reminds me of something else to say to Lawrence, but...

What you get as you develop imaginal practice is that at any point there's this possibility of just leaning more into the samādhi—leaning more into the energetic quality of what's going on and enjoying that and opening to that. And it takes you into deeper samādhi. So you're kind of letting the image go to some extent.

But then you can also go the other way. You can lean more into the image, into the complexity, into the meaningfulness, into the relationships within the image, into the emotions that are involved. Both directions are available to you, and both are part of the practice.

So yes, it definitely gets more subtle. The imaginal has its own spectrum of subtlety, just like samādhi does. At the gross end, you have very vivid, complex images with lots of narrative and emotion. As it gets more subtle, the images might become simpler, more archetypal, more essential. The emotions become more refined. The sense of meaning becomes more distilled.

But it's not exactly the same kind of subtlety as samādhi. In samādhi, things tend to merge and lose distinction. In imaginal practice, even as it gets more subtle, there's still this quality of relationship, of eros, of meaning-making that remains. The image might become very simple, but it's still an image. There's still this sense of "other" that you're in relationship with.

This is part of what makes imaginal practice so rich—you have these two vectors available to you at any moment. You can go deeper into the samādhi and let everything become more unified and peaceful, or you can go deeper into the imaginal and let the meaning and relationship become more complex and profound.

Eventually, you can learn to play with different emphases of attention. You might give very little attention to what's happening in the energy body, or place most of your attention there. You could focus primarily on the image, or on the emotion that's arising. There are all these facets of experience, and with practice, you can decide where to lean at any given moment.

Imaginal practice can absolutely take you to different levels of samadhi, simply by staying in touch with what's happening in the energy body and then, at any point, peeling off into that dimension and focusing there if you choose.

But there's also a way that images, as the whole thing matures, become more subtle—like most dharma practices. Going back to what you said initially, samadhi is a movement toward less fabricating. When you do imaginal practice, you fabricate. But what can happen is a kind of settling into samadhi where you can go as deep as you want and rest there if that's what appeals to you.

Then at some point, you can simply come up a little, so to speak—just loosen the whole thing slightly. What will have happened in that plunge is that the psyche has become loosened, creating a space where images can be born. If I'm deep in that stillness, I'm truly in a state of non-fabrication—and actually, all fabrication, all perception is fabricated. This includes worldly perception, bodily perception, and imaginal perception.

But it's like taking that plunge, then coming up just a little. The whole psyche becomes looser, and more imaginal material can arise if you wish.

This brings me to something else about what Lawrence mentioned—this energy that feels unpleasant. This is actually quite common. Piti can indeed feel unpleasant at times. I define piti as non-sensually arising pleasantness, but for many people at different stages in their exploration of samadhi, piti actually feels uncomfortable. It's too agitating, or too coarse.

This is very common. Many people who have tasted the calmer dimensions of samadhi become what I call "piti snobs." Something you would have given your right arm for years ago—this bliss—now becomes unpleasant. We need to find a relationship with it that allows it to be pleasant again.

Part of that is about allowing. There is some enjoyment present, even if it doesn't seem so. Often we've simply gotten into a relationship with piti where we tune into the unpleasant aspects, and our very resistance to it fabricates it as unpleasant. If we can open to it and find the pleasure within it, this actually begins fabricating it as pleasant.

This pattern is quite common at different stages of practice. Again, everything depends on the relationship. The relationship conditions, fabricates, shapes, and guides what unfolds—body, world, emotion, mind, image, energy, all of it. Everything depends on the quality of relationship we bring to our experience.

CHAPTER 97

Awakening and Soulmaking (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 38 min

> In this Q&A session from the "Of Hermits and Lovers" retreat, Rob Burbea explores profound questions about spiritual awakening and soulmaking practice. A practitioner with physical limitations asks whether enlightenment is possible without traditional meditation, leading to a discussion about the flexibility of contemplative practice and the narrow definitions often imposed on meditation. Burbea emphasizes that awakening can occur through walking meditation and other practices beyond sitting, drawing on sutta accounts of liberation in various postures.
>
> The conversation delves into how imaginal practice naturally leads to jhāna states through energy body alignment and attention captivation. When cosmic imagery spontaneously gives rise to samādhi, practitioners can learn to navigate between deepening absorption and continuing with imaginal exploration. Burbea explains how any image—whether peaceful or wrathful—can serve as a gateway to concentrated states through energetic resonance.
>
> A deeper philosophical inquiry emerges about whether image or body should be considered primary in spiritual practice. Burbea addresses this through the lens of emptiness, explaining how different conceptual frameworks create different experiences and truths. Whether starting from embodied awareness or imaginal perception, eros serves as the unifying force that eventually sanctifies all dimensions of experience. The devotional quality (bhakti) inherent in this work connects directly to eros, creating an expansive soul-making process that transforms understanding across psychological, philosophical, and experiential dimensions.

Anyone?

Suzanne, yes.

First, I want to say that your talk last night and this morning really resonated with me and was very useful. It got me very excited. The world of the senses is kind of taken care of for me. For as long as I can remember, I've always had a yearning, a really deep yearning to connect with something divine. I've interpreted experiences as Buddhism 101—all things are connected—and I had some synchronistic experiences. Then when I learned about emptiness, I thought, oh my god, I knew it. It just seemed to all make sense, and I developed this passion for experiencing it.

I know that it can slip into cravings sometimes. But in our meeting yesterday, you mentioned that I don't have to meditate. Because of my physical limitations, I don't think I'm going to be able to meditate in the traditional way. I know I'll have to try different things and be flexible.

So I'm wondering: can you have—as you were saying, you don't have to meditate to become enlightened—but what does enlightenment look like if you're not sitting on the cushion? Can you have an experience of the unfabricated? I know I've heard stories about monks and sudden realizations. What does that mean? Is it the same thing as having a cessation experience, or is it something else? Is it something different for everybody? I would think not, to a certain extent. There's a certain knowledge that you gain, right?

I just want to know that I'm moving in the right direction. I don't want to go off thinking I could just do this or that when it's not really a good direction.

Let me summarize the basic question: given what's happening physically right now with health, and feeling like long meditation sessions and frequent meditation sessions are not within the capabilities of the body, is it still possible to get enlightened? And is that kind of enlightenment I might get without long and frequent meditation the same kind of enlightenment as the beyond that you've described?

Thank you. I don't recall saying to you that you don't need to meditate.

What I did say was that meditation might not look like what you have a picture of. When someone asks me what is meditation, what is insight meditation, people give all kinds of descriptions. They think it's a certain posture or concentration or stillness, whatever. To me, it's just, in a nutshell, practicing a flexibility of ways of looking and seeing what comes out of that flexibility of ways of looking. Understanding comes out of that having to do with all kinds of things, but primarily emptiness. That doesn't have to look a certain way.

To make a distinction between meditation on retreat, on the cushion, and not—I feel that's overdone. People become enlightened during walking meditation absolutely. If you look at the suttas, there are loads of stories of that. There's this strange hierarchy between the four postures—sitting, standing, walking, lying down. Sitting is usually considered the best one apparently, but this division is artificial. Even in the Buddha's teaching, there are the four postures.

Even in the division between retreat and not retreat—long meditation sessions and long meditation retreats can be really fruitful, but they're not necessarily where a person's most transformative insights and liberations come. I have spent a lot of time on retreat, but even looking back, I wouldn't pinpoint the long times or sessions as the moments of greatest transformation. I don't think it stacks up that way. I don't think that bears up to scrutiny, really.

We have these ideas. I shared with Suzanne that when I was about 21, I was on retreat at IMS and had all this crazy energy happening. The teacher asked me to sit at the back of the room because I was disturbing people. When I was still disturbing people from there, they told me to go away. I sat on the other side of the courtyard, outside the meditation hall, in my room by myself, and eventually they asked me to leave.

I was 21, living in a foreign country, so passionate about the path, so wanting enlightenment and awakening.

And I remember after he said, "You know, it's better for you to leave. You're going to hurt yourself. You need something," he recommended. And I was devastated. I was absolutely devastated. I told you this story. I walked up that road thinking, "How am I going to get enlightened now?"

To me now, looking back, I really feel for him and that kind of passion, but it seems I was so naive. There was this simplicity: "If I can't do long retreats, then I won't get enlightened. If I can't sit a long time still..." I had gotten into this jhana practice and was trying not to be attached to it, but also thinking less and less fabrication—that's how it's going to happen through jhana practice.

But that's just one way things unfold. I've had many teachers say that there are ways other than jhana practice, that jhana practice is supposed to get you to a place where you can do insight. But that's just how it's often taught.

Teachers are important. Right now we're having this dialogue—I'm the teacher and you're the student—and I really recognize the support of that. But in this moment, I'm feeling a little uncomfortable, partly because this is such a big, tricky area. What is one's relationship with teachers and outside authority and people who say it's like this or like that?

For example, that idea about jhana. In my Insight Meditation tradition, jhana was taboo territory for a long time. Then certain teachers began to teach jhana, and some said you need jhana because it will sharpen the mind, and so on. This is all just dogma, really.

Jhanas can be really helpful for lots of different reasons to some people. For others, they're just not a big factor on the path. I don't buy this thing about sharpening the mind so you can do insight. I just don't buy it at all.

As a teacher, I know there are many teachers who teach a way of doing things. One reason I always love talking to you is because you encourage me to do what's right for me, whereas other teachers say, "Don't do this," and then I start doubting. But I don't want to do that. I still want to meditate.

But again, I would open up what that word "meditate" means. If I look back to when I was twenty-one years old, there was a period when I didn't meditate. I cared so much about it, but that period and everything that came out of it—everything I learned, the bodywork I did—it was so helpful.

I'm not a doctor, but I don't think what you're going through will last your whole life. It's a period. And meditation is more than sitting still and getting the mind to shut up. If it were just that, it's nice, but there's so much more.

If you have this broader view of what meditation means, it becomes something much more creative. Things like insights into the unfabricated and fading—they come, but it's not so linear. The person who sits twelve hours straight isn't necessarily the one who gets it. It's not like that.

The jhana thing as well—sometimes people say, "I sat there and didn't have a thought for two days or something." And it's like, okay, where's the insight? It doesn't stack up that way. I'm not saying it's not worth it, but it's not a one-to-one correspondence at all.

In terms of the unfabricated as well, sometimes—and this isn't textbook dharma—one has the perfume of that even without formally meditating. You walk in nature, you walk somewhere, or even when you're with someone, there's something we sense. That's meditation.

What's happening there? The way of looking is opening up. The perception is getting attuned to something. I can't put it into words. I can sense it somehow, beyond sense or whatever. These are the kind of things. They start working their way into your life. Not only do they stack up, but they also bring a certain amount of liberation.

Before you've had... well, let's leave that. But these things give you a faith that you feel in the marrow of your bones in something like that. All of this...

And then the last thing is—and I also said this to you the other day, relating to what I was talking about yesterday and today—you're going to want a big, fat liberation, not just a deep liberation. You know, a wide one, because of the art and because of... Do you understand?

So it's like how you find your path, create your path, discover it, is going to have to include all that rather than getting too tight around it.

Johan's question brings up something fascinating. He's describing something that seems to be occurring quite regularly with the same image. There's an image that has to do with stopping of time and is kind of cosmic in terms of galaxies and stars and things. And there's eros with that image, there's beauty. It's a poetic image that captures something. There's an image of stars and space, and as we're moving through it, all of a sudden it freezes. And then here's the jhāna. It happens quite frequently.

He's a little surprised how sometimes that leads into jhāna, or quite frequently into jhāna, rather than what I was saying about how imaginal work tends to create more complexity and branch off. This is actually leading into more simplicity, less fabrication.

This has actually come up a couple of times here. This is really common. So why is it happening? I think it happens because when something is imaginal, the energy body responds first of all, and comes into some kind of harmony or alignment or openness or something like that. And if the mind—part of the mind gets—attention gets captivated by what's happening in the energy body and the kind of harmonization there, it will just go into jhāna because focusing on that is a jhānic state.

So anytime there's an image, it doesn't have to be an image of stopping time or space or some kind of image of stillness. Actually, it was you, Johan, the other day, asking about an image of anger. Do you remember that? So it could even happen with an image of anger.

You think, here's this—not the image you were alluding to—but maybe some image of stomping, monstrous, raging dragon god or something. And it's all this fire and energy. The power of that can be felt in the energy, but there's a resonance with it. The anger itself is kind of transmuted alchemically into whatever its golden equivalent is, so to speak. But the energy body starts resonating with that energy, and one can—one of the options is that it enters jhana.

So as I think I was saying yesterday, at any point with imaginal practice, you can kind of glide in any direction. You get to have a little more say sometimes; sometimes it just takes you. But because of the energy body involvement, there will always be a possibility of samadhi. You can always lean off into that. At the moment it sounds like it's kind of happening because the energy body constellates that, and then probably the attention is just getting captivated by it.

But as you develop, it will become more and more an intentional possibility. So you could always just do that—let the image go. You could say, "Very nice energy body stuff, but I want to go further with the resonances with the image," so you don't go so much into the samadhi. And then you can play with the emphasis of attention—like how much attention is on the meaningfulness, the beauty, the poetry of the image, how much is on the energy body, how much is on the emotional impact.

With time, all this becomes like—you've always got these directions you can lean in multiple ways. Also in terms of how much attention am I giving the image versus how much to my own process or my own self, the way the self is constellating in the imaginal constellation. So you've got things like self, other, world, and the eros itself, all of which can be imaginally infused, come alive as image. You understand me?

And then you've also got things like the emotional aspect, the energetic aspect, the samadhi aspect, the image aspect, and you can kind of—sometimes you're just taken into one or another. Sometimes you need to rebalance things. I think I alluded to that in the second night's talk. Sometimes we're just too much in the image or too much with the self or too much—like the self needs to come alive imaginally. It's all over there, the divinity.

So there are all these options. Sometimes you're balancing things so that there can be more steadiness and equanimity and fertility with the image. And sometimes you're just making a choice out of curiosity, and sometimes you're just taken one way or another.

So I'm answering more than you're asking, but do you get a sense of what can evolve here? This is not at all uncommon. It also happens with non-imaginal things. Sometimes one way people kick-start jhana or samadhi is just by remembering something that brought happiness, for instance. And then that happiness infuses the being, and there's just a gentle inclining the mind to that happiness—getting into the happiness and letting it suffuse. And for some people, that's a way into jhana. So it's a little bit similar to that as well, but that's not so imaginal.

The image falls away into samadhi and you let it go because the samadhi is what you want? Well, I didn't realize I was doing that. I just thought it was a natural progression.

I have more the feeling that as it unfolds more and more, you'll realize that you can—like sailing or something—you can kind of lean different ways and guide it. A little bit related to Suzanne's question, you know, samadhi is great. I really, really value it. And jhanas and all that. But if there's a lot of eros in a soul, that won't satisfy. It's part of what we want, but there will be something that wants the image as well.

I mean, a jhana by definition is a non-bored state, but something in the soul, in one's life, will get—okay, that's enough. Not enough, but it's like, I want more soul-making. I want more of the poetry. So I would keep both options open. And some people have long periods of time when they're more leaning this way or that way. Other people, or as it unfolds, you might just go back and forth more regularly between the two.

Does that help?

Yes, it's Bo, yeah. So I'm very new to this.

I'll do the English thing and apologize for anything that's not correct. But you have planted some really beautiful seeds, both of you. And I wanted to cross-pollinate a little bit with some things related to the body. One of the things I think you said is that image is primary and experience is secondary, or image is primary.

So image is primary, and I was reflecting a little bit on some lines of research that have come out about the body. One is in the area of connective tissue that talks about our tissue not being inert, but always moving, all the time, kind of in what has been called intelligent chaos. And then also, embryologists are starting to say that we never lose the embryo. As adults, it's still present in our bodies, and that motion is...

Thinking about fabrication, I have been hearing things like, the body doesn't have a soul, the body is a soul. And I'm wondering if part of the beauty of all of these exercises is a sort of... you talked about who is the soul-making for. Could the fabrication and the soul-making be part of stepping into the soul of the body, if there is one, through all these many threads, nature and the connection to this? There are times when I think in my experience here, it's just feeling like there's a moment where there's music, you're stepping into... I wouldn't be sure I had to sum that up.

Are you asking, like, whether instead of image being primary, we could view body as being primary? Is that part of what you're asking?

Yes, and there's one tiny thread, which is that part of what we're doing here seems very devotional, like very bhakti in nature. It's part of our devotional practice to do these things.

So Bo's asking whether body could be primary instead of image, and also noting that part of what we're doing is very devotional and has bhakti in it.

Here's how I might frame it or think about it. We have eros as human beings. If everything is empty, and any conceptual framework, including the scientific, cannot possess a claim to the singular truth of things, then classical science, fantastic, wonderful. Embryology and all this stuff, brilliant. It has wrapped up in that as a whole conceptual structure, way of thinking, assumptions. Great, very fruitful. Is it the ultimate truth of things? Is it the singular truth? No.

Starting from those premises and looking at things and asking questions, from those premises unfold certain experiences and truths. Starting from some other premise will... You understand?

So what if we start—and we could start anywhere. We could start where you started with the body. We could start with the idea that image is primary. But if someone asks me, is that an ultimate truth? I say, no, of course it's not an ultimate truth.

Once you've seen something about reality and about epistemology and about all that, you start to realize, oh, I participate in truth-making. And I participate in world creation and perception creation, if you like. And so I can, we can, just play with entertaining certain concepts and conceptual frameworks and seeing what they open.

So we could start with the idea that body is primary and motion in the body, as you were alluding to.

Beautiful, absolutely beautiful. We could start with the premise that body is not separate from soul. You could start with the idea that image is primary. When we say "this is primary," we're already suggesting something quite radical: What happens if we take that as a basic principle?

Instead of, for example, taking my psychological history as primary, or materiality as primary—all of which are fine as starting angles that will give a different perspective on reality. It's like those disco balls, you know—reality kind of shimmers and shifts depending on how the light hits it. And I am really cool, by the way, in case you're wondering.

So yes, we can start with image as primary. We can start with what you said, absolutely. Each approach will unfold its own revelations.

Now, we could start with Eros as primary. In a way, this retreat is leaning in that direction. What happens if we just pick up the Eros thread and discover what Eros is through our experience and what opens from that? That's what we're doing here, to some degree.

Or you could start with—I think I tossed this out at some point—the soul loves soul-making. This is my axiomatic proposition. What the hell do I mean by that? Well, I unpack what I mean. It ends up being somewhat circular as a definition, but it proves to be remarkably fertile.

So if I take Eros as primary—let's say I have noticed in my experience, in my life, where there's Eros. And wherever it moves toward... that could already be the body. It could be materiality. It could be my lover. It could be the transcendent. And I just trust that Eros. I investigate the experience of Eros psychologically and phenomenologically—what it does and what it opens.

Then I will find that it starts to subsume everything, as I said. Everything gets made sacred and made valid, if you like. So if I start with "my body is just not soul," eventually I will come through experience to the perception that opens up: the body is soul. You understand?

Now, another person might start more from there—that's where their Eros goes immediately. Another person might seem a million miles from there. They want to be unfabricated, they want to go beyond form, all that. But if we allow the Eros and allow that fire to catch, it will eventually catch everything. It will eventually discover more things, more facets, more sacrednesses. It will discover soul everywhere. It will create soul everywhere.

You understand? So there ends up being this unlimited perspectives and unlimited soul-making, unlimited en-soul-ing. And you ask, which is first? Just follow your experience, follow your own unfolding.

So if you start with what you're saying about the body—there's both conception and personal experience there. You have a felt experiential connection with body and bodies, and the investigation and experience and understanding of that. There is Eros there—conceptually, experientially, soulfully for you. If you do that, then it will just... it will go to other things. Someone else approaches it the other way around. Just soul-making, yeah.

I could have cut all that and just said yes. Yes, you're right, and so is someone who says something else, and so is something else entirely. Because of this, there's something quite radical here—a shaking up of the whole notion of truth and objective reality.

Again, if we follow the thread of this retreat, it's like we have this experience of Eros. If we just name it, we begin to see what it does a bit more. Then we say, "I'm going to trust this, I'll follow it." And then you start to see what it does—experientially, erotically, soulfully, psychologically, philosophically, conceptually, all of that.

So it's like, it's all right, you know? It's all true. Does this make sense?

And the devotion is exactly connected with that, because where there's devotion, there's Eros. Where there's Eros, there's devotion. Again, this might not be so obvious at first.

You feel into it. Let me explore my experience of devotion. Let me explore my experience of eros. Or as I said, just in the imaginal—here's an image and you start to realize, hang on, start to notice: oh, there's devotion here. Oh, there's eros here. And then I trust that. And then that's how that threads into the other. I'm just following my devotion. The whole thing opens up conceptually, experientially, heartfully, soulfully, physically, energetically. You know what I'm saying?

So those two parts of your question are extremely related. The bhakti, the devotion—it ends up being a kind of philosophical opener as well as an experiential opener.

Does this make sense?

Well, just what I just said: the devotion is—where there's devotion, there's eros. Where there's eros, if we get interested in it and don't get in its way and allow it to do its thing, it will instigate, inseminate, ignite that soul-making process which starts changing my experience of things. So it changes my experience of body, of what my body is as a thing, from the point of view of subject, from the point of view of expression. Everything—it gets the image, the sense, the experience, the felt sense, the ideation, and that's where the philosophy bit comes in.

This is why soul-making is so significant, because every dimension of the being, experientially, it's got this expansion, and I know it, I taste it. And not only that, I know it in a way that's important to me, and everything comes into support—that ideation, the conception, the philosophy, the psychology, the emotion, the energy, et cetera, et cetera.

Does that make sense?

Okay. I'm happy taking a... Yeah, okay, sure.

This is from Nick's book. "Does your bear have a name?"

"Bear."

Bear. Bear is asking—he's enjoying your teachings. He thinks they're quite good. Would you like me to justify your claim that there's no such thing as bare attention?

I bow to his greater wisdom.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 98

On Blessed Ground: Fantasies of the Self on the Path

Rob Burbea · 32 min

> In this profound exploration, Rob Burbea challenges conventional approaches to Buddhist practice by examining the fantasies that inevitably shape our relationship with the spiritual path. He argues that wherever there is love, devotion, or deep meaning—including in our dharma practice—fantasy and imagination are always operating, creating what he calls "imaginal constellations" that encompass our perception of self, others, and the world.
>
> Burbea identifies several archetypal fantasies of the self on the path beyond the traditional medical model of the Four Noble Truths: the researcher investigating consciousness and perception, the artist creating through practice, the adventurer exploring unknown territories, the lover devoted to psyche, and the receptive meeting place for multiple threads of experience. He suggests that recognizing these fantasies—rather than trying to eliminate them—opens up new levels of liberation and psychological honesty.
>
> This teaching invites practitioners to examine what truly ignites their practice, what fantasies are actually driving their spiritual life, and whether these serve soul-making. Rather than viewing fantasy as something to overcome, Burbea presents it as inevitable, beautiful, and essential to meaningful practice, while emphasizing the importance of holding these fantasies lightly rather than with rigid realism.

I have to admit I feel a bit ambivalent about talking more right now. We are very conscious that it's a lot of content, and different people need different things at different times, digest differently. I still feel a bit unsure, but I think I'm going to go ahead. Tonight, just so you know, there won't be so much content. We'll have a different way of being together, so there won't be so much stuff coming at you.

I want to see if, without talking too long, I can say enough to open up something else—another possibility, a little bit connected to some of the material I was exploring last night.

When you're in love, or when you love anything, when you're devoted to anything, when you're dedicated to anything, when something is meaningful to you in a deep way, there is fantasy and image operating there. There is an imaginal constellation, and it's an imaginal perception of you in your life and of something in your life. In other words, it's not just intrapsychic. We're actually seeing others and self imbued with fantasy, so that the whole constellation of other, or thing, or object, or event—work, other, self, world, and time—all that constellation is ignited as fantasy, and also the eros, the desire there.

This also applies to the path and to our idea of awakening: our fantasy of awakening, fantasy of the Buddha, fantasy of teachers. All this is brought in or engulfed in the movement, in the beautiful movement of fantasy, wherever there's love, wherever there's meaningfulness to us, wherever there's that devotion.

Now, usual psychology says when you're in love, for somewhere between three and six months, you're a little bit doolally. There are the fantasies there, and we call it projection. And there's all that. Hopefully you make it through that period, and then you start to get real. And then that's proper love. But is that actually what happens? Is that actually, so to speak, the best thing to happen?

Or is it more that in time, as things progress, there is this attunement to and attention to the relationship, the needs in the relationship, the different psychological patterns that one confronts and meets in oneself and in the other? One cares for all that and cares for the relating and the dialogue and the interactions and the patterns. But at the same time, the fantasies don't and shouldn't go away. They might change, they might deepen, they might become more subtle, more attuned to the—let's use that word—realities, more nuanced, more sensitive.

What happens if they go away over the months, over the years in a romantic relationship? What happens? It might be the end of the relationship—people get bored—or it might be the relationship just finds another way of being together that's more about metta and friendship, but the eros is gone. How common is this? The sex might still be there, but the eros might be gone. You can certainly have sex without eros.

Same with the path. When you love the path and you're dedicated to the path, whatever that means, it's imbued with fantasy. What happens when our path is not imbued with fantasy? What happens to it? We lose our inspiration, it becomes flat, or we go into a kind of fixation mode and it becomes about measurement: How am I doing? I've heard about these different stages of awakening. I wonder, have I got that first stage yet? Where am I?

And it becomes fixated, reified, concretized, rigidified into a kind of movement or a relationship of ego measurement. This is what happens for people who care, for people who love and invest themselves—how easily the eros and the richness and the beauty of the fantasy goes into craving and fixation. Probably everyone in this room knows that.

So what I want to see if it's possible to open up a little bit for us is to talk about fantasies of the goal, if you like—fantasies of awakening, fantasies of the path and what the path involves—but also fantasies of the self on the path. In other words, like I said, when there's image, there's a whole imaginal constellation. It's not just that object or that other person. We forget to see—this is so important—we forget to see sometimes the self needs to be included in that fantasy, is included in that imaginal constellation.

What's going on with the self image in the good sense? What is, so to speak, the fantasy of the job of the self on the path? What's your job on the path? And what's the image of the self walking that path?

Now usually in spiritual teachings, whether they're Buddhist or other, especially Eastern teachings, they're taught and framed in what we might call the medical model—a medical fantasy, the Four Noble Truths. There's suffering, there's a cause of suffering, there's the possibility of the end of suffering, and there's the way to the end of suffering. This is actually a medical formula that the Buddha adopted at that time in India.

This is how a doctor would talk to a patient. "This is your problem, this is what's caused it, you can be cured if you do what I say, and this is what you need to do—this is the prescription." So we've inherited that. That's absolutely the most central thing in Buddhism: the Four Noble Truths. And even if we don't consciously think of the Four Noble Truths—if someone asks "What are the Four Noble Truths?" and we respond "Oh, I don't know"—even then, we've become completely, or almost completely, imbued with this idea that what we're doing is reducing suffering. We're healing suffering. It's a medical model, and this is what we need to do.

So this whole idea and fantasy—this medical fantasy—imbues our thinking so deeply that when a person talks about their practice or thinks about practice, or when someone's teaching, it's always somehow related to freedom. What's it going to help free us from suffering? What's going to help alleviate suffering? The entire way we frame practice to ourselves and to others, the whole conceptual framework, the complete relationship with the path and the self on the path and the job on the path—all of this operates within this medical fantasy model.

Coupled with that in spiritual teachings is what we might call a second fantasy: the religious fantasy. By that I mean something relatively specific, though all these fantasies I'm going to explore are quite broad, with lots of wiggle room. What's characteristic of what I'm calling a religious fantasy is that in my practice, the job of the self is essentially to replicate as closely as possible someone else's awakening. It's the Buddha, right? He had this awakening, and we're somehow trying to get something pretty close to, or at least in the direction of, that awakening.

The characteristic of religion—and I use that word loosely, in different ways at different times—is that the authority is in the past. You understand? The authority is in the past. We look to the past, look to the tradition, and the self fills out this fantasy with beauty, with reverence, by replicating something. So in a way, there's not much new in the religious fantasy. It's not that we're going to make new discoveries. We might open up the demographic of where we take the Buddha's teaching—Mark is working in prisons, taking that to that demographic; Jamie's doing some wonderful work—so we're opening up the demographic, but essentially the discovery is not new. We might use research on what mindfulness does to your brain, but this is just a kind of corroboration with culturally sanctioned ideation that supports what's already there.

There's nothing wrong with this. This is all beautiful and lovely. But sometimes—you may have noticed this—what do you actually want in practice? What do you actually want? Now, at times, of course you want an alleviation of suffering, and that's why you're practicing. But all it takes is a little bit of honest inquiry and reflection, and you see that some portion of the time—maybe even a lot—that's not actually what you're primarily most concerned about. It's something else. If we keep talking about it as if it's that, and keep prioritizing that, it's as if we're looking at the world, looking at ourselves and reality in a kind of blinkered way. We're not being psychologically honest, perhaps.

So we've been using this word soul-making, but sometimes when one sees what one actually wants, whether one uses that word or not, it's actually soul-making. I'm more interested in that at times than I am in the reduction of suffering. Is this making sense?

The fantasies of the self can be larger than or other than the religious fantasy and the medical fantasy. When I say something's a fantasy, it doesn't mean it doesn't have any "reality" to it—of course it does. What I want to say is there are other fantasies possible of the self on the path and of the job of the self on the path, as much as there are of awakening and all of this.

Maybe there are loads, but let me offer some possibilities to open this up a little bit. One could at times have the fantasy of—how am I actually seeing my practice? Who am I when I'm practicing? What am I doing? And one might have the feeling that I'm researching. I'm a researcher, I'm a research scientist. What am I researching?

Well, it could be the end of suffering within the medical model. It could be that I'm actually researching consciousness, or I'm researching perception, or I'm a phenomenological researcher of some kind. But then the whole job of the self and the fantasy and what gives juice and aliveness is different there. Do you understand?

It may be that it's bound up—and there's certainly an overlap—with this reduction of suffering and the relationship with the Buddha's discoveries and teachers who are important to you. But there's a different fantasy of self operating there. What's really exciting and galvanizing at times is this possibility of discovery.

If we think about a scientific researcher, what's the relationship with time? The religious fantasy looks backward to replicate. Science uses the past as a platform, but it's looking to the future. It is presumed in science that the science of a hundred years from now will know more than the science of a hundred years ago—not just the same. There's a forward movement.

So what would it be to have a fantasy of the self that you could make discoveries that are not discovered yet? That you could be researching in a way that's moving forward? What is the job there? What's the goal of that fantasy and the aliveness there? It's not just the reduction of suffering. There's more involved. It's not just functional in that way.

Or there could be—so that's a third possibility—the fantasy of the artist. I've talked about this elsewhere. What's the job of the artist? What's the purpose? If my practice is art, I'm playing with these ways of looking and really—like we called the last retreat—the poetry of perception.

Why do people make art? Why do human beings make art? What's it for? It's a rhetorical question, because what I want to say is whatever answer anyone gives—I'm sure there'll be loads of beautiful answers—you're never going to capture it. You're never going to capture that urge, that human urge to create and to be involved in art. Art is always going to be bigger. Why does the artist do what they do? Why do human beings make art in the broader sense? What's the purpose of it?

So if I'm fantasizing and feeling my practice as artist, what's the purpose of it? And I keep trying to talk about it in the medical model, but actually something is relating in a different way. What's the artist's relationship with the movement of time, past and future?

An artist who really gives themselves to the art—most artists will want to explore the past, the past masters, and absorb those styles, replicate. But they don't want to stop there. And the whole idea with art is that it can go in a million different directions. It's going to be new. It's not predetermined even where it's moving. And what does the artist create? What does the artist make? What does the practice artist make? Artists, we say, make things or create things.

What about an adventurer as another fantasy? What's the adventurer's relationship or fantasy of their place in time? The relationship with tradition? What's the job of the adventurer? What's the goal? Does an adventurer have a goal? Or is adventure the goal of the adventurer?

What about the lover? Fantasy of self on the path. What am I doing? My job is to be a lover.

What does that mean? What does it mean—my job is to be a lover? Lover of what? Lover of whom? What is the job, the duty of the lover, and what is the sense of self and sense of goal that the lover would have?

I was working with someone not too long ago, inquiring into this with her. In just one session, she explored what makes you feel most alive in practice—when you love it, when something is really ignited in you. What is it that you love at that time? What is the fantasy operating then?

Feeling into it, exploring this several times with different answers, I asked: "Who are you in that? What's the fantasy?" She said, "I'm a landing place. I'm a meeting place for all these threads and characters"—from her history, from her life, from the culture, from the intrapsychic realm. Her job was to be that meeting place, that landing place, and simply to open. You can hear that's a much more receptive fantasy, really beautiful. That was her job, her fantasy of self.

A little while later she said, "I'm a lover—a lover of psyche. I'm a lover of psyche." Very different, a different fantasy operating entirely.

So again: where there's love, there is fantasy. Fantasy exists as a ground of the path. There's usually a mix of fantasies, in fact, but the path is not just functional. It's not merely accumulating techniques to reduce suffering, though sometimes we talk or present things as if that's what's happening.

All of this is good, all beautiful. There's certainly not one fantasy that's better or right or wrong than another. If I am in that reducing-suffering fantasy, maybe it's not just functional or utilitarian. Where we love something, there's always fantasy involved.

Of course, there are people who go to a class and learn a couple of stress-reduction techniques. That person may or may not fall in love with practice. If they don't, then it could remain purely utilitarian. But once we start to get involved, practice becomes imbued with fantasy. Even that medical, functional reduction-of-suffering fantasy gets imbued with other fantasies.

No right or wrong here, but can we see this? It's almost like waking up psychologically. Can we recognize that fantasy runs through our life wherever there's meaningfulness? Can we acknowledge the necessity of fantasy, the inevitability of fantasy, the beauty of fantasy and the gift of fantasy?

For many people this is a completely upside-down way of thinking. I'm feeling more and more that a psychology which doesn't realize the necessity, inevitability, beauty and gift of fantasy and eros almost inevitably ties itself in contradictions. People say one thing, but what's really driving them is something they're not quite fully admitting—or they have no conceptual framework to flesh it out and support it. There's almost a kind of incomplete integrity in not admitting the place of fantasy and eros.

To me, I'm beginning to feel more and more that psychology needs to be more sophisticated to truly shine light on something that's already there for us. It's just that we don't have words for it so much. Often we don't realize—we don't think this way—something that's already present in our life, ebbing and flowing, getting ignited and illuminated, then ebbing away. We don't realize that fantasy is involved almost as the ground of our path, the ground we walk on.

We often don't realize what the fantasy is that's driving us, supporting us, inspiring us—or what they are, plural. And we don't realize the implications of all this.

What are the implications? I think there are many, and they're far-reaching.

I'm certain this is landing in different places. I hope that for some people—hopefully now, but maybe sometime soon—you can sense there's a whole other level of liberation possible when you start to open this. A whole other level, a kind of meta-level of liberation.

On the other hand, some people might be thinking, "I'm not really sure what you're talking about." And others might feel, "This is really, really disturbing."

So I'm really aware of that and want to be sensitive to these different responses. It might be that some of you are thinking, "Well, if you're talking about being on the ground of fantasy, aren't you just pulling the rug out from under my whole path and my whole sense of what I'm doing? You're just saying it's fantasy, and the whole thing kind of crashes and deconstructs." And it might be that we're left without any juice, inspiration, or fire, because we've lost the fantasy. Because we've realized it was fantasy, we conclude it can't be real, therefore we can't trust it, and so forth. This might feel horrific, disorienting, disconcerting.

At some point there will be... but that's not the point. In other words, that's not the real possibility I'm pointing to here. There will be a reconstruction. We construct as human beings, we fabricate, we fantasize. There will be a reconstruction. The question is: what's my belief about that reconstruction? Is it realist or not?

This is only horrific if our view is too realist. If I really understand that fantasy imbues our life, imbues our love, and that it has its juice precisely in the non-realism—if I get that, there's a whole other level of liberation here. Is what's reconstructed as fantasy realist or not? Or is it, let's say, poetic or not?

With all this, one of the questions becomes: am I locked into a certain fantasy? Maybe I don't even realize it—am I just locked into a fantasy that doesn't really fit me, but I'm simply stuck in it? Maybe there's just a kind of mono way of seeing. Or can there be flexibility here? Flexibility in the fantasizing.

As with images, it doesn't matter to me at all whether the fantasies that are supporting you, inspiring you, driving you, drawing you on, pulling you forward—it doesn't matter whether they're your inventions, so to speak, or your discoveries, or whether they're just received fantasies. That's actually irrelevant. It doesn't matter at all whether you read them in a book, heard them, or received them from a teacher. The question, as always, is: are they soul-making? In other words, do they open up the inspiration, the ignition, the dimensionality, the depth, the beauty, the meaningfulness, the eros?

So what is going on, what is inspiring, what is igniting, what is beautiful when you feel most alive in practice? What is it really? At those times, what is it that makes you feel alive? What is it that you love? There's a lot of room here. I've just run through six possibilities, but there are all kinds of others.

And then, what does this particular fantasy that I'm in—how does it fantasize an ending? Is there an ending? Is there a completion? When I asked the woman, she said, "I'm a lover of psyche. I'm a meeting place for all these threads." I said, "And is there a completion to that? Is there an end?" "No end." "Is that a problem?" "No." Whereas with other fantasies, there definitely is a problem—we're wanting to arrive somewhere. Or are we?

Wrapped up in all of this is even the question: is there an end, is there a completion? Does this make sense, what I'm talking about?

I'm going to stop there. I just wanted to see if this could be opened up a little bit and maybe put those seeds out—just sprinkle some seeds and let them land where they land. To borrow someone else's phrase, we may revisit this and work with it as an exercise. We'll see. But this is—I don't know if it even makes sense—as I said, there's something immensely potent here, potentially at least, in this kind of re-looking or opening up.

So we may revisit it, but I just wanted to scatter some seeds a little bit.

I wanted to explore this territory with you, to see if we could open up this inquiry together and perhaps plant some seeds. Like scattering seeds in fertile ground, they will take root where conditions are right.

There's something immensely potent here—this kind of re-looking, this opening up of our fundamental assumptions about practice, about completion, about the very nature of our spiritual journey. We may return to this exploration and work with it more systematically, developing it into a practice exercise. We shall see where the Dharma leads us.

For now, I simply wanted to scatter these seeds of inquiry, to invite this quality of questioning that goes beyond our habitual patterns of seeking and attaining. In this willingness to not-know, in this embrace of the mysterious nature of our unfolding, perhaps we touch something essential—something that cannot be grasped or completed, but only lived and embodied moment by moment.

The path continues to reveal itself, not as a destination to reach, but as an endless deepening into the mystery of what we are.

CHAPTER 99

Beauty and the Buddha

Rob Burbea · 1h32

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea investigates the nature of beauty and its connection to soul-making practice. He begins by examining how the Pali Canon restricts the concept of beauty primarily to mental states like the fourth jhāna, while viewing sense pleasures as dangerous distractions from liberation. Burbea challenges this bifurcation, exploring what our actual phenomenal experience of beauty reveals—something that touches us beyond mere sense pleasure or craving, involving resonance, participation, and dimensionality.
>
> Drawing connections between beauty and imaginal perception, Burbea argues that experiences of beauty naturally involve soul-making, where objects become magnified and imbued with meaningfulness rather than singular meaning. He critiques approaches that limit aesthetic experience to tragic impermanence, proposing instead that beauty emerges in the relationship between subject and object, neither wholly within nor without. Through practices that honor the whole energy body and allow for flexible ways of looking grounded in emptiness teachings, practitioners can open to experiences of beauty as expressions of the divine pervading sense experience itself, supporting the endless creativity of soul-making.

I'd like to speak about beauty, and I hope that in doing so this will perhaps seed something, nourish something. In speaking about it, I'm going to try and tie together some things we've already touched on, and also open them out further—so both tie together and open out.

I'm not sure there's a linear path possible through what I want to communicate. Perhaps there is, but I can't quite see it exactly. Perhaps in the nature of what I'm trying to do, what we're doing, is shining light on what is already tied together, implicated together, mirroring each other, and what already opens out further, or suggests a further opening, so that a linear motion through the material is not really possible, just by the nature of the material and the way it's connected.

Many of us would say and feel very much that beauty is important, deeply important to us in our lives, and therefore also the whole realm and conversation, investigation of aesthetics and application of aesthetics, is also important. For some people, it's not, or it really doesn't seem to be that important. I know quite a few people for whom beauty is not something they invest in a lot, that they care about a lot, that they pay a great deal of attention to and support and care for.

There is a connection though with Eros and soul-making. It seems to me that those people for whom beauty is not that important are also people for whom there is not a great deal of soul-making movement happening in their lives, not a great deal of Eros. Beauty is a part and an element in soul-making.

If we look to the Pali Canon and see what it says about beauty, as far as I'm aware, we find something that might strike us at first as a little curious. The word beauty is only found in relation to the mind—and not only that, in relation to the mind or certain minds or minds in certain states.

So the fourth jhana—sometimes the Buddha and the texts refer to that as the beautiful jhana—that stillness and the radiance of the mind there, and the state therein of equanimity that goes with the fourth jhana. This is, as the Buddha said, equanimity based on singleness, when there's a kind of closing out or really deep fading out of the senses, and the mind is just collected into stillness and a kind of radiant presence of stillness and equanimity there.

Or the Buddha talks about equanimity based on multiplicity as a connected but slightly different state, where one is still open to sounds and sights and smells and touches, but there is equanimity in relation to stillness, and actually there is a degree of fading. So in both of those, whether it's equanimity based on singleness or multiplicity, there is a degree of fading. That's important. Fading of the perception of senses and sense objects.

So there is this reference to the beautiful, but only really in regard to the fourth jhana and beyond, or to a Buddha's mind, or an Arahant's mind, free of defilements, pure and therefore beautiful, or sometimes to the body of the Buddha, the physical body of the Buddha, which is full of the thirty-two marks of a great man and is regarded as beautiful.

With respect to the world, the world that we live in and the earth and the senses and what comes to us through the senses, the word beautiful and beauty is not used. Beauty is in or of the mind, and everything else is just talked about in terms of what is pleasing to the senses or sense pleasures. This bifurcation of language has all kinds of implications.

And more than that even, because the Buddha talked about sense pleasures being like a snake's mouth or a pit of burning coals or a torch of hay that one is carrying into a headwind. All these images of danger and pain associated with what is pleasing to the senses.

The whole Pali Canon, as we've touched on before, has this movement, this thrust, towards transcending the world of the senses—pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral—to the unfabricated, to the fading of sense experience in all six senses, including the mind, and through that to the ending of rebirth, an end of being reborn in the world of senses. So there is clearly a very negative connotation given to sense experience. It's not a realm of beauty. It's not where we look to for beauty.

That's quite interesting, and it has a legacy which I think we are still not clearly investigating, aware of, open to, sensibly confronting, questioning.

Bearing that in mind, and what's there in the Pali Canon, if we look at what is our phenomenal experience of beauty—what is our actual experience of beauty—we have, as human beings, at least most people have, at times, experiences of beauty. And I would say, and most people would say, that's more than just something being pleasant in the senses, and more than sense pleasure leading to a kind of craving.

Most people would say, when I experience beauty, it's something different than just a pleasure in the senses that the being, the mind or the body craves for. Something in the experience of beauty touches us. It's more than craving. Something is touched in the being. But by touched, I also mean more than an obvious emotion.

An obvious emotion is grief or compassion or some kind of passion for something that may be touched and triggered in the experience of beauty. But we are touched in the experience of beauty in our being in ways that go beyond or include more than what are obvious emotions.

I have a Buddhist friend who wrote a piece recently about beauty, and particularly about aesthetics, really, and his approach to aesthetics. He was saying that beauty was something that comes out of mindful experience, or mindfulness of experience, so that there isn't the craving, there isn't the tanha. And through mindful experience, for instance, on retreat, the world appears radiant. The things of the world appear radiant. And that radiance is a perception and experience of beauty.

Notice that this experience of radiance—and some of you will know this from being on retreat and being silent, being mindful, as the mindfulness kind of ratchets up its power—

There is a radiance in experience. You go outside—the grass, the sky, the cup, the steaming tea rising from it—all possess this quality of radiance that we can feel. It's a universal quality.

So radiance seems to, in that state of heightened mindfulness, pervade everything. Everything appears radiant. It's universal, not so much tied to particular objects. The radiance of this is not particularly different than the radiance of that. There's something universal present here, which I wanted to note.

A further thing to inquire into with this radiance is: what is it? What do we mean by radiance? Certainly not, in our friend's way of thinking, some kind of luminosity—and certainly not a numinosity attributed to the object or flowing through it from beyond in some way. I think what it actually is simply an experience of vividness, a vividness of perception of anything that comes into the realm of sense experience.

Why? Because with mindfulness there's less distraction. The mind doesn't dissipate so much energy; it accumulates energy, becomes brighter, more alert, more present. With that, the grime is wiped off the windscreen, so to speak. There is a vividness, a brightness, a radiance of perception. This radiance that's perceived and experienced as enjoyable—perhaps some would call it beautiful—is really just a property of mind or awareness in certain states. Some people even say it's a brain property.

I have some questions about that experience of radiance and what's involved there. But our friend goes on to talk about the sublime, which we've discussed earlier on this retreat—this whole Romantic notion of the sublime. He means what is beautiful in terms of pleasing sense experience, but not just beautiful—also terrifying, dwarfing to the sense of self, the fragile human body and existence confronted by a vastness that could swallow it up, dwarf it, erase it easily.

Think of Turner's fantasy of being strapped to the mast of a ship in a storm—the colors and vividness of sense experience combined with that hugeness, that terrifying confrontation with or openness to nature. In this experience of the sublime, which is very important in our friend's notion of aesthetics, especially Buddhist aesthetics, something transcends the self here. There is a kind of transcendence.

But what transcends the self is really only impermanence, tragedy. It's seeing contingency and dependency—things being dependent on other things. There's a kind of emptiness there, but implicit in this understanding of emptiness is that it's tragic, that it really means impermanence. It just means these real things are dependent on other real things; material things are dependent on other material things.

What transcends the self is the existential predicament of the self that surrounds it, that is inevitably waiting for it—our unavoidable existential predicament of inevitably moving towards non-existence. There's a kind of transcending of the self there.

In his view, art is also regarded as transcendent, but in a slightly different way, because we can't quite fully say what this piece of art or that piece of art means. Our friend says more: "This makes me uneasy, I feel uncomfortable. I want to be told what this painting I'm looking at means, what this sculpture means. I want to be told what it means, and I want to be told how to feel about it."

He connects this with the poet John Keats' notion of negative capability, which in Keats' words is "a state of uncertainty or doubt without any irritable reaching out after facts or reason." This is negative capability. Our friend takes that to mean being without any reaching out away from a state of uncertainty and doubt, except certainty and non-doubt about the existential predicament.

Here, what's important to our friend is the poignancy—the poignancy of the tragedy of our existence and the tragedy of impermanence, of our impermanence, of everything's impermanence. Making art in a Buddhist context needs to be about this, because this is what the Dharma is about: opening to this. Art is only really about that. There isn't then the possibility of an art that can expand beyond being about that poignancy and tragedy of impermanence.

This is all fine and legitimate. Everyone's allowed to have whatever view and approach to aesthetics they would like. But from our point of view—what we're trying to open on this retreat as ways of practicing and ways of conceiving—notice a couple of things.

One is that there is a limited and singular view of life here. Life is taken axiomatically, dogmatically, to be really about or to involve this absolutely real existential predicament: moving to non-existence, the tragedy of impermanence. There's a singular view of life—this is how life is. It's a limited view and a limiting view, limited to that singular perspective. And also of art: this is what life is, therefore this is what art, at least Buddhist art, should be.

Notice also that in this approach, any individual or anything is mostly or only interesting to us insofar as it moves toward obliteration, toward extinction, toward erasure in the universal facticity of impermanence. The thing itself may be different from that other thing—we can see that—but that difference isn't particularly interesting in itself. The individuality has no real depth to it. It's only interesting insofar as this thing shares with all things the tragic impermanence that characterizes existence—all things, all selves, all individuals.

As I said, all that's fine and totally allowed—no problem. But from our point of view, it is both limited and limiting, or from the point of view of what we're trying to unfold on this retreat and in other retreats and teachings.

Let me explore and flesh out a little what's involved in the experience of beauty—what are the facets or aspects involved in the experience of beauty, again from an almost phenomenological point of view.

First, in the experience of beauty, we're not just enjoying the beauty of the object, whether that's a sense object in nature or art or whatever it is. What's also involved in the sense and experience of beauty is that we are enjoying our sensitivity, our subtlety, our awareness or attention with respect to that beautiful object. We actually enjoy the way that we are engaging with it. Do you see? We enjoy our attunement. We enjoy the arousal of being, of consciousness, of senses, mind, heart that is there in relationship with the aliveness that's present for us, in us, through us. We enjoy the state of intimacy and the relationship of intimacy. We enjoy the connecting connection.

All this means also that in an experience of beauty, we are enjoying our eros, our erotic connection, our experience of the erotic connection with the object. Part of the experience of beauty, I would say—whether we're fully conscious of it or not—involves seeing the beauty of our eros, of our response. You might not have realized it fully consciously, but when I have a sense of beauty, I'm also appreciating and seeing the beauty of our eros, my eros.

Another related aspect—and this is hard to articulate, or at least I'm finding it hard to articulate—is that if you pay attention when you're experiencing beauty, sometimes there's a sense of something within us resonating. There's a kind of resonance with whatever we're perceiving as beautiful. There's a chiming or an echoing between the object and the subject, or some kind of—it feels as if perhaps something is being echoed there in the object, or we are echoing the object, or the object is mirroring something in us, or something in us is mirroring it. A resonance, a chiming, an echoing, a mirroring of something within us with the object.

Now this isn't a state of merging in oneness and union. There is still the otherness there that's necessary to eros that we've talked about. The otherness is there. The polarity is there. The twoness is there—connected but two.

Maybe there's a sense of participating in something. I think there is. In a deep sense of beauty, we feel that we are participating in something, deeply. But what is it that we're participating in? What is the object of beauty? What is the beautiful thing? Again, whether it's a sense object or a mental object or an image or a piece of art or whatever it is, a piece of music.

What is that object with which we are resonating, in which we are participating, in which there is a participation together? That object itself, I would say, is magnified in that erotic connection, in the perception of beauty. The object is magnified, amplified, widened, so to speak.

If you listen to music—wordless music—and there's really a perception of beauty, it is not just bare sound. It is not just bare sound. I would say it's not even just pleasant bare sound. The object is, in the experience of beauty, somehow magnified, amplified, widened and deepened. What does this mean? How is it thus widened and deepened?

Thirdly, and I've just touched on this, an experience of beauty is more than—is not only—an experience of pleasant sensual contact or pleasant sense experience.

That is not an experience that qualifies as beautiful in the way we're speaking about here.

Nor, I would say, is it simply a matter of a pleasing arrangement of visual elements or sonic elements. What is it about a Rothko abstract painting? Yes, certainly there are pleasing proportions and arrangements of colors and shades of color on canvas. Or William de Kooning, another abstract painter. Or in wordless music, yes, of course there's a temporal arrangement of different timbres and sounds. But the experience of beauty is more than just being pleased at the arrangement of pleasant sense experiences.

I would go further and say that to me, it's not that we can reduce beauty to "it just means this or that." This painting means this, this piece of music means that. When we reduce art or sense experience in nature to meaning—"it means this"—there's a kind of monovalency, a singularity of meaning. Even if it has one or two meanings, we've reduced it, we've limited it. That's different from the notion of meaningfulness. Again, it may not be the best word, but there's an openness to that. It can include specific meanings, but there's something more in the experience of meaningfulness. And that, I would say, is more characteristic of the experience of beauty. It's not a reduction into a kind of monovalency—"it means X or Y."

Nor is it, as I alluded to before, that the experience of beauty is confined to an emotional experience. Or certainly not just that. It may include emotions triggered by whatever is beautiful, emotions associated with or referring to my personal narratives, things that have happened in my life, or human narratives in general. It may include all that, but I would say there's something more—it needs to be open.

So experiences of beauty, if I'm exploring the phenomenal experiences of beauty that we have as human beings, I would say partly what characterizes them is this sense of more, of beyond, of unfathomability, of inexhaustibility. As I just said, also of meaningfulness. And as I said before, there's an involvement in the experience of beauty of, as well as the object, also the self. And again, maybe not so obvious, but of the world.

So our sense of the world is transformed when there's a deep experience of beauty of anything. It affects our sense of the world. And also our eros is involved. So again, we get that fourfold constellation that's always involved in any perception: self, world, other, and desire—in this case, eros. The involvement of all of those is, as we've already said, involved in a sense of beauty.

Can you see, can you hear how the characteristics, or some of the characteristics of the experience of beauty echo, mirror, are similar to many of the characteristics of imaginal experience? There's some relationship between our experience of beauty and our experience of the imaginal.

And I shouldn't need to say this at this point in the retreat, but I will: by imaginal we do not just mean so-called intra-psychic—the images that come to me when my eyes are shut and out of contact with the world of the senses. This is so crucial. The imaginal really involves a set of perspectives, of perceptions, ways of looking. It involves soul-making beauty, and it can be right there in my perception of this room right now, of the ground beneath me, of my own hands, of you as I'm looking at you, of this tree. Our perception of the world can be imaginal.

So there's a mirroring, an echoing, a similarity, a correspondence between the characteristics of the experience of beauty and the characteristics of imaginal experience. So much so that I would wonder: does beauty actually imply—does our experience of beauty imply that there is soul-making happening? It implies already some opening up of the imaginal with respect to this piece of art, with respect to this piece of music, with respect to this flower that I'm looking at, with respect to whatever it is.

So it involves depths, dimensionality. That's part of the experience of beauty. And these are open-ended. There's an openness of depth, an unfathomability. The dimensionalities that might open are without limit, without preordained limits.

Again, referring back to our friend's aesthetics—in this awareness of the sublime, there is a more, there is a kind of beyond that's part of the whole aesthetic sensibility and project. As we talked about the sublime in previous talks, there is a meaning there. But the art has this kind of singularity of meaning. It means, it refers back to, it points towards always this poignancy, this tragedy of impermanence.

But as I said, relative to what we're trying to open up here, it's a limited perspective on both life and art, and it's limiting. There's a monovalency—it has one meaning. And that meaning is the poignancy of the tragedy of impermanence. The fantasy, the image, the soul-making is only in those kinds of perceptions, those kinds of perspectives, and in those artistic endeavors that would come out of that and be restricted to that. The fantasy, the image, the soul-making is only with respect to that tragedy. It's limited by that.

The transcendence is also limited. It's monovalent or, if you like, bivalent. As we said, there are two kinds of transcendence that one might consider: the transcendence of the art and the transcendence of the sublime transcending the self. But it's just that—two kinds of transcendence. It's bivalent only, and only refers to the uncertainty in regard to the art and the tragedy with regard to persons and things.

My friend and I have quite different—I would say, though it might sound quite similar at first—quite different views, conceptions, interpretations of emptiness.

And this is part of what's at the root of the difference in approach to life, practice, beauty, aesthetics, and a whole range of other dimensions.

For my friend, the teachings of emptiness and the fact of emptiness are actually tied to a fantasy of tragedy and opening to tragedy—the tragedy of impermanence and the fact of existential uncertainty. His understanding of emptiness implies dukkha. Because there is dukkha, because things are empty. And there is tragedy, because things are empty.

This is quite the opposite of most of the Buddhist tradition, where emptiness implies and leads to freedom. Our confrontation with it, our exploration of it, leads to freedom. Knowing the emptiness of things, opening to the emptiness of things, brings freedom. It's not tragedy, not dukkha—quite the opposite. It's a remedy for dukkha.

The teachings of contingency or dependency—everything being interconnected, not having one basis or being based in itself—are really used in those other approaches just to say: don't get excited about any one thing, because any one thing relies on everything else, is connected with everything else, depends in some way on everything else. So don't get excited about any one thing.

The whole premise and tenor and directionality of the teachings of emptiness is really quite different than the way I would present it or view as being the basis for our work here.

In our friend's presentation, there is not this inclusion of the dependency of things on the way of looking. There is not the allowing of different ways of looking because things are empty. There is not the allowing of a flexibility of ways of looking, and there is not the practice of the flexibility of ways of looking. There is, in fact, just one way of looking, which is geared toward seeing this impermanence and tragedy. At least one kind of sanctioned way of looking.

Rather, in how I would understand it and how I've taught it, emptiness means the emptiness of something means it's not independent of the way of looking. There is no independent reality independent of the conception and way of looking at any time.

So rather than emptiness being tied in with impermanence and equally tragic, the emptiness of things, or the realization of the deep emptiness of things, means understanding that things—all things—are neither permanent nor impermanent. Neither impermanent nor permanent. They are beyond the categories of impermanent and permanent. Neither impermanence nor permanence are ultimate truth.

The Mahayana teachings in particular are full of these kinds of emphases and point this out repeatedly. For example, in the Prajnaparamita Sutras, form, feelings, vedana, perception, mental formations and consciousness are not permanent or impermanent —are neither permanent nor impermanent. In another Prajnaparamita Sutra, the perfection of wisdom does not describe any phenomenon as permanent or impermanent.

So to keep harping on about impermanence and to rest only in the view of impermanence is not a perfection of wisdom. It's a certain relative wisdom that needs to be transcended, deepened, gone beyond.

Nagarjuna, who is the paragon teacher of emptiness in the Buddhist tradition—second really only after the Buddha—also wrote in some of his main texts: "In a relative sense, everything is impermanent, but in the absolute sense, nothing is permanent or impermanent." And again, he writes: "There is no origination, there is no destruction. The customary usage of origination and destruction, and otherwise impermanence, has, however, been expounded by the Buddhas for practical purposes." It's a stepping stone teaching.

So to limit our dharma understanding, our exploration, our perspective of life, and also our approach to aesthetics and art and sense experience just by a limited understanding of impermanence and a limited exploration of emptiness—well, it limits.

How might we open up the possibilities for beauty and also for our aesthetics and our practice? And in that, open up soul-making, because they're connected—beauty and soul-making.

Perhaps we need to explore more deeply the nature of objects, of things, of life. If we feel like we say, "Oh, life is uncertain, life is this or that, it's huge," but we've actually nailed it down, nailed what it is and given that a reality—what is it? Well, it's this tragic impermanence and this hugeness that might dwarf me or erase me or extinguish me and my existence at any moment, the fragility of that. You see, that's what life is. We need to perhaps explore more deeply the nature of objects, things, and life to open up the possibilities for beauty, for aesthetics, and for soul-making.

And also, we need to open up and explore more deeply if there are, for instance, this view of life, these feelings, these emotions in regard to selves and things—this what my friend would call the unbearably poignant feelings, emotions of unbearable poignancy, seeing this fragility, impermanence of things, seeing this sublime.

Going deeper into those feelings, not just stopping there with the first sense of them and then perhaps intellectually formulating them, but not stopping—really feeling into them, certainly not avoiding or brushing them away, but going deeper into them, exploring them, opening to them. Do you have the skill to do that? Go deeper into these feelings, care for them, see how that actually transforms the feelings themselves—not by avoiding them, not by brushing them over or painting them pink, but through deeper exploration.

Don't arrest that exploration of what you're feeling if it's painful, that unbearable poignancy. Deeper exploration transforms the feelings, because everything is dependent. The transformation of the heart transforms the self-sense and the sense and the perspectives, and then the very sense and experience of things and of life—just through going deeper and exploring more and caring more and being more careful with the feelings.

So both poles—both the object pole, so to speak, and the subject pole of experience—need more exploration in order to open out the possibilities for beauty and aesthetics, and also soul-making. Both poles, subjective and so-called objective.

Beauty is in-between. Beauty is not wholly within, nor is it wholly without. Beauty is in-relationship. We say beauty is in the eye of the beholder. It's not just in the eye. It's in-relationship—of subject and object, just like image is. The image is not just there, nor is it just here. Image in the sense that we're using it, imaginal image. And just like soul is—what we mean by soul is in between, it's in the between, it's in the relationship. And actually, just like existence is, and life is, and being is, and world is, and the senses are—there's an unavoidable, inextricable link between the subjective and the objective.

They are inseparable, subject and object, these poles. There's a mutual involvement, a mutual dependency of object and subject, a dialogue, a conversation, a mutual participation. And the same with the soul and the world.

So if we're stuck, or rather in order to open up further our sense of beauty, both poles—the subjective and the objective—need working with. We can explore fruitfully both poles, where they are limited, where they are less pliable.

In the pole of the object, we see that it's empty, in the sense that it doesn't exist independently of the way of looking—it doesn't have an inherent existence. It's empty in all kinds of ways, in fact. We're not reducing it to a scientific materialist or reductionist materialist view, because then I've limited the object. I've decided that it is this. And that kind of reductionist materialist view of things or objects or sense experience doesn't hold water if I investigate it. If I limit my view of objects, things, to a one-dimensionality, then it's almost like I'm not investigating them properly. I'm limiting what I can see there, what I can sense there. So this one-dimensionality needs to open up to the dimensionality, to the experience of dimensionality in sense objects.

And also, as I said, the subjective pole, the pole of my experience—taking care of the heart, the emotions. Catherine was talking about the senses connecting to the heart, an experience and a conception of the senses as connected with the heart. This will also support the sense of beauty and the opening and deepening of beauty.

We can also say that, as we touched on already in the retreat, in experiencing, in coming into sense experience with something, the whole energy body is involved. So I'm taking care of the subjective pole by bringing the whole energy body into contact with it. It's not just my eyes that see. What is it to look with my whole energy body as well as my eyes? What is it to know with my whole energy body as well as with other senses? So this whole energy body is included in the knowing. It's epistemically and epistemologically included. We're not shrinking down and dismissing other ways of knowing. There is no epistemicide or epistemic cleansing, which has been so rampant in Western society in the last few hundred years.

This knowing—or rather involving the whole energy body and the whole image of the body in the knowing, in the sense experiencing, in the looking or whatever it is—is also a way, as we've touched on, that supports eros to arise in the sense contact. How do I move from craving to eros? One of the ways is getting the whole energy body involved, so that the imaginal and soul-making can open up.

And then we've said before, again talking about how to open up our possibilities for beauty and deepen the possibility for aesthetics, we need to allow the fertility of the imaginal. We need to allow psyche, and we need to allow logos to expand. And we need to allow the eros to flow through and in our relationship with sense experience, or art, or whatever it is, so that through this allowing, the eros-psyche-logos dynamic can expand, can enrich and widen, deepen.

And there is the perception, eventually, of dimensionality and divinity, both of object and of subject, as we've touched on. We need to allow ways of looking that are legitimized because of the emptiness of things. Allow this diversity and flexibility, plasticity of ways of looking, including, for instance, deliberately sensing this sensation, or this vedanā, or this perception of an object in any and each of the six senses as divine. Deliberately sensing this as divine—so this is a deliberate practice—or as from the divine.

Or deliberately sensing and viewing—a way of looking that deliberately senses and experiences and perceives or conceives this knowing, this awareness of this thing right now, in this moment, this knowing itself as divine or as from the divine, or that in that knowing I am, you are participating in divine knowing.

That kind of deliberate divinization of, if you like, the experience of the object or of the self or of the eros or of the world—that deliberate divinization may be, the capacity to do that may be developed from that experience just spontaneously arising through similar perceptual shifts where any of those aspects, any or all of those aspects—self, other, world, or eros—appear to us as divine. We have that sense through practice, through soul-making practice.

Or it can come through, or be supported through emptiness practice—ways of looking that see this object, or this vedana, or this sensation, or this knowing, the awareness itself, as anatta, not self.

And that loosening of the self-appropriation—"this is my knowing, I am knowing, I am the one who is aware," or "this is my awareness," or "this is my hand," or whatever I'm looking at—this loosening of that identification and self-appropriation with regard to experience and the aggregates, the so-called five aggregates, also opens possibilities because of the loosening. Then it becomes much easier to see them, for instance, as divine. Not mine—they're divine.

But these possibilities are supported in different ways through practice. I'm talking about how to open possibilities for beauty, possibilities for aesthetic conception, possibilities for soul-making. And oftentimes, again, it's the logos that limits our sense of beauty, the range of beauty that we can experience. It limits our aesthetics and limits our soul-making.

So for example, to have just a body of teaching that, either directly or indirectly, ends up saying there is no beauty to the world and in the senses—it's all just craving at sense pleasure. And then because of that implicit or explicit teaching, one moves into a mode of relating that avoids or dismisses or denigrates sense experience and the world, the world meaning the world of sense experience. And there's the movement to transcend that, as we've talked about. Or we just get the more modern Western version: enjoy but don't get attached. How does that work exactly? It's not really a very well fleshed out teaching or something we can have a lot of integrity with.

The relationship with the senses is implicit in and directed by a whole metaphysics that comes with teaching. The relationship that we have with the senses and that we try to pursue with the senses is implicit in and directed by the whole metaphysics that comes with whatever teaching we're exposed to and following. There's a logos of what is real and what's not real and how we can know and what the world is. And there's a fantasy wrapped up in that, completely wrapped up with the conception, the fantasy of the path and what awakening is and how that relates to the world and the world of the senses.

So someone saying, like our friend, "Buddhist art is about impermanence, tragedy and the sublime." Why? Because that's what is believed to be real. These are real things. Life really is like that. These are real. So again, there's a metaphysics involved that ends up determining the relationship with the senses, with art, with beauty.

What would it be not to limit art, not to limit beauty and the possibilities of beauty, not to limit the possibilities of soul-making? That they are actually open-ended, as we've discussed, potentially infinite in their directions. So notions and fantasies about reality and the relationship with reality, including some kind of beyond, are tied up in the aesthetic sense.

We talk about physicists and mathematicians talking about a beautiful theory or a beautiful equation. Part of that sense of beauty is not just the elegance or simplicity of the equation or the theory. There's something, there's a dimension there. It reaches to a dimension of what isn't yet known, what is not obvious. And in another way, that's a way of saying depths, isn't it? The deep is what is not immediately apparent, what is not obvious. The theories that are beautiful connect the apparently unconnected, and they penetrate and open to what's beyond understanding, to another level.

So there's metaphysics in physics, there's this movement, and that's part of the whole perception of beauty, the whole sense of beauty, and the aesthetic sense.

And when it comes to practices, we also might be engaging practices that may limit the experience of beauty and the experience of soul-making. Bare attention to sense experience, to art, or to something in nature—bare attention will not bring a sense of beauty by itself. It will not bring a sense of beauty or soul-making. It might bring a sense of vividness and that radiance. If it does bring a sense of beauty, I would say at that point it's no longer bare attention. We actually haven't realized that it's not actually bare attention. It doesn't bring a sense of beauty and soul because it doesn't allow other depths and dimensions and the imaginal to open up in relation to what is perceived and what is sensed.

Or for instance, Mahasi practice, where there's this very focused, narrowly focused, sharp attention—kind of microscopic attention to the details of experience. And what comes down is these moments of sensation, moments of vedana, moments of perception of heat, cold, color, whatever it is. And there's a kind of atomism, which we've touched on in previous retreats. This atomic seeing, this deconstruction or reduction of the world to atomic moments of experience and elements there, is regarded as real. And being regarded as real in the logos, it creates a limit. This is the limit, because this is real. We've reached the base of what reality is—reality is made up of these extremely fine grains of sand of experience.

But then because there's a limit there and that's taken as reality, there isn't this unfathomability, this inexhaustibility, this mystery to things, to experiences, to perception, to sense experience. There is in that teaching a beyond sense experience, a transcendent, the unfabricated, but it's not in and through.

The beyond there is not in and through. It's away from experience. It's with the erasure, the fading, the cessation of experience.

Or as a third example of practices that might limit the opening of the senses of beauty and soul-making: a practice where one simply receives experience and abides, rests in a kind of openness of awareness. This will, as it progresses and deepens, lead to a sense of one taste. Everything, all experience has one taste—probably the taste of awareness or love—just has one taste, insubstantial. It might be infinite spatially because the awareness opens up as if vast. But in terms of dimensions, it reaches only that one dimension. This one taste of everything is awareness, or everything is love, or whatever it is. But the dimensionality doesn't open up either beyond that or more than that or wider than that. There is not the fertility of soul perception.

So I would say, why limit? Can we not limit beauty, art, soul-making? I would actually say, just like eros and just like soul, beauty also will always be larger than however we define it. It will not be captured in any definition. Why? It's part of the mystery of being. Beauty and our capacity for beauty and our sensitivity to beauty and the existence of beauty is one of the mysteries of being. We will never exhaust it in experience. We will never exhaust it in our creation of it. We'll never come to the end of the possibility of creating beauty or experiencing beauty. And whatever definitions or ideas of beauty we hold will never completely exhaust what beauty is, will never arrive at a final comprehension that captures it. Just like eros, just like soul. And also, just like divinity, the divine.

Some people hear that word—divinity, or the divine, or God—and think, "What on earth do you mean?" Or they assume you mean some figure they've heard about: a guy sitting on a cloud, meting out judgment to people with a long beard, or whatever. Sometimes people find it very perplexing. "What do you mean when you say that—God, or divinity?"

Maybe what might help for some people to open to that word, if one is curious and has enough looseness and flexibility and permission in the soul to allow that word or explore what that might mean, is opening up that relationship to the word divinity by analogy to beauty. Something analogous here.

If someone said—which people of course do say quite commonly these days—"There is no divinity, there is no God, there is no Buddha-nature, there are no metaphysical dimensions. None of that. Or if there is, it's irrelevant..." In a way, that would be similar to saying—if I pursue this analogy a little bit—similar to saying, what if someone said, "There is no beauty in the world anywhere. There is no beauty in the world, there is no beauty anywhere. And anyway, even if there is, it's not important, it's irrelevant."

Of course, a person can say that and they can believe it, and that might be their own experience: there is no beauty in the world anywhere, and even if there is, it's not important, it's irrelevant. But surely it's too much to generalize that for others and just claim that everyone who perceives beauty or for whom beauty is important is simply deluded or deluding themselves. So fine, if a person has that experience, but one cannot generalize that for others.

Divine, as I am using the term, or divinity, refers to experience. Just like beauty, it refers to experience. And the way I am using divinity has, again, parallels to beauty—an analogy to what I mean by beauty—because I am not claiming that divinity exists independent of perception, of a way of looking, of soul. Just like beauty.

So it refers to experience, and I'm certainly not claiming that divinity is something that exists independent of my perception, independent of certain ways of looking, independent of soul. Now, if a person wants to say, "Ah, so it's basically an illusion—you just said it doesn't exist independently. It's an illusion. It's non-existent. It's just a fabrication"—again, this would be silly on a number of counts, such a statement, because show me something that's not fabricated. Show me something that's independent of the way of looking. All things are. Bring that thing to me. Show me. Point to it. There is nothing that's not dependent on the way of looking.

Nothing that's not fabricated. And if a person were to say that beauty is non-existent, an illusion, just a fabrication in the poor sense of the word—would you really believe that? If someone tried to convince you there's no such thing as beauty, that it is merely an illusion, or if they said people believe in beauty or seek beauty as a consolation—people say that about divinity, don't they? We believe in divinity, we seek divinity as a consolation.

It's possible that some people do approach divinity this way, or beauty. They either believe in it or seek some kind of experience as consolation. But really—and divinity is so charged and has become so problematic, so translate that to beauty—if someone said to you, "You believe in beauty or you seek beauty as consolation," possible maybe at times, or for some people at times. But really, as a kind of psychological assessment of what's going on within our relationship with beauty? It's hardly accurate, hardly comprehensive, let's say. It doesn't really flesh out what's actually happening for us in an experience of beauty.

It's not that we desperately create beauty to console ourselves against the reality of a meaningless universe and the finitude of our existence. As much as we might seek beauty or create it, it finds us. As much as we might seek or create it, it finds us. We are struck by beauty. If we are only open—and open means more than heart, more than just heart, more than just the senses—open means soul open.

There's something to recognize here. There's a mystery to beauty. It's always going to be bigger than the reasons why—the reasons why we create beautiful things, the reasons why beauty is important to us, the reasons why we experience beauty. We make those reasons, and beauty will transcend them. It will be more than that. Our whole relationship with beauty will always be more than that, just as with divinity and what I mean by the experience of divinity and the conception of divinity. So I'm making a parallel here.

And what's more, certainly in the way that I would like to open up that exploration of divinity and inclusion of that notion and that experience—divinity, like beauty, is not outside of sense experience. So there is certainly a dimension or aspect, if you like, of divinity, of the transcendent, unfabricated, that might be wholly transcendent of sense experience. Sure. But divinity, like beauty, is not outside of sense experience, in the way that I would like to open that up.

This is an analogy. I'm not saying beauty is God or God is beauty or anything like that. I'm not equating the two. I'm making an analogy. If divinity is just a baffling notion to you and there are all kinds of reactions, think about and explore your relationship and your notion and your experience of beauty. There are, I think, many analogies there with the experience and possible notions of divinity.

I could use actually love or mercy or intelligence rather than beauty, because in mystical experience and mystical perceptions that are possible to open up, we can have experiences of love or mercy or intelligence or many other qualities pervading the cosmos, being present throughout the cosmos. But those kinds of experiences are less common than an experience of beauty in the cosmos, in the universe. Even though beauty can be harder to find at times, most people have had an experience of beauty. We don't think of it as a mystical or rare perception, a rare experience, though actually it is a kind of mystical perception.

I'd like to say more about the experience of divinity and the breadth and range of those kinds of experiences, but I'm aware of time, and I've talked about it recently elsewhere, so I'll leave that for now. But just to say that when I'm talking about the experiences of divinity and that notion of divinity, we're really talking about infinite folds—infinite possibilities, infinite folds of the infinite, if you like. Infinite aspects of divinity that can open up for us everywhere and in everything.

Every facet of our being and every facet of existence can be divinized or experienced as divine in infinite ways. Because of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, because of the expansion of soul-making, of the movement of soul-making, everything that involves and implies and galvanizes, there is the ongoing possibility of the creation and discovery of divinity everywhere, in everything, in every facet. Even the creation and discovery of facets that we haven't, that we don't even yet perceive in things, in ourselves, in our being. And then those too will be divinized, these new facets, these unknown facets.

Now sometimes, of course, people really don't like that word "divinity" or "God" for all different reasons. And so sometimes people might use the word "Buddha nature," and actually I could use them interchangeably as far as I'm concerned. In Buddhism, Buddha nature has, you know, a whole range of teachings, divergent teachings. People disagree about it.

People argue about it—a whole range of ways that word and concept of Buddha nature is used.

One of the ways it's used, especially recently, has come to mean simply your nice qualities, your good qualities. So you might feel that you lack generosity or compassion or patience. But actually these things are there in you, just waiting to be unearthed. This teaching helps us in regard to self-judgment because we recognize this innate goodness.

Some streams of the tradition use it in a second way—related, but different. Buddha nature means your potential to be enlightened, to become a Buddha. The possibility of you becoming a Buddha is your Buddha nature. Why is that possible? Because the mind is impermanent and the factors of the mind are impermanent. So if you're stingy and not generous, if you're judgmental, if you're impatient, these are just impermanent factors of mind. Because they're impermanent, they can go away and you can cultivate opposite qualities—generosity, compassion, patience. In cultivating them, you grow towards Buddhahood.

There's another way, which I prefer to speak about, which is what I mean mostly when I talk about Buddha nature. This refers to something much more mysterious, mystical, transcendent—or transcendent in some respects. It refers to the Buddha mind, the cosmic Buddha awareness, if you like. But it's not even just an awareness. It's a non-dual awareness. It is empty in itself, but it's inseparable from what it knows. And what does it know? It knows the world, the world of appearances, which are also empty, and it knows that they are empty.

So it's a knowing of emptiness and the totality of both the knowing and what is experienced—the awareness and the world. It's, if you like, the whole intersubjective field that we call included when we talk about subject and object, the whole field together. It's the gnosis, the ultimate knowing of a Buddha, the ultimate intersubjective field of a Buddha mind, but it's cosmic knowledge. This is more what I would like to infer when I use the word Buddha nature.

Buddha nature comprises, in the Mahayana tradition, dharmakaya as one aspect or dimension. In some teachings, dharmakaya really just means—kaya is body and dharma is consciousness. One meaning of dharma is mental factors. It's just the body, if you like, the collection of the Buddha's mental factors, of the Buddha's mental dharmas. In the Prajnaparamita Sutras, it means much more than that. It's not just the collection of the Buddha's mental factors possessed by a certain individual—Siddhartha, Gautama, or whoever. It's actually referring much more to this non-dual, empty gnosis that's inseparable—subject and object, awareness and world—that whole cosmic intersubjective field that knows the emptiness of things, is empty itself, and includes both awareness and world, subject and object, all being empty.

Actually, Buddha nature also includes not just dharmakaya, but also sambhogakaya and nirmanakaya. We don't have time to go into that, but I've talked about this before. If we don't restrict the meaning of those words and these kayas to just an individual, historical individual, or one possible individual in this finite form—their Buddha nature or this person's Buddha nature—and regard it more widely, more cosmically, then the dharmakaya and the sambhogakaya and the nirmanakaya really include this cosmic, universal subject, if you like, the whole realm of imaginal perception, the imaginal realm, and the world of physical appearances or appearances that appear physical to us, whatever that means.

All of that brings us to something much more mystical, much more inclusive and much less dualistic as well. With a certain understanding of Buddha nature that I would like to relate to the use of the word divine or God as well. Can we move towards that? What would support that kind of opening of the view, that kind of platform of a view, actually in experience as well as in conception?

We know, for example, with just a little bit of reflection, that my body, your body, though it looks like a distinct thing, is actually in constant permeable exchange physically with the material world—the air we breathe, the food we eat, what we drink, what we excrete. There's permeability between my body and the world's body, if you like.

As we go more into and allow more and support more the soul-making dynamic and the igniting and the fire of eros-psyche-logos, we begin to be able to perceive and to sense, not just conceive, but to perceive and to sense—because things that we perceive and sense become erotic objects for us, then the whole eros-psyche-logos dynamic, as we've described—we start to perceive and sense those things, and the world of things, and everything, and every facet, and every fold, and every dimension, gains a kind of autonomy. We sense it as having a certain autonomy, a certain intelligence, a certain soul, psyche, and also its own eros.

This tree has a certain—comes alive as soul. It has soul. It is soul. It also has eros. So psyche and eros and intelligence and all the rest of it and autonomy are not just in the human or animal minds. Actually, with the eros-psyche-logos dynamic expanding, deepening, widening, fertilizing, we start to sense ourselves and conceive ourselves in an ensouled world, a world that has soul, that is soul. An animate world—the word animate actually refers to anima, has soul, which is Latin for soul.

The world becomes animated. The world of things, of objects, of so-called inanimate objects becomes animated. The whole open field of being becomes the field of eros and soul and eroses and souls and psyches.

So psyche is not just in here. Soul is not just in here, or in you, somehow. And we've already actually implied this by saying, in the use of the word psyche, we said yes, it means soul - my soul, your soul - in the subjective citta sense. But it also means, in the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, the totality of imaginal perception. We said that, if you remember. In other words, the totality of objects and perceptions. So it's already implicit that psyche is not just in here, so to speak.

And eros too. I told you about Eros always being with Pothos and with a band of gods or demigods called the Erotes. Well, another character, as well as Eros and Pothos in that little band that always goes together, is Anteros. This is responding or returning eros - the mirroring of eros. And what we see with our imaginal experience, whether it's a purely so-called intra-psychic image or an imaginal perception, the deepening of the soul-making perception of something in the world, is that that thing, whatever it is, or that beloved other, we start to sense that they have eros for us. The eros is returned; it flows both ways - from us to them, from them to us. The world of things loves us. It has eros for us. It has soul. It is soul. Souls multiply, become more manifold.

So in all this, we're collapsing, or if you like, going beyond the sort of typically now ingrained assumption and perception of Cartesian dualism that Descartes made between mind and matter - cogitans and res extensa. Actually, reading recently, quite interesting - it really started with Galileo, not with Descartes. That's interesting anyway. But this - not so much collapse, but opening out of that dualism, dissolving of that dualism - becomes not just an idea, but a lived sense. It's sensed, it's felt, it's experienced, as well as conceived.

So that movement happens, as I said, just through soul-making and supporting soul-making and being interested in that and exploring it. And that expansion there through the whole eros-psyche-logos dynamic, as we've been explaining, it will move to that place. And then that place will just keep becoming more manifold - the senses of divinity, the perceptions, the experience, the dimensions, the facets, creation, being created and discovered, all of that.

It may also be supported - and again I'm answering this question, how do we open up that sense of the divine? What supports it? - it can be supported for many people through emptiness practices, really deepening. For some people they need to go through that route.

So we see with the way I would teach emptiness and that whole line of exploration, we begin to realize through playing with ways of looking that the mind fabricates perception. And through that, this thing or that thing, this perception or that perception, this object or that object is empty, is fabricated. And then we also see that this mind or this awareness too is not-self - it's anatta. And we can play with that view and see what happens. And we recognize eventually that this mind, this awareness that fabricates, it too is empty in itself. It's not only not me or mine, it's also empty in itself.

We see more than this in this whole opening. We see that time is empty. And because of all this, fabrication itself is empty. The whole duality between what is fabricated and what is unfabricated, what seems illusory in some sense and real in some sense - that collapses. All of it, including the mind, can be perceived as sacred, as divine.

And we can say yes to a certain, or in a certain manner of speaking, a certain relative truth: the mind fabricates, but the mind that fabricates is this divine mind. It's not mine. It's the divine mind, which is not separate from the things and the world, because we've seen all that through the dependent origination, through the understanding of emptiness. It's the divine mind that fabricates all perception - so-called physical, so-called imaginal, so-called combination perception. And this view becomes, this way of looking becomes available. It's a possible view. We can move into that.

So I can engage that, deliberately, that view - that it is the divine mind fabricating, the divine mind that's timeless, that's empty, that's beyond all that can be said about it. That divine mind is fabricating a world of perception - the world of things and objects and selves and others and all that. It's not separate from those fabrications, but it's that that's fabricating, not me, not mine.

As Catherine has emphasized, we could say mind, but we could also say the senses or include within the word mind the senses. We tend to split these things; they're not really separate. The word, the Pali word and Sanskrit word, I think, is ayatana.

The Pali is certainly that, āyatana. And it gets translated as sense bases or organs, so ear, eye, etc. Or agents, implying this active role that they have. Their extent, their reaches, their fields—this is also a perfectly valid translation and is implied in the meaning of āyatana.

So that word āyatana encompasses much more than how we tend to divide those meanings up in English. If we say ear, we don't tend to think of the whole field of aural perception. Or eye—we don't tend to think of the whole field of visual perception, but actually that's included in āyatana. And so it includes the objects as well, the objects of sense perception, the fields of sense perception, the activity of the agency, the way that it is actually active and participatory. The senses are active and participatory, and also the so-called physical organ or base.

Again, this āyatana points to this intersubjective realm, this non-dual sense, if you like, that we can have of the whole realm of experience.

So through the view of emptiness, if we go through the practices of emptiness, for some people, it's what opens up the possibility of a certain view of Buddha nature, of divinity. And implicit in that is a certain soul-making practice—a view of soul and the soul's participation. And it can form a basis of possible further ways of looking and conceptions, a basis for the flexibility of that and being able to entertain, because we've seen the emptiness of these things. And because of that, further soul-making, and as I said, further folds, further facets created, discovered, come on that basis of that sense of participating and being in this divine field, if you like—the world as divine, the experiences of the senses as divine, ourselves, our minds, every fold, every facet of the being as divine. And that can be multiplied and deepened and enriched because of the eros-psyche-logos dynamics.

Now, it may be that someone is listening and thinks, "Yes, but is that real? Is that true?" If you have this sense...

I hope that it's obvious by now from everything we've said in previous retreats that we have moved beyond, we have deconstructed naive notions of reality and truth. We are in the playing field, the realm opened up by the Middle Way—neither existing nor not existing, neither is nor is not, as the Buddha said. "I teach neither is nor is not"—the Middle Way. That is a basis, a result of emptiness practice, and if you like, a basis but also a refinement or product of the refinement of imaginal practice.

So is it real? Is it true? In a way, we get locked into very naive—philosophically naive and psychologically naive—notions of reality and truth.

And what are we doing here? I'll say this again. I've said it before. What are we doing here? Is this whole exploration, whether it's of eros, soul-making, beauty, aesthetics—are we wanting to serve something called truth? I mean, maybe that's partly... I think it is actually a part of it. But so often when people hear that word, or "reality," or whatever, they just have some idea—we just have some idea of something that's singular and objective, existing independently of the way of looking. Is it that we're trying, this whole movement of practice in the service of reaching some singular, objective truth? Or is it soul-making? And that's a different intention.

We need to really open up what we mean by truth. But for me, we're in the service of soul-making. We're interested in supporting that movement of soul-making. And in the movement of soul-making, there will be an expansion. By definition, soul-making means an expansion of perception, an expansion into perception of dimensionalities and divinity, divinities and Buddha nature and all that. Limitless creation, discovery, revelation. This is the movement of soul-making. This is what we want to serve.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 100

Modes of Soulmaking (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 36 min

> In this Q&A session, Rob Burbea explores the nuanced relationships between emptiness practice, samādhi states, and mystical perception within his innovative soulmaking approach. Participants share experiences of perceiving insubstantiality in everyday objects and question whether they are experiencing samādhi or emptiness. Burbea clarifies how both samādhi and emptiness practices involve progressively less fabrication of self, other, and world, creating a convergence that opens mystical possibilities.
>
> Burbea challenges conventional Buddhist interpretations that view emptiness as merely "deflationary," instead presenting it as a gateway to divine perception and multiple forms of mystical experience. He discusses how soulmaking amplifies these possibilities infinitely, moving beyond traditional spiritual frameworks that offer only universal perspectives. The conversation touches on cosmopoiesis - the soul's creative perception of the cosmos - and how imaginal practice can transform both inner images and worldly perception.
>
> Participants explore questions about the directional nature of eros in practice, the experience of merging with imaginal figures, and how this approach differs from classical Tantric practices. Burbea emphasizes trusting the soul's natural unfolding rather than forcing prescribed outcomes, encouraging practitioners to notice the beauty and aliveness that naturally arise in their practice.

Sometimes when I sit in my kitchen and open my eyes—or even during the sit—things become insubstantial in the sense that the kitchen cabinets now look completely new and fresh and still, and almost vibrating at the same time. The other thing is I'm not quite sure sometimes whether I'm in samadhi or emptiness; it's just a blend. I'm thinking about it.

Let me see if I can summarize adequately. She used to be what she calls "an emptiness bore"—I'm really interested in that. So this whole area of imaginal practice is relatively new. We're talking a lot about divinity and mystical experiences and things. She recognizes from the past that whether at home or here on retreat, opening the eyes after there's some stillness, she perceives the world as shiny and radiant, but also recognizes in hindsight that in that perception there's some majesty and some mystical depth. She also experiences the insubstantiality—the kind of film-set quality with that sense of insubstantiality to perception. And she's not sure: Am I in a state of samadhi or emptiness? What's the relationship? And is it possible to experience the mystical opening and the divinity through emptiness?

Thank you. This whole business about the path—the whole way Buddhism is construed, and who the Buddha was, and what he tried to communicate, and where the teachings go—even here at Gaia House, if you were here for a while and went to every retreat, you would get very different, almost completely opposite pictures of what that is.

You will get people who say the Buddha was categorically not a mystic. He was trying to go away from all mysticism and anything like that. And then you get people who would say the Buddha was a mystic and he was opening that door. So everything within the Dharma—things like emptiness and samadhi—they all get interpreted according to this vision or fantasy of the package of where the whole path is going.

In a vision or fantasy of the path that categorically refuses any mystical sense, then emptiness has to be interpreted accordingly. Sometimes what you get is emptiness having this kind of deflationary quality—it's a deflationary teacher. Emptiness is saying, "Don't get excited about anything. Why? Because there's nothing behind anything or mystical. Nothing has any depth. Everything is interconnected, so nothing is worth getting excited about." And the path is essentially letting go of any kind of possibility of that. It should meet this existence, face up to it. It's what it seems to be.

Versus the way I would construe the whole path of emptiness—it's an opening to divinity. That's where it goes, absolutely. Or that's where it can go. Put it that way: that's where it can go. It may not be obvious at first with the whole way, at least the way I would present the way emptiness opens up. It may be that the first thing is just a bit more cooling, a bit more spacious, a bit more ease with things. But as you go deeper—and this I would again be in the plural of it—divinities, perceptions of divinities, different kinds of mystical experiences open up.

Emptiness can provide certain almost predictable experiences that open up for people. And then at a certain level it provides a kind of platform that allows all kinds of other experiences to open up of divinity. So divinities or experiences of divinity, different kinds of mystical experiences.

What we're adding on this retreat is that actually those possibilities are amplified, magnified even more in any possible direction. It's not just everything is divine because it's empty, or everything is divine because it's universal love, or everything is divine because its nature is awareness. What starts happening with the soul-making process is the kinds of divinity and where you find them, the faces of divinity—it just multiplies in the opening, in the perception.

Am I in samadhi, am I in emptiness? The two are related. They're related by virtue of the fact that states of samadhi are states of progressively less fabrication of perception of self, other, and world. And doing emptiness practices are also practices that fabricate less.

So they converge in direction. In that movement toward less and less fabrication, mystical experiences arise along a certain avenue. Does this make sense? What we're doing is saying: not just that avenue, but this avenue, that avenue, that avenue, that avenue, that avenue, that avenue, that avenue. It's infinite and proliferates in the best sense in every possible direction, rather than just the classical direction you tend to get in most spiritual teachings that offer a more universal perspective on things as opposed to personal deity.

This is one of the places where I see the emptiness path opening out most valuably—creating a platform or legitimization, a freedom to see in all kinds of different ways without getting hung up on the idea that something needs to have some kind of objective reality. You've released all that, and what you have is simply freedom to play with perception in all kinds of ways.

Let me clarify something about the jhanas, because someone asked this in an interview today. When I say the jhanas are states of progressively less fabrication, I'm not suggesting that's the way everyone needs to go—that everyone needs to practice the jhanas to know the unfabricated. It's more a way of understanding what happens in classical Buddhist practices.

Everything in the Dharma—metta, generosity, samadhi, insight, you name it, all the practices in those classical lists—moves in the direction of less fabrication. I don't mean to suggest it's a practice everyone needs to do: "Do the jhanas, otherwise forget about it." Rather, there's a way of understanding what that whole movement in the Dharma is. It's a conceptual framework for understanding this business about fabrication and what gives you the freedom to fabricate in beautiful ways. But it's not necessary that everyone tread that particular practice path.

Dave is asking about examples—we've talked about the force of eros being able to open up cosmopoiesis. Cosmopoiesis means the creation of cosmos—poiesis means to create, like writing poetry. Through perception, through ways of looking, we're discovering and creating the cosmos in beautiful ways through the force of soulmaking.

One way this can happen is through an imaginal image charged with eros. The whole galvanization of the soulmaking process—perception, movement, involvement, relationship—happens with that image. Then it begins to spill over into the world. You look around after meditation and notice the world looks different. How does it look different? How do I feel it differently? What is the world? The idea and perception and sense of the world is transformed, transubstantiated in connection with the flavor of the image.

You mentioned an example with a tree—the sturdiness and patience of the tree perceived in other objects in nature, though perhaps not in the pervasive way that might have been alluded to. Don't get too hung up on cutoff points. I would just keep practicing and see what happens. It can also happen the other way around—you're walking or sitting, and suddenly everything is a certain way.

With these things, try not to force or pressure. We work hard in meditation, asking what we can do to find balance, learning the skills and elements of the art—and that's good and important. We bring our heart, soul, dedication, and intelligence to it. But you can also conceive it another way: that the soul is driving this. What perceptions arise for different people at different times is what needs to arise.

Sometimes images move in series, building gradually rather than jumping to something dramatically cosmic. Sometimes the whole experience is very dramatic, sometimes really, really subtle. The key is not putting too much pressure on yourself, wanting the dramatic experiences you've heard about. What's needed is what arises naturally for you.

But how does that sound?

Look, I'm not hearing a lot of frustration in your question. It sounds more like curiosity rather than struggle. So beautiful things are happening, right? Would you say? Trust that. Stay with the beauty. Something really beautiful is happening.

You don't need to force anything. Much of imaginal work is simply noticing—we start to notice more and more. Some of that comes from familiarity, some from attuning more deeply, rather than trying to make different things happen.

So this whole teaching about self-other-world eros—what's a quadrupod? This four-legged stool of imaginal engagement—it's not obvious at first. The world, the cosmopoietic dimension, is usually present in images as the object. We don't realize, as I mentioned, that the self is actually also ignited and infused in the imaginal constellation. We miss this. Sometimes that's fine. Other times, whoa, things get really out of balance. The whole quadrupod has lost a leg, and we need to look around for what's missing to restore balance.

That was something I just noticed over time. Much of this work, including the cosmic ways, is about noticing: "Oh, that's interesting." I can't remember if my first recognition was dramatic or subtle—it doesn't matter. The point is noticing gradually rather than making things happen.

This applies to many aspects of imaginal practice. Even recognizing divinity—it's "Oh yes, it does have that quality." I might not like the word divinity, but it's what we notice rather than manufacture. This is characteristic of the imaginal. You start to notice: "Oh yes it is, oh yes it is, oh yes that, oh yes that," rather than trying to make it happen.

Now, I'm wondering about your question regarding how I use the word eros. When I talk about it in definitions, I mention contact, this wanting toward the beloved, this desire to penetrate or open to. You noticed I don't make any distinction between those two modes—penetrating and opening to. Is there a reason for that?

In your own practice, you feel a lot of eros for your direction, your path, but what your being wants to express is more in what we might call the feminine mode—not so much about going toward, but about being known by, being opened to rather than penetrating.

When you talk about eros, it often seems to carry that penetrating tension, that more masculine quality. Thank you for raising this.

Yes, when I talk about eros, it does seem more penetrating. I'm a guy. In terms of what we call masculine and feminine energies, I'm very masculine. So I have a lot of that penetrating quality, and I apologize if that emphasis comes through too strongly. The truth is, eros includes both movements—the reaching toward and the opening to be reached, the knowing and the being known.

Continue following this principle of how Eros wants to move in every way—go with what seems to be alive. If the directionality flows toward opening the self to what we were talking about this morning, if it's the anteros first—which is similar to what you're saying—then fine, just go with where it's alive. It's like a flame; wherever it's alive is where you trust, and then it will start moving. So eventually you get both the penetrating and opening, and so on.

I think I mentioned in the guided meditation that you can have purely sexual, erotic, imaginal experiences unfolding, and you could be the penetrator, and then transform into the one who's being penetrated. It doesn't even make sense anatomically, but it doesn't matter. You just trust—again, back to Dave's question—there's a soul movement here that will unfold how it unfolds, in the order that it unfolds for you, in the order that it unfolds for others. It's going to be different for everyone.

It's a bit like the question yesterday about conceptually starting in different places and experientially starting—some people more with the body, some people more with other dimensions. It doesn't matter. Trust the Eros and let it do its thing, and it will flourish. So apologies if my language tends to tip in that direction—it's just how it is.

Another practitioner shares about images and merging

So often when people talk about working with images, it's like merging with the image rather than relating to an other. But actually, whether there's an image which I merge with or whether the image is just myself, there is a sense of other in the conscious being-known within that image. The experience is that I am the image, but there isn't so much...

That's interesting. It doesn't seem like there's so much of an other—the self, or that pole of the self-other dynamic, has become the principal image, and there's not so much duality because there's quite a lot of merging going on.

Again, I would just trust it. When there's Eros, it creates otherness—othernesses, actually. What happens is it proliferates more and more othernesses. So you become multiple. The folds of your being start proliferating. It's not just one self—it's like this element or this dimension of my being that becomes a pole. And so there will be another, a beloved other, and then there will be more and more.

So again, I would just say trust it. What we're not doing is only diving into a kind of complete melting, dissolving experience. That's fine, and probably that happens for different people—that's quite normal. You can let that happen, you can enjoy it, but always there's a coming out of that. We don't want to get lost in that. We want to know it, and then otherness reestablishes itself in a beautiful way. There are degrees of melting, but there will be this proliferation of othernesses. You can basically just trust, I think.

The practitioner continues sharing about experiencing multitude within the image of self

Yes, that's fine. There'll be othernesses within that, yes. So it's like self almost becomes like another, like a beloved other, or beloved others, within that knowingness.

Oh yes, exactly. Thank you.

Jamie asks about Tantra

You mentioned in one of the talks that there are elements of Tantra that are analogous to the soul-making paradigm. I'm wondering if there are any critical ways in which it's definitely different.

There are probably lots of different ways that Tantra gets disseminated—classical Tantra, I mean. First of all, there's Buddhist Tantra and Hindu Tantra and all kinds, and then there's modern Western sexual Tantra. So what are we talking about? But even in Buddhist Tantra, there are many different schools and traditions.

One thing that comes immediately to mind is that often what you get in tantric teachings are prescribed deities with prescribed forms and prescribed colors and prescribed meanings and all kinds of specifications. That's all great and fine. I think we're leaning more toward this trusting of the soul and what comes up individually—what images come to you. So that's one difference.

There are others, but I'm not sure whether I want to say what they are right now.

I think I won't, if that's okay. Sorry. Is that okay? Is that enough?

The practice is so revelatory and powerful that why has no one found this before and talked it in a considered way? Well, what's in Tantra? Should I go to Tantra and see what else is there?

I'm not an expert on Tantra. I don't consider myself at all an expert. I suppose one of the ways it opened up for me was from the emptiness practice—it almost to me just suggests tantra, suggests the ability to do that. You reach a certain point when it becomes the obvious next step and the obvious unfolding.

So I went to the library next door and rummaged through books and tried to apply myself to the practices they were taught, but it worked to a certain extent, though it actually felt like it wasn't the right thing. And then for me, what was really a big thing was reading James Hillman. Moving through that and taking that and then just experimenting.

Your question of why isn't... It has a lot to do... That's why I tend to try and talk a lot and think a lot about conceptual frameworks, conceptual ideas that actually block it, that prevent... Why isn't it? There's actually a reason why. It's because we believe X or we believe Y or we believe that X or Z is wrong or this and that. There are actually ideas and psychological reasons—lots of reasons why not, why it doesn't. So that's actually quite an interesting question.

But yeah... then become the image in a way you need it.

I'm just a little... Dodgy territory. Well, it's dodgy for a reason I don't even want to say why. Let me just see what to say now. We can pause there if you want.

I think... Tantra is effectively infinite. I might have said that in a talk the other day. It's not taught as infinite. And it's also... The direction is prescribed. There are more directions than, say, in classic Theravada. But the directions are prescribed.

I think what I'm just kind of letting the cats out of the bag a little bit, here and in other talks and places, it's like, let's really open up that infinite thing. Let's really admit that that's implicit in the whole soul-making, and the directionality is infinite. And what happens if we just really open to that idea, realization, and then create a path out, or find a path out of that?

Tantra is an odd animal. Or religions are odd animals because there's this religious fantasy which goes backwards. So I have to tie something to this authority and this logos and this image of what awakening looks like. And then some things expand. There is a soul-making, but I still have to tie it to... Did you see what I mean? And there's a tension there.

And there was in Tantra right from the beginning because often... Historically, probably a lot of the tantric roots came from shamanism and village shamans meeting kind of orthodox Buddhism and stuff. So to me it's interesting, but there's still a kind of reined-in-ness that... it's a big step to do that, but that's a bit of an answer. Is that okay?

Okay. Let's just set someone who hasn't maybe asked anything. Anyone?

"This is one that could be answered or not answered, but it feels like one of the Eros practices that both of you have been seeding in us is maybe the art of asking beautiful questions."

I've been reflecting on how we can ask questions that elicit what you could call images in their own likeness. Because we have, literally, Eros and Psyche sitting in front of us—did I hit the mark there? Yeah. And as we prepare to go, with the knowledge you have now, sensing us the way that you do and having that heart connection, is there a question that you would craft for us together that we haven't thought to ask? For everyone.

You've been doing that all along in some ways, so it doesn't have to be answered now, but what would be... I'm also aware of that part of myself that always wants to ask: "Is this right? Is that right? Are we doing that right?" So this is just an open invitation at any point.

What was that about doing it right? I didn't catch that.

Well, as we prepare to leave, having some sense that the questions which elicit answers in their own likeness tend to be... I mean, we could probably map them out together, all the ones that... "Am I doing this well enough to be able to go home?" But what would...

Because you've been teaching us things like: "Is this soul-making? Does this feel alive?" To recognize the quickening that happens inside us when we ask something beautiful, or when there is an image of beauty.

We can think about it. Is that okay?

Yeah, maybe we'll ponder it and see what comes.

Okay. Unless anyone has something burning, shall we... We might, but... Okay. Shall we have a bit of quiet time?

Okay.

CHAPTER 101

Longing, Vulnerability, Anteros

Rob Burbea · 26 min

> In this profound dharma talk from the "Of Hermits and Lovers" series, Rob Burbea examines the intersection of longing, devotion, and vulnerability in spiritual practice. Drawing on Greek mythology's concept of Anteros—reciprocal eros—he reveals how we are loved by that which we love, exploring how devotion creates a mutual relationship with the divine.
>
> Burbea shares intimate examples from his own creative work, demonstrating how staying present with emotional difficulty and anxiety can constellation imaginal figures that transform our relationship to challenge. He illustrates how moving through the "crucible" of dukkha opens doorways to imaginal practice, where angels of our work appear to support and love us in our devotion.
>
> The talk explores how authentic devotion must include image and fantasy, not just material reality. Whether relating to Buddha, Jesus, Avalokiteśvara, or other divine figures, Burbea shows how beginning in humble human-divine relationship eventually ignites the soul-making dynamic of expanding eros. Through this alchemical process, both devotee and deity become erotic objects, transubstantiated in sacred relationship. He concludes by questioning how we participate in creating and discovering sacredness, using the example of tangerines becoming sacrament through blessed perception.

What I want to talk about is longing and devotion—some aspects of that whole dimension and movement of our being where divinity meets humanity, where our humanity meets divinity. Specifically, I want to explore where our longing and devotion touches and includes our vulnerability, our brokenness, or even our burden.

I'll try to illustrate with a few examples, but see if you can translate these to you and your life and your longing and your devotion. What I'm trying to get at may have levels to it—levels of meaning. So if it sounds simple, perhaps there are other levels as well.

Longing, devotion, vulnerability.

I remember when I wrote a book a few years ago. For many different reasons—too many to go into now—lots of different conditions, inner and outer, came together around those years that I was writing it, and it was very difficult to write. I didn't want to be writing that book. I had moved on from the subject matter in my own explorations, and there were many reasons that made it very, very hard for me. It felt very hard.

Instead of just seeing the emptiness of all that and letting go and sailing through equanimously, I chose—because I was actually more interested by that point in imaginal practice—to relate to the challenge of it in my own practice and the difficulties through imaginal practice. And that was hard. It wasn't even immediately apparent how to do that.

So there was a lot of difficulty in writing it, lots of different kinds of difficulty. At a certain point, the work itself, the book itself became image. There was the image of the book. It wasn't even written yet. There's the image of the book. And there are the imaginal beings that come to meet the difficulty of writing it, the difficulty of giving oneself, of being devoted to something.

So there are angels of the work, angels associated with that which we give ourselves to, and they might come and they might love us. The book is an angel, the book is an image—it becomes image. Figures came, angels come, healing, ministering, loving me, loving me in the difficulty, loving me for taking the trouble.

Only through going or being in, sitting in the crucible—the alchemical vessel of the pain, of the need, of the dukkha—sometimes, only through that can the image and the imaginal world open up and the whole movement of devotion open up and another aspect of the alchemy of desire can happen. We have to go through whatever it is: the sense of burden, the sense of difficulty, the sense of brokenness. I can't, most often, circumvent that.

Devotion includes eros. Where there's devotion, there's eros. Where there's eros, we may not recognize it at first, but there's devotion. They go together.

In classical Greek mythology, Eros hangs out with a sort of crew, a band of what's called the erotes. One of them is Pothos—this infinite longing, this infinite desire that always wants the beyond, the next thing. We've emphasized that and how crucial it is in the whole dynamic of eros.

There's another character in this little band called Anteros. And Anteros is reciprocal eros—eros coming back to us from our erotic beloved other. We are loved by what we love. We are loved and beloved and held erotically, embraced erotically by that which we are devoted to. We are loved by that which we love.

You can say, "But I love that person and they don't." Listen: we are loved by that which we love. That which we are devoted to is devoted to us. Anteros. Where there's eros, there's anteros. And it may not be obvious.

More recently, there's another huge creative project that I'm involved in, even bigger, probably. Yes, colossally huge.

It feels that way to me anyway. This is even just some weeks ago, and I found myself very consumed in it, very much giving myself to it, and then feeling at certain times anxious about what the outcome would be.

So, anxious for the outcome. Would this work disappear without a trace? Would it just sink? Like when something sinks in water, it's just gone.

Sometimes when we long for something, when we give ourselves to something, when we're devoted to something—please translate this to whatever longing, whatever devotion—we need to touch that possibility of not getting what we want, the possibility of losing, the grief at the potential losing and the pain of that, what we hope for, what we long for. Something in touching that may constellate an image, even if it's an image of that pain. And then I can have the imaginal relationship and something can open.

Because eventually then, that whole devotional relationship opens up faith, energy, alignment. We recognize somehow that we are not alone in wanting this thing. We're not alone in it. It's not only up to us. If we want something really deeply, let's say it this way: the angels and the divine wants it too. It wants it through you. The angels want it through your wanting. And I ask them, whose eros is it? We asked the other day. Whose eros is it? Whose longing is it? Whose devotion is it? Where is it coming from?

So I had this worry or anxiety come up, something felt consumed by giving myself to, that it might just disappear, get lost, sink. And with that there's the sense of self gets constructed around: I am responsible, I am burdened with this, it's up to me to make sure this happens, to make sure it doesn't sink. I was actually talking with Catherine about it and she was helping me inquire into this.

So being with that anxiety, being with that worry, and articulating it, and being with that emotion, not covering it over, being in that difficulty, and staying with that, and then that emotional difficulty and the willingness to be in the fire of the emotional difficulty constellated an image.

And the image that came was of a black woman and she is a single mother, but she had lost her only child. Either he'd died suddenly or been murdered. And she was stunned, in a state of just absolute stunned. Life had become baffling. There was a sense of meaninglessness. She was in a state of shock. Everything was rendered meaningless and disorienting. She was just standing there in her kitchen or something.

So this was an image, it was a very emotional image, it was really impacting emotionally. The image had to do with loss and the devastation of a feeling of loss when one poured all her love into her only child. Gone. Gone.

Something about being with that image was powerful. But I want to go slowly here because I want to illustrate what happened. It wasn't then that something just opened up. It actually put me into a state where it was like murky, like water that has sediment in it, you know, and it's all like particles floating around. It wasn't like great clarity came in. So I was in this kind of state of, what would you call—yeah, like kind of sedimented water. So it was kind of dark, but there was something that had shifted there in the anxiety. But I didn't know what it means or it wasn't even clear what the effect was.

Over time, and it was really I think maybe the next day, something settled. I didn't really even do anything. I was just with this image, with this murkiness, and with that image of the single mother.

And the next morning I was able to sense—it came to me—the soul of this project, the soul of the work, the angel of the work. And that wasn't something separate from the life, it's not something separate from the work, it's not something separate from other people. So a second image came, which is actually the primary image, the image of that which I am devoted to. It comes alive and it's bigger than me. It has its own autonomy, it has its own intelligence, it moves.

I am part of that movement, I participate in that movement, but it's not up to me. There's a sense then that it's bigger than me, that there's a soul intelligence moving that I can trust. I open to the sense of this movement. There's a flow there that's wider and deeper than I am. It's not just my responsibility. And then I can align with that. Then I can give myself to that. Then I can feel the trust, trusting in the intelligence of that. Then I can devote myself again. Then I can have faith.

Or another example: you might have a practice of, perhaps when you're feeling vulnerable, putting yourself in relationship with a deity. Maybe it's Jesus, maybe it's a bodhisattva of compassion, maybe you curl up in the lap of the Buddha. This constellates the human in vulnerability, in relationship to and being held by the divine. Really, really important. With that humility, with that reverence, with that recognition and feeling of that which is bigger than me, that which holds me.

Or perhaps you're in relationship with Quan Yin or Avalokiteshvara or some other tantric deity, and you're giving yourself to them, devoted to opening to and surrendering yourself to them and to their mission. The mission of Avalokiteshvara is compassion. What is it to open myself to that deity, to open myself to their mission, their mission of compassion? What happens over time if I do that again and again?

This level of the relationship—me the human and them the deity, they are the other, they are divine, I am human—that level is really, really important. It has the humility, it has the reverence, it has all of that. If I hang out in that space long enough, what happens? The whole soul-making dynamic starts getting going because of the eros in the devotion.

So that in time, self, other, world gets subsumed, involved, ignited in the dynamic of expanding eros, psyche, logos. I'm lying in the lap of the Buddha, I'm sitting at the feet of Jesus, I start to become divine. Why? How? Because of the self, other, world constellation being drawn in and catching the fire of the eros, of the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamo, I start to feel myself as divine. Then two deities are exchanging and sitting. We both become—the other is already an erotic object. I become to myself, so to speak, a beloved other, an erotic object. I become erotic to myself. My own eros starts to become erotic, an erotic object to me. I see the beauty, I see the divinity of my longing, of my devotion, of my eros. Everything gets caught up in the fire of eros and transubstantiated in the alchemy of desire. All of it, all the elements potentially. And one can have both perspectives at once: human-deity, deity-deity.

So when we really allow ourselves to give ourselves to something, to someone, when we really pour ourselves into something, to someone, then something or someone pours itself into us, pours itself through us.

When we don't know the outcome—this thing that I long for, please translate this to wherever your longing burns—when we don't know the outcome, don't know if I will get this, receive this, open to it or not, there's that vulnerability of not knowing. If the hoped-for goal does not, maybe won't manifest, what happens with the devotion? What needs to happen with the devotion?

Also, when we start to see that our devotion is based—as I think we were talking about yesterday—start to be a little more psychologically aware, you start to realize that devotion is based on fantasy, it's based in image. So both from either angle, we start to realize that devotion must be to image. Devotion is to image. Must be.

I mean, it must include reality, if we use that word, materiality, physical appearances. But devotion is not just to a flat reality. The depths of devotion include image. So what are we devoted to? What are we devoted to, really, when we're devoted? Are we not, at some level in a certain manner of speaking, actually devoted to soul, devoted to beauty, whatever that thing is that it seems like it is?

So even when we're devoted to the manifestation in materiality, some manifestation in materiality, that's what we long for, that's what we're devoted to, it needs a soul dimension. The devotion needs a soul dimension. It needs a fantastic and imaginal dimension. And devotion needs trust. It needs enough trust.

Trust in what? Devotion needs trust in something. Trust in what?

Do we discover sacredness? Is it revealed to us? Or do we create it? If we discover it, if it is revealed to us, how? How do we discover it? How can we open to that discovery? How is it revealed to us? If we create it, how do we create it? How can we support that creation?

And if we create-slash-discover—that word that we don't really have—how does that happen? We participate in the creation-slash-discovery of sacredness. We participate in that. We participate in perception. We participate in truth-making. We participate in the creation-slash-discovery of the nature of awakening.

By "participate" I can't quite articulate this—I mean something much deeper than we participate in life because we pay our taxes and whatever. Something that, if we think too much in the usual ways of thinking in terms of subject and object duality, doesn't make sense or seems silly. If I go to oneness and just the perspective of oneness, it also doesn't quite make sense.

Eros, as we've been saying, needs twoness. It needs otherness. Eros also creates twoness and creates otherness endlessly. And through that, Eros discovers-slash-creates sacredness. It reveals sacredness.

I was very touched by the ceremony last night. I don't know—of course people have, each person even has many different experiences during whatever it was, an hour and a half. How do those tangerines... how are they made? How are they sanctified? How did that happen? If it happened at any point, how did that happen? How did the tangerine become sacrament?

We bless things. We bless each other. We bless ourselves. We bless the world. We sanctify self, other, world through our ways of looking, through our conceptions, through our actions, through our body, through our speech. And then the sanctified world, the sanctified other, blesses us.

I don't know—when I put those tangerines in my mouth, it was quite powerful. How does the world get made holy? How do we discover the holiness of things?

Shall we have a little quiet together?

CHAPTER 102

Shaping Vessels

Rob Burbea · 13 min

> In this closing talk from the 'Of Hermits and Lovers: The Alchemy of Desire' retreat, Rob Burbea addresses a crucial question for practitioners: how do we sustain and grow our spiritual practice beyond the retreat setting? He explores the paradox that those most passionate about the Dharma often feel lonely within meditation communities, despite their deep commitment to the path.
>
> Burbea introduces the concept of 'vessels' - sacred containers that support soul-making practice in daily life. These include formal sitting groups, study circles, and particularly the sharing of imaginal perceptions and images. He emphasizes how intimate images are to our spiritual development and discusses the Greek concept of 'temenos' - sacred space that requires respect, care, and proper holding for deep sharing to occur.
>
> The talk examines how Right Speech (sammā-vācā) functions not just as ethical conduct, but as a practice that sanctifies perception itself. When we share what is most beautiful and alive in our practice within appropriate vessels, our speech feeds back into consciousness, deepening imaginal perception and creating alchemical transformation. Burbea offers practical guidance on creating both formal and informal structures that can hold the vulnerability required for authentic spiritual friendship and mutual support in continuing the soul-making journey.

I really want to say thank you to you for your practice, for the willingness and openness to try different things and bring the fullness of yourself, open to perhaps new ideas. To throw yourself into something of such beautiful quality—I feel like saying, thanks for coming over to play. It's really, really beautiful and precious.

And so the vessel of the retreat ends, but life goes on, certainly, and practice goes on, and the path goes on. Creating these kinds of vessels, creating vessels or discovering vessels, is really, really important. It's not about jumping to the absence of any distinction between retreat and life, everyday life, so to speak, and retreat. There is that distinction. But in a way, there is no distinction either. Practice goes on; practice needs to go on.

So just to pick up something Catherine just touched on: What would support that? What would support practice, not just putting the time in—someone used to say just sort of treading water until the next retreat—but what would support and sustain a growing of practice, of these practices, of your soul-making off retreat? This is a real question. What supports it? What might sustain it? What might enable us all to grow, for our practice to grow, for our vision to grow, for our sensibility to grow, for our soul to grow, to digest what we discover in the growth, what we've discovered here, to fertilize, to be fertile, to expand the edges? What would sustain it? What might help? What would support that?

It's interesting—in the last few months I've come to realize something that I was vaguely aware of before, but it's become more clear to me. At least in insight meditation culture, we have somehow—certainly not everyone; there are people in this room for whom this is really an exception—but it seems there's a kind of... for people whose lifeblood is practice, who have a deep passion, where it's maybe the thing, the path and their engagement with the path and that whole movement and that whole opening and receiving is perhaps the most important thing in their life... And curiously, it's those people who often feel so lonely, even in a Dharma world.

Somehow we have set up, or there has emerged, a kind of culture of—maybe not non-sharing, but limited sharing. And this is really interesting to me. I know this from my past: How is it that the ones on fire end up being the lonely ones? Actually, there's a lot to that question. What has happened? And what might open it up differently and support the beginnings of perhaps a new way of relating?

What happens, or what has happened to you in the past perhaps—not everyone, I know that—where there has been an attempt at sharing and something has happened that causes us to back off, or it's ended up that we've backed off? And we yearn to be seen and to see and to share what's at our edge, what's most alive, what burns in our heart. And so people might go to sitting groups and it's fantastic, and yet the things that are aflame in them, the things that are really on their edge, are the things that are not shared, that are not explored. I'm not saying everyone at all. And I know people in this room who have created something or relationships where there really is that possibility. And there are others in this room where, much as they want it and much as they know they want it, it's not there. And there's still interaction with Dharma people and friendliness and everything, but some level is missing.

And it's difficult, you know. What comes in? There's the whole measurement thing. Maybe I share and I'm not up to the level of the other person. Or maybe I share and it's beyond them, and then there's this whole trip that they think I've got a big ego or whatever it is. Maybe I fear they will judge me in some way. There's vulnerability, as you know. Part of what we've talked about is vulnerability and being together—all the complexity of vulnerability and being together.

Last night, while you were listening to the talk, I went for a walk and went up the hill. Maybe some of you know it. I came to some houses quite away from here, a farmhouse. Everything was just getting dark. And this lovely dog came out. And it was just in the middle of the road, just sort of flipped itself onto her back and just opened her belly —just "rub my belly." It was so unguarded and so simple and so beautiful, you know. Really, really lovely dog. And then when belly was rubbed and we had a sort of connection, it was like, "Okay, so..." Off she went, wagging her tail.

It's usually more complicated for us as human beings.

We have another practice to give you. No, not on this retreat. Next one.

Yeah, it's complex. We have history. It's not easy. We are complex beings. There are parts that haven't been seen or have a history of being unrecognized or slighted or disrespected or misunderstood. It's not easy for us, unfortunately.

So again, I go back to this question: what would support? What would support that intimacy? What would support the soul-making? Whatever has been meaningful, whatever has been your edge - why cannot there be a sense of a growing edge of retreat that can continue? It's really a myth that it all happens on retreat. So the question: what supports that?

We talk about vessels. There are different kinds of vessels. This retreat was a vessel. Coming together and being in silence and sitting together can be a powerful vessel. I know that you know that. Listening to talks together, reading, studying together, discussing what you've read, studied, listened to - that's a vessel as well. It's a certain kind of vessel.

Sharing images is also a vessel, and it's a particularly potent vessel, or can be. But images - have you noticed, I'm sure you have, how intimate images are to us? When I was doing the Path of the Imaginal retreat, I was saying to Catherine beforehand, "I'm not sure how it's going to work. Are people going to feel okay to share this together?" There's a lot that needs to be taken care of if we share images with each other because they're so intimate. They can be. Did you recognize this?

So might it be another kind of vessel to actually share images with each other? Then what does that need? How might we take care of that?

Perhaps you've gotten a sense here - in an interview or in a group or in these little dyads and triads - of a vessel being created or just formed spontaneously that actually really takes care of something. And then there's an alchemy in the sharing and in the listening and something in the togetherness and the mutuality.

But it needs a temenos. Soul, images. Temenos is a Greek word. It means a kind of sacred space. We don't have to make a big deal of that, but it basically needs respect and care and holding.

That can be formal. So you could set up really formal structures - like when we do these dyads and you take your posture and you've got all that stuff that we've been doing and then there's your go and then my go. There's a formal structuring that can really, really help the intimacy. Or other times it's a much more informal back and forth that helps. But both are possible.

Another vessel is to share live images. What's the image? Catherine asked yesterday, I don't know how it was for you in the dyad, "What's alive for you right now?" And maybe some of what came alive in that moment was imaginal perception.

While you were playing, while you were working, Catherine and I just sort of did it for like a minute and she asked me that question. I can't remember exactly what I said, but I noticed that she was asking me, and I saw the divine light coming out of her eyes. This is an imaginal perception. And I shared that, and I said that.

I don't know if you noticed this, but for me I noticed something very interesting: that in the sharing of it, it took the imaginal perception and opened up the dimensionality. I know some of you know this.

So if I go back to the question I put at the other end: what is it that sanctifies? How do things, how do others, how do selves, how is the world sanctified? In lots of different ways - through body, speech, mind, through way of looking, through speech. We sanctify, we bless, we open our ways of looking, sometimes through what we share verbally or in writing.

And sometimes through listening. So sometimes there's even a vessel that deepens our images in the moment – right speech. The Buddha talks about right speech. It has a whole other level when you realize how the speech feeds back into the consciousness and into the perception.

And not just in the sense of if I go out trashing people in my speech and lying, then I get a dull mind and a worried mind about what people are going to be saying about me and all that – but also in this kind of speaking of that which is most beautiful, taking care about how that is expressed, trusting, putting that in a vessel that can hold it, that can care for it, feeling that mutuality.

And then the whole thing gets reflected back by, so to speak, the walls of the vessel and by the other. And we hear the echoes of our speech and it does something, it's part of the alchemy. This is not so common in our culture.

The main point here is that, again I go back to this question, what's going to support? What will support? You know, or you will find out, or you will begin to experiment or something. Lots of possibilities, lots, lots. What will support?

So, bless you and thank you all.

CHAPTER 103

Aspects of the Imaginal (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 53 min

> In this opening talk of 'The Mirrored Gates' series, Rob Burbea offers crucial clarifications on imaginal practice and soul-making dharma. Rather than adding entirely new material, he focuses on supplementing and clarifying previous teachings to support deeper understanding and practice. Burbea introduces the term 'sensing with soul' as complementary vocabulary to 'imaginal,' encompassing both intra-psychic imagery and imaginal perception of the material world.
>
> The talk presents approximately eighteen interconnected aspects that constitute the 'constellation of the imaginal,' including love and being loved, eros, beauty, dimensionality opening to divinity, beyondness, autonomy, two-ness with soft boundaries, infinite mutual mirroring, meaningfulness, theatrical quality, logos (conceptual framework), eternality, humility, reverence, grace, soul-making capacity, embodied awareness, and connection to the broader imaginal context. Burbea emphasizes this represents a spectrum of imagination use, from papañca proliferation to fully imaginal experience.
>
> Addressing practical concerns, he offers guidance for practitioners who feel they 'don't get images' and explores how imaginal capacity can be developed. The talk balances rigorous precision with generous amplitude, acknowledging the dynamic, evolving nature of imaginal experience while providing clear discernments that serve as 'ignition keys' for deeper practice. This foundational teaching prepares the ground for understanding how imaginal practice can dimensionalize and enrich traditional dharma approaches.

Good evening, everyone. Welcome to this short course, this set of talks that will focus on soul-making, imaginal practice, related ideas like eros, and other themes we've explored over the last several years. We'll examine what these concepts mean, what they might mean in the Dharma and for the Dharma, and how they might expand, stretch, enrich, deepen, and dimensionalize our understanding of what Dharma practice is, what it can open up, and where it can lead.

Actually, if I'm completely honest, I know this will change, but right now I'm feeling somewhat ambivalent about giving more talks on these themes. There's already quite a large edifice of teachings around soul-making in the Dharma, and it's substantial. It's a lot to digest, to come to terms with, to integrate into practice. It's complex to understand and for the heart to open to. It's not simple, and I'm acutely aware of this.

These teachings are quite new in being different from usual cultural ways of seeing the world, feeling ourselves, and sensing existence. They're also quite different from other Dharma approaches and perspectives on what Dharma is and can be. So I know it's substantial, and I'm feeling hesitant about adding too much more to that edifice at this point. I don't want to overload you or put out too much too quickly in a way that might be consumed hastily, leading to indigestion or confusion.

There's a certain pacing that's necessary to give proper attention and mature reflection to the appropriation and digestion of these teachings. So I won't be adding much genuinely new material or ideas or whole new directions. Rather, this set of talks will supplement, elaborate, and clarify previous material we've already presented.

On the other hand, I won't repeat everything we've covered over the last few years in terms of laying out that whole edifice again or explaining what we mean by all these terms and practices. Instead, I hope to clarify and supplement aspects of what was already taught where clarification and supplementation seem needed, based on what we're hearing back from people.

This is an attempt to clarify certain aspects, themes, and elements, and to fill out some strands of what we've done and their implications. Perhaps I'll show just a few possible directions for extending practice. As I said, I'm aware it's already substantial—a lot to take on in terms of practice possibilities, the skills and art that requires, the know-how and capacities needed, as well as intellectually. For the heart, the soul, the practice, and the mind, it's a lot. So the purpose is not to add more, but rather to supplement and clarify what's already been offered so that you can digest and understand it better.

All of this—both these talks and past talks from recent retreats—will sound quite abstract, even bizarre and baffling, unless you've done considerable serious experimenting with imaginal practice, eros in practice, and what we're calling soul-making, alongside general Dharma practice including mindfulness, samadhi, metta, and some understanding of emptiness.

Without quite substantial grounding and intimate familiarity with these practices, all of what we'll discuss will sound puzzling and it will be difficult to recognize its value. If that grounding is present, or to the degree it's present, then I think and hope you'll truly recognize the value and significance of the discriminations and clarifications we'll make, and see their relevance. But without that practice foundation, it will likely sound strange or simply uninteresting and irrelevant.

In this first talk—or first group of talks, depending on how you count them, as I might divide them into parts—I want to examine in more detail this word "imaginal" that we've been using. I want to clarify what Catherine and I mean when we use this term.

I'm aware that "imaginal" is somewhat in vogue in certain circles right now, and there's plenty of overlap between how different people use it. However, there are also some really significant differences—not to say one usage is better or worse, right or wrong. I'm not interested in such judgments. But in terms of what we're trying to lay out and put forward—this edifice of teaching, conceptual framework, and practice idioms—it's quite important that we're all on the same page about what we really mean when we use the word "imaginal."

So I want to clarify this by reiterating and re-emphasizing certain aspects or elements of what this means—this word "imaginal" or imaginal experience—that may easily have been missed in past teachings or haven't been clear enough for various reasons.

Secondly, in this first group of talks, to help clarify what we mean and what's involved in these practices, I want to introduce a new term: "sensing with soul." I want to add this alongside, not replace, the word "imaginal." I'm aware some people don't resonate with the word "imaginal," while others love it. Some love it but could use more understanding of what it means and its discriminations, as I mentioned. Some might prefer this phrase "sensing with soul."

This isn't really a new concept or practice or way of looking. It's another language for what we'll explore as we go through this first group of talks.

some of, or quite a bit of, what we've already been talking about. It's almost—we might say—identical with the word imaginal or imaginally, perceiving imaginally. They're almost interchangeable. And I'm quite happy with the word imaginal, but I'll try to use them roughly fifty-fifty so you can gravitate toward whatever word you prefer. But hopefully the understanding is most important, rather than the words. By introducing this different term, it will open up and increase the understanding, making it fuller and more precise.

When I say "sensing the soul"—and I'll explain more as we go—I do mean to include the perception of intrapsychic images. I close my eyes and see whatever it is: an image of a wise old man or some other intrapsychic image. That's part of sensing with soul—perceiving with the inner senses, the inner vision or the mind's eye.

But another part of sensing the soul, equally important, is perceiving this material world we live in—others, objects, things, trees, whatever it is—and perceiving them imaginally. When we've talked about this word imaginal, we've actually been including this perception of the world imaginally. So another way of understanding all this, rather than using the word imaginal, is "sensing with soul." I'll try to fill this out more as we go along.

The third aspect in this first group of talks is a little of the how. We've covered some of the what—what we mean by imaginal, what we mean by sensing with soul, what's involved. Now, a little about the how.

Sometimes I hear from people: "It sounds really interesting, I really want to develop this, but I don't get images. Therefore it must be irrelevant to me." I want to address the practitioner who thinks this is their case. What might we do to develop in practice? How might that develop beyond the statement "I don't get images"? What needs to be understood? What needs to be developed? How can it be developed?

Or someone might listen to this more nuanced and finely discriminating definition of what imaginal means and say, "Hmm, I get images, but now listening to what you say about what imaginal means, I'm not sure they're imaginal"—which is actually a really good thing to be aware of. How might such a practitioner be addressed and helped in practice? In other words, what allows some object of the imagination to become imaginal? What supports that?

Another practitioner might say, "I only get intrapsychic images—I haven't found a better word—but I don't really get what you mean when you talk about things like cosmopoiesis or seeing someone imaginally or sensing the world with soul." What might be offered to such a practitioner?

And the opposite or complementary practitioner says, "I get this kind of perceiving the world as sacred and the sense of divinity in nature, and how the understanding and practice of emptiness opens that up and legitimizes it, but I don't get any intrapsychic images. How does that happen?" I want to say something hopefully helpful for such a practitioner as well.

So regarding practice, hopefully a little about better receiving images, opening to images. A little about how objects of the imagination might be supported to become more fully imaginal. And what is it—how can we support a sensing with soul, a sensing of the world, self, other, material objects in the world? What supports that movement toward that kind of opening of perception?

That's the third domain about practice that I hope to weave into this first group of talks.

Lastly, fourthly, just a little bit more about some of the assumptions and implications in what we're saying. Really a little bit more—I know I've touched on it quite a bit in the past—about some of the philosophical dimensions and aspects of this whole subject. Specifically, and again I know I've touched on it before, about ontology: the question of what is real, or what are we associating

So with regard to practice, hopefully a little about getting—or better, receiving—images, opening to images. A little about how objects of the imagination might be, how we can support them to become more fully imaginable. And what is it, again about practice, what is it—how can we support a sensing with soul, a sensing of the world, self, other, objects, material things in the world, sensing the soul? What supports that movement toward that kind of opening of perception?

So that's the third domain about practice that I hope to weave into this first group of talks.

And lastly, just a little bit—fourthly—just a little bit more about some of the assumptions and implications in what we're saying. So really a little bit more, again, I know I've touched on it quite a bit in the past, but just a little bit about some of the philosophical dimensions and aspects of this whole subject. Specifically, and again, I know I've touched on it before, but specifically about ontology—that is the question of what is real, or what are we associating with regard to the world, ourselves, others. This question is so central in terms of what gives a foundation to these practices, this kind of whole outlook, this whole conceptual framework. But it's also part of what gets opened up—our whole sense of reality can be opened up, questioned, challenged, extended.

And complementary to that is the whole philosophical area of epistemology, which is: How do we know? How does a human being know? I know I'm sitting on a chair right now—that's knowledge. Everyone would agree, you can see me, Rob, sitting on a chair. And we just say, well, I take that knowledge for granted.

But when we get more into the imaginal or sensing the world with soul, then this question arises: How can I claim knowledge? How can I claim this as knowledge? Most of society, contemporary Western society, discredits, discounts that kind of perception as any kind of knowing of anything real.

So again, these practices and these concepts and these ideas and these sharings push on and break open or extend our epistemological notions. They call them into question and they also rely on a questioning of epistemology, a penetrating kind of assessment and investigation of epistemology. What counts as knowledge? What counts as knowing something? I don't mean intellectually knowing something. I mean knowing something with the senses as well, or the intuition. Knowing something with the heart. We'll go into this a little bit.

So I just want to touch on these areas. So those are the four main themes and strands that I want to weave together in this first group of talks.

Okay, let's make a start and focus a little bit on this word "imaginal." And it seems to me that in various ways this word imaginal is confusing for some people or not clear—really its meaning is not clear for perhaps many people. Sometimes a person is aware of their confusion or their lack of clarity as to the meaning of the word imaginal. And other times they're not so aware. They're not even aware that they're confused. The conception that they have is confused. The idea is confused. And they're not aware that they're not clear.

So as we said, it may be better for some people to use this term—this phrase that I'm introducing now called "sensing with soul"—may be for some people more helpful for them to use that to get a better understanding and a better feel and approach to practice with the imaginal.

So if we think about the imagination for a moment, we can see very easily that the imagination is certainly part of being a human being. It's a faculty of the human being. But there's, at least to my mind, clearly a difference between what we might call papañca and the way the imagination spins in a state of papañca, of proliferation. He, she looked at me a certain way or didn't look at me a certain way, and now I believe they're evil or I'm a loser or whatever it is, and I spin off—the imagination spins off, creating catastrophic scenarios in the future or whatever it is. So clearly there's that kind of use of the imagination or ensnarement in the imagination run riot there, very different than a mindful use of the imagination.

For example, imagining my friend and keeping the image of her, the sense of her—whether that's a visual image or not—keeping the sense of her mindfully in the consciousness and radiating the intention or energy of mettā toward her. And there's a deliberate and mindful use of the imagination, clearly very different than the use of the imagination for papañca.

And maybe even that use of the imagination is not just mindful, but quite embodied. In other words, my energy body, my awareness of the energy body is really integrated seamlessly in that experience of mindful imagination, for example, in mettā practice. So that I have the sense of my friend and the image of them and the sense of the awareness of the energy body, and the intention of the mettā, and all that kind of harmoniously woven together in the embodied mindful imagination in the mettā practice. And certainly that's how I would tend to emphasize the practice of mettā and how I would teach it.

And then there might be a healing—for example, we talked about the figure of love in the imagination a few retreats ago. And so it could be even someone like Tara, or a deity like Tara, or the Buddha, or Jesus, or your grandma, or whatever it is, and one, again, with mindfulness, and with the energy body awareness, is aware of this image, and there's healing flowing there toward one. Really, really helpful.

So there's papañca, there's mindful imagination, there's embodied imagination, there's healing imagination, or a healing image. And then there's the imaginal. And we could make more gradations as well.

What do we mean by this word "imaginal"? Because it's certainly more than—let's say, more is implied and included than in those other examples of sort of categories of use of the imagination: papañca, mindful imagination, embodied imagination, healing imagination. When we use the word "imaginal," we mean something more than that.

So I want to tread carefully here, and let's maybe open up the idea of a spectrum. There's a spectrum of—we could say a spectrum of the use of the imagination, in what I've just outlined, from papañca on one side all the way to, let's say, the imaginal on the other. Or we could say that's the spectrum of the imaginal, and it's all—we get more and more toward the, if you like, authentic or fully imaginal.

There's a spectrum of experience with the imagination. What do we mean when we use this word imaginal?

As I pointed out earlier, people have used and do still use that word differently. It was originally coined by Henri Corbin, but different people have picked it up in different psychotherapeutic modalities and other directions, using it differently from each other. I really don't believe in a right or wrong here. People are free to use words however they want, and I'm certainly not interested in saying I'm right or someone else is wrong. But there is a particular way that we are using it.

A particular way that we are using the word imaginal that is not completely the same as the way Henri Corbin used it, or James Hillman, or Tom Cheetham, or Philip Pullman—although I don't know his work very well—or Mary Watkins. Many of these people, except for Pullman, have been very important to me personally, very influential and dear to me, and have contributed significantly to my relationship and explorations of all this. But still, there are differences. We are using it in quite particular ways.

There's much overlap and similarity between how this word is used among different groups, but there are differences. The same is true of the term soul-making that we're using. Again, it's a niche word, but relatively common these days. Words like eros, soul, or logos are all used differently by different people. There's quite a bit of overlap and similarity, and some very significant and important differences that actually mean the whole trajectory of practice and understanding and revelation unfolds differently depending on how the terms are conceived in the first place and thus how practice is approached and what then unfolds.

If I were to briefly throw out a list of what is involved—the aspects of the imaginal as we are using that word—there are different aspects that come together to make up the fully imaginal as we use that term. I do this with quite a lot of caution, trying to walk a tightrope between helpful precision and discernment on one hand, and daunting pedantry on the other. You'll perhaps hear my own ambivalence about the whole thing. But for the sake of clarity and bringing more life, color, beauty, and power to this direction of practice, let me throw out a list very briefly. We'll return to these elements or aspects of the imaginal in more detail later.

What are some of the aspects or elements in the constellation of the imaginal? What nodes are involved in making an imaginal experience? I'll throw these out quickly and we'll return to them. I'm deliberately not numbering them. I roughly count eighteen, but that depends on how you divide them up, because something might count as one item on the list but actually involve several aspects, so it might count as more. There's a reason for me not being too precise about this.

First would be love and being loved. I've talked about most of these before in different talks, and right now I'm not going into detail. We'll pick up many of these as we go on in this first group of talks.

Second, eros. Again, I'm not going to define it here. We've talked about it extensively before. It's different from and more than love and being loved.

Third is beauty. Beauty is involved in the imaginal.

Fourth is a sense of dimensionality—depth—but dimensionality that eventually opens out into a sense of divinity. Dimensionality opening out to a sense of divinity.

Fifth and related would be a sense of beyondness. Not complete transcendence, but an image has a sense for us of there being more than I can quite get my head around or grasp or even see or sense right now. It has more for me to move into. Actually so much more that one intuits a sense of unfathomability to the image.

Another aspect is autonomy—that the image is not sensed as just a part of me or an element of my consciousness. It has its own somewhat distinct autonomy, its own somewhat distinct independent being, so that there is a two-ness. Two-ness is an aspect of the constellation of the imaginal.

There's me, and there's this image, this imaginal object or person. And even if it is an object—this book, for instance, may be imaginal to me—as the imaginal sense deepens, there is a two-ness of person, of personhood. It's as if the book also has, or is also, a soul, an intelligence. And so there's this autonomy, there's this kind of distinct two-ness, yet the boundaries are not definite. There's a kind of softness or blurring of boundaries of the imaginal object.

So that's six or seven so far. There is also, number eight, what I would like to call a kind of infinite echoing or infinite mutual mirroring between the image and me or my life—you or your life, if it's your image, obviously. There's a kind of infinite echoing and mirroring between the two. I'll come back to what I mean by this later, as I said.

This includes meaningfulness. The image is pregnant, full, super-abundant with meaningfulness—a sense of meaningfulness for us, for the subject. But we cannot quite grasp or delimit or totally articulate or define the totality of that meaningfulness, the complete meaningfulness. But it's pregnant with that; it has that sense of meaningfulness to us. Meaning is a part of meaningfulness. So yes, it may well have meanings as well, but meaningfulness is even bigger than meaning or meanings plural.

And in that, perhaps ninth, we are not reducing the image to "it only means this," "it only represents that," "it only is this." There's not a limitation or a reduction of the image in any way.

Another element is that there's a quality of what I call theatricality to the imaginal. Meaning it's powerful. It has an effect. It moves us. It stirs our soul like good theatre. And it's intimate like good theatre. But we know that it's theatre. It's neither real nor not real—rather, either one of those doesn't feel quite right. There's what I also call sometimes the imaginal middle way between real and not real. It's a really crucial part of the imaginal, the theatricality, the imaginal middle way.

I've lost count now, but it's about ten, I think. The imaginal is not a non-conceptual experience—if such an experience is really possible for a human being to have. The imaginal is definitely not non-conceptual. Implicit in the imaginal, in the constellation of the imaginal, in the experience of the imaginal, is a logos, is some kind of conceptual framework, some kind of conception of what is going on. Now, it might be very loose and quite open and unarticulated, but it's not a non-conceptual experience. And the imaginal, and that whole realm of the imaginal, involves logos, involves the mind in that way, the conceptuality.

Next, an imaginal image has a quality of what we might call eternality to it, and timelessness. Something is different in the sense of time that pertains to an image or that an image inhabits, if you like. Again, we'll come back to all this, and I've mentioned much of it before.

Next, humility is an element in the constellation of the imaginal. We feel humble in relationship to the image. That's a quite loaded word, and again I'll revisit this. Some people are not quite sure what that means, or it gets too squeezed, that word. But humility—I'd like to explore a little bit what that means.

And also next, reverence. And grace. When an object is imaginal for us, whether it's a purely so-called intra-psychic image or something in the material world that has become imaginal, there's a sense of grace there, of kind of inexplicable gift, an overflowing, a bestowing on us from something greater—a sense of grace.

And another kind of defining element or aspect or quality of the imaginal is that it leads to, it brings with it, a sense of soul-making, a sense of soulfulness. As I said, it stirs and engages and ignites our soul with full of resonances and richnesses. What does that mean? Soul-making—we'll come back to this, and I've touched on it a lot before—but basically the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic is stimulated and starts to expand and deepen and enrich and mutually fertilize its elements of Eros-Psyche and Logos. So soulfulness as an element in the constellation of the imaginal. And that's more than heartfulness. It includes heartfulness, but it's actually more than heartfulness.

More than just being touched in the heart.

Next, the imaginal could actually be conceived more as a way of looking at something than as the thing itself, than the object itself. So we could say that in the constellation of the imaginal—which includes both subject and object—what's key, a key aspect, is the way of looking at the object and the way of conceiving. Part of that way of looking includes the awareness of the energy body in this very integrated, very sensitive and responsive way. It's part of the way of looking that, if you like, makes or supports something to be imaginal.

And lastly, when we are with an image, with the imaginal object, we have the sense that it is part of a bigger context of the imaginal. It's part of what Catherine and I sometimes call the concertina of images, or the concertina of the imaginal. In other words, this is one image, but we have a sense—either sometimes directly right then in the moment, palpably or sensibly right then in the moment, clearly, and sometimes much more vaguely, much more intuitively—of other possible images, possible other imaginal objects, if you like, waiting in the wings of the theatre, so to speak. So there's that sense of the concertina, of the context, the imaginal context.

Okay, so there's a brief list of, say, eighteen, or depending how you count it, maybe twenty-something elements of the constellation of the imaginal. I'm going to come back to many of those in more detail and expand on them.

As I said, I'm cautious here, and I'm wanting to walk a bit of a tightrope. So as I said, we might, in our understanding, conceive of a spectrum of experiences that involve the imagination. If you like, culminating—one end of that spectrum is the authentically imaginal, if we can use that word, or the fully imaginal. Again, I'm not quite sure about those words.

So I feel a little ambivalent here about churning out a list like that or stipulating a list like that. Now, you probably know this about me already, but I can admit that perhaps my personality type, my tendency, is to be quite picky and precise and fussy. I am perhaps a quibbler by nature. Some might say I'm a quibbler by trade. To me, that's just my tendency.

So I'm aware of that tendency, and at the same time, I want to encourage a kind of generosity or amplitude in these teachings so that a certain looseness is required to kind of balance out, or at the same time as, this kind of fussy precision that is perhaps my tendency, but I think is also quite necessary if we're really going to get the power and the potency out of these teachings.

If—and I might as well share as well—if I have a fantasy or a hope of, at some point in the future, a kind of creative sangha contributing to and developing these directions in practice, these logoi, these conceptual frameworks, these ways of practicing, then I think both a kind of looseness and a kind of rigor of discernment and precision and clarity are going to be necessary to allow that potential of communal creativity to actualize. Just as in the arts or the sciences, the ability to create and discover in those fields needs a clear common ground in understandings and a developed mastery—if you like; again, I use that word with caution—developed mastery of the history of its tradition, whether it's painting or jazz or classical music, whatever it is. And then, based on that, can come new creations, new discoveries out of that grounding.

So my sense is it's similar here. And so we need a certain precision, a certain kind of subtle discernment that's quite rigorous. And we need a certain looseness.

Now, many of you—just again about the relationship to lists—I know one or two of you, maybe no more, one or two of you actually like lists. Like, you like when the Buddha gives lists and you like when I give lists. But there are, I'm guessing, probably many of you who actually hate lists and it turns you off.

It may help that latter group to know that I feel quite ambivalent about lists, actually. Sometimes though, when one is teaching something that's relatively new, this can be a good heuristic, a good educational tool or device to stretch and light up the awareness and the discernment where it might otherwise just not notice what is new. We tend to hear what we already know and kind of hear within a box. So lists sometimes help stretch it. You say, "What was that number twelve on the list? Hold on, what does that mean? Am I including that? Am I thinking about that? Is that in my awareness?" So it helps us to notice what is new and different outside of our habitual conceptions.

However, lists can also get dry, and if care is not taken, what I think is even worse is they can get regarded as atomic truths, which I get a bit nervous about.

But I'm ambivalent partly because I don't want to discourage you, and you might hear all that's on the imaginal and think, "I'm nowhere near that. I don't know what you're talking about, and this thing, and that kind of dimension of experience, and this and that." So I really don't want to discourage you; I rather want to encourage. And what I'll come back to later on in this first group of talks is you'll actually see that the elements of this list actually each end up being a kind of ignition key for deepening the imaginal experience and practice. So it's not just useless pedantry and pickiness. I'm actually pointing to these things, these elements, because awareness of them and turning towards them, as I'll explain later, can actually deepen the practice. They are keys to igniting and deepening the whole imaginal opening and soul-making opening.

I'm cautious in treading a tightrope for another reason, an even more subtle reason: if you've been following the teachings so far over the last couple of years, you'll recognize the fact that imaginal and soul-making experiences are dynamic. They're not static experiences. This is because, as we've explained in previous talks, the soul-making dynamic starts to involve the other elements, so the eros and the logos, or the image, and they start to deepen and widen and enrich and fertilize and complicate each other.

That's a dynamic - it's moving, on its way, expanding, enriching, growing more complicated and deepening. And then, as you may remember if you've been listening closely, when there's an imaginal perception, eventually at some point the sense of the self becomes involved in that imaginal constellation. So subject and object, self and other, and then the world too in cosmopoiesis, and the eros itself. Within all that, as we alluded to earlier, there's this infinite echoing and mirroring.

At some point in the dynamic - and all this is a process, it's happening, expanding and enriching - the self-image becomes actually one's whole life, one's whole storying. It's not just this moment now without past, without future. As I said, something of the relationship with and the concept of time is opened out and altered.

But the main point right now is that there's a dynamic. So how much of this - what stage of complication and enrichening and deepening and widening of the eros, of the psyche, of the logos, what stage of involvement of the self and the world and the image of the eros or the logos of the eros are we at, at any moment, in relating to an imaginal object? At what point in that dynamic, in that unfolding process of mutual enrichment and involvement deepening and complicating, at what point are we going to say now it's imaginal?

So I might have all the beauty and meaningfulness and theatricality and all those other elements with the imaginal object, but the self is not quite fully involved yet as image. It hasn't been drawn into and involved in the imaginal complex, in the constellation of the imaginal. Am I going to say that's imaginal or not imaginal? It's a little bit arbitrary.

So that's another reason, more subtle, why I'm cautious about throwing out these lists that can easily become sorts of rigid or formulaic and stipulative categories. There is this spectrum. Clearly something like papañca is imagination, but a state of papañca is not imaginal, neither is it imaginal when we do a straightforward mettā practice necessarily. And there's this gradation of uses of the imagination that we could say get more and more imaginal. Exactly at what point we say "now it's imaginal" - we could argue about that.

So what that means as a practitioner is that one wants to listen to all these elements and ask: How can I move towards more of that, the fuller end, the more authentically or more fully imaginal end of things? How can I enrich my experience, deepen it, open it out, make it more fertile? So it's not so much about judging oneself or measuring up. It's the direction we're interested in.

For me, the clarity is important. We're really talking about something other than just the use of the imagination, or something merely mythic, or whatever.

CHAPTER 104

Aspects of the Imaginal (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 48 min

In this continuation of his exploration of imaginal practice, Rob Burbea examines the spectrum of imagination use in Buddhist practice, distinguishing between unskillful papañca and beneficial imaginal perception. He clarifies that the imaginal is primarily about the way of looking rather than specific objects, involving lessened fabrication, duty, trust, and intention not primarily for self-benefit.

Burbea addresses common concerns about "not getting images," offering practical techniques including samādhi-based approaches, emptiness practice, dream recall, and working with emotions. Through detailed examples of both unremarkable and dramatic images, he demonstrates that imaginality depends not on visual intensity but on soul resonance, beauty, meaningfulness, and dimensionality. He emphasizes that imaginal perception can apply to ordinary present-moment experience - the body, conversations, confusion, or dedication can all become imaginal when met with appropriate receptivity, humility, and energy body awareness.

This teaching bridges formal meditation with daily life, showing how imaginal practice develops from initial techniques toward a natural mode of being characterized by attunement, receptivity, and play. The path involves alternating imaginal work with simpler practices, cultivating the sensitivity and openness that allow the mundus imaginalis to reveal itself in the most ordinary circumstances.

Just to recap briefly, we said we could notice, acknowledge, and think about a spectrum of uses of the imagination. For example, there is the unskillful, unhelpful use of the imagination in papañca, and then there are many kinds of good, useful, important ways the imagination can be used that are actually part of developing practice. We can differentiate different ways imagination can be used, and we can discern a little bit more finely and understand what we mean by imaginal—the imaginal imagination, if you like.

In doing that and pointing to some of those features, attributes, and aspects of the imaginal, this will be useful not just for the understanding and the logos and the usefulness of the conceptual framework, but also in terms of igniting practice. These discernments can function—and I'll explain how later—as keys to understanding imaginal practice.

So on that spectrum, we talked about, for example, the use of imagination with mindfulness. What's often not there when there's papañca, of course. So mindful imagination, for example, in mettā practice, compassion practice—we're deliberately and mindfully using the imagination for skillful ends. We have mindful embodied imagination and healing imagination, again with mindfulness, with body awareness. All kinds of possibilities there: light shining onto the body or in the body where there's illness or injury or all kinds of possibilities.

But these examples—the mindful imagination in mettā or compassion, embodied imagination, healing imagination—they are not necessarily imaginal. They may be very, very helpful, important, necessary parts of practice, very useful, very beneficial, but they're not necessarily imaginal. Often they are not. They may be imaginal. In other words, it's possible to be using the imagination in a compassion practice and it becomes imaginal, or it is imaginal. And the same with healing images—it's both imaginal and healing. So they may or may not be what we're calling imaginal. Actually, even a daydream—we can catch a daydream and then there's mindfulness, then we stay with it and start relating to it in certain ways and it becomes imaginal. So these may or may not be imaginal.

I rattled through very quickly a list of attributes, aspects, and characteristics of what we're calling the imaginal. That list was not intended to be exhaustive, and it certainly wasn't exhaustive, nor was it intended to be too rigid or too neatly delineating between these different elements or aspects of the imaginal. It's not too rigid, not too neat and sharp, these distinctions between these elements, and it's certainly not an exhaustive list.

For example, we talked about the imaginal—you could sum up what the imaginal is: it's more about the way of looking than about the object per se. But that way of looking includes some degree of lessening of fabrication in the way of looking, that it's fabricating perception less, even if that's very, very slight.

Also in the way of looking—and I'm actually mentioning some elements now that I didn't mention in the list yesterday, mentioning things that we could have said were implicit in the list, but actually we could draw them out and kind of add to the list. So in this relationship that makes up a part of the imaginal, the actual relationship between subject and object, in the poise, the stance of that relationship with the imaginal includes a sense of duty—duty to what is perceived, the duty of the self to what is perceived. I've talked quite a bit about this on several retreats in the past few years. Duty is another element of this constellation of imaginal. Trust as well, and again that's something that I've highlighted several times on past retreats dealing with imaginal practice.

Duty and trust. Now, if someone's coming to this new and they just hear those words—duty and trust to something in your imagination—it sounds completely bonkers, certainly very dangerous. What, I have a duty? I'm going to follow all the voices in my head and do what they say? And I just blindly trust them? I'm not going to go into it right now, but if you're familiar with the material we've covered, you'll know that it's much more nuanced than that, much more subtle than that, and doesn't come without caveats and certain qualifications. But duty and trust are elements we could add to the list.

As is, and again related to the relationship that makes up the imaginal, that constitutes the imaginal: the intention for being with this image and for exploring this imaginal image needs to be not primarily for the sake of self in the ways that we usually understand self, not primarily for my psychological process, for my spiritual development, for my personal growth, for my empowerment. All these things may well accrue with imaginal practice, but something happens when those intentions are the primary intentions. And strictly speaking, again, if we're talking about a spectrum here, we're not really in the fully or authentically or genuinely imaginal there. So something, again, about the relationship: duty, trust, and the intention is not primarily for self. And that's also something I've talked quite a bit about in one of the last retreats—I think it was Re-Enchanting the Cosmos, I'm not sure.

So not an exhaustive list, not too rigid a list, not so neatly, sharply cut up between the elements. But most of these elements will apply to so-called—I wish I had a better word—so-called intra-psychic images, imaginal images, and the perception of this material other, material object or other person, or the world, or the self—an imaginal perception of that. This world that we move in, that we agree in, seen imaginally.

So this list applies to both, because, again, the way we have been and still want to use that word, imaginal, means more than just intra-psychic images, more than just "I close my eyes and something appears in my mind's eye," or I hear something, or whatever it is. And as I said, we'll come back to this, but a better term, a more helpful term for some people to really make that aspect clear—that it's not just intra-psychic—is this "sensing with soul." We'll return to that.

Now, before we elaborate further some of these elements that I've touched on in this constellation—if we even call it a list—some of these constituent aspects of the imaginal constellation, before we amplify them a little bit and fill them out and say a bit more about them and also how they might be used as keys or, if you like, ignition points in practice, let's just touch base a little bit about intrapsychic images and say a few things about practicing with them.

A number of people have said to me over the last few years, "I don't get images. Oh, but I don't get images. It sounds really interesting, but I don't get images."

So I have talked about this before—again, this is also something I've talked about in the past. I can't quite remember where. I think it might be in the talks entitled "Orienting, Relating and Tuning to the Imaginal," or something similar, which is in the retreat "Path of the Imaginal." There may be—I don't know how many talks there are—two or three perhaps. I think there's quite a few instructions in there for this kind of thing, and obviously scattered elsewhere. Someone else may know better than I do.

But if we just briefly review some of those possible approaches to kind of open the gates a little bit to the images or stimulate the imaginative faculty, at least, towards images and the imaginal.

So, and again, just rattling through some possibilities because we're really reviewing briefly: There's the possibility of samādhi, some degree of samādhi, dipping into that—however, whatever ways work for you—dipping into that. And again, I mean by samādhi this whole body harmonization and alignment of the energies in the well-being. Dipping into some samādhi, to whatever degree possible, and then kind of just coming out a little bit and slightly relaxing the sort of intense focus, if you like, or grip on that sense of well-being that's the object of the samādhi, and just relaxing that a little bit and sort of just hanging out in that space where there's a relative degree of samādhi but it's more relaxed. That can be a very fertile ground or space for images to arise in.

Similarly, very similarly, some kind of emptiness practice. And again, whatever you know and to whatever depth you sort of develop that. Working with that, with the emptiness, and then again, just backing off, taking the foot off the accelerator, the gas pedal, a little bit, slightly relaxing in that space that has opened up. So both these—with the samādhi and emptiness—really what's happened is we've kind of decreased the fabrication of perception of self and objects, and then kind of loosened the mind just a little bit. So those are two options.

Another is actually to recall a dream figure or a dream scene that has touched you or felt potent in some way. Often it's easiest right after the dream or pretty soon after the dream, say in the morning or something, when it's still alive and the soul resonances are still kind of accessible when you recall the dream figure. And taking up the dream figure as an object of meditation or entering into a meditative exploration of relationship with that dream figure.

Or it might be a previous imaginal figure, something that has ignited for you and felt fertile as an imaginal image in the past. And absolutely, you can just deliberately bring back that image and work with it again. Reconnect in that relationship. See what else needs to happen or just find yourself again in the same kind of territory. Maybe something different wants to happen. So that's another two possibilities: recalling a dream figure or a previous imaginal figure that has worked for you and deliberately reincarnating it.

There are, of course, a whole host of deliberate meditations on pre-prescribed imaginal figures. Often for those of you who have Vajrayāna backgrounds, there might be Tārā or Avalokiteśvara or many sort of tantric deities, or it could be non-Buddhist, depending on your background, whatever. They're actually prescribed. This is a standard meditation on this figure. And then we enter into—and there are differences between the way we're approaching things and sort of more, let's say, standardly taught Vajrayāna approach.

It could also be a character from history or from literature, a novel, or a film that, again, has touched you, has sparked and grabbed your soul, moved your soul. Again, I've spoken in the past—Nelson Mandela, John Coltrane, I mean, there are many for me, and some purely fictional characters that are potent as images. So that's, again, a very, very beautiful way in.

It could be an actual living person that you know or know of—a friend, a teacher, something else, even a family member, someone in your family who is alive as image for you. Someone was telling me of her grandchildren and the delight there and the eros there and how they came alive as imaginal figures for her. So someone who you know who is alive as image, as imaginal image for you. They're already alive and then you take them—even though they might not be present with you in the room at that time—you bring them, you elicit them, you conjure them in the consciousness and meditate on them as an imaginal figure.

I'm pretty sure I shared a certain technique which was useful to me for quite a while. It's actually imagining deliberately myself descending a staircase—oftentimes it would be a stone or spiral staircase—down into a kind of cell, more like a prison cell, and then waiting there in the dark, and oftentimes different images would appear in that cell. Very beautiful, very fertile.

Or perhaps beneath the foliage of a tree—a big tree, a little tree, a beautiful tree—and sitting or standing under the leaves and the dappled sunlight and the shade there, warm or cool or whatever it is. And in that space, that enchanted space, images can enter or arise or certain encounters can take place.

And again, really, really, really not to overlook the possibility that often when the emotions are quite alive—either in a difficult way, when there's a difficult emotion, when we're struggling with something, or in a lovely way, when there's some very beautiful emotion—there's the energy in the emotionality that can constitute an image. We just have to hang out, open to be with, find ways of being with that emotion, difficult or lovely, in ways that can give birth to images. So I'm hanging out there, open to, connected with, intimate with the energy body, and sensitive to and caring for and receptive to what arises out of that kind of vortex of the emotions and what arises as image or may arise as image. A really important possibility.

And then we can also, for example, deliberately imagine the body in a certain way, or with regard to the body. So I can deliberately play with imagining my body as a body of light, perhaps a certain colour, or a body of fire, or fire emanating from my body. Or, as Catherine did a beautiful guided meditation on the last retreat there, body as the beloved other and then entering into that body as beloved other with all the senses and all the sensitivity and receptivity. So there's all kinds of possibilities, and I really encourage you to try some of these if it feels like you're one of those people that says, "I don't get images."

Now, I'd like to actually give you an example of a very unremarkable image to make the point that—because sometimes people say, "Oh, I don't get very interesting images," or, "Rob, you describe your images and they're really intense and far out and kind of amazing." I've tried on past retreats to deliberately give both kinds—far-out images, if you like, or kind of intense-sounding images on the one hand, and on the other hand, really not far-out, quite ordinary-sounding images—to really emphasize the fact that, in a way, the remarkability or unremarkability of images is really not that important. It's kind of irrelevant. It may impress your friends if it's something remarkable, but in itself, it doesn't mean much at all.

So not too long ago, I was sitting in meditation and a visual image came up. It was fairly vivid as an image, but it was really unremarkable and very limited in scope. The visual image was of a black suit coat—I don't know what they call it, like what a businessman might wear, a sort of overcoat on a suit. And it was just its lapels. It wasn't even the whole coat—just the lapels, and the white shirt underneath with a kind of dark tie there. And so it was just that for a while.

Of course, initially one thinks, "Well, that's not very interesting." And it wasn't like there was a particular great upsurge of soul resonance or emotion. But just hanging out with it—hang out, not too quick to judge. Just be open, be sensitive, be delicate.

As I stayed with this, it was almost like I'd get more of a sense of the man who was wearing this very standard sort of Western attire of a certain style. I get a sense of him. I don't really see him that much per se, but I just get a sense of him. He's a kind of research scientist. In his inside coat pocket, he has papers, and they contain a theory. He's traveling around with these papers, studying and contemplating this theory on his travels. Sometimes he's alone, and sometimes he's moving around—probably, I don't know, some kind of Western country in Europe and fairly modern, sometime in the nineteenth or twentieth centuries.

Sometimes he meets with others who are similar to him to discuss and share and study these papers, this text together. So there's a very small group of men bound together by this intense focus and passionate involvement and devotion to this study. All this is a kind of sense I get. It's not like I really see all this happening and there's a whole film of him going and meeting all these guys. It's more sort of visual, but certainly not dramatically visual in any intense way. It's more just a sense of his nature—what he is and what he does and what he's about in his story.

I also get the sense that it's not even that they think this theory represents or seeks the truth in some simple way—like "this is the truth" or "this is the theory of the world." There's something about this theory that's as much a creation, as if it's an art, and there's also something religious or spiritual about it for them. So it's a curious kind of blend—sort of scientific and sort of an artistic creation and sort of religious, all of that. And that goes for their relationship with it. It's a kind of religious spiritual thing. It's an art. It's all of that. It's research.

There are not very many of these people in the world. And it's not secret what they're doing. It's not like some super confidential thing. But they don't really speak or share much about it, or about their devotion and passion. They don't really speak much about that with those who are not interested. And most people are not interested. So they don't really talk about it with most people, basically.

But their focus and their devotion to this exploration, this study, and this sharing together gives their lives a kind of profound sense of alignment and rootedness and a steadiness of depth. And to the extent that something is more important to them than their individual fate, their individual life or death. And again, none of this is very dramatically conveyed in the image. It's just a kind of intuition I have about what is going on there with this man and these people.

I am also, during this image, struck by the fact that these are white men. They're all white men in suits, conservatively dressed. I don't know, is it like the 30s or 40s or 50s? So that strikes me, and I'm not sure how I feel about that, but that's the reality of what appeared.

I'm reminded at the same time of ancient or medieval mystical esoteric texts shared among small and often disparate groups of initiates or seekers and carried on journeys by traveling members of this group or collective. The texts are carried and communicated to each other before the printing press, before pressing send on an email, before all of that. Sometimes it's paper, sometimes it's a sort of paper-bound leaflet or booklet, sometimes it's a dark hardback book. The specific form isn't so important.

Now, the reason I'm saying all that is it doesn't sound very interesting. I imagine it doesn't sound very interesting. It wasn't visually rich as an image—it was a visual image, but there's a lot that wasn't visual in it. It was more like an intuitive sense of who they were and what was going on there. It wasn't visually detailed or rich or complex. And the effect on the energy body was definitely not dramatic. Sometimes it can be really dramatic, the sense of alignment or release or energization that comes into the energy body with an image that really resonates with your soul. So it really wasn't dramatic, but it was there. There was an effect on the energy body.

I can't remember, actually—I can't tell or decide: was I in the image as one of them, or was I kind of outside just watching them and in a soul relationship with them?

So very unremarkable, probably not very interesting if one tells one's friends such an image, but imaginal nevertheless. Why? Because of the soul resonances it had for me, which were quite subtle. Again, not dramatic, not fireworks, not shooting flames and all that business—but the soul resonances and the kind of reciprocal, infinite echoing and mirroring of the image and the imaginal characters with currents of my life, currents of my soul. Some of you will obviously recognize that in the image.

But the point is, images don't need to be dramatic, intense, vivid visually, or remarkable, unusual, far out, et cetera, to be imaginal. On the other hand, we can have very remarkable, vivid, intense and dramatic images that are not imaginal.

So here's an example of one like that. I'm sitting in meditation and suddenly a snake appears. And it's very vivid—a very vivid visual image and very intense. Its presence is very intense, right there, like its head or its hood, like a cobra, is right face to face with me. But I can't quite relate to it somehow. It actually doesn't feel imaginal. What's not there? A sense of beauty, a sense of meaningfulness, a sense of dimensionality, divinity. These are not obvious. Nor is my energy body signaling a soul-making engagement. So I'm a little bit puzzled, but really struck by the vividness.

And I sort of ask it—but not necessarily as a formal question—try and get a sense, you know, what does it want? What do you want in relationship to it? Again, that doesn't need to be a formal question. Sometimes that can be a little too clunky as a technique.

And the snake says something like, "To burn you or to burn through you." It wants to burn me or to burn through me, which means to hollow me out through its fire breath. It breathes fire, the snake, which it then instantaneously does. So that's a really dramatic, intense thing. Suddenly this vivid image, and it wants to burn through me, and then it just does that, and I kind of disappear.

So there you have pretty remarkable, very vivid, visually intense, dramatic. There's even talking going on, all of which can sound really impressive.

But it wasn't imaginal.

Another aspect that was missing there was love and also trust. What happened over a little time—I think it took a few sessions—was that I started playing with a few elements. This is the kind of thing we'll come back to later and amplify a little bit: playing with a few elements or gently allowing the possibility or looking for a few elements like love, like trust, or introducing them a little bit. I was also aware of the dependent arising of the image. We've talked about this before—when I introduce just a little bit of trust, the image actually, if you like, is shaped by that trust. Image is always—an imaginal image is always a dependent arising. We're not overlooking that fundamental dharma insight.

So it was only then that it began—still, it took a little time—to become more imaginal. I won't go into what happened right now, but I will say one more thing: I didn't trust it. It did this thing with its fire breath and disappeared me and said, "I want to burn you or burn through you." And I sort of said, "Why?" And it said, "So you can live forever." I was very suspicious. It's like, that's a very strange-sounding thing. Something about it I didn't trust—actually quite a number of things about it I really didn't trust.

So it wasn't imaginal at that point. It didn't have the beauty, the meaningfulness, dimensionality, divinity, love—all of that, despite the vividness, intensity, and all that remarkability of it. But in time and with practice, it did become imaginal, opened up, and was actually quite fertile.

Again, repeating things I've said before, but it seems important because of how often I hear people say things which makes me think they haven't quite grasped this aspect or that aspect of what's important here: An image in our sense, despite the way we tend to hear that word in our language, is not necessarily visual. Any of the senses could be primary, not just sight. It could be hearing or the kinesthetic sense or touch or smell, taste, whatever, or something we can't even quite put our finger on. How is it I'm sensing this? But an imaginal image is not necessarily visual.

When we're—again, I'm trying to address someone who says, "I don't get images"—oftentimes what happens is a person dismisses what comes up as a potential image too quickly. So I could have easily dismissed the image of that suit lapel, the lapels of the suit with the tie. It really wasn't that interesting. It hardly registered as being interesting at all. But really, don't dismiss too quickly. Because something that appears insignificant or appears—"Oh, I just made that up"—don't worry about whether you think your ego has made it up or whether it feels like it's not interesting or it's insignificant or it's just the tail end of a daydream. Don't dismiss too quickly. Stay with it a little bit and see what can be worked with, what happens when you hang out, when you come into a different kind of relationship with it.

So we have to be patient, both in a session if we're trying to work with imaginal practice, and also over time, with the development of this practice. But really what we're talking about is that with imaginal—again, it's more a way of paying attention and being with that constitutes the imaginal. If you allow something that might seem insignificant, uninteresting, a total mental fabrication of some element of me that is not even that profound or interesting—it's the way of paying attention to and being with that that oftentimes is the most important, to allow that germ, that seed, to become something imaginal, to gain that dimensionality and beauty and meaningfulness and all of that echoing.

I think I've said this before—I've definitely said it to some individuals who were quite surprised when I said it—but I don't think I am a natural. I don't naturally have a super imaginative faculty that just churns out images and all that. I don't consider that the case at all for myself. I'm not a natural. Some people really are—images come very easily to them. That's not me.

But what I can be, and what I was in the initial stages of developing this—and I still very much feel that I'm developing this, that I'm learning, that I'm expanding—what I can be, rather than being a natural, is I can be patient, I can be dedicated, I can be curious, I can experiment and play, and I can notice: "Oh, that's interesting—when I experiment like this, that happened. Oh, that's interesting." And I can ponder.

So bringing those qualities to bear, something gradually—it really took some time, and it's still very much developing for me—something begins to develop, to accrue, something starts to come together. A facility starts to emerge and get founded and flower and blossom and unfold and take you places.

So it may well be—and if I think for myself, it was the case—that I did use certain techniques at first. I ran through them briefly before: descending a staircase to a cell and waiting there, recalling a dream figure, all of that. I did use that at first, and you might need to at first if you're one of these people who says, "I feel something in me calling when I hear about these practices, but I just don't seem to get any images."

So go ahead, use some techniques at first. No matter what James Hillman said about that, I would judge it by the results rather than being suspicious of your ego, suspicious of technique. Techniques at first might be helpful. What we're looking for is the soul-making.

We use the soul-making as the indicator. I sense that I'm on the right track. I can smell it. I can feel the eros. I feel the resonances. But techniques at first, and then in time it becomes more just a mode of being, if you like. The imaginal is opened by this mode of being that we just move in and out of with kind of less fuss and fanfare. It's something that we just glide in and out of in our lives. It becomes more of an art rather than a technique. It's more a matter of attunement, receptivity, flexibility, play, discovery, all of that. But sometimes we need the techniques at first.

Some people need, like myself, the techniques at first or different approaches that you might discover for yourself to kind of get into the territory a little bit and then develop it. And even if they're not fully imaginal, genuinely imaginal, as we said before, it gets you into the territory and then you can start working with that, as we'll fill out more as we go through this first group of talks.

Sometimes we might be trying too hard to kind of get an image or receive an image. And maybe what's needed is we just need a little more sensitivity and attention, without pressure—sensitivity and attention to perhaps a pain or a lack or confusion we're feeling. And we do that with the energy body or just paying attention to the energy body and just dwelling in the energy body, as we've emphasized on the retreats. Just hanging out there. It's really good practice. Even if no image comes, just this skill and facility and familiarity with the energy body is so helpful in so many ways and for so many practices.

Sometimes we're trying too hard to get an image. Just let it go. Let that whole attempt go and just go into some samādhi to develop the well-being, nurture the well-being in the energy body, whatever way you know how, or some emptiness practices if you know those. As I've mentioned in the past, we want to alternate. No one's going to be doing imaginal practice all day long—the balance would be off there. So we want to move in and out of other practices which really put down images, let them go, let them quiet, let them fade, come into something simpler, some emptiness, some basic mindfulness practice.

Maybe sometimes what we need to do, when we're trying too hard for an image, is just loosen the mind and let it drift for a while. Yes, let it drift. Just let it drift. Just with a light mindfulness, just let the mind drift a while. And sometimes out of that an image emerges.

And maybe sometimes we need to stop meditating and realize or notice that an imaginal image is sometimes already existing for us in our lives—in how we see our lives, or again, the persons in our lives, or certain persons in our lives at times, or ourself, or our endeavors, or activities. It's already there. The images or the fantasies that run through our life—I don't need meditation to find them. They're already in my life. All I need is a certain kind of understanding and a certain kind of awareness to notice what they are.

Where there's inspiration, there's fantasy, there's image. Where there's love, where there's dedication, there's fantasy, there's image. And when we start picking up on them outside of formal meditation, then I can maybe get a sense of what they are and take them, if I want to, into the formal meditation.

You here now can also be seen imaginally. Not something other—you, here, now, can become image, can become imaginal image. So, for example, even the image of oneself humbly, reverently waiting for an image, and maybe even slightly frustrated. And then it's the way of relating to that, the way of seeing that—that itself becomes imaginal. The self, sitting here, waiting, whatever it is, walking up and down, becomes image. Self-practicing becomes image.

Or the inquiry, your inquiry, your dedication in asking a question, your aliveness, your longing to know, to open, to understand. This too can become image. It's nothing different, but what is going on, just seen differently, becomes imaginal image.

Or a conversation with a teacher or with a fellow practitioner—the very conversation becomes image, or the memory of the conversation becomes image. It's almost like realizing something about it or seeing it in a certain way, opening to certain aspects of it that we might have not allowed or not caught the scent of.

Even yourself confused or having difficulties on the path, but still earnest in one's attempts and one's dedication and one's efforts. That too can become image. This confusion, this difficulty that the self is experiencing, and the self that is experiencing that difficulty, but still showing up—that too can become beautiful poetry and image, an imaginal image of meaningfulness and depth and divinity and all of it.

So an image can be—nothing's actually appearing different. The image of the body doesn't appear as blue light or this or that or with flames shooting out or anything else. It's just the body as it usually appears.

But it doesn't appear differently. It's sensed, if you like, in relation with or surrendered to or given to divinity. All these possibilities—the self, another, an object, the world, our eros—each of these can become imaginal without something different being introduced as the image.

We don't need necessarily something like a pink rabbit suddenly appearing to the mind, spewing forth profound and pithy and bizarre Zen utterances. This here now, very ordinary looking to one view, and quite fathomless and pregnant with meaning and with beauty and with poetry to another view. Nothing, no different object, if you like, is in the consciousness or made to be the image or introduced as image.

When there is humility and the softening or opening of the heart, when there's even just a little less fabrication, when there's a certain looseness and openness of the perception and the perceptual grasping, when there's a delicacy of sensitivity, when there's the whole energy body awareness—all these together, and other factors, support the opening to the imaginal.

So it's less about getting an image than something in the stance of the being, in the mode of the being, in the way of looking, in the relationship with what is here now in the material world. Certain factors, certain elements, constituents come into that, and they together support the opening to the imaginal, the opening of the mundus imaginalis, the world of the imaginal.

This here, now, is image, or it becomes imaginal. It can be imaginal when related to in a certain way.

CHAPTER 105

Aspects of the Imaginal (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 56 min

> In this third exploration of imaginal aspects, Rob Burbea presents a sophisticated understanding of how imaginal experience operates as an interconnected lattice or constellation of elements. He emphasizes that nothing is inherently imaginal - rather, the imaginal emerges through specific kinds of relationships characterized by particular aspects or 'nodes' that mutually support and ignite each other.
>
> Burbea examines three key nodes in detail: energy body awareness, soul-making capacity, and the bidirectional flow of love. He explains how practitioners can work skillfully with these elements - sometimes through deliberate attention, sometimes through gentle noticing - to support the emergence of authentic imaginal experience. The energy body, conceived not as a fixed entity but as a way of sensing bodily experience as fields of energy and vibration, serves as a crucial gateway that can activate other aspects of the imaginal constellation.
>
> The teaching maintains a delicate balance between technique and grace, acknowledging that while practitioners can learn to work with these elements, the imaginal always retains an element of mystery and gift that transcends purely technical approaches. This reflects the deeper wisdom that soul-making and authentic imaginal practice involve receiving something beyond our complete control while still engaging our capacity for refined discernment and skillful participation.

So if we recap a little before we continue further, we've given a loose list of elements or aspects that we can identify that constitute the imaginal, the fully imaginal. We've said that there's a spectrum of the skillful use of imagination, from mindful imagination all the way to the imaginal. In relation to these elements and aspects of the imaginal that we want to point out and discern, we're developing our discernment and our refinement of discrimination and noticing. In relation to all that, we're holding it all loosely, with some ambivalence.

We do want to increase the precision and the depth and the subtlety of our discernment because that's part of the whole work. And we want to be loose with this. How many elements there are on the list is loose depending on how we divide it up—you'll see things are connected, or we could divide it differently, or say that's one or that's really two. The intention is certainly to encourage, not to discourage or overwhelm. So we need a little looseness.

There's a spectrum, and even what we mean by imaginal and soul-making has its own dynamic to it anyway, which is to some extent relatively arbitrary. At what point of that evolution of a dynamic do we say there's a cut-off and declare "now it's imaginal"? All this is held loosely, and I hope you can enter into that spirit of looseness with precision—precision with a kind of ease to it, looseness and fluidity to it.

We also said certainly that the list wasn't exhaustive or complete; we could add to it, do it differently. The elements and aspects that we're pointing to apply both to so-called intra-psychic images and to perceptions of material things—selves, others, objects in the world. So it applies both to so-called intra-psychic images and to what we're going to call sensing with soul.

One of the first things to say here is that in the way we understand it, there is nothing that is inherently imaginal. Something, some object or thing or event, is imaginal for someone—and even then, for someone at a specific time. There's nothing that is by itself inherently imaginal.

An imaginal image, or the imaginal, or sensing with soul, is a way of looking, a way of conceiving, a way of sensing an image or a perception. That's a better way of putting it. It's a relationship. It's a way of looking, conceiving, sensing—a relationship with an image or a certain perception in any of the senses. That constitutes the imaginal or sensing with soul.

When the relationship has certain elements in it or certain aspects to it, then something comes alive imaginally for us at that time when the relationship is such. We can also say when something is imaginal, there is a certain kind of relationship. In other words, sensing with soul is a relationship—a relationship that we're talking about that is characterized and constituted by all these different aspects and elements.

Someone might have a film or a book in mind, or a piece of art. That film, book, or piece of art might have slightly surreal or imagistic representations in it—forms, figures, characters. They might be what seem to fit into the classical archetypes. This film has someone who's a warrior and someone who's a king and someone who's a clown and someone who's a mysterious prostitute and someone who's a thief and someone who's a madwoman—they're all classical archetypes, and we say, "Oh, it's an imaginal film, it's really imaginal," or "it's an imaginal book."

But in our conception, such a film, book, piece of art is not necessarily imaginal. Nor, incidentally, is it necessarily archetypal according to the way James Hillman would define archetypal. I'm not totally equating what we're doing with James Hillman's work, but there's overlap there. It's more in the relationship, more in the fruit of what an image or an object or a perception gives, that qualifies it to have the word imaginal or archetypal according to our conception—and also in terms of the word archetypal, according to James Hillman's understanding.

Clown, warrior, king, prostitute, madwoman, thief—these are not inherent aspects of the imaginal. It's rather the relationship with anything at all. When that relationship opens up, creates and discovers a sense of dimensionality, a sense of unfathomability, some kind of sense of divinity, some kind of sense of beauty that touches us, some kind of sense of meaningfulness for us, some kind of way that it echoes and mirrors us and our lives in that meaningfulness, some kind of mystery, some kind of eros, some kind of potential expansion of the whole eros-psyche-logos dynamic—all that and more. When the relationship stimulates, triggers, opens, invites, creates and discovers all that, then we say this thing is imaginal.

Maybe that film, book, piece of art was all that, did all that at a certain time for person A, but for person B, they look at it and just see—it's not triggering that imagination. Why? Because the relationships that person A and person B each have with said film, book, piece of art are different. One constitutes, supports, fertilizes the whole opening of the erotic imagination, and one doesn't.

I want to elaborate on some of these elements over this group of talks—some just to touch on, some to elaborate a bit more. One way of thinking about all this: when we talk about an image, we think of an object. I've also pointed out in talks in the past that the self gets involved, drawn into the imaginal constellation. The self becomes imaginal in relation to the imaginal other or object. And then the world does in cosmopoiesis and all that. That's really important.

But to expand on that, we could say that when we talk about an imaginal image, what we're really talking about, or one way to understand what we're talking about, is that there's a kind of lattice—a constellation, an arrangement of elements that are all connected with each other.

I don't want to push this analogy too far, but imagine something like a fluid crystal structure—a lattice or constellation. There are nodes or elements that are somewhat discrete, yet not entirely separate. As I said, they're all interconnected.

When we talk about something becoming imaginal or entering the world of the imaginal—this relationship that supports, constitutes, opens, and ignites the erotic-imaginal—we're really speaking about this lattice. There's a lattice with nodes distributed throughout. When something is fully imaginal, all the nodes are firing, igniting, alive, mirroring each other, feeding each other, opening each other, reflecting and empowering one another.

For practice, this understanding isn't merely a matter of definition and precision—it has real implications. When we consider the spectrum toward the imaginal—from various uses of imagination toward the fully, genuinely, authentically imaginal—part of what determines where something falls on this spectrum is how many of these nodes in the lattice are firing together and mutually empowering each other. How many are lit up? How many are alive in this way?

What this means in practice is that we can sometimes nudge things along this spectrum. When we have an image or perception, we can guide it toward the more fully, authentically imaginal in several ways—by taking into consideration and being aware of the different possible nodes in the imaginal constellation, in the lattice, and perhaps wiggling or jiggling one of them.

Just wiggle this particular node—the energy body, for instance. Bring that alive a bit more with increased awareness. Sometimes this requires deliberate action. Other times it's simply a matter of noticing—noticing a certain element or aspect we haven't fully perceived. It's there latently or potentially, and our mindful noticing of it, our resonating with that particular aspect—let's say the energy body—brings that node alive in the very act of noticing, making it more imaginal.

Here I am with this image, but it's not really fully imaginal. Here I am with this perception that's not really fully sensing with soul. Then, for instance, I begin to notice how it echoes and mirrors my life and journey in some way that's really hard to articulate fully—perhaps I can partially articulate it. I start to tune into that and allow myself to feel and notice, paying subtle, sensitive attention to that echoing and mirroring between myself, my life, and this image.

Or I start to notice how the energy body feels, or I notice the sense of meaningfulness, or I observe that it has this kind of dimensionality and unfathomability, or the aspect of being neither real nor not real—somehow neither category really applies—this imaginal middle way or theatrical quality.

One possibility is simply noticing, gently looking for a certain element. Often, as I said, it's already there, latent, waiting in the shade or darkness. Our noticing and attuning to it brings that particular node alive, and then that node begins to ignite others. It's like blowing on a corner of a fire—that side of the fire or piece of wood ignites another one.

We could say that noticing one of these aspects—sometimes it takes just one—can ignite that particular node, that specific aspect or element. This can either suddenly or gradually illuminate, ignite, fire up, and turn on the other nodes, until the whole thing becomes imaginal. It's as if we're blowing on a node.

Sometimes it's a matter of noticing. Sometimes it's about empowering it somehow. Sometimes it involves what I'd call wiggling or jiggling it. With the energy body, for example, this might mean paying attention to it in a different way, or imagining the body in a certain way, or spreading the energy. These are what I mean by wiggling or jiggling possibilities.

There's something very important in all this—in this loosely speaking list we're going to explore. As I said, it's crucial for refining discernment and achieving clarity, but it's also important for practice and potentially has significant power. These are like keys or ignition points that can turn the whole thing on and move it toward the fully or authentically imaginal.

Having said all that, I feel quite strongly about this: there's a kind of middle way here. Soul-making and the imaginal, for me, involve an element of grace. It's not purely within the remit of what we can control with clever techniques, nor is it fully outside that range. It's as if we are given something. Soul gives us something, opens a door for us. It's a grace.

It's never fully—and that's the key word—never fully in our control or under our control or mastered by our technique. There's always some mystery in it and some sense of receiving something. I think, "Gosh, where did that come from? How did that happen?" We could say that in a certain way, soul is giving us something, showing us something of herself.

So to me, that not just attitude, but that awareness, that acknowledgment, recognition that there will always be a limit to our technique and to the degree with which soul and soul-making and image are under our control and mastered by our technical manipulations. And yet there is, at the same time—we can do things, we can jiggle things and notice things and something comes alive.

Much of this conception work involves straddling different conceptions and different attitudes, different orientations, somehow mysteriously holding both. This is really, really important. On the one hand, there's a grace involved. The soul is always bigger than me. It's always bigger than, and if you like, more powerful than my ego and my will. And at the same time, there's quite a lot we can subtly work with and support by our placement of attention, our attitude, our inner work—what we could loosely include under the word technique. So it's straddling both those approaches or attitudes.

I touched on the energy body. We could actually start there. I threw it in at some point in the list towards the end, but we could start there, and there's no order in which these elements or nodes of the lattice need to ignite or progress. It's more like a network of nodes or lights, and you can enter from any direction—part of the beauty of it. But let's start with the energy body, just to give an example.

What this means—I've already said it, but let's make it really clear—is that awareness of the energy body is characteristic of the imaginal. We could say it's one element of our list, depending on how we divide it up. Something is not imaginal in our language. There is not the sensing with soul for us without the awareness of the energy body. So that's characteristic of the imaginal, characteristic of this relational constellation.

As we go through the nodes of the lattice, you'll see that some more obviously seem to pertain to the object and some more obviously seem to pertain to the subject. But all that gets mixed up and expanded. If we just start with this: characteristic of the imaginal and that relational constellation is awareness of the energy body, a sensitivity to what's happening in the energy body in the moment.

What this means for practice is that bringing awareness to the energy body, filling that energy body with awareness and sensitivity and the delicacy involved in that, tuning to it, including that in our awareness as we pay attention to either a so-called intrapsychic image or something else in the material world—including the energy body awareness—can, because it's a node in the lattice, actually stimulate, ignite, fan the fire of, and bring into co-burning the other nodes of the lattice.

So bringing awareness to the energy body, just noticing what's going on there and turning the dial up on the awareness and sensitivity there, can stimulate the opening of the erotic imaginal. This has two aspects. The erotic part means that if there might be craving there, sometimes what happens as we bring awareness to the energy body is craving morphs into eros. We could say that. There's a transformation of craving or grasping into eros, and we've talked a lot about the difference between those two in the past. I'm not going to go into it right now. But because the energy body is a node in the lattice, giving attention to that, we support that node to come alive, and then that might start to spread, and the whole thing becomes more imaginal, or completely imaginal, so to speak.

There's a mutual dependent origination between the nodes of this imaginal constellation, this lattice. In other words, when the energy body awareness is included and comes alive, then either suddenly or gradually the soul-making resonances might come alive, or some other aspect of the nodes of the lattice, and vice versa. As we allow the soul-making resonances to come alive, we start to feel some of those resonances in the body and it stimulates the energy body. We could probably take any two elements of this lattice, nodes in this lattice, and say that they are mutually dependent, which means one gets stimulated, another gets stimulated, or they feed each other and can trigger each other.

If we were to give instructions, it might be: here I am working with an intrapsychic image or working in relation to some thing, some object, some person or being in the world. I'm wanting to support sensing them with soul for that relation to become imaginal. As an instruction, can I just drop in perhaps the question or encouragement to myself: can I be in relationship with this object, whatever it is, intrapsychic or otherwise, with the whole of my body?

Sometimes I'm in relationship with just a part of my body, or I'm just relating through the eyes, or just through one sense, or just through my head center, or just through my heart sense. Can I somehow put my whole body in relationship with this other? That includes the whole body, the whole energy body—I'm feeling it, and I'm feeling it in relationship. What is it that I sense this other, this object or person, with my whole body? And within that, including that, my whole body—I'm aware of the energy body there and what that feels like, what my sense of it is.

I'll come back and talk more about this whole concept of the nodes and the lattice or the imaginal constellation and the ignition of that later. But I hope you get the general principle of what I'm talking about. It's really worth including this awareness and starting to experiment with it and noticing the magic here.

confusing or hard to grasp clearly. In a way, it's tricky because these are deliberately open concepts without hard edges—and that's part of their beauty, though I recognize it might be frustrating or simply confusing for some people. My articulation of these concepts is evolving over time, but the concepts themselves are intentionally fluid. They don't have rigid boundaries, as I've mentioned before and will explore again.

So what do we mean by energy body? The energy body is actually a way of looking and conceiving rather than a particular experience. When we speak of energy body, we're referring to a whole range of experiences understood through a specific lens—a way of looking at and sensing bodily experience that feels the space of the body as a field of energy, vibration, or texture.

This encompasses an enormous range of possibilities. The energy body might feel very solid, dense, earthy in a certain sense of that word, all the way to extremely ethereal, with everything in between. It's a way of looking and sensing that perceives the space of the body as a field of energy, vibration, and texture, embracing all the range potentially included in that.

Importantly, it's also a way of conceiving that doesn't limit the body or our idea of body to only the conventional scientific, materialist, and typical modern conception. For example, it moves beyond the view that the body is just flatly material—mere matter without depth, dimensionality, or soul—where consciousness somehow emerges when neurons fire, though no one quite understands how. This classical scientific materialism conceives matter as fundamentally flat and claims this physicalist reductionism as the only true understanding of what the body really is.

Even physicalist systems theory, though people argue it's not reductionist, still falls short when we're talking about something beyond the purely physical. While it may view the body as a system of physical elements that emerges into something higher than pure matter, it remains limited.

The energy body conception also means that our sense and understanding of the body isn't being judged according to socially fashionable notions of attractiveness. The energy body embraces all of this—it's a way of looking and conceiving that transcends these limitations.

While we're exploring this subject, let me elaborate on something we may return to later. This connects to the whole idea that any concept we're using is linked with other concepts, and where one concept shades into another is not rigidly defined or clearly demarcated.

At the risk of adding complexity, I think this will help fill out our understanding of body and energy body. I would say that whenever there is any sense of body—anytime whatsoever—there is some concept, some image, and some inner felt sense of that body.

Any sense of body includes some concept of what that body is, some kind of image of it—whether visual or otherwise—and some inner felt sense. This includes energy body and applies to any experience of body.

The concept might be, for example, that typical scientific materialist biological conception of bones, organs, tissues, and so forth, composed of cells, which are themselves composed of intercellular structures, and so on. All of these, in this view, exist in interactive relationship with each other and with the outer material environment. That's one possible concept.

At other times—and some of you will have tasted this—the concept might be that the body is made of light. There's an actual conception of a light body, a subtle body of light. The concept might emerge from certain meditative experiences, particularly some jhanic states.

For instance, coming out of the sixth jhana—the sphere of infinite consciousness—one might have a very real conception and sense that the body's substance is actually consciousness. All this apparent matter is revealed as consciousness, perhaps a kind of cosmic consciousness. This would be a typical concept arising in the aftereffects of the sixth jhana.

There's always some concept operating whenever there's a sense of body. We might not be fully aware of what the concept is or able to articulate it completely, but some kind of concept is always present when there's any sense of body.

I also mentioned there's always some kind of image when there's any sense of body. This image may be one of space—the very nature of the body experienced as space, as in the fifth jhana. The image might be imaginal in the sense we've been using that word, where the body is perceived as numinous, multidimensional, possessing its own autonomous intelligence—all those aspects of the imaginal constellation we're exploring in these talks.

Of course, the image of the body might also be very non-imaginal—just the contours of a body in the mind's eye with nothing numinous or multidimensional about it, certainly nothing suggesting autonomous intelligence. It's simply a body in the usual sense, and the image itself feels rather flat.

So there's always some concept, there's always some image, and there's always some felt sense—some inner felt sense of that body, of the texture of sensation in the space of the body. In the space the body is perceived to exist, there's always some sense. And again, that sense might be that there is an absence there. That would be more akin to some of the formless jhanas. That kind of felt sense involves a disappearing of felt sense, but you still have the felt sense of absence, of non-solidity, of space. So there's always some kind of felt sense or other—the sense of some kind of density, some kind of field of feeling or vibrational energy. And again, the range is huge.

Now, of course, all these three—concept, image, and felt sense that are part of bodily experience, the phenomenon of the body for us—they're actually interrelated and not separate. They overlap each other. Just a little examination of your experience and thinking about this, you'll see that. So we say, it's good to delineate things, and it's also good not to get too stuck on these delineations. There's some concept, some image, and some inner felt sense, and they overlap.

So why are we saying this? We're talking and delineating this way, not to claim or even attempt a description of truth. This is the truth of the body. This is the reality of the body. It's really this kind of matter or it's really that kind of matter or whatever. We're saying all this and making these delineations in order to help open up the possibilities of experience, of image into the imaginal, of conception, of energy, of perception and emotion—in fact, of body, matter, self, others, world, soul, and cosmos.

We want, by making these discriminations, opening up and putting them in relation to each other, to stimulate an awareness that can then unblock—because we're not trapped in certain conceptions that we're not really even aware that we have. So we want to unblock what may, without our even realizing it, be blocking or inhibiting these openings of soul-making.

So that's behind all these delineations, discriminations, and definitions.

Going back to our main point, the energy body awareness is one node in this lattice that's mutually dependently arising. In noticing it, in wiggling or jiggling it, in tuning to it, blowing on that ember, if you like, brings it—fires it up more, ignites it more—and that can support the opening of the whole, or the ignition of the whole lattice into something more profoundly, fully, authentically imaginal.

Another aspect that is intrinsic to what we would call imaginal images or sensing with soul is that the imaginal and sensing with soul open up soul-making. It's kind of a circular definition. And we will return to this word, soul-making. I've talked a lot about it in the past, but we'll return to it even in this set of talks. But basically, that's an element of the imaginal constellation—there is a sense of soul-making. Something is only imaginal if it brings soul-making. We're only sensing with soul if there's some sense of soul-making there.

So what then is the relationship between this second element that we're focusing on—this business of soul-making—and imagination? Not imaginal and soul-making, but imagination and soul-making.

In the way we're using that term soul-making, as I said, it may be quite different from how other people may use it or how you may understand it at this point. There are quite a few differences as well.

So soul-making implies, in our definition, that eros and psyche and logos—concept—are involved and worked or stretched in the process, in the dynamic of soul-making. Eros, psyche, and logos are involved and worked and stretched.

Now psyche, we said in previous retreats and talks—when we use the word psyche, one of the meanings we intend is image. The image, that is also the collection of images. So, in the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, the psyche, the image, may not be image in the obvious sense. In other words, there's an image that I see intrapsychically, or this object that I'm looking at in the world. It may be more the fantasy of what is happening and the self in relationship, or in the process of what's happening.

For example, a person practicing with dedication and opening up the jhanas deliberately, going step by step and piecing it together and really beginning to feel—first of all, this is amazing. What beautiful states, what a blessing to be able to open to these dimensions and discover them and be nourished and resourced by these dimensions.

But secondly, one is struck on that path, on the jhanic path as one develops it. One is struck like, wow, this is what the Buddha was talking about. It just totally fits the description. When he gives those beautiful images of the lake fed by an underground spring and delineates what's involved in the second jhana, third jhana, one absolutely recognizes intuitively—this is absolutely what he was talking about.

Then one feels this beautiful connection between oneself and the Buddha and the whole 2500-year tradition carried on. Here little old me is experiencing what the Buddha was talking about. I recognize it from the words, and it's been handed to me through the tradition. I'm walking that path, and who knows what else we'll be able to open.

So there's a fantasy there, actually, in the good sense, of the beauty of that connection, the inspiration of it, the fantasy of the self on the path, which is also fantasy, and the tradition, which is also fantasy, the whole thing. So that's one aspect of the way image or fantasy is working there, with the jhanas, which in themselves are actually non-imagistic states.

They're the quieting of mental representation and image, by definition, almost.

But it also might be that the soul-making pertaining... Let me approach this differently. The soul-making might arise when something is new for us, when we are opening up new territory that feels meaningful, that has a kind of beauty and is beyond what we already know.

Imagine I'm in contact with a jhana. A jhana's opening, and it's new to me. I haven't thoroughly become utterly familiar with it. That takes a while—to get used to jhanas. It's still new. It's still got this kind of otherness, of beyondness that I can get to know more of. So it becomes an object of eros for me, of attraction. But it doesn't involve image in the usual sense.

Anything that, when we're at the stage with something that's just opening for our psyche, for our consciousness, for our being—so for instance, jhanas, or it might just be heart work. Perhaps we've never really done any heart work, and then we come to Gaia House retreats, and some of the teachers speak so beautifully and encourage this kind of sensitivity to one's heart, and the opening of the heart, and the valuing of the beauties in the heart and the vulnerability and the honesty with oneself about one's heart and the honesty with others.

All this might be new. It's new territory. We're expanding into something. And for a while, it stays new. When it's new and meaningful and beautiful like that and attractive—even though we might be a little daunted—then in that stage of newness and beyondness, it creates a "more" for me in expanding my being, opening new territory of expansion. Then there can be soul-making in relation to that thing. And as I said, the thing itself and the self in that process can become fantasy as well. But it might not be an image in the usual sense, or in the commonly thought-of sense.

Just body awareness. Someone may never have done any body awareness. I remember back to my really first years, I was very young, starting meditation. Just coming into my body, it was like, "Wow, wow." And even more than that, I remember—I think I might have told this story before—I started learning meditation in a class, a weekly class. And the homework, I think it was for the first week, was to do five minutes of meditation a day. Not half an hour, not forty-five minutes, five minutes.

So I dutifully did that. I was very taken by the teachings as a first-timer. And it was like opening a whole world. That five minutes, it was... And I went back to the teacher and said, "Wow, it's just unbelievable. I really feel different." And I couldn't quite—I was struggling to articulate it with him. What had happened? He said, "That's mindfulness." Oh, mindfulness. And just that five minutes, it was new for me. So there can be soul-making in relation to that, and again, in relation to this path, what I'm discovering, what's being stretched.

But it's not an image in the usual sense, or the typically understood sense. And again, like I said, jhanas, body awareness, energy body might be new, and it's like, "Wow," and that itself stretches us, and may—again, we have a sense, a fantasy of ourselves on the path of practice. That whole thing becomes fantasy there.

Or playfulness. I've emphasized a lot the importance of playfulness in practice. And again, someone might have had very little of that in their life. And then they begin to let themselves have some playfulness, and that feels soul-making at first. Just the playfulness itself, because something is being expanded, drawn into new territory, with all this meaningfulness and beauty and kind of beyondness that's beyond what I already know.

But these elements—playfulness, heartfulness, energy, body awareness—in themselves, they are necessary and integral elements of imaginal practice, of sensing with soul and the imaginal constellation. So playfulness, heartfulness, energy, body awareness—I didn't mention some of them before, but they are also necessary and integral elements. But in themselves, they do not make something soul-making. Just playfulness in itself... They don't make something imaginal either.

They may if they're new.

Conversely, as we've already explored in previous talks, mindful imagination or embodied imagination is not necessarily imaginal nor soul-making in our sense. When we use our imagination, it might be skillful and genuinely helpful, but there's often a kind of reductionism involved. We find ourselves reducing the image, making it too literal, or narrowing it down to a singular meaning. We might view the image and imaginal work as serving solely or primarily our personal growth, or see it as representing merely a part of ourselves.

All these attitudes and elements won't allow the full and authentic imaginal to emerge. They will limit—not prevent entirely, I hope this all makes sense—but they will limit the degree, depth, fullness, and range of soul-making that's possible. In other words, it's quite possible to have skillful and beneficial use of the imagination without it being soul-making, or with only very limited soul-making occurring.

However, if using the imagination skillfully is something entirely new—something that previously wasn't allowed in one's tradition or upbringing—and we're suddenly introduced to it or begin allowing it, then this skillful use of imagination, because of its newness, may indeed be soul-making to some degree.

So any skillful imagination is not necessarily imaginal. Any skillful use of the imagination is not necessarily imaginal, but it may be soul-making.

Similarly, one might encounter an image from a book, a daydream, a film—any imaginative form. This image might deeply touch our heart, perhaps even move us to tears of compassion. While it's beautiful and important to be touched in this way, it doesn't necessarily mean that just because the heart is very moved, the experience is imaginal or soul-making in itself.

Soulfulness is, if you like, bigger than heartfulness. It includes heartfulness but involves much more. In certain language, you could say heartfulness is a necessary but not sufficient element of the imaginal constellation. The imaginal does touch our heart in countless different ways, but heartfulness alone is not enough for something to qualify as imaginal.

Let me highlight one more element before we close today. I mentioned this in our earlier list—it might have been the first one—and it represents our third node: loving and being loved. You could count this as two elements or just one.

Both the imaginal and sensing with soul include a sense of being loved by this imaginal object, other, or being. I've spoken about this before, but I want to highlight it now. The love in the imaginal, or the love of the imaginal, from the imaginal, always has a particular flavor or character specific to that image and that relationship. This imaginal figure loves me in a very particular way that harmonizes with its character and our unique relationship. This love may evolve and change over time.

I'm emphasizing this because sometimes we hold too narrow a vision of what love looks like and feels like, how it can manifest. There are vastly different kinds of love. Some loves are tough loves—more stern, distant, disciplined. Others are soft, warm, melting, comforting, and easeful. It's all love.

Part of tuning to an imaginal figure or object involves discerning and feeling into the particular quality or characteristic flavor of the love that is present, the being loved that exists there. Sometimes this being loved isn't obvious at all initially, but we gradually recognize: "Oh yes, there is love here." This recognition ignites and stimulates that particular node of the lattice, which can then stimulate others. It helps us enter and open more fully to the authentically imaginal, moving us along that spectrum.

The love flows both ways. We might be more aware that we love this tree but not yet notice how the tree loves us—with its own particular kind of loving. Or vice versa. We notice one direction of the love that flows, moves, connects, and passes between us, but not the other.

Whether you count these as two elements or one, this is part of what we can notice and even work with intentionally. Actually affirming our love, for instance, is more than just noticing that we love.

I'll come back to that, I hope, in a later talk. What is it to actually speak? "I love you" – to say that, to feel it, not just to feel it and notice that we love, but actually to affirm it, to make that gesture.

So sometimes it's that kind of wiggling or jingling or empowering that actually stimulates the love, which can then stimulate the sense of being loved, perhaps, or just generally the other nodes of the whole lattice. And sometimes, as I said, it's much more about noticing. It's like, "Oh yeah. Oh yeah, there's that. Oh, how beautiful. There's that element of love there."

And just tuning to it, bringing that sensitivity to notice what kind it is and linger with it and resonate with it and vibrate with it, so to speak. Let it touch the soul.

Okay, let's stop there. Thank you for listening.

To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit DharmaSeed.org/donate.

CHAPTER 106

Aspects of the Imaginal (Part 4)

Rob Burbea · 1h22

> In this profound exploration of imaginal practice, Rob Burbea examines the complex constellation of interconnected elements that constitute sensing with soul. He presents imaginal perception as a dynamic lattice where different nodes - including energy body awareness, eros, beauty, dimensionality, divinity, grace, reverence, humility, trust, and duty - can ignite each other to create authentic soul-making experiences.
>
> Burbea explores how practitioners can develop sensitivity to these various aspects, learning to attune to different qualities and modes within the imaginal constellation. He discusses how any single element can serve as a doorway, triggering or igniting the whole lattice through what he describes as either sudden quantum leaps or gradual transitions along spectra of experience. The teaching emphasizes both the technical artistry involved in imaginal practice and the essential element of grace - the receptivity needed to receive what is bestowed.
>
> Key concepts include the imaginal middle way (neither real nor unreal), the relationship between dimensionality and divinity, and how qualities like humility and reverence function within soul-making dynamics. Burbea addresses potential cultural resistances to terms like divinity and humility, offering nuanced perspectives that avoid both reification and dismissal. The talk concludes with an examination of duty as an inherent aspect of imaginal relationship, exploring how soul-making experiences carry implicit obligations for integration and honoring.

So we've been saying that from, for a number of reasons, it might be helpful at times to adopt or enter a perspective that recognizes that the imaginal—or an imaginal perception or sensing with soul—is actually constituted with different elements that are interrelated, or different aspects. We investigate a little and see what is involved there, what are those elements and aspects of this imaginal constellation.

Exploring in this way, bringing this perspective, and then looking a little closer and teasing things apart, even if that apartness is somewhat artificial, and looking a little closer, is for the sake of increasing our understanding, filling out our conceptual framework, also increasing and developing our sensitivity and our discernment to actually be sensitive to these things and notice these things, and our attentiveness and our attunement, our capacity to attune to them and feel their different qualities and modes and aspects.

But it's also useful and helpful to adopt and explore this perspective because of the potential for practice in igniting the imaginal, entering more fully into the mundus imaginalis, the imaginal world, moving along that spectrum of imagination experiences, moving more along that spectrum towards the fully, authentically or genuinely imaginal.

So we can say again, that an imaginal perception or perceiving imaginally or sensing with soul actually involves a constellation or a lattice of elements, of aspects, and any star in that constellation or any node in that lattice, its triggering can trigger or ignite or infect, if you like, the whole lattice.

For example, it might be that seeing the self—seeing myself, yourself, seeing the self as angel—is what occurs first, or we notice first, or what actually ignites first in the experience. And then this seeing the self as angel, as part of the whole larger constellation of imaginal experience at that time, then ignites the sensing of other-world and eros, imaginally, erotically, theophanically.

So it might actually happen in time that they get ignited, or it might be actually that there's a noticing that happens in time, one and then the other and then the other. Or the first to ignite—or so to speak, the door that opens first, the node to resonate first—with eros and to resonate erotically and imaginally, might be the humility of the heart. We will come back to this.

The sensitivity, awareness of the energy body—we've touched on that already. It might be the middle way of the imaginal, actually sensing that middle way, this kind of neither real nor not real quality. It's related to the middle way of emptiness, but it's different. It's what I call the imaginal middle way, or the middle way of the imaginal, the theatre-like quality or status of what is occurring, what is being experienced, the perceptions involved.

Or it might be an idea or conception that's involved in this perception, or we start with an idea or conception, and this starts, as I said, infecting, inflaming, igniting, triggering, opening the other nodes in the lattice. We actually start with an idea or a conception that's implicit there.

Or we start with the eros, or some part of the whole multi-directed eros that is flowing, that is alive in the self-other-world relations there. It might be we start with the sense of deep value, that that is the first door to open, the first to be ignited in our consciousness, and the sense of deep value or treasure of what we are perceiving, or some aspect of what we are perceiving, some pole of what we are perceiving.

It may be a sense of the divinity, or a theophany, again, of some aspect of perception. Or it may be the very sense of participation with or within that sense of divinity. It's that sense of participation that then inflames the whole constellation, the whole lattice, makes it burn more brightly, takes us deeper into the imaginal.

So an awareness of one or some of the different connecting nodes in the lattice allows us to try different things, if you like, to trigger or ignite the constellation, to ignite the imaginal experience, to enter further into the mundus imaginalis, the imaginal world.

But as I said, sometimes we can jiggle and wiggle one node and actually do something there to support that particular star or node igniting and illuminating. And sometimes it's more a matter of—more precise and helpful to recognize—that what we are doing at times is rather than changing anything, it's just noticing some aspect that is already aflame, already ignited. And it's this noticing, this attention, that allows that node to ignite further and more fully and deeper, and then the whole lattice to get ignited and triggered from that.

Either simultaneously, the whole lattice, the whole imaginal constellation kind of illuminates at one point, like a light switch going on, or gradually, kind of node by node. And this is quite interesting, too. When it ignites the whole thing, or turns on, if you like, becomes alive imaginally, when the whole lattice ignites simultaneously, it can feel like something just took a quantum leap. So from one discrete state to another, it's like a sudden jump of a system, if you like, this system of nodes and lattice to a different state.

So it's something that can feel really like, well, we just suddenly shifted gears there into a really different state of perception, of consciousness, of being, and a different experience.

Now, we haven't talked much, and we won't talk much yet—maybe perhaps for quite a while—about actually working in a dyad with another intensely, with the soul-making and the imaginal perceptions that involve each other, and being in participation and dialogue and reciprocal relationship in that erotic-imaginal dyad. Sometimes what can happen—I'm just mentioning this—but sometimes what can happen is that quantum leap happens not just for one person, but for a whole field of two people, or sometimes more. It's like the whole field, in this case, if we're talking about dyad, and both people suddenly undergo that quantum leap. There's some kind of almost magic of a shared entry or a shared inflaming or illumination of the imaginal together. We won't dwell on that.

And at the same time, I already mentioned this, it's good to recognize that where there is eros in the imaginal, there is always—and we'll come back to this too—a sense of grace, of gift. And with that, therefore, there must be a sense of receptivity. We receive gifts. We receive grace. We open to it. It is bestowed on us.

If it's grace and gift that we are receiving, that means that the quality of receptivity, the stance, the poise, the posture, the inner posture of receptivity, and of sensitivity and flexibility and attunement are necessary. It's as if we notice the gift. We pick up on the grace, on the breeze, so to speak. Our antennae, so to speak, are moved. Our receptors are moved. And then, ah, what is that? Something on the wind, something on the breeze, an intimation, a fragrance. And we tune to it, cock our heads to it, turn towards it, open to it, to receive it.

So there's this real element of grace, gift. "No one knows whence the Spirit bloweth," to quote roughly Jesus. And so it's not completely in our control. We don't completely direct this.

There is an element of technical art and skill and deliberateness—bringing images back deliberately, gently supporting this or that, working with responsiveness. But there's also this element of grace, of openness, receptivity, sensibility, flexibility, and receptiveness. These qualities are part of the imaginal constellation as well. It's not just about technique, but it does involve technique. It's never totally under my control and mastery. Recognizing that fact is humbling, but it also, to me, makes it more beautiful. I said this before: soul is greater than ego, is greater than me, greater than you.

But again, we have a conception or an approach or an attitude that kind of straddles two modalities or two inclinations—the inclination to receive and the inclination to be deliberate and active, proactive, a kind of mastery. We're straddling and including those. There's space here, flexibility, range.

A little bit more about this process or dynamic of what we might call ignition, or turning on, or illuminating the imaginal—the imaginal becoming illuminated. I've talked about these nodes and elements of the imaginal constellation, but it's not just that they're like on-off settings—this element of humility or this element of eros is either on or off, just like an on-off switch. They are also, at times at least, more like spectra or dimmer switches. Instead of a flick on-off switch, a dimmer switch—you turn the lights up or down in the middle, like a volume control or like a fire. If each is a kind of individual fire, it's not simply on or off. I mean, that's one way of looking at it, but it's also like a degree. Is it just a kind of ember, or is it really flaming or really a raging fire?

It's maybe too clumsy an analogy, but at least it's more nuanced than a switch, which is something that we switch on or off. So this idea of suddenly sparking or the ignition of one node triggering or igniting suddenly the sparking of other nodes or elements—that's a good way to understand this, and that actually can convey this sudden change of state, this kind of quantum leap that can often occur here.

But at other times, the transition, as I mentioned earlier, is actually more gradual. So it's like dials or faders moving higher or lower up their scale, more or less on or off. And we can actually actively turn any one of them up by simply noticing or paying careful, gentle, attuned attention to that element. Perhaps then the whole lattice is gradually turned up—the whole imaginal constellation gradually turns up with that. Or sometimes, at a certain threshold of tuning up one of the elements, there is a sudden ignition of all the others. So all kinds of transitions are possible here, all kinds of developments.

One more thing about this. All this that I'm talking about—we're really talking about developing the art or the skill of imaginal practice, of sensing with soul. In time, as that skill or art develops, along with the whole range of what's involved there—because it's really a collection of all kinds of capacities that are implicit and required for imaginal practice—we may find that we can even guide the relative balance of the settings of any two, or maybe even more, of these dials.

So, for example, the attention to the energy body is one of those nodes, one of those dials, and the attention to it can modulate from anywhere—from just a background minimal awareness to a kind of complete immersion in the sense of the energy body, the whole energy body. The awareness is completely immersed in it. That energy body awareness, where it is on its scale relative to the attention to the image itself—you understand? So here's this image, whatever it is, and here's my sense of the energy body. I've got basically both of them, awareness and attention to both of them in imaginal practice, and the relative degrees of where the attention is weighted, more or less, we can vary that.

So I can lean it back, so to speak, into the awareness of the energy body, and more of the energy goes there, more of the sensitivity there and what's experienced there. And I might go so far as into a jhana—I can lean so far into the pleasure that's going on in the energy body that I actually enter a jhana, and the image is either completely gone or in the background. Or vice versa—the energy body is there, I'm aware of it, but the primary thing I'm paying attention to is the image.

There's a whole gradation there of relative weighting of attention and emphasis of attention. And similarly with the emotion—we can give what's emotionally present... maybe an image brings with it some kind of poignancy or a particular kind of loneliness or a particular kind of loving and being loved, or sadness or joy or a particular kind of delight. And again, we can lean into that, if we want to, in time, much more than the image, while still keeping the image around. Or we may just, so to speak, completely lean into an exploration of being with and holding the emotion going on, and let the image kind of fade. And vice versa—we can be much more with the image or some other aspect of the imaginal constellation, and just be aware of what's going on with our emotions in the emotional body.

Similarly with other aspects—the emptiness aspect, for instance. We can play with the relative emphasis of attention, or leaning of attention, or weight of attention, on any of these different elements.

I don't know how that sounds. It might sound to you like that's really advanced. Certainly it takes practice to develop that kind of facility and flexibility and nuance of art and attention.

But it's similar in many ways. Some of you will know I used at one point the analogy of a great hawk or eagle gliding on air currents as a sort of image or symbol for how one can move really quite gracefully and sometimes with minimal effort between, say, an insight mode of working, a way of looking, and the samadhi that kind of organically comes with the letting go that arises from the insight.

Just like this hawk riding high on the warm air currents—if it wants to go left, it's just the slightest movement. It's sensitive to what currents are already there, what thermals, what directions are winning. It can just pick the one that's going left, if it wants to go left, for example. And just a slight inclination sends it that way. This hawk is riding on what's already present. And similarly, if it wants to go right, there's just a slight inclination, a slight modification. There's a real beauty and gracefulness and art to that.

One develops—again, it's all part of developing the sensitivity in practice and the attunement—and there's so much possible here. If it sounds outlandish, it isn't. It probably takes time and practice to develop, but it's certainly possible.

So if we continue with our list, we've already mentioned the first element: energy body awareness. We said a little about the second one: the fact of giving rise to soul-making, the sense of soulfulness and soul-making happening. So soulfulness as an experience is another element. The soulfulness of what's going on is another aspect. The third we mentioned was loving and being loved, and we spoke about the particularities there and the attunement there.

With that third element, really tune in and feel that particularity and let it touch you. Let this being loved touch your being, touch the heart, feel it in the body, feel it in the soul. And we also said that in the range of what those loves can manifest—how they can appear in imaginal perception, in sensing with soul—is really, really large.

Yes, absolutely, it includes metta, it includes compassion, at times it includes mudita, and we should also say equanimity. So it includes the classical brahmaviharas, but there's much more particularity in the kinds of love. And the range is actually larger than what we tend to think of with the brahmaviharas, whose range is also quite wide because there are different flavors of metta, of course, and all that.

A fourth element or node in the imaginal constellation is eros. I've talked a lot about eros before, but I won't go into it much, just mentioning it here. Again, it's something we can notice, tune into, and that noticing and tuning into ignites it further, and then that can trigger the rest of the lattice, take us further into the imaginal, deeper into the more authentically, fully imaginal place.

And we also said, for example, being in relationship with the whole of my energy body and the sensitivity of the energy body is likely to support eros opening rather than craving. And the dissolution of craving is going to support the opening of eros. So eros feels like an opening. It also opens. It opens the imaginal.

We've been through all this on other retreats, so I'm not going to go into it much now. But all this presupposes that I'm able to notice eros, that I'm actually familiar with the experience of eros. Again, I'm not going to delineate everything that's involved in the experience of eros—we've done that before. But that also may take some practice. Like, oh, this is eros present. How do I recognize eros? Am I familiar with it? And then I can kind of hone in on it more, open up to it more, allow it more—all that supports that particular element or aspect or node.

So eros is very important in distinction to craving. As I said, craving is a contraction and it contracts, it limits and contracts the possibility of soul-making. Eros is more of an opening and it opens all the dimensions of the possibilities of soul-making. It's really that that makes a difference here.

But I've also talked about a fifth element: beauty—a sense of beauty as an aspect of the imaginal constellation. But just like love, the range of beauty that we can feel touched by and feel open to is huge. So oftentimes, like with love, we tend to kind of box in a little too narrowly our sense of what qualifies as beautiful, or what beauty is, what it looks like or sounds like. There's a huge range here.

Be surprised at the range that beauty can have for us, our sense of beauty, the things that we can find beautiful. And again, I've talked quite a bit about beauty and written about it recently, so I'm not going to go into it here much. But just to mention that it's again a factor, if you like—a node, an element, an aspect that we can tune to, begin to resonate with, be touched by, open to, appreciate, enjoy. And in the fullness of that, that node comes deeper and more fully alive, and that can trigger the other nodes to come alive and the fullness of the authentically imaginal.

Now, I really have lost track of the numbers, which is a good thing, because as I said earlier, if there are numbers here to the elements of this list, don't take them too seriously, or too rigidly, or too tightly at all. You'll see that these elements kind of reflect each other, blend into each other, and are not that discrete. Some of them are obviously not discrete; others are interconnected anyway.

But I think it might be number five, number six—and this is a sense of what I call dimensionality. It's a little hard to describe, but this dimensionality is almost as if a thing is not just flat. It has other depths, if you like, or there's more to it. And those dimensions kind of recede or proceed into a sense—they shade into a sense at some point of divinity.

Again, I've talked quite a bit about divinity here in the last few retreats, so I'm not going to say too much, but it's a mysterious word, isn't it? What do you really mean when you say divinity? And this is, again, one of those words that I would deliberately not put in too tight a box, because by its nature, it won't fit there. And in addition, there are infinite possibilities for the experience of divinity. We could, and I have, delineated certain common elements, if you like, of experiences of divinity. But actually, I would say, there are infinite possibilities. There is not one experience of the divine. Once we get into imaginal practice, infinite experiences we can have of divinity.

So it's a word that's mysterious in a number of different ways, but for me it feels like a very important word. And actually for most people who experience imaginal practice and get the flavor of it and get into it and get the sense of it, all this makes sense. So it feels like, yes, that is the right word. I might never have used that word before, or really related to it much, but there's kind of no other word for this sense I have of this imaginal figure, or this way that I'm sensing this thing in my life, or this person, or whatever. It has a sense of dimensionality, of multiple dimensions to it. They may not be clear, and that dimensionality shades into a kind of sense of divinity.

So the sense of divinity also implies a kind of infinity, or kinds of infinity itself. In other words, the word divinity to me implies that we can never exhaust it, we can never fully fathom it. So it's related to the unfathomability of objects as well—of imaginal figures and objects and of things, that which is perceived when we are sensing with soul, that which is sensed with soul.

The divinity means that I can't reduce this, or it feels like this perception, this sense of whatever it is, is not reducible to X or Y, or "it is this," or "I sum it up," or "I box it in," or "I understand it now." There's always going to be more. There's always going to be more dimensions, more depths, more heights, if you like, more beyond what I can either capture with my intellect or even fully experience. So there's always an infinite and beyond element to an experience of the divine.

But—and again, I've been through this before, but I'll say it briefly now—that beyond is not, I would say, especially when we get into imaginal practice of sensing the soul, by definition, the beyondness of the divine is not only beyond appearances. In other words, it's not only the transcendent, unfabricated, the fading of experiences. Nor is it a beyond in that it's always lighter or more ethereal. It's somehow in, with, through, as the appearance itself.

So yes, there is a sense of a divinity—we've talked about this before—a kind of divinity that is beyond the appearance, with the fading of the appearance, so revealing the essence of a thing, we might say. But there is also, in the particularities of this appearance, an immanent divinity that has still a beyondness to it, and an infinity to it.

Both the notions of dimensionality—or if we say depths, or heights, or supernality in some traditions, the supernal, I mean the heavenly—both notions of dimensionality and of divinity make some people very nervous, understandably, because of some of the history associated with such concepts and the kind of metaphysics involved. But particularly the implications for valuing—what is of value and what is of more value and what is of less value, and what is considered more real and less real.

So these two aspects—valuing and real—are tied up, or at least historically were very much tied up, with notions of dimensionality and divinity. And many people felt that this sort of entrenched Western religions would value the deep or the high or the transcendent over the immediate, the material, the superficial, and sometimes exclusively valuing one over the other with great cost to all kinds of aspects of our existence. And also valuing of the divine over the human, and then this had a reaction with humanism and scientific materialism.

But to me it's actually not that simple. It's quite interesting, not that simple. I would like to say that perhaps, in terms of the question of what's real, perhaps we can think of this notion of dimensionality and to a certain extent even of divinity, as not so much a question of more real. So it's not an ontological assessment. This is deeper, this is therefore more real. When we get a sense of depth in some perception or pertaining to some figure or something that we're sensing—

Rather than making an ontological claim, this becomes simply an epistemological one. When we speak of depth, we mean something that is harder to sense - requiring the instrument of perception to be opened, tuned, and prepared with greater care. What we call "deeper" or "more obscure" or "less obvious" demands this heightened sensitivity rather than being inherently more real or valuable.

Instead of asserting ontological distinctions about reality, we acknowledge that these dimensions we sometimes feel graced to perceive require more refined attunement. The nodes of the imaginal lattice must be empowered and activated to enable this sensing of dimensionality, which may be felt obscurely at times and more specifically at others.

Regarding value, I would say that greater dimensionality does encompass increased value, but precisely because these dimensions don't devalue the immediate, the apparent, the form, or the material. We're simply not viewing the material through a reductive lens that dismisses it as purely unholy or mere illusion.

When we speak of deeper dimensionality, higher dimensionality, or divinity, we're not asserting ontological priority - that these are more real, or that only the divine beyond is real while appearances are not. To avoid making such ontological assertions is somewhat unusual. It's also to say, from another perspective, that divinity is neither real nor unreal.

This may sound mysterious and challenging for those accustomed to discussions of divinity that involve assertions about hierarchies of reality. They might wonder: How can it have power, value, or meaningfulness for the soul if you're not claiming it's real or more real? How can something that is neither real nor unreal possess such significance?

Yet it can and does have power, value, and meaning for the soul. Those familiar with emptiness teachings understand this middle way - neither real nor unreal - and the beauty and transformative capacity this understanding opens. We can apply this same principle here through what we might call the middle way of the imaginal, which is related but distinct.

This sense of divinity that moves us so profoundly, that bestows and gives and opens, carrying implicit value within it - this divinity we sense as neither real nor unreal in the conventional sense. Wonderful. Beautiful.

Perceiving, imagining, or sensing with soul involves some conception, whether clear or obscure, of the sacred or divine nature and origin of an imaginal image or whatever perceptions are involved. These are not conceived merely as results of personal human history - arising because of some past experience - unless that very human history is also understood as an expression, manifestation, or journey of the divine. In this case, any image representing or recalling such memory also partakes of divinity, having its origin in the divine.

Nor are these images simply the result of random brain activity or contingent responses to sensory input. The valuing permeates everything - it's not separate from appearance itself.

Related to this aspect of divinity - whether we count dimensionality and divinity as one element or separate them into two - comes what we might call our seventh element: grace. Grace is intimately connected to the sense of divinity.

Grace carries this quality of being given something, of receiving. The image, the perception, the sense of beauty and divinity - all of this comes from divinity. The divinity itself, its beauty, its very appearance and experience are sensed as gift, as given.

This differs from mere luck, which implies random occurrence. Grace suggests some divinity or greater dimension bestowing something upon us - not through fortunate chance, nor through our clever engineering of circumstances. Neither of these would constitute grace.

There's this sense of gift, of receiving, of grace. It's a beautiful word that carries something inexplicable within it. No matter how much preparation we've undertaken, there's always an element of surprise in opening to an image - always this quality of "What a gift!"

Who would have imagined this? Who would have foreseen such a thing? There's something inexplicable, a mystery there—and a sense of being, as I said, given something, receiving something from some dimension, some divinity bigger, greater, beyond ourselves and beyond our capacities, our machinations, our ken. And with all that, with that kind of gift, there's a sense of beneficence, of the goodwill and bounty of something pouring down on us, visiting us, being given to us.

So that's another element or node aspect of the imaginal we can tune into. Very related to that is perhaps an eighth, depending on how we're counting—and I've mentioned this one before very briefly on retreat: reverence.

Reverence, obviously related to grace and divinity. Reverence, as I think I pointed out when I previously mentioned it, is from a Latin word that means to be in awe of. So again, this sense of something that's beyond us, beyond our ken.

And reverence is, for some people, a strange word, or it's a word that has associations of perhaps stiffness, or a sense of should—"reverend, you should be reverent, you should be respectful." Like we're being told by authorities or elders to be reverent, with a sense of should and stiffness.

What I mean—the sense of reverence itself, when it's authentically experienced—is something very beautiful. It's something that has a pliability to it. The soul and the heart are pliable. And again, here we have reverence itself as a composite. Like grace and other things that we'll come to, it involves the heart. The heart feels reverence. It involves the soul—it's more than the heart. And it's also a kind of concept. There's a concept involved, again, of something to which we feel awe, something bigger, greater, beyond us.

We can feel that reverence in the body. We feel it in the energy body—the pliability, a certain softening perhaps, a certain opening, a certain energizing. Very beautiful quality.

Where there is eros, and where there's the imaginal perception, where there's the erotic imaginal perception, and eros is allowed to do its thing in inseminating, fertilizing the eros psychologos dynamics of the soul-making—where there's the erotic imaginal, reverence is implied there, reverence is included there. It's part of, if you like, certainly the subjective pole of the imaginal constellation. An attitude, a poise, a stance, an opening in reverence—something very lovely.

And if we go on to our list related to that, this kind of constellation—you see how closely related and interconnected and overlapping, actually, a lot of these elements are. But still, I feel it's really important to draw them out and discern between them and draw attention to them.

So this next one—ninth or ninth and tenth, depending on how you're counting: humility and also bowing. And again, they're related.

So humility is another word that can be kind of loaded for us in our culture. Or we get a little bit narrow and stuck in a certain range of meaning or a certain stiffness in relation to what it means or what it looks like. So we certainly do not mean by humility any kind of self-shaming or self-blaming or self-punishing or anything that's kind of life-denying. Some people, even if they don't consciously think that's what humility means, it has those kind of echoes, perhaps from the past or dimly from some cultural associations that we have with us.

Certainly not what we mean with that. Humility goes with reverence for the other or the imaginal object and for the self. Again, the imaginal constellation spreads over self, over other, self and world. So there's reverence, not just for the other, but to the self. Humility goes with reverence to the self. There is respect and reverence for the self included in our humility. Do you understand?

We tend to think humble and we tend to think of a sort of belittling of the self, some people. But actually there's reverence for the self in the very experience of humility in the face of another, or towards another.

This participation of the self with another through humility reveals something even deeper. For humility implies and involves a profound and wonderful participation of the self in the other, in the imaginal object, in the cosmos, in existence, in God. We'll return to this notion of participation - it's a crucial but subtle point.

Humility doesn't create alienation; rather, it implies a kind of participation. I'm included in what I am humble towards. I somehow mysteriously and deeply participate in that theophany or that divinity, that beauty in relation to which I feel humble. Again, this goes with grace and with a sense of meaningfulness.

These can be tricky words for us - humility may be one of them for some. This difficulty is partly cultural and historical. Often in the West, with secular modernism and the ethos that dominates our culture, we sometimes lack the humility found in other cultures or periods. Instead, we carry a kind of arrogance.

There's a sense that we can do everything, that everything depends on me. If we want something, we can rearrange it, fix it. We can master nature through technology - that rapidly growing impetus and movement and desire, perhaps addiction, to master and control everything, to make everything dependent on us, on our will.

While this brings beauty and gifts and help, the lack of humility that sometimes accompanies secular modernism is also tied to a kind of existential alienation and unrootedness of the self. So the self feels less humble, more powerful, if you like. But simultaneously, it feels this existential alienation, this unrootedness, and the abyss of what's supposed to be the ultimately real meaninglessness of existence. This forms an existential abyss of unrootedness.

You can make up meanings or arrange your life to give it meaning, but at the bottom of it all, we're living in a meaningless cosmos. This abyss of existential meaninglessness and alienation, this unrootedness, becomes the flip side or the wages of this lack of humility. They very much go together - this presumed ultimately real meaninglessness of one's existence, struggles, life, and choices.

At first glance, the humility of another culture, whether past or present elsewhere in the world, might look to us less powerful. But again, it has a flip side. Someone embedded in that culture might truly have a sense we lack - of much deeper, wider, and more intimate belonging, and of meaningfulness to their lives that we sometimes don't possess in our dance with what can be a lack of humility.

Such cultures offer an embeddedness in the cosmos, a significance and value of the self, of one's life, choices, actions, and duties. Sometimes this is harder to achieve within the cosmic picture we currently hold. I'm not suggesting a primitivist return to other cultures, but can we bring awareness to this and find ways to open up so that we can cultivate a beautiful humility that gives us gifts without completely sacrificing technology?

How can we move forward, not backward, to receive a more healthy, soulful sense and perspective of the self and cosmos? How can we progress toward that?

Humility is implicit in the imaginal constellation - implicit in our sense of the images' or imaginal figures' autonomy, which we'll return to, in the non-reductive, non-reducible nature of the image, in reverence, unfathomability, divinity, and dimensionality. You could say humility emerges from this; it's implicit in all of that.

If we can notice it, tune to it, allow it, and open to it, we can draw it out, amplify that node, encourage it, and perhaps even ignite it further. This ignites the whole mode.

I mentioned bowing as well, and this is deeply intertwined with this sense of divinity, grace, reverence, and humility. Bowing, for me, is a profoundly beautiful stance or poise or movement of being - a movement of devotion.

By bowing, I don't mean just a physical gesture, though it may be, or it may look different from what we typically think a bow looks like. Something in the being is moved - and it may not even manifest as physical movement - in reverence, in surrender, in orientation to that sense of sacredness, in giving oneself to something.

Bowing is not merely a gesture. It's also not simply accepting - "I bow to my fate" or "I bow to this illness." It's not just about acceptance. It includes a sense of the sacredness of what one is bowing to, and implicit in this is the unfathomability of what one is bowing to.

Humility can be, for some people, a slightly awkward word or one with tricky connotations, even if these operate subtly in the field, in the aura or cloud of the word and what it might mean for us. But as we're using it, humility doesn't preclude empowerment. Because I feel humble doesn't mean I'm disempowered. It might mean I feel great empowerment in all kinds of ways.

Empowerment and humility can coexist in the experience of an image, just as they can coexist in life - in our relations with others and with events and the cosmos. But this is only possible if neither the humility nor the empowerment is identified with.

Only if neither the humility nor the empowerment is identified with. So again, this kind of imaginal middle way is necessary so that we don't take on the identity of the humble one and reify that as who we are and really believe that—or the empowered one or whatever.

But one of the points here is humility doesn't always look or feel how we typically think it looks or feels. So humility, even grace for some people, these kinds of words are often loaded for us, and they can mean different things and be loaded in different ways, depending on our past conditioning with such words.

But in imaginal practice, or with sensing with soul, these words and these attitudes—humility, grace, reverence, etc., bowing—the words and the attitudes to which they refer, they need to not be too self-weighted, too heavy with self, too focused on self, and certainly not on heavy concepts like sin and the sin of the self and all that kind of heavy, contracted, dense and tight fabrication of self-sense and self-story.

You could say these kinds of words, humility and reverence and the rest, and the dispositions that they refer to, occupy a certain region of the spectrum of self-fabrication. In other words, too much tight, dense, solid self-fabrication in association with those words, and we've lost the imaginal. Outside of that region of at least slightly lighter self-fabrication, the imaginal perception, the sensing with soul, won't work and won't be fruitful.

Let me say one last thing as a general point about this cluster of notions—humility, bowing, reverence, grace. If they are involved in soul-making and imaginal practice, as I'm saying they are, when they are involved with soul-making, they will themselves get caught up as objects of the soul-making dynamic, of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic.

And so the very sense, the very experience and the very idea of, for example, humility will expand, will stretch, will break open and be reconstituted larger. As we have explained about the whole process, the whole way the eros-psyche-logos dynamic works, when anything comes into its vortex, into its orbit, when anything is caught up, subsumed, involved, implicated in it, then it comes alive as an object of soul-making. The eros-psyche-logos dynamic goes to work on that object itself.

Our sense, our idea, our experience of humility—of what that means to us, of what that can be to us, of what it looks like, of what its range is—similarly with bowing and the rest of them, will itself become image. Humility becomes an imaginal object and an object of eros. We start to have an erotic relationship with the humility that we are experiencing or that we glimpse. You understand? And the whole thing gets infused and ignited itself.

Again, we don't reject delineations in this whole conceptual framework that we're unfolding. We don't reject delineations and concepts and try to just open and be non-conceptual or whatever. But we use definitions and use delineations from some starting point—wherever you are, wherever that is for an individual at the moment, in your sense of "this is what humility means."

And then that quality, humility or whatever it is, can develop because it gets stretched, it gets expanded, it gets busted open, it gets worked, deepened, widened by the soul-making dynamic. The quality can develop because we're practicing it and because we're allowing it and opening to it, but then it gets a whole other kind of gear of opening and development of the image and the idea of that very quality of, say, humility or reverence.

And as with all soul-making, it's potentially infinite. What's the range, what's the limit of what that word can be and mean and feel and be experienced as by us? Like the rest of the soul-making dynamics, it's potentially infinite—its range, its depth, its subtlety, its nuances, the individual shadings and delineations we start to make within humility, as well as our relationship with it. And that gets all opened up.

So like everything else in imaginal work and soul-making work, we make delineations, but those delineations we make don't get dissolved or erased. The twonesses that we make—humility and non-humility, or whatever—don't collapse or melt into a oneness only, although we can be conscious of the dimension of unity pervading everything. But rather in imaginal practice, in soul-making work, the delineations and the twonesses are mostly retained, but they have soft and elastic edges so they can expand, they can be stretched—whether we're talking about the twoness of self and object or self and imaginal object or self and other, self and world, or just the twonesses of delineating between concepts.

So we introduce some of these words, like humility, and they might sound a little awkward or unfamiliar. We're just not really used to that kind of word, or that kind of stance, perhaps. And we're not really familiar with it. We don't get a flavor of it yet. We haven't got a flavor of it yet. But as we practice with it, we start to notice that we get more familiar with it. We start to amplify it. We start to feel more comfortable with it. It starts to grow and develop.

And then once it becomes itself an object of eros, once it itself becomes imaginal—when we have an imaginal image of this humility, of this bowing, of this poise, whatever it is—then there's an even greater development, potentially infinite development of the depth and the breadth and the complications and the nuances of what can be involved for us in that very word humility. But we start where we are. We start where we are and it grows from there just through the attention, through the care, through the gentle and subtle entering into the practice and responsiveness.

So I think—I've lost count, but I think a tenth on our list is trust. I've mentioned it briefly as we ran through the list, and I've talked about it on previous retreats, I think, the Path of the Imaginal, perhaps other retreats.

Sometimes what happens with images is that we might have a sense of clearly good beings nurturing us, and this feels genuinely helpful. But then perhaps other characters enter the image, and they seem to be destroying or attacking or wiping out what we thought were the good guys—clearly they must be the bad guys.

One option in imaginal practice is to intervene imaginatively, supporting the good guys against the bad guys. But it may also be that there's again a deeper intelligence working. What seems problematic or dark, what appears pathological, may have a deeper intelligence to it, a deeper wisdom and necessity.

So what if I simply move back into a mode of witnessing that destruction of the apparently good guys by the apparently bad guys? I witness it, resonate with it, feel the pathos of it, and sense in the soul what that does. I sense in the energy body what that does.

Again, we can use the sense of the energy body being aligned, energized, opened, harmonized. This is a very good indicator that we're on the right track. My mind doesn't get this—it was all very nice with the good guys, now the bad guys have come and they're destroying everything. But if the energy body is saying "yes," if there's a sense of opening and expansion and beauty coming through this, then I trust that. I trust that there's something here that my conventional thinking doesn't understand.

Sometimes what we call "dark" imaginal figures or images are actually serving the soul in ways that we don't comprehend with our usual thinking. They may be destroying something that needs to be destroyed, or initiating us into some necessary wisdom, or breaking open some structure that has become too rigid.

This trust—this willingness to suspend our usual judgments about good and bad, about what should be happening—is fundamental to imaginal practice. It's a trust in the deeper intelligence of the psyche, in the soul's own wisdom about what it needs for its unfoldment.

kind of taking over from the good guys, somehow my energy body just is getting more harmonized and more open as that happens. I can trust it even if my mind doesn't get it. You understand?

Or sometimes there are deeper than just the mind's superficial conventional objections and fears, there's a sense of the soul-making and the resonances and the meaningfulness. We don't completely understand it, but it feels somehow right. It's touching us and resonating with the soul deeply.

Let me offer one last element for now—number eleven on our list, though again, it depends how you count: duty. I mentioned it before, and it's something I've talked about quite a bit, certainly on the Path of the Imaginal retreat. To me, this is really important as well. It's another aspect of the imaginal constellation and indeed of any soul-making experience—a sense of duty that the soul feels.

It has a duty. It's not always clear what that duty is or how it should manifest. I've explored this before: whether it needs to be literal, whether it needs to be concretized, whether it needs to be an obvious translation or something much more subtle, whether it needs to be just purely internal—through the reverence, through the bowing, through the respect and humility. So I won't go into that again, but I will point out that, as I said, it's always an aspect of the relationship with the imaginal object, the imaginal figure, and indeed of any soul-making experience.

Even, for instance, when what's happening to constitute a soul-making experience is not so much an image, but just an idea, or a framework that has expanded—our whole logos, or conceptual framework, or just an individual idea. We have a new idea, and we can feel the importance of it. It's new. Something's expanded in my whole conceptual framework just by the introduction of this new idea. It might be something about anything—about the cosmos, or about the nature of God, or the nature of self, or soul.

Or it might be the expansion into a new way of looking. It might be even the perception of a level of oneness that is relatively new, as an expansion for me, or a state of consciousness—for example, a jhana that's relatively new. But when it feels soul-making, somehow, and often vaguely, we feel at some level a sense of duty—for instance, to explore it further, to consolidate it.

So if I've perceived that oneness, there's somewhere in the being a sense of: I need to go into this more, I need to open to it more, I've got a duty to consolidate it, make it part of my life, let it or support it to actually influence and guide or undergird my everyday life, my choices, my values. What would it be for this new idea, this new conceptual framework, this new way of looking, this new perception—whether of cosmic oneness of some kind, or just this state, this jhana that I've glimpsed, this remarkable state, the third jhana, utterly remarkable—what does it imply about my life? What does it imply about how to live and what to choose and what's important and what's valuable? And how can I bring that in so that it really flows in and informs and supports and grounds my life, my existence, my orientation?

Somehow, I feel that we vaguely, even when there's no obvious image involved, when there's soul-making involved in any way—it's different with imaginal figures, but still the same—there's some kind of duty that we feel. At the very least, not to forget it. At the very least, not to forget it.

So again, I would say that's an aspect, an element, a node of the imaginal relationship—again, more of the subjective pole. It may be also an objective correlate or a correlate in the imaginal object, in the imaginal figure.

But let's stop there for now.

CHAPTER 107

Aspects of the Imaginal (Part 5)

Rob Burbea · 1h22

> In this fifth installment of exploring aspects of the imaginal, Rob Burbea examines three crucial elements of authentic imaginal practice. He begins with "fullness of intention," emphasizing that genuine imaginal work serves soul-making rather than personal growth, requiring practice "for the sake of divinity" rather than the self. This intention encompasses more than just passion or emotional intensity—it includes the full eros-psyche-logos dynamic that extends understanding and brings dimensionality.
>
> Burbea then discusses the autonomy of both the imaginal other and the practitioner, exploring how imaginal perception preserves twoness rather than collapsing into oneness. Using examples from his own practice on Dartmoor, he illustrates how images maintain their independence while remaining in relationship. This connects to fundamental questions about free will versus determinism, showing how soul-making requires both the givenness of what comes from soul and our freedom to respond.
>
> The talk concludes with "indefinite boundaries"—how imaginal objects have soft, elastic edges that fade into unfathomability. Unlike material perception with its apparent sharp boundaries, imaginal perception involves infinite echoing and mirroring between image and life, creating meaningfulness that includes specific meanings while remaining open to unlimited interpretation. This element reveals how personhood, whether of imaginal figures or beloved humans, cannot be reduced to singular meanings but maintains inexhaustible depth.

All right, if we continue with our list of elements and aspects of the imaginal and of sensing the soul—and I think you'll probably almost certainly have gotten the sense by now that you should take my counting of the elements on this list with a large grain of salt—I think this is number twelve, depending on how you count and how you slice things up. So number twelve. I'm not quite sure what to call this, but let's call it "fullness of intention" for now.

Now this is related—you'll hear—to many of the previous elements. In fact, they're all related, but this one is more obviously related to many of the previous elements: grace, reverence, humility, divinity, duty, and so forth. In a way, we could say that it's perhaps implicit in the fullness of the meaning of those elements, but we want to draw it out. I think it's helpful and worthwhile to draw it out as something standing on its own—or rather, separate it out as if it were standing on its own, when it's not.

The reason I'm choosing to speak again about drawing out and delineating these lists is partly just in response to what has come back to us so far in terms of what we hear people not quite understanding, or things they've heard but perhaps weren't clear about, or they forgot or overlooked. So this choice of going through the list in this way is basically a response to the sense we're getting from people who are working with this material. And partly, as I said, it's helpful to draw these elements out because it will contribute to our understanding, but also our sensitivity and discernment, and also to the art of practice and our kind of finesse there—our subtlety, our art.

So number twelve: fullness of intention. Now this itself has two parts or two aspects or two dimensions. It's interesting—as I was reflecting on it, I don't know that this is something that we so much notice, and in the noticing of it, it ignites the other factors. But it's something that we may be able to focus on as we're working, or working with an image, or with a certain sensing of soul, and then kind of wiggle it, jiggle it a little bit—open up or bolster it or deepen this dimension of filling out the intention, letting the intentionality fill out. So it might be more that an activity is implied in this node rather than just a sort of noticing it. That may be the case.

So, two aspects of this, two parts. And the first is—well, they're both actually relative to the subjective pole. In other words, my part of the relationship or attitude to the imaginal figure, the imaginal object, the perception that I'm sensing with soul. It may be, as we get really deep into this, that one perceives it's actually also an element of the object itself, of the objective pole of the relationship, of the imaginal constellation.

But this first part of this fullness of intention—and I've mentioned it already—is that my relationship or attitude... the intention there is not primarily, not primarily in the service of my growth, my spiritual growth, my empowerment or whatever it is, my psychological growth, my healing even, or my psycho-spiritual process. It may be that that intention is mixed in there. It certainly is the case that these kinds of things will be endemic. They will grow with the imaginal. They are gifts of the imaginal relationship as it deepens. But the intention is not primarily in the service of that. It's not primarily for my growth, my empowerment, my psychological or spiritual process, my healing.

So I mentioned this before, but it's quite radical. It's quite rare as well. People often use certain language, but when you just ask a little bit or hear a bit more what their relationship really is, it often is in the service of self-growth. And it can be a bit almost baffling to the modern mind often to conceive of some other kind of intention in this regard.

So again, I don't want to overwhelm you or have you feel like, "Well, the bar is just set so high here for what you're talking about, Rob. I don't know if I've ever come close to that." There is a natural evolution in practicing with images and bringing all this to bear, so that even if this particular piece feels like, "Hmm, I'm not there yet," or "I don't think that's really the case for me"—remember, there's a spectrum. There's a spectrum of skillful uses of the imagination, and it kind of gets more and more into what we might call the fully or authentically imaginal. So we're on that spectrum, and we're just interested in encouraging the movement to that fuller, more genuine, more authentic end.

And there is a natural evolution. In other words, if we begin to love this kind of practice, this kind of work, if we begin to start to understand some of the ideas and begin to work with it in practice, there will be a natural evolution over time towards the intentionality being primarily for soul-making. Soul-making is the primary intention for engaging with the imaginal, in relationship with the imaginal other, the imaginal figure, in sensing with soul. Soul-making is the primary intention.

Another way of putting that—and I think I did focus on this in some talks at the beginning of the Re-enchanting the Cosmos retreat—is practicing for the sake of God, for the sake of divinity, not for myself. And we can easily adopt that phrase, but actually a genuine opening or shift or deepening or filling out of the intention is actually quite rare. So, so beautiful. And so transformative, in fact. But as I said, there is a natural evolution. If we get into it, eventually something in all this works its magic and that becomes the primary intention, the primary reason why we're doing all this. And there are lots of other gifts too.

But the primary reason is the soul loves soul-making. And we love that and we want that almost, in fact, more than anything else. We're practicing for the sake of God, in the service of the God, in the service of divinity, in the service of Buddha nature.

Okay, so that's the first part of this fullness of intention. That this is not primarily for me and my process and my growth or whatever it is.

The second part is kind of related, but it's to say that the intention in being for soul-making is more than just an intention for heartfulness or for passionate living. So sometimes people... I sometimes get the sense that a person has elevated those qualities and either mistaken them for soulfulness or just kind of fixated on those qualities in their life as being of paramount importance in the way that they relate to organize their life or their practice or what they select out from what's most meaningful to them in the world, in relationships, in stories, etc.

So what we mean here is if the intention is for soul-making, it's more than just for the sake of a rich and deep and intense emotional life, beautiful and lovely as that is and beneficial as that is. It's more than just a kind of elevation of feeling passionate or passionate engagement. Again, necessary, beautiful, lovely and fruitful as that is. It's more also than only a wanting of eros, or eros only, in the kind of small sense, in the sense of, "I like this feeling of eros, I like the juiciness, I like the fire, I like the engagement, I like the passion, I like the aliveness of it, and the buzz and all that," in the small sense.

Eros in the big sense, if you remember back to the talks, we explained this in quite a lot of depth. If eros is allowed to do its thing fully, it automatically inseminates, involves, fertilizes, extends the psyche and the logos and lots of other things too. And so then we can talk about eros in the big sense as an element of that larger and more involved dynamic that does involve psyche, does involve logos, etc.

If the intention is just for the buzz of aliveness and the juiciness and the fire of eros in its more isolated sense, without it really including the range of what is impregnated and catalyzed in the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, then that too is not full enough of intention. And certainly not a desire just for sex. Or, again, if it's a desire for the pleasure, the delight in the soul-making and the eros. Again, it's not full enough. Or a desire for an intention for fascinating images. It's endlessly fascinating, like what might come up. Great, wonderful, extremely rich, bountiful things. Certainly interesting, but in itself, it's too small as an intention, finally.

So the intention for soul-making in a more fuller sense includes all that, what we've just been through: emotion, passion, eros in its smaller sense, pleasure, delight, fascinating images, all that. But it also includes eros in the larger sense, which includes logos in terms of understanding. Something is being pushed on and extended and enriched and deepened and complicated in the understanding, that whole dynamic, with all that sense of dimensionality and divinity, all that.

In other words, eros in its small sense, for example, a fascinating image, might not be so pregnant with that sense of dimensionality and divinity and really all the elements that we're talking about. So sometimes people, again, it's slightly personality style, it's slightly a cultural sort of influence or conditioning, but sometimes people love the eros, love the images, and kind of forget a little bit about the logos, where it doesn't yet quite land and open as something really important and really fertile aspect of the whole dynamic or fertile dimension of soul.

Logos, in the sense of understanding, conception, the stretching, the enriching of that, is itself an aspect of soul. We love that logoistic element of soul-making as much, eventually, as we love any of the other aspects: the delight, the eros, the vitality, the juiciness, etc.

And I've also said in some other talks, I think it was primarily on Eros Unfettered, that the logos is also important for balancing and stabilizing with the images and intense energy and all that. That conceptual structure, having a conceptual structure that's actually adequate, can bring a lot of wisdom into the proceedings and understand how to attenuate things or respond to things or what to emphasize, what to seek out, etc. But also in itself provides, in its structure, balance and stability.

So in this second part of this fullness of intention, we're not limiting what we're aiming for. It's bigger, it's wider, it's more inclusive than just those more limited elements, wonderful as they might be and kind of vitalizing as they may be. All of them that we went through—emotion, emotionality, passion, eros in the small sense, pleasure, delight, fascinating images, whatever—they are all, in one way or another, elements of soul-making or subsidiary to soul-making, if you like. Sometimes very obviously, sometimes a little bit obliquely or more obscurely or less concretely.

I'll throw one more thing in there, because it may be—or I'm wondering, it may be—however, as a qualification to what I just have been through, maybe that the desire for one of these elements, for instance, passion... So one can become kind of passionate about passion and interested in it and seek it out. And if the desire for one of those elements, those sort of subsidiary elements, I wonder if that particular desire is allowed and pursued with intelligence, intelligently pursued and fully pursued, whether it itself won't inevitably open up to the other aspects of soul-making and naturally evolve into a more full intentionality for the fullness of soul-making.

Do you understand? It's one thing. The soul's got hold of one thing. Let's say it's passion, and it's enamored with passion, and it's interested in passion. And if it follows that interest, and that connection, and that desire for passion, and inquires into, what is it that allows me to have a fuller passion, if that's what I want? I'm on the arrow of desire, but I'm pursuing it with intelligence, with rigor, in fact. And allowing and riding that, but inquiring into what allows it, what allows passion to be full and rich and multidimensional and multidirectional and all of that.

And eventually the passion itself, that singular arrow, will open up in the whole field of soul-making. At least I'm wondering if that's the case, and I have a strong suspicion that it is. But in itself, it may well be too limited. And an aspect of, let's say, the more fully imaginable, that end of the spectrum, is this fullness of intention in those two parts that we said.

So that would be number twelve, I think.

Number 13, roughly, autonomy, the autonomy of the imaginal other, the imaginal object. Now, I've talked a lot about this. I think it was right from the beginning in Theatre of Selves and things like that, and I keep stressing it.

So, to me this is very interesting. Actually, this number 13 is autonomy and twoness, but two things we've talked about before, the twoness much more in the last couple of retreats, but autonomy and twoness. So, what does that mean? It means that the imaginal figure or the object, the other perceived, sensed with soul, if it's something in our material world or another in our material world, has an autonomy. It's independent of me. We get a sense of it. It's not kind of a part of me or an aspect of me. I can't reduce it to that.

This is interesting in a number of ways. One is that, in the way I would like to lay out the whole logos of this work, we never lose sight of the fact that any perception, including an imaginal perception, an imaginal other, whatever it is, is anything other than a dependent arising. All perception is sensing with soul or imaginal or regular material perception, whatever it is, in the mind, it's all a dependent arising. So somehow acknowledging the dependent arising of things, and that's a kind of unshakable base of the larger logos that I would put out there. But somehow within that, we get a sense of the independence of this thing.

So again here we have, right in this notion of autonomy, we have a kind of straddling or bridging of two apparently contradictory attitudes, understandings, relationships. On the one hand, we see its dependent arising. On the other, we sense or feel it or allow it to manifest to us as independent. You could say the way of looking and the way of conceiving grants the imaginal other or the object sensed with soul a sense of autonomy and independence. It doesn't feel right or true to just reduce it to an aspect or a part of me or my psychology. It's not reducible.

Extending that a little bit, we could say that this autonomy, when it's allowed its fullness of autonomy, what it really means is we begin to recognize and become alive to the personhood of the imaginal figure. Or the personhood of anything we are perceiving, sensing with soul. It could be a tree, it could be a piece of land, it could be my own body. And we think, well, that's a part of me. But actually, once we get into sensing our own body with soul, the body itself begins to have its own intelligence, its own agency, its own intention, its own soul. You understand? So we're entering what I've talked about before on other retreats. We're talking about the autonomy within the intersubjective field. An intersubjective field. Two subjects get established or filled out. Me and the imaginal other.

So it's as if there's a sense of respect for and a sensitivity to and a relationship between two souls there. So this is of course related to this twoness that we've been talking about on a couple of recent retreats and emphasizing. Sensing with soul, imaginal perception does not, for the most part, for the most part, does not collapse things or dissolve things or merge or melt things into oneness. There are exceptions to that. I've been through all this on recent retreats. But generally speaking, it doesn't do that. It preserves twoness. So imaginal perception, sensing with soul, preserves twoness.

Now there's a lot to this, but as an example, I was out for a walk on Dartmoor a few months ago, in fact, in the summer. And I'm walking on a lovely area there. And the image arose as I was walking of many, many kind of thick, muscular tentacles rising up from the earth that I was walking on, rising up, these thick, muscular tentacles, almost like giant reptilian sort of octopus tentacles. They're like a foot wide, each of them a foot wide, many, many of them, rising up to claim me, to capture me. One would think to suck me down would be the initial impulse, but really they were just rising up, countless of them, and densely covering the land, the Earth's surface, around me, at least.

Now, if we're not careful, this could be construed, such an image—and by the way, it was very, very delightful, very sort of rapturous image in both senses. It was very blissful in that sense, rapturous, but also sensed as a rapture, a seizing from the earth, but instead of the usual rapture, people tend to think it's up, it was down, down and earthy, rather than up and ethereal. But usually we might construe that kind of image out of dharma or spiritual habits or habitual teachings that we're used to as an image kind of indicating oneness or a move towards union, dissolution in the earth below, a kind of oneness emerging with that rather than with the spirit above.

Yes, we can see the difference—it's down and earthy rather than up and ethereal—but we might tend to suppose that it's an image portending or indicating or signaling or initiating union, movement towards oneness. But the image did not proceed forward in time to a dissolving union. And I've been through this before—imaginal images are most often not what I call narrative, moving in time, but iconic.

Again, there are many exceptions, but they are, if you like, almost static, eternal moments, despite the dynamism and energy implied in them or present in images such as this one. There's something timeless—I'm going to come back to this eternality of images later as an element on our list.

So if we see this image of the tentacles claiming me for what it is, rather than through the typical assumptions of union or dissolution or a kind of dharma that prioritizes that movement towards union, dissolution, fading, and so forth—that whole spectrum as the primary aim of spiritual endeavor—if we resist that temptation of the typical lenses, then you actually see that what stands out in this image is the twoness. It's the earth and me in relationship. There's relationship there. There's both twoness and eros, and there's not the dissolution, but twoness and eros are captured in or through the image.

There might be more than two, actually. There might be many, because I'm not sure now whether it was many or just the earth—many tentacles, many others, or just the earth. And also what's noticeable is the power of the autonomous desire of the earth, the eros of the earth. It was the earth's eros. In other words, there was two there. It—the earth, she, he, it—had its own eros. Its desire was autonomous, and that was also vividly sensed in the image. It was not my desire. There's two there. There's autonomy.

So eros, as I said, sustains twoness. Generally speaking, there are exceptions—I've been through it before. But more than that, eros and soul-making needs twoness. It needs two. It takes two for eros. It takes two to soul-make. And further—we've explained all this before—eros and soul-making will create and discover twonessess, othernesses, in an ongoing way. More and more twoness, more and more otherness. Eros needs to and also creates and discovers twonessess, othernesses, in an open-ended way.

Now, otherness is actually already a given of our existence. We sense othernesses. We sense otherness. There's a sense of self, there's a sense of other. Even if we know and perceive fundamental oneness—and one knows unshakably the fundamental oneness of all things and can have a vivid, palpable, deep, mystical sense of that oneness, at whatever level it is (there are different kinds of oneness, I've explained all this before)—it's still the case that phenomenally or phenomenologically, others appear to us. Otherness appears to us. Perception delineates othernesses. Otherwise we wouldn't be able to move in the world. We wouldn't know how to function. We wouldn't be able to operate anything. We wouldn't be able to go to the toilet. We wouldn't be able to eat. All that.

So perception delineates at a very basic level othernesses, otherness. This is already a given, an aspect of the way consciousness works and must work. But the thing about eros is that it creates and discovers—or eros, as it's allowed to catalyze and ignite this whole soul-making dynamic of eros, psyche, logos, and all that—will create and discover more othernesses.

This doesn't mean more distance, more alienation between self and other. It's not the same as unskillful fabrication, building more dukkha. But there will be an ongoing creation and discovery of more and more dimensions, more and more particulars, more and more images, more and more aspects within a beloved object, a thing, a being scented with soul.

We've been through all that before.

Now there's something I'd like to add here that perhaps I haven't emphasized so much before, so I want to draw that out. So autonomy and two-ness. There's the autonomy of the other, the autonomy of the imaginal other, the autonomy of the other sensed with soul. But also there is implicit in that, and worth drawing out, the autonomy of the self, the autonomy of the subject. In other words, here I am in this imaginal world, this perception, engaging in relationship with this imaginal other, but I also have some autonomy there.

So very often, and related to a lot of what we've said, even in this talk so far, the things that we perceive soulfully, when we sense with soul ourselves, our life, our circumstances, or some perception opens up, or an imaginal figure—all of that can seem, in the realm of soul-making, in the realm of soulfulness, that it is given, that it has a kind of necessity. So this imaginal figure—and I've talked a lot about this, again, I think right from the start—this sense of the necessity of this imaginal figure, even with all its seeming craziness or perhaps pathology or whatever it is, and I don't understand it fully or it puzzles me, it seems like soul is giving us something.

And this is related to these ideas about claim and duty. And even when we sense our lives and the elements of our life and the events of our life and the paths of our lives, sometimes we can get the sense of necessity there too. My illness, maybe, I don't know, my death. When we're sensing with soul, this is a face of, or a sense within that of being given something, of something being a necessity, and that it asks of us something. There's a claim there and duty.

But the other side there, balancing it, is that we are, in relation to imaginal objects and in relation to imaginal figures and whatever objects sensed with soul and whatever it is—we are free. At the same time as there's a necessity and something is given to us and we're just the recipients, we are also free to act, to choose, to intend, to steer, to adopt ways of looking and attitudes and thoughts, conceptions and conceptual frameworks, ideas that either move us deeper into the soul-making, or less, or this way, or that way.

So there's this curious kind of, again, straddling or balance between two views: the givenness, the necessity of what comes to us from soul, let's put it that way, and our freedom to steer, guide, enter into, hold a certain attitude, adopt a certain attitude, to choose, to intend. So this is something that—yeah, I think it's a very significant aspect of the whole soul-making business.

It's related a little bit, I want to linger on this just a little while, it's related a little bit to ethics, actually, and values. So I'll explain—I'll try to be brief, and I may well come back to this in the future, but I'll try to be brief now.

Implicit in or fundamental to the very possibility of ethics—in other words, just the whole idea of ethics, of right and wrong and choosing rightly or wrongly—fundamental and implicit to that is the perspective of the possibility of free will. No free will, the whole realm of philosophy of ethics is pointless. It's like human beings can't choose. So the perspective of the possibility of our free will is fundamental and implicit in the very possibility of any ethical discussion.

Because if everything, every response or feeling or intention, impulse is totally conditioned, if we solely adopt that view, that everything I think, all my responses—if I hate something, if I desire something, any feeling I have, all that is just conditioned from past history and present input from the environment and from others—if I just have that view, that everything is conditioned that way, then there can be no possibility of making ethical choices, right?

That's implicit when we hear ethical stories that move us, for instance. A beautiful passage from Viktor Frankl's Man's Search for Meaning, when he talks about being in Auschwitz, being in the concentration camps, and he says something—excuse me, I won't say it so well, but he says something like: we who lived through the camps, we remember those who had nothing, had almost nothing, who were sick and weary and in the same boat as we were. And yet they went around giving away their last piece of bread, comforting, consoling others. And they bear testament. Such acts that human beings are capable of bear witness to the fact that you can take everything away from a human being except their freedom to choose their own way. Whatever the circumstances are, there is that freedom. And the beauty of that—we can choose what is noble, what we value, we can choose what we feel deeply is right, and that can transcend any other concern in our life.

So I hope to come back to this area, as I said, but I just want to say a little bit now. So the question of free will versus determinism—it's kind of an open one, and I'll say a couple of things about that. All we can say at this point, I think, is that neither extreme view, that of complete determination or conditionality—everything is just conditioned, all my impulses, all my thoughts, all my feelings—or that of a total free will—I'm always completely free and I am the one who's solely responsible, I'm purely self-determined—I don't think we can at this point really say either of those is solely or ultimately true.

And in any particular situation, the exact balance, the exact mix or relationship of those inputs from, so to speak, the self and from, so to speak, conditions, is too complex to fathom. They are, however, therefore, both available to us—both these views, the view of self-determination, self-choice, and the view of conditionality—they're available to us separately as views, or together, kind of fused, if they're held lightly as perspectives. And there are also views that go beyond both of them.

So emptiness to me and no-self—that teaching doesn't stop at just "everything is just conditions, you're just a process of conditioned elements, conditioned from your past and conditioned from the environment. And so there's no self, there's no self-choice, there's no free will." Conditions too are empty. Any of those kind of dots or elements you might want to say are the conditioning factors, when probed, they are recognized to be empty too.

So there's a whole view even beyond these two. And people often get a little—I feel a little silly with this insistence that there's no such thing as free will. It's too extreme a view and it just doesn't bear honest, authentic introspection.

The idea or the view that there is no free will, that everything is dependent on conditions, is a skillful view to adopt at certain times. It can really help with blame, and I've talked and written about this before. It's a way of looking, skillful at times. At other times, the view of free will is skillful. They're kind of opposite, both true and both adoptable. So I think it's really important to bring some intelligence here and some actual honesty and discernment, actual clarity of seeing.

Sometimes you get certain spiritual schools or even within Buddhism that kind of lean way too much on this insistence that there is no free will. Not only is it a little short-sighted and not particularly intelligent, but it's also not very beautiful. It doesn't open up much beauty. Neither does it open up much soul-making potential, which is the connection I want to make.

Because, just like ethics, soul-making needs a perspective of the possibility, to some extent, of individual free will. And, at the same time, a view that, to some extent, regards the circumstance of our lives and our individuality and the imaginal figures that come to us as given to us by the soul, by the God, by divinity, by Buddha nature, whatever words we want to use.

Soul-making needs a perspective of the possibility of both—to some extent, individual free will, and to some extent, this givenness of our lives, of our circumstances, of our fate, of the images that come.

It is in this balance of self and other, really the balance of the autonomies of self and imaginal figure, while the two are at the same time somehow not separate. It's in that balance and that kind of straddling again, the balance of self and other, both autonomies and at the same time somehow not separate. It's in that mix or balance or kind of meta-view, if you like, that soul-making and imaginal practice is possible and fertile.

So the autonomy of self and the autonomy of other. Soul draws us—there is a telos that we can sense in the way soul draws us, or draws us on, or towards something, or in hindsight we can see that. Soul gives us our circumstances, our individuality, the trajectory of our lives, our fate, our images. And at the same time, we assent with our free will. We have to assent to soul-making.

So all this relates to another element—a deep and central notion which I've mentioned before—of participation. And it's all wrapped up in that, in a sense. We participate in soul, we participate in the divine, we participate in all the dimensions of our being. Aspects of our being participate in the divine or in soul or in the Buddha nature, in the imaginal other.

This notion of participation, a very deep notion—one of the beauties of it is it preserves an autonomy in a sense of non-separation. The idea of participation preserves an autonomy and a sense of non-separation. We'll come back to that.

But the very word, even, soul-making—soul-making implies, in the suffix, in the "making" bit, implies agency in doing. Soul-making. Agency in doing is not, in other words, a completely passive receiving that is involved in soul-making. We receive, we're given, but we also need to do and adopt and relate in certain ways. We assent to soul-making, as I said, and our free will is involved in that.

So the two-ness of soul-making, of imaginal work, of sensing the soul, preserves, to some extent, my autonomy, the subject's autonomy, as well as that, for example, of the imaginal figure, of the other. It preserves, emphasizes, requires my choosing, my will, my consciously orienting, my deliberately considering and viewing and adopting a certain way of looking and stance.

Okay, number 14 on our list. Many of these elements, perhaps you've already heard how some of them are implicit in each other, or you could say, well, that's part of that or whatever. Others, if you like, qualify each other. This is an aspect of the soul-making. This is an aspect of sensing the soul. This is an aspect of the imaginal constellation, at the same time as that which is opposite to this is as well.

So many of these elements kind of interpenetrate, many of them kind of qualify each other or balance each other or give complexity to the richness of paradox. That's maybe a good way of putting it—paradoxical implications, apparently self-contradictory relationships between some of these elements.

So, number 14: We've said already that despite the dependent origination, there's one paradox already—despite the dependent origination, there is the sense of and the granting of independence and autonomy of the imaginal other, the object-sense of the soul. And yet, number 14: the boundaries are not definite.

The boundaries are not definite. Indefinite boundaries is the 14th element on our list. Boundaries between the subject, the self, if you like, and the other or the imaginal figure—that boundary is not a definite boundary. But also the boundaries of the other, the object sensed with soul, the imaginal figure, and in fact of any soul-making delineation.

So it is with the boundaries of being. When we contemplate other human beings, there's this natural sense of soft edges, of their being extending into mystery, into depths that cannot be fully fathomed. And the same applies to ourselves - when we truly introspect, we don't encounter solid boundaries but rather a sense of extending into unfathomable dimensions.

This quality of indefinite boundaries in the imaginal realm becomes even more pronounced. The imaginal figure or object-sense sensed with soul doesn't end abruptly but rather fades gradually into mystery, into what cannot be fully grasped or defined. Like music that seems to blend with the silence that surrounds it, or like the way a beloved face in memory seems to extend beyond its visual contours into realms of meaning and relationship that have no clear edges.

These soft edges are also elastic. They can expand or contract depending on the quality of attention we bring, the depth of our engagement, the resonance of the moment. Sometimes the imaginal figure seems to fill all of awareness; other times it feels more contained while still maintaining that essential quality of extending beyond definite limits.

This elasticity reveals something crucial about the nature of imaginal perception. We're not dealing with fixed entities but with living realities that breathe and pulse with the rhythms of consciousness itself. The boundaries stretch and contract like the membrane of a living cell, permeable and responsive to the movements of soul.

And here's what's particularly significant: we actually sense these soft, elastic edges. This isn't just a conceptual understanding but a felt reality. When we bring attention to the edges of an imaginal figure, we can perceive how they blur into infinity, how they extend into dimensions that our ordinary perception cannot map. This sensing of the indefinite boundary is itself part of the imaginal experience, part of what makes it numinous and alive.

This quality of soft edges allows for something that rigid boundaries would prevent - the interpenetration of being, the sense that the imaginal other is both distinct and mysteriously connected to ourselves and to the larger web of existence. The imaginal figure maintains its autonomy and independence while simultaneously participating in the fluid dance of consciousness.

When we recognize and attune to these indefinite boundaries, the whole experience deepens. The imaginal becomes more fully itself precisely because we're not trying to contain it within sharp definitions. We're allowing it the space to extend into mystery, to participate in the unfathomable dimensions of being that are its natural habitat.

This is why conventional approaches to imagery or visualization often feel flat or mechanical - they assume definite boundaries, trying to construct clear, contained images rather than allowing for this essential quality of extending into the unknown. True imaginal perception honors the soft-edged nature of these realities, creating space for the mystery to breathe.

The edges are blurred—the bottom, the top, the sides—they're soft, and they're elastic. We can explore this simply by paying attention to the sense of self, the sense of another human being, the sense of anything really. It's also possible with animals, non-humans, and even material things. Just be present with the sense of this thing. It's harder with material objects, but with enough meditative depth and acumen, this quality will emerge.

So here we have element number fourteen: boundaries that are indefinite, soft-edged, and elastic. A thing has elastic edges. A human being obviously has elastic edges as well—a human being can grow. Any being, whether it's an imaginal being or anything scented with soul, also has elastic edges, and it will expand. In other words, our sense of it—our sense of what it is and involves and includes, its depths and range—must be elastic, must be extendable, and it will be because of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic.

We've talked extensively about this in recent retreats, how that dynamic gets going and the elements start enriching and fertilizing each other, complicating and pushing each other. The very sense of what a thing is, what it comprises, what is included, the depths and dimensions of the thing will change, extend, expand. Sometimes it shatters first—our original idea and conception and sense of this thing just explodes—and then it grows. Other times it's more elastic and elastically extendable without being so catastrophically dramatic as a shattering of the vessels.

Related to this element but actually a little different, we come to number fifteen, which I'll call infinite echoing and mirroring. There's something in the perception of the imaginal, something when we sense something with soul—though this is much more apparent with intrapsychic images. I think it's still there, much more subtly and obscurely, when we sense something with soul in what we call direct cosmopoiesis—that's not a cosmopoiesis arrived at through a previous intrapsychic image then opening out and spilling over into the environment. This element of infinite echoing and mirroring is present also in sensing with soul objects that are in the world, but it's much more apparent with intrapsychic images.

What I mean by this infinite echoing and mirroring is that imaginal perception involves or includes some sense of infinite mirroring and echoing, mainly between this image and one's life. There's some kind of mysterious and infinite-seeming quality. We get the sense of this infinite echoing, like mirrors placed opposite each other where the reflections go toward infinity. Or again, like an echo in a canyon that doesn't seem to clearly stop at some point. We can't discern exactly when that series of echoes ends; the edges, the further or deeper edges, are indistinct. They fade into infinity. We sense that this echoing or mirroring is or might be going on forever. We can't quite make out the edge.

This sense of it is not often primary in our attention—it's usually secondary. But it's actually very important, this kind of infinite depth of mirroring and mutual mirroring and echoing, usually between this image and one's life. It's related to meaningfulness, which will be the next element of our list. This image somehow reflects my life or aspects and dimensions of my life, some of which may be quite clear and some of which are a little indistinct and not so obvious. And there's a sense there's more of that reflecting than I can even quite delineate. The image is reflecting my life. My life is reflecting the image. They mutually reflect each other.

As I said, this is an important element, an important aspect to become aware of. It's intrinsic to imaginal perception.

I was working with someone a few months ago—I can't remember the exact context now—and she described an image she had had of a kind of Balinese or Indonesian figure, quite a common stance for an Oriental statue. You'll have seen this somewhere: a figure that's a little fierce with a sword raised above the head and held like a dagger pointing outward. Often one foot is raised and the other foot is bent at the knee.

So there's this kind of very elegant, very dynamic, fierce warrior pose. The image that this person had was of this—whatever it is, excuse me if I'm getting the cultural reference wrong—Balinese or Indonesian warrior god. She could tell it was important, but it wasn't quite becoming fully imaginal. She could sense there was a sacredness to it, but the sacredness was not familiar to her. Now you could say, well, it's from a culture she's not familiar with—she doesn't know that iconography. But also her poise in relation to the sacredness of this image, that too felt unfamiliar. She didn't recognize her own stance either. The whole sense and feeling of sacredness wasn't quite accessible to her, and the entire image really had not become fully imaginal. In her words, it was a bit two-dimensional.

So we were talking, and I suggested that perhaps she could notice and tune into and linger with—probably there are many ways, but really any noticeable way—how she recognized this archetypal image echoing her life personally. The personal echoes, the echoing between image and personal life, the mirroring and being mirrored by this image, this archetype, this icon, whatever it is.

One has to be careful not to be too clunky here. It's a very delicate thing, usually, and I'll talk more about this. It's like—and I have talked about it before—not landing too heavily on "it means this." A lot of this work is really quite subtle. We're picking up resonances that are quite subtle, certainly in their deeper ranges as they become more indistinct and carry that sense of infinity. They're really quite subtle, almost by definition. So you can't be too heavy-handed in this approach of feeling into that infinite echoing and mirroring.

Some of the resonances may be distinct—not entirely clear, but you really get a sense of, "Oh yeah, I can kind of see a sort of refracted or inflected version of that stance of that god in my life, or in a certain thread through my life, or in a certain current of dealings or events and my relationship with them." The instances of this mirroring may be very specific psychological aspects of oneself—very specific personal psychological aspects or patterns. Or they might be events in one's life, or tendencies to approach or be in certain situations a certain way. Or the potential that we don't often manifest or realize—to be in certain ways, in certain relationships or situations.

In other words, there might be something we're capable of, and the image, the imaginal figure, is partly catalyzing something or opening the door of a possibility. It's showing us: "Hey, you know, you actually have this in you as well—this stance, this possibility, this way of relating."

All this connects with the sixteenth element I want to highlight, which is meaningfulness. Again, you can see some overlap here. But this recognition of specific and finite representation or mirroring—when I recognize that, it brings the image alive. It's part of this sixteenth aspect: the sense of meaningfulness. When I notice this specificity—oh, that's echoing, I see that echoes this—and maybe I get the sense of the larger infinite echoing as it shades off into less distinct echoes and mirrorings, then that ignites the constellation, the imaginal constellation. That ignites the other nodes.

So again, there's a middle way to tread here. If I conceptually reduce and limit an imaginal figure to "this image means x only" or "y only"—if I limit it to just this meaning, this one singular meaning, or even a couple of meanings, or five meanings, whatever it is—it will sooner or later, and often sooner, kill the imaginal. It will kill the image as an imaginal image, as a potent, fertile, endlessly deep imaginal image, and also kill the soul-making. It will squash it, constrict it, take the fire away from it.

I'm mentioning this because I want to be clear. Based on feedback, I wonder whether I've been clear enough on this, or perhaps overemphasized something. I was working recently with someone who had an image of riding on a flying dragon—straddling this dragon on its back, flying—and there was a lovely relationship between the person and the dragon. But they had completely no sense of it meaning anything, and the whole thing didn't really open up. The richness and fullness of the imaginal wasn't there. It was just an interesting image, but it wasn't really rich and deep and juicy and multidimensional and colored.

Because I knew this person and their practice quite well, I could see very clearly some of the echoing, some of the elements that were mirrored between their life and this image. Even when they were describing how they were wanting to squeeze the dragon with their legs—like you would with a horse, using your inner thighs to signal and be in relationship with the horse you're riding, in relationship with the dragon. There was that kind of relationship going on, but he was just baffled. It meant nothing to him.

Knowing him, for me it was really clear. This kind of echoing was going on between that image and very much to do with practice—effort in practice, relationship with effort, modulating effort, the sense of practice having enormous potential power and really being able to fly, to take off, with all the beauty and soul-beauty of the dragon. Even elements of practice like samadhi. Yet he was stumbling a lot, often running into difficulties around effort. For me, knowing him, it was puzzling sitting there: why doesn't he see that? Why is this not taking off? Why doesn't he see that echoing and that meaning?

He actually told me that he'd thought he wasn't supposed to look for any meaning in images. So it's possible that I just wasn't clear in the past in making this distinction between meaningfulness and meaning. I may have overemphasized not reducing it to a certain meaning.

So I would rather say now that meaningfulness includes individual meanings. In this infinite echoing mirror—related to the last point, the last element—we can discern individual echoes or individual reflections between life and image, but we're not stopping at that.

So often we revert to an attitude or relationship with images and imaginal figures, including dream images and figures, an attitude or relationship that wants to figure out what it means and sum it up. It's not, I want to hopefully make clear, that we need to shut down that meaning-seeking attitude, but we need to make sure it doesn't dominate. It doesn't take over and limit.

Another way of thinking about this is that an imaginal figure or something sensed with soul, as I said before, has personhood. We sense more and more of its personhood. This imaginal figure is a person. This thing or object sensed with soul is a person. And it would seem ridiculous in our lives to ask about a person that we love and are touched by or who's important in our lives and psyche, "What does he or she mean to me?" I mean, I might be able to say a couple of things about someone who's deeply important to me in my life, some person, but I can't say that exhausts them or it's only that they mean X or Y to me.

An imaginal figure or a dream figure even is just the same. It doesn't, I would say, only mean X or Y any more than a person who is deeply important to me and in my life, whom I love and who loves me, only means X or Y to me. There's personhood there, and personhood is unfathomable.

So meaning, individual meaning - yes, there is this meaning, there is this echo, there is this whatever it is - may be part of it, may be part of what the imaginal figure is or does. But we can never reduce either an imaginal figure or a person in our lives to one meaning or even several meanings.

So the meaning-seeking and meaning-finding attitude is part of imaginal practice. I didn't mean to exclude it completely or banish it from imaginal practice, but rather don't stop there, don't limit it to that. When it's there, notice it and take whatever meaning, whatever individual meanings, that attitude or faculty comes up with. Oh, it means this, or I notice this echo, or I make this conclusion. Take it as just one "true" meaning of potentially infinite meanings that are carried by and in a certain image, a certain soul perception.

In this way, we do include that. It is important because it might - in this case, with the image of the dragon or the figure of the warrior god - be part of what stimulates, as a node in the lattice, the filling out of the imaginal. So yes, meanings are fine, just don't limit it. Keep open the gates to the garden of infinite interpretations. Keep them open. Don't just settle for one tree or one apple in that orchard.

So we're including individual specific meanings. When I use the word meaningfulness, it's really fullness, meaningfulness, which means there's an unlimited possible number of meanings, and there's this infinite mirroring and echoing of image and life.

So there's a middle way here. On one extreme, a mistake would be any kind of monovalent reduction to one meaning only - "This image means this." Or even several meanings. That would be one extreme of mistake. Another extreme would be a refusal to see any personal and specific meanings in the image at all. That would be another extreme, another mistake. And as I said, if we do that, then probably the image will be without meaningfulness. It won't come alive, it won't open its full sacredness to us, it won't have its full beauty potential or the aliveness of the dynamic of its beautifying, its depth, as it could.

Meaningfulness includes meaning, meanings, and sometimes it's not actually clear. We don't have a clear sense of what any meaning is. And that's fine. "I'm puzzled by this image. I don't know." But at least let's not shut down the possibility of individual meanings, individual discernible echoes and reflections between life and image.

You can probably hear again that this talk of meaning and meaningfulness is related to duty. It's also related to values. And again, I'm hoping at some point to talk more about values and ethics and the relationship with soul-making. But meaningfulness is related to values. We find a sense of meaningfulness in life in relationship to, or part of our sense of meaningfulness is, our relationship to what we value, and what we value most highly, and what's most important to us in our life. This will give our life meaningfulness to the height of that value.

The thing about values is they're limitless. They always will have a beyond to them.

If we say love or goodness or beauty—and these are things that, for some people, and I put myself in that category, they mean everything. Soul-making, soulfulness—these are open-ended values that mean more even than life, more even than life and death. But they don't have a limit to them. They're transcendent in that respect.

They're also transcendent in the sense that any manifestation will be actually limited in how much it instantiates or manifests any particular value. A piece of art will always have some kind of limit to its beauty, if you like, or some kind of compromise that it's making. With goodness, when we're actually faced with ethical choices, we're often making a kind of compromise—well, if I take care of this, then that goes a little bit, or if I'm taking care of this, I can't take care of that.

So there's a sense that values need to manifest in life, and we need to make choices, and oftentimes choices are hard because we can't have perfect, complete and comprehensive goodness. We can't have perfect, complete and comprehensive love actualized in life. The brahmavihāra in the heart in meditation is one thing. Actualized in life, we make choices.

There's something about values that they're always kind of beyond what we can reach. Not only can they always be more—you can always be somehow more good or more beautiful or more soulful—but they're also... how we actually manifest them and encounter their manifestations is always going to have some kind of limit or compromise to it.

This in itself is something very interesting. I may return to that in later talks or a later series. But it means that in relation to values, they've got a kind of infinity to them. They've got an infinitude, a transcendence, a beyondness always. And that is part of why we can have an erotic relationship with values and ideas like goodness and beauty and harmony and soulfulness. Because of the infinity, they're always going to have a beyondness, and it always allows Eros to constellate in relation to them.

Values have a part to do with meaningfulness, and values also have a part to do with images and sensing the soul. Whenever we have an imaginal perception, and whenever we're sensing something or other with soul, values that are really important to us, that are dear to our souls and hearts, are bound up—if you like—or expressed or refracted or hinted at, or shining through that imaginal thing, in that imaginal constellation. I hope to come back to this at some point. That's part of meaningfulness—it's our sense of value.

CHAPTER 108

Aspects of the Imaginal (Part 6)

Rob Burbea · 1h30

> In this sixth installment of exploring aspects of the imaginal, Rob Burbea continues his detailed examination of elements that characterize authentic imaginal perception and soul-making. He explores meaningfulness as something larger than specific meanings—a pregnancy with infinite potential that's never fully exhausted. The discussion moves to eternality or timelessness, explaining how imaginal images have an iconic rather than narrative nature, existing in hierophantic time where beginning and end happen simultaneously.
>
> Burbea introduces the crucial concept of the imaginal middle way—neither real nor not real—drawing parallels to the traditional Buddhist middle way of emptiness while distinguishing this theatrical quality of imaginal perception. He emphasizes the necessity of play in both senses: the theatrical dimension and the capacity for creative experimentation in practice. The talk explores participation as a mystical concept, examining how one participates in divine archetypes, the mundus imaginalis, and larger soul-making processes while maintaining autonomy.
>
> The discussion concludes with the concertina aspect—the sense of other possible images waiting in the wings—and the role of concept in imaginal perception. Unlike mainstream Buddhist emphasis on non-conceptual awareness, Burbea argues that imaginal perception is deeply conceptual, requiring concepts that are both vague and open yet capable of refined discernment. These concepts must serve soul-making by maintaining soft, elastic edges while supporting increasingly subtle differentiation and sensitivity.

Let's take just a moment to remind ourselves of the point of what we're doing right now—to frame where we are and the trajectory of what we're trying to accomplish in this set of talks.

We were identifying a group or list of elements or aspects of the imaginal to make more clear what we really mean by that word "imaginal," which different people use. This supports the understanding and grasping of the conceptual framework that we're using, and also deepens, enriches, and refines the sensitivity and discernment in practice when one begins to notice these things, pay attention to them, and tune to them—these aspects and elements of the imaginal constellation experience.

In addition to that, we are pointing out the possibility of noticing and tuning to some of these aspects in different ways in order to support the movement or development, the evolution of some perception into the more authentically imaginal realm. There is a spectrum of the uses of imagination, and at one end is what we're calling imaginal.

These elements can be played with, attended to in a way that amplifies them, ignites that specific node or element aspect that one's paying attention to. That in turn can ignite or spread that illumination, that activation—that soul life can spread through the other nodes of the lattice, the other stars of the constellation.

The general point about this kind of amplification or ignition is that we can notice one of these elements or aspects. Here I am working with an image; here I am with a certain perception and I notice one of these elements. I bring my attention to that and I sensitively tune into that particular quality, or I bring a delicate question to bear in relation to that node.

For example: Is this imaginal figure autonomous? Do they seem independent? Just the introduction of the question lightly shapes my attention in a way that shines a light on that particular element. The light may illuminate, ignite, amplify that element, draw it out to consciousness, bring it to life really. From there, the whole thing may become more imaginal.

Or the question: Do I have a sense that they're—would I call them real or not real? Sometimes the questions can be posed in actual language in time like that. Sometimes that's way too clunky. It's more a kind of question that's very subtly implicit in the very attention itself, in the looking—very, very nuanced and delicate.

Another question, another way of bringing a kind of very sensitive, curious attention—again, say with the example of an imaginal figure or imaginal perception that we're wanting to help move, evolve along the spectrum towards fully imaginal, fully sensing the soul—might be: Am I loved? Am I loved by this other that I am perceiving? Or, what kind of love do they have for me? What's the quality or character of that love that may be there that I might sense?

So again, this possibility of just noticing, or a kind of questioning, or a kind of curious, sensitive attention to one of those elements or aspects.

Thirdly, there's the possibility that one can actually shift one of those elements, move it, turn it on, switch it on, wiggle it or jiggle it or change it a little bit so that it turns on. In being turned on, it turns on the other elements and the whole constellation, the whole lattice is turned on, amplified, to resonate in that imaginal wavelength of things.

So there are those three possibilities: just noticing; a kind of questioning or sensitive, curious attention; and the possibility of actually focusing on shifting it, switching it on, turning it on, wiggling, jiggling it until it comes on. Very, very delicate, all this. Very delicate, very light, not so clunky.

I've said before, and I'll say it again right now: A lot of the evolution, I think, when we talk about practice going deeper or evolving or maturing, has to do with things becoming more subtle, actually. Not so much more fireworks, more clunkiness, more grossness. A lot has to do with the experiences becoming more subtle and correspondingly our awareness and our responsiveness becoming much more delicate and nuanced and subtle.

Sometimes there's a third or fourth possibility. We can actually start deliberately with one of these elements that may be accessible for us at that time. For example, we might just have accessible to us a general sort of humility in relationship with what might even be a very vague sense of divinity. It's just the sense of my humility in the face of the divine, or whatever words one wants to use. In that humility, despite the vagueness there, again it functions—that node is being illuminated, amplified, brought out more, brought to life more, and that can spread. The vagueness may remain. We talked about a sense of divinity as one of the other nodes. Well, that may remain vague, or it may get more clear or more particular.

Or another one that might one deliberately start with is actually loving. Here's this perception of another. What if I actually express love? We said that love was one of these nodes—loving and being loved. What if I actually just now, deliberately, feel the germ, the seed, the basis of that love? It's just a little bit.

What if I amplify it? What if I express it? What if I tune into it, switch it on? Then what happens?

Or it might be, as another example, for those who have a deep understanding of emptiness—one that's really accessible in perception. One can have that understanding in the moment, in the actual perception of things, of the middle way of emptiness: neither real nor not real, and the magic of that. If you do know that kind of level I'm talking about, the way that opens up all kinds of possibilities as well as the sacredness of things—then that middle way of emptiness, for some people, becomes quite fertile ground to open up the middle way of the imaginal that we'll come back to shortly. That can open up the whole realm, the whole tenor, field, texture and wavelength of the imaginal.

Or it might be that what's accessible right from the beginning in a deliberate way is that fullness of intention—that element I drew attention to earlier in our list. I can be here, intending in practice, in a stance of relating to this other or this imaginal perception, not primarily for my sake, but for something bigger: for the sake of soul-making, for the sake of the divine, for the sake of Buddha nature, whatever makes sense. That fullness of intention is also going to have an alchemical, catalyzing capacity.

Or it may be—and I think I've suggested this and we've done a little bit on some retreats—one can start with a deliberate image of one's energy body or deliberate image of one's body. For example, just imagining the body as a body of light, maybe a particular color, blue or anything. Just staying with that imagination and then tuning in—it's a deliberate imagination, but then feeling what that feels like, what the body feels like, with sensitivity tuning to that particular wavelength of that image and that sense of the energy body. See what opens up from this image of the energy body and the sense of it. It may be that other images open up, or that itself becomes a genuine imaginal image, or something starts to interact with that, or it relates to its environment in a way that's genuinely imaginal or sensed with soul.

I think on one retreat we did a guided meditation with the Om Mani Padme Hum mantra, imagining the syllables as jewels and the body as made somehow, in some mystical way, of these cosmic, magical jewels of compassion—the syllables of the Om Mani Padme Hum mantra, or just jewels, magical, mystical jewels. What is it to have a body of jewels?

Or it might be something at the other end of the spectrum in terms of earthiness and solidity. What is it to imagine the body as a body made of, or at one with, or mixed with, or emerging from the roots of trees underground in the dark, damp, fragrant soil, the moist earth? Actually imagining that, and then again tuning into that and seeing what comes from that.

So there are different possibilities in terms of how we use these nodes, how we relate to the nodes in supporting and encouraging that movement into the fully imaginal and fully sensing with soul.

We were going through our list and got to number sixteen: meaningfulness. We made the point that specific meanings, specific echoings of the image with life and life with the image, and the sense of particular duties or particular values—these elements are all sub-elements or parts of the aspect of meaningfulness. But meaningfulness is something larger than any specific meaning or even a limited, finite collection of meanings or echoes. It cannot be reduced to values. Meaningfulness is something larger, somewhat akin in its largeness and openness to that infinite echoing and mirroring. It's bigger than individual echoes or ways that life and image reflect each other.

So meaningfulness is more like—we say this image or this perception I have is pregnant with meaningfulness. There's something discernible and something half-hidden, just like when you see a pregnant woman or animal. The pregnancy is visible, palpable, but what is being gestated is not yet visible. Sometimes things emerge from the imaginal, from sensing with soul, from a hiddenness into manifestation, but we never exhaust that meaningfulness. The pregnancy is never fully over. The imaginal is always pregnant. The soul is always pregnant and always giving birth, or at least very often giving birth again and again.

So there's something tangible and something obscure. There are intimations of meaning—all that is intended by the word meaningfulness. But the obscurity or the not quite knowing what's there, half-hidden, does not make meaningfulness any less powerful. The fact that we're not entirely clear what it is that so moves us, that has this meaningfulness for us and gives us a sense of devotion and orientation and functions like a beacon, touches our heart, touches our soul—the fact that we're not exactly clear what it is, can't neatly define it, wrap it up, sum it up, does not take away any of the power of that meaning.

Number seventeen on our list is something I'd call eternality or timelessness—some sense of the timelessness or eternality of an image, or at least some kind of alteration of the time sense. Some sense of the timelessness or eternality of an image is an aspect of what makes it imaginal in our language, in our conception. I've talked about this before in a few places, and for me it's a really important element. There's a difference between...

or rather imaginal images have what I was calling an iconic nature versus a narrative nature. They don't go somewhere in time towards some grand resolution like a story, some heroic finale and redemption necessarily. The power and the redemption of the imaginal is not in its narrative nature. Apotheosis is not in its narrative kind of culmination or end point. So this to me is quite important. I call it iconic rather than narrative. Images tend to be iconic rather than narrative.

So for example, nowadays a lot of people are very importantly drawing attention to the need to, as hopefully humanity needs, make a transition or an evolution, really, a development of wisdom and practical wisdom into, let's say, 100% renewable energy. So important—coming away from fossil fuels and polluting fuels. And so the imagination, the faculty of the skillful imagination that human beings have, is a very important faculty. Can we imagine that future when everyone's homes are powered and energy comes and transport comes from 100% renewable energy, electric cars and whatnot? Can we imagine that, and imagine the stages that might move us towards that, that might transition us towards that state, where there's no depletion of resources, minerals, etc., from the planet, species—can we imagine that? The skillful use of the imagination, that's more of a narrative image. It's not yet imaginal.

Imaginal has more of this timeless, eternal quality. It's not moving in time necessarily towards some goal. Or if it is, because some images do have a kind of relatively narrative quality, it's what I tend to call, use the word fantasy, but they have this aspect of—it's always already happening, this story. All the elements of the story, all the stages of this fantasy, of this narrative image, are actually somehow still happening, always happening in hierophantic time, in holy time, in sacred time. And somehow, curiously, the beginning is happening at the same time as the end of the story, even if they're, on the face of it, separated in time. So that there's still this timeless or eternal sense, however we use words to describe that, in an imaginal image that is of a relatively narrative nature.

So what this means in practice, regarding this element, is that we can pay attention, when we're working with an image, to the sense of temporality—the sense of temporality within and of that image, or that imaginal perception, or the way we're sensing something with soul. So we pay attention to the sense of temporality and notice it.

Now this is often quite subtle, and it's as if the two levels go on at once—the movement in time, of course, and the eternal aspect. But can we start tuning to the sense of temporality, attending and noticing the sense of temporality and noticing and tuning to the sense of timelessness within the larger sense of temporality? The sense of eternality somehow pervading this image? And that, again, just as with the other elements, that noticing can amplify that very sense of eternality, which brings the whole thing, raises up, if you like—or if you don't like that vertical innuendo, amplifies or illuminates or brings alive that element of the imaginal. And then that element, again, spreads and the whole thing becomes imaginal.

So there are many possibilities and flavors of time and also of timelessness when we sense with soul in the imaginal. It's not just one kind of experience we're talking about. There are many possibilities.

So, for example, one may be dwelling with a whole body, energy body awareness, and the sense of eternality of, if you like, of oneself as image, and of one's life as image, but in a certain way. Meaning, in this case, just as an example, the sense of one's whole life with its narrative and its difficulties and its dukkha and its challenges and its tragedies and all of that, its story and the conditions of body, of soul, of story and conditions of relationship with others and world—all of that sensed or seen, so to speak, from, if you like, after death, from out of time, from the perspective of eternity.

So what is it to get a sense of oneself and one's whole life, that whole stretch from birth to death, maybe even more, seen, if you like, from after death, from out of time? And that's one possibility. I'm just giving a possibility of a kind of eternality or timelessness. And one can sometimes actually find one's way into that perspective with the energy body. And if there's that energy body awareness and that eternal energy, it can open up the door to the imaginal—the doors, the gates to the imaginal, the gates to the mundus imaginalis.

The imaginal world can open up just from seeing oneself. One's self becomes image, one's life becomes icon and becomes seen with soul, sensed with soul. And this will bring with it the other elements—the humility that we talked about, the fullness of intention that we talked about. It will ignite, illuminate, amplify, bring those into existence. And likewise, those elements, for example, humility and the fullness of intention, will likewise help that sense of, in this case, timelessness—this perspective of eternity—will help to ignite, illuminate, amplify, bring that into existence.

And then one is sensing, sensing oneself, sensing one's life and one's death, and that whole journey with soul, as well as this moment now, as well and including the dukkha—all the dukkha, the whole life with the dukkha. And that itself is extraordinarily beautiful and extraordinarily redeeming, healing, transforming, prayerful, mystical perception—sensing all that with soul. And then at that point, there may be other possibilities that open up from that.

One can relax that sort of whole life from the perspective of eternity, especially an eternal artist. One can relax that whole perspective and emphasis a little bit, and then there are other aspects or another relationship with time that can be sensed with soul—other relationships with timelessness.

For example, the unknown of the future and the moment can come and be sensed with soul. That very unknowing—we do not know our fate, we do not know the future. But when it's arrived at that way, opened up that way, with that kind of fullness and richness and dimensionality, that's quite different from just a kind of more flat acknowledgment or recognition of a very basic insight that we don't know the future. Quite different, quite a different level of sensing and perception there.

Now, someone—maybe someone hearing this who hadn't listened to all the other material—might say, "What are you saying? Are you saying this is something that's not impermanent?" And for a Buddhist, obviously, that would be a kind of horrific heresy or just ridiculous or whatever. So I probably don't need to say this to you at this point, but of course images are impermanent. Of course everything is impermanent. Impermanence is obvious.

By introducing this aspect or element of eternality, of timelessness, we're not dismissing the perspective that things are impermanent—that images, this very image that one is perhaps so moved by and senses as eternal, this very image is impermanent, comes and goes. So we're somehow holding both at once again. Yes, of course, it's obvious it's impermanent. And there's this timeless kind of strata or dimension or aspect to it.

Sometimes, again, people with a lot of deep emptiness practice—if that's something you've developed or just know is a possibility—can come to the point where one thoroughly and absolutely knows the emptiness of time, alongside everything else. And that knowing of the emptiness of time kind of opens up and legitimizes many possibilities in practice.

So we're holding the impermanence and the—not so much permanence as timelessness, but you could say permanence—always already happening. We're holding them together. As William Blake said, help us or save us from single vision. Save us from single vision. It's not just this or just that. It's not just eternal. It's not just impermanent. There is this capacity in the imaginal to see with more than one way of looking at once.

Nothing here is being presented or practiced because one can't face the truth of impermanence and the fact of death. There's completely nothing to do with that. All this practice is grounded in—yes, death comes, and we don't know when, usually. Everything dies. Everyone dies. I will die. You will die. Everything is impermanent. And we do need to face up to that in life. We need to open the heart and the being to that. This is just not coming out of an inability or a refusal to face that.

Nor is it a kind of clinging to this sense of timelessness at the expense of an acknowledgment of impermanence. I hardly need to say this. We're not talking about images of "happy ever after"—that this is what will happen—or an image that kind of ends all rosy. Something completely different. In what I just described about sensing the whole of one's existence with soul, there is still death, there is still suffering, and sometimes quite difficult suffering that a life is afflicted by or given to handle. It's not transmuting that into some other kind of ending.

Number eighteen is what I've been calling the imaginal middle way, or the middle way of the imaginal, or the theatre quality, the theatre aspect of the imaginal. This involves non-reification. It's not taken as real and literal and purely concretized. The relationship with the real self in a real world is much more less solid, less fixated.

Someone might have an image or a vision of teaching or of serving or whatever it is. Traditional or maybe more usual kinds of dharma or spiritual approaches to that kind of thing—someone having those kinds of images or visions of themselves teaching or serving—whatever it is, would be: let go of the attachment to whether that vision materializes and whether you get what you want, whether it comes to pass. So there's the teaching of, yes, you had that image, but just let go of any attachment to whether it materializes.

Or it might be, again, in the more usual or common approach: Can you be aware and discern with that vision or that image of serving or whatever it is? Because it may be, if you like, true or accurate or kind of prophetic intuition of something of the future or something that you're called to. Or it may be your delusion, your wishful thinking.

But in either of those two more common or usual spiritual approaches, they both rest on a kind of realist appropriation of the image or the vision. And they refer it simply, directly, literally and concretely to a real self in a real world of real time. So all these other elements that we're talking about—the timelessness—that's not there. And it's all about a real possibility in a real self in a real world.

And in neither case—whether it's "let go of the attachment to whether it materializes" or "discern whether this is an intuitive glimpse of the future or just delusion"—in neither case is the image treated imaginatively. Neither case relates to it as or allows it to be an imaginal image in our sense of the word. Instead, it has to be categorized as either real or not real, either real or delusion.

And the middle way, the imaginal, is not content with either "real or not real," either "real or delusion," "real or papañca." This is what I mean by the middle way. Neither "real" nor "not real" seem adequate or accurate or truly appropriate categories or labels for this imaginal perception or this what I'm perceiving when I sense with soul.

Another word I use here is theatre—the theatre element of it. When we say theatre, that doesn't necessarily mean dramatic. Remember I was giving examples of images that are really not dramatic at all, or even particularly narrative. They're just a sort of freeze frame of something. So the word theatre doesn't imply grand drama or narrative. But it implies this quality or status: this figure, this perception has power for the soul, has a certain depth, a certain ability to affect and move me or us. It's important to me and it even feels necessary, and soul-making comes with it, and there's this infinite echoing. All that we talk about as poetic truth or artistic truth—that's another way of saying this. We're talking about something that's true, but it's a poetic truth. It's not a literal truth or necessarily a concrete truth.

I don't know if you've ever been, as I have, to a play in a theatre, and the theatre is very small, and one's sitting very near the actors, and the actors may be very good, and it's a very intimate, vulnerable experience to be in good theatre with powerful actors in that way. It's very intimate. You are involved. You cannot not be involved unless you really go into some kind of shutdown mode. It's actually vulnerable for you as a member of the audience. You're right there, open, your being is open, the actors can see you.

All this relates to imaginal figures as well. When we sense things with soul—which I'm using interchangeably—you can't be untouched in that situation, unimplicated. It's not the cold distance of the ideal scientific method that's uninvolved.

When we are practicing and something's imaginal, we can notice: Oh, it has this theatre-like quality in terms of it's not real because it's theatre, but it's not not-real either. And I don't just mean by "not not-real" that it was just happening, so therefore something exists. I mean there's something, there's a deeper kind of poetic truth being communicated there.

This aspect—and again it's something we can notice, and I'm pretty sure that in time, anyone doing these imaginal practices and getting into it will just notice that this is an element, this is an aspect of the imaginal—may not be obvious to us at first. It has a quality of theatre, it has an air of theatre to it. It's neither real nor not real. Neither of those labels or categories really applies. It's in the imaginal middle way.

Again, noticing that tenor of it, that status of it, that air or quality to it, amplifies that quality. It becomes more apparent. Over time, it becomes something that one can just notice immediately with practice. And then, again, the whole constellation can amplify, illuminate, evolve toward the more authentically, fully imaginal.

So that word play, which I tend to use a lot in my teaching—whatever I'm teaching, dharma-wise and practice-wise—is necessary or relevant in both of its senses. We go to the theatre and we see a play. So there is something of a play happening, but something that has this artistic, poetic, necessary, vital, deep truth to it at the same time as it's theatre.

Play in the other sense is necessary as well: the capacity and the permission for us to play in meditation and with perception and in life. Play with concepts, play with experiences, play with ways of looking, play with energies.

Are we able and are we free? Are we granted permission to play? To me, that's absolutely necessary. Actually, it's the way I tend to teach. I think it's maybe not necessary, but really, really helpful for all practice. And in this realm of the imaginal and soul-making, I would say it's vital. Absolutely vital. Necessary.

So play, in both senses, is an ingredient of imaginal practice. It's an ingredient of soul-making that remains fertile and expanding. Because something can be soul-making, then something freezes. We've been through all this on previous retreats when we talk about the soul-making dynamic in eros, psyche, logos. So we could say that the quality of play, the aspect of play in both its senses, is a prerequisite of soul-making and imaginal practice.

Some practitioners have deep desire. There's no doubt about their desire and their aspiration and their dedication to practice and the path. But that element of play is not so easy for them. For different reasons, possibly—maybe the capacity to play is actually inhibited by the very image or the logos, the psyche or logos of what practice looks like. I encounter this occasionally, and it's so important, I think—play in both its senses.

You just have to watch children playing to see how sometimes very serious that play can be, how captivating it is for them. To me, it's something really, really beautiful. And they're not mistaking it for reality. If they're playing soldiers or whatever, they're not mistaking that for a real war. It's like, "I just shot you, bang bang, you're dead," and now you get up. That doesn't make sense—there's no confusion. They're just so with the play and playing in this imaginary way, in the theatre. There's no confusion about categories of reality for the most part. We'll come back to this.

But the play can be very serious, very engrossing, very vitalizing and deeply important. And of course, we talk about playing music. See the play and the beauty and the necessity and the seriousness—well, I know for me as a jazz musician, when I was playing.

Sometimes, what I've also noticed recently is that people—and I don't think I've really touched on this so much, or not really made it transparent—the relationship of this imaginal middle way to the middle way of emptiness, the more traditional middle way that the Buddha referred to in the Kaccāyanagotta Sutta in the Pali Canon and then was really amplified by Nāgārjuna and the whole Mahāyāna teachings. Middle way referring to emptiness between is and is not, exists and doesn't exist, real and not real.

So what's the relationship between that traditional emptiness middle way and the imaginal middle way? They're not quite one and the same. I would say the emptiness middle way is—for me it's extremely important—but in terms of imaginal practice it's more like understanding the emptiness middle way as part of a much larger conceptual framework of the whole of practice and a certain range and directionality, a range of directions of possibility of dharma. In other words, understanding that deeply—the middle way of emptiness is an integral part of a much larger logos and conceptual framework which we're trying to unfold and explain and also develop. So it has a different place in the scheme of things.

Not entirely, because for some people, the emptiness middle way, when they really get a deep sense of that, actually opens up the possibility of the imaginal as a viable and sensible path—legitimized—and also opens up that sense of sacredness and the possibility of perceiving things imaginally, with the imaginal middle way. So for some people, that understanding of the emptiness middle way is a springboard, either conceptually or in actual practice. The practice has actually arrived at that very deep center of the emptiness middle way, and that's what opens up the imaginal middle way.

Other people—and I wonder whether they're in the majority—don't need that deep sense of the middle way of emptiness in their practice. It's quite a deep level we're talking about, and they don't need that. It's more that they have a poet's sense of things, of poetic truth, of artistic truth. They have the sense, and they can feel it, of the theatre element. So it's just there in the perception, integrated into the way they live and consider things and relate to existence—already this potential of the imaginal middle way.

And as I said earlier, if it's not there initially, it will emerge just as one gets familiar with the mundus imaginalis, with the imaginal realm and the perceptions. One actually notices, "Oh yeah, there's that quality," and that distinguishes this imaginal way from other perceptions.

For me—and I thought quite a lot about this when I was starting to teach this kind of thing, and was unsure whether to include it or not—but more and more I really leaned towards wanting to include it as a necessary part of soul-making, a necessary part of what it means for something to be imaginal and for something to be sensed with soul. I feel it's absolutely crucial, and not just for the philosophical sense and framework that it gives.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 7/11). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

Not just in the service of creating and establishing and opening up and filling out an adequate and robust conceptual framework for everything that we're doing here. I think that's very important too, actually. I think it's very, very important. But it's more crucial in the sense that this really helps the balance—especially when there's a lot of eros, especially when the soul is on fire that way and there's all that beauty and all that attraction to this path and opening, and all kinds of things are opening up.

It really helps this middle way, this sense of the middle way, the theater element. It really helps the navigation, the balance, and, as I say, the fertility. It helps in soul-making. It's an element of any soul-making. I'm going to come back to this because it's actually not quite that simple, but let's just say that for now. And I would like to just emphasize just how important that is.

That was number nineteen. Number twenty is something we've already said: that the imaginal, or soul-making, or sensing with soul, is, as they say of beauty, in the eye of the beholder. Or we may say in the soul of the beholder, in the senses of the beholder. And that realization, that awareness, that recognition, that concept, helps the imaginal middle way. When I realize, oh, something is not objectively independently imaginal—whatever it is, we've gone through this in this talk earlier, in part one, I think—realizing that, remembering it, recognizing it, and being aware of it, keeping in mind that concept, again very, very lightly, it helps establish us, open us onto the middle way.

In other words, soul-making, sensing the soul, the realm of the imaginal, an imaginal figure or imaginal perception of something is in the eye, in the senses, in the soul of the beholder. Another way of saying that is, again as we said before, the imaginal is really a way of looking. And by way of looking, I mean that includes a way of conceiving, a way of relating. So nothing is, so to speak, objectively or independently imaginal. The imaginal arises as a function of the way of looking.

That twentieth aspect as a concept, as an awareness, as a recognition, helps, for some people, in the establishing of that middle way, the imaginal middle way.

Now, for some people, this talk or this teaching that perception, or actually any perception, whether it's imaginal or material, is dependent on the way of looking—this teaching that anything is dependent on the way of looking is tricky. When one hasn't quite seen it for oneself in practice through deep fading and all that, and the way things manifest dependent on the way of looking and what's wrapped up in the way of looking, and then it comes as a teaching—and I know I emphasize it over and over again—for some people it's a little tricky because the usual way of thinking and understanding can't help but conclude that if something is dependent on the way of looking, whether I sense something with soul, or I have this imaginal figure, or this beautiful perception of sacredness, and if it's dependent on the way of looking, then somehow it actually can't be real then. Because our usual way of conceiving of reality is independent of the way of looking, having objective existence, and it can't be real, therefore it can't really have value, and it can't really be sacred.

So this is troubling. And because I emphasize it so much, it can be a bit of a stumbling block for some people and inclined to sort of do away with that element.

A couple of things about this. I would say that, again, a deeper understanding, a journeying deeper into that whole experimenting and playing with and exploring ways of looking and the whole notion of fabrication and that whole revelatory journey, beautiful revelatory journey—the deeper one goes, at a certain point, one really sees for oneself, one understands in one's bones the emptiness of everything.

That means it's not that objects are dependent on way of looking, meaning that the self somehow or the mind or the awareness or something here in the subject or the way of looking, this is real and it forms a real basis for what is not so real. We go deeper on this journey into understanding emptiness in practice—it has to be in practice—and we understand that everything is empty. Self is empty. Subject is empty. Awareness is empty. Mind is empty. Ways of looking are empty. They don't inherently exist.

And what that does, because everything is empty, and equally empty, if you like, then all becomes—rather than one thing is valuable and in relation to that or relative to that, this thing is not valuable, this is sacred because it's real and that is not sacred because it's not real and therefore not valuable—everything, because everything is equally, deeply, mysteriously, mystically empty, if one really goes into the roots of what emptiness means, what we can sense of what emptiness means, everything actually becomes sacred. Everything becomes valuable. Everything has this status of the, if you like, traditionally Buddhist middle way of being neither real nor not real.

And there's a magic in that, in how it is and how things are and their appearing but being empty. So it rather opens up the door to more sacredness, more comprehensive sacredness and more possibilities of kinds of sacredness. I've talked and written about this before; I'm not going to go into it right now.

What I want to emphasize right now is the twenty-first element of our list: the sense of participation. I'm highlighting this because it stands in contrast to that immature or incomplete understanding of dependent ways of looking, which reifies either the way of looking itself or the subject—the self, mind, or awareness that does the looking and sensing.

The notion of participation gives me a sense of dependency on the subject, on the way of looking, on the mind or awareness of self, but not without retaining any objective pole—a pole of value in the object, a pole of sacredness or reality in the object. So this sense of participation forms our twenty-first node or element.

As I mentioned in one of the earlier parts of this talk, the idea of participation preserves autonomy within an understanding and sense of non-separateness. Do you understand? When something participates in some way with something else, it maintains its own autonomy while being kind of non-separate. The sense of participation we're discussing—both the concept of it and the felt sense of it—is something sensible. We perceive it. I'm not talking merely about an idea, just an idea. This is a mystical participation.

We might have a sense and concept of participation in a divine archetype. When we're working with an imaginal figure, perceiving this imaginal figure, there's a sense that I'm somehow participating in the divinity that I'm perceiving. I'm participating in an archetype. The archetype actually needs my participation, and yet I also witness that archetype.

I can get a sense and concept of participating in the mundus imaginalis. But again, it takes my participation. My participation is part of it. It supports it, feeds it, nourishes it, transforms it, changes it. I am not separate from this mundus imaginalis, and yet it's not just me. It's not reducible to me or merely a figment of my imagination in the impoverished sense of that phrase.

I can sense and conceive of participating in the always-already happening in hierophantic time of whatever I'm witnessing—participating in, being part of, partaking of, fabricating of the image. I can sense participating in the eros of the divine or the divine eros. We talked about tracing that movement and evolution of that sense. I traced it particularly in the Eros Unfettered talks.

One really gets a sense, a perception mixed with concept, that my eros is somehow participating in some larger, deeper, more mysterious, more unfathomable, more divine eros. Similarly with the mind—one's own mind, insights, perceptions, conceiving, holding and entertaining of ideas, the arising of ideas. One's mind is somehow participating in divine mind, in Buddha nature, in cosmic Buddha nature.

One can also sense and perceive participating in the intersubjectivity of the imaginal other—the object or thing, the person being sensed with soul. One participates in the intersubjective communication of eros flowing back and forth, love flowing between self and other in soul-making.

As all this deepens—and I would say this is a natural evolution, the trajectory I traced in some of those talks, particularly in Eros Unfettered—it's actually a natural and inevitable evolution of the sense of things and the concept, if we're following this path. At some point, without needing to rush or hurry it, one can get a sense that this perception I'm having right now, this soul-making happening right now, perhaps my whole life, even the life of culture and history, is participation in the larger unfolding mystery of soul-making—in some larger unfolding of divine soul-making.

It's the soul-making happening of Buddha nature, and I and my soul-making, all that involves, all the elements and aspects and dimensions of my being that involves—in that perception, conceiving, openness, in the body, all of it—is participating in some much larger mystery of soul-making that's unfolding. The Buddha nature soul-making. The soul-making of the cosmic Buddha, the soul-making of the divine, the soul-making of God, whatever.

When I get a sense of this—and I find it quite hard to convey—it's a deep and mysterious concept. We're not talking merely about, for example, when the food delivery truck pulls up at Gaia House and several coordinators help the work yogi and kitchen coordinators unload the food delivery and put it away, and you say, "Oh, I participated in unloading the food delivery today at Gaia House." That's typically quite a flat sort of participation.

I'm talking about something that includes that but is somehow more, somehow more mysterious.

As with many of the other facets and dimensions of the imaginal, this one may not be evident at first. It may be one of those qualities that emerges to our attention and consciousness. We notice it more after time, after we've become more accustomed to the imaginal realm and perceptions there. We say, "Oh yes, there's that quality."

The sense of participation can be quite intense, but it can also be really, really subtle. There's great variety in how palpably and obviously it manifests. But I'm speaking here about a deep and mysterious concept, a deep and mysterious sense of mystical participation in something.

Number twenty-two is what I want to call the concertina—the imaginal concertina or the concertina of the imaginal.

We used to employ the phrase "vertical spectrum" or "vertical spectrum of the imaginal," and I think one or two people picked up on it, though I can't remember when. But we want to retract that now. It was an unfortunate choice of words. We want to replace that same concept with the notion of the concertina.

You know what a concertina is? It's like an accordion that opens outward, or like the bellows used to blow air on a fire—something that expands to reveal its contents. Think of those old file cabinets that stretch open to reveal individual files, or can be compacted so you don't see all the files there. There's probably a better word, but this gives you a sense of what I mean.

When there's an imaginal image or a perception of something sensed with soul, it's also sensed to exist within a context of possible other images. This imaginal image—this way I'm seeing my beloved, sensing her, him, them imaginatively, sensing them with soul—an image comes that is sort of them and sort of not them. It's coming through them; it's a theophany. But there's also a sense at that point, sometimes quite dim at the edges of consciousness, of "Oh, this is one image that I'm perceiving within a larger context of other possible images."

Because I could perceive her, sense her with soul, him, them with soul, and another image might come to the fore or replace this one or be there simultaneously or linger in the background. It's as if this concertina reveals other possibilities, other possible perceptions waiting in the wings. Like a theatre where this character, this image, is waiting for its time to come on stage, and other actors are waiting. There's a sense of other possibilities in potentia.

Sometimes some of these others can be clearly sensed or even perceived. They're individually discernible. One might actually perceive two images simultaneously, sometimes along with the regular perception of my beloved other, or this tree, or whatever I'm sensing with soul. Other times, the sense of the concertina is more vague, more implied—again, like a kind of pregnancy. Either the images there are vague, or they're just very dimly perceived, or we simply have a sense that the concertina is open, that there is a concertina, but the individual images are not coming to the fore and often not individually perceived. Perhaps that's more often the case—just a sense of context.

We can notice when that concertina expands, or when it comes online. The context, this range of possible images, or just the sense of a range of possible images, comes alive, comes online, expands. Again, we can notice that concertina and tune to it, and that helps the whole sense become more imaginal. It helps the imaginal constellation become more filled out, more genuinely imaginal.

With that allusion to waiting in the wings, this element of concertina or aspect of context might be regarded as an aspect of the theatre element or the middle way. As we go through this list, you can see how some elements are implicit in others or qualify others, as we've noted before. In a way, this presence of the sense and concept of a concertina or context prevents us from getting too narrow in our perception, from getting too fixated. To quote William Blake, it prevents us from collapsing our relationship and perception and conception into a kind of single vision, because we're aware of the concertina. That awareness does something to the whole tenor, texture, ether—the realm, the air of the perception.

Now for the last one: concept. Concertina or context was twenty-two. Concept is twenty-three. As I mentioned at the start when we rattled through the list, imaginal perception, sensing with soul, is not non-conceptual. It's not a non-conceptual perception.

One of my ongoing concerns is with how freely and lazily the notion of "non-conceptual" gets bandied about in some spiritual and Buddhist circles. I don't equate concept with thinking. Concept is much more subtle. You can have concept, you do have concept, without actual discursive thought or heavy-duty intellectual, complex ideas.

I reserve the word "non-conceptual," the category of non-conceptual, just for moments of the cessation of perception—just for moments when there is no fabrication and all perception is pacified, to borrow Nagarjuna's phrase. There's a fading of all perception, cessation of all perception and feeling. That is a non-conceptual experience in my book, and only that really qualifies. I've written and talked about this extensively elsewhere, so I won't go into it too much right now.

But for me, all and any perception has concept woven into it.

Certainly any dharma perception, or perception that arises in the context of dharma practice, has this conceptual element woven through it. This includes mindfulness. Mindfulness is not non-conceptual. So-called bare attention is not at all non-conceptual. There is always some sense, no matter how faint or subtle, of subject, object and time as the basic tripod of fabrication underlying even very basic perceptions and conceptions.

Wherever there's any perception of any kind of subject, any kind of object, any kind of time sense—or sense of the present moment, even the present itself—there is concept involved. And actually in many dharma practices, in regular mainstream dharma practices and mindfulness, there are all kinds of concepts woven in. In imaginal soul-making practices, in sensing with soul, all kinds of concepts, a great range of concepts are brought in, or involved rather—they're an important part.

We mentioned the conception, some kind of concept no matter how vague, of the divine nature of this other that I'm perceiving, this imaginal figure or this other that I'm sensing with soul. The divine nature and origin is a perception, and also a concept.

The concept that's involved is not reductive, as I said. This image is not simply a representation of my compassion or something in my history conceived too tightly or narrowly or flatly. So the conception has to avoid being too reductive or narrow in that way.

But things like this eternality or timelessness that we're talking about—that is also a conception, a concept. "Always already happening" is a conception as much as it is a perception. When we have an imaginal figure—could be anything—and they have certain qualities, there's the conception, among many others, of their nobility and their courage and their dedication and devotion. These are all conceptions as much as they're perceptions.

The whole conception and sense of an imaginal figure's autonomy and personhood, their subjectivity, their soul—or them as souls—is also a concept as much as a sense. Love, as another element, is a concept, of course. It's also not only a concept—it's a lot more than that, as are all these elements. They're not just concepts, but there is a conceptual element as part of any and all of this.

What we were referring to earlier about the participation of my mind in the divine mind, the participation of either the thinking, the conceiving, or the perceiving, or both—the participation of your mind in the divine mind—that's again a concept as much as it's a sense, an imaginal sense.

Something akin to this actually has a long tradition in Western spirituality. I don't know if it started with Aristotle and his idea of the act of intelligence—it might have been before that—and then it was modified and went through a kind of evolution. Lots of spiritual traditions, Kabbalah and others, draw on that and transform it and use it as quite a central mystical principle in their conceptual frameworks.

But we also get a sense of this kind of thing, the participation of mind in each other's minds or in the divine mind, in our life. We get glimpses of it, tastes of it at different times. For example, when there's a kind of creative artistic flow—and even if that's not necessarily something that happens instantaneously, like those Zen drawings that you do very quickly, or a haiku that just comes really quick, or some phrase that comes when you're improvising music and there's a sense in the moment of "wow, something just came through"—but also in the longer stretches of struggle with a big creative project over a long time.

Something might take two or three years to complete—writing a novel, writing a symphony, writing a book, whatever it is—and you can still get a sense of this creativity that's happening. It's me and it's not me. I'm participating in something. My struggle with this, my creativity, my application of mind in and through the creativity is a participation of my mind in something larger—call it divine, whatever you want to call it.

But also between each other. Sometimes people sharing humor—that moment when you and someone else or a group of people grasp something together intuitively, and the spark, the flash of communication that happens there, the brilliant intuition that happens, the connection that happens in finding something humorous or seeing something together. And sometimes it would be very hard to actually articulate what it is. Something happens in the communication of that between human beings.

But also with poetry and with language and with love and communicating love, sometimes non-verbally—there's some way we participate in some greater mind together. And that's how we can have these intuitive flashes. We're participating together in something, we get it together in a brilliant moment of revelation that defies any kind of mechanistic translation from one place to the other through flatly conceived materialistic means.

So this kind of concept and sense is something that we can get a sense of in our life as well. But as I said earlier, when we're talking about participation as an idea, as a concept, as a notion, participation in the divine is a concept, but it's very hard to articulate, very hard to define clearly. And perhaps that's partly what I meant when I said it was a mysterious and deep concept—perhaps it defies such completely clear articulation.

We could give another analogy for participation, something like the arm or the hand of a clock. Big Ben's big hand is part of the clock and participates in the clock's functioning.

The clock needs that to be a fully functioning clock, yet the hand is not the clock itself. It participates, but this mechanistic analogy is far too gross for the deeper, more mysterious participation we can sense when practicing with the imaginal and soul-making.

This brings us to notice that many concepts within our soul-making logos are deliberately vague or, if you prefer, open. When we speak of meaningfulness, the suffix itself leaves possibilities open—infinite, inexhaustible potential that cannot be fully discerned. Love functions similarly, as does the very concept of soul. These are intentionally vague and open concepts.

Soul-making itself embodies this paradox—it is simultaneously vague and precisely defined. On one hand, it encompasses countless nuances, subtleties, qualifications, specificities, and particularities. There are things to notice, include, exclude—endless refinements. Yet simultaneously, it remains a somewhat vague and open notion.

This relates to our earlier discussion of soft and elastic edges—not only for imaginal figures, but for concepts themselves. The concepts that serve soul-making best are those whose edges become soft, elastic, stretchable, even if they didn't begin that way.

We find this fascinating tension: conceptual vagueness and openness alongside the birthing of increasingly subtle delineations and discernments. There's this and there's this, then this and this—each slightly different from the other. The entire soul-making dynamic, through the way eros-psyche-logos fertilize, inseminate, complicate, expand, enrich, deepen, and widen each other, creates and discovers ever more discernments, differentiations, and delineations.

So we have this remarkable straddling: vagueness and openness on one side, increasing subtlety and precision on the other—both in conceptual terms within the logos and logoi, and in our sensitivity as beings, in what we can actually sense. There's an ongoing creation and discovery of new dimensions, sides, and elements.

We need a conceptual framework that serves what we're doing—soul-making. Therefore, both our larger conceptual structure and individual concepts must serve this purpose. They need to be simultaneously open and loose, yet capable of very refined, subtle discernment. The conceiving that's wrapped up in perceiving requires this straddling, this bridging, this inclusion of both aspects.

It's precisely in this manner of relating to and holding concepts that soul-making is supported. If we were pursuing classical scientific method or certain social sciences, we'd want sharper, measurable, strictly definable concepts—either zero or one, like computers operate.

But when we're interested in soul-making, our relationship with conceptuality is not non-conceptual. We're deeply engaged with conceiving, with logos, with the concepts we entertain. We develop flexibility, richness, and sophistication with them. This becomes something beautiful to us—not the absence of concepts, but their masterful engagement.

The logos aspect of soul-making comes vibrantly alive as an equally important, necessary, and valid part—a vitalizing element of the entire soul-making movement. We won't be non-conceptual, but our way of handling concepts, the kinds we choose, and how they straddle vagueness and refinement—this entire approach becomes integral to our practice.

CHAPTER 109

Sensing with Soul (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h27

> In this opening talk of a new series, Rob Burbea introduces the phrase "sensing with soul" as both complement and alternative to the term "imaginal." He explores how this encompasses all seven senses - seeing, hearing, touching, tasting, smelling, thinking, and imagining - as potential arenas for soul-making practice.
>
> Burbea examines the relationship between intrapsychic imaginal work and cosmopoiesis - the spreading of soul-making perception into the world itself. He outlines four factors involved in all perception: conception, intentionality/desire, sense data, and the imaginal faculty, showing how these cooperate in soul-making perception. The talk delineates four possible skillful modes of sense contact, from ordinary functional awareness through dharmic lens-focused mindfulness to perceptions of oneness, culminating in sensing with soul.
>
> Drawing on philosopher J.N. Findlay's emphasis on mystical rapture as "the only things absolutely worth having," Burbea articulates his primary intention: the re-enchanting of existence through opening possibilities for genuine, transformative senses of sacredness. He demonstrates how sensing with soul includes and transcends mindfulness, involving presence, sensitivity, appropriate attention, reverence, discernment, and play as essential elements of this approach to practice and liberation.

I hope these talks prove helpful in some way. As I mentioned previously, much of their content and structure emerges from my sense of what has been difficult to understand or frequently misunderstood. Sometimes I need to rebalance certain emphases—when particular aspects, approaches, or leanings have been stressed over recent years at the expense of others, contrary to my original intention. This is an attempt at such rebalancing, if necessary.

In previous talks, I described a process—an evolution of practicing with the imaginal. One might begin working with an image where eros is present, and that image becomes imaginal, sparking the soul-making dynamic. This involves, catalyzes, and ignites the whole Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic with their mutual insemination, mutual complication, enriching, deepening, and widening. We've discussed this as one way of understanding the essence of the soul-making dynamic as it unfolds.

Within this vortex of eros, psyche, and logos and their interrelations, there can sometimes be a spilling over of the image. When working with an imaginal figure intrapsychically, it begins to overflow into the extrapsychic realm—into the world itself. The soul-making perceptions, the imaginal perceptions, begin to spread and include not just the imaginal figure one might be working with intrapsychically, but also the self, the world, one's eros, and all elements of being—both intrapsychic and extrapsychic, but particularly in the extrapsychic realm and the world.

We use the word cosmopoiesis for this phenomenon—an unusual term in our time. Cosmo derives from cosmos, meaning both the world and the organizing principles of the world, the structure of the universe. Poiesis refers to a kind of poetic creativity. Cosmopoiesis describes what happens through the depth, vitality, and beauty of imaginal practice: this spreading of soul-making perception to include and involve the world around us. When one opens one's eyes or while sitting, walking, or simply standing, the world becomes imbued with imaginal perception influenced by the original intrapsychic imaginal perception.

The word poiesis is carefully chosen here. Cosmology typically implies truth—usually scientific truth. Cosmopoiesis implies a poetic truth, a kind of truth that one would not feel comfortable dismissing as mere illusion in one's integrity, completeness, and the fullness of one's being and soul. I provided many examples of this in recent talks on the path of the imaginal and during the "Re-enchanting the Cosmos" retreat.

This represents both a creative process and a discovery—discovery in the sense that there is some kind of truth to these many possible perceptions of the world, the cosmos, the universe. What occurs is a spilling over that spreads to include the world, self, other, world, and so forth in this cosmopoiesis. All perceptions of the world are then shaped, colored by, or exist in relationship to the particular image one began with.

This doesn't mean that if one is imagining an imaginal figure—a god, goddess, divinity, or deity—the entire world is necessarily perceived as that deity. Rather, one might perceive oneself and elements of the world in relation to, in reference to that deity: as the lover of that deity, the consort, the food of that deity, or in countless other ways. All perceptions within this cosmopoiesis are shaped and colored in relation to the particular image that served as the starting point.

The possibilities for cosmopoiesis are infinite, truly endless, because of the infinite fertility and possibility of the soul and the imaginal faculty, the imaginal realm. In such perception, all those elements and aspects we listed as pertaining to the imaginal in the previous talk become elements of that cosmopoetic perception. In other words, it is soul-making. Some elements seem to refer more obviously to the subjective pole, others to the objective pole of that imaginal constellation, that cosmopoetic perception, that soul-making perception.

Actually, this kind of cosmopoiesis could be considered the larger subset of all possible cosmopoiesis. We can also include perceptions of the world when perception is influenced and imbued with visions of universal oneness that can arise from certain deep meditative states or formal meditation practice. These are perceptions of the oneness of love—everything is of the nature and substance of love; love permeates and forms the essence of all things. Or compassion, joy, or peace might be perceived as the fundamental essence. These represent different kinds of perceptions of oneness that become different forms of cosmopoiesis.

Again, one wouldn't feel comfortable dismissing these perceptions as mere fabrication or delusion. One intuits some kind of mystical truth here: everything is awareness.

The nature of all being is awareness, or is nothingness. There are, within this category of what we could call perceptions of universal oneness—cosmopoieses that are characterized by some kind of universal oneness—actually a finite number of possibilities. I mentioned this in the Unfettered series, and there are certain variations.

For instance, around the sixth jhana or practices of resting in awareness, either one can give rise to quite a few states where the essence of things that permeates everything is consciousness or awareness. They're not exactly the same, and if this is the kind of territory whose beauty moves you and interests you, it can be really fascinating to sail on those seas, to navigate that territory and make those discernments.

But that set of perceptions or cosmopoieses that involve a perception of universal oneness—of some kind of universal essential essence—they are more limited as final possibilities. Together with the ones that come through more imaginal practice, they form the whole set of all possible cosmopoieses, which is actually infinite. Although perceptions of universal oneness form a finite set of cosmopoieses, the others are infinite, completely open-ended. There's no limit to what the soul can conjure, weave, create, discover.

So one may be working primarily with a so-called intrapsychic imaginal figure, and then this spreads out into a cosmopoiesis that's shaped, colored by, or in relationship to that particular image one was working with. That cosmopoiesis is very particular, and there are infinite possibilities.

Or one can actually not start with an intrapsychic image, but rather begin with some object of the five senses—something one is seeing, smelling, tasting, touching, hearing. Some sound, smell, taste, touch, or a person that one is seeing, listening to—whatever it might be. One basically starts with the world and the things of the world, and the initial starting point in practice is with that sense contact, rather than with the so-called intrapsychic imaginal. One is starting with the extrapsychic.

And there too, in some instances when we practice, Eros and Psyche and Logos get involved in that sensing, in that perceiving. We speak of perceiving my beloved, my friend, my teacher, my lover—whatever it is—imaginatively. Or we use this phrase: sensing with soul. We're sensing this or that thing, this or that object. We're sensing the world with soul.

Sensing with soul—I introduced this phrase and I'd like to dwell on it a little today and over the next few days. The cosmopoiesis, the movement from an intrapsychic imaginal figure to that cosmopoiesis, is also a sensing with soul. So there too the world is sensed with soul. The order of practices by which we arrived at that point—whether we started intrapsychically or extrapsychically—is irrelevant. At that point of cosmopoiesis, we are sensing with soul.

So those kinds of cosmopoieses are subsets of a larger mode of being that we call sensing with soul.

As a kind of side point, the more traditional kinds of oneness perceptions of the world and those cosmic visions I mentioned earlier—they may be soul-making, as I've said before in other talks, and they may be a kind of sensing with soul if they are newer to the consciousness and so present a kind of beyond. "I haven't quite got my head around this. I haven't quite plumbed the depths of this perception." They present to the psyche a kind of beyond, which is more than I know, more than I'm familiar with, more than I can quite grasp or sense right now. And so they have allure and there's eros there because of the beyond, because of the pothos in the eros.

Those kinds of oneness perceptions can also be soul-making if there's a fantasy of the self in relationship to that experience, or in relation to a tradition that teaches and lays out the way to those kinds of experiences. So that could be soul-making. We could then also call it sensing with soul, when all that is present with a certain image, a certain sense of universal oneness.

Perhaps I'm too loose sometimes, or not caring enough about drawing rigid definitions of words. But another way to carve all this up is to say that soul has two directions of desire, two directions of eros. One is the direction towards unfabricating, towards the unfabricated. And those different states of perceiving universal oneness—love, peace, joy, awareness, nothingness—they are points along that spectrum towards the unfabricated. They are states and perceptions of less and less fabrication. We could order them and delineate them along that spectrum.

And we could say something in the soul—it might not be alive for all people at any time—

But in other words, a person—this might not have come alive for them yet—but I would say that the soul has some desire, some eros in that direction, some pull and magnetic attraction to the beauty and the mystery and the wonder and the deliverance, in the Buddha's words, of those states, all of those states along that spectrum, all the way to the unfabricated. This is a hunger, a desire, an erotic pull of the soul.

And the soul has a second direction of its desire or eros, or the way its desire and eros points and wants to open, explore, expand, unfold. And that is towards—not so much the unfabricated, but towards what we could call poetic or soulful fabrications that include the imaginative faculty, the imaginal faculty.

So there's a movement towards unfabricating and everything that's on that spectrum, all those onenesses. And there's a pull, a movement, a longing, a love, an erotic movement and desire for poetic, soulful fabrications that include the imaginal faculty.

As I said, I sometimes feel I don't really care about the language too much. But let's just say for now, this last one, this poetic, soulful fabrication—soul-making fabrications that include the imaginal faculty—we're going to call or want to introduce the phrase "sensing with soul." In other words, sensing that is soul-making. Therefore, sensing this world, sensing this thing that I'm in touch with—this material thing, this person, this object, this element—sensing in a way that gives rise to some sense and concept of divinity, of sacredness, of meaningfulness, of beauties opening up. So sensing that opens all that up.

And this—this opening up of the sensing of the world in ways that are soul-making, in other words, opening up the possibilities of the sensing of divinity and sacredness and holiness in and through and not just beyond the world itself, and opening that up widely and infinitely in ways that really make a difference to the soul and to one's existence, opening up the meaningfulness and the beauty—this to me is the main point of imaginal practice. It's not so much getting fascinating images or this or that, but this transformation of the whole sense of existence, this redeeming and healing of the whole sense of existence, this open-ended creation and discovery of what exists, all of existence. This to me is really the main point. And that can be very subtle at times and very undramatic.

To me, the main point of even intrapsychic imaginal practice is not so much the intrapsychic images for their own sake. Yes, healing comes in all this practice, imaginal practice, soul-making practice. Personal healing comes. Yes, dukkha is healed, attenuated in all kinds of ways. I'll dwell on that in the next talk. Yes, all this imaginal practice, the way we're teaching it and the sensing with soul and all of that, catalyzes, fertilizes, works and brings to—I was going to say fruition, but it's also an open-ended process—what we could call self-growth or my psycho-spiritual process, your psycho-spiritual process. What a Jungian would call individuation, though there are significant differences.

In other words, yes, all this imaginal practice brings personal healing, brings the resolution of my dukkha and actually also the dukkha in the world. Because we live, we see the world differently and we care for the world differently because we see it with soul, we sense it with soul. Our relationship with matter, with nature, with other human beings and other sentient beings is also deepened and enriched, made more beautiful, made more meaningful, made more importantly woven into our very sense of existence and value. So all this has huge implications for the reduction of dukkha.

But we could also just refer to all this—personal healing, reduction of dukkha, individuation or something akin to it, personal meaningfulness and relevance, personal process work—we could include all of this under the term "sensing with soul," where the self also is sensed with soul. In that way, with regards to one's own person, one's own existence, one's own self, the self becomes an object of soul-making. The self becomes an erotic other. The elements of the self become erotic beloveds to our own soul. The self and my existence and my journey and my struggles become pregnant with meaningfulness, amplified with different meanings and meaningfulness. I start to see the beauty of myself, the beauty of my journey, of my struggles, of my aspirations, of my efforts. I start to see the divinity of myself. And that has nothing to do with ego.

As we talked about on the Re-Enchanting the Cosmos retreat, there's a re-enchanting of dukkha, of my suffering, of my travails, my tragedies, what life has given me to work with, to deal with, to face. The whole sense of self is opened when it's sensed with soul. And all that self-process and soul-fertilizing of the self, soul-making of the sense of self, is happening in a context where the world and others and objects and the things of the world are also re-enchanted.

So all that is happening—something akin to individuation and personal healing and personal reduction of dukkha and all that. But the main point is this sensing with soul, sensing existence with soul—existence and the things, the elements of existence with soul. To me, that's the main point. That's where all this is going.

I want to quote a little bit from a philosopher that I've been getting acquainted with over the last six months or year, named J.N. Findlay.

He's dead now. And he was very unfashionable when he lived. I think he died in the 80s, so he lived, born in the early twentieth century. And he would be interested in certain philosophers and branches of philosophy and directions in philosophy that were really not fashionable during the period of his life, so that he spent a long time kind of really in the provincial outskirts, sort of banished because people thought he was a bit of a fuddy-duddy.

But I find a lot of what he says and writes and what he's trying to get at and trying to open up and trying to emphasize the importance of—I find it very beautiful, very touching. And I just want to quote from an essay that's slightly autobiographical, and he says of himself: "I myself have always been constitutionally mystical, feeling that certain kinds of rapture concerned with work, beauty, love, and a few other things, are the only things absolutely worth having." Listen to that. The only things absolutely worth having.

"I dropped my mysticism for a long period, partly on account of certain disillusioning experiences in my twenties with certain spiritual groups" that he was involved with, "and partly out of deference to the dry methods and doctrine that prevailed in British philosophy."

Then he says, latterly, however, increasing age—he was only sixty-two when he wrote this—has brought him back to his openness to mysticism and his seeing of just how important that is. And these aspects of beauty, love, work, beauty, love, and a few other things are the only things absolutely worth having.

And he also says, also seeing "the completely nugatory accomplishments"—that means the completely trivial accomplishments—"of purely unmystical analysis." So he was a mainstream philosopher in that sort of very dry Anglo-American tradition that prevailed for so many years and still is quite popular. And he knew all that, he worked with all that, he was respected as a proponent of all that in academic institutions. But then, as he approaches the end of his life, seeing the completely nugatory, trivial accomplishments of purely unmystical philosophical analysis, "I have found myself reverting increasingly to my original mysticism."

Sometimes, you know, maybe it's certain teachings, or maybe it's certain kinds of philosophy, and you just think, well, so what? So what? So for me, and one could even say, even with working with the imagination, it's like it can be, oh, so fascinating, and it's also so kind of sexy-sounding, or whatever. But the main point to me is this sensing existence with soul. For me, of course, you're free to make whatever is your main point, and whatever's most important to you, but for me, and my intention in sort of even starting with these teachings was always that. It's the re-enchanting of existence, the opening up of the possibilities and the legitimizing of and making accessible the possibilities of genuine, vital, and meaningful, and deeply transformative senses of sacredness—in the plural, senses of sacredness. That's my sense of what's most important here.

So in all this, there's a process or journey of opening to make more accessible and more refined this soul dynamic, soul process of the creation slash discovery—or the creation and discovery—in very individual ways as well as collectively or socially together. This creation and discovery of senses of sacredness, sensing the world with soul and the possibilities there.

Life and death, existence, self, others, objects, world, matter—all the elements of being become image, can become image. That doesn't mean all the time, twenty-four hours a day, every day. But the access to that, the refinement with that, the flexibility, the depth and breadth of that, it grows. It gets worked, gets opened over time. And all of that, all the elements of being—matter, self, other, world, life, death, existence—can be perceived imaginatively in the infinite different ways that that is possible, in the infinitely richly and bountiful ways and helpful ways that that's possible. All of that can get sensed with the soul. And that, to me, as I said, is the primary thrust, or where this is going, the intention of what is being opened.

Now, just a little bit, again, I mentioned it already in the first talk at some point, but about vocabulary here. So we've been using this word imaginal, and we're still using it, and I personally don't intend to necessarily give it up. But I am aware, of course, as I said, that it can be confusing for some people, or it has been confusing to some people, whether they're aware of it or not, or limiting for some people. So I just want to say a bit about these different vocabularies—imaginal and sensing with soul—and really kind of, again, introduce or wave the flag for this new phrase, sensing with soul, alongside the word imaginal as a complement or an alternative. And actually, say they can be used almost interchangeably, I think.

So for some people, it seems that the word imaginal seems to imply a necessary involvement or centering around an intra-psychic visual image. Just the word image in our common usage in the wider culture seems to imply something visual and seems to, for meditators, imply something intra-psychic as opposed to like an image in an advert or something. And then we've been through this as well and some people say, well, I don't get any of those. I don't get any images. So there's still this idea of intra-psychic visual images.

So I thought about it, and it occurred to me that maybe the phrase sensing with soul would be a helpful complement to the word imaginal, perhaps, for some people. Why? Because sensing with soul would imply, or it seems to me to imply, that it includes seeing, hearing, touching people, being touched and the use of the kinesthetic sense. Tasting, smelling, thinking and imagining. Any and all of those, if we say seven senses, if we count thinking and imagining as the sixth and seventh. And you'll know that classical Buddha Dharma counts the mind—whether it's thinking or imagining or all that—as the sixth sense.

But any of those senses—seeing, hearing, touching, being touched by, tasting, smelling, thinking and imagining—can be engaged with soulfulness or in ways that are soul-making. So sensing with soul means using any of the senses in ways that are soul-making, using them with soulfulness.

Now, of course, this just begs the question: what do the terms soul, soulfulness and soul-making mean? That needs explaining, which I've done elsewhere, but I will explore again. So there's a kind of circularity of definition, but all the most... well, I was going to say all the most important things in life have circular definitions, but let's just say this one does. And that's fine, because hopefully you will really get a sense and a taste of what we're talking about here.

This phrase then, sensing with soul, implies an involvement or inclusion of both intra-psychic phenomena—images—and perceptions of this world and material objects and others in this world. In other words, sensing with soul embraces both the so-called intra-psychic and the extra-psychic.

It may be that the tendency with the phrase "sensing with soul," because of the emphasis on sensing and our usual association of sensing with the five senses and hence the link to the extra-psychic and the material world, might drift the other way for some people, away from the intra-psychic. But no phrase or term is going to be perfect and eliminate all incompleteness of understanding or misemphasis or unfair emphasis of direction. So I want to introduce it as a kind of complement, or for some it will be an alternative to the word imaginal—as I said, embracing both the intra-psychic and the extra-psychic.

But also the phrase "sensing with soul" hopefully makes it clear that images are not necessarily visual. We could give so many examples here, but I think it was in the talk "Image, Mythos, Dharma," in the first part of that talk...

Some of you may be really dedicated musicians, deeply into that art of music and that whole life. And in the way that a musician who is really into it, in the moment when they are playing with soul, their instrument—the way they touch the instrument, the way they move their fingers or their lips, the contact, the manner, and all the extreme subtleties that you would be really hard-pressed to even analyze into their components or sum up—that way of touching and playing an instrument is part, of course, of their technique. It's part of how they are accomplished in the way that they get the instrument to make the sound that they want it to make. But it's also imbued with soul.

So again, if you're a musician, you'll recognize this: when you're playing with soul, then the way you're touching the instrument, the movement and the contact and the kinds of contact with the instrument, the actual physical impact, is being perceived with soul, perceived soulfully, sensed with soul, and also moved by soul. So the whole thing—all that touch and contact—is imbued with soul and actually involves a perception of the self, some kind of other, which may be the instrument and the music and the sound and maybe other musicians in the present moment that one might be playing with, and also other musicians in history that are alive as images somehow imbuing your music-making creative process in the moment. And also the world and the audience and the sense or the imaginal perception of the audience's participation and listening and involvement and enjoyment and openness and appreciation of the music.

There's nothing necessarily visual there. The imaginal element of sensing with soul is really happening in the touch and in the listening. It's happening... and if we're talking about the way of touching the instrument, it's very, very subtle, and the way it's woven into touch there is very, very subtle.

Maybe more accessible for a lot of people would be an example of the way lovers touch when they're in love. Of course, it's sensually pleasant. Of course, there is goodwill communicated. But there's another element there of the erotic imaginal in and through the touch. Even if one has one's eyes closed...

You understand, so sensing with soul, or sensing and acting with soul, involves all kinds of perceptions of self, other, object—could be in any of the senses—and world. All seven senses.

Actually, on that musician example, some of you know B.B. King, the blues singer who died not too long ago, a great blues singer and guitarist. And he, you may know this if you know him, called his guitar Lucille. So his guitar was, for him, a feminine person that he had a real intimate relationship with. So there's an imaginal relationship there, and maybe a sensing with soul. But that's relatively gross. If you just say, "Oh, his guitar becomes a person," that's a relatively gross sort of sensing with soul, a relatively gross imaginal perception.

When someone might not personify their instrument that way, for example, and the whole sensing with soul is happening, as I said, through the touch or through the sense of the audience or through the sound or through the kind of historical connection that's happening so subtly with previous musicians who are images for us... but the main point here was that it doesn't have to be visual. So it can be extremely subtle and can happen through any and all of the senses.

And again, notice that when I made kind of seven senses there, thinking is included in sensing with soul. So again, in the thinking, in the conceiving mind, there can be a soul-making fantasy of thinking, of my thinking, of the thinking happening itself.

It becomes imaginal. The thinking itself, our sense of our own thinking becomes imaginal—we perceive it imaginatively, we sense our own thinking with soul. Then the thinking itself becomes an image, becomes erotic. Our thinking, the thought, the thinker, ourselves as thinker.

And also, a distinction we've already made: there can be a soulful conceptualizing of, or a soul-making with respect to or in relationship to, one's conceiving.

So all of the senses can be arenas—spheres, to borrow the Buddha's word, ayatana—for soul-making. Soul-making can happen through and with and in all the senses.

In some respects it's useful to make a distinction between intra-psychic images and extra-psychic sensing with soul—intra-psychic sensing with soul, extra-psychic sensing with soul, or the imaginal perception of this material world. Let's say sensing the soul includes the intra-psychic imaginal, and we can just about use the words interchangeably: imaginal and sensing the soul.

If we explore a little bit the nature of sensing, the phenomenology of sensing, and this notion of sensing the soul, I'll just highlight a few things.

One could say that there are good, justifiable reasons for saying—from a certain point of view, or a certain way of thinking about things, analyzing things—that any and all perception, which means any and all experience or any and all appearances (I use those words perception, experience, and appearance pretty much interchangeably), is fabricated in a way that involves or mixes or relies on the cooperation of or is infused by four elements, dimensions of our being or aspects or factors.

One is conception, and I've emphasized this before. That includes everything from the most gross conception to really, really subtle conceptions and assumptions about what is real and what knowledge is. Any kind of delineation of perception involves a delineation of conception, whether we're conscious of what's going on conceptually or not—and for the most part we're not. So conception.

Secondly, intentionality or desire is also a factor involved in, mixed in with, cooperating in and infusing any fabrication of any perception. Any perception at all. So that means: what is actually the intention in perceiving? What is the desire? What kind of desire is it? Is it clinging—and if you know the way I would explain the phenomenology of perception and the whole ways of looking and fabricating, it needs to be some kind of clinging. Is it craving, though, or is it eros?

Some kind also of aspiration, which might be very developed—the aspiration to see along some kind of dharmic lines, to see impermanence, or the aspiration for liberation, or the aspiration to sense with soul. It might be quite a developed and conscious aspiration, a sophisticated aspiration, or it may be very, very subtle. It may be conscious, it may not be conscious. But some kind of intentionality or desire or aspiration is involved as a second factor.

The third, we could say, is just sense data.

These four factors—the fourth being the imaginal faculty—are all involved and mixed together, or they cooperate, or they infuse each other. We could say they're in dialogue with each other. Sense data, the imaginative faculty, conception, and desire, intentionality, aspiration, are in dialogue with each other to inform, shape, influence our perceptions of anything, of life, things, and existence in any moment.

Though dialogue is not really a good word because it implies a kind of separability—this is in dialogue with that. The imaginative faculty is in dialogue with the sense data as if the sense data was something raw and pristine and we could arrive at it and separate it on its own. We can't. That's not possible despite the sort of teachings of bare attention that used to be quite common in the Dharma world.

These four factors are inseparable. They are mixed together in a way—we're artificially separating something just as a conceptual structure right now that's not actually separable. So sense data is always mixed with conception. It's always mixed with intentionality and some degree of imaginal faculty.

So each of these four—conception, intentionality or desire, what we might call sense data (in inverted commas), and the imaginal faculty—they are all involved to some degree or other. In other words, you can have a really rich involvement of the imaginal faculty, and it can be shaped this way or that way, like towards more papañca, or towards more soul-making, or colored this way or that way. And as I said, there can be a really sophisticated, conscious involvement of the conceptuality, or just a very unconscious and not very sophisticated involvement of conceptuality.

So they all can be more or less, each individually and relative to each other, and they're inseparable and there's a confluence—they're all influenced, they're all mixed together.

We can say that with some justification as a sort of way of conceiving what's happening with any and all perception, any and all experience or any and all sense of an appearance.

When we talk about sensing with soul, one way of understanding what we really mean is that those four factors are working in a way that brings soul-making, that opens soul-making. So the conception operating, the kind of desire or intention or aspiration operating, and the imaginative faculty operating, are operating in a way that supports and opens and nourishes soul-making in the moment, so that the imaginative faculty is not papañca, towards papañca, nor is it so reified—that would be a good distinction to make.

but it's more imaginal with all those elements.

So sensing with soul is simply those four factors mixing and cooperating, each existing in certain states, and through the way they blend together, soul-making emerges as the result. This offers another way of understanding what unfolds in these moments.

When there is extra-psychic sensing with soul—meaning material objects or persons present to us in physical actuality are perceived imaginally—there is an obviously direct meeting, mixing, infusing, or involvement of the imaginal faculty. When I perceive my beloved and see her, him, them imaginally, when I sense them with soul, or sense this tree or mountain imaginally—perceiving it with soul—the involvement of the imaginal faculty becomes very obvious and direct in that imaginal perception of things, of life, of matter, of world, of objects.

When the sensing with soul is more intra-psychic, the involvement of the imaginative faculty with life, events, and material objects is present, but seems less direct. We have discussed this kind of mirroring and echoing—sometimes it is not so obvious. Yet in both cases, whether intra-psychic or extra-psychic sensing with soul, the imaginal faculty is involved in both ways it meets the world. In the intra-psychic sensing, the meeting of the imaginal faculty with the world is sometimes not so directly apparent.

But whether we speak of intra-psychic or extra-psychic sensing with soul—and you can tell I don't really even like those terms—all sensing with soul implies that reverence is present. All sensing with soul involves reverence, involves humility, involves love, involves the perception of and being touched by beauty. Beauty opens up the perception of beauty in ways that are deeply meaningful. This involves love, a sense of duty or duties, a sense of unfathomability—something beyond my perception and conception that the eros, the pathos within the eros, wants to reach toward, connect with, know, become intimate with, open to.

All sensing with soul includes dimensionality, a sense of dimensionality, and eventually a sense of divinity. It involves soft, elastic edges, some attenuation of grasping, and eros as well. It will preserve the twoness we discussed, even while we remain aware of an underlying oneness. All sensing with soul, if we stay with it, will eventually reveal a sense of participation and a conception—even if vague—of participation, and so forth. Essentially, the entire list we explored before, all those twenty-three elements and probably more we didn't include, will be present when sensing with soul. All of those elements and aspects are important components of sensing with soul.

If we place this in a slightly different context and consider sense contact—borrowing this phrase from the Buddha regarding sense experience—we might ask: what are the possible skillful modes of sense contact?

Before outlining these, let me point out that "skillful" is a word the Buddha used. But what constitutes a skillful mode of sense contact? Several things come into play. First, what is skillful is contextually determined by at least two factors. One is tradition—the tradition we inhabit determines or decides for us what kind of sense contact is skillful. It establishes what skillful means.

If opening to seeing Christ in everyone and everything is the goal of the path or an element one wishes to cultivate, this obviously determines what skillful means. If one interprets Theravada Buddhism along certain lines, then skillful carries quite a different meaning. Even within Buddha Dharma, you can see how this word means quite different things to different interpretations of the Pali Canon. What does skillful sense contact mean?

We must always remember that all of this is contextualized by tradition. We are informed by, persuaded by, sometimes indoctrinated by the tradition we inhabit. Whenever we use "skillful," it remains relative to a certain tradition or according to a certain tradition.

Related to this point, the word skillful—or the label skillful for any kind of sense contact, thought, or conception—is also contextualized or contextually determined by one's long-term and short-term aims. For instance, my long-term aim might be to explore all this imaginal territory and open up the eros. But it might be that right now this is not the right approach, and I need to move into another mode. So presently, the skillful sense contact would not be to open up more eros—the fire is already raging in a way that's not helpful, and I need to relate to sense contact differently.

If the long-term goal is knowing the unfabricated and eventually not being reborn, this forms a long-term aim that informs what skillful means. But the short-term aim might simply be making it to the teacher's talk tonight. So I cannot be unfabricating too much because I won't be able to get there—I won't be able to find the place or function in the world if I'm constantly unfabricating like that.

We can make many such distinctions. The point is that when we speak of skillful modes of sense contact, we must understand this as a contextualized word dependent on various factors.

That said, we could delineate four possible skillful modes of sense contact, of sensing. One is simply the normal way we engage sense contact when moving through the busyness of life, encountering objects and tasks that need completion. There's a kind of perfunctory mode of sense contact—

And of course, this is perfectly fine at times. We need such moments. We simply move through the world—get in the car and drive it, get on the bike and ride it to reach our destination. Sense contact is delineated for practical purposes. We're accomplishing something toward some other end, hopefully a beneficial one. This mode is completely appropriate, according to the Buddha Dharma, when accompanied by a certain level of mindfulness—just a basic level of what the Buddha calls sampajañña, usually translated as clear comprehension. I know where I am, what I'm doing, how my body is positioned, where I'm going, and what my intention is. This basic mindfulness within a normal mode of sense contact—moving through a busy life, getting things done—is fine and completely appropriate at times.

A second possible skillful mode of sense contact involves what we might call a slightly more intense mindfulness, specifically a more narrowly focused mindfulness directed through the lens of some dharma concept. For example, sense contact viewed through the lens of the second foundation of mindfulness, or the first foundation, or aspects of the fourth foundation when the Buddha delineates certain lists. This might involve sense contact examined through the dharma lens of the six sense spheres, or fields, or the eighteen sense constituents—organizing one's experience according to this more intense and narrowly focused mindfulness. In other words, focused narrowly according to this dharma lens.

This second approach has the effect of simplifying things through a certain reductionism. By virtue of this kind of lens or grid through which we examine experience—three kinds of vedanā, three kinds of reactions to three kinds of vedanā, and so forth—we're simplifying through reductionism, through a certain kind of helpful reductionism. Even the idea of bare attention as a dharma concept becomes a dharma lens. It's simplifying and helpful. The same applies to the four elements—earth, air, fire, water—or simply the idea of contact, or the twelve links of dependent origination.

This approach is extremely valuable at times, as you know if you've practiced this way. Because of the simplifying and other factors, there's a relative degree of lessening of clinging and craving. There's a relative degree of less fabricating. Things simplify and are fabricated less to a certain degree. These modes of sense contact or ways of looking are extremely valuable—really helpful, genuinely beneficial skills to develop.

A third kind of possibly skillful mode of sense contact is one that senses or sees, if you like, or knows oneness. We've explored different kinds of oneness—love or awareness or peace, or even the emptiness of phenomena. The sensing then becomes a different kind of reductionism, not so atomistic. When this is really deep, there's almost a mode of sense contact that doesn't buy into the whole idea of contact. It's not so much this touching that, this sense sphere touching that. Instead, there's a sense that all is one essence.

Rather than this sense base touching that sense object, there's more a sense that both the so-called sense base and so-called sense object are really just waves or foam in the same sea, the same ocean—not so much this touching that. This too is extremely valuable at times, extremely beautiful. With it comes probably an even greater degree of lessening of clinging and craving and fabrication.

Actually, as we discussed before, one can unfabricate so much that even the perception of sense contact fades. One doesn't actually have bodily sensations, and sometimes even vision or hearing fade—there's actually a dissolution. In this third mode, in what we could call the direction of unfabricating or seeing different kinds of oneness, the whole structure of sense contact begins to melt into oneness and actually into a kind of fading and disappearing.

Then we could say there's a fourth possibly skillful mode of sense contact, which is what we're calling sensing with soul—imaginal sense contact, imaginal sensing. In this mode, my personhood and the personhood and particularity of what is sensed is preserved. There's no reduction to merely seeing some kind of process with different constituents, as in the second mode, nor atomization, nor dissolution into some kind of true nature of love or being or awareness or other kind of oneness. Instead, there's a preservation of both my own and the object's personhoods, souls really.

This mode also liberates and makes present different kinds of senses of beauty—and again, beauty means much more than just pleasant vedanā or pleasant sensations arranged. It liberates and brings to presence a sense of meaningfulness, much more so than the getting-things-done quality of the first skillful mode of sense contact. It liberates a sense of mystery, unfathomability, holiness, value—all these elements of soul-making we've been discussing.

This fourth approach, this sensing with soul, this sensing in a way that is soul-making and involves the filling out of that dimensionality, that amplification, the expanding of all that's involved—this too decreases craving and increases equanimity. So we talk extensively about eros and fire, but we shouldn't overlook the fact that this sensing with soul...

generally also brings equanimity in a different way, but at a very deep level. And it also involves a reduction, in the moment that we're sensing with soul, a reduction of craving. And I will also say more long-term. When we sense food with soul, and that becomes more a common and frequently accessible perception of our food, for example, then the whole kind of craving for—I need to eat X or Y or this tasty food, or it has to be like this, or it has to be whatever—it gets attenuated, it dies down.

We are fed by something much more important than pleasant vedanā, much more nourishing than pleasant vedanā. The body is nourished by the food and the soul is nourished by the soul-making perception of the food, by sensing the soul. And as I said, this kind of sensing with soul and sensing one's existence with soul brings, I feel, a really profound and widespread equanimity.

If I speak personally, there is a very immediately accessible example: just in relation to my cancer and the possibility, being given such a dire prognosis, the possibility of dying very soon. When I am able—when I sense my existence and myself and my illness and my life and my death with soul, and confronting, including, embracing with soul the very real possibility of death soon, and all the disability and the impediment and the restriction and the unpleasantness and the difficulty and the incapacity that being ill long-term involves—when I sense that with soul, and in all kinds of different possible ways, I honestly say what a deep equanimity comes.

It comes in a very different way than just seeing it's empty. Oh yeah, it's impermanent. Life is impermanent. Health is impermanent. Very different way than just applying mindfulness to unpleasant sensations. Different way than oneness. There's a whole different realm of possibilities for the letting go of craving and for the deepening and strengthening and widening of equanimity in one's life in relation to the most difficult elements that can be faced or experienced.

Just the point right now is this fourth possibly skillful mode of sense contact we can move in and out of. A developed, mature practitioner will move between these skillful modes of sense contact. But this fourth one, sensing with soul, different than the others, also involves, to some degree, less fabrication, but still preserves fabrication. It involves less craving, but more eros. And it brings equanimity, as should the second and the third.

A second point, perhaps, in contextualizing this idea of sensing with soul: sensing with soul must include, at least implicitly, sensing with mindfulness. Now, people use the word mindfulness in quite broad ways and emphasize different aspects of it according to different schools and ways that it's taught. But sensing the soul must include, at least implicitly, sensing with mindfulness, which includes then, to me, the qualities of presence, wakefulness, careful attention. These are central to what we mean by mindfulness, of course. And there's no sensing the soul without presence, wakefulness and careful attention.

Sensing the soul also includes the qualities of sensitivity and responsiveness. So sensitivity and also the capacity to modulate our mindfulness or where we direct the attention or how we respond—that's part of mindfulness, at least in the way some people would teach it. It's not just a blanket, one-gear sort of passive mode of attention.

Mindfulness also includes appropriate attention. That's a translation of the Pali yoniso manasikāra, which is sometimes emphasized and sometimes not at all, but it's linked with mindfulness, and the Buddha placed a lot of emphasis on it. It was a very important concept for him. I would translate it as something like minding, or knowing, or even thinking by way of the matrix, or by way of the womb—yoni means womb, matrix. This implies that involved in the whole way we're paying mindfulness and involved in the intention of mindfulness is an interest in exploring and investigating and an attention to the dependent origination of what arises and what passes.

So in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta when it says attending to the arising factors, attending to the dissolution factors, some people just translate that as noticing arising and passing—in other words, noticing impermanence. But the Pali word that goes with it is samudaya, which really means dependent arising—the same word used in the arising of suffering and the arising in dependent origination. So in its broader sense, I would tend to emphasize that that's what appropriate attention means or includes: this awareness of the dependent origination of what is arising and what is passing.

Similarly, when we're sensing the soul, we're attuning to, interested in the dependent origination of what is happening. Sensing the soul is not just a kind of passive receiving in a fixed mode. It's agile, responsive, flexible, and aware of and interested in the dependent arising. Like, if I trust a bit more, then the image opens up more.

dwell with my sense of humility, or whatever it is, then the thing becomes more imaginal. As it becomes more imaginal, I see that the self becomes image. All this is the dependent arising of the imaginal perception, the dependent arising of what is sensed with soul.

And so for some people, that is an important part—that appropriate attention, as it's sometimes translated, yoniso manasikāra, is an important part of what mindfulness means and likewise an important part of what sensing the soul involves.

The third of the qualities of mindfulness that we can just highlight right now of sensing with mindfulness that is also implicit in sensing with soulfulness is reverence, which we've touched on before. Mindfulness is nowadays taught in different settings, with different intentions, with different slants, with different contexts of cosmology and all kinds of business. But many people in teaching mindfulness actually very beautifully emphasize that mindfulness involves a kind of reverence. It's included either explicitly—maybe not that word exactly—or just implied as an aspect of mindfulness in many contemporary mindfulness teachings.

Reverence for what though? So sometimes it might be, again, implicit or explicit. Reverence for this moment. Sometimes that's what's communicated. Reverence for life, with a big L. Reverence for what is. These are all either explicit or implicit communications that go along with the different ways mindfulness is presented.

Still, those kinds of reverences or objects of reverence, if you like, are different than a reverence for soul—with all the open-ended creation and discovery that is implied and involved in the word soul. And a reverence implicitly then, in the reverence of soul, implicitly for the possibility that this experience, this experiencer, the self, me, this object, experience—that this matter, that is also soul. So when there's a reverence for soul, there's an implicit possibility that all that too can be included as soul. It is soul or can be ensouled, if you like—come to be sensed as soul.

So when the reverence in the sensing for soul, sensing with soul, the reverence is really for soul, which may be quite different—that may not be in the circumscription of certain mindfulness teachings, where the reverence may be more for nature, or this moment, or life, or what is, or whatever it is. Reverence for soul that's included in sensing with soul is broader, more far-reaching, more multi-dimensional, as we've explained. But anyway, reverence as an aspect of mindfulness—and because sensing the soul includes, at least implicitly, sensing with mindfulness—reverence is there. There are overlaps.

And mindfulness, actually, again depending on how it's taught, but basically mindfulness includes, implicitly at least and usually explicitly, discernment regarding what leads to suffering and what leads to a decrease in suffering. Because mindfulness, the teaching of mindfulness, is actually embedded in the centrality of the Four Noble Truths, which concern themselves absolutely fundamentally with what leads to suffering, what leads to locking suffering into place, what leads to increasing suffering, and what leads to freeing from suffering, decreasing suffering.

Sensing the soul also involves a discernment along these lines. It involves discernment generally, as we talk about all kinds of discernments, but also discernment between eros and craving. And here again, it's like the movements of desire that not just lead to more suffering or less suffering, but also soul-making or not soul-making. And discerning between imaginal perceptions that are more going in the direction of papañca, and ones that are more along the spectrum towards the imaginal. And discerning between concepts and logoi that nourish and open and support soul-making, and those that imprison soul-making and also imprison the being, and those that don't.

So discernment is actually a factor of mindfulness, and likewise it's present in sensing the soul. I would say that the range of discernment is broader in the sensing the soul as well.

And last, just to point out—to repeat, I've already said it—but sensing with soul involves play. Play is an element in the sense of the permission and the capacity for flexibility, fluidity, experimenting, trying things out, curious responsiveness and experimentation.

And so play, as I would understand it, needs to be part of the image and the idea, the logos, of practice, of my path, and of my goal. That actually liberation, awakening, enlightenment—actually one of the things that means is a liberation, a freeing up of the flexibility of ways of looking, ways of relating, ways of being. That's what's liberated. That's what's opened. One of the most significant features for me of what liberation might mean, awakening might mean.

So the image of playfulness and the idea, the notion, the logos of playfulness needs to be part of the image and idea of what I have of practice, of path, of goal. Sensing the soul needs that too, as I've pointed out before.

All right, let's stop. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 110

Sensing with Soul (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 48 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea deepens his exploration of "sensing with soul" - engaging our senses in ways that support soul-making and open dimensions of beauty, meaning, and sacred connection. He examines why conceptual understanding is crucial for sustaining and deepening these experiences, providing the "soil and ground" that prevents soul-making from becoming merely ephemeral.
>
> Burbea articulates two complementary definitions of soul: first, as the phenomenological recognition of qualities like meaningfulness, beauty, and sacred dimensionality; second, as an "organ of sensing" - our capacity to perceive in ways that cultivate soulfulness. He explores the mysterious balance between receptivity (grace, givenness) and active participation (choosing, steering, desiring) in the soul-making process.
>
> The talk focuses extensively on the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic - the three interweaving elements that constitute soul-making. Eros embodies the wanting for deeper connection and intimacy; Psyche represents our imaginal faculty; and Logos encompasses our conceptual frameworks. Burbea explains how these elements mutually stimulate and fertilize each other, with Eros containing pothos (infinite longing) that continually opens new "beyonds" to explore. This process naturally involves transgressing boundaries and making increasingly subtle distinctions - not just conceptually, but in our embodied sensitivity and awareness. Understanding these dynamics, he suggests, is vital for addressing contemporary challenges including our relationship with nature and environmental crisis.

So we introduced a bit of new vocabulary, a new term, sensing with soul, as a possible alternative to the word imaginal for some people, or a complement to it—a way of phrasing things that perhaps gives a slightly different slant or emphasis in case that emphasis was somewhat unfairly skewed towards the intra-psychic previously for some people.

We said that sensing with soul simply means sensing, engaging the senses, being involved with our senses as human beings in ways that support and fertilize or bring soul-making. Sensing with soul is just sensing in ways that are soulful, that bring soul-making.

This business of sensing with soul is potentially vitally, crucially important for our being in the world—for how we relate to existence, for how we relate to the gift of human life, how we relate to each other, how we relate to time, how we relate to nature and the planet, and also to the grave environmental challenges that we face as a species at this point, as do other species.

For me, there's something here in this whole business that we're trying to illuminate from different directions that's vitally important. We can relate to our senses in ways that close certain doors or open doors that we may really not want to open and go down, that may have grave or limiting consequences. Or we can find ways to relate to senses that actually open up gift and grace and beauty and soul.

I want to dwell a little less on giving examples and focus again on understanding what are we getting at here? What's involved? Why is this so important? Understanding the concepts involved allows that vitality to come forth, to come through in our relating to the world. It's actually understanding that can provide a kind of robustness to this whole endeavor, to this whole exploration—a robustness to our experiences.

If we have soul-making experiences, we have experiences that touch us, that move us, that seem to have bigger implications, one of the things that gives them grounding and gives them the ability or potential to be more than just ephemeral experiences that we sometimes forget or that seem to have no consequence or are easily dismissed or don't seem to carry out and bring forth their implications is the absence of a conceptual structure that really gives that soil and ground and rootedness and nourishment and fits it into a context.

For me, this understanding is crucial. I realize that for some people it's not how they tend to relate to things in terms of concepts and structures and how it all fits together. Many of the ideas that we're introducing are quite alien. So I realize that for some people it's quite difficult, for other people it's quite attractive. But there is something crucial and vital about understanding, because that allows the greater vitality of what's going on, of this business of soul-making. It allows and offers robustness, durability, fertility to the whole project, the whole exploration.

So I want to dwell just a little on some of the concepts involved. Sensing with soul, we said, was sensing in a way that was soul-making. Now, why do we call it soul-making? Because if we define sensing with soul that way, it just begs the question for someone listening: well, what do you mean by soul? What do you mean by soul-making or soulfulness?

So why do we call it soul-making? What is made? What is the making? What is soul-making? I've been through this in different ways quite a lot in the last few years, but to say it again, one way we could approach this—actually, before we even say that, was it soul-making?

We pointed out in the last talk that this making is not only a passive process. There's a kind of straddling. It can feel to us, and in the movement of soul-making, it will feel to us that something is given to us. Images are given to us. Circumstances are given to us. Perceptions open up for us in a way as if there's a greater intelligence operating, as if the soul bestows on us as graces these openings that we call soul-making.

And yet at the same time—and that's a very important perspective—there's a sort of opposite or complementary perspective: it's not only a passive process, this making. So yes, there's a sense of givenness, of grace, of necessity, of something being handed to us. And sometimes that involves what is difficult being handed to us, as well as what is beautiful. So yes, there's all that.

But it's not just passive. There is also required in this making our assent, our willing, our choosing, our responsiveness, and our steering, and our desire, our eros. So in the making, it's this mysterious, beautiful, somewhat paradoxical mixture or encompassing of both the passive sense of receiving, giving, grace, and also of doing—our making, our choosing, our design.

But why do we call it soul-making? What is made here? Two ways of approaching this. We could say soul. Soul is made through soul-making. What is being made? Well, soul is being made, hence the word. But then that begs the question: what do we mean by soul?

Again, we can approach this in different ways and at different levels, but we could say soul means a quality—or rather the collection or manifold of qualities, aspects, or dimensions that constitute a sense of soulfulness.

In other words: meaningfulness, beauty, a sense of beauty that touches us, an involvement of the imaginal capacity or fantastical capacity, an ideation or conceptual structure or framework or logos that is stimulated and can support the whole network of elements—the lattice, the constellation of what is involved in soul-making.

Eros is involved—this wanting more connection, wanting more penetration, wanting more intimacy, wanting to know more of the erotic other, the beloved erotic object. There's a sense of theater, this middle way between real and not real, this infinite echoing and mirroring, a sense of theophany, and so forth. All of this constitutes a sense of soulfulness.

Soul means the various qualities, the collection of manifold qualities, aspects, or dimensions that constitute a sense of soulfulness. This is what we mean by soul, and this is what's made in soul-making.

Soul is something we recognize—we recognize soulfulness, we recognize soul, and we recognize soul-making phenomenologically, in our experience. We recognize that dimension or those aspects of experience.

A second way we can think about or speak about soul is—holding this lightly—as an organ of sensing, or an instrument of sensing. The human organism is composed of different organs, and we could think of soul, very lightly, as an organ. It is that in us, or perhaps which we are in, that senses in ways that bring and increase and open a sense of soulfulness.

Soul is that organ that senses in ways that open, support, and deepen a sense of soulfulness. It is an organ of soulful ways of looking.

This organ—which we could put in inverted commas—we can also deconstruct. By putting it in inverted commas, I mean it doesn't have inherent existence. When something doesn't have inherent existence, we can conceive or view it like this, and we can conceive or view it like that. It's open and amenable to different ways of being conceived and sensed.

Because soul doesn't have inherent existence, it is not one fixed thing independent of the way of conceiving it and the way of sensing and looking at it. We can look at it from different angles, different perspectives. We can deconstruct it further into its various elements or aspects or ways of looking or properties.

But we could say soul is this organ which is or holds the capacity and ranges of ways of looking that bring soulfulness. It's an organ that employs ways of looking that support or open, nourish soulfulness—a sense of soulfulness.

It is this organ or instrument or capacity—or you could just view it as a range of available ways of looking. Soul is that. It's more of a verb. Like soul-making, it's a range of ways of looking. And it is this organ, this capacity, this instrument, or range of available ways of looking that is made in soul-making, that is built, that is developed.

Right there, there are two ways of seeing what we mean by soul, or conceiving what we mean by soul. The first is a phenomenological recognition—it's an object of experience. We have the experience of this theophany or beauty or meaningfulness. The second is the imputed subject of that range of objects or experience—this organ of ways of looking that bring soulfulness.

We can conceive of soul as object or as subject, or both.

Soul, in its activation into the soul-making dynamic of Eros-Psyche-Logos—which we'll review in a minute—soul makes. In other words, it creates as well as discovers soulfulness, and it creates as well as discovers soul capacity and soul sensing.

Soul is that capacity to sense, that ability to sense in a soulful way, in ways that bring soulfulness. It makes the objects, the aspects and dimensions of objects, the subject, the self, the world in cosmopoiesis, in sense of divinity, with eros, with dimensionality, with beauty. It makes and creates and opens all that up in the very sense of the fabric, the texture of existence, and the sense of what our existence is.

All that is why this is so important—because it has enormous implications for how we live, how we relate to our life, death, and the world around us. It is this openness and potentially increasing capacity to make soul, which means to sense in those ways, that is so important.

Now, as we just mentioned, soul amplifies what's happening in the soul-making dynamic by having elements. One way of breaking up the elements is to say that eros and psyche and logos are always involved when there's soul sensing, always involved in imaginal perception.

Eros is this wanting more connection, wanting more contact, wanting more penetration, intimacy, opening to the erotic object—whatever that is, whatever that erotic object is, what we might call the beloved other. We've talked a lot about eros.

Psyche—one definition of psyche in this sense is that it's the imaginal faculty. The sense of image, of sensing with image.

And logos is the conceiving faculty—the notion or ideation or whole conceptual framework that's operating at any time with a perception.

So that all these factors are involved when there is a sensing with soul - there has to be eros, there has to be the imaginal image involved, and also some kind of ways of conceiving that support that deepening movement and that sensing with soul, with all the elements of what we call the elements of the imaginal constellation, the elements of soulfulness that we've enumerated.

In the soul-making dynamic - what we were calling the soul-making dynamic, or the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic - these elements of eros, psyche, and logos interact with each other. They get involved with each other, woven into each other in ways that stimulate their mutual feeding, mutual expanding, enriching, complicating, deepening, and widening. This can happen in many ways.

One of the most obvious ways that it happens is because eros, if you heard in the definition, has that "more" in it. It wants more. So whenever there's eros, there is the enjoyment of what is present and the appreciation and the beauty there. And at the same time, it has pothos within the eros. And pothos is the Greek divinity of infinite wanting, of wanting always more. So within it, eros has this pothos that no matter what beauty and what depth and what richness it has, it's always got an element of wanting more.

Rather than being a problem in the way that craving is a problem - this endless thirst that the Buddha talked about, tanha, creating more and more suffering, keeping us on the wheel of rebirth - there's something creative and stimulating and fertilizing about this pothos within the eros, this wanting always more. It orients itself to what is beyond what it already knows, what it already fully experiences, what it's already fully familiar with. It discovers beyonds, if you like. It also casts out and creates beyonds. And it sets itself in relation to - in erotic relation of longing, if you like, or just desire or impetus or dynamic - towards that beyond.

In doing so, it then finds, creates and discovers more beyonds in the sense of what is going on. In the sense of the object, the imaginal sense of the beloved other is deepened, widened, given more aspects and dimensions. All this is created, discovered also in the self, in that imaginal constellation, and then in the world. So eros, because of the pothos, always constitutes a beyond. And that beyond, it wants to move into, it wants to penetrate, it wants to open to what is more. And that engages and stimulates and fertilizes the whole Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic.

When there is more beyond being perceived, then we could say the image is enriched, and then that greater image - the greater beauty of it, dimensionality and aspects and complexities of it - stimulates more eros, and so on. And then at some point, maybe the whole idea of what is going on here - what am I in relationship to? Who is this that is in relationship? What is myself? What is the soul? What is this looking? What is this eros? What is this world around that I perceive? - the whole idea, not just the sense or the imaginal image of all that, but also the whole idea, the notion, the logos of all that, also gets stretched. It has to get stretched.

So either our previous ideas are shattered and they get reconstituted, if you like, in a larger way that can encompass what we're experiencing, or they just get stretched gradually in this whole gradual movement of the soul-making dynamic. So this can be over time, either at sudden junctures where there's a kind of breaking of the vessels, or much more gradually in this kind of elastic stretching over time.

Just to point out something there: in this beyond, eros has an element of impetus to transcend. But the impetus to transcend can be, as we've pointed out a lot in previous retreats - the impetus to transcend can be beyond the appearances, beyond the objects, or it can be a transcending in the sense of transcending just the limitations of our idea and image of what we are presented with, what we are encountering. And in that way it stretches, rather than going beyond into a kind of fading of appearances - the transcendent beyond of unfabricating - it's actually the beloved other itself and the self, whatever eros and soul-making dynamic kind of gets involved with. That object or other gets expanded.

So there's a kind of transcending of the limits, but not beyond the object so much as beyond just what was known of the object. So more gets created, discovered - more dimensions, more aspects, more beauties, all of that. So in a sense, eros has this push or impetus or longing or direction of - we could call it transcending, we could call it transgressive. In other words, literally moving beyond boundaries, moving beyond limits.

I'm just mentioning this as a sort of side point, but because of this pothos in eros and the constitution of the beyond, eros, we could say, or wonder - does it need to be transgressive? Does it need to go across boundaries? Go across - wherever there's a boundary, eros will push across that in different ways. Does eros in a way constellate or create transgression?

Now transgression, if you're familiar with that word, often has a kind of moral implication, doesn't it? But I really mean it in a much broader sense. Transgression of any kind - it may be moral, it may be a transgression of category or type or behavior or divisions - but transgression implies this otherness, something other than what was within the limit, something beyond. Eros, as I said, needs and creates othernesses and beyondnesses.

When people have affairs or find themselves drawn to or attracted, or they can only be kind of sexually or romantically stimulated in certain conditions or environments or when something's happening that's a little taboo, that's a little transgressive or a lot transgressive in the moral sense, I wonder whether part of what's really happening there is it's this natural impetus of eros to constellate a beyond, which it then wants to explore and dive into and open to. It wants to, or it does need and constellate a transgression, but that transgression is actually much - potentially much bigger if we allow ourselves the whole involvement of psyche and logos, the imagination and the logos and dimensionality and all that.

So it's perhaps a kind of limited or constrained or thin manifestation of a movement, of a transgressive movement and impetus in eros, which is really, as I said, a thinner and poorer and limited manifestation of something much larger and more essential and much more potentially fruitful and more giving rise to, more supportive of soul-making than those kind of purely - the turn-on of some kind of taboo often is.

So again, I'm dwelling on the conceptual framework or the understanding of what's really involved when we're sensing the soul and what's really involved—or one way of understanding what's involved—in the soul-making dynamic. I'm dwelling with that and looking at it from different angles, trying to shine light on different aspects of it, because I really think and see that understanding the larger picture—understanding the dynamic, how soul-making works, what it involves, what supports it—really digesting it conceptually in ways that we can actually bring forward and engage in our practice and experience, that understanding of the dynamic will be so helpful, so fruitful. It really gives the whole movement of soul-making much more power, range, and fertility.

Also, it brings a beauty in itself. We see the whole thing when we understand it more. As we understand it more, the whole thing emerges to us or is revealed to us as something of much more power and beauty and consequence. So that's why I'm dwelling a little bit on these elements of the dynamics.

Let's say a few more things about it. If we consider these elements—Eros, Psyche, and Logos—central, if you like, aspects (they're really parts of the same thing, but we could divide them into three, as I've said before, divide that whole soul-making process into three as if they were separate), it seems to me that it might be generally true to say that Eros is more labile, more subject to change, more changeable than psyche, than image, which is in turn more labile, more changeable than the logos.

So it seems like there's a kind of gradation between the three terms or aspects of this trinity—a gradation of how mercurial they are, how changeable they are, how labile they are.

So Eros—and again you'll notice this if you engage these practices and really notice what's going on and track your own experience—Eros comes and goes and fluctuates, it ebbs and flows relatively quickly. Even over a few minutes, the Eros is coming and going, getting stronger and weaker, disappearing and coming back.

An image, the psyche aspect, tends to stay a while, though it does need some focusing on and steadying. We need to kind of engage the psyche aspect, the image, and hold it in a way that it can stay steady. But it tends to be, once it's there, relatively steady. And within that, the eros in relation to that image can ebb and flow up and down.

The concepts involved, the logos aspect, tend to be even more steady, less changeable. They expand or shatter only under greater or more sustained pressure. In other words, only through repeatedly sensing this whole other dimension of being that we get when the eros opens up the image again and again, or if it's very marked—only under greater or more sustained pressure does the logos change, move, stretch, or shatter.

Though with practice, we can be quite agile and quite flexible in deliberately moving between different conceptual frameworks. And again, this is something I would really encourage. It's almost like you can just look at something with a certain logos and then switch, move agilely, look at it with a different logos, a whole different conceptual framework. And that's very much available with the maturing of practice—something I would really like to encourage.

All of that agility and flexibility of conceptual frameworks fits into this much larger logos that is partly a function of the whole deep teaching of emptiness and dependent arising, able to open up. It legitimizes that and allows it, gives us that permission and that ontological and metaphysical legitimation.

If we just dwell with this trinity of Eros-Psyche-Logos and the dynamics involved in that, and say a bit more about logos: the logos in the soul-making dynamic, in the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, doesn't expand only when the sense of the image or the sense of the self expands, when the psyche expands.

What can happen—again, you will recognize all this if you really get into these practices and this way of approaching things and exploring this territory—when there is eros for logos, in other words, when we see the beauty of the whole framework and the beauty of the conceiving function of the soul, when there is eros for the logos and we're attracted towards that and it becomes something that is beautiful, attractive, has a beyond to it, divine, has dimensionality—when there is eros for logos, the logos is ignited through that eros.

And this igniting of the Logos engenders more creation and discovery of new concepts and new conceptual frameworks. You understand? So it's not just through the psyche. There can be a direct erotic connection with Logos itself, with the whole conceptual framework, but also with the very element of the soul that we call Logos, the very capacity or that part of the instrument that we call Logos. And then that engenders more creativity. It's like there's a whole activation of the whole logos structure or strand of the soul. And all kinds of creativity and discovery in regard to concepts and conceptual frameworks is born from that erotic connection with logos when that gets going.

And of course, the whole eros-psyche-logos dynamic might itself be stimulated into expansion when the logos itself is directly stimulated—again, not just by the sense of the image, the imaginal sense opening to then knocking on logos's doors and limits and saying something needs to stretch here. The Logos can be directly stimulated, directly stretched or shattered or ignited by something one reads or something one hears, a concept, a thought, or a thought or concept that arises spontaneously in the mind. And that stimulates the Logos directly to expand, to stretch, to enrich and complicate, deepen, to come alive, to come on fire.

So there are different ways, perhaps different styles, that each of the elements of this trinity operate under, but also different ways in. It's not always the eros stretching the psyche, which then stretches the logos eventually at some point, if there's enough sustained pushing on that and expansion of that. There are many ways these elements can kind of get stimulated, involve each other and fertilize each other.

We could say, and I think it's pretty fair to say, soul-making—it's complex. So what we're trying to unfold here in this kind of vision or logos or conceptual framework of the whole business that we're talking about is complex.

It's not easy to understand, and it's not easy to explain either or sum up in a nutshell. It's quite foreign, quite alien to our usual ways of thinking in modern society. And I would add that probably the way we're conceiving it would be alien to ancient and premodern societies as well.

In somewhat lighthearted justification of this difficulty, I quote Richard Feynman, the Nobel Prize-winning physicist—quite a character and a beautiful spirit who won his Nobel Prize for pioneering work on quantum electrodynamics. The day he was informed that he'd won the Nobel Prize, the phone didn't stop ringing and reporters flocked to his house wanting interviews and photos. One reporter came to him, stuck a microphone in his face and said, "Professor Feynman, can you explain your theory in five minutes for our audience?" Feynman looked at him and said, "Do you think that if I could explain this theory in five minutes that it would be worth a Nobel Prize?"

Some things are complicated, unusual in the way they stretch thinking, difficult to explain, and can't necessarily be summed up very simply until one has familiarity and experience with the terms. Then you can sum things up in a nutshell—but there's a lot being implied in the words spoken.

The word soul, or the concept of soul, like other crucial and important fundamental words—like love, like dharma, like self—concepts that really matter deeply to us and to our sense of existence, are in a way undefinable. And they need to retain a certain dimension of undefinability. It's important that they not get trapped in a logos, in a conceptual framing that is too tight, too rigid, too narrow—so that Eros, Psyche and Logos can expand and enrich themselves, becoming complicated and deeper and wider in relation to that very concept.

In other words, soul-making can happen in relation to soul. The very idea, the very concept of soul is something that soul-making gets hold of and expands by expanding the Logos—enriching, deepening, widening, stretching, shattering, opening, complicating that very concept. The idea and sense of soul will keep opening, deepening, getting richer. It is in itself fertile. If I lock it in too tight, too narrow, too limited and rigid a definition, it can't be fertile. Its fertility is limited.

When we say "undefined," we don't mean nonsense or non-existence—that soul is just a nonsense concept because you can't define it, or that it just doesn't exist. Nor do we mean that realizing its undefinability, we should shrug and turn away from the idea of soul because it's a silly concept, not strictly and rigidly definable. Actually, just the opposite. Its ultimate undefinability opens or furnishes space for a kind of never-ending creativity of exploration. It allows this never-ending creation and discovery in the exploring, in the conceiving, in the logos. And it's this never-ending exploration that is soul-making and is fertile.

One last point: as soul-making gets going and there's the fertility of the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic and the discovery and creation of beyonds and more dimensions and more sensitivities and discernments in both the image and in the sense of eros and in ideas themselves, that creation and discovery essentially makes more distinctions. They're made to perception, made to conceiving, made to nuance, made in the realm of emotion. Making distinctions is part of what happens in soul-making—an element. The whole thing gets more nuanced.

We discern between this and that—for example, between eros and craving. There's an infinite birthing, creating and discovering of distinction-making, discernment-making, not purely conceptual, but also in the body, in the ways we relate to and with the body, in the very sensitivity of the psyche and consciousness and organism and sensing, and also in the concepts.

Soul-making brings distinctions, and making certain distinctions also opens up and supports the possibility, fertilizes the possibility of soul-making. The distinction between eros and craving, for example, is supportive of the whole endeavor of soul-making. If we just limit desire to "it's all craving"—which is way too simplistic—that won't serve soul-making. Or even if we limit it to just either unskillful desire, craving, or skillful desire, kusala desire, chanda for the elements of the Eightfold Path or the factors of awakening—that too is not a fine enough and nuanced enough distinction to support the conceptual elements and experiential elements that are part of soul-making.

So soul-making engenders the making of distinctions, discernments, and fine discernments at all levels and aspects of our being. Soul-making involves making discernments and distinctions—delineations of reality. And certain delineations, distinctions, and discernments support and open, fertilize and catalyze soul-making, catalyze this process of creation and discovery.

Let's pause there.

As I've mentioned now for the third time in this talk, there's a whole other level of beauty and import that becomes apparent, that is revealed to us, and a whole other level of implication and power that also gets revealed when we understand—conceptually, when we really develop a working understanding. This means in practice, not just purely intellectual or abstractly intellectual, but in practice we develop a working understanding of the elements involved in soul-making, what it means, and what sensing with soul means.

That's why I'm dwelling on these elements today.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 111

Sensing with Soul (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 28 min

> In this third part of his exploration of sensing with soul, Rob Burbea delves into the alchemy of perception—the dynamic processes through which ordinary experience becomes imaginal and soul-making. He examines the temporal dimensions of transformation, noting how the eros-psyche-logos dynamic unfolds across different timeframes, from sudden shifts to gradual consolidation over months or years.
>
> Burbea emphasizes the fluid, responsive nature of soul-making practice, encouraging practitioners to balance precision with playful experimentation. He discusses how attention might need to dwell with different elements—self, other, or world—and how various aspects like energy body awareness, emotional resonance, or engagement with desire might require patient cultivation. Drawing from his understanding of the imaginal teachings, he addresses common habits that can limit soul-making, such as avoiding certain bandwidths of experience or falling into overly restrictive patterns.
>
> Crucially, Burbea addresses the question of reification—the tendency to solidify experience—noting that while it can obstruct authentic imaginal perception, practitioners shouldn't become 'reification police' toward themselves. He compares teaching these practices to teaching art or music, where principles provide guidance but exceptions always exist. The talk concludes with encouragement for dynamic responsiveness and freedom to explore, emphasizing that mistakes are part of the natural learning process in developing the capacity to sense with soul.

I'd like to look in a little more detail at the alchemy of perception—that transition, the process through which we come to sense with soul, sense the world with soul, sense others and things. How does that transformation of perception actually happen? What are some of the elements involved in that process? How does life become image? I want to give some examples and explore what's going on there.

But before I do, something occurs to me that I feel compelled to say again, perhaps to reassure you—though I don't know if that's needed. As I said in the first talk, I feel like I'm treading a bit of a tightrope. On one side, I want to bring in a sense of precision and careful discernment, a kind of acuity and refinement of attention and wisdom in terms of what's involved in all this business of imaginal perception—perceiving, imagining, sensing the soul. On the other hand, in that sort of careful delineation and examination of what's involved, I don't want to discourage or make it overly prohibitive or formulaic or too tightly circumscribed.

So I really would like you to feel like you can jump in and play and experiment. It doesn't have to be, "Am I getting it right?" This kind of freeze, this cramp that so often plagues meditators and people on different spiritual paths—especially, I find, in the way we teach insight meditation—I seem to encounter that a lot. So I'm really wanting to strike that balance and say a bit more that helps you feel hopefully free in this process, free to play.

I've pointed out that when we talk about soul-making and that whole journey or trajectory, that direction of soul-making, what we're really talking about is a dynamic process. There's a dynamism involved. In fact, there are all kinds of dynamism involved in soul-making. Eros itself is a dynamic movement towards wanting more, or of bringing something towards us and opening to it. There's a dynamism there.

There is a dynamism in what we described as the very soul-making dynamic—the eros-psyche-logos process, the way they get involved with each other, inseminate each other, fill each other out, complicate, enrich, widen, deepen. There is what I mentioned at the end of the last part of this talk: the kind of process involved in soul-making will bring, will give birth to discernment, discriminations, distinctions, delineations in both our conception and our perception of all kinds of elements of experience—emotional, material, sensory, intellectual, you name it—in terms of the logos, the conceptual framework. And the very making of some discernments and distinctions and refinements of delineation also feeds the soul-making process. There's a kind of dynamism involved in that—all kinds of dynamism involved in the soul-making movement.

And I would say dynamic responsiveness—the ability to respond to what's happening. We talked about that hawk gliding on the thermal air currents, and the ability to respond to what's happening, to dance with what's happening in the being, in the perception, in the body, in the totality of that, and move in response to that very dynamically, very beautifully. That dynamic responsiveness is also an element of soul-making.

However, when I say all that and imply all that—that there's a dynamism involved, that we're talking about dynamic processes involved in soul-making—one also has to consider the time frames of what we're talking about. If something is dynamic, it can be dynamic with a very sudden dramatic shift of something bursting into consciousness or a sudden change of responsiveness that's happening in the moment. Or it can be dynamic in a very almost imperceptible way over time to build up a change. Or it can be dynamic in stages in the sense that we plateau for a while—it's not the best word, but let's say things look relatively static for a while. They're being consolidated. We're steadying with something, and then something suddenly shatters or just gradually changes.

So one has to look at the kind of temporal styles or different temporal characteristics of the way change happens. Dynamic response, dynamism, doesn't mean that there's always change happening, that it's always rapid change, and things are always exploding or moving rapidly. Sometimes it appears like that, and sometimes it's much more characterized by different trajectories of change.

For example—and I did already touch on this when we talked about the eros-psyche-logos dynamic in the last part of this talk—they actually have different labilities. They're changeable in different ways. Logos tends to change more slowly over time. We need to consolidate a conceptual framework or just a new idea, get used to it, over quite some time usually, and then something might shatter or change. Or, in time, with practice, there's this ability to shift it quite rapidly, deliberately.

So we can say logos is involved in sensing with soul. In other words, there's always a concept happening. There's always a conceptual framework being engaged when we're sensing with soul. It's not a non-conceptual experience. But the sort of expansion or stretching or shattering of a logos is something that's usually more gradual, slower over time. It's less labile as one of the elements in that trinity than, say, eros.

As another example, we talked about the movement—the organic movement, if we're not blocking it—for the soul-making dynamic to sort of spread from not just the erotically imaginable object or other, but also back towards the self and the elements of the self, and also out towards the world. What can be very helpful at times is attending to that particular trinity—self, other, world—and just allowing that to be, or encouraging that to be more balanced, the soul-making spreading in a more balanced direction at times.

But even saying that, it doesn't mean it always needs to be balanced. I don't always need to make sure that self, other, and world are equally balanced in this soul-making situation to the same degree or intensity of soul-making that's spreading equally in all directions. No, the whole thing is fluid. So sometimes we're much more with one of those three, much more than the other two. And it may be that we actually need to dwell more with certain poles there. We could add eros to that and make it self, other, world, eros—in terms of what becomes, if you like, an object of soul-making, becomes taken up by the soul-making process and becomes an erotic, imaginal object for us.

But maybe we need to dwell with one of those poles of that pattern. For example, habitually we might not allow the soul-making process to return to ourselves. We're always—and I've mentioned this before—seeing the divinity, the beauty in the other, in the imaginal object. Yet habitually, for different reasons, it doesn't return to the self, or we're blocking it from returning to the self, or simply neglecting to look there. Through the looking, through the noticing, we allow it to ignite the self as an erotically imagined object for ourselves.

So that might be a habit. We might need to linger a little with the self as image and stay there, being somewhat imbalanced the other way for a while, because it's countering our habit. Or it could be the other way around—we're always with the self and in situations where we forget to notice, "Oh, what's happening with my perception of the other at the moment?" We let that become more imaginally alive.

In working with different people, I see people have different habits here. Sometimes, if I'm working with them, I need to gently remind them: "What about that? Can you notice what's happening there?" And then something opens. The water spreads in that direction to balance things out, and that helps the whole soul-making process.

Or it might be that in the soul-making or in the sensing of the soul, we need at times or stages in our practice to give more attention to the bodily experience, the energy body experience in what's going on. This might be because attending to the energy body hasn't become second nature to us—we lose touch with it in our erotic fascination with the other as we go outward. Hence the exercises on tunas, or part of the reason for those exercises we were doing on recent retreats.

We may need to linger more with the energy body and really become accustomed to what it is to pay attention in a way that brings the energy body alive. That in itself can take months and often years. It's really a journey for people. As I've pointed out before, it doesn't just equate with mindfulness of the body. It's a certain quality that opens up the experience of mindfulness of the body, opening up the wavelengths of that experience much more broadly.

Within that, we may be so used to attending to the energy body experience that our habit is always very solid—always just the sensations of the body on the cushion or chair, very gross level, solid level sensations. We need to become accustomed to, and this can take time, the much finer range of the spectrum where things are much more ethereal, and the sense of the body as a kind of luminous space of refined vibration. Or vice versa—that's someone's habitual default, and they need to become familiar with the more solid, earthy sense of the energy body.

Again, in terms of energies and body, someone might be, for various reasons, comfortable with different kinds of resonances and movements and feelings in certain areas of the body—for instance, the heart area can feel very alive there. But when it comes to the hips or the sexual energy, it's a bit cut off or frozen, not felt there. So there might be a period where that area needs to feel out more. Or again, vice versa—the heart and the whole quality of heartfulness and how that feels, the movement of emotionality filling out with the energy body, is not something a person is used to attending to.

Extrapolating from that, maybe within the whole constellation, dwelling more with the emotions as the pole of what one's paying attention to might be important for some people at certain stages in their practice. Really leaning toward that over and over might be very important as a kind of growth.

Or we get the sense of the imaginal and the whole soul-making process, and it's always habitually very nicey-nicey—always white-robed angels of light, very ethereal in the texture of the images, with less of the dark gods. Maybe, conversely, it's all a bit dark and filled with dukkha and angst, or dark in different ways—perhaps sexually or otherwise. There needs to be that opening out to the more obviously traditional, ethereal, beneficent, angelic, light, luminous, refined presences.

Again, what's the habit? What's needed?

Or, as I've noticed recently, the whole realm of desire—for many people, it's actually not okay to have desire. That can be a cultural transmission from the wider culture, an early religious transmission, or something in the family or schooling, or in the Dharma teaching. Even just allowing one's desire and allowing one's eros, if we talk about the opening to the current of desire practice or just the awareness of eros in the imaginal practices.

There might be a period where one is learning to notice desire, actually feel what it feels like, allow it, and be okay with it. Then even recognizing it as a lovely thing and a beautiful thing, and that can increase all the way to sensing it—as I've explained in the Eros Amphitheater talks—sensing it as a divine thing, our desire. It's divine desire.

So that might be a whole way that the dynamic or the constellation needs to be weighted for some people, perhaps for a while.

We've talked about balance and all these elements, but there's also the individual growth or development of a soul, if you like, as an expression. What is the habit that we need to address? "Oh yes, that always happens. I always neglect to do this." It's just a little shift or a little shift of attention that allows us to break out of our normal habit. Sometimes these habits are not—you know, "Oh, that's terrible, that's going to take me decades"—it's just a shift, and then, "Oh, that's moved right there in the moment."

The habit might still carry some entrenchment, but the actual shifting of it often proves less daunting than we imagine. Sometimes the process requires more involvement—we may need to examine certain murky beliefs absorbed from our education, our culture, or even dharma culture itself, beliefs that block off, inhibit, and disallow our desire and our celebration of its inherent beauty, or even the possibility of such celebration.

This brings us to the essential question: What is habit? What does it need? And what is given by soul to me?

It may be given that this particular complex emotion needs lingering with, or that this bandwidth of the energy body—this entire spectrum—requires patient attention. These are gifts from soul, part of our soul-making, our soul education. So we must distinguish: What is given by soul? What is purely habit? What is needed here?

I'm not suggesting these are necessarily easy questions, but I encourage maintaining this quality of light inquiry rather than approaching these questions of balance and dynamism with rigid formulas about what needs to be happening, what should be happening.

There's also the question of personal soul style—the unique way that my soul is, that your soul is, which deserves deep respect. Some people carry more darkness in the beautiful sense of the word—beautiful, rich darkness—as part of their soul makeup. Some people naturally have greater facility with the ethereal than with denser realms. Some simply carry more sexual libido and eros than others. All of this needs honoring.

So we ask: What's personal soul style that needs respecting? What's habit and indoctrination, or simple encrustation through repetition? What is given to me by soul? And what is actually needed?

All of this inquiry remains very light, very open, playful. Don't fear making mistakes in this exploration. As Miles Davis understood, mistakes are simply part of the creative process—not something to fear, but something to respond to dynamically. They become part of our responsive dance.

I really want to encourage this sense of play, this permission and freedom to simply dive in and explore. Though I'll qualify even that statement later.

All this talk of dynamism and dynamics connects intimately with pacing. I believe I discussed pacing in the Path to the Imaginal retreat—though I'm aware there's an abundance of material being communicated, so this concept might have gotten lost in the vastness of information being shared.

Pacing operates on multiple levels. There's pacing in relation to a particular image: How long do I stay with this one image and deliberately call it back? When do I let it move on naturally, transform, or invite another image in? These questions I've explored before.

But now we're bringing pacing into relationship with these elements and this entire sense of dynamism. How quickly do we move through different logoi? Consider the breaking of vessels that I've discussed in several retreats. Vessels cannot break constantly. There must be periods of building—building vessels, building structures, understanding conceptual frameworks, truly absorbing and digesting them, making them work for us, extracting their full juice and mileage. Only then might come the breaking or stretching or questioning.

So there's pacing in all of this—pacing questions and discernments to make throughout this exploration of dynamism with regard to the different elements.

I speak extensively about reification and how crucial this middle way of the imaginal is—this theatrical quality that belongs to the whole sensing of soul and imaginal work. While the reality is more complex than I can fully articulate here, what I want to emphasize now is this: reification is indeed a significant issue, and it often lies at the root of problems we encounter in these practices.

When the work feels like it has exploded or hit a brick wall, when something goes wrong or the soul-making feels stuck, when dukkha arises instead of the opening of the soul-making process, when things fail to be fully or authentically imagined in the way described in this series' first talk—often we can trace these difficulties back to reification of something or other, sometimes quite a lot of things.

This is genuinely the case, and it is truly important. Yet I don't want us to become the reification police, with "Thou shalt not reify" as our first commandment.

We don't, you know, it's like—expect to reify. Look, it's human. To me, that goes with the first noble truth: there is dukkha. Dukkha arises. It's like dukkha rests on reification. And so we will do that. We will reify. Expect to reify.

And again, in the context of what I'm trying to say right now in this little fragment here is: don't get too hung up on all this. Sometimes it's necessary to reify something, and maybe for a while, and there can still be a lot of soul-making that happens in a reified perspective. So it is a big deal, but you don't need to get frozen thinking, "Oh my goodness, what happens if I reify?" so that the whole thing gets stuck that way.

Expect that you will reify. It's probably quite a maturity to really whittle that down so that it tends to happen less and less. But you know, it is a big deal, but don't get too hung up on it. So we really don't want to be the reification police with this, and we don't want you to be the reification police with respect to yourselves.

And so just finally for right now, you know, I feel like whatever I say in all this—trying to make these delineations, trying to say things, "Do you see how this is working? It's like this, or it has this element and not that, or this rather than that, and it must include this"—whatever I say, whatever we say in trying to provide a framework and a platform for all these explorations, there's going to be exceptions. I'm beginning to think so. There will be possible exceptions.

Teaching this stuff, I feel like it's more like teaching art, or teaching music. It's like, yeah, it's really important. You learn rules of harmony and things to look out for when you're improvising and different ways you can do things. "And did you think about this? Or you can explore this and don't forget this," and all that. But whatever one says as a teacher—I think, or whatever one is told as a teacher—there are exceptions possible, and someone can just give an example of exactly an exception to what you've just explained, and the opposite of it.

That doesn't mean, though, that all that explanation, that delineation, and the exploration of those delineations and those refinements of perception and those conceptions and conceptual frameworks is irrelevant just because there are exceptions.

So again, I feel there's this kind of—tightrope's too dramatic a metaphor—but there's a balance and a looseness with precision that's involved in this. A looseness with a precision of discernment and refinement and attention.

So again, I'm inserting this fragment at this point just because it occurred to me and because I really want to encourage and not discourage. So I hope that's helpful.

CHAPTER 112

Sensing with Soul (Part 4)

Rob Burbea · 1h14

In this fourth installment of his exploration of sensing with soul, Rob Burbea examines how soul-making practice naturally evolves toward greater interfusion of life and the imaginal. He outlines four essential conditions for sensing with soul: openness and intimacy with the object of attention, whole energy body sensitivity, reduction of clinging, and receptivity to aspects of the imaginal constellation such as meaningfulness, beauty, and sacredness.

Through detailed examples including a student's experience with vedanā practice transitioning into imaginal perception, and a beautiful ritual involving the sanctification of tangerines, Burbea illustrates how ordinary experiences can become imbued with soul through association, proximity, and recognition of deep value. He presents an extended account of a practitioner's eating meditation that demonstrates how horizontal awareness of interconnectedness can open into vertical dimensionality and sacred perception.

Burbea emphasizes that sensing with soul doesn't replace conventional perception but enriches it with dimensionality, meaningfulness, and sacredness. He concludes by examining how different intentions—particularly the common 'medical model' focused primarily on alleviating dukkha—can sometimes limit the fullness of imaginal perception, suggesting that while suffering may be transformed through soul-making, it need not be the primary goal.

Let's continue. Let me pick up again our elaboration of this idea of sensing with soul and our exploration of the possibilities that can open as there is this opening of the field of experience and the senses—the sense of experience.

Let me start with one larger observation. Generally, it seems to me—and there are always exceptions—but generally, as soul-making practice matures, or evolves, or grows, there is an increasing mixture or interfusion of life and image. In other words, we sense more with soul in different ways. This is something I've observed quite generally, and there are several aspects to this development.

The first aspect concerns what becomes primary more and more—though often in quite subtle ways, not clumsy or ego-driven ways. What becomes more primary is the relationship between the imaginal and life. Whether we're speaking of intra-psychic images or extra-psychic ones, there emerges through the sense of demand and duty what needs to be expressed or manifested. This duty or demand is born from and comes with the image. Again, what I'm describing really isn't too clunky or clumsy—it's not an ego identification or reification, as those patterns have been loosened.

This brings forth the importance of the relation between the imaginal and life, and it can be quite subtle. It brings with it the question of how: What is demanded? What is my duty? How and at what level and in what domain does this image translate into an expression, a manifestation through my life? What is involved in that infinite echoing and mirroring I alluded to earlier? These are subtle and delicate questions.

There's always the problem of gross reification, literalization, and concretization—very oversimplistic translations of image into life. While not always the case, sometimes this can signal a kind of inappropriateness. So this is one aspect that comes with the maturing of soul-making practice: this mixing and meeting and interfusing, more and more, of life and the imaginal, and this opening of the sensing with soul.

The second aspect is that we sense life more with soul. More and more, the mode of sensing that we have is infused with soulfulness, is more soul-making, is more imaginal. We see—if we use the visual metaphor—we see life as image, more and more as imaginal image. This becomes, again, not a permanent state, but something we move much more often and regularly in and out of.

Part of this sensing life with soul includes a kind of recognition, in hindsight, of how much and how often the imaginal and fantasy—different fantasies—have already been operating in our lives. Image is primary. Actually, one way of conceiving all this is that we are driven by fantasy, by image, in a good sense. Sometimes we ignore it, or we collapse it, or reify it, or make it too small, or don't recognize its divinity, or over-identify with it.

But with this growing maturity—both in the understanding and the experience of soul-making practice—one of the facets is that in sensing life more often with soul, and more deeply, more richly with soul, we come to recognize the primacy and frequency of how much and how often the imaginal and the fantastical is already operating in our lives—already primary, already driving, pulling us, calling us. We see and can understand, or rather we can bring this as a perspective—one way of understanding what has been moving us in our lives, what does move us, what galvanizes us, why we choose certain things, why certain ways of interacting tend to manifest themselves in expressions.

So there's this quality where it becomes more about the relationship between the imaginal and life. There's also this capacity where we simply see life more with soul.

Thirdly, there is the widening, the deepening, and the variegating—the making more manifold, creating more options—of our senses of sacredness. In other words, the ways and directions and places and levels at which we sense sacredness expands, gets wider, gets deeper, becomes quite varied.

I should mention that for me, this piece—the opening up and diversifying of the senses of sacredness, sensing the sacredness in life, in existence, in death, in all of it, and all the elements of that—for me, that's the main point. Now, of course, and I really do mean this, anyone is free to decide what for them is the main point. If one is taken with these practices and interested in them, anyone is free to decide what is the main point for them.

But just to say that for me, this is the main point. There's so much richness, so much bounty and gift through these practices, through these ways of conceiving—so much is opened up. But at the end of the day, if I'm just honest, for me, that's the main point: this opening up of the senses of sacredness.

I should add this, because it may not be obvious, and sometimes even that word "sacred"—people think, "What does that mean? I don't know. I can't relate to it." Or it's a problematic word, or a charged word, or a taboo word, or just a dead word.

But just to say, in case it's not obvious, that a sense of sacredness doesn't necessarily mean something solemn or stiff. So increasing the senses of sacredness that we have, that are active in our life, that are working and flowing and opening and dynamic, doesn't mean that we become more solemn and stiff. And sacredness doesn't always translate or manifest in some kind of always sober manifestation. Just witness the poems of Rumi when he talks about Shams. I got a note from a yogi quite a while ago, and she said, "I was with this imaginary figure and we were in hysterics together. It was hysterically funny." You never said that could happen, but all kinds of things are possible, and certainly sacredness does not always look solemn, stiff, and permanently sober.

So those are just a few general observations. But I said I was going to look in a little more detail, probe and open up through examples how this sensing with soul opens up. How does our sensing, when our sensing opens up to a sensing with soul, how does that happen? What supports it? What are the shifts or triggers or influxes or other openings that allow that?

Very generally and broadly, we might say that in order for something in the material world—whether that's a person or an object or an event or whatever it is, or a feeling, an emotion, a state that one is going through—in order that something in the material world or the experiential world is sensed with soul, we could very broadly, very generally say that, loosely, four things are necessary.

The first is that we need to be open to this thing and intimate with it. So this thing, whatever it is, and I'll give some examples, I need to actually meet it and touch it with my consciousness, with the senses. I need to be present to it and I need to be intimate with it. For example, if it's my dukkha that I'm experiencing at a certain time, just in a moment, or it might feel like it's a lifetime of a particular kind of dukkha that I struggle with again and again, I need, in order to sense that dukkha with soul—or in different language that we've used before, for that dukkha to be re-enchanted—this pain, this suffering, this sorrow, this thing that actually I don't like, I need to become intimate with it. I need to open to it and become intimate with it. And this is a sort of sine qua non. It's basic. I can't skip this step. So whether it's my dukkha, whether it's some object, a material object, or some thing, or whatever it is, any phenomenon, I need firstly to become open to and intimate with it.

When I outline these four, I don't necessarily mean that they happen in time, in some linear order. It might be mixed up which comes first.

The second factor or element that needs to be present is, again, emphasizing the inclusion of the whole energy body pervaded by sensitivity, by that kind of delicacy of attention that fills out that whole space and that whole openness to the whole range of vibrational possibility there in the energy body. This, again, serves as a platform, a key, a door to sensing with soul.

Thirdly is some reduction in clinging. Now, not so much that absolutely everything fades. If you're familiar with deep emptiness practices, actually all perception begins to fade. That's actually too much because sensing the soul is a perception, of course, as is internal, imaginal perception. Any sensing of the soul, intra-psychic, extra-psychic, involves the fabrication of perception. So there can't be too much of a reduction in clinging because then all perception or most perception will fade, certainly the level that we call sensing the soul. But there can be actually quite a lot of range. There has to be some reduction in clinging, some kind of loosening of maybe the habitual grip we have, either pushing away or holding on to a certain idea or a certain perception or an energetic relationship with something. Some loosening of clinging is a necessary element in sensing the soul. Again, there's not a temporal linearity to these elements.

And lastly is a kind of whole bag of tricks which we've touched on before. I would say just some receptivity or tuning into whatever the most helpful other element of the —what we call element or aspect of the imaginal or node of the imaginal constellation. So it might be, for instance, humility, it might be the neither real nor not real, it might be anything within them, the meaningfulness, the beauty, anything at all of that list that we went through.

So there are these four elements: openness and intimacy with whatever object we're talking about, and in whatever realm of objects, whether that's intra-psychic, intra-personal, as an emotion, or dukkha, or out there in the material world, or another person, or whatever; whole energy body sensitivity with that openness of what might be included there and the range that might be included there; some loosening of clinging, grip, fixation; and then a kind of open, opportunistic receptivity or tuning into whatever otherwise is the most helpful element of the aspect of the perception there, of the imaginal perception of the sensing of soul.

Now these four elements are often going to be mutually dependent arisings anyway. They're mutually dependent. In other words, as one gets ignited or illuminated or fired up with the imaginal, the fullness of the imaginal, with the sensing of the soul, then it tends to influence the others and open them too. Especially between the second and the third, the sensitivity and awareness, permeation of the whole space of the energy body with the sensitive, delicate energy...

awareness and tuning in there—that factor, that second factor—and the reduction of clinging tend very much to show an easily observable mutual dependency between them. So as we open up to include the whole energy body and an awareness of that, and the sensitivity to that, including that awareness and sensitivity in how we're relating to some object, inner or outer, that opening up of energy body sensitivity tends automatically to attenuate, reduce, and loosen the clinging in relation to that object and in relation to other elements as well—other factors in our being, in our perception.

And vice versa. When there is a lessening of clinging, the availability of the sense of the whole energy body—that kind of awareness of the body as energy body and that space as energy body and all that that means and might be—tends to open up or just present itself, become more accessible or become noticed as there's less clinging. It becomes, if you like, maybe not the default, but one of the strong options for how we then sense the body. As there's less clinging, the body tends to be perceived more as an energy body.

So there's a very obvious, easy-to-spot, mutual dependent arising of the second and third factors of that little list. And with practice, that mutual dependent arising will also be easy to spot with the fourth. The whole list of what we went through—what we're calling the nodes of the imaginal constellation, or the nodes of the lattice of the imaginal constellation—anything there, as I said: humility, reverence, duty, meaningfulness, that whole list, will be included. So we can, in tuning into that, something happens with the energy body and the clinging. And in reducing the clinging, finding ways to reduce the clinging, those elements or one of those elements will present itself, become more accessible, become more available to be receptive to, to tune into.

So with practice, those three—the last three factors of this little four-item list—it becomes obvious, their mutual dependency. Also the first, but it's not necessarily the case that someone opening to and becoming intimate with something, in the usual ways that we talk about it in insight meditation—we put a lot of stress on that, broadly speaking, in the insight meditation tradition. Can you open to it? Can you be with it? Can you become intimate with it? Whatever it is, this experience that's passing through right now.

We put a lot of emphasis on that, but it won't be the case that someone doing that in the context of a more conventional insight meditation approach will then necessarily open up the others. There won't necessarily be a huge reduction in clinging. There will be some, just by virtue of approaching and opening to the object. There won't necessarily be the inclusion of the sensitivity of the whole energy body.

But with practice, these four items or factors of this little list become—one can see the mutual dependency and actually use that to catalyze or enhance or deepen the whole process, the whole movement of opening into sensing with soul.

Let's look at a few examples. I've just chosen a few to give you a sense of this process—what's involved in, what can be involved, the kinds of things that can be involved in experiences, but also what can be involved in the processes of how that transition into opening, into sensing with soul happens.

A student sent me an email some time ago, and she was just describing what was going on in her explorations, in her practices. She was getting very interested in the whole imaginal strand of practice. She was also interested in others—in samadhi and emptiness and all kinds of things. But she was reporting that she was noticing, in her words, "even the emptiness practices are getting consumed by the imaginal."

So the example she gave was: "One minute I'm tracking vedana." She's observing, in other words, the arising of vedana in relation to whatever—she doesn't actually say. It could be the totality of experience, it could be one sense door, it could be one particular experience. "One minute I'm tracking vedana," she says, "and perceiving it as empty."

So that's an extra kind of way of looking. She's training her attention on the vedana, keeping it lightly there, and employing some mode of looking that perceives that vedana as empty of inherent existence, of which there are many, and we've talked and written about that plenty, so I'm not going into that now. Just the fact that she was employing an emptiness way of looking in regard to the vedana.

And then she reports, "and in the next moment, it becomes holy. The vedana becomes holy and turns into leaves fluttering from branches." There's a beautiful image there.

So in our language, there's the emptiness practice and the intimacy. Tracking vedana, one has to be intimate with it, because actually it's a felt experience. One can't do that intellectually. One can't do that kind of at a large distance. One actually has to feel pleasantness, unpleasantness, neither pleasant nor unpleasant—all of which is an intimacy, an intimacy of attention, an intimacy of feeling, basically, as vedana sometimes gets translated as "feeling."

So there's the intimacy there, and there's also the emptiness. And emptiness ways of looking, as you probably know, as I've harped on so many times, naturally bring a reduction, a loosening of clinging, which allows a loosening of perception, a lessening of fabrication. Less clinging, less fabrication. Less fabrication means this thing that I'm perceiving—a vedana, whatever it is—is then less fabricated, less rigidly, tightly, solidly formed as a thing. It becomes, to borrow an alchemical metaphor that we haven't used for quite a while, water. All things become water. If you remember from some years ago, we used to say that a lot in relation to the imaginal.

Don't proceed until all things have become water. That's an alchemical maxim. All things becoming water means all things not so rarefied, not so concretized, not so rigidly conceived of and perceived as just this. This is what they are. And then the self in relation to that also, this is what it is.

So all things become water through the lessening of clinging that goes automatically with an emptiness way of looking and the lessening of fabrication. The solidity gets fabricated less. The thing is fabricated less as this rigid, solid, concrete whatever. And this happens quite regularly for some people, this loosening.

In the context of trying to do an imaginal practice, automatically in the making water, making liquid – don't proceed until everything is liquid – in the making liquid of the perceptual field, we could say, either images arise, intrapsychic images arise in that water, or whatever is in that field begins to be sensed with soul. So there are two factors here: the lessening of clinging, in this case, came from the emptiness practices. And there's also the intimacy that's implicit in the very practice that she was doing.

Some of you listening were present and participating in the retreat that we did – I think it was the last retreat, the Alchemy of Desire at Gaia House. You'll remember the ritual we had, I think it was towards the end of the retreat, involving the tangerines and the kind of sanctification that happened there. So I want to remind those who were there and also try to explain what happened because I don't think we recorded it in any way. Probably one would need to have filmed it to get a sense without being there.

Earlier in the retreat, we'd actually spent a day reminding people of the importance, generally, of being able to put things down in the sense of not clinging, move away from an image, give it up, go back to the breath, go back to the energy body, whatever it is, not get so caught up and have some freedom in relation to that. We were exploring the whole idea and a few practice possibilities in the realm of just letting go – letting go of clinging, letting go of grasping, letting go of holding onto this thing, whether it's a wonderful, fascinating thing or a difficult thing.

We offered the possibility of bringing mindfulness, really careful mindfulness, to a meal. I think it was before lunch. This is quite common to do on an Insight Meditation retreat – very important, beautiful practice. And also looking at the craving and the clinging that might arise in relation to the whole eating experience and queueing for food and so on, complex for us as human beings what comes up in relationship to food anyway. We had given that as a practice and we actually intended to follow that through on the retreat as a theme and then look at what it would be to open up the possibility of actually relating to food imaginally or sanctifying the whole experience with food. But because there was so much on the retreat and we really wanted to be cautious about not overloading people in a week's retreat at Gaia House, we let it go and didn't follow that through.

However, somewhere I think towards the end of the retreat, Catherine led this very beautiful ritual, and part of what it involved – these are my words now – is a kind of sanctifying of food, in this case tangerines. If I remember some of the elements, we created a special space by moving into a circle from the semicircle we'd been in, moving into a kind of loose circle around a lovely blue velvet cloth that Catherine had brought.

She had a little sort of, I don't know what to call it, it looked a bit like a kind of half an oyster shell, but it was gold inside. It was laminated with gold – quite a beautiful thing. Someone had given it to her, I think, and she talked about that. She placed it in the middle, so we were in a circle around this central sort of altar of dark blue velvet and placed it there and talked about gold and luster, the luster of gold. So there was this gold oyster shell thing, beautiful thing, and she asked us, if I remember, to reflect on what has or is becoming gold for us on this retreat – meaning what is precious for us, what's a treasure, what speaks to us or resonates with us in any way of what we deeply, truly value in our being.

So how and where has gold, this sense of treasure or value, been showing up for us? It may be conceptually, intellectually, heartfully, imaginatively, energetically, in relationship to the body. We were exploring all these different elements and more. So the gold, the sense of treasure, deep treasure, and gold itself, obviously, is an image, and this oyster shell of gold was placed there as an image, or at least as a touchstone, really, of that whole sensitivity to the sense of value of gold in our lives, in our practices over those days.

And gold might be sacredness and dimensionality and the kind of beyondness that calls us and that we're pulled to and that we want to move into and connect with when there's Eros. So this bowl or oyster shell, painted or laminated with this gold luster.

Catherine then explored a little bit the etymology and the history in relation to the word lust and pointed out that the word lust only became a kind of negative term in English in the West in the 16th century. Before that, it was actually somehow luster and lust were associated, or at least could be associated for the soul.

So there's this association of gold and shining brilliance, luster, related to Eros, related to lust, related to the Eros in the way that we're using it. Eros is something that will make sacred, that will create and discover dimensionalities and beauties and sacrednesses and meaningfulnesses. Lust making luster, lust making the luster of gold, lust making treasure, making gold, lust discovering treasure and gold—lust in the sense of Eros in the way that we've been talking about.

So we can talk in a much fuller way about, if you like, a healthy appetite in and for the senses. Rather than the senses—we went through all this in the Eros Unfettered retreat—the senses as merely a problematic area for us to either disconnect from in our move to the transcendent, or kind of hold at bay in this limited way with some notion, limiting supposed notion of bare attention, supposed bare attention.

So there was this kind of altar created and a togetherness in the group, entering into the ritual together, and the ritual space, if you like, was created. Catherine was bringing this object and speaking about gold, about luster, about the shining brilliance there, about treasure, and asking us to reflect on where the gold is or was for us on that retreat. And feel into that.

This is important again: intimacy, opening to, connection with, sense into that actual knowing. So it's not just an abstract intellectual list—"Oh yes, there was that on Tuesday morning or whatever." There's this sensing into the knowing of this. And then further—I'm partly elaborating on this because I'm actually quite interested in ritual as a way of sensing the soul, but that's maybe for another talk—sensing into that sense of gold, where it has been for us. Not abstract, not intellectual, getting the body and the emotionality and the soul involved.

And then we were invited to, in our own time, while everyone was chanting together in a kind of open chant, if you like. It was actually Om Ah Hum. And I think I said something about this represents the body, speech, and mind of all Buddhas, or the primordial Buddha, if you like. Om Ah Hum—body, speech, and mind of primordial Buddha. It's kind of quite an open chant in terms of people can enter into all kinds of relationships individually with that chant in ways that each person finds useful, so it wasn't too formulaic or too tightly circumscribed.

And then as that chant was going on, Catherine invited us, if we wanted to, to come to the center of the circle and make some gesture—actually either in the center of the circle or wherever we were sitting—some gesture of the body. It could be anything at all that kind of expresses or reflects this honoring and this recognition of gold, this sense of gold that we have, this sense of the beauty and the depth of meaningfulness of whatever it was that we felt that in relation to, that sense of preciousness and instinctual sense of soul value.

So one could do that through the sound or through any gesture, no matter how subtle or involved or gross even. There was an openness and a freedom there to connect the body with the sense of sacredness and with the honoring of that, and actually join them through the expression.

Before the invitation to express with one's body or one's voice, we divided up some tangerines and placed the segments there on the cloth around, just sort of around in an aesthetically pleasing manner, around the gold bowl or oyster shell. And so the dark blue velvet cloth in the candlelight with this lustrous gold bowl and the deep orange of the tangerines was there as a sort of focal point for our energies and our attention and our gestures and our coming together there in this ritual.

I can only speak for me, but what happened through that is there was a focusing, bringing to consciousness and to visceral feeling and sense, to the soul sense, of the sense of sacredness. It was connected with the bowl. It was connected also with the group and the circle and the togetherness and the invocation and the power through the gesturing and the voicing together of the chant and the singing together. We were allowed to improvise however we wanted with the chanting as well.

All that created, if you like, a kind of soul field or soulfulness field or soul-making field or force field of soul, whatever we want to call it. And so what happened was that, at the very least, I would say for me—at the very least—what happened was these different elements became kind of sanctified together, or in other words, they became imaginally perceived together. They gained dimensionality, meaningfulness, resonance. There was reverence in relation to all of them, beauty, all of that.

So the tangerines then, as much as the chant, as much as each other and togetherness and the bowl and the sense of gold and all of that, became—kind of each element there, each sensual element became infused with soul. We sensed it. I sensed it with soul, and I sensed what other people were as well. There was a sensing with soul of the tangerines, which, in fact, I don't think anything had actually been said—we haven't said anything about the tangerines. I don't think Catherine has said anything. We just placed them in proximity, in this field of focus, if you like, in this soul field.

And through proximity, through the kind of contingency, the touching—contingere, to touch, to touch together—through association, if you like, the tangerines became sensed with soul. And whatever that might be for each individual person, there's going to be individual variations. But it will involve these general elements of sanctification, meaningfulness, beauty, dimensionality, depth, divinity, all that stuff.

And so when it came time to eat the tangerines again—slowly, mindfully, ritually, individually in whatever way we wanted—people were also given the possibility of feeding a tangerine to another in the group in a ritual manner of their own choosing. When that moment arrived, the tangerines themselves had become holy food. It was food of the gods. It was the blessing of the earth. It was all of that. It was spiritual nourishment, soul nourishment, which is so much more than just material biochemical nourishment for the biochemical processes in the cells of the body.

Again, if we analyze a little what was happening, there's this coming together through association, proximity, contingency, and through the element of value—those two together forming the prime elements. And there is also something about field, which I'll come back to soon. The field of others, if we're open to them and if there's not some problem there, then the field—the social field we're in—can become a soulful social field, a soul-making social field, so that it becomes catching. In other words, the tangerines caught soul, if you like, through being in close proximity with the bowl and with the sense of sacredness, and caught it from us, and we caught it from each other.

I may come back to that whole question of field in this series of talks. But these two central elements were deep value and association. So again, if we're analyzing—I don't want to be too technical about this—those were the primary elements there. We could also note the involvement of the body in the chanting and the opening of the body, the involvement of all the senses—hearing, seeing, moving the body—the involvement of the body in gesture and the invitation to express through the body whatever devotion was there.

We had, by the way, opened the retreat with a similar invitation to express in the body one's devotion to Eros and devotion to the mystery of desire, even if one didn't actually understand or that wasn't completely clear or free of problems. So this ritual also had a connection, following on from that previous soul-making ritual with which we opened the retreat.

But in terms of conceptual understanding right now, there are these two factors. When we sense with soul, we sometimes sense something with soul through association with something else that we're sensing with soul, through proximity to it. It gets caught up in the field, if you like, infused with soul-making sensing, and also through value. This is something I might return to—when we feel into our sense of deep, deep valuing of something, the goal, the treasure for us, and we feel it, that also can be an element that stimulates soul-making. So in that whole ritual there, I certainly was really touched by it. I thought it was very beautiful. There we can begin to understand how that process happens.

I think I'll give another example. It's actually a lot more involved, and there are many elements at work here. So I'm going to read from an email that a student sent me a while ago—I have her permission to do so. But there are many elements, so I'm going to intersperse it with commentary, drawing out for our attention the elements that involve what's happening in this process of opening to sensing with soul, or transforming, if you like, the perception, the sensing, so that it becomes more soul-making, more soulful.

In fact, the very inquiry I'm talking about now—this process I'm trying to illuminate—was the very inquiry that this person was working with when they opened in this way that they then wrote to me about. So I'll read what she says.

She says, "I've also been working with what I'm calling transitioning into the imaginal. I know that we are imagining twenty-four hours a day, but the soulful quality is not always present. So this has become a question for me: What do I bring to the imaginal that allows the soulfulness to blossom and feed me?"

This was actually a question she had asked on retreat. I will point out, now that we've said everything we've said in the first talk of this series, that I would change the wording there. She says, "What do I bring to the imaginal?" I would rather say, "What do I bring to the imagination, to the use of the imagination that allows the soulfulness to blossom and feed me?"—in other words, that allows the fully, authentically imaginal to blossom or allows a sensing with soul.

There are many elements here, as I said. Partly, notice that she's starting with an inquiry—her imaginal explorations are infused with a certain inquiry that she invented. Actually, she'd asked me something about this on retreat, which I had at the time only given a limited answer to. So she picked it up on her own—I don't think with any further suggestion from me—but there's this impetus, this willingness to inquire, and that's really, really important to me.

As you'll see in what she describes, there's a lot of flexibility. There's this willingness and availability to play, to experiment. Let's see what happens. Let's try different things. Let's just have fun, even, in the context of this inquiry, this curiosity, and also a deep yearning and longing for these kinds of openings.

So she has this question, and then she says, "One of my discoveries came during an eating meditation." This actually links to what we were talking about before—the sanctification of food within the bigger subject of sensing with soul. She continues, "I had decided to continue with your instruction of taking a few meals meditatively"—this is after the retreat where I'd given those instructions before lunchtime. "I decided to continue with the instruction of taking a few meals meditatively, but decided that rather than emphasizing the emptiness, I would draw out the imaginal."

I made some hummus and prepared a plate of vegetables and then sat down to eat. I began with the more horizontal contemplation of all the hands that had touched this food—the growers and the transporters and the supermarket workers, and so forth.

A couple of things here. What she means by "horizontal" is that there's a spreading out of awareness of what's involved in this thing: the hummus and vegetables and my sitting down to eat. What are the dependent arising factors in the material world that contributed to this? Many of you will know this is a favorite contemplation of insight meditators, and certainly of Thich Nhat Hanh, who speaks extensively about this. Can we spread the field of awareness to see that this plate of hummus or vegetables depends on so many factors coming together to be now on my plate, and that I'm able to eat this? As she says, the growers, the transporters, the supermarket workers, the growers' parents, the transporters' parents, their education, their everything.

So there can be a horizontal meaning—it spreads outwards to involve more and more of the world. But "horizontal," she's saying, is in contradistinction to a sense of verticality, or dimensionality, which is the term I'm currently favoring.

She said, "I began with the more horizontal." There's even an awareness: "Okay, I'm not doing imaginal yet. I'm just spreading it horizontally, this awareness." And in so doing, there's already a loosening of the thingness of things, of the tight center. This is a plate of hummus. It's nothing but a plate of hummus. This piece of broccoli or carrot is just that. It has very clear borders. There's a loosening of that through the contemplation of this horizontal interconnectedness and the conditions.

Also, with that sense of interconnectedness, metta and compassion probably open and soften the heart somewhat, because then you become aware of all the work and care—oftentimes sacrifice—that might have gone into this plate of vegetables and hummus from the growers and the people transporting and the people working in the supermarket who might be tired or whatever. In the sense of interconnectedness, it also conditions or forms a basis for the softening of heart with metta and compassion, heartfulness. So I point that out as well—we're looking at the factors that support, catalyze, and make possible this transition to sensing the world, sensing things in the world with soul.

And then she continues: "And then I looked at the vegetables and tried to 'see' all the water and sunlight and earth that made up the walls of their cells." So again, the interconnections, the horizontal interconnection of meditation is broadening even more to these more subtle elements: water, sunlight, earth, in the thing, so to speak. And so she's aware—she puts "see" in inverted commas. And again, there's a kind of furthering of this loosening of the sense of the thing and the concept of the thing.

Actually, again, as Thich Nhat Hanh points out, the rain is in this hummus. The rain is in this carrot. The soil is in this carrot. And if the rain is in it, then the clouds are in it and the sea is in it, and so forth. Very beautiful. But for now, what's important is the sense that this is part of the loosening.

And she continues: "Which led to this desire to taste all of that—all of the water and the sunlight—on the tongue." So, and she continues: "To taste the dreams of the children whose parents had operated the machinery." How beautiful. To taste the dreams of the children whose parents had operated the machinery.

In the opening up of the interconnectedness, the heart opens, and part of what opens is this desire to taste all of that. Desire and intimacy. Yes? And she continues: "And the dukkha that might have arisen in this long chain." Okay, so there's the compassion and wanting to taste, wanting to become intimate with that dukkha. Yes, in the imagination, but still, there is this desire, element of desire, expansion, and a kind of desire for something intimate there. She said to taste all of that on the tongue.

So at this point, we've got elements of imagination, desire, heartfulness, love, all of that. And then she continues: "And I could feel in my body that the imaginal was operating. This feeling of liquidity and a bit of electric charge." So now she's—I read it as referring to the energy body.

The energy body feels different when imagination is operating—something electric, alive, energized, less solid. She continues: "I still hadn't eaten anything. I was just opening to that charge." She's approaching this very consciously with mindfulness and sensitivity, aware of the different elements at play.

"When I thought of you"—she's writing this to me. Jane, some of you may know, has been so kindly and beautifully preparing food for me since I've been ill, with such grace and loveliness. This person knew of Jane's generous service and my severely compromised digestive system after the operation and chemotherapy. "I was just opening to that charge in the body when I thought of you and Jane and the food that she was preparing for you. And I thought, how dearly I would love to feed you."

Again, heartfulness here—love, eros in our expanded sense (not sexual, remember; eros encompasses much more), perhaps devotion. These elements will be present for any beloved, erotic-imaginal other in our understanding. It might be a friend, partner, family member, teacher as in this case, historical figure, or as I've described, certain musicians, artists, or spiritual teachers from the past. It could be a literary character, a fully imagined figure, or someone from a film. But these elements will be there—devotion, love, eros in our sense, heartfulness.

"And then the words 'my body is your body' were offered into the mind, and there were some strong body convulsions as you and I merged."

Much is happening here. Notice how, as we explored extensively in the Eros Unbound talks, self and world, as well as other, are included in the imaginal perception—here in sensing the soul. It's not just about me or the food, but "my body is your body" offered into awareness. There's an opening in the energy body, something happening at another level. It doesn't have to be convulsions—it can unfold very smoothly and subtly. In this case, it was stronger.

"As you and I merged"—self and world become involved, as well as other. That trinity of self, other, world becomes subsumed, drawn into the whole imaginal perceiving, the whole sensing of soul, including the food she was attending to.

"And this food perceptually had the potential to heal you." Again, love and care, knowing about my situation with cancer, chemotherapy, the operation. There's a transformation of perception involving self, world, the vegetables, the food itself, and me. The food is sensed as having potential to heal.

She continues: "It was sacred, holy food, because it had been touched by everyone and everything, and it could offer its rain and compost and human emotionality into your system." Very beautiful. Do you see how everything becomes involved, drawn into the soul-making vortex, the soul-making dynamics?

"The feeling of you entering me, of this kind of fusion that happened, of us consuming the food as one body and yet still two—it's truly indescribable. I'm struggling to describe it, to convey it in words."

Again, there's inquiry, flexibility, many elements involved, all approached with careful, attentive, soulful mindfulness. There's experimentation throughout. In this case it involves me as the imaginal other, but in a way that's healthy and beautiful, with very clear boundaries functioning as a temenos that allows this opening into the imaginal without needing concretization or feeding anyone's ego.

Her inquiry continues: "Since then I've tried to recreate the above"—she puts "recreate" in quotation marks—"with varying results." She's following a thread of inquiry, which I find so important.

Her inquiry continues, and she writes to me: "Since then I've tried to 'recreate' the above with varying results." She places "recreate" in quotation marks, recognizing something important about this word choice. Again, she's following a thread of inquiry here.

"I feel like there is still so much to know and learn about the conditions that align when the imaginal is most potent." This is exactly what I've been exploring throughout these talks—understanding the conditions that support and nourish imaginal perception.

She reflects further: "Perhaps the clue is in the word 'recreate,' which suggests that these sacred visits from the imaginal, from the soul we might say, might be just the result of tinkering with the conditions and gaining 'control' over when and how they appear." But then she recognizes something crucial: "This lacks the erotic thrust, the sublime impregnation of how I experience these moments. It's like you've said many times—they have a divine autonomy. The element of surprise and grace is flattened by believing I, anyone, as a human being, could fashion it alone."

In other words, it's not all simply up to technical mastery. There is that dimension of skill and understanding conditions, but there's also this element of grace that I tried to include in the first talk of this series. If we look back at one phrase from her earlier description, she had written: "And then the words, 'my body is your body,' were offered into the mind." This exemplifies the element of grace—something was simply given, occurred to the mind, planted itself, landed in consciousness.

This kind of gifting is very common in imaginal work. It's as if we're given something by soul, handed something as if the soul has its own intentionality, its own direction that it wants to stimulate in us. But we still need to assent to it, to pick it up with skill and sensitivity and responsiveness and free will.

So here's an example involving many elements, all subsumed into a larger inquiry with considerable flexibility and experimentation.

Let me offer a few final observations for this section. When there is sensing the soul—whether extra-psychic or intra-psychic—the conventional perception of the physical or material world doesn't necessarily disappear. In fact, most of the time it won't. I'm still seeing what anyone might see through conventional perception. It's just that dimensionalities have opened up—meaningful sacredness and other elements have emerged not in place of that object, but imbuing it, filling it out, enriching and complicating it in that soul-making way through these imaginal aspects.

In all this sensing of soul, it's actually possible to have two perceptions simultaneously. One might be the very conventional level of perception that anyone in normal consciousness would have in that situation—the sensation of body sitting, touch with cushion or chair, feet or legs on floor, all the normal bodily sensations of sitting. At the same time, there can be an image of the body or sensing of the energy body that's very different from these conventional physical sensations.

So one can feel sitting still in a chair while simultaneously having an essential experience of the energy body doing cartwheels or dancing or flying or coiling around the vertical central axis of an erotically beloved imaginal other, or experiencing the body as a light body of a certain color. This imaginal perception can occur alongside conventional perception of sitting wherever one is sitting.

Or one might be in the physical presence of a beloved other, seeing them as one normally would, as everyone would see them, while simultaneously holding an imaginal perception of them as angel or cosmic king or queen—infinite possibilities. This imaginal sensing might be sensorially vague; we might not be able to clearly discern details but know it's angelic or this cosmic queen presence. Sometimes it can't be precisely described. But as I've pointed out many times, the vividness of the image to the senses isn't what matters most. What matters are these other elements of sensing the soul, these other aspects of imaginal constellations.

One last point about intention. I've talked on recent retreats about different fantasies of path and goal, including what I called the medical model—the approach many spiritual teachings employ, sometimes unconsciously. This was actually pointed out by some Greek philosopher whose name escapes me: philosophy as medicine for the soul. The Buddha used this analogy explicitly and consciously—Buddha as physician diagnosing, giving prognosis and cure, with the Eightfold Path as regimen of treatment.

In this medical model, one's trying to end suffering, or for most people, simply decrease it, whether momentarily or long-term. But sometimes this very intention to alleviate suffering as the primary goal may block or stifle the fullness of soul-making that's possible, the authenticity of imaginal perception, the richness of sensing the soul.

We discussed in the first talk how fullness of intention is one element of imaginal constellation. This is complicated, because I don't mean that the desire for alleviating suffering isn't present as part of exploring these practices. But at some point, it may well not be the primary intention, and that's perhaps the crucial piece.

Imaginal perception, sensing the soul, may indeed end certain suffering, may totally dissolve particular forms of suffering.

It very probably and almost always attenuates or alleviates, sometimes to a remarkable degree, some suffering. So that is very probable. But again, in my way of thinking about things, at least where I am right now, it's not really the point of this work. It's somehow included in the package more often than not, but it becomes something that's not the primary point of what we're doing.

Oftentimes what happens is the suffering is translated, if you like, or it's cast differently through the sensing with soul, through the imaginal perception. The sensing of the soul puts the dukkha in a different light, in a different context, if you like. It sets it on a different stage. And this kind of allows or brings soul-making. In soul-making, that's what's happening—not necessarily the ending of suffering.

But this is complex, and I will actually return and devote a whole talk in this series, I hope, to some of the strands of the very complex area of dukkha and soul-making. But just to say for now, this piece about intentionality can be significant in sensing the soul, because if the primary intention is getting rid of dukkha or just alleviating dukkha—which is a fine intention, and very appropriate at times, and completely valid and everyone should be free to choose that at times, or even all the time if that's what they want—there will be times when, if that's the primary intention, it actually blocks and stifles and prevents a fullness and a full deepening and opening of the sensing of the soul.

It may be, as one explores all this, that there may be some dukkha, some grief or suffering of some different kind, and one starts with the intention of just wanting to alleviate that dukkha—that's very understandable and very normal. But then when the suffering is alleviated just enough or just a little bit, the sensing of the soul begins to emerge or become possible, and maybe that then becomes the primary intention, and through that maybe the suffering is decreased further.

Or it may be, like I said, as the imaginal opens, suffering is decreased. So there's also fluidity in terms of intentionality that can be possible here. But just to draw attention to that briefly right now.

Okay, I think that's enough for today. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 113

Sensing with Soul (Part 5)

Rob Burbea · 1h13

> In this fifth part of his exploration of sensing with soul, Rob Burbea examines how imaginal perception often involves receiving something from beyond ourselves—a quality of grace that cannot be fully mastered through technique alone. He shares intimate examples of how soul-making can emerge through relationship: receiving imaginal perception from another person, communicating these perceptions between people, and how shared fields can suddenly shift into imaginal awareness.
>
> Burbea illustrates this through personal anecdotes, including a story of receiving imaginal sight from Catherine McGee during a moment of creative anxiety, and therapeutic work where sharing the perception of 'sacred prostitute' transformed a client's relationship to painful memories. He emphasizes how each person refracts the divine in unique ways, offering this as perhaps our most precious gift to one another.
>
> The talk also addresses how life situations themselves can become imaginal—how what we might dismiss as papañca (mental proliferation) may actually contain soul-making potential when approached with proper attention to energy body awareness, humility, and soul resonances. Burbea concludes by noting how each element of imaginal perception—humility, desire, values, logos—deserves deep exploration in its own right, suggesting these as areas for future contemplative investigation.

I very much hope that all this analysis of what's involved in and what supports sensing the soul, perceiving imaginatively, soul-making—taking apart what we mean by those words—I hope that this is helpful. I hope that it opens up possibilities and makes actual possibilities for you, allowing you to open up this field further.

I hope that through what we're saying here and through your own practice of it and dipping in, you really get a taste of the kinds of things that we're talking about, the kinds of experiences. Get the taste in terms of actually experiencing for yourself these kinds of openings, deepenings, transformations, whatever you want to call them. That you both get the taste and get the idea—as a metaphorical term, but also more literally—and you understand conceptually as well. As it opens up experientially, may it also open up for you conceptually, making sense and being grounded conceptually, both through what we're saying and through your own practical explorations.

With that, again, I really want to encourage you to play, to experiment. Experiment means trying different things, doing some different things in practice than you might usually do. But experiment implies with it a sort of attentive, careful noticing of what happens—a kind of inquiry in and through the practice, sometimes even questioning. Through that combination of play and inquiry, we could say experimentation is attentive noticing when we're playing. A maturing of soul-making and imaginal practice and of understanding will take place.

It's that combination—playing or experimenting with a kind of attentive noticing and inquiry and thinking about it as well. All of that together will inevitably open up and establish a kind of gradual maturing of these kinds of practice and of the understandings. This way of approaching things is very different from a kind of harassment or pressure of the question: "Am I getting this right? Am I getting it right?" which so often plagues meditators and oppresses the meditative exploration and the meditative path.

Slowly, gradually, we're looking at what is it that allows, opens, supports, catalyzes sensing with soul—sensing life, the world, the things of the world, the materiality, the bodies, the beings of the world, sensing any and all of that with soul. We've touched on the importance of certain aspects of the way that we are present, the way that we show up in the present moment and bring our awareness and our being to bear. Certain factors or aspects of our presence are key.

For instance: humility, heart opening or heart softening, a certain amount or some degree of lessening of the fabrication of perception, some degree of loosening of perceptual and conceptual grasping too tightly on what a thing is and how reality is. Sensitivity as an aspect of presence, energy, body awareness—these kinds of things.

I'm just repeating now what we've been through before, just to reiterate it once more. We said any aspect or element of the imaginal, any node in the imaginal constellation—we went through that whole list—attention to or noticing that node can either suddenly or gradually bring that element alive. From there, the whole lattice can ignite, become illuminated. The fully imaginal can be moved towards or entered into, either suddenly or gradually.

In all of that, some of those elements won't necessarily be there at first or in the beginnings of your practice with all this. Something like the sense of participation, for instance—I wonder whether that's just a bit more subtle. In other words, it's maybe not likely to be noticed immediately. It could be that the fact that you've heard me say it so much stimulates that noticing and makes it more accessible. But the general point right now is that it's not necessary that all these elements are noticed at first.

As I said, there's a maturing of the discernment that happens, like your eyes getting used to the dark, but over a period of time—like, what's actually involved in imaginal perception, what's actually involved in sensing the soul.

We also said that the order of practices is not important. For example, one might start with a so-called intrapsychic image or intrapsychic sensing the soul, and from there it spreads out to some thing, some object, some person, or just the general environment in a kind of cosmic sense—to what we might call extrapsychic sensing the soul. Or it might work the other way around. One starts with some material object or the general sense of one's surroundings, perceived and sensed with soul, and from that arises some intrapsychic image of oneself or of someone else or something else.

So it can work in either order, either way. It might be only extrapsychic. It might just stay with this object in front of me, this thing, this being, whatever it is in the material world manifesting materially, and one senses them as soul, and that's just what it does.

It might be that we start with, for instance, some degree of cultivating some samadhi, and the well-being, the harmonization, the integrity and beauty, really, of the energy body experience there liquefies to a certain extent, lessens fabrication to a certain extent, loosens things to a certain extent. In that loosening, liquefying, there's the possibility for more sensing the soul of the world around us, because everything is liquefied, a little bit loosened.

Or it can be emptiness practices first, which essentially do a similar kind of thing. They're all in the movement of less fabrication, lessening of fabrication. Or some other element—for instance, we've mentioned humility earlier. It might be that lingering with that sense, allowing that to open one and allowing oneself to open into that realm, that mode of being that we call humility with everything that's involved there, in whatever way that does and whatever that means for us or however that opens at that time. It may be that that element is the way in, the door that opens to allow the sensing of soul into the mundus imaginalis.

In all this analysis, there's this possibility to develop our understanding conceptually of the conceptual framework and understanding regarding the elements, some of the elements that might be involved in—whichever way you want to put it—opening a door or building, creating this constellation, this construction, this fabrication that is the imaginal.

And also with practice. So dwelling on this allows both the understanding and the practice, hopefully, to develop, for you to gain some confidence in, because you can actually try different approaches. Dwell or focus on this or that element, try changing this or that, just noticing or tweaking an element or amplifying it or whatever it is.

But we also made the point that okay, there's this understanding and skill that develops regarding what elements may be involved, but never, never, never is soul-making going to be only a matter of technique or something that can be harnessed under the rubric of mind mastery, of our mastery. It's never going to be only that.

Yes, there is skill and art that can develop in practice, and yes, there certainly is quite a beautiful and remarkable evolution of refinement, of discernment conceptually and perceptually and all that. And that's really, really helpful and important. But it's never going to come just under that. I'm never going to get it completely under my thumb. There's always going to be an element in soul-making of grace, of the unexpected, of something being given, a gift, and receiving something, so to speak, from beyond ourselves.

This sense of grace, of gift, of receiving something from beyond ourselves, is always, I would say, to some degree, an element in soul-making practice, in sensing the soul, in imaginal perception.

So that's the end of the little review. If we pick up on that little point and amplify something that I mentioned earlier—I can't remember when, but recently—so we can, as I said just now, receive something from beyond ourselves. And that beyond ourselves might be from another human or other humans right now in the present, materially with us, together with us, or a whole field, or group, or whatever. That's one possibility of the beyond ourselves that we may receive from.

Now, I'm not going to talk—we're not going to talk, and we probably won't talk for quite a while—about, I don't know what to call it exactly, deliberate dyadic soul-making practice, where there's deliberate sort of erotic imaginal exploration deliberately face to face with another and kind of held there and explored there and allowed to amplify with each other. I think we'll save that till later. I don't actually recommend that practice quite yet. It takes some very beautiful, very wonderful prerequisites psychologically in terms of skill with one's own process, relational skills and arts, all kinds of things, energetics, etc.

So I'm not really wanting to talk so much about that as a deliberate avenue and possibility and practice. Rather for right now, just to mention a possibility, because some of you will have experienced this anyway, and it happens, of course, that we receive, we are given something from beyond ourselves, sometimes from other human selves right now that we're in relationship with, and that opens up for us. It's what we get from them, what they communicate to us, that opens up the possibility right then for us of sensing the soul.

I could possibly give a few examples of this. One actually is something that I can report for myself, helped by Catherine. I think it was the last retreat, the Alchemy of Desire, and I was talking at some point, perhaps in the talk called "Longing, Vulnerability, Anteros," and was talking about something that happened, and my worry, or fear, regarding a certain creative project that was very dear to my soul and heart and my fear, my concern, worry that it would just sort of get lost or dissolve or not come to fruition. And also my recognition that it didn't depend on me and how that opened up through an exploration that Catherine helped me with, but that was primarily my own image that I explored.

That was around the same time—I can't remember if it was before the retreat or after the retreat—but Catherine and I were Skyping. And I think it was a similar uncertainty that I was in, or similar anxiety, really, about this thing that felt, this creative project that felt very, very important to me.

At a certain point, I was maybe sharing some of this, and some of my feelings. And at a certain point, her perception shifted into an imaginal perception. In other words, she was sensing with soul. She was sensing me with soul through the medium of Skype, perceiving me, sensing me with soul. In other words, I for her had become image at that point—not so much as a narrative, but in that moment as a kind of iconic image. Not so much the whole story of this, if I remember rightly, but with everything that involves: the theophany and the dimensionality and all of that.

And she shared that with me in real time, in the moment. She said, "This is how I'm seeing you right now." She was quite struck by the perception and the sort of luminosity there, and the beauty of that in her perception. Her communicating of that perception—in this case of me—communicating that to me in the moment, in the midst of my sharing open-heartedly about the anxiety that I was feeling, did something to my perception of the life of this work, or the life of this creative work that I was caring deeply about and actually concerned about.

So her communicating that perception to me—it's not so much that I picked up that exact perception and saw myself iconically, theophanically, as image as she was. It was more that something illuminated in the field, and then I was able at that point, somehow in the magic sort of ignition of that field of her communicating, that was triggered by her communication of her imaginal perception, I was able actually to perceive the life of the work more imaginatively, the life of this creative project more imaginatively. And then the kind of contraction of anxiety that was there was able to relax.

It's as if I caught the sensing the soul, or caught the imaginal field from her. Or her perception, her communication of that perception, that imaginal perception, ignited not the same perception, but a related perception perhaps, but a different perception in me, imaginatively.

And so I had been in this kind of grip of "I need to figure out what to do to ensure that this creative work lives and becomes generative in the future, if I die," etc. In my shift, that was catalyzed by her shift of seeing me imaginally, in my shift, then that kind of grip relaxed and there was a whole different seeing of this creative project, of my relationship with it and the possibility that I might die before it comes to fruition.

That all relaxed and became imagined. There was a very different relationship with the whole situation.

So that would be one example of something we receive from beyond ourselves that opens—if you like, turns the key in our perception—so that we are then able to perceive, to sense with soul.

A second example might be—and some of you might remember this, since I'm pretty sure I recounted it in a talk, which I think might be the Theatre of Selves, maybe in the second part. I was relating the true story of working with a yogi on retreat who shared with me some really difficult memories that she'd felt a lot of shame about for many years concerning something that happened when she was quite young, a very young woman really.

As she was talking—and we hadn't discussed anything about the imaginal, hadn't even used that word, this was really quite a few years ago—I heard the words "sacred prostitute." I was sort of wrestling with myself as I was listening, wondering whether it was okay to share that phrase. And I did.

In a way, what came to me through these words was an imaginal perception, a sensing with soul of the memory of the whole scene and narrative that she was sharing with me. It was so painful for her and so bound in shame decades later. And my sense, my imaginal perceiving of that story, that episode in her life, I then shared with her.

In this case, she immediately picked up the flame of that very same imaginal perceiving, that very same sensing of that memory, of that narrative with soul. It was the same image, so different than what happened with Catherine and me on the Skype, where what ignited for me was a slightly different perception. In this case, it was the same image. I'd been listening for a few minutes to this very painful thing, but I shared what came, and she immediately grasped that image.

It immediately cast the whole episode and the whole pain of it in a very different light. It was literally seen with a different way of looking. The memory was re-membered—not the facts, but the whole color and the whole actual movement of what was going on there.

What was going on in this painful memory? We can interpret it this way: the hermeneutic is shaming, it's a kind of moral inferiority and great mistake, and there's no beauty, nothing redeeming in it. But something shifted in this perception. It wasn't just my intellect coming up with how to recast it, to bring in a different way of looking. Something was, if you like, given to me.

So I received something from beyond myself, which had to do with the field, and in the field we were looking together at that memory. I received something from beyond myself—who knows from where, from soul, from whatever—and then communicated it to her. That was exactly what she needed then to shift and see the whole thing with a re-sanctification, a redeeming, an opening up to see what was beautiful there and what was divine. Mercy began to flow, healing began to flow.

Her sense, not just of the past, but then of her present as well—it's as if she recognized the necessity and the truth, if you like, the truth of that imaginal perception, the truth of sensing what happened with soul, remembering in that different way both her past and herself. And that means herself in the present too.

So that would be another example of receiving something from beyond ourselves and it being communicated between humans.

Another one—and again, it was something I was involved in with a very good friend, sometime in the last few years. I don't quite remember what led up to it, but I think we were both feeling a certain particular kind of tenderness and openness between us.

It wasn't that something had been closed or hardened or hidden or held tightly behind certain doors for fear of being seen. It wasn't that at all. But something happened and I think we both felt this kind of, metaphorically speaking, nakedness with each other. And again, it wasn't that we were hiding anything before that, and suddenly it was like, "Ah, now I can show you what I'm ashamed of" or anything. It was nothing like that at all. That can be a very important moment in human beings relating, but it actually wasn't that. It was just that something happened, or in the flow of things there was suddenly a sense of this really beautiful kind of nakedness together.

We were talking a little bit, but there was a lot of just silence and a really slow pace to things. I was checking, paying attention to this kind of beautiful feeling of nakedness, metaphorically. And I sensed, oh, it's got this real innocence with it and a kind of real unguardedness. And again, not that there was really much guardedness before, but it had this kind of almost pristine Edenic quality—as in Garden of Eden. Something very young, very innocent, sort of open and unguarded and really naked.

As I tracked this inside, in the flow of this very sparse conversation, just being together—there was a lot of love there—I was paying attention at the same time to this sense that I had.

And in the paying attention, it became imaginal. It took that quantum jump. And the very sense of my nakedness and innocence, openness, unguardedness, and the youngness of that began to have those qualities of beauty and theophany and dimensionality. It became iconic for me—there was something of the iconic image in that.

As we talked about elements of the imaginal, I began to pick up and notice these elements. I wasn't doing it in any deliberate way. I don't think I'd even articulated this business about elements of the imaginal to myself at that time, but I began to notice the element of eternality. It's as if that nakedness, innocence, unguardedness, openness, youngness—this image—I sensed the eternality of it. There was this young naked boy that had this "always, always already happening in hierophantic time" quality to it. And that amplified the sense of divinity of the whole thing.

I haven't talked about it for quite a while, but I spoke at some point, perhaps in Path of the Imaginal, about this possibility of seeing an image as an object or becoming an image—two possible different ways of relating to an image, among others. In this case, I opened more to this iconic divine image and its eternality and the beauty of it and the sweetness of it, the innocent purity of it. And I became that more.

Again, it's not that I was identified. There wasn't this rigid, tight ego grasping at it. But it's as if I let myself enter into being that image or feeling myself as that image. And with that, it felt like, as part of the image, there was a blessing radiating from that image. As I entered into the image and became that image physically in my bodily experience, it felt like my body and my hands were emanating blessing and were part of the image.

I remember placing my hands on my friend's head in blessing, and she could feel the blessing energy. It was very beautiful and touching and interesting.

Now, again, there wasn't really much reification going on or identification. If someone were to go around placing their hands on people's heads with this sense of being identified with having blessing energy coming out of them—"that's good for me, it's good for you, telling people it's good for you if you let me touch your head because I've got blessing coming out of my hands"—that personally would make me very nervous. Maybe that's just my style, but here it really felt in that theatre, in that imaginal way, with all the loveliness and power and ability to affect the soul and heart, but not the identification, not the ego identification and grasping and reification of that.

So what happened was through the touch—well, we were together in this heart experience before—but through the touch, we both were sensing the soul. Through the touch, the image, the imaginal was shared between us, and part of its sharing was sharing through the touch.

In all those three examples I've just given, we could say something comes from beyond ourselves. It could be from another human being, or we could talk perhaps about the field. Like fields in quantum theory, it's as if the field takes a quantum leap. In other words, what two people are experiencing—the whole thing becomes imaginal together. This to me is really quite interesting. In the field, whoever is participating, there is a quantum leap into a new imaginal sense.

Notice that in the examples where there was dukkha, that imaginal sense doesn't ignore or erase the dukkha that was there, nor the particularity of the persons involved, or the events, or the story. But it transforms the seeing, transforms the sensing. Something has gone to sensing with soul. Something has opened up in the field, taking that quantum leap. It's taken a quantum leap into the imaginal realm—imaginal perceiving has opened up.

What can happen, as I mentioned, is this quantum leap can be given to or arise first in one person, if there are two people there. First in one person who then communicates it to the other, and the second person's sensing also then makes the quantum leap so that the whole field has shifted. Both of them are in this new perception, and the whole sense of what was and is present—the perceptions, the selves, the others, objects, events, the world—all become, as they do in the soul-making dynamic, involved and transubstantiated, transfigured, and the beauty of that.

So again, I'm mentioning this as one of the ways in which sensing the soul opens for us—that we receive from beyond ourselves. But I do want to put the brakes on a little bit in terms of this deliberate dyadic soul-making practice, which I think does take quite a lot of preparation and prerequisite capacity, skills, arts in all kinds of domains—relational, psychological, personal, energetic, insight, all that.

But some of you will recognize from these kinds of examples that you've already actually experienced this. As I said when I described what happened with the ritual with the tangerines, some of you might have felt, "I've already experienced this many times"—talking with a friend or in an interview or something, or sharing some images in a group. Of course, lovers in love know this kind of thing. They might not have a conceptual framework for it, but people taste this kind of thing. You may know the possibility from your own experience with times when you were in love.

And it's not so much about that form or definition of a relationship. It's more like where there is the erotic-imaginal alive, it can spread between two people. And the erotic-imaginal alive does not necessarily mean sexual or romantic between two people.

As another example of this field or receiving from another, let me share something that Catherine told me, that her niece told her. This particular niece is just five years younger than Catherine. When Catherine's mother died—which was Catherine's niece's grandmother, despite the fact that Catherine's niece is only five years younger than Catherine—

When Catherine's mother died two and a half years ago, Catherine's niece shared something deeply moving with her. "Nanny was the only person," she said—that's what she called Catherine's mother, her grandmother—"Nanny was the only person who would say to me when I went round to her house and sat beside her and told her my problems, 'Let's sit quietly and put ourselves in the hands of the Lord.'" It was beautiful. "Let's sit quietly and put ourselves in the hands of the Lord." And then Catherine's niece continued, "Now there will be no one who will say that to me anymore."

Catherine's mother, a devout Catholic who died in her nineties, was the only figure in Catherine's niece's life who still had that kind of devoutness, that unabashed, unashamed, humble relationship with God that she could share with others. Not in a pushy evangelical way, but as the only person in Catherine's niece's life who would communicate that sacred presence.

Looking at this through our analysis, several elements converge here. In that simple invitation—which probably happened many times throughout Catherine's niece's life—different dimensions would open up depending on what the problem was, depending on countless factors as they sat quietly together and put themselves in the hands of the Lord.

You can see the humility there, the reverence. You can see what is communicated from one human being to another—receiving something of that humility, and also a certain conception, because there's a whole understanding involved in putting oneself in the hands of the Lord. It might be vague, but there's a conception of divinity, a conception of the human relationship with divinity being communicated.

An idea is there. An invitation to humility is there, coming from another. And also an image is there. When someone says, "Let's put ourselves in the hands of the Lord," presumably no one literally visualizes some giant hand descending from the clouds. It's a metaphor, but it's a loose image that can become, as a vague metaphor, itself an imaginal perception that opens up the sensing with which problems can be met and resolved.

There are definitely several elements converging: an image, an idea, and this other—in the field, or in this case, a kind of dyad from which Catherine's niece receives something from beyond herself, something she's not quite able to access on her own for various reasons. All of this, together with the invitation to humility and other elements, opens up the sensing with soul. This can then manifest and unfold in different ways depending on what the actual problem was or what other factors were present in the moment.

I want to say something else about this particular anecdote that could easily be overlooked when someone shares such things after another person dies, or in what people generally report of their lives. It might be obvious to some of you, but I think it can be very easily overlooked in our present zeitgeist, in our culture's way of conceiving existence.

To me, when I hear this—of course I could be wrong—it seems that Catherine's niece, in saying that to Catherine after her grandmother died, is expressing that she's missing not just her grandmother's human kindness, not just the comforting that happened, but something much more specific. She's missing what was communicated of the sacred through her grandmother in a very particular way. When she said, "Now there will be no one"—it's very rare in her life, very precious.

She's missing not just human kindness and comfort, but what came through her grandmother in a very particular, very personal way—of the sacred, of the sense or idea or image or conception of the divine, expressed or brought into presence or conjured through a particular person, their style, their mode of doing that. As if each of us is potentially—and hopefully more than potentially—each of us refracts the divine in a different way.

Each of us in our life has the opportunity to sing the praise of existence, to communicate through our being in countless ways our sense of the sacredness of existence. We all do this; we refract the light of the divine, the infinite light of the divine, each in our particular ways. We each have our different songs or ranges of songs that we sing.

Over and above the human kindness or comfort that she might have received from her grandmother, it's this that Catherine's niece is expressing she's missing—the rarity of that, the loss of that from her life. "My nanny, my grandma had this particular way that she expressed and brought the divine into manifestation through how she related to the divine, through how she felt it, how she expressed it."

Is this not the most precious gift that we bear and give to each other as human beings? The ways that we express and refract the light of the sacred, of the divine, of the beyond, of the mystery?

There's something much more going on here than just a strategy for decreasing suffering. It could be seen that way, and it certainly had that function—there's something useful there. But there's this whole other level: the taste, the intimation, the disclosure, the fragrance of the particular expression or slant or refraction of divinity that we receive from each other. It's not useful.

In a way, it's useless. I'll come back to that in another talk, I think. But is it not the most precious gift? I think it is. One of the most beautiful things that we love in this existence.

So let me move on to another possibility that I've alluded to many times, but let's draw it out a little more. A life situation that we're in can become image for us—it becomes imaginal for us, or we sense that situation with soul. There is that potential.

Instead of just thinking "this is just a problem" or "just this thing that I like" or "this thing that I'm interested in," we can in practice allow it to become fully imaginal for us. Sometimes that's obvious, or it's clear that something can easily be fully imaginal. But oftentimes it's not—not at all. We just regard the thing as something we're caught up in, some predicament, or a problem we have: "I have too much desire," or "this or that."

So oftentimes we're not aware—a person isn't aware of the potential in a life situation to liberate the imaginal that's there and to plug in, to connect with, to open to a very different sensing of that situation, of themselves in that situation, sensing it with soul.

Someone was sharing with me in an interview a while ago—I asked her permission to share it with you. She was describing a slightly complicated nexus of conditions, and I think she may have said in relation to imaginal practice, "I don't get images." She may or may not have said that, but I think it's important in this connection because what I'm going to say now also addresses those of you who still might think, "I don't get images." We've said quite a lot about that in past talks.

But oftentimes the image is there in our life. It's just that we haven't recognized it as image, recognized the fantasy that is propelling us, that is calling us, that is pulling us anyway. It's in what we love. It's in what we're moved by. It's in what is meaningful to us. I think I said this in the Image, Mythos, Dharma talks, but I've said it many times over the last few years: where we love, there is image. Where we're dedicated, there is image. You can look there.

It's a matter of unearthing the image or illuminating the image there, and then allowing it to shine its light on us and on the whole situation.

So here was a situation with different sides to it. Let me present the whole picture very briefly. She had shared with me that she had gone to an exhibition of a certain Japanese artist, Hokusai—some of you will know him, a wonderful artist from the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. She was sharing how much she really loved art and literature, but was regretting that she had no time in her life to study it as she would like.

But it turned out some of the impetus to study was because she was in a certain social situation. She had moved to a new town where many of the people she was encountering were into the arts, but in a way where they seemed to be boasting about their knowledge—showing off how much they knew about it. So she found herself in a slightly intimidating social scene where she felt she had to equal their knowledge or risk being exposed as ignorant. It didn't sound like a very pleasant social scene that she had been introduced to, and she was understandably very ambivalent about whether she wanted to be in that scene at all.

This "I don't have time to study it" was itself mixed. It was partly "I need to know more to keep up with these people around me"—it had this slightly harsh, judgmental quality of comparing and measuring each other. And some of it was just coming out of love.

Another piece was that she also had a column in a magazine in her profession, which had nothing to do with art or literature—a regular column. She was talking about her relationship with that, with teaching and communicating the teaching in her column.

As we discussed this, she reported how she could get really manic in relation to some of these things—either in relation to this column she had to write, or in relation to getting excited about art or literature. She felt that energy in the chest, and then her mind just spins: "Well, then I'll do this, and then I'll do that, and after that I'll do that"—this kind of forward momentum of overexcited papañca was something she recognized and didn't want to get into. I think she used the word "manic."

Most of us will recognize that possibility—when we're in planning mode, overexcited, not really in our bodies, and it's all gone out of hand.

As we were talking, I said, "That's really good to be aware of that. And there are three fantasies, at least three fantasies, woven together here in your life." And I mean fantasy in the good sense—something that is already image and fantasy for us in that it has beauty, it has meaning, but it needs to be recognized as such and allowed as such, given permission and granted respect and trust in order for it to have its power.

Because otherwise what happens is we mistake something that's potentially imaginal—we mistake it for papañca. Sometimes what comes to us as image and fantasy can be papañca, or it can turn into papañca, or it can actually be papañca but we start relating to it differently, and then it becomes imaginal.

What I want to offer as a possibility, as a permission, or as a reconceiving, is that maybe it was actually imaginal to start with. Because we didn't trust it, because we didn't pay attention and relate to it in the right way—because we were suspicious of it, or we closed it down, or we didn't involve the energy body and didn't respect it—it became more of a papañca force and a problematic energy spinning in our consciousness, in our being.

Do you understand?

So these things are usually always redeemable at any point. It's not that we have to catch them and nip them in the bud. It could be years of what I've been considering as papañca, an unskillful relationship with something. And actually then I re-conceive it, I just give it a little bit of trust, I enter into relationship in a much more different way with much more attention and respect, and grant it the possibility that it may have some treasure in it. And actually the thing becomes imaginal and not papañca.

So here, there was the possibility, as we were talking, that woven into her life there are at least three fantasies pulling her, propelling her—good fantasies in our sense of imaginal fantasies, soul fantasies, and functioning already. One was around art, one was around what we might call Japanese Buddhist aesthetics or Japanese way of life, one was the whole realm of literature, and one was her column, her teaching column in this magazine as her own creative flow rather than as just something that she did as part of the duties of her job, as a kind of "oh dear, it's time to write that column again."

All these were possible and kind of live fantasies that somehow in relating to them or conceiving of them, there was more suspicion than trust and not quite the relationship that allowed the blossoming, the blooming into full sensing with soul and imaginal relationship. But all these fantasies, these imaginal narratives—the art, the Japanese Buddhist way of life, the literature, the column as heroic, artistic, creative—all of them had beauty, soul resonance, meaningfulness, mystery.

All of them can be and sometimes were what we were calling fixations—in other words, images that weren't imaginal, fixated images, the stuff of papañca. They could be that if we relate to them in the wrong way. So for example, if that wanting to measure up to this strange new social situation that I'm in where everyone's sort of dropping hints of how much they know about this art or that art or literature or whatever, and I feel like I have to keep up and it's very intimidating. If that part of me that gets roped into that not very nice social way of relating and the kind of ego measurement involved in that, if that part of me gets hold of this, then I'm going to be relating to these potentially beautiful fantasies and potentially imaginal fantasies. I'm going to be relating to them as they become fixations, not imaginal. I'm going to be relating to them from the need or from the effort to try and impress others with what I know about art or whatever, or in my column that I'm writing, or my fear of failing to do so.

But what we can do at any point in practice is actually take it into the meditation process—take these strands in our life, this complex, this nexus of fantastical strands in our life, and begin to meditate on the soul resonances that these have for us. So that Hokusai art, for example, can meditate on, tune into, bring back into the mind's eye those paintings and meditate on the soul resonances and how they move and touch my soul and what they mean for me even if I can't articulate it or put it into words, but feeling into that, allowing those very fantasies of my wish to somehow be artistic in writing this column that's about something completely different and my wish for a creative flow there.

So meditatively taking up these strands, perhaps at first singly and then perhaps in combination, meditating, feeling into the soul resonances, taking one's time with mindfulness, with the sensitivity to the energy body. And then within all that, one can be aware, for instance, of what happens in the energy body when it goes into the excitement of "I'll do this, and then I'll do that, and then I can do this, and then after that I'll do the next thing." And perhaps relating to that in energetic terms as one possibility within the meditation—how does the energy want to flow when I become excited?

So it goes into this almost intolerable kind of what she was calling manic energy in her chest. And then probably at some point what happens—and she was trained in mindfulness—but probably at some point what happens is we lose connection with the body and then the mind just spins about what I'm going to do. And then when we think, "I just need to drop all this, this is crazy, forget all this, it's all papañca," we just cut the loop. And sometimes that's really important. We talked about this, the necessity of being able to do that.

Sometimes you can just let's go in slowly and really tune into the resonances, the meaningfulness, the beauty, the dimensionality, the mystery. And within that, the energy—what does happen to my energy body? When I think about my own possibilities of artistic flow or my own wish to be creative artistically somehow in whatever form is given for me or available for me to do that, then I see it tends to go to excitement. Well, excitement is an interesting energy. It comes from inspiration. It comes from love. It comes from eros.

So what happens to the erotic energy in the body? If we just stay with the energy body experience dimension now, what happens in the energy body experience of eros that it goes from something that's very lovely and harmonizing and takes us deeper into the imaginal, and opens up beauty and empowerment, what happens is that it goes into a kind of excitement that's a little too top-heavy and intolerable and feels not very helpful. How is it that the energy wants to flow?

Maybe I can allow it to flow that way. Perhaps it wants to go up and out the body. Perhaps it wants to radiate out the chest in this kind of outburst of energetic song like a songbird, or out the throat. Maybe I can allow it to do that or even imagine it flowing that way, moving that way. Maybe sometimes it's just the simple awareness of what's happening energetically. But I can also use the imagination, as we've talked about, in the energy body awareness, and have an image of my body, maybe have an image of my body a certain way with this kind of inspired energy in it.

Then because I'm approaching it meditatively with this delicate, sensitive attunement to soul resonances and how the heart is touched and how the meaningfulness is touched and how the energy is and wants to be and wants to move, and again, the dynamic responsiveness and sensitivity to all that, the whole nexus of these meditations, fantasies, soulful fantasies, can open up in a way, open up their beauty, their dimensionality, their gift to us, rather than become problematic.

And again, one can do all this with a particular fantasy, like even of what I want to, or this impetus that I have, or this calling, or this wish to be creative, or it might be a combination of fantasies. And then one can play, as I mentioned, with the kind of balance of awareness within that, with the attention to the fantasy and all the elements involved in that and to the energy body, maybe a bit more in the energy body, play with that. When we talked about the—each one is like a dial, and what the relative settings of my dials of attention on the energy body alongside attention on the soul resonance of the fantasy itself, I can play with that. What feels helpful? There's so much to explore there and allow to open up in potentially a much more helpful, fruitful, soul-making way.

So again, the images and the fantasies were, so to speak, already there underneath all this complexity in the sense of papañca, in the sense of manic energy and all that.

But they weren't quite being related to yet in a way that brought soul-making, that brought empowerment, that brought freedom, that brought the creativity and discovery of soul-making, of sensing the soul.

But it really is possible. And actually, in a way, this applies to so many of the examples that I've given over the last few years in talks. There's a way of hearing them again from that perspective. This or that situation or this or that event or whatever. And is there a way that actually the image or the fantasy can be made sensible again, in the sense of we sense, oh, that's the image, that's the fantasy, what's involved there, how does it feel, we enter into it, and we give it life, or we allow it to have life, and it gives us its life, instead of strangling us in all these spaghetti loops of papañca, and then constriction, and then feeling, oh no, I shouldn't do that, and it's not okay, and over the top, or whatever.

Now, another related element in all this, and again, in hindsight you'll see that this is the case, imaginal images and fantasies or sensing the soul always includes, I've said this already, always includes a sense of value or values, what we deeply value, which is, if you like, a part of the meaningfulness that it has for us.

So if we think about the example I just gave of that person, the valuing of art, the valuing of artistic expression and creativity, the valuing of a certain kind of aesthetic, Japanese aesthetic or whatever, loosely speaking. The valuing of, with Catherine's niece, the valuing of everything that was involved in the beauty of Catherine's grandmother, of Catherine's niece's nanny, saying that, bringing that forth, bringing that possibility, opening that possibility, opening the door into the realm, into the territory of that mode of being. It included, wrapped up in there, were things that Catherine's niece, or elements, or dimensions, or directions of experience that Catherine's niece valued deeply.

So always when there's sensing the soul, and similarly with that story about the seeing of this episode as the something shining through it of the sacred prostitute, always in the imaginal images of fantasy and sensing the soul, values are part of it.

Now this is something I want to return to, probably in this set, almost certainly in this set of talks, and hopefully at some point even more in the future. In this set of talks, partly why I want to return to it is because it's not obvious at first, and I'll explain hopefully how, but this business of values relates to our...there's something about the philosophy of the imaginal or the philosophy undergirding this whole business of sensing the soul. It has to do with epistemology, which is how do we know or recognize that we're knowing something. And there's something about values that mirrors that, how we know and recognize values. But I will come back to this.

Actually, I'm looking at the time. I think I'm going to end soon. One possibility, which I may do soon or maybe in the future, is we could perhaps do a whole guided meditation where one enters or opens up the sensing the soul, opens up the imaginal realm through a sense of value. But I don't think I'm going to do that right now.

But just to say, just to finish, actually, on a more general point, many of the aspects that we've explored and the elements that I've enumerated over these talks so far, for instance, this whole notion of value, values, and humility, whatever, many of these aspects we could single out and really dwell and linger on them and explore them much, much more. Each one.

So for example, humility. We could spend a whole retreat even on just this question of humility. And what does it mean for us? What happens when we hear that word? How do we relate to it? Does it prickle us in an unpleasant way? Do we resist it? Does it have a soul resonance already for us? What do we think it means at the moment? What happens for us as that word becomes, and that concept of humility and our experience of humility becomes drawn in and involved in the soul-making dynamic, becomes itself an object of eros and an imaginal object? What happens to it and what happens when we start making, because of the soul-making process, we start making more and more refined discernments and discriminations within what we might call humility? Oh, there's this kind of humility and that kind of, and that color and that color. So we could easily spend a whole retreat on just that.

Or the whole relationship with desire. We talked a lot so far already in other retreats about desire and eros and all this. But we could back up and just look at, what is my relationship with desire? Am I stuck because I actually don't see it as a good thing, or only certain desires are a good thing, or it's not spiritual, or I'm afraid of it, or is it just completely out of control in my life, or what are the different kinds of desire? All that, we could spend quite a while just looking at where we each are with desire and our conceiving of it and our relation to it and our discriminations of the kinds of desire.

Or with the whole idea of conceiving and logos, which some people find so, you know, it's anathema to the spiritual path, or there's resistance to the idea, or afraid, again, might be one's personal relationship with, I'm afraid that I'm stupid, and you say all this stuff, and it sounds so smart, and I don't get it, or whatever, or thinking, I already know, I already understand all that, or whatever it is, or maybe there's a kind of rigidity, or we don't hang on enough to certain ideas.

So each of these aspects we could easily slow down and really, really explore just where are we each. And what do we need, and what's current for us right now as this particular aspect, as one of the many elements involved in the whole movement and opening of soul-making. What do we need right now? What do we see right now? What do we sense right now in relation to that? Where are we? What are we bringing with us from the past? What can we let go of? What do we need right now? To expand and explore each of these elements, aspects, or building blocks, if you like, of the whole soul-making movement, of the whole practice of sensing the soul and perceiving imaginally.

But I'm just mentioning that, and hopefully it will be something for the future.

Let's stop there for now.

CHAPTER 114

Sensing with Soul (Part 6)

Rob Burbea · 1h05

> In this sixth part of his exploration of soul-making, Rob Burbea delves into the philosophical foundations underlying imaginal perception and sensing with soul. He examines how ontology (what we consider real) and epistemology (how we know what's real) have been shaped by the scientific revolution from Galileo through to modern quantum physics, and how this affects our capacity to claim knowledge of values like beauty, love, and goodness that are inherent in soul-sensing.
>
> Burbea traces how the historical shift from Galileo's primary/secondary qualities distinction through to contemporary scientism has relegated values to the realm of mere subjective opinion, creating epistemological confusion that constrains our ability to honor imaginal perception. He argues that different modes of being - scientific, poetic, moral, soul-making - require different hierarchies of values and ways of knowing, and warns against allowing one dominant mode to colonize others.
>
> Using examples from his own retreat experiences and contemporary religious fundamentalism, Burbea illustrates how powerfully ideas shape perception, including how we experience our own bodies and materiality. He suggests that recognizing the influence of conceptual frameworks can free us from unconscious limitations and open space for both scientific and soul-based methods of knowing to complement each other in a more expansive ontological and epistemological framework.

At the beginning of this series of talks, I mentioned that I wanted to explore some of the philosophical questions involved in this whole endeavor—this opening up and exploration of soul-making—and particularly questions of ontology and epistemology.

Just to refresh your memory on these words, which I've been using fairly regularly over the last few years: ontology is, roughly speaking, the kind of philosophy that deals with or decides or tries to ascertain the reality status of different things. So what we count as real and what we count as unreal. To state it in a more refined way, ontology is the philosophical discussion of what kinds of reality different things have.

Epistemology is the philosophical investigation regarding how we know, how we know what is real. What qualifies as knowledge? What qualifies as a mode of knowing, a way of knowing? What qualifies as something that is knowable?

I said at the end of the first talk—which has now actually become two talks, "Aspects of the Imaginal" and "Sensing the Soul"—that I would like to visit those questions of ontology and epistemology, and also hopefully later on in the last talk of this series.

I want to open that up now a little bit because I think it's really important. But it's a huge subject, and I just want to open it up without letting the threads get too out of control or too sprawling, because they do have all kinds of implications and ways that they connect with all kinds of things.

For now, I want to open up this philosophical territory in questioning and rethinking regarding ontology and epistemology with respect to soul-making, sensing the soul, imaginal perception—and connect that with where I left off in the last part of this talk. There I made the observation that sensing with soul, whether it's so-called intrapsychic images, or purely extrapsychic, or a mixture of those, has woven into it a sense of values.

For instance, beauty. Kinds of beauty, love, goodness, nobility, courage—the sense of that, either explicitly or implicitly, consciously or less consciously, is woven into the very sense of soulfulness that we have when we are sensing the soul.

Also, a sense of the value of tradition or a sense of the value of its kind of complement or opposite—innovation, or perhaps even revolution. Humility, surrender, duty—these are values that we can sense not just in ourselves, in the relational poise and stance with respect to what we are sensing with soul, but also in the object. All kinds of values and all kinds of shades of different values are discerned, sensed, picked up on, attuned with, resonated with.

Can we say that they are known? This is where I want to tie these questions of ontology and epistemology with this particular strand of the observation that sensing with soul includes, involves, a sensing of values.

In our culture, modern culture nowadays—one of the things that characterizes the modern global world is just how much differentiation there is and how much plurality of cultures there are—but what we might call the dominant culture is characterized by a certain ontology and epistemology, and I would say a lot of confusion regarding epistemology with respect to values.

This affects or is related to how difficult it is for us to stake out or claim some respect with regard to sensing the soul or imaginal perception and the reality of that, or the possible reality, or the reality status of that.

One can imagine no one objecting if you shared with almost anyone: "I had an image and it was really lovely and it really touched me." The person would be either interested or not interested, or say, "Oh, that's nice," or whatever. A few people would say, "Well, that's very dangerous, because you might go psychotic or you might lose touch with reality."

But if you said, "I had an image, or I sensed this tree, and I sensed that this tree loved me. I knew that this tree loved me"—then people, many people would object. "You can't use the word 'know' there. You are making an epistemological claim that you have no warrant for." It's not the norm in our society.

When we try to open up and see what we can do with this question of ontology and epistemology with regard to the imaginal, we are confronted by a contemporary cultural viewpoint that limits severely the knowledge claims—the epistemological claims and the ontological claims—of anything that we might sense when we sense with soul.

I'm going to hopefully in the last talk pick up on this realm of values in the way that they are an element of, or a part of, our sensing the soul. As I said: love, kinds of love, beauty, kinds of goodness and nobility—that whole list we gave. Hopefully there I will offer some different pathways with all of this and ways that the whole sensing the soul can actually be navigated in slightly different directions.

Sometimes it's possible when we are sensing something with soul—say it's my beloved other, someone with whom there is a sense of the erotic imaginal perception—and perhaps we are holding hands. I am holding hands with her, with him, with them. In that touch, and perhaps in the sight, but let's say just in the touch, I'm sensing with soul, I'm perceiving imaginally with everything that that means.

Within that, one strand of that sensing with soul at that time might be her love, his love, their love for me. How do I know that? How am I picking that up? I can say I know it. I know it through the touch. Is someone going to convince me that I can't know that love—her love, his love, their love for me—through the touch?

Love, as I said, is a value. How am I picking it up? I'm going to elaborate on this.

What about loveliness? Her, his, their loveliness. We are touching, we are holding hands, whatever it is, and within the whole kaleidoscope and multidimensionality of the perception, the total sensing that is going on when we are in that erotic imaginal space together and sensing the soul together, I sense her, his, their loveliness.

It's part of the sensing the soul and it's part of their particularities and my particularities and myself and all that. But there's a way possible of tuning in to just that element, just the loveliness. Now that is much more than just pleasant experience. It's a particular kind of pleasant experience. But if I go into it more, it's almost like I can open up and focus on and open up the very essence of loveliness and the essence of a certain value, in this case, loveliness.

And it's sort of her, him, them, but it's sort of kind of a universal beyond. It's some kind of essence of, in this case, loveliness. So it's almost like there's a whole other pathway that can be opened up when we sense with soul. I hope to return to this later as a sort of additional possibility, perhaps in the last talk.

But let's leave that for now. The main point is about values and sensing the soul involves a sensing—and can we say a knowing—of values. What does that have to do with the ontology and epistemology and those kinds of issues with regard to sensing the soul?

So first, I hope, a very brief sort of history lesson or historical perspective. Galileo—Galileo Galilei, brilliant scientist in Italy in the fifteenth, sixteenth century—believed that the world, he said, the book of the world, reading, understanding the world, is reading a book written in the language of mathematics. This was a sort of fundamental, almost religious principle that he held.

In that view, he decided to pick up on and reinstate a view that was prominent in one stream of ancient Greek philosophy, the atomistic view of Democritus and Lucretius. He said when we deal with the world, there are primary qualities. He didn't actually use that word—it was Locke who coined that phrase. But it's something like there are primary qualities. For instance, how heavy a thing is, whether it's moving or at rest and how fast, at what time it's happening, where, its location, its size, its shape, whether this thing that I'm talking about or looking at or trying to investigate is one thing or a collection of a few things or a collection of many, whether it's touching X or Y or not touching—all those are amenable to mathematical representation. They can be measured and given some kind of mathematical symbol or status.

Whereas qualities like taste or sound or smell or color, these are—again, it's Locke's actual phrase, but Galileo made the point originally—secondary qualities. He said these are more subjective qualities. There's something in the sensitivity of the sensitive soul, sensitive organism, and they're subjective. They are not real. Only primary qualities are real. They are secondary qualities, qualities of a secondary status.

Now, that idea, enormously brilliant and very fertile in terms of giving birth to the whole scientific revolution there, was picked up by Descartes, by Francis Bacon, by Locke and Hume and others, and gave birth to the whole notion of Cartesian dualism. I'm following the writings of someone called Marcus Appleby here, who points out that people often think this Cartesian dualism—this is a little bit of a tangent, but I'll throw it in right now—the whole idea of mind and matter being separate and completely different things, originated with Descartes because of a kind of idea of a transcendent God, and that the mind, spirit, et cetera, was linked to that transcendent God.

But actually, Descartes was much more secular in his thinking than, say, someone like Thomas Aquinas who'd come before him, who was much more influenced by religious thinking and had a much less dualistic philosophy regarding mind and matter. So Descartes really kind of incarnated this what we call Cartesian dualism between mind and matter. Then the whole scientific method was born from Galileo with Descartes, Francis Bacon, et cetera, extended in the philosophies of Locke and Hume.

What came with that gradually over time was this kind of relegation, a whole ontology and epistemology and a relegation of certain aspects of our experience, aspects of the world, into what were called secondary qualities, meaning less real, and then what we might even call tertiary qualities, even less real than that—for instance, values.

This took a long time. So values, with the scientific revolution and the so-called Western Enlightenment and modernism, eventually became just regarded as historically conditioned opinions, really. What is beautiful? What is good? What is right or wrong? What is the nature of love? What is one's duty? All of this.

So there's a kind of hierarchy established over time, historically, starting in Europe and then in the West and then more globally, concerning what is real, and therefore, as I touched on in an earlier talk, what is respected and valued because it is more real, or real as opposed to not real. This happened gradually, and so the hierarchy of ontology and with it of epistemology and also of respect and valuing, and therefore also respect for different kinds of knowing, or eventually this kind of feeling that you're not justified to say you know X.

This spreads into all kinds of subcultures—the actual divisions of what is real and therefore what's worthy of respect and valuing. Different cultures have different demarcations, of course. For example, in psychotherapeutic cultures, what's real and therefore what's worthy of respect is slightly different, varying even among the different psychotherapeutic subcultures.

Different spiritual paths, whether so-called secular or religious, all bring in—either implicitly but more often explicitly—a certain ontology, a certain hierarchy or categorization of what is real, what is not real, what is more real, what is less real. With that comes a hierarchy of respect and value for things themselves and also for modes of knowing.

So there's an ontological, epistemological, and moral hierarchy that's rolled out implicitly or explicitly with any kind of culture. Each one will say: "This is real and therefore valuable, worthy of respect, and we respect the knowing of that real thing or aspect. But that, in contrast, is not real, and therefore we don't respect and value it—and we don't respect and value the knowing of it—at least not as much, or not at all."

Originally, what started as a kind of liberation from religious dogmatism with the scientific revolution, the Renaissance, and the Western Enlightenment gradually became, over several hundred years, a kind of imprisonment. We are somehow told by whatever culture or cultures we move in that there is this hierarchy: this is real, this is less real, this is more worthy of respect, this is less worthy of respect, this kind of mode of knowing is valuable and worthy of respect, and this is not.

That can actually become an imprisonment. What started as liberation in Europe just after the Middle Ages becomes, in some ways, an imprisonment for us.

I want to make several interconnected points here. One concerns what we value—this changes with the dominant ontology and epistemology. I also want to make a point about the ontological and epistemological status of different values themselves.

Where I'm going with this whole talk is this: if sensing with soul includes the sensing, perceiving, and perhaps knowing of values, and if historically the knowing of values is dismissed—because values are not primary qualities, not even secondary qualities, but something else that doesn't conform to the epistemology of classical science and scientism—then sensing with soul, because it involves sensing and perhaps knowing values, cannot claim any knowing there. It's not given any place or platform, because values are not given any place or platform.

I also want to point out the incredibly powerful influence of ideas in our psyche, in our modes of discourse, modes of conceiving, ways of looking, ways of relating—our whole conception and sense of existence.

Actually, values can never be removed from our way of looking or conceptual frameworks and orientations. Values always orient us. Even the scientific method, which Galileo gave birth to and which was developed further with Descartes and Bacon, is in part an implementation of certain values—valuing this over that, valuing a certain mode of knowing, a certain way of establishing knowledge.

So even though values themselves may be ontologically relegated, they always come in—even to a system that devalues them or relegates their ontological and epistemological status. They still come in to inform, orient, and direct that system or culture.

More widely, we need to recognize that different modes of being, different ways we are in the world and relate to the world, are governed by different hierarchies of values. The mode of scientific investigation, the mode of poetry, the mode of art, the mode of politics and economics, the moral mode of navigating ethically in our life, the mode of soul-making—all these are different modes of being, each with a different hierarchy of values appropriate to it, a different way of organizing and relating to what is most important.

We need to be careful not to be stuck in one mode of being's value system or hierarchy when we're actually moving into another mode of being, another mode of relating to existence, to the universe. Because certain value systems and hierarchies are dominant in our culture—established over hundreds of years through the education system, through the way people talk to each other, through cultural agreement—it can be quite hard to recognize: "Now I'm in a different mode. That value system, that hierarchy of values, that whole ontology and epistemology and what goes with it, does not quite apply here. I'm in another field now, another domain, another mode of being."

How do we decide between all these hierarchies of values? How do we decide and orient when we're in different modes? And how do we prevent one dominant hierarchy from overextending its influence, spreading like a kind of colonialism into areas that are actually beyond its reach, beyond its prerogative, beyond its purview, beyond its domain?

So again, two main threads here. One is about the influence of ideas—I'll come back to that—just to be really wary and conscious of the influence of ideas. I know I've returned to this strand often over recent years; I think it's so significant for us as practitioners and simply as human beings.

At any time, whenever we lived, but certainly at this time, in this point in history. So that's one general point: the influence of ideas.

And secondly, this idea that there's something about the way that values and a sensing of values are woven implicitly or explicitly into sensing with soul. The epistemological confusion and quandary and relegation with regard to values that we have in our modern culture—generally speaking, in the dominant culture—there's something about that epistemological confusion that relates to our hesitation or shyness, our non-permission with regard to the ontology and epistemology we might develop or claim with regard to sensing the soul.

With regard to that brief historical perspective, we could trace that thread back to Galileo. This developed and developed, becoming more and more entrenched and more and more taken for granted, really woven into the actual normal perception of human beings and how they spoke to each other—the dominant discourse.

Unfortunately for that whole perspective and the dominance of that hierarchy of values and perspectives, just in the realm of physics, if we follow that thread from Galileo, there came Einstein's theories of special and general relativity and the quantum physics revolution in the early part of the twentieth century, roughly the first quarter century.

In those discoveries of relativity and quantum mechanics, all of Galileo's primary qualities were rendered, if you like, non-objective. His whole point was that these are objective elements of reality. Everything else—taste and sound and smell, color—is subjective, and then later, values even more subjective, and therefore less real.

But with the quantum revolution and the revolution in physics—relativity and all that—all these primary qualities, mass, velocity, time, even the simultaneity of events, like what came first and after, location in space and time, size, length, shape, whether something is even one or a few or many, whether things are part of one unit and touching or not—all these so-called fundamentally, objectively real aspects of reality were exposed as being not objectively real, anywhere near the degree to which we thought they were.

What the quantum physics and relativity physics revolutions exposed was just how much all these factors—mass, velocity, time, location, size, shape, one or many, contingency and all that—were dependent on the observer, dependent on the observing object. So that whole differentiation that Galileo and Locke made between primary qualities and therefore more real, and secondary, or even what we might call tertiary qualities and therefore less real—that just dissolved.

The current state of physics makes it really hard to justify a belief or the sustaining of that whole notion, of that whole hierarchy. In a way, what we realize is that all of these things, all of these elements of experience, including value experiences, all these aspects of reality, aspects of the world, involve the subject, involve the observation. Participation is implicated in all of them. They do not have purely objective reality. So that whole hierarchy, that whole structure, that whole edifice, that whole tower crumbles.

Sometimes, if we're not careful, or sometimes I get the sense that it's possible to pick up on certain Dharma notions and construct a similar-ish kind of hierarchy. The notions of bare attention, for instance—a notion that the Buddha never used—but that whole notion, if I cling to it too tightly, too rigidly, believing, "Oh, this really is bare. This really is as it is, as things are." Now I'm really being with things as they are.

Or certain limited ideas related to that in relation to mindfulness. Again, not what the Buddha taught, because the Buddha's mindfulness included: is there matter, is there not matter? What is of value, what is not of value? Even just pleasure and pain, pleasant, unpleasant. The Buddha did not have such a pared down lens and a pared-down ontology and ontological and epistemological structure. It's true that there was a certain simplification and reductionism that he encouraged, but it wasn't that reduced.

But similarly, with science influencing the wider culture, and in a way, this whole Western Enlightenment, modernistic and scientistic influence coming in then to so-called spiritual cultures and implementing implicit or explicit ontological and epistemological hierarchies there with ideas like bare attention—the idea of what's real, what's more real, what's less real. The sensations in the chest, the complexity of the emotion, the story, papañca—this can tend to bring an implicit value judgment about what's real and what's worthy of paying attention to, what counts as actual knowledge and what's just fabrication in the negative sense.

All that can get woven into our Dharma practice in ways that aren't fully questioned or elaborated enough, I feel. And then also into just obviously the way we live and how we relate to existence and how we relate to others and what we care about and what we invest in and what we stand up for.

So these ideas influence reality notions of ontology and epistemology. Ideas get a grip and shape our cultures—plural. We move in different cultures these days. Ideas get a grip and they shape the cultures we move in and therefore shape our beliefs, assumptions in a really fundamental way, particularly regarding our basic sense of reality, unreality, more or less real—ontology and epistemology—and therefore what is of value, and all that's related.

As I said, two points woven together: what we value, because of reality notions here, ontological and epistemological notions, and also the ontological and epistemological status of values, like beauty or goodness or whatever it is, love. Two themes I want to weave together. I am weaving together here.

But ideas—the point right now is about ideas and just how influential they are and how important it is to be aware of that so that we can get a little freedom, so we're not just caught in a kind of indoctrination there.

So Jung very wisely wrote, pointing out that at the time of the Renaissance—some people use that word Renaissance interchangeably with the Enlightenment and the Scientific Revolution, and other people point out there were three different movements going on there, but around that time, they all happened around the same time—

Jung observed how, during the Renaissance period, "the newly won rational and intellectual stability of the human mind nevertheless managed to hold its own and to penetrate further into depths of nature that earlier ages had hardly suspected," despite the persistence of old religious dogmas. But then he makes a crucial point: "The more successful the penetration and advance of the new scientific spirit proved to be, the more the latter, as is usually the case with the victor, became the prisoner of the world it had conquered."

In other words, what was initially a liberation has, to a certain extent, become a kind of prison for us - a prison of view, of assumption, and therefore a prison of limitations on value and care in regard to the world.

From a soul-making perspective, we could see the scientific revolution as initially involving a kind of shattering of the vessels. There was a widening and deepening of what we might call the eros-psyche-logos dynamic of the cultural Weltanschauung - the whole way culture saw the world. The eros, the impetus of scientific investigation, expanded along with new images of humanity in that endeavor, new images of what the world was, and new concepts of what was real, what a human being was capable of, and what nature itself was.

Science sought to know things more widely and deeply, to penetrate their nature and workings, and to discover the laws governing their behavior. These physical laws - whether Einstein's $E=mc^2$, Newton's laws of acceleration, or Maxwell's laws of electromagnetism - represent another dimension of the being of things. In some ways, they're similar to the imaginal dimensions we speak of in soul-making. The laws that govern an electron's movement belong to the electron, but they constitute another dimension of its being.

So initially, there was an erotic movement, a movement of imagination and logos, a shattering and opening. But in time came the shrinking down to scientism - the belief that everything can be reduced to physicalist, materialist, usually atomistic explanations. Only with this rigidification did the soul-making dynamic of the culture become frozen.

What if we could keep the scientific method open as one mode of knowing, one mode of being and investigation with its own hierarchy of values and ontology-epistemology, while also opening soul methods of knowing? These two could live together, complementing each other and expanding both further. Perhaps what's needed now is some kind of meta-level ontology and epistemology that allows both movements - the scientific method and the soul method of knowing - to expand and complement each other. This might be a step toward unfreezing the eros-psyche-logos dynamic of our dominant culture.

Ideas influence. Dominant ideas that run through culture, education, and the ways people think and talk influence, constrain, and direct our existences - our movements and expressions of care. They direct our practices, which then shape our perceptions and values according to those very ideas. It's a self-reinforcing cycle prevalent not only in the larger culture but in psychological and spiritual subcultures as well.

I once read an article in The Guardian by Stephen Tompkins that made a striking observation: "The Bible doesn't state anywhere that it should be read literally." Yet for many Christians, Muslims, and Jews, a literalist approach is core to their faith - an all-or-nothing belief that if the world wasn't literally created in seven days, or if Jesus didn't physically ascend to heaven, then the whole edifice collapses.

But as Tompkins points out, "Biblical literalism is by no means an essential Christian tenet. No creed says anything about how to read the scriptures." Christians believe the Bible is the word of God, but why should that fact "mean it has to be read with naive absolutism?" In other words, if it's God's word, why can't we say that God is a poet? Why can't we understand that spirit speaks poetically?

It was written by the Holy Spirit, and the Holy Spirit speaks and writes more as a poet, more as an artist.

And then he points out—and many of you will know—part of the problem is historical, that something happened with the Protestant Reformation. I don't think it was actually primary in what Luther intended, but one of the things that he favored and that came out of that was a very literal interpretation of the Bible and a real limitation, a tight circumscribing of the range of how scripture could be interpreted. It's a really fundamental shift that happened there, and part of the result of that was religious fundamentalism. And that influences so much in the way one then sees existence and the whole hermeneutics, the interpretation of our existence, of our perception of existence.

That movement, I think—that literalism, that biblical literalism—affects and influences not just those who we might call these days religious fundamentalists. It also affects many other people who consider themselves religious, and the wider culture, even secularists or people who consider themselves secular and non-religious. Something happened in the whole regarding of the ontological and epistemological status of what we call in our language sensing the soul and an imaginal perception—an imaginal reading of scripture, an imaginal reading of the texts of reality, the text of existence, the text of body, of matter, of world, of others. Massively influential.

And disturbingly, in another article by someone called Harriet Sherwood, also in The Guardian quite some years later, there was a survey or study, and I find this a little disturbing myself—but that just betrays my biases. They found that when a church emphasized a literal interpretation of the Bible, that actually helped increase church attendance and brought in a much younger congregation. So many more people are attracted, it seems, by a literalist interpretation of scripture, and for some reason, younger people are as well.

There's something here—again, the larger point has to do with the ontology and epistemology of our endeavor, our exploration of what we're calling imaginal perception and sensing the soul. And we're talking about large cultural ideas that really influence, limit, circumscribe, prohibit certain modes of knowing, modes of being—but also even more significantly modes of knowing, or what we might even try to state, to claim as modes of knowing.

So this happens in all kinds of ways. There was a Christian example, but we could give a more Buddhist example regarding the way we see bodies, or our body. Now that, of course, is dependent on the way of looking, which always includes a conceptual framework and the mind state. So when I use the word "way of looking," you know that it means a lot of different elements within that concept and also just what we call mind state or state of mind or mood or whatever.

So I remember many years ago, I think it was almost twenty years ago, I did a retreat completely on my own in a cabin in the woods when I was living in the States. And I'd never done it. It was a really, really solitary retreat. I didn't take any books, any dharma talks, no recordings, nothing. Just me in the woods. I think I saw one person in the whole ten days by accident. And there was an intense heat wave during that time, and then it rained for two days straight, and I was just on my own and in really total solitude.

At that time, something really happened in terms of my jhāna practice. I went really interested—I had had a bit of an opening, quite a significant opening before in terms of jhānas, and I really sensed, oh, I wonder what will happen. I really want to explore that. So I went, and the first four jhānas really began to open up, and I was really excited by that.

And I also had, in terms of fantasy and image, running through those ten days a very sort of vague background, faint fantasy of being a monk—and actually filled out the fantasy. It was actually a Theravādan Buddhist monk. And that kind of sustained and gave some soulfulness to my days there and my explorations and my efforts and my solitude.

At that time, I had no articulation or words or even interest in imaginal practice. I wouldn't even have—I'd never heard of it, never heard of any of this, and certainly hadn't thought about it and explored it the way we have now. But in hindsight, I could say that that was running through alongside everything.

And I remember at some point there was a sort of large mirror, broken mirror that was outside the cabin. And I remember washing—I would get water from a well nearby and wash outside my cabin. There was no one around. And just at some point catching sight of my naked body in this large broken mirror fragment. And it looked so strange. My body looked so strange to me at that point.

Something happened in the course of those days in regard to my body awareness. Because of the way I was practicing and because of the fantasy and because of the practices I was doing, something occurred that influenced and shaped very much my perception of, in this case, my body.

I was eating very simply and not eating much at all. There was a surprisingly easy renunciation with regard to sense pleasure that was very much helped by the opening up of deep equanimity in the third and fourth jhana. So in regard to the senses and particularly to body and materiality, I was - I can only see this in hindsight - but what struck me right then was just how strange my body looked.

With the jhanas there, the view of flesh is kind of one of anatta. It really just goes very quickly to the sense of not me, not mine. And in that whole complex - the fantasy, the Theravadan monk fantasy that was operating there, and secondly in the jhanas, and renunciation with regard to eating and sense pleasure - all of that together, there was no sense of the body as anything sacred. No sense of this body as something wondrous and sacred. If anything, it just looked a bit like a strange sort of animal. I could see my animal nature, almost as if it were kind of an appendage.

It wasn't that there was hate or aversion, nor was there love. There wasn't any self-judgment - no "oh, I wish I had bigger biceps" or whatever. Nor was there any aversion to the animal nature. But there wasn't either any sacredness or any particular interest or opening up of that sense of materiality.

In the fourth jhana, in the first four jhanas, as you might know from the Buddhist description, mindfulness saturates the bodily sense. So we're not talking about being disconnected from the feeling of the body at all. But it's a very particular kind of body sense, and with it comes a particular kind of body conception and view - with that particular practice and with that whole complex of ideas and fantasy that goes with the Theravadan monk thrust in relation to body and flesh.

I remember a colleague, an insight meditation teacher colleague, referring to her body as "a sack of meat" or something like that. It wasn't that it was particularly aversive, but she was saying it because it's a way of referring to the body that represents one of the strands very strong in the Theravadan lineage, in which she was very firmly rooted. And it wasn't that there was aversion or hatred, at least not obviously, but it's a certain way of regarding it - not sacred, not having this dimensionality, not as something that the eros can open up, but something with regard to which we want to let go, see it in a way that leads to dispassion, disinterest.

As I said, in the first four jhanas, the Buddha called them rupa jhanas. They're really body awareness jhanas primarily. That's the dominant experience. But the body awareness undergoes transformation. The awareness is of the energy body, of that space, and then the different frequencies or textures of that space change. It's not that we're out of the body or disconnected in some way. Body awareness is saturating and suffusing the body sense. But there's no real interest or focus on the materiality of the body, and certainly not an opening up of that sense.

And when there is focus under the Theravadan insight rubric, it's hardly ever sacredness or wonder or a kind of erotic interest that is cultivated with regard to matter or body. It's more letting go, disinterest, a minimum of involvement - just enough to keep it together so that you can liberate yourself - or regarding it as just the four elements in a kind of reductive way. Let's not get too excited about this. It's just the four elements. Or it's kind of on its way to being a corpse. It's already a corpse, one imagines. The body is dukkha.

The point is, here was a certain fantasy and set of ideas that I had absorbed and was really taken with - borrowed from the Pali Canon, Theravadan Buddhist logos and fantasy and set of teachings regarding body and materiality - and that massively influenced my body perception and conception at that time, vividly and immediately, in the perception as I caught sight of myself in the mirror there.

Regarding the body or materiality or anything else, I say it so many times: the way we see it, the way we experience it, the way we feel it, the way we conceive it is always dependent on the larger conceptual framework. Whether that's Pali Canon Theravadan Buddhism, whether it's Tantric Buddhism, whether it's popular secular culture and we tend to regard the body in terms of self-judgment or certain body types are elevated or denigrated or ego identification gets involved. Or if it's the larger conceptual framework of the cosmology of, say, an indigenous Amazonian person.

Always that larger conceptual frame, the larger idea - ideas influence. The larger set of ideas, as well as the mind state in the moment, and there's a huge range in that, as well as the feeling in the body and the image of the body. And that image overlaps with the conceptual frame of the idea.

Idea and image overlap. It's something I want to come back to later in this set of talks.

So something like body and materiality is hugely influenced by all that. The point I want to make now is how much it's influenced by idea—how powerful ideas are—and what ideas we're absorbing, certainly from the wider dominant culture, but also from the individual cultures, the subcultures, if you like, that we move in and are educated by.

This brings us to a crucial recognition: our experience is always being shaped. Nothing we encounter—whether it's our body, our emotions, our sense of self, or the world around us—exists in some pure, unmediated state. Everything comes to us through the lens of our conceptual frameworks, our conditioning, our moment-to-moment mental states. And this shaping is happening whether we're aware of it or not.

The question then becomes: what kind of shaping do we want? What conceptual frameworks serve our liberation, our understanding, our capacity for love and wisdom? What ideas open up possibilities rather than close them down? What ways of seeing support our deepest intentions for practice and for life?

This is why the dharma offers us not just techniques or methods, but entire ways of seeing, complete conceptual frameworks that can transform our experience from the ground up. When we truly understand the dependent arising of all phenomena, when we see through the lens of emptiness, when we recognize the constructed nature of our perceptions, we're not just learning concepts—we're being offered tools for the complete transformation of how we meet reality.

And this is ongoing work. It's not that we adopt a dharma view once and then we're done. These frameworks need to be cultivated, practiced, lived into. They need to become not just intellectual understandings but embodied ways of being that naturally influence how we perceive and respond to each moment as it arises.

CHAPTER 115

Sensing with Soul (Part 7)

Rob Burbea · 50 min

> In this profound exploration of epistemology and soul-sensing, Rob Burbea examines why our culture grants validity to certain forms of knowing while relegating others to second-class status. He investigates the parallel between the epistemological challenges of sensing soul and our cultural difficulty with claiming to 'know' values like beauty, goodness, and love.
>
> Burbea distinguishes between intra-psychic images (dreams, imagination) which have gained some cultural acceptance through psychoanalysis, and extra-psychic soul-sensing (such as knowing a tree loves you) which faces greater epistemological resistance. He explores how the imaginal middle way—holding perceptions as neither real nor unreal—allows for a fruitful relationship with soul-making perceptions that brings freedom, wonder, and meaning without fixation.
>
> The talk delves into participation as a key concept that transcends the subject-object divide, suggesting we participate in both creating and discovering truth, reality, and soul. Burbea challenges the dominant materialist ontology as a form of 'epistemological colonialism' and invites practitioners to explore how different conceptual frameworks can open or close possibilities for soul-making and imaginal perception.

Now let's come back to the connection I made at the beginning of this talk between epistemology—epistemological questions and concerns regarding sensing the soul—and similar questions with respect to values.

Remember, epistemology is about knowing. Why is it okay to say "I had experience X and I had experience Y," but I am only allowed to say "In having experience X, I knew X," while I can't say "I know Y, I knew Y"? Some things we can say we have experienced, but in terms of knowledge—knowledge of reality—that's the epistemological remit. What constitutes knowledge? What qualifies as knowledge? How can we know? What are the modes of knowing? What is knowable?

Why can I say of some experiences that there was a knowing, and of other experiences they were just experiences? Epistemologically, they have second or third or perhaps fourth class status. There's that whole question with regard to sensing a soul, and it's linked to this similar kind of question with regard to values.

I can say, or it's deemed okay for me to say, "I know this bag of potatoes weighs X kilograms." That's fine. Or "I know they are potatoes." Or "I know we were in a car crash the other day." But once I get to things like "I know this is beautiful," then some people start to get a little bit nervous. "I know this is more beautiful than that." Or "I recognize, I know beauty, I know goodness, I know love."

This is a knowing of values. "I experience a sense of beauty. I experience this is good. I experience love." "I know" gets a little more tricky when values are involved, or people are less willing generally in the culture to grant the same epistemological status as knowing there are potatoes in front of me and they weigh X kilograms, or knowing that this piece of metal smashed into that piece of metal at X miles an hour.

If I say, "I know this tree loves me. I know this tree—this tree that I love—I know it loves me," versus "If I say, I feel that it does, or I experience that it does, that it loves me," that's generally more acceptable. People might raise an eyebrow too, but to say "I know that it loves me" seems like an epistemological step too far for our culture.

I want to really open up this area a little bit—ontology and epistemology—and I hope you can get a sense of how important it is. Can we just walk around in there and pick up some stones and overturn them and see what's underneath in that domain of ontological and epistemological questions?

Values have been relegated slowly in terms of their truth status in our culture. As I said, especially with modernism sort of rolling into post-modernism—or a certain kind of postmodernism at least, the dominant kind of postmodernism—values are just regarded as historically conditioned, culturally conditioned opinions of what is beautiful, of what is good, etc. So to say "I know this value, I know it to be there" has had its status epistemologically and ontologically relegated.

The connection with sensing the soul is partly analogous, parallel. There's an epistemological parallel in the relegation. As I said, if I say "I know this tree loves me," or this imaginal dimension—"I know that"—again it seems too far for the modern outlook, the dominant modern outlook. So partly it's a parallel with the epistemological cramping with sensing the soul, and partly it's because, as I pointed out, sensing the soul includes a sensing of value.

These are bound up together—not just by analogy, but because one is included in the other. They weave together.

It is sensing with soul—the sensing with soul of others, of the world, of the self—that in our time needs epistemological validation.

When we come to purely intra-psychic images, as opposed to extra-psychic sensing the soul—let's say "that tree loves me, this tree loves me" as an example of extra-psychic so-called sensing the soul—when we contrast that with a purely intra-psychic imaginal image, it needs a different kind of validation, or that kind of validation less.

There's a kind of validation that most people these days would give—many people in our culture would give a certain epistemological validity to intra-psychic images just because we've had more than a hundred years of psychoanalysis post-Freud. Most people—well, let's say many people—would accept that the psyche has a kind of intelligence regarding our inner life and feelings, and a moral kind of intelligence of the psyche regarding its moral judgment of our actions in the world. The psyche manifests this intelligence through images, in dreams, in our imagination, and in many ways, in many forms—but dreams and imagination would be dominant ones, common ones.

So that degree of validation—there is a kind of knowing. If I get an image of something or a dream of something, it may be, or at least many people in our society would regard it as having a certain validity as some kind of knowing, but in regard to my inner life, my inner feelings, some part of myself reflecting on another part of myself or where I've acted or relationships that I have to certain people or certain things in my life or my childhood or whatever it is.

There's a certain knowing there manifested in the image and we can know that knowing. When we interpret this dream or this image in a certain way, that constitutes a knowledge of ourselves. We say then we're knowing it.

When it comes to extra-psychic images, it's really these that need the epistemological validation or championing or perhaps promotion after their relegation over the last hundreds and hundreds of years—and perhaps a different kind of promotion.

So this tree that I love, if we take that as an example—this tree that I love—how do I feel, sense that it loves me? How do I know that it loves me, that love flows between us? There's an epistemological, ontological question. How can I feel justified in saying, "I know that this tree loves me?"

Let's linger with this a little bit.

When my friend says she, he, they love me, how do I know that she, he, they love me? Saying "I love you," as any honest and mature human being knows, doesn't guarantee the truth of that love.

Consider someone incapable of expressing their love verbally or through obviously interpretable motion or gesture—say someone who's paralyzed. Did you see that film My Left Foot with Daniel Day-Lewis? It was many years ago, and I thought it was fabulous. He plays a boy with cerebral palsy who cannot speak and has very limited motion, just in his left foot. So he's essentially paralyzed and rendered incapable of communication for much of his adult life.

One of the things I found so touching and beautiful in that movie was the relationship he had with his mother and their love flowing both ways. But how did she know that he loved her? How did she know? He was incapable of expressing it, and even when it became a complicated thing—when he did eventually manage to express it—it was dismissed by some people around him. "He's just a vegetable," was the sort of view.

Very movingly for me, she said to him at one point when they were alone—she looks at him and says, "Sometimes I think you are my soul." Very beautiful.

But in that sort of situation, or with a pet or a dog incapable of expressing their love verbally or through some obviously interpretable emotional gesture, and in the absence of some scientific measure of love, how do we know that this being loves me? How do we know?

We could open it up even more. What is love anyway? Is love a feeling? Is love an action? Is love a commitment to action? Which actions and when? Maybe it's an attitude. Is love an attitude? Or is love a tendency to try to view and act in a certain way? None of those possible definitions is universally agreed upon or enacted by human beings.

So in relation to something like love, we have a problem epistemologically.

But this tree that I love loves me. I know that. I know that the way lovers know—the way lovers know not just that they love, but that they are loved. The way they feel that. How do I know it? By what organ of perception? By what instrument of knowing? By what mode of knowing do I know that?

I could say I know it in my heart. I know it in or through the soul. I also know it in my body, in the touch. This tree that I love loves me, and I know that the way lovers know.

So what we call perceiving imaginally or sensing with soul—perceptions of the imaginal, soul-making perceptions—always involve, although they are not reducible to, they always involve sensing value. For example, beauty or loveliness or meaningfulness or whatever. And knowing values, like beauty or goodness or love, is not, it seems, as simple as knowing what is material, what is measurable, and what is socially agreed upon reality.

This is why there's a difficulty here for us nowadays. In the modern West, we find it hard, or it is not so generally accepted—and especially, as I said, after postmodernism—to claim we know something's beauty, or even something's goodness. We are only allowed, it's only politically correct, to claim a subjective perspective: "I find that very beautiful," or "I find that not beautiful," or whatever.

And there's really some intelligence in that—this escape from dogma and this freeing up of the individual subjectivity to grow in its own way and find its own sensitivities. But it's easy to go to another extreme here.

Because only a kind of—if even there is such a thing—completely dispassionate human being, and even then, only with regard to what does not involve him or her or them, only such a person in such a relationship or situation will say and really believe, regarding a sense of right or wrong in terms of value or beauty or whatever, will say and really believe when they say, "It's all relative and only a matter of opinion."

So for me to consent to the possibility that the Smurfs—do you remember the Smurfs? I checked with Mark and Ava, and they're much younger than I am, but they remember the Smurfs—so these were like these little blue, kind of dwarf-like cartoon characters, and they had a few hit singles, a hit movie, and number one top of the charts singles.

But for me to consent to even the possibility that the Smurfs' songs are as beautiful—if we take beauty as a value—are as beautiful as Beethoven's late string quartets or John Coltrane solos or whatever... Politically correct as it might be to say that one is not really more beautiful than the other, if I were to say that, or to be in a situation where I'm forced to say that, I can feel something—it does something in my soul and my cells.

And yet to imply that it's not so, to imply that one is more beautiful than the other—and I know that is kind of not politically correct—we're not granted that epistemological validity of knowing with regard to beauty. And what we know in... You see the connection here? Why are we talking about the Smurfs now?

The question of claiming, making knowledge claims, epistemological claims with regard to values—and so with regard to beauty, with regard to the Smurfs—is related to our hesitation, our shyness, our withdrawing, our non-claims, if such there be, or possibility of making knowledge claims with regard to sensing the soul. Because what we know in soul ways of knowing, as I said, always partly involves values and ideals, not only what is measurable or material or socially agreed upon.

So if we remember that when we talked about the spectrum of uses of the imagination, we said there's papañca, and then there's a kind of possibly mindful images and mindful healing images and imagination and intrapsychic images and we could say extrapsychic sensing the soul images. It's really, in that little list along that spectrum there, it's really the epistemology and the ontology of that last category, the extrapsychic sensing the soul, and to some degree the intrapsychic, that's the category that's tricky for us. The papañca we just dismiss.

Even if we insert into that little spectrum the kind of image that comes with ESP, or extrasensory perception... It's really that last one because we can find a category, oh, it was valid. That dream I have that turned out to be a premonition of this happening or gave me some information in advance, so to speak, of some event happening. Something that minds can do under certain conditions, in a way it's really not a big deal, but on another level it is a big deal because it has lots of implications. But that in itself, it's easy to find an epistemological and ontological slot there. It's like, oh, okay, so I knew this in advance somehow, and even though it wasn't proved until that thing actually happened and I found out that it was true, there was clearly some kind of knowing in advance. And so we can give it that place in... We can support it with its own kind of ontology and epistemology.

The thing that's difficult with the epistemology there is just that, as I said, we don't know its knowledge until we've checked it with asking our friend, were you in such a place there? Or they do call when we dreamt that they would call, or we get some news when we dreamt that the news would be such and such as opposed to something else. And we only know, get it checked off as knowledge at that point. But still, epistemologically and ontologically, it doesn't seem to create that much of a problem.

But particularly the extrapsychic sensing of souls, that's tricky for us. If we connect that to what we've been saying about values, images that might come—and remember images might mean any sense modality—but dream images or some kind of extrasensory perception images in any of the sense stories, don't seem to involve a sense of values so much. I mean, this is just my observations. I think it's fair to say. They don't feel imaginal. They don't have those qualities, those aspects and elements that we ran through in the list. It's almost like just a communication of information. They don't have... They're not permeated by a sense of beauty or meaningfulness, or maybe meaning, but not meaningfulness, not depth, not unfathomability, etc. They feel, ESP images, if we can call them that, feel just kind of matter of fact. They're bits of information only, really. And they don't have that whole imaginal constellation of elements and aspects that we ran through in the first talk.

So ESP experiences feel very matter-of-fact, ordinary in themselves. Perhaps when we reflect on the fact that we can even have such experiences at times—it's really the mind under certain conditions has such experiences; we look at it that way, it has nothing to do with ego—but perhaps when we reflect on the fact that we can have such experiences and reflect on what the implications are for understanding the nature of awareness or mind, consciousness and its relationship with matter, then that whole reflection and acknowledgement and recognition can be and feel soul-making for us if it's a new reflection and a new opening of the logos there. But the sense and texture of the actual ESP perception or image itself is often very ordinary. It doesn't have a sense of holiness or divinity or all the rest of it to it.

There are other kinds of perceptions. I'm going back to this kind of—I think I put it right at the beginning of the Path of the Imaginal Retreat—this kind of classification or categorization of different kinds of uses of the imagination. Because there are other kinds of perception. Someone was telling me about being present at her grandmother's death and being aware somehow of her grandmother's soul or awareness entering another realm, leaving this realm and entering another realm and sensing the joy and the gift and the wonder and the revelation of that.

Now, in that kind of perception, there's immense meaningfulness, a sense of beyondness, depth, divinity, wonder. The energy body, as she experienced that, was harmonized and open and all the rest of it. So those kind of perceptions are closer to imaginal perceptions, though they are taken as true and real rather than in a kind of very theatre sense, in that imaginal middle way sense that we were emphasizing.

So there's all kinds of divisions here in terms of ontology and epistemology. How to distinguish these different perceptions of other dimensions or realms from what we're calling imaginal images and soul-making perceptions, sensing the soul, how to tell the difference.

It may well be that some of what we classify today as imaginal - neither real nor unreal - may at other times and places in human history, both past and future, be classified as real and accurate perceptions of matters of fact. Just because, as I said before, ideas in history change, and that influences massively our sense of what is real. Even if we're not philosophers and have never heard the words ontology and epistemology, ideas in the culture massively influence our understanding. This will shape how we think of all these different kinds of experiences involving the imagination.

But there is a certain subset of experiences that we might call ESP - extrasensory perception regarding matters of fact in this material world that feel very ordinary and unimaginable in the sense we've outlined, lacking the imaginal constellation of elements and aspects. So I think this is very complex. Can it remain an open question? I don't know anyone who's figured out - certainly not to many other people's satisfaction and agreement - some kind of categorization of the ontology and epistemology involved in different sense perceptions, if we include sensing the soul and imaginal perceptions. Perhaps there are grey areas, perhaps there are crossovers and in-betweens. Complex, interesting, complex.

I think for us right now, apart from wanting to walk around in this area and turn over some stones that maybe haven't been turned over for quite a while, to create a bit of space in what can usually be a domain that doesn't have any space to walk around in - it's just given to us: this is how things are, this is what's worthy of respect, this is not worthy of respect - so just wanting to walk around in there.

At a minimum right now, we could say that experientially, even when we do hold to this imaginal middle way - not really saying it's real, not really saying it's unreal - those perceptions, those imaginal perceptions, that sensing the soul can have a huge effect. Even with this middle way held regarding ontological status and reality, that sensing the soul, that imaginal middle way, can have a huge effect on our conceptual frameworks, on our orientations, on the directions we have in life, on what we're devoted to, on our whole sense of existence, and actually on our ontology, epistemology, cosmology.

Picking up on that point, it may be that humanity may never arrive at a conclusive and finally complete answer regarding the ontic status of imaginal images, of what we sense with soul. It may be that there's no way of finally knowing any of this for sure. But phenomenologically - that is, in our experience - we can notice that adopting or finding ourselves in the imaginal middle way, sensing images or soul-making perceptions as neither real nor not real, automatically and often effortlessly allows us to have and feel, with respect to an image or perception, a sense of devotion with freedom and relative non-attachment, a sense of sacredness and meaningfulness without fixation or tightness, senses of depth that are still open to more discovery.

So phenomenologically, the stance of the middle way, the poise of this middle way, is a very helpful and fruitful perspective. We can notice that, we can notice how it feels for us as we receive the gifts of freedom, of energy, of wonder, of beauty, of joy. This poise of the middle way is very fruitful and helpful in terms of freedom, energy, wonder, beauty, joy, devotion, soul-making.

Conversely, we can see and notice, we can feel what happens when an image is reified or literalized. We can see what happens, we can see what dies. Something tends to die when that imaginal middle way gets squeezed, when the theatre goes out of it. Something dies in the whole experience, and those gifts of freedom, energy, wonder, beauty, joy - particularly the freedom - are often unavailable when an image is reified or literalized.

As is often the case, we need to look to the effects of our way of looking to inform our choices, our stances, our attitudes, our perspectives and conceptions. What we can say is that the stance of the middle way, the stance of the imaginal middle way, brings really good results. We feel its bounty, its fruitfulness. When we're talking about theatre, it's powerful, it has effects, but we recognize the theatre of it. And one of the fruits is the soul-making.

At the same time, we could go a little further with the ontology and epistemology involved here. Adopting that middle way is, in some respects, very fruitful. In some respects, it's also a relatively cautious approach.

I think at the end of the Eros Unfettered talk, I mentioned a phrase - I don't know who coined it - about metaphysics and a disparaging comment that metaphysics is that branch of philosophy which, for some people, translates as anything spiritual or anything we would call soulful, equivalent to being in a dark basement, a pitch black basement, looking for a dark black cat that is not there. That whole way of talking about other dimensions and divinity is something equivalent to that - quite a disparaging comment.

I can't remember if I made the point, but what if I hung out in such a basement wanting to find such a black cat, and maybe someone gives me infrared goggles...

Or maybe I start not looking with my eyes, but touching with my body, with my hands and the feeling and the senses there. Maybe my eyes just get used to the dark. And actually there is a cat there and I experience that cat for myself.

And then what was called metaphysics just becomes the valid conceptualizing or attempt at conceptualizing and forming conceptual frameworks with regard to what I experience. Because here I am touching this soft, warm, furry thing that looks and feels and sounds like a cat, a black cat.

So just as science is the endeavor of creating valid concepts and valid conceptual frameworks of what we experience, Buddhism—whether it's "religious" Buddhism or "secular" Buddhism—involves a valid conceptualizing of what we can experience and what we do experience, or at least what some people experience.

If it didn't occur to me to start sensing with my touch to find the cat, if my eyes didn't get used to the dark, if I didn't spend long enough for my eyes to adjust, if no one gave me or I didn't find infrared goggles there I could use, I wouldn't experience the black cat and I would consider this all just ridiculous waste of time conjecture—metaphysics in the most disparaging sense of the word.

But once I experience things through my meditative dedication and work and practice and opening up and careful intelligent practice, once I experience them, then those things come into the realm of why I need some kind of conceptual framework for these things. And if I experience them regularly and extensively, and if they make a difference in my life, I'm going to need some kind of valid conceptual framework around that. Just like science, just like actually any kind of philosophy, whether it's educated philosophy or just everyman's working philosophy.

Again, with regard to ontology and epistemology, science and philosophy debate ongoingly the being or non-being or ontic status, reality status of what seems most evidently there. Ontological debates still go on in science and philosophy regarding things that we experience and things that seem really obvious: chairs, chariots, cats, quarks—all this is still up for ontological debate in the realm of science and the philosophy of science and also wider philosophy.

Same with gods, same with divinities, same with soul. We experience it. It seems evident to our senses with practice. And so it can be drawn in. There's a validity to drawing it in to the ontological and epistemological debate. Experience must be accounted for, generally speaking.

Philosophy—even if it's not worked out philosophy or conceptual structure—we account for experience with our ideas. Somehow, we try to account for experience with our ideas.

And again, we inherit or receive, are impacted by, a whole set of hierarchies and value systems regarding ontology and epistemology from the cultures that we move in. So if we regard someone who's tone deaf or color blind—obviously being polite about it and not offensive—but we somehow regard them as having something inadequate or not quite competent or deficient in their perception, or as a perceiver.

Or an autistic person—one of the theories of what's going on there is they can't read emotions in another person. So it's as if another person is devoid of emotion for them, of emotional reality. There's no reality to them. They can't actually perceive it. And again, generally in terms of psychological diagnostics, we regard autism as a kind of pathology. There's a perceptual deficiency, inadequacy, incompetency there.

Now, some people—and again, it's not quite politically correct, but it's pretty dominant—might regard, let's say, a pre-modern, so-called pre-modern tribe, an indigenous tribe somewhere, and that whole worldview, and regard them also as deficient or incompetent perceivers and conceivers and thinkers because they don't have science in the way that we do. They don't have that scientific methodology or that scientific directionality.

But we could ask, isn't that an epistemological colonialism? We've got this view and we're convinced this is right and this is better. They are deficient, just like an autistic person is deficient in their perception and conception, just like a colorblind or tone-deaf person is also deficient in their perception of color and sound. There's a kind of bias there of what we could call epistemological colonialism. Our culture is right. That culture is wrong. We know what's real. They are barking up the wrong tree with regard to reality.

Why, just in principle, doesn't someone who thinks that way accept this culture's regard for your inability to perceive souls or spirits, for example, in nature—something we might call akin to sensing the soul? Why don't we perceive that as a deficiency? Like that's a kind of autism. We are simply unable to see some aspect of reality, like tone deafness or like color blindness.

We, our culture or the dominant culture, has ruled out that as qualifying for reality status. It's got a relegated ontological status and any kind of knowing that one might claim is not justified. Any kind of "I know this tree's spirit" or "I know this forest's spirit"—that's not given epistemological validation.

So we could really push at this circumscription, this cramping that has been given to us, imposed on us by the dominant culture.

In regarding ontology and all that, I actually regard it as a never-ending exploration. I don't think humanity will ever fully answer these questions. It's more like the questions themselves and the positions that various cultures take with regard to them over time is part of the story of humanity. It's part of the soul evolution of humanity.

Conceptual frameworks, ontologies, epistemologies reflect and engender soul-making. Certain conceptions, certain ontologies, certain epistemologies can open up possibilities for soul-making. Certain emphases of conceptual frameworks open up soul-making differently, so that ontological and epistemological conceiving becomes part of the whole soul-making movement, potentially.

What's quite popular in a lot of modern philosophies—some philosophers such as Richard Rorty, for instance, who's quite popular in some circles—is to almost look back in history and just acknowledge that the whole philosophical and scientific endeavour to arrive at a kind of conclusive ontology and epistemology has proved unsuccessful so far. Therefore their attitude is just to drop that whole investigation, just kind of shrug and give up and leave it and poo-poo those whole threads and investigations and explorations in philosophy.

What it seems to me, reading someone like Richard Rorty more closely and people who say that kind of thing or espouse that kind of thing, is that they're saying to drop all ontology and epistemology. But actually what happens is there is a default reversion to just whatever is the dominant unconscious and usually unquestioned ontology of the main culture. In other words, Rorty often lets slip—I don't think he's even quite conscious of it—that his notion of reality is a kind of atomistic, physicalist one of atoms moving in space according to random, meaningless laws. That's underpinning, or hidden—it's his hidden default ontology and the epistemology that goes with it.

Despite the talk of "let's just drop all this talk of ontology and epistemology, because people just argue; let's just keep everything open so that we can move forward together in a spirit of harmony," actually underneath there's a real entrenchment and preference for one kind of ontology and epistemology. In other words, the secular, modernist, scientific, materialist, dominant ontology and epistemology over and above anything so-called spiritual, religious, soulful.

So if there is this kind of never-ending philosophical possibility, if soul-making is potentially never-ending, and part of soul-making is logos, and that too is never-ending, and part of logos is the exploration of ontology and epistemology and opening them up and trying different things out and shifting ideas—and if soul-making is endless, then part of that endlessness is the endlessness, the never-endingness of ontological and epistemological exploration or conceiving, creation, discovery, play.

And it might be that one of the ideas that perhaps its time has come might be this idea of participation. Because up to now, the dominant philosophical and scientific modes have really veered towards a kind of objectivism and subjectivism. This goes all the way back to Descartes and before: reality is what is objectively independently real, and you can talk about what's subjectively true for me or my opinion or my taste or whatever, or my just being a pawn of the culture and being totally culturally conditioned and moved about by trends in history and historically contingent. But basically there's a gulf between subject and object.

A notion like participation is in a way a very ancient concept and goes back to Plato. I don't know much about how he used it, and I know that he was actually quite vague—he never really filled out what he meant by it. For me, it strikes me as a very important and possibly very rich and fertile notion and a really key concept. And again, it's hard to fill it out, but one of the things that we touched on before about participation is it does not fall into a kind of view of subjectivism nor a view of objectivism. Not "reality is what is objectively independent" or "everything is just dependent on the subject."

There's some kind of mutual participation of what we typically conceive of as object and typically conceive of as subject. What we typically conceive of as truth and what we typically conceive of as a knower of truth. So instead of truth being objectively independent, real, we are participating in the creation slash discovery of truth. Creation and discovery of truth. There's some word between or straddling or encompassing both creation and discovery that the word participation hints at.

So it's a really deep concept that embraces and involves ontology and epistemology and reality and notions of God and all of that, even notions of awakening, as I mentioned in one talk. So none of these things—matter, reality, selves, subjects, objects, truth, liberation, soul, divinity—all of them are participated in. We participate in creating, discovering all of that.

To me, this is a very profound and potentially very fertile concept as perhaps a new step in our play in logos, which is part of our great play in soul-making. A new step in our play with ontology and epistemology, conceptual frameworks, and how involved in that play is also what we perceive, what we sense, sensing the soul, perceiving imaginatively.

CHAPTER 116

Dukkha and Soulmaking (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h44

In this opening talk of a series, Rob Burbea examines the complex relationship between dukkha and soul-making practice. He explores how imaginal perception and sensing with soul can relieve suffering, while also addressing the prerequisites and areas of care needed for sustainable soul-making work. The talk emphasizes the importance of energy body awareness, emotional intelligence, and relational skills as foundational elements. Burbea discusses various approaches to working with emotions in meditation, from laser-beam attention to delicate awareness and kindness-infused mindfulness. He highlights how soul-making often occurs more readily in relationship with others, requiring sophisticated communication skills and psychological maturity. The concept of temenos—sacred space—is introduced as essential for sharing imaginal experiences safely. Throughout, Burbea balances encouragement with honest assessment of what this path demands: facility with samādhi, insight into emptiness, mettā practice, and the ability to discern between eros and craving. While acknowledging these practices as potentially 'advanced,' he emphasizes that all these capacities are developable and accessible, forming gifts not only to oneself but to the world.

This talk was initially planned as the second of a series of four. It's now the third of a series of five. In it, I would like to talk about dukkha and soulmaking.

This is, I think, a really huge, vast and complex subject. It's also what we might call an open field, an open subject, in that what we emphasize, what we conclude, and the paths we take and clear in this whole area depends a lot on conceptual frameworks and ways of looking that we develop and implement. What arises for us in terms of suffering in the context of soulmaking—how soulmaking addresses and impacts on suffering—depends very much on what we mean by soulmaking, what we mean by imaginal and eros and all these other words, and our larger conceptual framework. So it's open. We're in the process of creating and discovering our ways in all of this.

Because of that largeness and complexity, this talk is only going to look at some areas of this whole domain and some strands within that. Mostly what I want to focus on in this talk, which will almost certainly have several parts, is how imaginal perception, imaginal practice, how sensing with soul—the different ways, or some of the different ways—it can relieve and ease dukkha, bring about some relief or even ending of suffering. Similarly, within the whole soulmaking paradigm, I want to explore the ways that eros, or working with desire skillfully and with discernment, can do something similar in terms of freedom from suffering, relief, ease from dis-ease.

I also want to touch on what do we mean by dukkha? What kinds of dukkha are we talking about when we say dukkha and Four Noble Truths? What are our conceptions of dukkha? What possible conceptions of dukkha might we bring to bear, and conceptions of the causes of dukkha, and also of freedom from dukkha and relief from dukkha or alleviation of dukkha? In other words, the paradigm of the Four Noble Truths and how it relates to the soulmaking path.

A third area that I want to open up is to highlight some of the ways and areas where this kind of practice, soulmaking practices, this kind of work, this kind of exploration, asks us for care. We need to take care with certain elements. What does that mean? What's involved in that? Which elements? And how? There are certain things that we need to be aware of in the whole endeavor, in the whole movement and exploration. There may be certain aspects that we may regard as prerequisites—it's good if this and that are in place, if we already have a facility, a skill, a capacity, that we have that under our belt.

Without that kind of care, without those kinds of awarenesses, and without those prerequisites, it's sometimes possible that practicing with eros, practicing with desire, trying these practices, practicing with the imaginal, actually brings dukkha—because we are not taking care, there's not enough awareness of certain aspects and areas, and not enough sensitivity and attention, and we don't have certain prerequisites. So that's another piece of all this that I would like to address, and that's what I want to start with: areas where we might need to take care, what that looks like, aspects and elements that we might need to pay attention to, to be aware of, and what might be prerequisites for this kind of path, explorations, and practices.

I think I've said before, I can't remember which retreat, sometime in the last couple of years, that one could say this soulmaking business and these practices are pretty advanced. Maybe that's true. It's a word I tend to shy away from myself, but we could say that, and I could go along with that. I think it's fair to say, using different vocabulary, that the soulmaking path, as we are unfolding it, outlining it, opening it up, describing it, exploring it, asks a lot of us. It demands quite a lot—a lot of know-how, we might say, a lot of skills or arts in relation to a lot of domains of our being and experience.

For example, with respect to our emotional life and the life of our heart and the needs of our heart, and with respect to body and energy body, what we're calling energy body awareness. With respect to being in a dyad or a tunus, in relationship with some kind of other—whether that's a human other, a totally intra-psychic imaginal other, an other in nature, whether we ourselves become in some way an erotic imaginal other to another aspect of ourselves. How we are in tunus, whether we lose ourselves, whether we can't connect, whether we have our body and our sensitivity there—all of that, that whole domain of sets of skills and awarenesses and arts.

It asks of us quite a degree of sensitivity in our mindfulness, of what we can actually pay attention to, notice, stay focused on, attuned to, really opening up the realms of subtle discrimination, subtle awareness. It's asking of us the art of engaging and entertaining conceptual frameworks without losing our body and the connection with our body and the fullness of that and the beauty and richness and juiciness of that, nor our heart. What is it to have all three aspects of our being—body, heart, and intellect and mind in that sense?

It's also asking of us that we have some capacity and some capacity for growth with regards to these qualities: humility and reverence and the awareness and sense of beauty and sensitivity to beauty. It's asking that we have developed or are developing the skills, the arts of handling energies in and through the body, of handling and working skillfully with our eros and the energy of our desire and the movements of our desire, that we can discern between eros and craving—such an important distinction in this kind of work.

This whole path, this whole journey and everything it involves, actually asks of us quite a set of relational skills, which I'll come back to today. We also need really basic insight meditation skills, like just the ability and capacity to drop something. Even if it's fascinating or beguiling or gripping or intense, can you actually put it down, let it go, let go of this image, let go of that eros?

In many cases, sometimes that's a skillful move within the larger movement of the path. And this work also requires all the more commonly taught and spoken about Dharma skills: loving-kindness, metta, mindfulness, some degree of skill with samadhi, knowing what works for you there, some understanding and a little bit of skill with emptiness. So it's quite a lot, you know. Maybe that warrants the word, the epithet "advanced"—the adjective "advanced."

It's also probably fair to say that this path, these practices, these kinds of investigations and explorations—playing in this way—can and often does bring up a lot, so to speak. Or we could say it pushes on a lot in our being, in our psychological and psychic makeup. It opens and stretches a lot. Whether that's in terms of our heart, our emotions and our emotionality, whether it's in terms of energies that we experience from time to time, whether it's in terms of our views—the views we have of self, of others, of world, of existence, of desire, of all kinds of things.

Psychologically too, it pushes on quite a lot, or can bring up quite a lot at times. Certain things that have gotten stuck in us or fixated can arise. We're also including the possibility that eros does become sexual at times. Remember, eros doesn't only mean sexual attraction and energy, but it includes that. So it may bring up things around our relationship with desire, around our whole sexuality, and how that is for us. All this arises.

Now, many of you are already practicing in this way—introduced in this way, playing in this way—and have already seen, felt, experienced for yourselves just what kind of openings are possible here. Many of you are, I know, really, really touched and almost amazed and taken with this way of practicing and what it can draw into its orbit and include and redeem and transform and open up.

You will also realize, if that's the case, or many of you I hope will realize, that for all that beauty and opening and grace and gift to be possible in a way that's long-term sustainable, we need to inquire into what are the elements of this path. When the Buddha talks about the Eightfold Path, what makes this sustainable? He doesn't just say, "Go and be intensely mindful," or "Just zip through the jhanas," or "Just contemplate emptiness and let go." What actually makes this kind of path sustainable? What are the elements—the essential pieces of equipment, if you like—that we need to take on this journey?

As I said before, I want to walk a tightrope somewhat in some of these talks and really want to be encouraging. I don't want to be forbidding at all. Many of you have already been really surprised by just what is possible, even with a little bit of practice in these kinds of ways. But there's also this question of bringing a kind of maturity—psychological maturity—to looking at the whole path and what it might need. What is good practice in the long term? What is good taking care of myself, taking care of the soul, taking care of this path and these practices?

So in the context of really wanting to encourage and offer freely these teachings for the long term, I'm balancing that with a kind of encouragement also to reflect. Each one of us, if I want—if you want—to open in this way, to explore in these ways and move in these ways of soul-making, what do I need to develop? What do you need to develop? What are the essential elements of the path, or pieces of kit for the journey?

We can be somewhat universal in answers to that, but a lot of it's quite individual as well. What do I need? Where I am right now as a human being with my history, the teachings that I've had, the practices that I've developed, the skills, the things I've worked through, my psychological history, my different capacities and needs—what do I need to develop now?

Me myself, right now, where I am—if I'm attracted to this path, if I want to open it up and move forward in a way that's really fertile and fruitful and sustaining and beautiful. It doesn't mean it's always going to be easy. Even if I have all these pieces and elements, even if I'm taking care in these ways, it will be challenging at times. But this really makes it actualizable, realizable—not just something that sounds good and exciting, or just some fireworks that flare up, look amazing, and then very shortly thereafter disappear without a trace.

I'll talk about some of these pieces. I've mentioned quite a few already, but if I find—or you find—that a foundational piece or an area needs some more work, it's quite possible to decide to focus on that piece for a while, or that area for a while, without forgetting or giving up on the bigger intention or the larger love of soul-making and that whole trajectory, that whole movement.

I keep that in sight. I know what I want to develop. I know where I want to go. I know what cools my soul and my heart. And I also see that right now this piece is important. Actually, that's quite interesting too, this piece. And that's part of the whole journey. If I want to get there, then I need to go over here. Maybe this bit is a little bit of rocky terrain, or it's a little dark here. I'm a little bit lost in a forest, but I have a kind of map. Or it's kind of uphill for a while.

Just that whole attitude of, "Okay, I'm not losing sight of the bigger picture of my soul's desire and that big calling and yearning. But right now, I'm going to focus on this one. I'm going to develop this piece. This is good." There's a kind of maturity in that, a psychological maturity in that kind of view. There's also a kind of maturing possible there of our fire and our eros for the path.

In other words, a wise or mature discerning longing to travel the path. A wise burning of our fire for soul-making involves at times actually going slower, actually staying in one place for a while and developing something or other—putting certain foundations in place, making sure we have the right footwear, if you like, or whatever it is.

This translates across many other traditions. For instance, in Tibetan Buddhism, there are extensive preliminaries for the bulk of the path, especially when approaching Tantric Vajrayana practices. Practitioners are regularly required to do 100,000 prostrations—hard work physically—before they even begin something that might seem more exciting or alluring. Or 100,000 mantra recitations. This is part of the maturing of the vision, part of preparing the soul, cultivating humility and patience. It's about maturing the fire, tending the fire.

There are those Zen stories where a practitioner seeks out a certain teacher and is made to sit outside the teacher's cave through snow and heat for three years. If they can stay steady, then the teacher says, "Okay, let's see. Let's give you some teaching." In the Jewish mystical tradition, many Kabbalistic lineages stipulate that you cannot study Kabbalah or enter into those mystical practices and teachings until you're at least forty years old. The people who arrive at that threshold have already been saturated with basic Jewish teachings, traditions, and practices—study of laws, rites, rituals. They possess substantial prerequisite understanding and education before moving into the more esoteric teachings.

There are parallels in what I'm suggesting. I wouldn't want to be so rigid myself, but it's really good to consider this maturely, this whole question of possible prerequisites. It's valuable to maintain a long vision with this work, to think about patience as a core element of any authentic path. Thoroughness—what does it mean to be thorough? To really be thorough because I love something, because I care about something. For me, caring about this path is also a way of caring about the world—they are indubitably, indisputably, totally woven together. There's a manifestation of deep care for the world in my caring for this path, in my caring for teaching about it. They go together.

If I love something, I'm going to be thorough. I'm not going to cut corners. I'm not going to build on shaky foundations. If I love my children and I'm building them a pram or a bed, I'm going to make sure it's solid. I don't want it falling apart, because I care, because I love them. The integrity of thoroughness really emerges from care and love—the fullness of love, the fullness of desire, the maturity of desire.

What does it mean to incorporate—I use that word carefully, meaning really to bring into being, into one's body? All of this knowledge and know-how and skills and capacities—emotionally, energetically, even conceptually—goes into the body, becomes incorporated. To incorporate good foundations, to bring honesty in terms of what's needed, where we are. A steadiness of dedication and practice that goes with patience, obviously. An unshaking commitment: "This is what's involved, I'm up for it." And actually one discovers that all the work, even when it's difficult or involves healing, is beautiful—it's soul work. In all of this there's humility and the willingness of the lover, the willingness of the devotee.

Some people approach things very linearly: they engage with the more commonly taught dharma practices, take care of themselves psychologically and address any healing that needs to happen, and then begin the emptiness and soul-making work. It's all very sequential, and that's wonderful if it works. For some people it's really good to think about things that way.

For others, it's not so linear. Many people will be called to this soul-making work and imaginal practice, sensing the soul, and actually almost start there. This makes things more challenging because then one has to develop all these other skills perhaps in tandem, or perhaps pause for a while to develop them. One might have some experience with soul-making practices and logos, really fall in love with it and see how fruitful it can be, but also at some point realize: there are some pieces here, some foundations, some incorporation that needs to happen. This can unfold in different ways—either by pausing in a certain area, slowing down, or actually working in tandem.

But again, all this implies an honesty with oneself and maturity in a number of respects. And it's also something you can ask a teacher who's skilled in this kind of soul-making teaching, who's versed in that and used to it. You can ask, "Do you think I could... What do you think I need?" And it's not to say the teacher's opinion is some kind of decree, but it's good to have some input like that.

Among the elements or foundations or pieces that we've emphasized—that I've already in the past placed great emphasis on—is energy body awareness and skill with the energy body. And for some people, I would say actually maybe many people—in fact most people—developing that, I mean really developing it, takes years.

So on the recent retreats we've spent a day or two at the beginning focusing just on that and then really emphasizing it. We've asked people to have practiced with that before they can even come to the retreats. But generally, there's generally quite a lot to develop until one really feels comfortable and it becomes almost second nature. The energy body awareness and the different ways of working with it can really take years.

That's not to say that one can't have quite a lot of fruitfulness and discovery and benefit from that kind of practice quite quickly, but really kind of making it almost like second nature and normal for one to be grounded in the energy body with that whole awareness, with that whole range that's implicit in what we mean when we say energy body—from really dense, solid, kind of earthy element experience to very ethereal and everything in between.

And to develop the ways that the energy body is really useful in practices of samadhi and samatha and metta and just generally as one mode of mindfulness of the body, how useful it is in insight practices, gauging whether we're on the right track or not in terms of what's useful in any moment, and also in imaginal practices—all of which I've touched on before. This can take quite a while, and even if one just did that, it would be so beneficial, such a huge resource in one's life, in one's practice.

And then particularly the energy body with regard to caring for and skill with our emotions and our emotional life, our heart life. To me, this skill and art with an awareness of our emotional life and everything that goes on there and really knowing facility and flexibility with how to care for that—to me, this really is indispensable for soul-making. It's an absolutely necessary element.

Actually, in the way that I would tend to teach the Dharma—like everything in the Dharma, whether it's metta or whatever—I would also really emphasize a lot of development of the art of emotional awareness and emotional care. I think it's so important for every aspect of the Dharma, every aspect. So in terms of the way I conceive of the whole broad teaching of Dharma, I put that very, very centrally. I realize that not everyone does, not all teachers do, but for me it's a really key element in how I teach.

And just, again, tied in with the energy body, just then what it can then open up. Having that confidence regarding one's emotions and especially how they are in the body. Having the understanding, having the facility and flexibility with working with them and caring with them—really, really important.

So I've talked a lot about working with the emotions and with mind states in the past, a lot. I can't remember the titles of the talks. If I try and remember now, there are talks called "Emotional Healing and Emotions" and "Freedom or Mindfulness of Mind States." There's a three-part talk, if I remember, called "Psychodynamics in Meditation." There was a whole retreat I did once, if I remember, just focusing on working with emotions. That was the main practice for the whole retreat. What's that called? "The Boundless Heart," I think. And every morning we gave a different kind of very specific instruction with regard to emotional awareness. It's quite sort of disciplined and circumscribed, each kind of practice there. And I think they were called "Working with the Emotional Body." And there are seven of them, day one to seven.

So there's all that available if you want to check it out and really develop this. And I really recommend that. Of course, it doesn't have to be those talks, and it certainly doesn't have to be me whose teachings you listen to on this subject. But I would really recommend—and again, it's part of the way I teach—that you develop, over time, so you're really comfortable with, you really have facility and flexibility with a whole range of approaches to working well with the heart life and the emotional life. There's another one called "Heart Work," I remember, in the context of a Metta retreat, so emotions other than metta, during metta.

But so that we have the skills, the arts, and the confidence—how rare it is for human beings to actually feel really confident that whatever emotions come up, generally speaking, I'm confident that I can work with it on my own. It's not that I'm closed to working with it in relationship and having other people input, sharing that with others or in group process or whatever it is. But I'm also confident that I myself can pretty much handle anything that comes up emotionally. That might mean that I have to grapple with it or play with it a little bit until I find just what approach kind of proves fruitful or helpful. It might be a challenge, but I'm basically confident.

And that's really, really possible. And so part of this, what I'm really encouraging, that we all develop this set of skills or the art and developing that confidence is a kind of—I don't know what to call it—just a sort of habit. Maybe that's the best word, a habit, a sort of automatic, ingrained habit of awareness of the mind state and the emotional state.

Someone was asking me about this recently, and I can't remember their exact question, but I found myself saying something quite interesting that I hadn't fully realized before. I think because I have paid so much attention to what I'll call my heart life, my emotional life—and I should note that emotions don't just happen in the heart area but actually occur throughout the entire body—from so much habit developed over years of psychotherapy, years of journaling work in a very embodied way, years of mindfulness and insight meditation where emotional awareness was central, and then incorporating it deeply into practices we've developed with the energy body and other aspects of Dharma practice.

Because of all that accumulated practice, I think it's almost as if—and I'm sure it can't be literally true to say that in every moment I'm automatically aware of my mind state and emotional state—but it feels true to say that in most moments, there's just a sort of organic, automatic quality to this awareness as part of my ordinary consciousness.

Now, the point I want to emphasize is not anything particular about me, but rather that it's truly possible for all of us to become much more aware of our emotional states. We don't have to remain strangers to our own hearts, wondering "Oh, what am I feeling? I have no idea." I remember when that was certainly the case with me—either I was completely overwhelmed by an emotion, or I simply didn't know what I was feeling. I couldn't recognize that I was actually experiencing a particular emotion.

So while this development can involve a lot of work, it can become really just part and parcel of one's normal state of awareness—this ongoing awareness of what the emotions are. And by emotions, I use that term interchangeably with "mind states," which includes something much more subtle than what we usually call an emotion. I'm referring to the very subtle texture of mind and heart right now—perhaps a little cramped because I'm slightly tired, or on neutral keel, nothing remarkable, just a bit peaceful, maybe slightly bored, whatever it might be. This awareness encompasses both really subtle states and gross emotions as well.

So there's this development of awareness across the whole range. We cultivate both the capacity and willingness to feel, including the willingness to be aware of intense emotions and the ability to actually feel intense emotions—recognizing that the heart is big. And equally important is developing sensitivity to really subtle emotions, the capacity to notice them, to make fine discriminations between perhaps wordless, subtly different heart states and mind states.

Tied in with this awareness is the development of sensitivity to make fine discriminations between states we may not even have words for—these subtly different emotional and mental conditions. And then, as I've said, part of the whole art is really learning to care for them, having different approaches to caring and developing facility and flexibility with all of that.

This includes understanding my emotions, which is a vast subject. What does it mean to understand one's emotions? It encompasses quite a lot. One aspect I'll mention right now is understanding how the very conceptual framework we're entertaining at any time—whether we're conscious of it or not, whether we articulate it clearly or not—actually impacts the experience of emotion and how that emotion unfolds. In other words, an emotion is not separate from whatever I'm conceiving or whatever conceptual framework is operating at the time. That's part of understanding emotions—quite a deep and subtle part, though there are many other dimensions as well.

All this work with emotions takes time for most people, though not for everyone. Some people are fortunate enough to receive this education in their upbringing from parents and school, or they're naturally gifted in this way. I don't feel I was. So it takes time, and that requires patience. It can take courage—the courage to be willing to feel what moves through the heart and emotions because it's intense, or because we're frightened. "What will happen if I feel this? What does it mean about me?" It also takes honesty. But it's so, so worth it to develop that art. So worth it. And it's really, really possible.

Now, I want to share just a couple more things about emotional awareness and the art of being with one's emotions well, caring for them skillfully. I spoke about having flexibility in different approaches, facility to engage different ways of relating to what's going on emotionally. I think this is worth lingering on a bit.

I'm emphasizing this partly because the Buddha did speak about emotions—we could say this is an element of the third foundation of mindfulness, mindfulness of mind states, mindfulness of the citta. Different traditions and teachers emphasize different ways of relating to emotions and mind states within this third foundation of mindfulness. So it's very commonly taught, of course...

Actually, some people don't teach it, but it's generally quite common that different ways of relating to emotions within the third foundation of mindfulness are explored. However, you might have been exposed to, or simply out of habit, a somewhat narrowed range of possibilities for skillfully relating to what's going on emotionally. Through no fault of your own, or simply through habit or limited exposure, you may have narrowed down the spectrum of approaches and ways of relating skillfully to emotional states or mind states.

Some people have been exposed to a practice that encourages a very intense, narrow, laser-beam quality of attention directed toward emotions as they manifest in the body—focusing on vedana in the body or simply bodily sensations. This approach can become the predominant way of paying attention to emotions in meditation practice. Sometimes, for practitioners who engage extensively in this kind of meditation with considerable intensity, this becomes their primary way of attending to emotions in daily life as well—this laser-beam focus on sensations.

For some emotions, for some people, at certain times, this approach can be tremendously beneficial. The amplified energy of attention, the intensity and focus gathered into mindfulness and directed with great concentration toward sensations in the body—whether in the throat, around the mouth, the heart, or the belly—can be genuinely helpful with particular emotions at particular times, partly because of the energy involved. I've discussed this previously, so I won't elaborate further now.

At other times, or with different emotions, this becomes a quite unskillful way of paying attention. Sometimes it simply obliterates what's happening, causing us to lose touch with the emotion entirely. We fail to develop any degree of nuanced awareness or sensitivity regarding what's actually occurring emotionally. Sometimes it's actively unhelpful for the emotion itself, burning it in a way that adds hurt to painful emotions or creates additional wounding. Through this laser-beam focus, we miss something of the bigger, more delicate picture.

A second possibility involves much more delicate awareness. We might still focus on the bodily sensations of the emotion, but it's as if we have a dial for the intensity of our attention. We can turn it all the way up to ten for laser-beam intensity, or all the way down to one for the lightest possible touch. I've used the analogy of a feather touching the most delicate piece of cloth—the attention just barely makes contact, very light and gentle.

Something like sadness can be quite a fragile feeling. Not only do we feel fragile when sad, but the actual feeling itself possesses fragility. We need to approach it with very delicate attention in order to learn about it and care for it properly. Part of the art involves developing this capacity—like having a fader switch or dial to adjust how delicate or intense our attention to the emotion's sensations will be.

A third possibility shifts from attention as a beam directed outward toward sensations to attention as a quality of holding. Metaphorically, the attention becomes like hands gently cupped, with the sensations or emotion resting lightly within this holding—safe and gentle, but not crushed within the cupped hands of awareness. The awareness itself contains this quality of holding.

This leads to a fourth possibility: infusing the awareness with kindness. I remember teaching a retreat years ago when someone coined the term "kindfulness," which some people now use. It's mindfulness, it's awareness, but with the kindness dial turned up. This too can manifest in many different ways, with various qualities, because we can be kind to the sensations, kind to the emotions themselves—which is slightly different from sensations—and kind to the self who is experiencing the difficult emotion.

This kindness introduces a quality of softness. I've used the image of gentle, warm water lapping against a sharp rock. The kindness infusing the awareness laps gently against the difficult, hard emotion. It's this softness around it, this warmth, this contact between difficulty and kindness that actually promotes healing.

We could distinguish between possibilities where one pays attention purely to sensations. In this mode, awareness shows no interest in the story, no interest even in the self—the "poor me" and the sense of self having these emotions. It's not particularly concerned with identifying exactly what emotion this is, because sometimes we don't know, sometimes there's no word for it. Even when aware of the emotion, attention remains focused at the level of sensations—less concerned with what the emotions are and less concerned with what the self is.

Again, this is useful, but if it becomes the only way we ever pay attention to our emotions, that becomes quite limited and probably not psychologically healthy in the long term. However, it remains an excellent option at certain times.

Then there's a sort of middle level focus, if you like, where we're not so much getting into the story, not so much getting into the self, but we are caring for this emotion. We really have a sense, with the sensations, what the emotion is. So there's a sense of more richness or fullness to the experience. We're not going for this kind of reductionist attention, which can, as I said, be really helpful at times. We're going for something more medium range, if you like.

So it's really—I really sense this is sadness. I'm not getting into the story of it. I'm not getting so much into the self that's constellated with the sadness. I'm just saying it's just the sadness with the sensations.

And then another one, perhaps this is the seventh. This list, again, is not exhaustive and not so clearly delineated, but I hope you can understand what I'm getting at. The seventh possibility is that we actually allow the self and the sense of self. We include the sense of self in the emotional awareness. So yes, the sensations. Yes, the emotion. And yes, the self.

Again, what can often happen with mindfulness teachings is that we kind of get the sense that self is not okay, or it shouldn't be in the picture. Story is certainly not okay. Self is not so okay. And we kind of get used to just the sensations or just the emotion. And again, really good practice—really good to have that gear, have that facility to be able to look in a way that just kind of looks underneath the self, so to speak. It's just this emotion with these sensations. And that's what I'm mindful of, and that's what I'm with, and I'm just steady with my attention there.

But often what happens with long-term mindfulness meditators, people who have been kind of schooled in the mindfulness tradition—and again, this was something I'm sharing from experience, something that I got into in my early years in practice—we kind of think, "Hold on, I have to recalibrate the lens possibilities here on my awareness, on my attention."

Another possibility is actually letting the self constellate, including the self. So the attention includes the sense of self and the care includes the care for this self. So it's not just this emotion or these sensations. I'm caring for me. It's me who's feeling sad. It's me who's feeling grief. It's me who's feeling angry. And that me, right now, needs care. Yes, I know it's empty. Yes, I know all that. But right now, we're addressing that self. We're including that. I'm not kind of focusing so closely that I don't see that.

So that's another possibility. When we open that possibility, the seventh possibility, then we could say, well, that actually splits into a few sub-possibilities, because we could say, well, which self? Self is a fabrication. So again, in other words, self can be fabricated a lot or a little or this way or that way. So if I say I'm going to include myself, which self? This opens up all kinds of possibilities.

One possibility, and again, if you have these kinds of other pieces of practice under your belt, it can be really, really helpful. One possibility is knowing that the self is empty, I know that the self is a construct, but let it be fabricated quite lightly, so that here's this sadness, and here's these sensations, and I'm aware of them, and I'm caring for the self. But the self that I'm letting arise is quite light. It's not a really heavy, dense, contracted self. We'll come to that in a minute, that possibility. But one possibility is knowing the self to be empty and just letting it be fabricated a little bit. So you have a kind of light sense of self with the sensations and with the emotion. It's a lightly fabricated self, so to speak.

A second possibility, if we go back to this—well, which self if we're including the self in the emotional awareness? The second possibility is an imaginal self, or a self that's, if you like, imbued with imaginal perception.

Part of that, remember, is the imaginal middle way. So to say an imaginal self is not the same as a habitual self-image that is viewed as real and believed in—"I'm a loser, I'm a failure, I'm this kind of person, I'm bad," and so forth. An imaginal self is not a reified self-view or habitual self-image.

But a second possibility here, in the larger possibility of including the self-awareness, the self-care in the caring for emotions, is a kind of imaginal self. So this loneliness that I might feel is the loneliness of that wanderer. This weariness or courage or nobility is the loneliness of that warrior. And it's mine. In the way there's this infinite sort of echoing and mirroring that we talked about—this part of the imagination—it's mine too. But it's this warrior. So it's this warrior's or this wanderer's emotions, or it's Avalokiteshvara's compassion, Avalokiteshvara's empathy, or Jesus' heart, the sacred heart of Jesus. All kinds of possibilities there—obviously infinite possibilities—but it's not the same as just the habitual, problematic, constricted, over-solid and reified, believed-in self-image.

A third sub-possibility of this seventh possibility of including the self in the awareness of the emotions and the sensations is actually, you let the self be reified. It's okay. As I've said many times, in the big picture of things, we know the self is empty. But at times, it's important—and certainly probably for a lot of people, for long stretches of their practice—it's important to just inhabit that view of a reified self and relate to that healthily, relate to that in a way that's fruitful, rather than just say, "I can't have self-awareness, I can't have a self-sense, I can't have a self-view."

Until there's really quite a lot of emptiness understanding, having a reified self will be very, very common. And even to the point of "I don't even know that it's empty." So it takes quite a lot of emptiness practice just to let it reify at times, and somewhere in our awareness we know that it's empty, but we're not leaning on that knowledge of its emptiness. And that takes quite a lot of practice.

So for many years, probably for most people, it's going to be mostly dealing with a reified sense of self. "I've heard this thing about emptiness, I've glimpsed a little bit about it, but not in any way that really makes too much difference yet." Given that's the picture, I need to find ways of relating to the reified self—either with the whole story that goes with it, or the stories that go with it, or just the self without the story.

Can you see there's all kinds of possibilities here? The reason I'm mentioning it is just because in some interviews in the last couple of years, I became aware—oh, that's really interesting. People are, especially people who've done a lot of mindfulness practice, have gotten into a habit of kind of paying attention to sensations or bare emotions, so to speak, but without the kind of caring for the self. It's like, oh, there's a whole dimension missing there that's really important. Because again, if you miss some of these things out, it will have consequences.

There's all these possibilities, and again, there's the possibility of facility and fluidity and flexibility with all of that.

So just to dwell on that last possibility, the third possibility of the seventh: sometimes with a reified self, and that's okay, and sometimes with the story—the story that I'm believing and this real self that I'm believing and all the pain of that and the history. And still, that's the perspective. That's the conceptual framework way of looking. What's the healing, opening, fertilizing, helpful way of looking at that, of relating to that?

There's a set of three talks that I mentioned—the psychodynamics in meditation talks, if I remember. A lot of those talks were really dealing with that, a reified self, and just some of the skillful ways of looking and conceptions and approaches regarding the psychology and the emotionality of that. And as I said before, anything I refer to—this is such a huge area, the emotions. It's so endlessly rich and fertile. So whatever I mention here, it's only part of the bigger picture.

Sometimes what happens, though, when we include the story and the reified self, it's always going to be from the perspective of some psychological framework or other, some school of psychology or another, even if we're not aware of what it is or that we're doing that. As I said, we can't help bringing in a conceptual framework—in this case, a psychological conceptual framework.

What I want to return to also in this talk later on is the need, I think, on the one hand, not to lock into any particular psychological view. "The view of this kind of psychological school looks at it this way and interprets things this way and this is the truth of what happened. Or this one does it this way." You start to realize there's all kinds of different conceptions and all kinds of different approaches and all kinds of possibilities. And to really be open to that and not too quickly lock into a certain view and then just become entrenched there as "this is the truth of me and my history and the story and this is the true fact of what happened," not realizing it's an interpretation according to a particular conceptual framework and that there are others possible.

Having said that, it may be—it may well be—that at certain times on our journey, individually, each of us may need to kind of lock into a certain view and really dig in there with a certain psychological view and interpretation and way of working, whether it's this or that way. It might be necessary just for our particular larger trajectory, that for a time we look that way, hopefully at times. Then after a while with that, we can kind of say, "I don't need this anymore, and what else is possible?" And then it still becomes an option, looking that way. But we're not so locked in, entrenched, and effectively imprisoned by something that can be quite narrow-minded, and if I think back to some of my history, quite dogmatic sort of entrenchment.

So oftentimes what happens is people get fixed on a psychological system or logos and not realize that depending on the logos, depending on the psychological conceptual framework, different experiences in different directions actually unfold from whatever is going on and whatever history we have.

It may be that at certain times on our journey, individually, each of us may need to lock into a certain view and really dig in there with a certain psychological view and interpretation and way of working, whether it's this or that way. It might be necessary just for our particular larger trajectory that for a time we look that way. Hopefully at times. Then after a while with that, we can say, "I don't need this anymore, and what else is possible?" And then it still becomes an option, looking that way. But we're not so locked in, entrenched, and effectively imprisoned by something what can be quite narrow-minded, and if I think back to some of my history, quite dogmatic sort of entrenchment.

So oftentimes what happens is people get fixed on a psychological system or logos and don't realize that depending on the logos, depending on the psychological conceptual framework, different experiences in different directions actually unfold from whatever is going on and whatever history we have.

The main point there was that in our awareness of and care for the life of the heart—the emotional life—we want to include at times the possibility of including the self and self-awareness in various degrees of fabrication and directions of fabrication in our awareness and care.

Let me touch on just one more piece about working with the emotions. I mentioned those seven instructions working with the emotional body—I think they were called "a sequence of seven instructions and guided meditations." Just to say, if you do feel moved to check them out or you find yourself doing that, I want to say a little bit about them. They're very circumscribed in what they're trying to do.

Again, anything we say about emotions is an infinitely rich and infinitely expanding area for human inquiry. Human beings, I think, are never going to exhaust the infinite possibilities of ways of understanding emotions and ways of relating to emotions. It's just one of the deep mysteries of human existence—our heart life.

Those particular seven exercises on that retreat are really quite tightly focused sets of practices, partly given exactly for the reason that what often happens in regard to our emotional life is we're all a bit at sea. Either things are too subtle and we don't have the awareness needed to notice what's going on, or when something intense is happening, it's so big and we're so thrown about by it that we can't really get a grip on it in a way that's helpful and fruitful. So those practices are deliberately very narrowly focused, very tightly circumscribed.

One way of looking at them is to regard them as exercises. It's a bit like practicing scales at the piano. Potentially they can prepare us or develop our facility and capacity to work well with strong and live emotions when they arise. So it might be that the practices themselves feel a little funny—some people love them—but one way of understanding what they are is they're just like playing scales at the piano. So when you actually go to play the pieces that you love or you're improvising and you're in the heat of the flow of the moment, you have the facility to work well both with intense and also with subtle emotions and experiences in the heart.

But not just that—not just as exercises. They can also be regarded as practices in their own right, which open up a few directions. One is they can potentially open up to us the world of subtle experience, subtle energy and subtle emotions. Again, this is often an area that human beings, for lots of good reasons, haven't really developed that subtlety in relation to the emotional life—of noticing and caring. So that possibility can be opened up through those practices. It's an avenue into subtlety, into making subtlety accessible.

The second way they are practices that can actually open up their own fruits and realms and directions is that you will probably find, if you really spend a little time with those seven exercises, that they can—at least some of them—lead or will lead to some samādhi, and oftentimes really quite deep samādhi, when the practices are sustained.

I can't remember if I explained it there, but it might be that one starts with, let's say, a little bit of sadness in the heart, or somewhere else in the body, and one's paying attention to it in a way of finding the right kind of frequency and modulating the attention in a caring way of finding, "Oh yeah, that really helps." Being with it and being with it, maybe it goes through a few different phases or needs and you respond to them. And then maybe one just keeps focusing on it after all that. And the whole thing, just through the caring, appropriate focus, can just gradually get more and more subtle, more and more quiet. It's not that we're denying it. It's not that we're out of touch with it. It's not that we're telling it to behave itself and "don't be so damn silly" or anything remotely like that. But just through the sustained attention and the kind of appropriate and caring attention there, the whole being, including the emotional, just gets more and more subtle, more and more quiet, goes into some kind of samādhi.

So those practices—one of the possibilities of opening there is as a way into samādhi.

Thirdly, for now, I just want to mention this. Again, if you do happen to play with those seven practices, with those instructions and recordings, it's possible that through playing with them, what becomes much more evident than is usually the case for human beings is the dependent arising, the dependent origination and dependent cessation of our emotions.

Those practices, because they're so circumscribed, we're very clear what we're trying to do. When I pay attention this way, when I think that way, when I pay attention like that, then I see the emotion getting more difficult or more easy or softening or being blended with care and transforming or healing or whatever. So through being quite precise and focused and sustaining what one's trying to do in the meditation in these seven instructions, the dependent origination of emotions is revealed to us.

And dependent origination, as you will know, is a crucially important insight. In regard to emotions, I view it as—it's not the be-all and end-all of what we need to understand with regard to emotions, but it's so, so important. It's so crucial. It makes such a difference to our lives, our practices, and just our whole understanding of ourselves and others when we understand that. It's not the whole truth, it's not everything, but it's a really important strand.

So we've mentioned just briefly a lot of factors. We've dwelt a little bit on the energy body tonight and a little longer on the emotions and what might be involved in this sort of prerequisite or need for emotional awareness and emotional care—the skill, the art of all of that and the range, flexibility and facilities there.

A little bit related to that, or partly related to that, I've noticed something over the past couple of years, and that is that for many—I don't know if it's for most people, but it might be most people—soul making happens perhaps more readily in relationship with other human beings, especially those also interested in soul making, than it might on one's own. It happens more in relationship, or more readily in relationship, for many people.

Or, what we could say more accurately, is that eros and image are activated, and perhaps activated and ignited significantly, in relationship—particularly in relationship with other people interested in soul-making—more than they might be when one is alone. People are different, and there are exceptions, but I would say this generally holds true.

The question, though, is whether eros is activated just in its smaller meaning along with image, or whether the eros is really allowed to activate and ignite the whole Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic—the whole soul-making dynamic that fertilizes, enriches, complicates, widens, and deepens through their interplay and interrelationship. Is that whole soul-making dynamic actually ignited and turning in a way that sustains? Or does something merely flare up quickly and then fade out, fizzle away?

Sometimes something flares up with great intensity—whether eros or image or both—and then it breaks down, or something short-circuits, so to speak, or a fuse is blown. Or it simply gets snuffed out by receiving the wrong kind of air or environment, or by something heavy landing on it, to use these metaphors.

So it's often in relationship that this happens, and the question becomes: what actually allows the eros and image that might arise in relationship—just from being around and interacting with other soul-makers, doing this kind of work—what allows that to be genuinely soul-making in a way that can be sustaining?

Because part of the way problems can arise—where the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic is disrupted or inhibited or squelched—is exactly in relationship with each other, or around relationship with each other. Sometimes that's precisely where we run into difficulties.

What this means, again, is that we need, or it's really beneficial to have developed, our psychological awareness and emotional awareness—not just in ourselves, but also of others. That doesn't mean telling other people what's going on for them or anything like that. But it means being able to have that awareness in relationship, and some degree of sensitivity to another. Perhaps that's a better way of putting it: sensitivity and openness to another's psychological, emotional, and energetic process, while we have our own awareness, sensitivities, and capacities.

All of this, plus what I think soul-making work asks of us—and I think it does—is relational skills, as I mentioned earlier. This includes communication skills: really being able to communicate well with another, to listen well, to work through difficulties well, to communicate difficulties with precision, to be sensitive, caring, and appreciative—all of that.

If we unpack this a little further: when soul-making happens, as we've said, eros is a factor. Eros tends to arise or be ignited when soul-making is occurring, and we might catch that flame from another or in a field, whatever the case may be. Even if we're not working deliberately in an erotic, imaginal soul-making dyad—even if that's not the case—there can be, just in the field with the eros that's arising (which might be eros for something else entirely), in the way that the soul-making dynamic can work, as we've described in past retreats, the eros might spread to be directed toward or in relationship with a fellow soul-maker. So I didn't start with it, but now I have an erotic, imaginal connection or ignition with this other soul-maker.

It's really good to be aware of this as a possibility. And then this asks us to consider what tends to happen when there's eros and someone becomes image for us: all our patterns, or some of our patterns around intimate contact with other human beings, get elicited, triggered, activated, and ignited as well.

For some people, this might be fear of rejection. Just as soon as I have eros and this person becomes alive for me as an erotic, imaginal other, that kicks in my fear of rejection, or my fear of getting hurt, or my fear of loss—some kind of fear, or a projection of rejection, or an anticipation. It's not even that I'm waiting for it to happen; I just assume that it's already happened.

Or I find myself, or I find the other one, bringing in or dragging in needs that don't really belong in this relationship. These are perhaps, so to speak, old needs, or needs that belong in a different kind of relationship where a whole different set of rules are established and understood. Again, we may or may not be aware of this, whether in ourselves or others.

Then there are the other person's patterns and reactions, and how I react to their reactions, and my patterns when someone else responds—all of this is possible. So again, to have some awareness, some skill, some sensitivity, some discernment, some willingness with all of that is really, really useful.

One element within all this that I've talked about before—I can't remember in which retreat, it might have been in the Re-enchanting the Cosmos retreat—is just what happens for us as human beings. I very much think this is endemic in modern, globalizing Western culture: what occurs around being seen, being seen by another, and being seen by another who's important to us.

For many people, there's a curious and painful mixture in the being of a kind of need to be seen—an intense and deep need to be seen, a wanting to be seen—and a fear of being seen. To be seen deeply, fully, openly. All of this gets mixed in a way that's confusing and uncomfortable and causes all manner of shuttling back and forth, opening and closing and hiding.

In the way that I see the soul-making work and understand the nature of soul, I would say that soul—the soul, your soul, my soul, or the divine in me—wants to be seen. It wants to be seen. It wants to express itself, to manifest itself in the world and to be recognized for what it manifests. It wants its particular beauties, its particular way. It refracts the divine, to go back to past talks and what I was sharing there. It refracts the divine light and luminosity in its particular style, the way it sings of the beauty and the depths and the infinite creations and discoveries of soul and divine. It wants and perhaps needs that to be seen.

That's what I would call a healthy soul desire and healthy need. But at the same time, being seen—I think in our culture, because of the culture of individuality and, well, actually all kinds of reasons, including in many ways a kind of brutality in our culture with regard to some aspects of soul and sensitivity—for lots of reasons...

Being seen can be very loaded for us, for some people, for many people. It carries with it, it brings with it a lot of pain and confusion that's often unresolved. And what's often unresolved as well is this mix of motivations and needs.

So we get quite, as I said, confused. Sometimes the being seen is more an ego thing. I'll go into this, hopefully, in this talk. And we want to be, you know, we want our ego to be boosted, or we want to hide, or we're ashamed, we're riddled with shame, or we have this core feeling of being bad, and so we want to hide that.

At the same time that we recognize that we know somewhere our soul's beauty and that is the beauty of the divine and not separate. And our particular soul's beauty, the particular way that that divine beauty comes through us, that divine mystery comes through us, expresses itself in and through us. And some part of us knows that too.

And so it's quite common to be really quite confused, and confused by the messages we get in the culture, certainly, but also confused just in our own psychology and heart and soul, because of our history with all that.

And in all of this, again, if we just linger on the relational skills piece, if you like, of soul-making, we don't sometimes realize just how sensitive we are and how sensitive is the other in relationship, how vulnerable is, in some ways, how vulnerable is the soul, and how vulnerable is the soul of the other, in some ways, or at some level, let's say. And so again, here, there's a lot of self-honesty, there's a lot of sensitivity and awareness that is asked for.

And fourthly, we could mention, which we've talked about before, the ask of handling erotic charge and sometimes handling sexual charge, sexually erotic charge. You know, is that okay with me? Is that okay with the mind or does it meet some kind of censorship or some kind of inhibition or block? Can I handle it appropriately and keep the boundary? How to do that? What helps with that? Do I even notice what's going on with that? And then we've talked a lot about what helps there. May or may not go into it again on this set of talks.

Similarly with desire, we talked a lot about how to handle the current of desire in a way that's actually helpful. And similarly, how to, if you like, handle or relate to images when they arise. Because we've said so many times, if I reify and literalize and concretize this image, oftentimes, most often, it's going to cause some problem. So can I relate to the image and allow it to become fully imaginal and allow the imaginal middle way, the theater element, to open up if it needs to?

So handling all that, eros, desire, the imaginal skillfully, handling, as I said, our own energies and emotions and psychological patterns. So all this, we could say, is part of the, all these things, factors are part of the prerequisites, if we use that word, the foundations for fertile and sustainable soul-making in relationship with others. And as I said, for many people, that's where it actually tends to happen.

So this deliberate soul-making diet where there's deliberately the investigation, the opening, the exploration, the focus on the inclusion of the other as beloved erotic image and opening that up with mindfulness, sensitivity, care, creativity, and discovery. We're not teaching that yet. That probably is something I wouldn't hesitate to add the word advance to.

But there's elements of some of the same skills that will be necessary for that, kind of in a maybe less urgent need, just because, as I said, where most people will most readily have the soul-making be ignited is in relationship with other soul-makers.

So, again, please, I don't want this to sound discouraging. I don't mean to overwhelm you. All of this is possible. So you may go, boom, boom, boom, that's a huge list and blah, blah, blah, and there's all this stuff, but it really is possible. And interesting to develop, and really, really useful stuff to develop, but it's definitely possible. It's definitely possible that we grow in these capacities, we gain these skills, we develop these arts. Absolutely possible. I'm not talking about anything that is not possible at all. What would be the point of talking about it if it wasn't possible?

A little bit related is, or very much related, is, and I don't know whether you've noticed this with these practices and with talking with others about these practices or in some of the dyad work we've done on retreats and stuff, is something about, I don't know if you've noticed, how vulnerable it can be, and sacred as well, and there's a relationship there. It's vulnerable because it's sacred.

How vulnerable it can be to share images with another person. So this to me is really interesting. Sometimes a person might share a trauma history or some kind of psychological difficulty with others or in a group interview or with another practitioner or something. And that seems often, sometimes seems often to feel less vulnerable and intimate for many people, maybe most people, than sharing imaginal images that are really potent for oneself. Even though one is likely to identify less with an imaginal image than if we say purely human or flatly human history or condition or fact.

So even when one's identifying less with the imaginal, when that imaginal image is potent, it's actually somehow more vulnerable to share it than to share a really difficult psychological thing we have or some even abuse history or trauma history. It's quite interesting.

So the imaginal has intrinsically, as we've said, a quality of autonomy and otherness from self, this imaginal figure, for instance. And yet it is bearing that to the world and standing connected to it, but apart from it. So bearing it, but feeling I'm connected to this, I'm standing with it in my sharing. And bearing it, opening it, sharing it with the world, standing connected to it but apart from it, that seems vulnerable.

Despite this otherness and autonomy of the image that's intrinsic to the imaginal, I've touched on this before, but again, to me it suggests, from a slightly different perspective, that what is most essential and important to the soul is not the flatly or simply human identity. There has to be a better way of putting that.

Traditional developmental psychology, or what's common for developmental psychology, is to put this flatly or purely human identity—and not soul and soul-making—at the core of its theories. It's always talking about this kind of human level self, flatly human level self, and the hurt there. That's the core of the theories and the driver of its processes. I may return to this later on.

But you know, it's interesting. I've noticed this a lot with people. Revealing the angel, so to speak—revealing the angel is harder, closer, more intimate, truer and more authentic, even in its patent fictionality, than revealing the flatly conceived human self, the self of normal human discourse, of conventional psychological discourse. Revealing the angel seems harder, closer, more intimate, somehow more authentic and truer than revealing the flatly conceived human self.

And this leads me to a final point about something I've mentioned before—a word called temenos, which is another Greek word that means a kind of sanctuary or the enclosure around an orchard. Sacred space, protective space, something like that—temenos.

I'm mentioning it now because of the relational piece and the care that's needed as an element in relation as an element of the care for our soul-making and soul-making practice, because a lot of soul-making happens relationally. And also because of what I've just said about how vulnerable it can feel to share images with another human being because of the sacredness involved there.

In other words, it's not helpful to just spout out an image without taking care of the space that I'm in, the relational field that I'm in, the timing. Where's the other person at? Are they paying attention? Are they being respectful? Are they open? Are they sensitive? Am I paying attention? Am I attuned? Am I in touch with my body? Am I just rushing it? Am I present? Am I showing up? Am I in relationship? Is it the right location? Is it private enough? All kinds of things. Really, really caring, again, for the soul and for this work, and for the image, if you like.

Again, if an imaginal figure is a person—and we're talking about an imaginal figure, and that includes this tree that is in the park where I go for a walk, and my sense of that tree, my sensing that tree with soul. Everyone can see the tree, everyone can feel the hardness of that bark, but a lot of people will not be sensing it with soul, and even sometimes I won't be sensing it with soul. Whatever we're talking about here, we're talking about a person and something worthy of respect.

So a temenos—you could say tabernacle is another word, or sanctum—is needed to support the sharing of images in ways that are soul-making. So we might share an image, but again, if we want that sharing to be soul-making and possibly even fertilize something for the other person and for ourselves in the sharing, then temenos, tabernacle, sanctum—some kind of care for the space, the field wherein that sharing is happening—is needed to care for the soul, to support the soul-making there, and the persons involved, and to respect all that: respect the soul, respect the imaginal perceptions, what's sensed there, and the persons.

And these words are words that are associated with religious ritual, temples, and sacredness in the past—the temenos, the tabernacle, the sanctum. Obviously we get our word sanctification from that word sanctum. Just as one would treat a divinity. Just as one would treat a divinity. And again, this doesn't need to be too heavy or too rigid. But there's something of a kind of reverence for the relational field, for the sharing, for the space that's really important here. Just as one would treat a divinity, a God—just as one would be and create, be in the presence of a God and one would create for the presence or in the presence of a God.

Now, someone might say, "But that sounds like some kind of religious dogma and realism, like you're saying this is divine, you're saying you need this thing." If someone were to say something like that, we could explain it more like this: We could say that in order that you have the sense, the perception, the felt sense of divinity arise in a way that is soul-making for you and or for another... And the sense of divinity, remember, is an aspect, an element, a dimension of the imaginal constellation of the sensing with soul that we talked about in the way that we're using those terms.

In order that you have that sense, that actual experience of the divine—at least the dimensionality and movement into the sense of divinity of the erotic, imaginal other, of what is sensed with soul—you need to treat an image in a particularly caring and respectful way. That is, with some kind of temenos, as I've just described.

This is not religious dogma, nor like you need to perform some special rite. It's simply a psychological insight: you need to care for this stuff. You need to care for these experiences. You need to care for these senses that you have of things. And you need to care for yourself and other in relationship around them. It's just a psychological insight. It's also an insight into the dependent arising of perception.

In other words, if I don't care—if I don't care for this possibility of a certain perception, in this case a perception of divinity—that perception of the divine either won't arise, or it won't arise in the other, or it won't get communicated. Or it might be there to start with and then will be dissolved because it doesn't have the vessel, if we use the alchemical term. It doesn't have the temenos, the tabernacle.

So a temenos can be supported by actually ritualizing the time and space. That's one way of supporting it—creating a ritualized space together. This may involve candles and incense; it may not. But it might, and such things might absolutely serve the intention. An interview, actually, between a teacher and a student, is also a kind of ritualized space. There's a form, and you sit a certain way, and there's a time frame, and there's a very specific intention, and there's a kind of focus there.

At the same time, though, a formal or ritual space does not guarantee a temenos. So the presence of the temenos is actually a subjective thing. It's not something you can objectify. Just because I burn some incense and light a candle and burn some sage, I'm not necessarily creating a temenos. It's a subjective thing—an experience, or if you like, an element of experience that one or more people have.

And it depends also on the qualities of attention, sensitivity, openness, emotional attunement, conceptual attunement, emotional energy, body awareness. All these factors are actually really necessary elements in creating a temenos, in establishing a temenos. Without any one of those, it will probably fall apart. That's partly why I said an interview works, because a lot of those qualities are gathered together there in the interview format.

So it's not so much the rituals themselves. As I said, these factors—these factors of soul, factors of consciousness, factors of intention—are themselves more likely to be gathered together and supported through establishing some kind of ritual or special vessel or space. In other words, the burning of the candle, the incense, does help sometimes to gather those qualities of consciousness and qualities of intention. But it's really those that make the space.

One last thing about temenos for now, related to what we just said: I don't think there are definite rules in establishing a temenos. As I said, nor is it that a temenos is only or always created by or in a formal space or time.

Rather, the soul-making that is possible in relationship through sharing images and perceptions is fragile. It's easily fractured. It's easily smothered. It's easily covered over, it's easily withdrawn, it's easily deprived of its ground, or if we borrow our alchemical metaphor, its incubating vessel. That's another word for a temenos—it's an incubating vessel.

So, for example, some kind of pressure emanating from one person to another, from one party to the other—some kind of demand, some kind of need that is not openly expressed. So I'm bringing this need and this demand to this interaction where an image is being shared, either I'm sharing with you or you're sharing with me, and either it's not okay or it's not really clear that that's what's going on. Or it's got other, more less obvious or slightly murky complexities attached to it, this need or this demand that I'm bringing, that I'm not quite aware of.

That's enough. Something like that, that kind of pressure or influx, is enough to puncture or collapse any possibility of temenos there. And then the soul-making in that moment, and what the other person can take in, and what can ignite in them, and what happens to one's own soul-making—all of that is compromised.

So again, with the temenos, part of that is in the realm of relational skills. The necessity of relational skills, sensitivities and attunements in order for soul-making to be possible in relationship with another is clear. It's part of what's involved in creating a temenos.

And soul-making is helped by a temenos. Sometimes we're deliberate in the creation of that. Sometimes it's very easy, just a very easily established thing. Other times we have to take a little care and find our way to create the temenos here.

But again, all of this—actually everything I've said tonight—I really want to be encouraging and not discouraging.

And at the same time, I want to point out there's this and there's this, and this is the way to really care for this. If you love, if you feel drawn, if you have the desire to explore these things, it's good to take all this into consideration and build these capacities. Sometimes that's slow and gradual, and sometimes it's much easier, but it's all doable, it's all developable—everything that I've talked about is accessible.

To walk this path and to develop these facets and these building blocks, these foundations, is such a gift. These are gifts to oneself, all of this: the emotional awareness, the energy body awareness, the relational skills, the taking care of spaces, the awareness of all that and the capacity to tend and care for all that. All of these things that I've mentioned and others this evening—such a gift to oneself for one's practice, for these particular practices, for one's wider practice, and for one's existence, for one's life.

And I think you can probably really hear that it's also a gift to others and actually a gift to the world to develop this. Really doable, really developable, really possible. The fruits, the bounties, the beauty of all this are there for us if we want them.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 117

Dukkha and Soul-making (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 44 min

> In this second part of his exploration of dukkha and soul-making, Rob Burbea delves into the practical elements necessary for sustainable imaginal practice. He emphasizes the importance of pacing - knowing when to open to new experiences and when to consolidate and deepen with particular images, desires, or insights. Burbea discusses the need for balance between practices that build equanimity (samādhi, mettā, mindfulness, emptiness practices) and practices of eros that engage with imaginal figures and soul-sensing.
>
> The talk addresses common concerns practitioners have about soul-making work, particularly around sexual erotic imagery and 'darker' images. Burbea emphasizes that imaginal images have an iconic, non-escalating quality that distinguishes them from ordinary fantasy. He explores the fear that such practices might reinforce kilesas (mental defilements) or lead to psychological instability, explaining how proper practice actually expands our sense of sacredness rather than feeding greed or delusion.
>
> Central to Burbea's teaching is addressing the fundamental issue of realism - the fear either that imaginal experiences reveal something problematic about oneself, or conversely, that engaging with non-consensus reality is dangerously delusional. This leads into his concept of the 'imaginal middle way,' which navigates between naive literalism and dismissive reductionism, treating imaginal experiences as neither purely real nor purely unreal but as meaningful encounters in their own right.

Let's continue by looking at some of the elements we need to take into account and bring into our awareness on this path of soul-making—if this vehicle, this soul-making vehicle of jhana, is not going to spring a leak, run out of steam, or blow a fuse. In other words, what are the elements we need to be aware of and care for if imaginal practices, sensing with soul, and soul-making practices in the broad range of what that means for us are not going to actually increase dukkha?

On Pacing

One crucial area is pacing. I've touched on this already several times on different occasions. You may have heard me say that one way of conceiving the goal—if we can even use that word—or the direction, or the delivery of this kind of path, is as a potentially infinite and endless opening of soul-making, of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic.

With that comes the accessibility and development of facility and flexibility with a whole range of possible ways of looking and ways of conceiving. Broadly speaking, this could be conceived as the goal or direction of this entire path.

When we put it that way, the emphasis is really on flexibility and opening, and it sounds like there's going to be this kind of endless movement, always moving from one thing to another, always opening to the next thing. In reality, that would be misleading and would overemphasize the movement aspect, giving a sense of constant movement. Whereas sometimes what happens on our path—at any point in the path—is that we need to hold onto or stay with something.

I don't just mean the breath, but it can mean that. It might be a logos that's opened up: a new idea about divinity, or about self, or about soul, or something psychological. Something has just opened here. Then we need to settle with that new thing, keep that in our sights, keep that plugged in. We need to keep coming back to that logos, use it, orient from it and around it and to it, and let that do its work.

In other words, there's an opening, but then we need to hold on to something, stay with something. It could be an image. We've talked a lot about this in the past regarding pacing with images: when to deliberately bring in an image that has worked for us before, when to just be open for new images, or whatever comes. Or it may be a desire or a movement of eros. It's not just that we want to feel that eruption of flame in the being, the energy and the psyche—sometimes that desire or eros, we need to really steady with it and focus on it.

Let it fill the body, fill the psyche, let it align the being. This is incredibly important when it comes to steadiness, equanimity, devotion, and commitment in the long term. Just letting our desires run deep—and because they run deep, they root us deeply. It's really like having a root deep into the earth. When we take time with our deep desires, let them run deep, let ourselves feel them run deep, and let ourselves almost be constellated or constructed—our very body and psyche constructed from the base of that desire—like it's one of the foundations of being.

So rather than just this desire, that eros, this image, another eros, another idea—all these aspects of eros, psyche, and logos may need us, after the initial opening which reveals the new aspect and presents it to us as a possibility, to really steady with that for a while. And that could be quite a while, or shorter, or whatever. We might need to return to it deliberately over and over, recall it deliberately, use it.

In principle, then, there's an opening, but then there's some kind of closing—closing around what has been revealed in that opening, what has been gifted to us in that opening, what we have discovered or created in that opening. Some kind of grasping of that new logos, new image, new desire, and grasping it for a while, consolidating it, strengthening our connection with it and our accessibility to it, the vividness of it, the power of it.

Otherwise, if it's only endless opening—certainly if it's only of ideas and logos or images or desires—it's just going to be chaotic. There's not going to be that steadiness, that strength, that grounding. And nothing really transforms. It feels like it's always constantly erupting new stuff and turning, and I don't know where I am. It can be kind of exciting, but one of the potential drawbacks, if it's just this kind of opening again and again, only opening, is that it's not actually, in the end, that transformative. It doesn't go deep and become fertile and potently meaningful and transformative in our lives.

So when we talk about pacing, some wisdom has to come in. Yes, a vision of increasing fluidity, flexibility, availability of ideas, conceptual frameworks, ways of looking—and also of that potentially infinite and endless expansion, deepening, widening of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic. But what that means from day to day, from moment to moment, is that there's a wisdom regarding fluidity and stability, consolidation, settling, staying steady with whatever that aspect is.

Integrating with Other Practices

Related to this—and I think I've said this before on a couple of retreats—if you're working with this material on retreat and wanting to incorporate soul-making practices into your retreat life and schedule, know that it's probably not good to be doing imaginal practices all day long and nothing else. We dip in and out, a little or a lot as suits and serves, into practices of the erotic imaginal. Within that context of moving in and out, when we move out, we move into other practices.

Other practices are really helpful complements and supports to practices of the erotic imaginal, sensing with soul. In a way, I would view them as one kind of larger mandala or integrated set of practices and approaches that form the soul-making path.

Dwelling in the energy body with that sensitivity permeating the body. Either developing samadhi or metta or being with the emotional life. Emptiness practices of different kinds, to whatever depth one's familiar with—and one can always develop that too, alongside or before or afterwards. Mindfulness of any kind. All these are really helpful complements to the soul-making practices.

say auxiliary - that makes them sound secondary - they all fit together to form, to tessellate together, to form this bag of (not really tricks, but) practices and approaches that are really helpful to the whole movement and ship-shapedness of our vehicle, if you like, and also the efficacy of the soul-making practices - their sustainability, but also their depth in the moment.

So really, any practice that decreases fabrication of perception in the moment - perception of self, other, world - will be a good mix with the soul-making practices and imaginal practices. As I've said, most imaginal practices are actually practices of skillful fabrication. In contrast to practices that fabricate less in the moment, fabricate less perception - emptiness practices, metta, samadhi, even mindfulness fabricates less to a small degree. These are all practices that fabricate less perception. Imaginal practices and sensing the soul are practices that fabricate perhaps a tiny bit less, but are actually engaged in skillful, what we might call skillful soul-making fabrications of perception.

So another way of conceiving of this mix is that there are practices that, again very broadly speaking, build equanimity directly. For example, samadhi practices, generally speaking; metta practices; brahmavihara practices; mindfulness; emptiness. Generally speaking, although they can also be quite exciting in terms of the energies they release at times, the movement of those practices is toward more equanimity. So you've got that on one side, that group of practices. On the other side you've got what we could call the practices of eros - actually opening to the desire and the eros and the erotic imaginative.

One can think about loosely speaking having a balance of those practices. It doesn't need to be fifty-fifty, and the balance itself will be fluid of course. But we need both. We can't just be plugged into these super intense erotic imaginal practices all the time. It's super exciting, but it's going to tip the boat over at some point, or just burn the engine.

I've talked before, particularly in the Eros Unfettered retreat, about the possibilities of working within the erotic imaginal practice, with the sensing the soul, and actually by a nuanced, delicate responsiveness and skill in those practices, balancing those practices at the same time as one is engaged in them. So instead of going back and forth between these kinds of practices and those kinds of practices, actually giving attention, for example, to the spreading of the soul-making toward self, other, and world equally; to the ways the energy might expand or need to move in the energy body; to bringing in different ways of looking; to ways of relating to desire, for example, with the opening to the current of desire practices; to being aware of where in the soul-making dynamic which of the elements of Eros-Psyche-Logos may be inhibited right now and may be blocking the soul-making and so kind of tipping things over or drowning them a little bit. And allowing it to spread there, and so helping to balance the whole soul-making process.

We've talked a lot about that. But broadly speaking, there's a back and forth one can engage in between different kinds of practices, and also a perhaps more sophisticated balancing at the same time within the practices of the erotic imagination, within the practices of sensing the soul.

Again, if you've listened to a number of talks already - and sometimes I know we're supposed to listen in order and I know that people don't - if you've listened to our series, and perhaps you're on retreat or something and trying to practice with this stuff, just to say it's really not necessary to do all the practices or anything you don't feel comfortable with. You shouldn't force yourself. If that's not obvious, I'm saying that now.

And even more broadly to say, this soul-making business and these kinds of practices - it's just not everyone's cup of tea. Some people will never be interested in this stuff, and that's completely and utterly fine. Souls are different, and they're drawn to different paths for lots of different reasons. So if you're listening to this stuff, please don't buy into some should. If it just doesn't attract you, let it go. There's plenty of other practice possibilities. Even if you're ambivalent, don't force yourself to think, "I really need to do that practice and that practice. That one sounds a little hairy, but I should make myself do it." Please don't think that way.

So again, there's pacing with all this. Many people do find themselves ambivalent. They're deeply drawn to these kinds of teachings and practices, and at the same time, they're really ambivalent, really unsure for different reasons. If that's the case for you - if it's not just a question of "Actually, this isn't really my thing, I'm not really drawn here," but there's this ambivalence - then I would encourage, first, perhaps talking to one of the teachers that's very versed in the soul-making paradigm and sets of practices. But also just a gentle questioning with yourself: What actually is the fear? Why do I feel reluctant to engage or explore such practices? What assumptions perhaps are involved in whatever fears might be operating or concerns?

Really, as always with fear, it's generally good to let it become more conscious. Oftentimes - I've said this many times before - oftentimes we're bullied, pushed and pulled and inhibited and shut down and directed this way and that by fear, and we're not even fully conscious of what exactly it is that I'm afraid of, what exactly it is that I'm assuming here. So I'm saying this as an invitation to a real gentle, caring, careful and thorough inquiry, not as just another fancy way of saying "get over it and move on and push yourself through into these practices" at all.

So timing - again related to pacing - timing with all this, and timing with also questioning oneself or inquiring what's going on for me if I feel ambivalent. Time is a matter of respect and sensitivity. I need to sometimes respect my concerns and my fear and be sensitive to when is the right moment to turn to them and say, "Now what's going on for me? What's going on in my heart and soul that there's this...?"

This fear or refusal or ambivalence about taking another step—sometimes that needs to be respected, sometimes we need to be sensitive to even the fact that it's there and not push through something, a kind of ambivalence that we haven't even noticed because we weren't paying attention to how we felt.

So on the one hand, timing is a matter of respect and sensitivity. On the other hand, there's also a place for courage and boldness and fire in these explorations—certainly, but also in the exploration of the relationship with the explorations, if you follow what I mean.

Some people may well think, and I know people have said to me, that these practices and these teachings are dangerous, or they sound dangerous. It's usually they sound dangerous, because it's usually someone who's not really engaging who's saying that. And I mean, you might say, "Yeah, maybe, but dangerous to what? What is it that you're thinking or assuming or concerning yourself with there?"

So oftentimes a person will worry that allowing eros to arise—especially allowing sexual eros to arise, or allowing other desires and their energy to open, as we teach in different practices in different ways—that this can only be encouraging and feeding and reinforcing the kilesas: movements of greed, because greed and desire are the same, or delusion, because fantasy and image must be delusion, or attachment, and so on.

This is really important to check out. I can say to you, it's not the case. Practices with wisdom, with sensitivity, with care, with responsiveness—soul-making practices and entering this kind of conceptual framework with all that care and responsiveness—it's just not the case. Now, only you, if you have that concern, can actually verify that for yourself. But I think you will find that it's so. And in a way, what we're talking about in this talk now, in these different parts of this talk, is: what exactly do I need to care for? What exactly do I need to keep my eye out for? What exactly needs to be in place in order that we don't just end up feeding the kilesas and thus feeding dukkha?

A second concern sometimes that people have, related of course, is that sometimes people are happy talking about using the word "imaginal" and using it in a slightly different way, as I pointed out in the first talk, and using it in a way that I would say is a little more tame, a little less radical, a little kind of safer, and a little more under the thumb of the self, really, of the ego. And so this relates to sometimes the way Jung would encourage people to think about things. So people often say, "Yeah, working with the imaginal and kind of engaging the sub-personalities."

And I just want to point out again that that wouldn't be—that way of thinking about things wouldn't be quite what we mean by the imaginal and by sensing the soul. "Sub-personalities" in the very word, in the nomenclature there, implies "sub." It's less than something. Less than what? Less than the ego or the self. There's something that's got the final say and is bigger than. "Sub" means less.

So this self is keeping my eye on things, keeping sort of in charge and organizing and overviewing, of which there are these little sub-personalities which can be fascinating and really helpful and bring some healing to integrate them into this bigger, superior personality or ego or whatever. And it can be really, really useful. And some people, that's what they want to do. That's the extent of their interest and engagement. And that's the extent of the kind of logos or conceptual framework that they're willing to play with. And that's absolutely fine.

I think we're going beyond that. And because of this sense that these elements that I outlined in the first talk—part of the imaginal, part of recognizing what we call the imaginal, an imaginal figure—means autonomy, means divinity, means unfathomability, means in some way, I cannot figure out or get to the bottom of this imaginal figure. In some ways it's bigger than me. In some ways I am gifted something by something, by something I don't understand, by something that is larger, more mysterious than me.

Sub-personality, therefore, is really the wrong word. They are autonomous persons. We are, at least—let's say—we are entertaining that conceptual framework more often than not in our logos. So we're not putting these things in our pocket or harnessing them or something like that. There's a different stance, a different relationship, essentially really a different, as I said, different conceptual framework, deliberately entertained.

We can move in and out of that, absolutely, and put it down, adopt another one—even adopt the sub-personality one—but at times at least, and probably the favored one, is not to box them in and diminish these imaginal figures as sub-personalities.

So sometimes a person hearing that—sometimes people don't hear that and they just, again, just hear the word "imaginal" and assume sub-personality because they've heard that elsewhere in some psychological paradigm or other. And so they don't hear the difference. I've dwelt a lot on the differences. And sometimes people will hear this kind of, if you like, more radical vision, and it will be scary. "I'm going to be a split personality, I'll have split personality disorder," or "That sounds bonkers, isn't that what crazy people do?" and all this. So that might be a fear.

But again, is that really what happens? Is that really the consequence of this practice when we take care, when we develop these elements, when we cultivate responsiveness, when insight and wisdom emerge? I really don't think so. Rather, something more powerful and radical and far-reaching opens for us. A much vaster landscape of soul is revealed when we don't limit what emerges—for example, constraining an imaginal figure to the category of sub-personality.

A third area that can generate concern—and again, it's a valid concern—is that this work sometimes involves a radically different way of conceiving and thinking about practice, path, life, existence, being, and every element of existence and the universe. This isn't merely engaging these thoughts idly or abstractly in ways that don't make a difference, but actually employing them. Again, when I use the phrase "entertaining certain conceptions," I mean plugging them in, seeing through those lenses, sensing through those lenses, and actually feeling palpably in the body, emotions, and soul what difference this makes to our sense of things.

In engaging these concepts and practices, there can be what I've discussed over the past few years—this "breaking of the vessels." This Kabbalistic concept describes something that stretches and sometimes shatters some old way of thinking, relating, conceiving practice, or understanding self. There can be this fracturing, this breaking of the vessels.

While there's a gift in this process, it's not always easy when we reach certain points. When a vessel breaks that we've grown accustomed to, or when it stretches to a point of tension and discomfort, the experience can be challenging. It's not always a smooth cruise. When these periods arrive in our lives—and I hope they do, because this is how psyche works at times, through the breaking of things—they become part and parcel of growth, of movement, of the opening and deepening of the soul-making dynamic over time.

When these experiences come, whether in small ways or larger ones, they require tremendous equanimity and wisdom to navigate the fracturing, opening, and rebuilding of something new. Someone hearing these teachings might sense the potential for breaking out of structures they've grown accustomed to, structures that may have supported them for a while but have passed their expiration date and become inhibiting. This possibility can feel worrying or daunting.

Returning to what I mentioned earlier—first, the larger-scale pacing involved in this path. This breaking of vessels, as the Kabbalah calls it, can happen across different domains of our life. Sometimes it occurs even when we're not engaging in soul-making, as part of maturing and growing up as human beings. It happens anyway, so it can be part and parcel of what this path catalyzes for us.

As I said, the path doesn't involve constant opening and fracturing, with endlessly new things slipping and sliding. There must be times for integration, consolidation, settling, rebuilding—for getting used to new structures, building new ones or allowing them to be built, then learning from them as I mentioned at the beginning. There's a movement between what we might call building and breaking, consolidation and shattering. This rhythm is part of our life anyway, as it should be. If it's absent, one might wonder what's happening in one's life—one would probably feel quite dead as a human being without this dynamic.

The second point I mentioned concerns questioning and the encouragement to inquire. Inquiry and questioning are dangerous endeavors—very dangerous because of exactly what we've been discussing: the breaking of vessels. When we inquire and question, we push against old structures, challenging them. Sometimes inquiry carries enough force, vitality, and soul that things break, whether intra-psychically or extra-psychically.

Yes, questioning can be dangerous. As I've said, it requires respect, sensitivity, and not forcing, but also courage, boldness, and fire. Questioning can be dangerous, but what's more dangerous than questioning—always in the long run—is not questioning. In fact, if we never question, there's an enormous cost to the soul from living a life without inquiry.

Just a couple more points for today. A reminder regarding typical areas where people feel nervous, ambivalent, or unsure about these teachings—obviously not just regarding eros generally, but specifically when the eros is sexual.

So when engaging and exploring the sexual, erotic, imaginal in practice, some people find this worrisome. I'm not going to repeat this endlessly, but we're talking about cultivating deep mindfulness, sensitivity, care, and respect—all in service of the movement toward opening divinity.

What one will quickly realize—and this bears repeating—is that when an image is truly imaginal, including an erotic sexual image, it has that quality of being iconic, as I mentioned. This means it's almost non-narrative in nature. For sexual erotic imagination, this translates into something quite remarkable: it doesn't tend to escalate. Unlike the sexual fantasy or imagery we might usually relate to, which builds toward some final denouement or climax, imaginal erotic imagery has a different quality altogether. It might simply be a single instant captured like an icon, something we resonate with deeply. It has this quality of not needing to escalate.

From the very beginning of teaching the imaginal, I have encouraged—with varying emphasis at different times—the inclusion and trusting of what we might call darker images. This means moving beyond the nicey-nicey, the all-white angels and cherubs, though these certainly have their place in the landscapes of the soul. But there are darker images too: more voracious, more carnal, sometimes seemingly violent. We've spoken of images of devouring and such things. I don't know if I mentioned this before, but "devour" may be related, for the soul, to "devoted."

These images are often not what the mind fears them to be. Even if they seem genuinely unhelpful, there are usually ways of relating that can redeem them, transform them, liberate the sacredness that's actually within them, reveal the treasure they contain. It's not a matter of evil or doing something strange. It's all in the ways of looking.

So there's this encouragement—again, at your own pace and only when it feels comfortable—to include what we might call darker imagery, including the sexually darker. For some, this comes very easily; it's already part of what they feel comfortable with in their sexuality. For others, less so. There are many reasons for this difference—education, past history, wounding. And souls are different. Some souls, if you like, have more darkness in them. This isn't good or bad; it's simply character. Some have less.

Part of this whole discernment process with soulmaking involves recognizing what is given to me rather than trying to fit into some pattern that's actually someone else's soul pattern. But with all this—with the sexual erotic imaginal and with the darker images or darker sexual imagery—when they're there, they're there. The divinity becomes clear. And as we've established, that aspect of divinity or theophany is one of the elements of the imaginal.

One starts to see that sacred presence, to feel the dimensionality, to sense the love—and implicit in love is respect—all these factors begin to emerge, and one starts to trust the whole process more. Sometimes, as I've pointed out, just a drop of trust at the beginning can allow these other elements to reveal themselves, and then we can let them become more illuminated and amplified.

But for me, what's possible here and what's most important is this logos and potential: the expansion of our sense of sacredness. Even in those areas that seem like the opposite of what the mind says is sacred, or that can't be sacred, or where I tend to feel sacredness only in certain expressions—this whole movement of soulmaking offers an important potential for recognizing the particularity of different kinds of sacredness. Not just a universal "everything is sacred, everything is perfect," but this particular theophany, that particular theophany, through this particular thing, that particular expression. This is central to the opening up of soulmaking.

But really, with all these cautions, what I think is most commonly at the root of people's fears, concerns, or ambivalences is the issue of realism. It's perhaps the most basic problem, sometimes underlying other apparent difficulties. This is what we encounter most frequently.

A person might be dealing with an image that feels scary, that doesn't fit their idea of what's holy or acceptable. Sometimes they fear this means something specific about them—that they're bad, that they have some strange pathology. There's a kind of reification, really an identification, and this brings up fear. It's fear that the image is really saying something definitive about who they are.

On the other hand, there can be fear that this image or entertaining this image is precisely not real. By engaging with what is not real—simply because it involves imagination, or because it doesn't conform to consensus reality, the socially agreed-upon, dominant cultural worldview—they fear they're practicing and reinforcing a dangerous disconnection from reality. They worry about being out of touch with something called reality.

With either of these fears—whether it's fear of what this means about me, or fear that I'm encouraging myself to be out of touch with so-called reality—the question becomes: what will be the consequences of either of those concerns?

With either of those fears—whether it's a fear of what this means about me, or that this will somehow manifest, or because I have an image and it must be a premonition, or it's a fear that I'm encouraging myself to be out of touch with so-called reality—the consequences become: "I will do this, it will get out of hand," etc.

Underneath all this, underneath what we're talking about with the fears around sexual, erotic, imaginal—with almost anything—most common underneath it all, most basic as a kind of issue or problem that needs attention, is the realism. That's why we talk so much about the imaginal middle way, about the theatre quality.

So let's come back to that. The imaginal middle way recognizes that images are neither purely subjective fantasies nor literal objective realities. They exist in a third space, a sacred theatre of soul where meaning unfolds through participation rather than belief or disbelief. When we approach our inner images—whether erotic, mystical, or otherwise—with this middle way understanding, we can engage them fully without the paralyzing fears of either "this must mean something concrete about me" or "this is dangerous unreality."

This theatre quality allows us to be present with the image, to let it reveal its depths and teach us, while maintaining the wisdom that we are participating in a sacred play of consciousness. The image becomes a doorway to understanding, to beauty, to the expansion of our being—not a threat to our sanity or a burden of literal meaning we must carry.

In this way, the imaginal becomes a profound spiritual practice, a way of engaging with the depths of existence that honors both the reality of our inner experience and the creative, non-literal nature of the soul's expression.

CHAPTER 118

Dukkha and Soulmaking (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 1h44

> In this third part of his exploration of dukkha and soulmaking, Rob Burbea continues examining how we can relate wrongly to imaginal practice in ways that create unnecessary suffering. He focuses particularly on issues of realism, reification and identification with images and soul perceptions.
>
> Burbea shares personal examples of creative loneliness and questions whether apparent attachment to certain images requires liberation in the traditional Buddhist sense, or whether there might be a duty to imaginal figures that includes accepting some dukkha. He explores the impossibility of perfectly manifesting images in material life, and the polytheistic nature of our inner imaginal figures with their conflicting demands.
>
> The talk delves into complex ontological and epistemological questions about the nature of erotic-imaginal perception, presenting a spectrum from "creating something unreal" to "discovering the real" to participatory ontologies where self, other, world, mind and divinity all participate in each other. Burbea emphasizes maintaining eros rather than letting it shrink to craving, connecting with the fullness of intention for the whole of soulmaking, and recognizing that images ask for other images rather than only conceptual responses. Throughout, he balances practical advice with profound philosophical inquiry into the nature of reality and perception in imaginal work.

Let's continue our consideration of some of the ways in which we can perhaps get hold of the wrong end of the stick, so to speak, with imaginal practice—grasp it in the wrong way, relate to it, and conceive of it in ways that actually bring unnecessary dukkha. Opening up that awareness, what do we need to pay attention to? What do we need to consider and take care of in order that this jhana, this vehicle of soul-making, works for us and is actually able to do what we intuit that it can do, and perhaps even more?

Let's continue and pick up where we left off in the last part of this talk with the whole issue of realism, reification, and identification in relation to images and what we sense with soul.

In this part of the talk, I certainly want to offer some hopefully helpful advice regarding this whole question of what we need to care for and how we can actually make sure that we're not just increasing dukkha through trying to engage in imaginal practice—how we can actually prevent that.

So part of what I hope to do is offer some hopefully helpful advice. Another strand of what I want to do is less about me telling you how it is, me having the answers and disseminating them, but rather trying to open up some questioning, open up the discourse around certain aspects of existence. I want to in part ponder out loud with you without having the answers myself.

Some of what I want to touch on regarding ontology and epistemology, and how that weaves into this paradigm of soul-making, this path of soul-making, and the practices of sensing with soul—some of all of that, regarding ontology and epistemology, is perhaps not given to human beings, and perhaps never will be given to human beings, to know definitively. These are open questions of ontology and epistemology.

How we relate to the impossibility of arriving at some final answer regarding ontology and epistemology that satisfies everyone in every realm of existence—the fact of that, how we relate to that fact of impossibility—either we make it interesting and fertile, or we just close it down. It becomes a barren wasteland, an area that is not supporting soul-making and that itself is not opened through soul-making.

So some of what I'd like to go into is really just opening up a discussion, pondering, wondering out loud with you.

When I survey the problems we get into with sensing with soul and imaginal practice, realism of one kind or another is the most common problem. In many ways, it's at the root of other problems. A problem or difficulty one encounters, or a way that dukkha is created, might seem at first that it's not to do with realism, but we can expose or trace it back to some kind of realism going on underneath. In that sense, it's the most basic as well as the most common problem.

Included in that are the kinds of ways it spins out or tangles a web for us. Something in us concludes: this image or this sense that I have of whatever I'm sensing with soul means this or that about me. Either we get puffed up by that because we're believing that to be true, or we worry about ourselves—we worry about our sanity, we worry about our goodness or badness, we worry about all kinds of things.

Another possibility is that I perceive this such-and-such imaginally, this image or imaginal figure, and then we take it as indicating: this is what will happen in my life, this is what will unfold in the material world. Or we take it as meaning: this is what I should do. In the squeezing of a sense of duty, there's too much concretization, too much literalization of the image. What I should do becomes too clumsy and clunky and too plainly translated into life.

Those are some of the obvious and immediate ways that perspectives of realism—usually unconscious, in that we don't really quite understand that we're in the grip of realism—can manifest.

One of the symptoms of realism is that it often goes with a kind of pendulum motion, an almost violent swinging from one extreme to the other. Realism tends to lead to swings in view—big, diametrically opposed, polarized swings in view or opinion, and also in the sense of things.

For example, between a kind of self-elevation on one side and then swinging to self-deprecation or self-abasement on the other side. In other language, swinging between a kind of grandiosity of the self and inner critic putting down of the self. Realism will tend to pick up those extremes and believe in them and swing between them without much in the middle. We're either pumping ourselves up and believing that kind of reification of grandiosity about ourselves, or the opposite—we believe in our worthlessness, failure, badness.

Similar and related to that is the swing between what we might call mania and depression, to use words from clinical psychology—the high of mania and the low of depression. With that comes a believing in a concretized, reified self-view, a rigid identity in either extreme, and also a believed-in, rigidified worldview that goes with either the extreme of mania or the extreme of depression.

These swings are indicators that we haven't really found that territory of the middle way. If I look at my history and experience and see that swing, that pendulum swinging between these poles, it's a signal that something around realism and the imaginal way needs more opening up for us, more vivification for us.

I'll add this as well, as it's related: what I also notice is a kind of swinging between what we might call realist religious dogma or religious fundamentalism on one hand, and a realist secularist dogma or fundamentalism on the other hand. This is quite an interesting thing to witness as well—that a person can be so entrenched in some kind of religious dogma, really fundamentalism in the sense of "this is true, I insist that X is real and true," whatever that religious belief is.

And a little time later—sometimes just a year or whatever later—they're just as entrenched in what we might call a realist-secularist dogma or fundamentalism, denying the reality of what they used to believe in and insisting on the reality of a more so-called secularist view.

Or if there's not this kind of pendulum swing, then there's this very awkward and strange sort of coexistence of the two. So one's an ardent secularist while also having all kinds of strangely superstitious beliefs or attractions to the magical, the mystical, the spiritualist.

These kinds of patterns—this swinging pendulum between extremely entrenched views, opinions, and senses of things—are symptoms, as I said, that something about realism needs a bit more turning of the soil, a bit more opening up, a bit more space, a bit more investigation.

In a way, those kinds of manifestations of realism and the problems they cause are somewhat more obvious, and the answers with respect to them are also, I would say, a little bit more clear-cut. There's a whole realm—at least in my current thinking—of questions or manifestations around ontology and epistemology, manifestations of what possibly is a kind of reified identification or general reification, that are actually more subtle.

For example: Am I actually attached to a certain image? I can feel it's soul-making for me, it's beautiful, it's fertile, all of that's meaningful. I sense the divinity. I even sense the middle way with respect to it, and the theatre quality with respect to it, but is there some still kind of level of entrenchment or identification?

So I'm going to share something from my own history. Something I realize in sharing this is that I'm perhaps making myself vulnerable to accusations from certain people who have certain perspectives—that really all this that I'm sharing is just a sure indication of some kinds, probably plural, of various kinds of psychological pathology on my part. So I want to take that risk in the hope that this is helpful, partly because you might see in my sharing the detail here, you might see not exactly the same images operating, but maybe you can translate the kind of general framework of what I'm talking about into some of what you see in the way you relate to the images that are really meaningful and the fantasies that are really close to your soul that run through your life.

I also want to illustrate that for me, there's always a questioning. Here's this conceptual framework—I still want to be open to questioning it. Here's this image or the manner of my relationship to a certain image or fantasy, and I still want to be open to questioning that. Questioning: How is my relationship with that? What do I think about that? Is there another view possible? Is there another conceptual framework possible?

So in the spirit of that openness to questioning, and with the hope that it's all helpful, let me try and take my time and unfold it. It's a little bit involved.

Some time ago, quite a little while ago, I was talking with Catherine one night, and we were inquiring into—I can't remember what it was that brought this out, that made it sort of present for me—we were inquiring into a certain kind of pain that arises for me, for my soul, that's related to, very much entwined with, we could say, the pain of certain kinds of loneliness that come up often for me, or have come up in the past often for me over my life, around much of what we might call the creative work that I have done or that I do.

So that might be in music when I was a composer, or writing poetry, or also in teaching Dharma—especially the pain around where things are a little bit unusual in terms of what's being composed or the teachings that are being constructed or expressed, and may stretch sort of boundaries that are then current, or limits of the ways people tend to conceive this or that.

The image that had been alive for me for many years and through many of these different phases of sort of creative or artistic work—whatever you want to call it—was very powerful. It's not something that sounds particularly dramatic, perhaps, but it's powerful. It's powerful for my soul. A lot of inspiration, a lot of beauty, and also this kind of poignancy. It wasn't free of suffering in the usual sense. And it's what we might call an image of creative aloneness or—creative loneliness, actually, more usually, rather than just creative aloneness. Creative loneliness.

So the dukkha of loneliness wrapped up in an image that was also very powerful, deep, meaningful, fertile.

So the image of essentially working alone, often working very hard, and then in the perception that tended to come out of that image, the perception of not being understood as fully as I would like, and in that also occupying a somewhat—being a somewhat far-out figure, somewhat sort of liminal, at the edge, if you like, of any community, whether it's a musical community, artistic community, social community, dharma community, as well as in the larger culture, the larger culture of our society.

So that was an element of this, not just of the image, but also of the particular kind of pain that was kind of wrapped up in, woven into the image.

Also, the sense in the image of having to sort of do battle, in a sense—this echoing and being echoed of the warrior image that I've shared, the lone soldier image that I shared many times in the past—so battling sometimes with the very people that are listening to whatever it is or reading or whatever, battling in some sense certain views about what art is or dharma is or this or that, or battling with authority figures, sometimes battling with both, and so having to battle to kind of express, manifest, bring into being what wants to come through me creatively.

Again, I'm sharing this. These are images that are very powerful, very close to my soul, close in to me, and I'm aware of how they could be perceived from certain psychological paradigms.

So Catherine and I were talking about this and kind of inquiring around this whole constellation of images or pattern with regard to certain images. And I realized as we were doing it, I realized a couple of things. One was that as we were inquiring, I was sort of assuming a little bit, or fearing in fact, that this inquiry had a kind of agenda and adopted a perspective which was presuming that it would be better if the loneliness weren't there. In other words, the loneliness is a signal that something is wrong. Something is being wrongly related to or over-identified with or whatever.

There was also a presumption that these images of creative aloneness needed transforming or healing, that they needed to be held differently so that my feelings and choices in behavior toward others in the larger community could be different and more as they ought to be.

In other words, there was this unspoken pressure in the inquiry—or my fear that there might be such pressure—coming from the culture, from myself, from whoever, that was pushing the idea that something was wrong here, that this needed to be different. The approach to the image seemed to want to transform it or relate to it differently.

The second thing I realized was that there was a subtle concern or fear of losing two aspects of this whole constellation of images, of this entire imaginal network that had become very precious to me and to my soul.

Somewhere in my being, there was a slight fear that if the lonely aspect of the image goes—or actually if any aspect of the image goes—then something of an integrated whole would be destroyed. Because the image is actually of lonely creative expression: lonely creative work, struggle, toil. The image is not of creativity with an optional extra of loneliness or aloneness that could be added or not. The concern was that I might lose the entire image.

And in losing the image, I would lose everything that goes with it—all those aspects and elements of image we've talked about. Beauty and love are inevitably woven into and with any imaginal figure. Beauty is there, even if it's very unconventional. It's the beauty of the soldier solitarily fighting day after day through exhaustion. It had a kind of unconventional beauty to me, a surprising beauty—beauty in the large sense that is bigger than a narrow understanding.

And then also the love. In relationship with an image, there's a love of that image and a being loved by it. Because the imaginal figure opens into dimensionality and divinity, it becomes divine to us when we let it fill out. So wrapped up in the very imaginal experience is this love of and being loved by the divine, and the gorgeousness and grace of that.

There was a fear that if I somehow surgically removed the dukkha part of the image—the loneliness—I might actually lose it all because it's an integrated whole, and it's not possible to lose just a part of it.

The second concern was that I might lose the actual creative capacity and inspiration that I love, that is like lifeblood to me, that is a joy of my being, a thrill with which I have a profound sense of duty and beauty. I think it was Rilke who said he didn't want to be psychoanalyzed because he was afraid of losing the divine creative outpouring through that process.

Both of these gifts—the beauty and love, the divine beauty and divine loving and being loved, and also the capacity and inspiration for the kinds of creativity that I love—I've gotten used to them. They're deep treasures for my soul.

As we talked around and in and about this, something in the way we were talking didn't really shift much. The way I was approaching it didn't enable a release regarding this image of creative loneliness.

Then at some point—I don't know if it was later or during the discussion—something occurred to me. Over some years, there have been changes, transformations, evolutions in certain images that have been woven close into my soul and my soul movement and journey and expression.

That solitary soldier or warrior image doesn't arise so much these days. Sometimes that solitary wanderer image has been added to or has an extension where the wanderer, often walking alone through deserts in endless traveling, sometimes gets to rest. Sometimes he's taken into a tent in the desert and receives healing. His feet are massaged by angelic figures. There's a kind of divine or angelic succor given to him through another that addresses the wounds and marks of his solitary wandering, his bruised body.

It's not that the image has disappeared, but it's gotten a whole other part to it.

Images of a tramp or destitute figure, really at the edges of society, having nothing, sometimes receive nourishment and nectar from a goddess. These are very touching, very beautiful to my soul.

There's also a figure with considerably more weight and fleshiness than I have in this life, resting in a pool or jacuzzi, very at ease and relaxed, into resting and really not doing much, not going anywhere or getting anywhere or being in a supercharged, turned-on state. This figure emerges at times as an alternative to another archetypal image I think I shared some years ago, borrowed from the myth of Horus, the Egyptian falcon god.

This falcon god is born and immediately flies swifter and further out than all other gods before him. There's something in that image of quickness and fastness and brilliance, the far outness of it—he goes really far out. But then that far outness is both at times...

delicious, exhilarating, enjoyable, and at times exactly that far outness brings a kind of vulnerability of aloneness. So he has all this particular power of his kind of divinity that he manifests and expresses and enjoys and revels in, and it comes at cost. There's much more to the myth, and I think it's very beautiful—it touches me a lot. But the point is exactly that it touches me a lot. It's an archetype, an archetypal image that I can really resonate with and that moves me.

This stands in quite a contrast to this imaginal figure of this person just resting easily in a pool, without any sense of duty of having to fly far and fast. He has a very different kind of work—his work is to rest in this jacuzzi and to enjoy it and to luxuriate in it.

So in addition to the typical images that had persisted over really quite a long period of time, there arose gradually and slowly certain modifications or additions or extensions or alternatives to these images. The question I had originally was: was there an attachment to or an entrenchment in a particular image, like the image of the solitary wanderer, or Horus, or the solitary soldier warrior?

But in all these instances where the image, the original image, was broadened or supplemented with another related or complementary image—in all these instances, the extension, supplementation, complementation came through imaginal work. It wasn't through challenging the apparent attachment to the image intellectually, or questioning either explicitly or implicitly its health from the perspectives and standards of some other predetermined conceptual framework—for example, conventional Buddhist teachings or the assumptions of contemporary psychodynamic or cognitive behavioral psychotherapies, all of which presume health looks like this and have both a logos and fantasies that run through them for what health looks like.

So it wasn't the kind of questioning coming from those perspectives. It wasn't a kind of intellectual challenging. It wasn't logical deconstruction of the image or some kind of reductionist approach. None of that—which I was happy to play with, and I think that's also an important point I want to stress—none of that made any real shift in, certainly in the depth of power of the original images, or in the kind of allegiance to them, the way something in my soul would keep coming back saying, "No, there's something about that, there's something about that that just feels more essential or more close to me." None of that had any effect really.

It was only through working actually over and over again, repeatedly, with the original image itself as it arose, without any agenda of changing or improving it. So to go back to that original fear I had about whether that was kind of sneaking into this inquiry—whether I actually had an agenda of changing or, quote, improving this image—the transformation, the opening up of this image, the broadening of these related images, happened through imaginal work, and not through imaginal work that was trying to change or improve the original image. Or it happened through imaginal work with other images which arose organically, or in imaginal work sensing with soul in the sense of experiences of life and relationship as imaginal perceptions when they naturally became images for the soul.

It was only in all of that imaginal work that the original image, whatever it was, was significantly modified, expanded, or made more flexible.

So that's one point there. Is it possible I'm attached to this image or too entrenched in a certain image or a certain way of seeing things? It may be through imaginal work, going deeper into that whole imaginal constellation or expanding the imaginal work without an agenda, that it's actually opened up, rather than necessarily just cutting off the image—although that is a possibility in some cases too.

In our inquiry, there was conceptual questioning and the possibility of looking at other different supportive conceptual frameworks. That's always going to be a fruitful and indispensable element of inquiry, and even soul-making inquiry. We did kind of turn the soil there. It helped. But to quote Russell Lockhart and Thomas Moore, two psychotherapists who work a lot with images and the imaginal: images ask for other images. This image, whatever it is that I'm entertaining, that I'm relating to, that I'm struggling with, or that I'm questioning whether I'm entrenched in—images ask for other images rather than only conceptual responses or only heart and emotional responses. The image asks for other images. It asks for an opening up of more imaginal work.

And only those images that were discovered by the soul—or you could say given by the soul—were effective here in opening things up. It wasn't like the ego's idea: "I think we should throw in another image of a guy in a jacuzzi because that's really different from the falcon god guy." It arose organically. It was given by the soul to the consciousness. It was discovered by the soul rather than contrived, placed there in a contrived way by the ego's idea of what was right or wrong, or grasping too quickly at something that might be an opposite of that other image that I thought maybe I was entrenched in or attached to.

Not for the purpose of self-improvement or healing or whatever—that was not even in the thinking, in the paradigm, in working with the images. And I would doubt whether any of that—placing an image there in a contrived way or grasping at something to try and improve the self or heal—whether that would really be soul-making.

There's a lot more I'm saying here, and it brings us back to that question or that pondering when I talked about different fantasies of the past. Soul-making may well overlap with what we might call healing and liberating, but those aims and directions are not necessarily equivalent and interchangeable. It depends how we define things. So soul-making, yes—connection, overlap with healing—healing and liberating, but not necessarily exactly the same thing, or we can simply substitute one word for another.

To open that up just a little bit now—I'll hopefully return to this in later talks—people often these days speak of healing, but what is meant when a person talks of healing? Who or what exactly is healed? Is it the self of modern ego psychology? Is it the self that is made to adapt or pretend or simulate, or to hide certain aspects while revealing others according to what the dominant culture deems acceptable? Until this self can be functional within the assumptions of our modernist Western capitalist society?

Is it the Self with a capital S that Jung speaks of? Is that what is healed? Is it the self as the process of the five psychophysical aggregates and their conditioning mechanisms in a temporally unfolding process? Is it the soul? And if so, what does that mean?

Similarly with the notion of liberation. What is liberation? Is it the liberation of Buddhism? Or if we say yes, which Buddhism? Whose Buddhism? Even if you listen to teachers just at Gaia House, you can see there's a pretty vast range in the conception of what liberation is, where the path goes, what's possible, what we're even fundamentally addressing when we say dukkha. I'll come back to this. Even just among the teachers at Gaia House, let alone if we venture outside.

We tend to believe, partly conditioned by past teachings, that any apparent attachment to an image needs liberating. We need to liberate that attachment, undo it, find space, somehow make a movement toward non-attachment—something called non-attachment, space, liberation from any apparent attachment to an image. That would be the traditional view of healing and liberation.

So this idea instead—that perhaps we have, or might have, a duty of some kind to an image, to an imaginal figure, to a soul-making perception; that it somehow has a hold on us, places demands on us; that our soul somehow must answer, is called to answer (we're never made to answer—we're called, that's a better way of putting it); called to answer to this duty even if a certain amount of pain and suffering remain wrapped up in that image, without dissolving, wrapped up in the image and our relation to it—that's quite a different idea. Not, on the face of it, compatible with the usual contemporary notions of freedom and non-attachment.

James Hillman is quite extreme in this. He insists that pathologizing is central to soul-making. In stark contrast to traditional Eastern spiritual views of liberation and the whole path toward it—where it's simply about more and more space and more and more freedom—Hillman was quite insistent in his view that soul-making needs pathologizing. There's something about pathologizing, of making problems, of making dukkha, of being ensnared in dukkha that's essential to soul-making. You have two quite disparate views there.

I wonder about all this, and I wonder about the possibility of really daring to explore it while being aware of what teachings we're conditioned by, what authorities we defer to. Can we be bold and creative with the conceptual frameworks and ideas regarding all this? Is there a way of embracing all of that into one larger conceptual framework that's perhaps more subtle?

These questions around soul-making, around the path of soul-making, are really interesting questions for me. Part of why they're so interesting, rich, and exciting is that we can ask these questions in a way that also questions whether there is a truth to be discovered in the answers we may arrive at, or that we may create in asking the questions.

We can ask a question without believing or going into an idea that the answers to these questions are therefore going to be truths. We can—and it's my preferred mode, approach, attitude—realize, or let's say entertain the idea, that just as much as we can conceive of our questions potentially uncovering truths, we can view them also as creations. The questions lead to creations. They even lead to what we might call soul-making fictions. Any answers we arrive at or entertain, we can regard as creations and soul-making fictions. It's a very different idea from the answer being the truth.

With all that, we realize also—which makes the questions so exciting and rich to me—that the path that then unfolds for us, or that we create, if you like, discover and create, depends on the way we answer these kinds of questions about suffering, about attachment, about what healing means, about what liberation is, about duty or no duty, about pathology. The path that unfolds for us is dependent, as always, on the conceptual frameworks we form and adopt.

There's something here in this whole meta-paradigm, if you like, that's so rich, so exciting to me because of that liberation from a rigid notion of truth and discovery of truth.

It's more, if you like, in tune with the sort of potentially liberating issues of post-modern or even pre-modern ways of conceiving, rather than the typically modern approach. I've talked about some of that before, I think. But to me it makes it kind of fun and more exploratory, and the very questioning is participatory. It's open. It's an open field rather than a narrowing down. It's creative rather than limited, as it would be in a kind of realist or truth-assuming approach.

So I hope all that makes sense, and I hope it's helpful. There's quite a lot in there. But again, if we continue, there are subtle and complex and deep questions regarding the way the universe is, regarding ontology and epistemology that are kind of open. So as well as questions of identification and attachment, there are these bigger questions around ontology and epistemology.

Again, if we trace what we're doing here, as I said at the start of the talk, we're looking partly at ways in which realism can lead to identification, reification, attachment in ways that are not helpful and how that can be liberated. But there are also, as we get into this whole question of realism and dukkha more, we also realize that as well as potential over-identification, or the question of whether it's okay and fruitful to be identified and have that image closely woven into one's life—as well as the nuances and more subtle questions around those issues—there are also questions regarding ontology, epistemology, cosmology, which are more subtle.

So for example, I shared—I don't remember when, maybe in the Re-enchanting the Cosmos retreat—a sensing with soul of the bird song outside the window and how the song of the birds was kind of weaving my energy body, weaving my body and healing me. A very beautiful image, full of grace and loveliness. But I think I also shared, I hope I shared when I shared that image, that the meaning of healing was not closed down or limited or too narrow or put into a box.

Similarly, sometimes there are angels of light that come as if they're caring for me, breathtakingly beautiful, and also part of a healing. But with those images for me, there's a kind of openness to what healing means. In other words, I may well die soon. I know that. I know that I may well not survive this cancer. But it doesn't take away the sense of healing and the kind of sense of the possible reality of that healing. It's just that what healing might mean, including on a physical level of healing, might not mean surviving this cancer or this illness.

So if these angels of light—beautiful, radiant in terms of luminosity, radiant in terms of love—if these angels of light are caring for me, watching over me, if they are touching me, if they are interacting with me, if they are guiding things a little bit, if that's the sense, the imaginal sense, if that's the sensing with soul, it still does not mean, to my conception—and I don't have to work at this, it's just natural with that imaginal sense, with that sensing with soul—I'm still not guaranteed a certain outcome. There are no guarantees that just because angelic figures of light tend to me and minister to me and feel like they're interacting with matter, or the birdsong or whatever, it doesn't mean that there's necessarily this or that outcome.

So sometimes, several people say similarly, and I could say the same for myself, sometimes it feels like the trees care for me or the birds care for me, but that doesn't necessarily imply an outcome that suits my ego or just what I want. I might die. And yet that takes away nothing from the beauty or the reality or the healing of the sensing with soul, in my case, or in the case of others who've shared similar things with me.

Certainly, this to me is—again, I'm just opening doors for discussion and questioning. I don't want to close a door on the possibility of the material efficacy of prayer, of what we might call magic, or of the kind of intuition that a person might have of something that's happening in what we might say are the unseen realms. I don't want to close the door on that possibility.

But for me, one, it doesn't narrow down to a sort of tight meaning of what healing means. And it doesn't necessarily at all imply an outcome that my ego would be pleased with or would want. We're not really talking about that here. And that to me is part of the whole sense of sensing with soul. It's part of all those elements of the imaginal perception.

So with these kinds of senses—the trees and birds care for me, these angels, the bird song—there's a sort of aura or cloud or space around and imbuing the perception that's one of just more space. It's not so tight, it's not so narrowly grasped in terms of what it means and what it implies and what will happen and what I want. There is some kind of spaciousness of the Middle Way. The spaciousness of the razor's edge of the Middle Way. Some kind of questioning, some kind of acknowledgment of "I don't actually know what this means fully."

Sometimes—and it's actually relatively common if a person dares to let themselves sense something and sense in these ways—sometimes a person senses, and they might have different ways they articulate it to themselves or to others: "The universe wants something from me. I sense the universe wants something."

It might be more specific than that. I sense the universe wants something—not just something vague, but actually in this particular direction, this kind of thing or that kind of work.

I remember reading or hearing something about Princess Diana. I really don't know much about her or that whole situation—I was in the States for most of that time—but I remember she had said something to her father when she was young, in her teens and early twenties. She had been very strict with herself about maintaining her purity, and she told her father, "I have a sense I'm going to be in the public eye. I just have this sense, and somehow that's important."

I also remember hearing an audio snippet of an interview with John Coltrane. He was talking about a dream he'd had of a band, just before he left Miles Davis' group as a sideman to form his own band for the first time in a sustained way. He said he'd had this dream of a certain sound—this quartet with a particular quality. He was very careful in the interview, very humble. "I don't want to insinuate that I can see the future or anything like that, but I had heard this sound, this band, this quartet."

If you know what they call the classic John Coltrane quartet of his middle period, it really was a revolutionary sound in jazz—so groundbreaking, such an unbelievably rich and deep gift to the world. What came through him in his whole life, but especially that band in particular.

So I don't want to close the door on these kinds of possibilities—intuitions, prayer, what we might call magic. But there's something that makes me nervous when someone gets too tight with this, too reified, too identified, too believing. Alarm bells go off for me.

If we linger on this a little, someone might have—perhaps I may have had—an image of performing something in front of large crowds, music or whatever, and there's this sense, this gripping image that feels beautiful. But it's still worth asking with these kinds of things: what is essential to the image? If it's performing music in front of large crowds, is it the size of the crowd, the numbers, the amount of people in the audience that's actually essential?

It might be. As Diana said, "I feel like I'm going to be in the public eye"—a lot of people looking at me, under scrutiny. So the numbers might be essential to the image, but it's worth questioning because they might have nothing to do with it. Actually, it might be something quite else that's more essential and meaningful—more the core of the divinity and beauty and duty in that image.

Again, I'm opening up the conversation, hopefully the discourse, the questioning, the allowing of pondering and reflecting on certain possibilities, while expressing what I think is a healthy caution with all this.

To me, signals that one is on the right track are humility, reverence, duty—but a duty to whom and to what? To that toward which we are reverent and before which we are humble. That's what we have duty toward. It's not separate from ourself, but it's larger. It goes in those dimensionalities of divinity.

The image, the imaginal figure—it's me and it's not me. In that kind of middle way, me and not me, some of the graciousness with all this is able to come in—the fluidity, flexibility, non-rigidity. That's a signal too, that it's not so rigid in terms of what actually transpires. There's a sense in the reverence, in the humility, in the duty of unfathomability that's part of it. It's not so narrowed laterally, but also vertically.

Another thing I'd like to throw in—it's quite unusual, I'm not sure how to say it—but there's something in imaginal perception that carries with it a kind of impossibility: the impossibility of complete material manifestation, the impossibility of perfect replication of that image in one's life. Oftentimes imaginal things carry this impossibility with them.

In regard to that, there's going to be dukkha in the manifestation of whatever it is in my life that echoes or mirrors that image. Why? Because it's impossible to completely manifest that image. This has echoes of, or analogies to, what Hillman's getting at.

There's some dukkha related to soul-making work, some dukkha related to imaginal work. Part of it lies in the impossibility—on some level, it's impossible to completely manifest or perfectly replicate the image in one's life.

So what manifests is always less than, always an imperfect replication or imperfect refraction of the image.

There's also another kind of impossibility with regard to imaginal figures—the impossibility of manifesting everything that all the many angels and demons require of you, of me. In other words, we are complex. The psyche is complex. We don't have just one imaginal figure calling us. We have many, and they move in different directions. Often they have quite opposing styles, wishes, desires, movements, expressions, and systems.

When one begins to realize this—to borrow from Hillman—one recognizes a kind of polytheism within. Many angels, many daemons come to me, ask of me. I have a duty to many of them. And I cannot possibly do it all, and I certainly cannot possibly do it all at the same time.

To share from my own experience: there is a monk and there's a musician, to name just two. I certainly can't be a monk and a musician at the same time, certainly not in the Theravadan tradition. The degree of intensity and passion and devotion which each one asks for in their purity of their archetypal styles—for me, you can't do both. Either you're going to devote yourself to one or the other.

Many people have shared similar experiences: "I feel drawn to be a nun, but I'm an artist." There's the tendency to want to lock into a kind of reified view, a realist view: either I'm going to be a nun, or I'm going to be an artist, or I'm going to live on retreat, or I'm going to devote my time to making art and being busy in the world of art, trying to make a living that way.

But once we realize that this is our situation—this polytheism of angels and demons for many of us, for most of us, I think—we see that we can't possibly fulfill their conflicting demands and directions. We can't possibly manifest or express or commit to all of them at once in our life. So there's a kind of dukkha in that—the sadness, the grief even. I wish I could fulfill these callings that I have, these passions, these images that speak to me so beautifully. I wish I was able to fulfill them both in manifestation, expression, dedication, material manifestation. I wish I was able to do them both at once. Maybe one has periods in one's life, as I have, but still there's this dukkha.

This is related to something I want to return to regarding values and the way that values important to us also often conflict, are impossible to manifest and bring into being or pursue simultaneously. That's what's called antinomous—I'll come back to that in another talk.

But what this means is when I realize the polytheism there and the conflicting duties, the pulls and beauties there in my pantheon of imaginal figures of daemons and angels, then I realize I can't possibly reify too much. I can't possibly over-identify too much with "I am this and I am that," when this and that don't really go together, can't possibly be manifested together.

Seeing this, acknowledging it, opening out to that view of the wider complexity and polytheistic landscape of our psyche also helps—allows us to reify less, identify less with regard to imaginal figures, and so experience less dukkha.

Wrapped up in these points is another element I've touched on before: where there's eros, it will create and discover—or create/discover—more beyond. It will always create, discover more beyond what I already know, already have manifested, already am inhabiting, already am familiar with. Something transcendent—not beyond perception or sensing as far as the soul is concerned, but transcendent in and through. Eros always will create and find a way to create and/or discover more, more beyond.

It's really good to know that. Because of this quality—related to the pothos in the eros and the longing—there is this tonality, this flavor of some degree of dukkha, or at least potential for dukkha, in the beyondness, in the not-yet-ness, in the wanting more, not quite satisfied.

Rather than saying that's all just tanha and useless and craving that brings samsara, we're saying: ah, no, with the eros, there's the possibility of beauty and discovery and creation of divinity and all the soul-making. But because it has this beyond, this not-yet-ness to it, there can be the slight flavor of dukkha wrapped up in the eros, in the movement of eros.

But again, as we've emphasized in this series of talks, recognizing or noticing or paying attention to this aspect—the beyondness aspect of the imaginal—knowing that it will be there because of the eros, noticing it, tuning into it, will allow the whole thing to become more imaginative. This attention, noticing this node in the imaginal constellation, illumines that node, and then that illumines, ignites the whole constellation of the imaginal.

And then that brings with it what's obviously not real, because one of the other nodes that is ignited is the sense of theater or middle way. And rather, it's divine. The divinity also shows itself.

So it's not necessarily easy when we feel the dukkha of wanting more, or we feel we're a bit stuck on wanting something. But if we can notice that beyond aspect, recognize that it's part of what happens with eros, let that ignite within more and let that ignite the whole imaginal constellation, the whole imaginal perception, then there's more ease because we realize it's not real, we cling less, and there's more beauty and divinity. Not necessarily easy, but definitely possible.

And so there's a loosening of any tight craving or the grip of too much grasping, and so less dukkha.

Another way of approaching what we've just said is to say that in the experience of the imaginal, in the experience of sensing with soul, we can investigate both the object and the subject. Who am I now? Who is this now? What am I now? What is this now that is in relationship in the sensing with soul?

And that investigation is with eros, with the sensing with soul, with soul-making, with the imaginal. It's not a deconstructive or reductionist investigation, which would just inhibit or drain the life out of the whole sensing with soul. But in investigating who or what, again, we expand into the beyond, both of the object and also of the self, of the subject.

More imaginal, the imaginal middle way opens up. It's obvious that this what—that I perhaps am feeling dukkha with because I'm grasping too much and wanting it or something or other, some kind of grasping, there's some kind of dukkha there—it becomes clear in the imaginal way. What it is and what I am is neither real nor not real. It's got that theater element, it's got the dimensionality to it, and it's got the divinity, so that what this is that I may be stuck on is the divine, and has the unfathomability of the divine.

It's more than what I took it to be at first blush, or from the perspective of the view of craving, the view that I was in when there was a lot of craving. So with the opening up of the middle way, with the dimensionality and divinity that comes, there is again a lessening of identification and reification and a lessening of dukkha.

Again, all these pieces that I'm talking about, or angles that I'm talking about, are related, and with a little pondering you can see that.

But another really important piece to bear in mind here is that element that we talked about in the first talk—the fullness of intention, that helps make something fully imaginal, authentically imaginal. This fullness of intention will help with the equanimity. And where there's equanimity, there's a decrease of dukkha.

So where the intention is fuller, in other words, where we're not shrinking what the object is or what we're after in our connection with the object, where we're not shrinking it or getting caught up in craving for this object. When the intention is actually fuller and we realize, oh, my deeper, fuller intention is for soul-making, for the whole of soul-making. It's not for this object as I immediately perceive it. It's not for any smaller element.

So again, this can happen. We might start off with a sensing with soul and then eros actually, if we're not careful, can shrink to craving and then that shrinks the perception and the intention shrinks and all of these factors. So we're in a dynamic situation whenever we're sensing with soul. And it's possible that we start with the erotic imaginal and there's all this beauty and loveliness and if we're not careful, it shrinks to craving with a shrinking of intention and shrinking of perception, all kinds of things.

But having or opening up to that, reminding ourselves of a fullness of intention, it's like planting deep roots. And like a tree that has deep roots, it will be stable in the winds. So there's something really, really important about reminding ourselves or aligning or dwelling with the intention or opening up the intention when we're engaged in this work. And that's one way of relieving some dukkha that might have crept in through some kind of cramping or grasping or shrinking of either intention or of craving or reification or something or other.

So we remind ourselves or we realize, in fact, that what we really love, what we're really wishing for, yearning for, and intending for is the whole of soul-making. So it's not just the excitement of imaginal perception or eros that I'm after or the sense of aliveness or the sense of juiciness or delight or some kind of pleasure or thrill. It's not, as I said, just the object in its kind of very tightly circumscribed, delimited form without those soft boundaries, soft edges and unfathomability that we talked about. The intention's bigger than just for that. Nor is it just for eros. Nor is it just for images. Images. Psyche, if you like, in the small sense of psyche.

But the intention can be, and I would say it is, in the soul's deeper intention anyway. So it's something we realize or we connect with—an intention that's already existing in the soul. Might be dormant, might be hidden. We might not consciously realize, but we connect with that. The intention is for the whole of soul-making.

That means for the sense of dimensionality, for the sense of divinity, the opening up of sacredness, for the sense of meaningfulness—all the aspects and elements we've outlined. And included in the whole of soul-making, our intention, our direction, our longing and yearning is also for logos. Remember, if we speak of the soul-making dynamic, the three principal elements are eros, psyche, and logos—which means also conceptual framework. So I'm hungry for this. My intention extends to logos and conceptual framework.

Sometimes it's very understandable, given our culture and the excitement that can arise around some of this material, that we find ourselves wanting simply to extend or intensify the eros or the images we're having without recognizing the larger soul-making movement that is happening or could potentially happen. We want to extend or intensify the eros and the psyche and the feeling of that, but we're less interested in the logos, less interested in the conceptual frameworks or ideas operating or the possibilities there.

But what happens if we align with, remind ourselves of, or connect with the recognition that our deepest passion and commitment—or the deepest passion and commitment of the soul—is for the whole of soul-making? The deepest commitment of the soul is to soul. That's the fullness of intention, and we can reconnect with that.

If we emphasize this logos—because for many people, that may be the missing piece—what would it look like to consciously include it? Of course, it could be the overly focused piece at the expense of others, body or whatever, but oftentimes it's the logos. If we recognize that it's the whole of soul-making, that includes curiosity—curiosity about what is happening in my experience and why it's happening, the dependent arising of all that, the factors that feed or starve or squash or ignite. Curiosity regarding conceptual frameworks and their effects.

Going back to those talks where I discussed different fantasies of the path, one I called the researcher fantasy—that fantasy of experimenting in practice and being interested in the results of trying this and that. What happens if I do that? What happens if I lean this way? What happens if I emphasize that? What happens if I bring this into awareness?

Inhabiting that fantasy brings with it, I believe, a certain amount of equanimity in regard to the actual experiences happening, because I'm less taken with the experience and more interested in why this is happening, how it all fits together, what there is to understand, what conceptual framework might be emerging.

Some people familiar with Enneagram personality types might say the researcher fantasy is like a type five, tending toward aloofness or distance. I'm not sure it necessarily implies that—I have reservations about personality typology anyway. In this case, I don't think the researcher fantasy brings equanimity through standing back, crossing one's arms in more aloof, uninvolved noticing. Rather, it could bring more equanimity because it provides more roots through an enlarging of one's commitments. Now I have the root of logos as well—the root of intention for investigating logos and conceptual framework as an additional root, making me more stable.

Also, I have an additional thread or strand of intimacy with whatever is going on. The intimacy between me and whatever or whoever I'm sensing with soul now has that extra facet, that extra strand of intimacy in and through the logos, in and through conception.

This applies to human beings as well—some of the intimacy, certainly the soul-making intimacy that can flow between human beings, is dependent on or supported or enlarged through the logos that might be shared. We can be intimate through logos, as well as through body, energy, psychically, heartfully. There's a kind of being intimate through and in logos.

In terms of what happens when one's sensing with soul, the researcher fantasy offers one way where, if there's dukkha and instability, bringing in more of that researcher quality can, for some people, bring more equanimity and thus less dukkha into the whole process.

But the larger point concerns the fullness of intention—reminding ourselves, refinding that, reopening to it, realizing that's actually what we really want when we're wanting. It's not this or that person, not this or that thing manifesting. What the soul most deeply wants is soul-making and the fullness of soul-making, everything that entails.

Connected with all this, dukkha decreases when—or rather, dukkha increases if eros becomes craving or shrinks to craving. Craving goes with dukkha, dukkha goes with craving. But if the eros can be maintained as eros and not shrink into craving, then there won't be dukkha coming into the experience. There will definitely be a significant reduction in dukkha coming into sensing with soul, into imaginal experience.

If any craving present can be alchemically transformed into eros—which is very possible, as we've discussed before—then that conversion of craving to eros alleviates dukkha, draining quite a lot of dukkha out of the experience. One way we've talked about is including more energy body awareness—the whole energy body allows craving to manifest more as eros. Shrinking bodily awareness to one part tends to go with craving.

Eros, unlike craving, opens—it opens the sense of dimensionality, opens the sense of divinity, and divinity in potentially infinite forms or faces, infinite possibilities of particular theophanies rather than just universal abstractions.

When we consider what we might call, somewhat humorously, run-of-the-mill versions of divinity—those universal conceptions of the divine—eros operates in a fundamentally different way. Eros opens, creates and discovers richnesses and facets of what we're sensing in the soul. It opens up the sense of beauty, the possibility of expression and individual expression, the creation and discovery of all these qualities. Essentially, eros goes with and opens up and leads to and stimulates and supports soul-making and sensing the soul. Craving does not. I won't elaborate extensively on this since we've explored it thoroughly in past retreats.

We've put forth quite a few teachings acknowledging that eros can be very subtle, and can also be very strong at times. Part of the possible maturing involves learning how gradually to ride that eros, handle it, or respond to it—to modulate it sometimes. Different approaches are possible, and they're really useful as part of the developing art. Yet we should never forget there's always the possibility—and we should never lose sight of this—of simply letting go, cutting something, dropping it for now and simplifying. We can let the image go, let the eros go. This possibility exists too when there's dukkha present because the eros feels too strong.

In relation to eros, let me read you something by the poet W.H. Auden. Someone sent this to me, though I neglected to ask from which of his writings it comes:

"When someone begins to lose the glamour they had for us on our first meeting, we tell ourselves that we have been deceived, that our fantasy cast a halo over them which they are unworthy to bear. It is always possible, however, that the reverse is the case—that our disappointment is due to a failure of our own sensibility which lacks the strength to maintain itself at the acuteness with which it began. People may really be what we first thought them, and what we subsequently think of as the disappointing reality may be the person obscured by the staleness of our senses. The vision of eros is, in my opinion, a religious vision. It is an indirect manifestation of the glory of the personal creator through a personal creature."

You can see many similarities with the ways we're presenting things, and some differences too. But notice this crucial insight: "It is always possible, however, that our disappointment is due to a failure of our own sensibility which lacks the strength to maintain itself at the acuteness with which it began."

In terms of dukkha, if we frame this within our understanding of suffering, people often think: "I fell in love with this person when I first met them. They looked so wonderful, so angelic—that's how I sensed them. Then after a while, they're actually just a schmuck like everyone else." We typically conclude that eros was a projection when we fell in love, that it was a delusion, wishful thinking, grasping, or craving.

But Auden, in that brief quote, is asserting something quite different. He's saying no—eros helps us to see reality. It's only through eros that we perceive what is real about this person. Because eros and the kind of acuity and sensitivity of soul and sensing that it demands of us is somewhat too much for us to sustain—we're not practiced at it, we're not given encouragement, it's hard work—our initial sensing of this person, thing, or whatever, slips to something more ordinary, more commonly agreed upon, more flat, less holy.

He's suggesting that eros is actually the mode of being or the lens through which we perceive and sense what is real. There's a particular ontology wrapped up in what he's saying, and I really want to open this up as a possibility for our consideration.

So one position aligns with what we just heard Auden articulate. An alternative ontology suggests that eros, as we've discussed, stimulates and supports and opens and ignites soul-making in the ways we've been exploring. This is actually the intention—for soul-making. That's what the soul wants. It's not seeking this object alone, or the sense of excitement or aliveness or pleasure for their own sake. Rather, it's not for this object in itself, somehow separated from its whole involvement in soul-making, not separated from the whole vortex of soul-making and the entire imaginal constellation that opens up with sensing the soul.

In this process, there is this elasticity and softness of edges of the object. In that elasticity, in the softness of edges, is where we sense both the potential for soul-making and the actuality of soul-making—that expansion of the object. This is what the intention truly seeks.

But in terms of the alternative ontology, rather than eros showing us "the real"—this person, this object, this thing, this world, this "I" as they actually are—we have one viable ontology very much at odds with the dominant worldview at the moment. An alternative ontology suggests that eros brings soul-making. And in soul-making, there's this recognition—at least in the way we're discussing it—of the truth of participation in perception, the truth of the participatory nature of perception.

Rather than a simple reality one is inducted into, one recognizes in the process of soul-making a truth or reality of a more participatory nature—a participatory understanding of reality itself, of perception.

Regarding the perceptions and senses of things that arise in and through the erotic imaginal, we could actually delineate a rough spectrum of ontologies concerning the perceptions that arise through the erotic imaginal. This is something I want to offer to open up our discussion, to think out loud together.

Through eros and through sensing with soul, we encounter profound questions about the nature of reality itself. At one end of the spectrum of ontologies—perhaps representing the dominant modernist cultural view—lies the perspective that in this sensing with soul, I create something unreal. That image or sense of things has simply emerged from my mind, my neurology, my imagination. It remains unreal in the simplistic sense that most of modern culture conceives of reality and unreality.

At the other end of the spectrum stands a radically different view: in imaginal perception, in sensing the soul through eros, I discover the real. This may be something more akin to what Auden was expressing—that through erotic engagement, we encounter genuine reality rather than mere fabrication.

Between these poles lie two positions that I find more interesting and philosophically viable. The second position along this spectrum suggests there is nothing real "out there"—only mental projections. Matter becomes merely a play of awareness; this is all mind only. In this view, there exists nothing substantial beyond consciousness and its projections. Therefore, in imaginal perception, I am simply creating freely, perhaps at the whim of soul or directed by my will in adopting this or that way of looking. Nothing truly real exists out there; all remains mental projection.

A third view presents what we might call the participatory perspective—more difficult to explain, more mysterious in its implications. In this ontology, the self who senses, the thing being sensed, the other, the object, the world, matter, mind, and divinity—all these elements participate in each other. The mind with its will, its perception and perceiving, its ways of looking and awareness—none of this exists separately. They all participate in each other.

Can you enter into contemplative pondering of what this might mean? What might this do to our entire sense of ontology and the possibilities it opens for an epistemology regarding sensing the soul? Self, other, world, matter, mind, divinity—none separate, yet not simply one thing either. They all participate in each other.

Rather than insisting on any particular way, what I truly want is to open possibilities for more creation and discovery, for pondering, for reflection, and for creating some conceptual space regarding the ontological and epistemological foundations for sensing the soul and these kinds of perceptions.

You might also ponder what kinds of suffering or possible ways of suffering, and what kinds of soul-making, are made possible or prevented through each of these different ontologies. If we consider what happens with eros in terms of its effects on perception and what conception of reality emerges through erotic imaginal perception, what does each possibility deliver for the soul and in terms of dukkha? After all, this remains our central subject.

I want to explore more about eros and fire in the next part, so we'll return to that. Let's pause here for now.

CHAPTER 119

Dukkha and Soulmaking (Part 4 - 'Mastering the Fire')

Rob Burbea · 1h39

> In this fourth part of his series on dukkha and soul-making, Rob Burbea introduces the alchemical metaphor of 'mastering the fire' - developing skillful relationship with the various forms of desire that arise in soul-making practice. Drawing on medieval alchemy's maxim that 'one who masters the fire masters the work,' he explores how different qualities of desire can either support or hinder the soul-making process.
>
> Burbea distinguishes four types of desire: craving (which contracts and brings dukkha), devotional yearning (with its beautiful bittersweet quality), intelligent responsive practical desire (the everyday engine of skillful action), and eros (which opens the imaginal and supports soul-making). He examines how to discern between these different fires, noting their distinct phenomenological signatures in body, mind, and energy.
>
> The talk addresses crucial questions for practitioners: How do we develop capacity to tolerate intensity? What internal patterns and habits shape our relationship with desire? How do we distinguish authentic soul desires from ego-driven wants? Burbea explores elements like emotionality, discipline, focus, and containment as aspects of fire that need attention, while emphasizing that complete mastery is neither possible nor desirable - the soul's fire must retain its wildness and connection to something greater than the ego.

Let's linger a little while longer on our larger theme, considering different facets of the soul-making movement or journey that may ask of us greater attention and awareness. What needs care? What aspects and facets need attention, inquiry, and respect? What requires modulation and responsiveness in order that soul-making opens up and not dukkha—so that the relationship with the imaginal, the sensing of soul, and the whole soul-making journey doesn't bring dukkha?

My hope and intention is to offer things that might be helpful by way of advice, but also to stimulate and open your own reflection on these issues and aspects—your own soul-making reflections, observations, experimentations, and considerations. I aim both to disseminate advice and to open up a field, drawing attention to it while inviting you to create and discover within that field regarding these facets I'm highlighting.

We ended the last part by speaking about Eros, pointing out the distinctions between Eros and craving. Craving contracts the being, does not bring soul-making, and brings dukkha. Eros, by contrast, has an opening characteristic. It stimulates and supports soul-making and does not in itself lead to more dukkha, generally speaking. We've explored these subtleties and details in other talks on previous retreats, so I won't delve into them extensively today.

Instead, I want to dwell on a few other aspects of desire, eros, craving, and that nexus—what we might call "mastering the fire." Some of you will remember an alchemical maxim from the Middle Ages that I've used in perhaps one or two talks: "One who masters the fire, masters the work." This referred to alchemy and the transubstantiation of existence—transforming the matter of existence into sacredness. The fire that heats the alchemical vessel must be mastered to master the work of alchemy.

If we use that metaphor of fire loosely for this collection of qualities—desire, eros, craving—what does it mean to master the fire? What might be involved in such mastery? Because if we master fire, then that fire does not create dukkha.

Fire, from the beginning of humanity's discovery or harnessing of it, has been recognized as both dangerous and incredibly helpful. It's very potent and dangerous if we have the wrong relationship to it, yet invaluable for heating, cooking, warmth, protection, and countless other purposes. Mastering the fire—using this alchemical metaphor—means being in right relationship with it so that the path of soul-making and practices of the imaginal don't lead to dukkha, but rather allow alchemy to happen in soul-making. Where there's the alchemy of soul-making, there is generally the draining away of dukkha, the release and freedom from dukkha.

Let's examine this fire as metaphor, shorthand, or image for desire and the different kinds of desire, exploring how to cultivate careful relationship and discernment with them.

I was speaking recently with someone in an interview about this—someone who'd been practicing quite a long time. Because the Dharma she had encountered hadn't included the element of desire, what she had absorbed from teachings was more about putting aside desire, shunning it, regarding it only with suspicion, ignoring it, or trying to quell the fires of desire. She was beginning to be interested in the wisdom and potential of actually having greater discernment and flexibility in one's relationship with fire of different kinds. We discussed desire in the broadest ways and the need to discern between different kinds of desire, their operations at different times in our lives, and what they need—some of what's involved in the metaphor of mastering the fire.

We talked about the necessity to learn, probably gradually, to discern between different kinds of burning. First, cravings. Second, devotional yearning. Third, intelligent, responsive, practical desire. And fourth, eros.

With all these, the divisions are not always clear. They overlap, and we find ourselves in situations, mind states, and states of being that involve mixtures of these. Part of the alchemical work is the refining, purification, and modulation that comes once discernment is there.

Craving, we've said, brings contraction. How do I know?

I feel it in the body, and yes, you can feel it in the mind in different ways—a kind of gripping of obsessive thinking, certainly, and also a shrinking of the space of awareness. But I would draw attention to how, when there's craving, we feel a contraction in the energy body and a non-harmonizing of the energy body.

As well, we notice that the sense of self and the sense of other or object—they are both reified. Both self and other, subject and object, are reified by craving or in the experience of craving. So there is not that sense of what we call the imaginary middle way, nor is there the sense of the emptiness middle way. There is, too, we can notice, not a sense of the object having a kind of unfathomable depth, and nor the subject, nor the self.

So one of the things about craving—and its closing down and kind of drawing tight limits and solid limits around what it involves, or what it connects, if you like, or disconnects in a way—is that it circumscribes subject and object and time. Rather than these soft, elastic edges, and rather than the dimensionality and the unfathomability, the unfathomable depth that we sense within the erotic imaginal, in our sense of imaginal figure and the subject, the self, there is not that unfathomable depth with craving in object or subject or world or time. And as I said, craving brings dukkha with all this contraction, reification, circumscription—it flattens things.

If we contrast that with the second kind of desire that I mentioned in this fourfold, loosely structured scheme—devotional yearning—for many practices, it's going to be really important to recognize, "Oh, what is that?" If I just lump that experience, that movement of the soul, if I just lump that into a category called craving, or "that's just desire, that's no good, that leads to suffering," boy, am I missing out on something that's so beautiful, so rich an aspect of human being, a possibility of human being.

Yes, there is often a kind of bittersweet quality, a kind of poignancy to devotional yearning. We yearn for the divine, we yearn for the beloved other of the erotic imaginal. We yearn for that depth that's just beyond. There's something beautiful here, and we can recognize that beauty mixed in with the poignancy and the bittersweet quality of it. It also has a kind of poetic characteristic to it. Our yearning itself feels poetic—and that's also not quite the same as the theatrics aspect, but something like that. We feel in a poetic frame of being, a poetic mode of being, when that devotional yearning is pouring through our soul, kindled in our soul.

Is that dukkha? Well, you could say the bittersweetness, the poignancy, the yearning, the not-yet-ness—yes, I guess you could say there's a kind of dukkha, but it's a different kind of dukkha, isn't it? It's got that beauty, that richness, that poetry, the bittersweetness in it.

And again, if we talk about distinction with craving, there is the infinite, unfathomable depth of the beloved other, the object of my yearning. That infinite unfathomability and depth and dimensionality is discernible. The divinity also is discernible, whereas craving, as I said, it flattens, it contracts things. Things become just that—what I think they are. And they don't have this palpable, discernible, sensible sense of infinite and unfathomable depth.

So that's the poetry, the beauty, the bittersweetness, the richness, the poetic quality of soul at that point, of sensibility, the infinite, unfathomable depth, the dukkha that one isn't sure that one really would want to let go of. All this helps us to discern this kind of desire, this kind of fire burning in the soul—devotional yearning that comes and goes, visits the soul, is kindled in the soul, in the being at different times.

And then there's a third category we could call intelligent, responsive, practical desire. So for example, one is practicing samadhi, and even in jhana—yes, in jhana, it may not be a kind of mystical or divine experience in a particular jhana, say, whatever it is, first jhana, second jhana, maybe, may not be. And the desire itself doesn't have that kind of poetic poignancy, but it's just practical. It's just the desire, moment to moment, to sustain the particular pleasure that is the dominant feature of this or that jhana. So the piti in the first jhana, the sukha, the happiness and joy in the second jhana, the exquisite peacefulness of the third jhana.

Just the desire to sustain that, to permeate it, to permeate that through the body, to stabilize it. This desire is operating in a very kind of low-key way, as a kind of engine, as a kind of navigator, as a kind of director, moment to moment, of what one is doing—yes, doing—in the jhana. And it's really not a big deal. It's just kind of a part of the mind is just intelligently, practically, responsively—in other words, it's responding to what's actually happening. I don't have to push at permeating anymore. I don't have to desire permeation anymore if the body is already permeated. It's just a gentle ticking over of desire that's directing the attention and the intention to sustain, let's say, the pervasion of sukha, the permeation of sukha in the whole energy body.

It's really not a big deal. I can't get too tight with it. I can't get too kind of manic with it. I can't get my knickers too much in a twist with it. It's just part of the art of jhana, part of the skill of jhana, and it's very kind of low-key—just an intelligent, responsive, practical desire. Just as a kind of equivalent from the world would be, I've got a meeting somewhere...

I have to go to that meeting—a dharma meeting, a teacher meeting, an interview, whatever it is, a soul-making meeting with a friend. I have a desire to get to that meeting. So I get in my car, get on my bike, and drive or cycle there. But I'm cycling responsibly, responding to what the conditions around me need. There's a car coming around the corner—slow down. The lane narrows—I have to wait for this car to go by. Now I'm going uphill, so I change gear. Now I'm going downhill, so I freewheel with maybe a little braking now and then.

There's intelligent, responsive, practical desire. It's not a big deal. It's just part of life, an everyday element of our lives most of the time. We cannot make an enemy out of this. We have to recognize when there's just that kind of desire. We need it. It's part of our life. We do it all the time, whether we think about it or not. It's part of meditation, part of everyday life, part of sustaining what's beautiful. And it's part of our path.

The fourth category we can contrast is eros, which opens the imaginable, stimulates and supports and fertilizes and catalyzes the soul-making dynamic of eros-psyche-logos, bringing with it the unfathomable infinite depth, also recognizable there. The theatrical quality, the unfathomability, the dimensionality, the divinity of the object.

Contrasting it with craving, the object does not have that unfathomable infinite—this is how we can discern. There's not the reification with eros, not the tight boundaries. There are more porous boundaries or soft, elastic edges. The beauty, the divinity, the meaningfulness, the energy body harmonization and alignment and openness, again in contradistinction to the experience of craving. All that—subject and object, self and body, erotic object, erotic other, beloved other—opened up in depth.

We can discern between these different kinds of desire. And that discernment is part of what we might call mastering the fire. I need to discern if I'm on the path—any path actually, but certainly the soul-making path—because then that distinction, particularly with eros, needs to get made.

I've mentioned some of the different ways that desire and opening to the current of desire actually releases dukkha. Where there is dukkha, rather than just letting go of the desire—which is a very viable option, a very sensible option at times—there's a real art of opening to the current desire and releasing dukkha, dissolving dukkha, and discovering treasure right in the heart of the desire.

We've also mentioned how in desires, especially in deep desires, in deep longings, in our devotion, is the gift potentially of equanimity. Connecting with, fixing on, focusing on, feeling in one's body, meditating on, surrendering to, aligning oneself with one's deepest movements of desire and devotion—hanging on, grasping onto that desire with the body, with the whole being, with the heart, with the mind, with the energy body—how helpful that can be for rooting the being.

In that deeper rooting, there's equanimity, and thus not the dukkha that comes with being blown this way and that, knocked over this way, knocked over that way, blown off course, unstable, unsettled.

So sometimes hang on to your desire, hang on to your deep desires. Find ways of doing that in meditation with the body, with the heart, with the whole being. Really skillful teaching.

But in giving such a teaching, it also invites and requires a subtlety of awareness, a kind of questioning, a probing, an asking, a listening. So it's good to be aware: is this desire that I feel, that I'm opening to or aligning myself with, is it an open-ended desire or not? In other words, is it a desire that I hope at some point to fulfill, to then tick off—done that, achieved that? Or is it a desire that's more open-ended?

There's no real end to this. And that can be a problematically open-ended thing or an unproblematically open-ended desire—that desire to close, to go out, to reach an end, to be limited, to not have more territory to open, to create, to discover. So is this desire open-ended or not? And in what kinds of ways?

Also, to be aware or to investigate: any desire happens in what we could call a context or a field of conditions, inner and outer, that make that desire feasible or not. Certainly, the achievement of that desire, feasible or not, or even just moving in the direction of the desire, feasible or not. In other words, I need to be aware if I have this desire, and it's actually, for that desire's goal to materially manifest, impossible with this set of outer conditions, or with this set of inner conditions. Or I can't even move in that direction with this set of conditions. Or I'm actually in a field where there is that possibility. Or it may be possible if the conditions change. So in a way this is just common sense. But this is part of bringing some kind of awareness and common sense to desire.

Less perhaps obvious, and though in some ways perhaps even more important, is another aspect or set of conditions we need to be aware of. Often a desire that exists or moves in us or arises in us meets what we could call an internal pattern of habit with regard to desire. This, I think, is very interesting and very important in terms of one's psychological self-awareness.

So I might have, for example, a habit of feeling lack. I've talked about this when we discussed the beauty of desire and the opening to the current of desire practice. It may be that my tendency is to go into feeling the lack and not so much into feeling the desire and the potency of the desire. I get stuck a little bit in this feeling of lack. There may be, we could say, good reasons for that. It may be actually important to feel that. But that may also be a habit, an internal habit. That's what happens. The desire rises in an internal field of a certain pattern or patternings. And one of them is this feeling of lack. That does something to the desire. It sends the desire in a certain way or dampens it in a certain way or blocks it in a certain way or convolutes it in a certain way. It ricochets off somewhere else.

Or a desire might arise in an internal habit field, if you like, or pattern field of expecting disappointment or expecting the frustration of this desire. Or it might arise in an internal habit field of disallowing or judging desire—again, for different reasons: cultural conditioning, education, spiritual education, family education, religious education, and so on.

Or their opposites, of course. I never feel a sense of lack. I just go straight into the desire, gunning myopically to get the thing that I want. I never expect to be disappointed or that my desire will be frustrated. I never question my desire. It's rarely "never" or "always," is it? But tendencies, habit patterns and tendencies, patterns of tendency.

These kinds of habit patterns, internal conditions around the desire, have a huge effect on what unfolds and whether the desire is felt or experienced as healing, as clarifying, as freeing, as empowering—as it may be, for instance, in that opening to the current of desire practice that we taught—or as dukkha in various ways. Desire can bring dukkha in lots of different ways, and it depends on what it interacts with, especially internally in the saṅkhāras, in the patterns of belief, thinking, assumption, tendency—all of that.

One other element to be aware of with one's desire if one is questioning whether this desire is worth opening to, whether this is something to hang onto: is the desire authentic or not authentic to my soul?

Often I have the sense that as human beings we can get caught up in desires that actually we don't really care about. Somehow we're putting a lot of energy chasing this and that, and actually we don't really care about them. I don't just mean consumerist movements of "I need this or whatever," but also spiritually. Sometimes, as a person, I really want to realize emptiness. That may not actually be, at this time in one's life, one's actual, authentic soul's desire. It may be that one has just got one's head full of "I need to realize emptiness, I need to realize the unfabricated," or whatever it is, because we've been exposed to certain teachings that emphasize it a lot, and certain people say this is the really important thing, and we're in a crowd that People are really into that, and we pick up on that energy, getting swept along and pushed into a certain direction. It may not be authentic to our soul at that time.

It may be that when we think we want to realize this or have a deep insight or have that jhana experience or realize emptiness deeply, what's actually happening is the ego trying to measure up. I've touched on this in past talks, and I feel it's a really important possibility to be aware of. Is this authentic? In other words, is this desire coming from my soul, and will it be soul-making? Is it what I really authentically want? Authentic has to do with author and self—auto—yes, to me, to my soul right now.

I remember a conversation with someone, a very seasoned practitioner. She said to me as part of our discussion about Eros and desire and soul, "I'm not sure if I'm actually attracted to... if I actually long for the unfabricated and all that you talk about, Rob. When I look inside, I see that what I long for—I do long for the holy, I do long for a sense of sacredness—but I long for the holy embodied in this or that person and relationship." Then she asked, "Should I be more mature? I find myself not wanting this so much, but wanting that—this kind of holiness, not that kind of holiness. Should I be more mature?"

She was asking me, as her teacher, for my input. What felt important to say in that moment was to point out that the paradigm coming to us from the Buddha and the Pali Canon, from the Theravadan teachings, is a kind of paradigm filled with patriarchal assumptions and inclinations—or we might say, in quotation marks, typically masculine assumptions, movements, inclinations, priorities, and styles.

It's hard not to recognize—with all the caveats about language and boxes and gender—that the Pali Canon and the whole tradition emerging from it is really a patriarchal lineage, both in its power structures and its regard for women's inferiority and inability. This has been at the forefront of Theravadan Buddhist consciousness recently with the bhikkhunis. But it's also evident in the styles of being, the styles of aim, and the approaches to goal and desire.

The Rhinoceros Horn Sutta exemplifies this—a text where the Buddha extols and praises solitude and the solitary wanderer. Sangha is great, but the solitary wanderer is held as the highest ideal. Be solitary, be independent. The model of the Buddha himself represents a very—again, in quotation marks—typically masculine archetype. And there's this whole transcendent versus immanent thrust and priority.

As this person was saying in our interview, the holiness beyond in the transcendent unfabricated doesn't actually draw her. What draws her is holiness embodied in this or that person, in this or that relationship—a more immanent opening, thrust, movement, priority, and desire.

Do we have the courage and discernment and intelligence and openness to actually question some of the priorities that have come down to us through different spiritual traditions, teachers, and lineages? Can we recognize that while there may well be value in this or that teaching, we must ask what's authentic to our soul and what represents the partiality of this or that tradition, this or that lineage?

For some people, this questioning feels too scary or arrogant. One thinks, "How could I possibly do that?" Perhaps here again we need to expose ourselves to sangha. The image of the bold, solitary questioner represents one style. The image of inquiring together in relationship, hearing and listening to each other's heart and soul concerns, represents a different style of questioning—what we might call, in inverted commas, typically masculine or typically feminine approaches.

Please excuse that language. I hope you can understand what I'm getting at, though perhaps there are better ways to express it. What I'm really talking about is authenticity—authenticity to my soul, to my soul-making right now. Does this thing I'm setting my sights on, that I feel I have a desire for, is it authentic to my soul right now? And does it bring soul-making, or is something else going on?

Another piece worth mentioning: when we talk about fire—fire is hot—and with Eros as well, and with opening to the current of desire practice, some of what we've been implicitly discussing is the ability to tolerate that much Eros, to tolerate that much desire, and to tolerate that much energy. This involves learning to handle it through how one skillfully responds to it, addresses it, and remains in relationship with it.

This tolerating of intensity is sometimes a necessity—more for some people than others, which I'll explore further as we continue.

But in this soul-making process, in the soul-making path, we need to develop the capacity to tolerate the intensity of eros, of libido, of energy in general at times. To forge soul requires heat. Yes, the ironmonger's forge is a furnace and part of the process is heat. It also involves cooling, doesn't it? You take the heated metal and then you cool it and then you bend it and you put it back in the fire. So involved, part of the mastering of the fire is the timing of the fire. When, when hot, how much heat, what kind of heat—which we'll get into, hopefully a little bit—and when to take it out of the heat. But at times, yes, red hot, white hot flame in the forge.

And so tolerating the capacity, the ability to tolerate intensity at times of energy, of eros, of desire, of libido in general, to forge soul, to create and discover soul and soul-making, to forge the sense of self, of other, object, world, eros that goes with soul-making.

So again, we've talked about this, I've talked quite a lot about this in different retreats, especially recently the Eros Unfettered and the Alchemy of Desire retreat of Hermits and Lovers, and the different things that can help in practice there.

But it's also worth pointing out, I think, that again, personality is a significant factor, as is habit, as is cultural conditioning. So, you know, I've been at parties or dinners or dinner parties, and you can see sometimes certain personalities, good friends actually, have a different relationship with intensity. Putting on a piece of music at a party—there's actually some John Coltrane who I mentioned the other day—and a good friend of mine said after a little while, "Can you put something else on? It's a bit intense." Or when a conversation gets kind of heated, not necessarily arguing, but just kind of full of intellectual passion or brilliance, and some people it's just a bit intense and they'd rather not. It's just not the habit or it's not okay in a certain situation or whatever.

And sometimes that's personality, and sometimes it's habit, and sometimes it's cultural conditioning, as I said. And sometimes we create a habit, or we create conditions that have an effect on the fire. So I mentioned years ago, just a little bit of alcohol—drink a bit of beer or a bit of wine every day. What happens to my fire, my fires? It dulls and dims my fire, it dulls my intensity, dampens all that. It makes soggy that alcohol, that liquid dampens, makes soggy my fire. And one can see that in others. You see the fire, their intensity, and over time you see that go out of their life. They actually become kind of lacking fire because of their daily or regular habit of drinking even just a little bit of alcohol.

And then there's cultural conditioning and cultural inhibitions, depending on the situation or upbringing and all that, that affects how we relate or whether we can tolerate intensity. Because intensity isn't just something to tolerate, so to speak. But if I then have a voice of cultural conditioning saying, "This isn't okay," or "It's not good to be intense," or "It's not good to be intense in a social situation," or "Not good to be intense when you're..." whatever it is. Or "This kind of intensity is okay, that kind of intensity isn't." That's going to put another kind of pressure on the fire that makes it also hard to tolerate. Either we just smother the fire or it gets smothered, or we actually feel a kind of intolerable pressure and we can't tolerate the intensity.

And implicit in all that, what I've just said, is our capacity and ability to tolerate intensity, heat, fire, is also dependent, of course, on the logos that's going on at the moment. So, for example, if it's with an imaginal figure and there's the fire of eros there, then the logos that we have regarding imagination, regarding soul-making, regarding the kind of perceptions that we're calling sensing with soul, the logos we have regarding fire, eros, desire, et cetera—all that helps or hinders my capacity in the moment to tolerate this intensity.

In other words, as I said before, and I think in that talk "Logos in the Garden of Souls" on the Eros Unfettered retreat and other places, a logos, if it's the right logos, it really helps give stability and capacity, and it helps the soul-making. A logos that doesn't—that is suspicious of imagination, or suspicious of eros, or a logos that kind of makes the fire burn, builds a structure of wood, if you like, if we extend the metaphor, builds a structure of wood where it all just burns too quickly—not that helpful for tolerating.

So tolerating depends on logos. My capacity to tolerate intensity depends on the logos operating. And also, of course, on the images operating, the fantasies operating that are in play. So, for example, the self images operating, the images that go back to that party of Coltrane and of that kind of music, and the images also of intensity, the images, if we're talking on a dharma path, of, again, of oneself, of what a seeker is and feels like, what it means to be a seeker. Is a seeker someone with fire? What kind of fire? What's the image? What's the fantasy of that? Again, the fantasy of the self on the path. What's the fantasy of the path? What's the fantasy of the dharma? The fantasy of the tradition and other seekers that we might know. And the fantasy of that lineage and their relationship to all this.

all the fantasy, the image of intensity with respect to talking about ideas, like that's not okay to have that kind of intensity. For what reasons? All this will affect our capacity to tolerate intensity, tolerate heat.

So the logos and the image of all of fire and all of that, what we've said as possibilities there, outlined as possibilities.

Now I should say, with all this, we're talking about fire, and it may well have occurred to you already that fire is an image. We're using it as a metaphor or an image and not as a clear concept. It's not a clear concept if I say, what is fire? I'm not exactly just translating it as desire. But that's okay. It's not a problem. But we could go into it as a concept and have a look at what's involved in fire.

What does fire include? So we've said and we've dwelt a little bit on eros, craving, desire, and differentiating between them. But fire includes that. Passion. Commitment, energetic arousal, intensity of focus, mental arousal, alertness, sensitivity, receptivity, penetratingness. All these, we could say, are included in what fire can mean.

We talk about someone's fire or my fire, your fire on the path or in relation to something. We really mean all this. Eros, craving, desire, the play of all this. Passion, commitment, energetic arousal, intensity of focus. As I said, mental aspects like alertness, sensitivity, receptivity, penetratingness, all that.

We can also say, in terms of what's involved in fire, what are the aspects of fire that we might need to be aware of in mastering the fire? I actually don't want to go into this too much, so I just want to throw some things out relatively briefly for you to reflect on, for you to consider in your awarenesses, in your investigations, experiments, explorations, conversations.

Talk about mastering the fire and use that as a loose metaphor, a loose image. What might be involved for me right now? What can I notice? What can I take care of? What can I perhaps modulate and respond to there? What are the elements involved?

So again, I'm not intending to be rigorous or complete or systematic here, but just to sprinkle some seeds for your process, for your creativity, for your discovery. I'm actually quite reluctant to be systematic here. Again, that reluctance is probably my personality style. Partly because there are, as I've said before, different soul styles. Different souls or different souls even at different stages in their life. The fire burns differently.

It's a different kind of fire burning in that person. And that person, you can't really say it's more or less. It's just a different style of burning. This one rages and it's that colour. And that one's...

So there's different soul styles and soul styles need respecting. It's not for me, not for anyone to say, all fires should look like this. Your fire should look like this.

So as a teacher, what's my responsibility to a student in regards to their fire? And what's your responsibility as a practitioner in regards to your own fire? What is my soul style? What is your soul style, your fire style, or your fire style in relation to this or that aspect? And what actually needs some attention, needs some care, needs some mastery, some active responsiveness, some taking care, some change, some adaptation, some steering.

So again, there's this dialectic, this tightrope is too dramatic an analogy, but with all this.

So for example, emotionality is, we could say, an element or a character, a characteristic of fire. So sometimes it's characteristic of certain people's fire. It's like their style, their fire style, their soul style, is very emotional, and less so with other people's fire. And again, it doesn't mean there's less fire, or it's a fire of less quality.

It's a fire of different quality.

So the question is, for example, here is the passion, and how much emotion is there in that passion? Passion can be very steady, very unremarkable and kind of undramatic looking to the outside eye and also to the inner sense of it. It hasn't got a lot of emotionality in it. And other people or other styles or the same person at a different time—the passion has a lot of emotion in it.

If there's emotionality in the fire, it has a characteristic of fire. Whatever emotionality is in the fire, it needs to be relatively fluid. That means not too rigid or frozen, either in fixed, repetitive patterns. "I always get really upset about this," and it gets locked into something in a way that's actually frozen, rigid, repetitive. This is just samsara. This is just this dukkha cycling around again. It's got a lot of emotion, it's got a lot of fire, but it's just a kind of samsaric prison—only certain emotions around certain things, and I'm just locked into that. Too much, too constrained, too small, too repetitive. The fire is frozen, in a way.

You get this, and this is just a side point, but you get this also with the range of a person's empathic warmth as well, if we talk about heat and fire. Sometimes a person can be very empathic with something where they agree with or understand or are familiar with a certain logos, and they have a certain view of why that person is suffering and that kind of suffering is justified according to a certain logos. The compassion flows, the fire flows, the warmth there, the compassion, the empathy flows very freely.

And when a person is describing a kind of suffering that doesn't quite fit into the remit, into the extent, the circle of the logos that that person has, then this person is suffering maybe just as much as the first person. But the listener has no empathy there because the logos, as I said, functions as a face, as a connecting point, a connecting strand of intimacy between people. Because the suffering that you're talking about, I just can't really understand it. Or I can't, in my worldview, my logos, my dharma view, whatever, it just doesn't make sense. And I can't therefore really empathize much. I can't really extend the warmth of the empathy and the compassion, that kind of tender fire there.

So there needs to be a certain fluidity to the emotionality, to the fire perhaps, to the way it burns. But not too much fluidity so that one is kind of emotionally disturbed and agitated about everything. Everything sets off my fire. I'm just on a hair trigger. Everything disturbs me. Everything agitates me. The fire is not—it's too undisciplined in a way. Too fluid. This little thing I get upset about or on fire about. And that little thing. And then this little thing. It's just flitting. The fire is flitting all over the place in a way that's not really harmonized, not really building anything, not really opening anything at all. Just one agitation after another.

So these elements, you can see again how they're related, how they overlap. Passion needs commitment, and commitment needs passion. We talk about a fire that's steady—that's the commitment element and passion. I feel really passionate about this, and I look at my behavior, and it just doesn't play out in any kind of consistent dedication or devotion or commitment. But a commitment needs some kind of passion. It needs some kind of warmth and fire and ignition, sparkle.

And part of that is the fluidity, if you like, of the fire being neither too great nor too limited. And again, that has to do with the tension—the tension flitting from this thing and that thing. "Oh, that's got my fire now, that's got my fire now." There's a certain amount of harnessing that needs to happen for the fire to really be soul-making. But not too much, too tight, too small. And also of the emotionality.

So we could say the fire needs to sustain, it needs to not burn out or exhaust its fuel.

What does this mean as far as soul-making is concerned? As far as Eros is concerned, the fire must sustain, not burn out and not exhaust its fuel. What does it mean for our path, our paths?

It must burn, fire must burn, our fires must burn in ways that support the sustaining of something else. That is the path, our commitment, the necessary practices, study, preparation, questioning, struggle, hassle, purification, all that. The fire is in the service of sustaining something else. Fire must sustain, in our case soul-making, everything that's involved in that.

Fire itself is not soul-making, just as fire itself is neither helpful nor unhelpful. As I said, it can be dangerous, it can be extremely beneficial. Fire in itself is kind of neither this nor that. So fires in the service of something, we want it to burn in a way that it can actually support and serve, sustaining other aspects.

Because you get, you know, quick-burning fires. Or there's wood, there's kinds of wood that burn very quickly, and there's kinds of wood—and I think hardwoods, you know, they burn much slower. The flame is more steady. What does that have to do with patience, longing, devotion, yearning, Eros, and patience? This is one of the paramitas the Buddha talked about.

There are fires, there are woods or conditions of wood where the fire causes a lot of smoke—more smoke than fire. Or conditions of fuel where there's very little smoke. It's all fire. What might this mean? What might this mean when it comes to our fire and the possibilities of mastering the fire, or just discerning, discernment with regard to the fire, awareness, responsiveness, possible responsiveness?

So we could say, related to a lot of what we just said, discipline is necessary for a holy fire. Discipline is an interesting word. So I mean it in both senses of the word. So we've got this retreat coming up in a couple of months, tending the holy fire. And what do we need for a holy fire? For that metaphor, that image. Discipline is actually an ingredient, as well, perhaps, or some discipline, let's say. Because a lot of these things, there's kind of opposites, complements, paradoxes.

So discipline, I mean it in two senses of the word. The actual word has this—discipline is a teaching. A disciple is a pupil, is someone who studies. So discipline in a holy fire requires learning. I have to study in the broader sense of what that means. I have to develop. And implicit in that is a stance, a poise, an attitude of humility. And that's necessary for a holy fire to burn within me, within my life, within my path, on my path.

And the second kind of meaning of discipline, some kind of steadiness or rigor or actually containment. So it's interesting. If you think about those religions or places or traditions that burn a kind of eternal holy fire—so there's that in synagogues in Judaism, there's that in the Parsi religion, I'll come back to the Parsi attitude to fire, or the Parsi teaching and ritual around fire in a little bit. Also, other places, the Olympic torch, I think under the Arc de Triomphe in Paris as well, where there's eternal fire—that eternal fire is contained.

So in other words, the fuel is brought to the fire in order that it keep going. And it's contained in a small space. And then compare that with a wildfire where the fire finds the fuel. It spreads to find the fuel.

Maybe the soul needs both. The soul needs us, needs a fire that's contained, and it also needs to spread. The soul-making dynamic, as I said, spreads. The vortex of Eros, Psyche, Logos spreads in different ways, into different domains. It's breaking the vessels. There's a wildfire.

So some discipline and some, whatever the opposite of discipline is, some wildness—I'll come back to that too. Perhaps the soul needs both, but discipline for now, let's dwell on that one, in both senses of a willingness to learn, an attitude, a poise, a relationship of learning, studying, developing, humility, and of, let's say, the rigor of containment that allows steadiness.

Our word, talking about containment now, our word focus actually comes from a Latin word which means hearth or fireplace. And so, you know, in this word focus, as in a hearth or a fireplace, it was where people gathered before there was electricity and before there was central heating and all that.

The family, the village or whatever, would gather around the hearth, the fireplace. That would be the focus—the focus of social life, the focus of spiritual life sometimes. This word focus has everything to do with fires burning, with mastery of fire. A gathering of energies. Like a magnifying glass that focuses the rays of light and energy intensely enough that something can actually ignite.

So listen to this with your soul. All of this is what we might call poetic metaphor. How will it translate? How might it translate? What might it mean for you? What might it give you to consider? There's something that needs, or that involves, a kind of gathering of energies, a kind of focusing in the way fires sometimes need to burn.

And there's also—back to this word focus and its meaning in Latin of hearth or fireplace—the fact that when a fire is burning in our soul, it brings to it, it gathers to it other qualities. Other beings gather. Beings gather around fire, the focus, the hearth, the fireplace. And soul—part of the alchemy of the fire in the soul is that it draws to it other aspects of soul. Images, imaginal figures are drawn to that fire. The divine is drawn to the soul's fire.

Actually, staying with this just a little longer, this business about focus and gathering energies: In the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, many of you will know, in the English translations, often translated as—for example, a monk, a meditator dwells or abides, looking at or regarding or contemplating the body in the body, the feelings in the feelings, etc., ardent, alert and careful. And "ardent" is a very common translation. It directly translates the Pali word ātāpī, which itself translates as heat, as the heat from the sun, ātāpī, or the fire or burning of zeal. Again, you have—actually also in Latin, ardere, to burn.

So there's something about the Buddha's... we're talking about gathering the energies in a certain way, gathering the focus—mindful, sampajāno, fully alert, knowing what's happening, and satimā, careful, with mindful care, and ardent, with the fire gathered, focused, or with one's fire burning in relation to this, with zeal.

Of course, in that more Theravādan style of the Pali Canon, the combination of that description—mindful focus, ardent, alert, careful—repeats in the refrain throughout the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. Implicit in that combination, with the sampajāno clearly comprehending what's happening right now and carefulness with the ardency, with the burning zeal, the fire—implicit in that combination is a style of burning that is very focused, contained, we might even say restrained. The fire is restrained.

This is not a wild and ecstatic fire burning, as it might be in other traditions—say tantric traditions, or some tantric traditions, or Dionysian kinds of things. So there's fire there, it's a certain—if you like—image of the way a fire burns. It's much more contained, much more steady, but there's fire.

We could also point out that fire needs—I don't know what to call it—intelligence, perhaps. So sometimes what happens is we get into, as human beings, a kind of black and white thinking with regard to something. And that black and white thinking is coupled with and fueled by a certain reification and a certain clinging to some self-view. So that something that sounds perhaps really good is actually being fed by a kind of thinking that's not so fully explored or perhaps lacking a certain kind of intelligence.

So even like: "I must do a year retreat so I can realize emptiness. And then"—you know, implicitly, why?—"because then my problems will go away." And maybe even underneath that, if you ask why: "Well, maybe I'll be a better person then," or again, "I have proved my self-worth," measurement, etc. Again, we have this: Is it authentic? Is it authentic? Is it soul-making? But also, what's constructing a kind of black and white thinking and involving, pulling in a kind of reification, a self-view there, perhaps in a way that the fuel for that fire is going to make that fire burn not in a way that's really helpful.

Actually, if we stay again with this—go back to this containment analogy—then sometimes a person is kind of enamored with fieriness, or there's a kind of—to use words we used on a previous retreat—immature enchantment with fire or with passion. And so the fire tends to get itself always reified. We're talking about fire now; it's an image. And the relation with that image, when it's imaginal, can be loose and responsive and poetic, and not so clung to in a way that's unhelpful, not so with the tightness of craving and grasping.

But sometimes you see in a person's style some kind of tendency to almost always reify and concretize—to be enamored of passion and then to reify and concretize what fire is going to look like and to make it visible. It always needs to manifest, and perhaps again in a very sort of—through a very sort of black and white thinking: "My passion for this, my fire with regard to this manifests in this kind of total action," a very extreme kind of implementation or playing out or expression of something or choice.

I drop everything and I do that.

And of course sometimes that's part of a freedom—it's exactly the right thing to do, and there's some beauty in that, some radicality in the best sense. But partly it's more that there's this immature enchantment with fire, as I said, and with that, a rigid belief in what it looks like, a too-tight tendency and impulse to always concretize, wrapped up with this black and white thinking. If there's fire, fire is good, and passion is good, and if there isn't, I do this, and it's very radical and black and white.

Is it really necessary that there's that kind of black and white thinking or concretization, this total concretization of something? Is the image we have of fire and passion being reified and clung to in ways that are perhaps not that helpful and not necessarily that soul-making? Do they end up yielding interactions in the world or situations that are not soul-making because they're built, again, on some kind of reification, some kind of black and white thinking and attachment to self-view and attachment to a certain idea of fire and passion?

What would happen instead if the fire and the passion itself were allowed to become imaginal—properly imaginal, authentically imaginal, genuinely imaginal? This means lingering with the very sense of fire and the perception and the ideation of fire and passion, sensing its beauty, sensing its unfathomability, its dimensionality, its beyondnesses, its divinity. And in that, discerning what is the actual duty that's wrapped up in the beauty of this fire for me, of this sense of passion for me—not just plugging in an automatic, immature enchantment, black and white thinking, reification, solid self-view.

Then, if we can approach it more imaginatively, more maturely, our enchantment becomes mature enchantment, and we can have the beauty and the dimensionality of that imaginal fire. We can have action that is not burdened or injected with reification and identification in ways that make it problematic, that issue in something problematic or meet something problematic later on in the world.

In a way, we could say that's also a kind of containment—not just jumping into this immediate translation into immediate black and white interpretation, concretization of duty. The fire needs a little containment. Let's stare into that fire a little bit. Let's feel that fire. Let's meditate on that fire. Let it become imaginal and see what comes from that.

So sometimes we could say fire needs a bit more containment, or containment of a different kind, and sometimes it needs less containment. These are seeds for you to reflect on, to consider, to talk with each other about, to inquire into, to experiment with, to become aware of in practice.

We can talk about fire in different dimensions of our being. To feel fire and to allow the fire and to respond to the fire in or of the mind—the fire of attention, the fire of the intellect and the brilliance of that, the fire in thought, in conception. Or the fire of the heart. Does it need to be either in the mind or the heart? Or can we have both together? Why not?

The fire, as we said, includes empathy as a kind of fire, a kind of warmth—the fire of the heart's passion, the heart's being moved, the heart's longing. And fire in the body, so to speak. And then even in different parts or dimensions of the body: what does it mean, fire in the whole body? What's fire in the belly? What's fire in the loins? These are all directions or kinds of fire or elements of fire that we can explore.

I mentioned that the Parsi religion of ancient Persia actually came out of the Zoroastrian religion, or rather is the continuation of Zoroastrian religion. It was based in Persia many centuries ago. In that religion, Catherine told me about this, and I did a little research on it, they burn—they keep burning a holy fire, an eternal fire, as part of their ritual.

But to make a new fire and to consecrate a new fire and a new fire temple takes more than two and a half years. It's not just that you light a fire and then decide that it's holy. Again, listen with your soul. Listen to what it means for you and for us with regard to soul-making, with regard to passion, with regard to eros, with regard to path, with regard to ritual—all of that, both outer and inner.

So it's a big deal to consecrate a new fire, to consecrate a new fire temple. There are sixteen different kinds of fire that need to be brought and gathered together to consecrate a new fire. Each of those individual fires needs to be individually consecrated. This newly consecrated holy fire in the new temple needs to be ignited from sixteen different kinds of fire, each individually consecrated, brought together. One by one, they contribute to this newly consecrated fire.

Those sixteen—I'll read them to you if I can find them—are the fire used by a dyer, meaning someone who dyes wool or cloth or garments or material, in a pot, in a cauldron. The fire from a dyer. The fire from the house of a king or a ruler.

There's two. This is not in any particular order, by the way. The fire from a potter, someone who makes pottery with clay. The fire from a brickmaker.

How might each of these kinds of fires function as little images or imaginal seeds that might get translated and planted in the soul? This kind of fire, that kind of fire in the soul. I'll leave you with that if it's interesting to you or if you're attracted to it.

The fire from a potter, the fire from a brickmaker. They do different things in the culture, don't they? Someone who dyes cloth or wool or whatever. Someone who rules. Someone who makes pots and dishes and jugs. Someone who makes the bricks that build houses and buildings and temples.

The fire from an ascetic. The fire from a goldsmith—the fire that burns what is precious and makes of it beautiful ornaments and decorations, beautiful things of great value. The fire from a mint, the fire that burns metal to make coins. The fire from an ironsmith—the fire that burns iron, heats iron in the same way to make different tools, different implements. The fire from an armourer, making very particular kinds of implements: shields and swords.

The fire from a baker, from the baker's oven—fire that makes the goodness of bread, the nourishment that comes from turning the earth and the wheat and the rye or spelt or whatever grains from the earth, helping that to become nourishment for us, wholesome nourishment. The fire from a brewer, someone who brews alcohol. That's interesting too, isn't it, if we connect that with Dionysus.

The fire from a soldier. Again, I've talked about nobility and the duty of the warrior image, the soldier—everything that goes into being a soldier in the best sense of the word, or at least the imaginal soldier. The fire from any house in the community—just the kind of ordinary hearth.

Those are fourteen so far. Then two fires that come not from humans, or not from living humans at least. One is the fire from the burning of a corpse, fire from the cremation pyre. And lastly, fire from lightning, from clouds.

So the first fourteen are all fires from different kinds of human and social interactions. This is one of the ways that, socially at least, we can say that the Zoroastrian community, in their sacredness, gathered together, pooled together the social cohesion, involved everyone.

But to me, it's more than that. Again, translating for us: it's not just me and my fire, but our eros, our fire, our soul-making ignites from others, with others, from the sangha, in the sangha, as we've pointed out.

But then these last two fires—the cremation fire is the fire from the dead, so there's a connection with the ancestors, fire from the beyond of this world, the beyond of human beings. Fire from the dead, the connection with death, and soul has a connection with death.

And then the fire from lightning—the fire from the heavens, from the sky, again another natural or non-human dimension.

So I offer that as something that perhaps for some of you will stimulate a kind of further reflection, thinking, poetic imagining into fire and kinds of fire—what might be involved and what might be necessary, what makes a fire soul-making, what allows and supports a fire to be soul-making.

A couple of things just to end. Having said all this and played a little with this metaphor of mastering the fire in the context of really saying: if our fire is not mastered, if it either just goes out or if it burns in a totally uncontrolled way, then there is dukkha. There are different ways that fire can create dukkha in the soul-making process, in the erotic-imaginal process, if we're not careful with it, if we're not attending to it, if there isn't enough mastery of the fire.

But in a way, I can't help but want to qualify all that and contextualize it by saying a couple more things. One is that there has to be, at least in the way that I would conceive of the whole soul-making process and dynamic, a realization that we will never completely master soul's fire or fires.

So it's a good metaphor, it's a lovely image, an alchemical image, and it's really important in this consideration of how we actually have this vehicle of soul-making work well for us—deliver what it can, open what it can open, issue where it can issue. Mastering the fire is part of that.

But I have to say, again, complementing or in dialectical tension with what I've said: I don't think we will ever completely master soul's fires. And I'd say we wouldn't want to. The soul wouldn't want to master its own fires, if you like. The soul will always, as I've said, be and have more than me somehow, more than my sense of ego.

So again, to borrow that phrase from Jesus—sorry if I'm misquoting it—no one knows where the Holy Spirit bloweth. And he's making an analogy with the atmospheric wind of the earth. No one knows where that bloweth. It comes, it goes, it changes directions. We can't predict it. We receive it, we're pushed and pulled by it. We can do something with that push and pull, as sailors do, but no one really knows, and you can't predict where it bloweth—where the spirit bloweth, where the Holy Spirit bloweth.

And the soul's fire, like the Holy Spirit—and fire is also an image for Holy Spirit in many traditions—is not going to be completely predictable or completely controllable. I cannot ever completely arrive at final mastery of my soul's fire, and nor would I actually ever want to. There's the beauty of that beyondness, of something bigger than me, of the unpredictability of it as well.

So yes, at times it blows out of my control, or I don't quite know where it's blowing or why. At times it seems to blow out, and then at times it comes back. It re-emerges from the embers, from what seemed like the ashes. It doesn't seem to be always directed by me. From some perspective, it seems never to be directed by me. It's given to me by soul, as I said, and it's my job to harness it, to respond to it, to have some mastery in relationship to it.

We talked about, on previous retreats, the potential realization somewhere on the trajectory of soul-making that my desire, my eros, my will even, is actually rooted in or emanating from the divine eros, the divine desire, the divine will. This fire is not even my fire. Now that's a genuine—and I'd also say inevitable—soul-making perception that arises inevitably at a certain point, with a certain maturing of the whole soul-making movement. It arises at times, in and out, and then it's something that, with practice, we can deliberately tap into, that perspective.

I'm talking here about it needing to be an embodied, sensitive way of looking, a perspective. It's not just a kind of attractive idea—and actually a kind of convenient one, because then it's like, "Oh, any desire I have is good because it's God's desire, it's divine"—that kind of very immature, ego-serving appropriation of a perspective.

But there's this humility, and I would say beauty, mystery, and magnificence in realizing that yes, I can reflect on and practice and attend to mastering the fire and my capacity and my ability with that, and tolerating, and everything that we've talked about and more. But I will never completely master the fire. There's always something—soul will always be bigger. Soul will always be greater. Soul will always be more powerful, in my book.

And on that note, related to that, again in the context—we've talked about how we can take care and attend and respond in imaginal practice, in sensing the soul, in the whole soul-making path, so that it doesn't create more dukkha or lock dukkha into place or exacerbate it. And so this is really important, this business about fire and exploring that metaphor and seeing what it means in my life, on my path, in my practices. But there's a sense where it's never going to be under my thumb completely. And thank God for that.

Donald Winnicott, the psychiatrist D.W. Winnicott, wrote somewhere, "We are poor indeed if we are only sane." Here's a man who devoted his life to psychiatry, to the support of sanity, if you will. And he wrote, "We are poor indeed if we are only sane."

There's always going to be some part where the fire rages out of control, some thread, some times. There's always going to be something Dionysian, some craziness, some insanity, some holy madness. I hope it's holy and not unholy. We are poor indeed if we are only sane. We could also say we are poor indeed if we are only safe—just to play a little bit with what he said.

So if the fire is always under my thumb, if I've always mastered it, if it's always under my control, if it's always just contained just so, then I'm always sane, I'm always safe, I have a feeling of always being safe. But maybe I'm not then receiving the full grace and gift and impetus and direction of soul and soul's desires, designs, and intentions for me.

CHAPTER 120

Dukkha and Soul-making (Part 5)

Rob Burbea · 56 min

In this fifth part of his exploration of dukkha and soul-making, Rob Burbea examines how imaginal practices can serve as powerful tools for transforming suffering. Rather than avoiding dukkha, he demonstrates how intimate engagement with difficulty—through the emotional and energy body—can allow imaginal images to arise that transform our relationship to pain and challenge.

Burbea presents the imaginal approach as one option among many for working with dukkha, alongside approaches that prioritize the nervous system, personal history, or relational dynamics. He emphasizes that these factors are mutually dependently arisen rather than causally primary. Through detailed examples, including work with romantic attachment and disturbing impulses, he shows how sensing with soul can reveal imaginal images buried within pathological patterns.

The talk explores how imaginal perception can regulate the nervous system and harmonize emotions not through direct intervention, but through the emergence of soul-making images that provide beauty, meaning, and dimensionality to difficult situations. Burbea suggests that image itself may be primary—that healing often involves revealing the imaginal seed buried within contracted patterns of craving and fixation. This approach maintains challenge and duty while transforming the quality of engagement from contracted suffering to soul-making participation in the mundus imaginalis.

So we've spent some time now drawing attention to some of the elements of soul-making practice around which we need to take care, to which we need to give some consideration, or some development if we want to ensure as much as possible that these kinds of practices and this kind of path of soul-making doesn't actually create more dukkha in different ways or bring its own whole set and level of problems.

Now I would like to turn that around and talk a little bit about how sensing the soul and imaginal practices can relieve dukkha, free us from dukkha, bring some kind of liberation in regard to some dukkha that we are experiencing or some situation of dukkha, some kind of healing, some kind of resolution or clarity or empowerment.

If you've been listening to the imaginal talks from when we first started, Theatre of Selves, and maybe even before that, and the whole trajectory there in different retreats, you'll have heard many examples of situations of dukkha, or sense of some kind of dukkha, some kind of pain, suffering, imprisonment, confusion, in all the different domains of one's being. Then practicing not an avoidance of that dukkha, not turning away from it, but rather a being with it, an intimacy with the dukkha, a holding of the pain in the emotional body, in the energy body, aware of the situation.

And then that being with the dukkha, with care, and with the body, and with the sensitivity, out of that an image arose, an imaginal image, and that transformed the whole sense of the situation, the whole sense of the dukkha, bringing some relief, some ease, some freedom, some dissolving of the dukkha—not often completely. So it's a slightly different approach here. What it leaves is not a blandly peaceful situation. But the being with the dukkha, the going into it, holding it, relating to it in a certain way, allows sometimes in the kind of alchemy there an image to arise that becomes imaginal. And that then transforms and with it brings an alchemy that transforms the dukkha, that brings some kind of freedom from dukkha. That's often quite remarkable and beautiful.

I want to talk about that a little bit. As I said, if you've been listening, you'll have heard many instances, and I hope that also if you're listening, you will have recognized this in your own experience by now. Many, hopefully, situations of dukkha for yourself that have been transformed, liberated, opened up, given another dimension, freed in some regard through the emergence of the imaginal—in a way that wasn't contrived, wasn't coming along and deciding, what can I imagine to make myself feel better here, and moving away and avoiding the dukkha, but by being intimate with the dukkha and the imaginal arising out of that.

So I want to draw attention to this—it should already be obvious for anyone listening at this point, but just say a little bit more about it—as one of the options that we have as practitioners, one of the ways of approaching dukkha, and also one of the options we have of conceiving of what is going on in regard to imaginal practice, in regard to dukkha, in regard to pathology. One option among others, not better, not worse, just another option, another angle in with regard to dukkha and freeing from dukkha and also with regard to the whole kind of edifice of conceptions around dukkha and freedom from dukkha and soul and all of that.

As I said, you will have heard many examples, stories I've related of myself or of someone else I've been working with or who's shared with me something and said it's okay to share it. And hopefully you'll have seen this for yourself. There's some kind of emotional difficulty or unsettledness where the mind won't settle down, some kind of difficulty in the field of relationships that one is in or the work or social situation one is in. Any of that—emotions, nervous system, mind, relational, occupational, whatever it is, or combination of those kinds of dukkha.

And one option is, as I said, being with that dukkha with the emotional body, with the energy body, and caring for it in the ways that we've described before. Out of that kind of crucible of the alchemical vessel, an imaginal image arises, or we sense the situation with soul. We could say it may not be that the image is—it might be that the situation itself becomes image, or I become image, and I look just the same in the image as I do now. It doesn't appear that different than what we might call material consensual reality, or something might be very different. But some kind of sensing with soul emerges out of the crucible, out of the alchemical vessel and heat of the difficulty because of the way we're being intimate with it and connecting with it, with the energy body, with the emotional body.

And that imaginal perception, that sensing with soul, does something to the energy body. What was a feeling of agitation and disharmony and unsettledness and jangliness in the energy body that went with the dukkha actually now becomes a sense in the energy body, palpable and immediate, of harmony. Something—to use a certain language—the nervous system has been regulated through the emergence of the image, through the emergence of the imaginal, through the sensing with soul. The nervous system has been regulated. Something has been soothed, something has been healed.

But it's not so much through addressing the nervous system directly. Not so much in this case, that trajectory I've just described, through addressing the energy body and playing with the samatha or ways of breathing or imagining the energy body. Not so much through thinking about one's personal family history or wounding or whatever it is. So there's just one option among other kinds of angles of approach to dukkha.

But for this to work, what arises has to be imaginal, has to be soul-making. And remember, that's for me now. In other words, as we said, the imaginal is only for a person now, for me now. What was imaginal for me yesterday may not be imaginal, or a year ago may not be imaginal for me now. And so it has to be alive as image for me now. And images transform.

So for example, as I shared the other day, there was that Lonely Wanderer image. It might be that months ago or years ago, that image or the solitary soldier, that image might have done its alchemical healing work because it was alive for me as image as it was, and transformed the dukkha and relieved the dukkha. But it might be that today, some weeks later, some years later, that image has transformed. And whether the image as it used to be would still function for healing or whether it needs the new one, there's not a formula for this. We can't predict it, but we actually feel when something is imaginal in the moment.

So it has to be imaginal for me now, where something comes into my mind with a kind of spark, a poetic spark, an imaginal spark, and something serves to help me see or sense the situation with soul.

Often what arises as image may borrow from historical persons or actual people in my life, but when they function as imaginal figures, my imaginal sense of them need not conform to historical reality.

I remember precisely this kind of situation where the mind wouldn't settle, the nervous system felt jangly with agitation related to what seemed a difficult political work situation. I was uncertain how to navigate the relationships involved. A book by Michel Foucault had arrived in the post, and I glanced at the small biography on the back. That came into my mind—this image of him—and he functioned as an imaginal spark for me.

In my image of him, I had assumed several things about his character. Noticing he died quite young, I imagined perhaps he died of this or that, perhaps he was this kind of personality. That image triggered something else, which triggered something else, and the whole situation—these upcoming work meetings—became imaginal for me in a way that immediately released tremendous energy. There was harmonization in the energy body, settling of the nervous system, regulation and relief.

Later, curious, I researched Michel Foucault online and discovered that what had functioned as such a helpful imaginal image—what had made him so beneficial for me—wasn't actually historically accurate. But it doesn't matter. When historical figures, famous people, or even friends become imaginal images for us, correspondence with so-called historical reality is irrelevant.

Something happens: dukkha is relieved, the nervous system regulates, emotions find healing, and perception of a difficult situation transforms—as does perception of self. This doesn't mean the situation is transformed into something no longer difficult, rendered bland and without challenge. The situation may retain a calling, for this is part of the duty of image.

We're not talking about "no problem, no self, no issue here." With image, the situation might still be challenging, but the self has become imaginable. The situation has become imaginable. With this comes duty—the soul issues duty as part of the process. This may still be challenging, still charged with emotion and energy.

We're not discussing mere relief or a bleeding out of life from the situation. It remains charged, but the emotions are harmonized—harmonized with the imaginal self and the imaginal sense of the situation. With the duty that may emerge through image comes clarity about direction, about one's part, bringing poise, stance, resolve, empowerment.

The whole thing becomes soul-making. It feels soul-making. This doesn't mean without challenge or even without difficult emotion, but everything that characterizes soul-making is present: beauty, duty, meaningfulness.

Consider the examples I've used throughout these talks—the solitary wanderer and the solitary soldier warrior. In a certain situation of suffering, a certain difficulty, when imaginal perception opens and we sense with soul that whole social constellation, dukkha transforms. Something shifts, though some dukkha may remain.

There may still be a certain loneliness—the loneliness of that solitary wanderer. It remains, but large portions of dukkha have departed. Similarly, a certain kind of battling may remain in whatever situation. One stands up for what one believes needs defending, resists what one's soul knows must be resisted. One speaks out, perhaps putting life or career on the line.

Much transforms, much dukkha drains from the situation, discombobulation clarifies and aligns, poise emerges—yet still certain dukkha remains. For these examples: the dukkha of the solitary wanderer, the dukkha of the solitary warrior.

But this dukkha, now seen in imaginal opening, is given place. It has rooting, grounding in the imaginal, in the mundus imaginalis. It has rooting in soul, in divinity. This dukkha carries all the nobility, beauty, and meaningfulness given by finding its place—by taking its place, by having its rooting and grounding in soul recognized.

So dukkha remains, but with beauty. There can still be purpose, nobility of different kinds, love. That solitary wanderer carries much love, receives much love. One doesn't abandon duty—may even be given duty through relationship with the imaginal, as we've touched upon repeatedly.

The whole thing becomes imbued with meaningfulness, set in a kind of fluid, light structure of meaning. Everything opens to dimensionality. Life and dukkha, whatever situation we inhabit, oneself—all begin to be sensed with soul, seen as image.

As we've elaborated in this series' first talk, this creates infinite echoing, infinite mirroring of image and life, self and image—my story and endeavors in the world dancing with this imaginal figure, whatever it may be.

And that sense and the mystery of that infinite echoing and mirroring comes as a blessing. It adds a texture of profound and sweet blessing, although some kind of strand of what we could call dukkha remains through this whole thing. But because of that, the larger part of the dukkha is attenuated, released, freed.

So in terms of part of what I want to do—as I said, situate the soul-making path alongside and in context with other paths and approaches, particularly around approaches to dukkha—one could, for example, approach dukkha with a sort of regard for the nervous system as primary. Something has happened—a situation ongoing, an event, whatever—and it's jolted or programmed, if you like, the nervous system to get stuck in certain unhelpful patterns. It can be very difficult. And so one can approach the dukkha that then arises at any time with a conception that places the nervous system as primary care, and also an approach that heads straight for the nervous system. And that's great and fine.

Or one can regard one's history with the family, or everyone's personal psychological history, and regard that as primary. Obviously related to the nervous system—not completely the same, but overlapping. And again, take that as the primary approach. This dukkha now—how does it mirror what happened to me when I was a child, the situation I found myself in? Go back to that and heal that, so to speak. Open that up, address that first, and then allow the current situation to heal from that. Wonderful, too.

Or one can turn one's attention and place one's conceptual primacy on the current actual relations and what they need, how they need to be addressed, what is skillful relationship here, what's actually going on in the room. And all kinds of other possibilities too.

But these are all, as I said, possible conceptual frameworks and possible practical approaches in terms of what they approach first, primarily, and what is given conceptual primacy of place in their structure.

But there is also the possibility to approach via the imaginal first, via sensing with soul. That becomes the leaning of the approach. At times—not always, but one approach among other options—would be to look for, if you like, the imaginal. Where is the imaginal here? What needs to emerge? Is it something that needs to be revealed here, some image or some way of sensing the soul that can emerge? And that can be, if you like, the primary leaning of the practical approach. And we can create or discover a conceptual framework that gives the soul in our sense of the word, or the imaginal in our sense of the word, conceptual primacy. In other words, we regard that as the foundational factor, if you like.

Actually, one can see that all these are tools and all these are aspects of a kind of human situation of dukkha that are mutually dependently arising. In other words, what's happening in the nervous system—whether it's regulated or not, what kind of patterns gain control at any time in the nervous system—how we see a social situation or work situation that's difficult, the actual situation we're in and how we perceive it, what images of self are operating in the plural way (images), and whether they're imaginal or not, the relative activation of the erotic-imaginal—in other words, the energy body sense—all of these are actually mutually dependently arising.

As I said, what is the dominant and dominating state of the nervous system depends on how I'm paying attention to the energy body, and vice versa. And my perception of this social situation, this difficult work situation or whatever it is, depends on the energy body and the state of the nervous system. And my perception of the situation that I'm in also depends on whether that's imaginal or not. In other words, I can have an imaginal perception of that, and how I'm paying attention to the energy body, and what is the sense in the energy body. All these factors are mutually dependently arising.

And sometimes what happens for us as human beings is we forget that. In fact, we forget it a lot. And we want to, or we find ourselves clinging to some conceptual framework—even if we don't think we are—that forgets about the mutual dependent arising of these things. So it wants to take one of these things, for example the nervous system, for example the family history, or whatever, and place it as primary and focus on that as the most important thing and the most foundational thing. Forgetting that how I see my history actually depends on all kinds of things in the present moment, like what's happening in the energy body, like what's happening in the nervous system, like what kind of images are operating, how authentically imaginal they are, like what social situation I'm in in the present also influences my perception of the past.

So all of these—we can paint arrows of causation, or we should realize that the arrows of causation move among every node there and others, and in all directions. Mutual dependent arising between all of that.

So, as I said, I really just want to highlight the imaginal and sensing the soul as one option among others, possibly among many others, including many Dharma approaches. And I've also given examples of how we can be in a situation with another person, and perhaps we're experiencing dukkha of some kind, and this is our friend or teacher or something, and something is communicated by that person from us, or by us to that person, and the one who is suffering is able to see imaginatively, to sense with soul. Something has been communicated, either because the other has an image alive for them, or feels something in the present moment of image, or sees the suffering that we are in imaginally, and they communicate it to us.

So the imaginal is communicated in the field. We catch that spark, something of the imaginal perception, something of the sensing of the soul is ignited in us through what is being given to us by another.

I described that situation of Skyping with Catherine when I was struggling with something that was really important to me. She saw me imaginatively, communicated that to me, and that helped me see the whole situation—the work itself, what would happen to it, myself in relation to the work. I was able to see that as image, to sense it with soul, and the dukkha went out of the situation. The beauty came in. The soul-making expanded the whole thing, and it became clearer what to do, what my poise and relationship and stance and duty was in relation to it all.

Or the story I shared of the words I heard, the image that was vaguely emerging for me as she was telling me something from her history that was very difficult—something that had happened some decades before. I voiced the poetic phrase or image of the sacred prostitute. Something was communicated, picked up by me, communicated to her, and then she was able to perceive that whole history and herself and the entire trajectory of her life in this imaginally filled out way. It became rich with image. It was transformed.

The whole situation was given its mirroring, its echoing in the Mundus Imaginalis. The situation was seen as a contracted echoing—what happened in the history was seen as a contracted echoing, a contracted, distorted mirroring of an image, of something in the imaginal realm.

As a teacher, I have completely lost count of how often this happens—working with someone and sensing an image as potential, glimpsing something, or sometimes even sensing what wants to happen in the energy body of the other, or seeing the image of their energy body. All kinds of things, very subtle and not really a big deal. In communicating that, the other person taps into an image and, for instance, may open up to a different sense of themselves because they're sensing themselves with soul—a different sense of their body, a different sense of empowerment, perhaps a kind of empowerment that's really not familiar to them.

Sometimes when working with people, I'm a little unsure. On one side, there is this real potential to communicate images in a field so that another picks up on them and their sensing soul is ignited. On the other hand, I sometimes wonder how much should

I say, what the timing of that is. One wonders, does it matter where the image arises first in a field? There will be many examples where the image arises just in them, and I am simply a witness or holding space.

All this can happen in a field, and it can also happen alone, in one's practice, in solitude.

I pointed out, I think it was in Eros Unfettered, that there might be times or situations where there's a desire to be with a particular person romantically, sexually, and one feels stuck because this other person—that's not what they want in the relationship with us. There's a very clear boundary, it's not possible, or something. One finds oneself locked into a kind of grasping and clinging and stuck with the dukkha of that craving in relation to this person. There is some eros, but there's also a lot of craving mixed up with it, and the whole thing is painful. If we're in some kind of relationship with them—perhaps we're friends—that relationship also becomes quite difficult because of this stuck clinging, this grasping.

Rather than only the options of letting go, putting it down, cooling off, finding what you want somewhere else, or looking at what one's dragging in that's inappropriate and doesn't belong here and needs a different kind of healing—as well as all those options and many more—there is the option of letting that person become image even more, become imaginal even more.

Dwelling with them, with the image of them meditatively, tuning in to all these elements of the imaginal we described in the first talk of this series, letting that amplify, letting that fill out, letting it flesh out and gain that richness and dimensionality. Allowing oneself, encouraging oneself even, to dwell meditatively, mindfully, sensitively, exploringly with the image of this person and tuning to them as image, as potentially soul-making image—then what happens is we start picking up on some or other imaginal aspects or elements of that whole imaginal constellation.

There's this ignition as we notice a certain aspect, the ignition of that particular aspect, the illumination of it as imaginal image, and then the whole constellation. One of the elements of that imaginal constellation will be the very sense of imaginal middle way, the very sense of theater, the very sense of not quite real, not quite not real. Neither category seems to apply. This is one of the things that will make all the difference.

Instead of "I need to manifest a concrete romantic or sexual or whatever kind of relationship with this person," the whole thing—the very sense of them—is expanded, altered, enriched, deepened, widened. It's allowed to become more imaginal, allowed to become more authentically imaginal than it perhaps wanted to be in the first place.

There's a sense we're not mistaking—we're seeing image as image, not mistaking potential image for concrete reality or something that needs to be concretized. That's one of the aspects and elements of the imaginal constellation that we actually encourage and support to become more obvious to us, more palpable to us, so we don't make that mistake between insisting on material fact and actually recognizing what is image, what is the Mundus Imaginalis, what is theophany.

In the whole soul-making dynamic that's supported by that kind of sensitive tuning, in the whole soul-making dynamic that opens up there, we create and discover the more that pothos wants. Remember how we described the whole dynamic that eros pushes on, because eros wants more connection, more contact, more penetration, more intimacy, more touch, whatever. That's the pothos in the eros—it always wants more. If we don't allow things to open up on the dimensions of the imaginal, we pursue that more in concrete reality.

Or we find ourselves compelled, so to speak, to shut everything down—to shut the eros down, return to simply letting go or whatever path of renunciation we might follow. There is a third option, if you will: the option of erotic imaginative opening that unfolds the soul-making dynamic and hence enables us to sense with soul.

In this possibility, the more that the Eros seeks is created and discovered within that soul-making dynamic—within the mutual fertilization of Eros, Psyche, and Logos, their widening, deepening, complication. I have then more intimacy, more faces and aspects of the Beloved with which to become intimate. Different light shines through—deeper, wider, more varied. I have all kinds of intimacy available in those dimensions. With all this comes meaningfulness, beauty, divinity as part of the dimensionality.

I am actually receiving all of this as grace through allowing the image to expand rather than shutting it down—or rather than locking onto it and demanding it manifest concretely, physically. In receiving this abundance, all the beauty and gift of it, and in recognizing the imaginal middle as one of the elements in this constellation, the clinging is reduced. The grasping, the fixation diminishes. The pressure of the situation lessens, including the pressure I am placing on this person in whatever our actual relationship might be.

There is less pressure in my psyche because there is more—because the soul-making dynamic's opening has created more vistas, more facets and dimensions of the beloved, of myself, of the eros itself. Larger, deeper, there is more space, and therefore less pressure. With this relaxing of grasping and pressure, not only might that person feel less pressured by my insistence on some particular material form of relationship, but my own dukkha is eased through this relaxation of clinging and pressure.

This represents a truly important possibility. Let me emphasize three aspects of it.

First, this transformation is not necessarily easy to accomplish. It might require considerable practice and skill to be able to effect such a shift. But it really is possible—I cannot stress this enough. It's almost as if both they and we become larger through the soul-making expansion. The whole contraction of craving is released, and everything emerges with a different sense entirely. It would be remiss of me not to stand by this possibility and point it out clearly. Yet I must also acknowledge that it may prove quite difficult, involving considerable maturity of practice and development of skill in imaginal practice and with the erotic imaginal.

Second, in working this way with a person who might actually be present in our life in some form—though perhaps not in the kind of relationship we think we want or that our craving desires—this practice doesn't mean turning away from dukkha. Nor does it mean turning away from actual relationship, avoiding this person, or neglecting to care for any potential difficulties in our relating. We must still address and approach the actual relationship and what it needs, because when there's significant clinging and one person wants something the other cannot provide, this often creates considerable difficulty in the actual relating. That too requires attention.

The inner work, from this angle of possibility, may involve opening up the whole imaginal perception, opening up the sensing with soul of other, of self, of the eros itself. All of this is possible, but not at the expense of caring for the actual relationship. What actually unfolds—whether you end up in a romantic or sexual relationship with this person or not—becomes much less important because you have received something else that was, in essence, what your soul was seeking.

I could offer countless examples of instances where something truly disturbing was occurring—a memory, or someone deeply troubled by recognizing their impulses in certain situations or relationships, or difficult events or circumstances, or self-images that were genuinely disturbing, painful, contracted. So many instances of different kinds of suffering, whether in relation to impulses one observes in oneself, memories, situations, events past and present or potentially future, self-constructs and images that cause real pain—not imaginal constructs, but seemingly solid, terrible realities.

Whatever the dukkha, it can appear almost irredeemable, terrible—something that shouldn't even see the light of day, let alone be shared with another. Shameful, pathological, strange. I'm not sharing some specific examples now, partly because the immediate effect might be disturbing, and partly because I've already offered many illustrations throughout these talks.

But what can happen—what is truly possible, and what I have witnessed repeatedly—is that this thing which seemed so strange, so terribly difficult, pathological, hopeless, can through soul-making practice become image. The whole situation can be seen with soul, beginning with the dukkha itself. Perhaps the sense of that dukkha, or the very thing that was dukkha, comes to be perceived imaginally. In this transformation—this transubstantiation, as I've called it—an image or sensing with soul emerges from that difficulty, from becoming intimate with it. And with this emergence comes some release of dukkha.

Not avoiding the problem, but going into it in a way that opens up the sensing of the soul. And then that opens up the whole situation, opens up the sense of the dukkha without dissolving it completely. It transforms it.

In a lot of these transformations that I'm describing, and I have described, one wonders whether it's actually—or whether one way of conceiving would be, as I mentioned earlier—that the image is actually primary. It's almost that in this difficulty, in this pathology, in this terrible thing or this impulse that I have, or even in the memories and events or situations I'm in, in this contracted self-image that seems like it just can't be helpful at all—one wonders sometimes whether it's almost like there's an imaginal image, or potentially imaginal image, kind of, not hiding, but buried in there. And that the healing, the liberation, the relief from dukkha comes when it is revealed. The image was there all along. It perhaps was driving the whole difficult pattern.

This is what I meant when I said right from the beginning, in Theatre of Selves and all that: image is primary. What would it be to consider image as primary? What would it be to entertain the conception that image is primary?

So that's there, buried. Somehow we've gotten into a kind of wrong relationship with that image. And what could have been Eros, or what started off as Eros, got contracted into craving, which brought more contractions. What started off as image and potentially imaginal image was grasped the wrong way and became what we call a fixated image, not imaginal image, reified, or became, in other language, kind of papañca.

If you, again, trace your own examples where this has happened for you, or if you recount to yourself different examples that you've perhaps heard me give of this transformation of dukkha through the erotic-imaginal and through the sensing with soul. And play with: oh, I could see that in a way that conceives of the image as primary—not my history as primary in itself, in the usual way we think about that causally, not my trauma as primary, not my nervous system as primary, not my whatever it is. But actually, one could at times, and again, this is just one option among others, and that's something I'll come back to.

One could—I think it would be a very good exercise. If you really want to fertilize and till the soil of your understanding and your grasp and your taste for these practices and this whole path, it's really good to kind of play with the conceiving.

So as I said, trace it if you can—bring to mind instances where you have undergone this kind of transformation of dukkha through the imaginal, through the sensing of soul. Or you've heard me or someone else give an example of that movement. And can you kind of see that in many of those instances, one could actually reconfigure the conception to see: actually, there's kind of a seed image in there. And that seed image has been related to in the wrong way, and all this difficulty has come out of it. And Eros, as I said, becomes contracted to craving; potentially imaginal becomes fixated image or papañca. And what may be required from this perspective for healing, for liberation, for relief and easing of the dukkha is the revealing—or creation slash discovery—of the imaginal image, the uncovering of the imaginal image at the core of the pathology. You understand?

CHAPTER 121

Dukkha and Soulmaking (Part 6)

Rob Burbea · 1h33

> In this profound talk, Rob Burbea examines how skillful intimacy with dukkha can open the gates to the mundus imaginalis. Rather than avoiding suffering, he demonstrates how connecting with difficult situations—illness, vulnerability, uncertainty—can give birth to imaginal images that bring healing and liberation. Drawing from his own experience with cancer and severe osteoporosis, Burbea illustrates how dukkha becomes a crucible for soulmaking when approached with humility, receptivity, and what he terms 'sensing with soul.'
>
> The talk explores how imaginal perception differs from mere mindfulness of images or getting lost in fantasy. When we sense our difficulties as image—not as escape but as deeper engagement—the oppressive grip of suffering loosens while remaining present to the tragic elements. Burbea discusses the mysterious sense of perfection that can emerge when life's difficulties are perceived imaginally, not through spiritual platitudes but through authentic soul-making practice that preserves both the reality of suffering and its sacred dimensions.
>
> This sophisticated exploration addresses practical concerns about environmental destruction and social issues, showing how soul-making responses to dukkha extend far beyond intrapsychic healing to include warrior images that call us to action. The teaching emphasizes that authentic imaginal perception requires fullness of intention—practicing not merely for personal relief but for the love of soul-making itself, recognizing our participation in the divine process of sacralizing existence.

Generally speaking, we can observe that when there is dukkha of any kind in any situation or dimension of our life, we can allow ourselves to find skillful ways of being intimate with that dukkha—opening to it, connecting with it, contacting it, holding it, and responding to it in different skillful ways. Sometimes out of that crucible, the heat of the dukkha, if you like, in relationship to the dukkha, an image might be born.

That image might be born just within ourselves, in our own solitary practice. It might be born through a field in which the imaginal spark jumps, so to speak, from one person in the field to another, or the image is communicated from someone else to ourselves. And that opening of the imaginal perception, or the arising of the imaginal in relationship to the dukkha, to the difficult situation, the sensing with soul there, we could say, is a kind of way of looking, or rather sensing with soul embraces a whole world of ways of looking, of perspectives that will bring, in some way or other, some healing, some liberation, some relief and release from the dukkha.

This is just a general observation that I hope you've seen many times already, if you've been practicing, and you can trace it through many of the examples that I've given in talks, or Catherine has given, or perhaps other teachers too.

I want to point out a few things about all this. As we said, often there's some situation that feels oppressive, where there's dukkha, and we see that very situation imaginatively, or we find an image there of that very situation, or of ourselves in that situation, or of the other—perhaps the other with whom we are in difficulty. Seeing them as image, or the seeing of them, or ourselves, or the situation as image, arises for us out of that crucible. And that seeing, that kind of way of looking, sensing with soul, brings with it a lessening of the oppression, a lessening of the contraction, a greater degree of spaciousness and ease.

It's not because we've gone away from or avoided the situation or the pain in it. It's not that at all. But it's because we've allowed it to have or to give birth to or reveal—or we've created or discovered—the imaginal dimensions of it, other or more dimensions of that very dukkha, of that very situation. In that, that creates more space. And there is, as we pointed out, an aspect of the imaginal constellation that is inevitably the sense of what we call the imaginal Middle Way or the theatros. And that's there too. And that, in a way that parallels quite closely the Middle Way of emptiness, also releases some suffering out of the situation, some of the grip or the craving and the contraction in relation to the difficulty that causes extra suffering.

So there's, generally speaking, because of these factors, more space, less concretization, less of just one flat view of what's going on—and all of that makes the whole thing feel less oppressive. And it's as if the image or the imaginal figure or the perspective of the imaginal perception, perspective of sensing with soul, has a kind of wisdom in it, a soul wisdom, that comes, is given to us, is transmitted to us through the imaginal, through the sensing with soul, regarding action, speech, bearing, poise, attitude, intention in that situation. In other words, something is communicated to us of a kind of practical wisdom or that has implications for how we might then be differently in that situation.

Sometimes it's a matter of then consciously trying to implement it. Sometimes the very opening to the imaginal by itself affects that shift in our action, speech, bearing, courage, poise, intention, what we're trying to do in the situation, what we can stand behind and commit to doing.

So this way of sensing with soul, this way of imaginal perceiving, stands as I said alongside and together with, or in, our larger repertoire of tools, arts, as practitioners, that we can have in regard and in relationship to suffering. So it's not always, "here's some suffering, oh, can I see it's impermanent? Can I see it's empty? Can I bring more metta? Can I just let go?" These are all very, very important, valid, indispensable tools, arts, if you like, skills that we develop in Dharma practice, but there's also the way of the imaginal. There's also the way of sensing with soul.

Now, if someone's very new to this, and they hear something about "find the image here with the suffering, in a suffering situation," that's probably very liable to be misunderstood without much previous experience in imaginal practice. "See it as image, or find the image here" may seem to be suggesting some kind of disconnection from the reality of the situation, some kind of going into an extreme of anti-realism or avoiding it with a sort of pleasant construct of wishful thinking or daydreaming. But by this point, you've been listening and practicing and you know we mean something much more sophisticated and artful than that, that involves and demands our integrity and our sensitivity and our presence and connection and openness and humility and all of that.

But with all this and this possibility of sensing with soul as one of the modes, one of the ways in which dukkha is eased and relieved, we might also ask, again, regarding this question or this factor element of the imaginal of intention—and what are called the fullness of intention in that list of elements of the imaginal, aspects of the imaginal—and we might ask: does the intention in sort of endeavoring to see this difficulty or this difficult situation as image or to find the image there, does it have to be, my intention there have to be more than just for the sake of trying to find some ease?

In other words, does my intention have to be for the love of soulmaking and the fullness of soulmaking? When, as we pointed out before, that very fullness of intention is part of what makes it imaginal, what qualifies it to have that adjective or label "fully imaginal, authentically imaginal." But it's also, fullness of intention is also what opens up and delivers to us the authentically imaginal sensing with soul, soulmaking.

Here we're asking, does the fullness of intention... If—or rather, let's put it the other way around—if I'm only trying to find a way to relieve my dukkha, I say, "oh, okay, let me try an image, maybe that will get rid of the dukkha," and that's the kind of extent of my intention, I'm only trying to relieve dukkha, will that be enough to relieve the dukkha? Or does my intention have to be even bigger? It's not that I don't acknowledge and I'm not aware that dukkha may well be relieved in the sensing with soul, but the fullness of intention—that it's for the love of soulmaking, the whole of soulmaking, and that that soulmaking is more than just my personal psycho-spiritual process. It's for the sake of the divine.

That's all in the meaning of what we mean by fullness of intention, as we said in the first talk. So the soul is more than my personal being—I'm conceiving soul-making as more than my psycho-spiritual process. And I'm also conceiving the locus or location of soul as more than just here. In soul-making, it's not just my soul which is here that gets made into soul or whose soul is increased and magnified. It's also, so to speak, the soul out there as other—nature, the trees. What is perceived and discovered in the object is also soul.

So soul-making means soul-making everywhere, in all the aspects—Psyche, Logos, all of that. What we find is when there's that kind of fullness of intention, or to the degree that there's that fullness of intention, to that degree is the imaginal opened up, is the sensing with soul opened up and supported and galvanized and deepened and enriched. And to that degree is the soul-making, and also to that degree is the release of dukkha.

In other words, if the intention is only for the release of dukkha—I'm just trying to find an image so that I might have some relief from dukkha, perhaps approaching it in quite a contrived way even—there are two points there. One is about the limitations or range of the intention, the fullness of the intention. The other is about how I go about it, whether it's contrived or I let it emerge. Of those two, the first is perhaps most important: if my intention is only the release of dukkha, it may be that less dukkha is released.

The contrived thing is a little more open as a question, because sometimes we do act deliberately. Here is this difficulty, and I'm curious what happens when I bring this imaginal figure that has been so meaningful to me in the past into dialogue, into relationship, into connection with this dukkha, or with myself experiencing this dukkha. Now that might be contrived in the sense that it's not just emerging organically by itself from our connection with the dukkha. So that may or may not be useful.

The dukkha that is released—or rather, the release, the decrease of dukkha that is enabled through imaginal perception, through sensing with soul—is very interesting in what it delivers, in how that release is experienced, as I've touched on already. There's something akin here to the two arrows metaphor that the Buddha used, the second arrow being the kind of secondary contraction or reaction to suffering. So it might be physical suffering, and perhaps the mind is getting embroiled in that, and the body also has a secondary level of contraction. The energy body contracts around pain, around emotional pain, around physical pain.

This release of dukkha that comes through sensing with soul releases what we might call the cloud of second arrows. But it might leave, of course, what is inevitably difficult, inevitably unpleasant, inevitably painful physically at some point, or even tragic. And what it does with that in leaving it is it doesn't leave it in just a flat way. It leaves it in a way that is impregnated and shot through and rich with soul.

So there's this definite sense of release of dukkha, this cloud of second arrows, and you can feel that in the clarifying opening, harmonizing of the energy body and the easing of the mind and the nervous system. And the rest of the dukkha—the unavoidable tragedy of what we might be facing, the unavoidable difficulty—is rendered with soul. And sometimes, in fact very often, what happens if this process goes deep is that this is then perceived as perfect.

There's something perfect about this very difficulty that I actually wouldn't wish on anyone. I certainly didn't wish it on myself—no, I'd rather it really not be here. And somehow, in the sensing of the whole difficulty with soul, in the sensing with soul of the whole difficulty, there's one great level of reducing of the suffering, and the remaining dukkha is regarded as perfect. And again, not in a contrived way, not as a shallow sort of spiritual posture or intellectual posture.

Someone on a retreat since I've been ill—I can't remember exactly what it was in response to, perhaps something I'd written or shared in a talk—wrote me a note. I can't remember exactly what it said, but it asked, "How can you talk of your cancer and your situation as perfect?" And "I have a really hard time with this," and I think the note mentioned terrorism or something like that. So it's a really, really good question. I don't think I had time on that retreat—I think I squeezed a little bit into a Q&A reading from the note, but I didn't really have time to amplify it. So I'd like to say just a little bit about that now.

Because one can, and people do, adopt a sort of concept that everything is perfect. And it's a kind of spiritualized attitude. So everything is perfect, including the tragic, including all dukkha. But that posture or concept or idea is sometimes—we can hear it—just way too facile. It's lacking in integrity and in sensitivity. There's something disconnected in it. It's not really letting the heart and the soul be impacted, engaged with, meet, be worked on by the dukkha, by the tragedy there.

There's something disconnected and unattuned, something indifferent sometimes to the point of a kind of callousness in relation to one's own suffering or in relation to someone else's suffering or the suffering in the world. And actually, therefore, for all the ultimate sounding, spiritual sounding wisdom in that "everything is perfect" sort of idea, there is actually a lack of wisdom and intelligence as well as those other factors—sensitivity, connection, attunement, integrity.

But somehow, because of the prevalence of those kinds of teachings, which when they come from the right place do have wisdom in them, but sometimes they don't come from the right place—a person is just picking it up, and it's not wise, it's not sensitive, it's not intelligent.

Other times, students pick up teachings about emptiness—hearing a teacher say "everything is empty, so everything's okay"—and try to apply this perspective to great personal tragedies or social and environmental catastrophes. But that student might not yet have developed the visceral understanding, the practiced, worked, integrated, digested comprehension of emptiness. That level of depth and comprehensive realization might not yet be available to them naturally—not at the level that would be commensurate with genuinely seeing something as perfect.

And by seeing it as perfect, I don't mean seeing it as perfect in a way that leads us to simply not give a damn—to just disconnect, go watch TV, watch a film, tune out completely.

I've stressed many times that emptiness is a tool—a very, very powerful tool. To the degree that we realize emptiness, it becomes a tool of that degree of power. But like all tools, it has a certain range. We apply it where it works for us, where it's appropriate. Trying to apply emptiness when we haven't developed the capacity to really pick up that tool at the necessary level, or where it's simply not the appropriate tool for some other reason—this isn't wise practice. It's not skillful practice.

This sense of the perfection or the rightness—the mysterious perfection and rightness even of some dukkha or tragedy—is available as a genuine and profound realization that is soul-making and fruitful when that tragic situation or event is seen as image. When the imaginal perception is there, when the sensing with soul is present, then emerges this mysterious, almost ineffable, almost unarticulatable sense of the perfection and rightness, and even the grace of what is most difficult and most tragic. This emerges when we see it as image, when we sense it with soul.

For example, the cancer that I have, the prognosis I was given, and the real possibility of facing an early death—finding ways, or having ways emerge, for this to become image, to be sensed with soul, transforms and transfigures the whole sense of the entire situation.

This sensing as image, this sensing with soul, is a sensibility. It involves receptivity, tuning, humility. It's not a technique, as we've pointed out before—or it's certainly not only a technique. In situations like these, it's probably even less in the realm of mastery or technique. There's grace involved, receptivity to what soul is giving us through the very dukkha itself.

Sometimes a situation, an event, a feeling—some kind of dukkha, some kind of tragedy—needs to become image first. Using my cancer as an example, it needs to become imaginal image first. We're present with it, and through our connection with it, through our openness and sensing into the whole situation, it becomes imaginal. We sense it with soul first, and then arises this recognition: "This is perfect. This is somehow perfect in ways I can't even get my head around, ways I don't fully understand." The whole thing becomes imaginal.

But I'm not approaching it first with this conceptual idea of the perfection of all things, the perfection even of dukkha. If I do try to approach deep difficulties and suffering with this kind of attitude—"this is perfect"—as a spiritual position without being truly attuned, it can be really silly, really a kind of platitude, and actually offensive.

Someone might be taken with certain non-dual teachings and hear this sort of thing: "everything's perfect." Or they might embrace a different kind of truth: "everything is God's will." But it all depends on the integrity, the sensitivity, the openness, the humility, the inner work, the receptivity, the attunement—the quality of the crucible in which the sensing with soul, the imaginal perception, can emerge.

All of this is to offer the imaginal and sensing with soul as one option—either in addition to or mixed with other approaches available to us as Dharma practitioners when faced with suffering, when faced with dukkha.

In this regard, there's something more I want to address. I've touched on it many times, and briefly in this talk as well. I've stressed the importance of contacting, connecting with the difficulty, opening to it, and then allowing the image to emerge from that connection, allowing the sensing of soul to emerge with it. We can hear this teaching and lodge within our understanding a belief that there's something objectively real in the suffering that we can contact—that we can see it "just as it is." Maybe that's a better way of putting it. The assumption becomes: when we connect with it just as it is, then out of that an image can come.

That's fine, and that's sometimes the best way of working—to approach the dukkha so that the soulmaking can emerge from it.

But as I've said so many times, the contact with dukkha or with anything is never direct, bare, simple, unmediated truth or fact revealing. There's always a way of looking, and wrapped up in the way of looking, there are always ideas, concepts, and conceptual frameworks with any contact or connection with anything. Anytime there's any perception, wrapped up in that is some kind of way of looking, and wrapped up in that are all kinds of concepts and ideas and conceptual frameworks.

So the dukkha that we connect with when in our practice we're trying to first connect with dukkha—the way we might sense it or perceive it or contact it—is not actually the bare actuality, is not the fundamental thing, the real thing. Nor even is the story we give to ourselves of its origin, of its cause. That's something I'll come back to.

Sometimes, and I hope in all this talking, you can get the sense of an alternative possibility, either of actually sensing or conceiving, that the image is primary. That the way we sense with soul is primary, is first. I don't mean temporally first—as first in a temporal sense, then a nanosecond later some interpretation or something like that. I mean in the sense of conceptual frameworks often placing something as more fundamental, as more the primary driving force of the psyche.

And you can get a sense, sometimes I hope, at least in your experience or in your conceiving about experience, that there's a possibility of actually conceiving and sensing, feeling that the image is primary. The imaginal is primary, is so to speak, first.

And it may be that one also gets the sense or the sense in hindsight, or entertains the concept that, as I mentioned earlier just briefly, the image is primary somehow. And out of that, situations arise with that as the sort of seed or kernel. Out of that, our life situations arise, mirroring the image or some kind of... dukkha arises, which we quickly get into a kind of unhelpful and non-soulmaking relationship with. So then we're just left with the dukkha, and the image might become papañca, the eros that might be there might become craving, and everything's gotten flattened.

Maybe sometimes even a step further—we can sometimes even come to be able to regard at times, or move in and out of the conceptual framework that might even regard our very process of learning as somehow given to us by soul or in the process of soulmaking, so that this image and then everything we went through with that, it's given to us as part of the soulmaking, for the sake of and as part of the soulmaking. So our history, even the painful aspects of our history, and our learning and our development psychologically, in soul and in relationship, all of that is somehow part of the soulmaking process and given to us as potential by soul, a seed by soul.

And I certainly don't mean to foist these ideas, and one shouldn't really enforce it on oneself or on another ever. It's more just—these are possible ways of looking, ways of framing, ways of conceiving we can entertain. As I said, move in and out of entertaining certain concepts, certain conceptual frameworks, if they prove helpful, if they prove soulmaking, or when they prove soulmaking. Rather than a fixed dogma: this is how things are, this is the truth of things, this is how one should always respond, this is how one should always think and regard, this is the truth.

So this seeing or sensing my dukkha or what difficulties and challenges are given to me, this seeing and sensing of all that as perfect in this kind of mysterious way—and that itself is kind of unfathomable. That's what I mean by I couldn't quite get my head around it or articulate it. This seeing and sensing of it as perfect, which implies that it has become image first, seeing it as a gift from the soul, as a gift from some god, or however we want to put this.

This doesn't imply just a passivity of receiving: it's perfect, it's all gift, so I just kind of—all I have to do is receive something. Again, there's a kind of, to me, a little more sophistication in how the conceptual framework is working.

So as I pointed out—I can't remember when in this series of talks—but we can regard it as given. The soul gives us these things, if you like. That's a certain conceptual framework, a certain way of conceiving, a certain sensibility also.

And at the same time, in order for it to be soulmaking, it's not enough that I am given something. I need to assent to what I am given, and assent to endeavoring and working to make soul there, to see it in a way that makes soul, to relate to it in a way that makes soul.

So yes, we can say that something is given, these things are given to me. Soul gives us the beautiful and the difficult. And at the same time, the soulmaking needs my assent. The soul gives us what it wants for our soulmaking, and at the same time it needs my assent, my will, my soulmaking orientation, my soulmaking intention, my soulmaking tuning, my participation is required.

So as I pointed out, in the twoness of Eros, the twoness that's part of soulmaking perception, imaginal perception, sensing the soul, not just the autonomy of the other, but also my autonomy is necessary, is preserved in that twoness, and also has its due emphasis in the twoness that is part of the imaginal constellation. My autonomy is necessary because I need, or the soulmaking needs, my autonomy. I need to harness my will, orient in a certain way, adopt a certain attitude, work towards the soulmaking, and there's the grace of what is given to me. And somehow, again, that curious polarity is embraced—mixture of opposites or paradox or whatever there.

So my choosing, my will, as well as my listening, my deliberation—which may well include doubt and uncertainty regarding what is happening and what the right approach is—all this is necessary as part of soul-making. Perhaps without them, without my choosing, without my will, without my listening, without also my deliberation, my doubt and my uncertainty, soul-making is not possible, or it's limited. The extent and depth and range of it is limited. Perhaps.

And maybe that's exactly because of the stretching that's part of the soul-making dynamic—the Eros, Psyche, Logos getting stretched as part of their mutual fertilization and expansion. So if we don't feel stretched, then soul-making is not happening. Sometimes being stretched is difficult. It feels difficult. And there's doubt and uncertainty, and work involved.

So connecting with dukkha through that connection and the kind of poise of that connection—the sensitivity and receptivity and attitude and intention there and the listening, in the attuning—something in or around, in relation to the dukkha, or from the dukkha, emerges as image. The gates to the mundus imaginalis are opened. We sense what is happening, ourselves included, the dukkha included, with soul. And out of that can come, as part of that soul-making unfolding, a sense of perfection—the almost mystical, unfathomable, baffling perfection of the very dukkha itself, of the tragic.

Some of you will know that recently I received a diagnosis of very extreme osteoporosis. Really extreme. Apparently I had no idea until I started breaking bones without any impact, or with very, very little impact, or just nothing at all. Bones started breaking. I had a scan and the doctor said, "You know, it's really, really severe." I had no idea, so that was quite a shock. And I didn't get to find out what it means long-term. It sounded like they can't really make it much better, so what does that imply if I survive the cancer? So it was somewhat of a shock, and there's a lot of unknown in terms of what will actually happen, what will be possible for my life and my range of activities.

There's a sense with that, obviously, of vulnerability in the body—that one might very easily break bones with the slightest of impacts, break one's back, or even, as I said, without even an impact, just moving in a certain way, not even particularly hard or strange movements. So there's a sense of vulnerability with that. There's the vulnerability of not knowing, the sense of physical vulnerability on top of the cancer and the chemotherapy.

I found myself with that and was just sitting with it, sitting with the whole sense of the whole thing—the unknown, the physical, the sense of the frailty of my body. Opening to the whole of it, connecting with the whole of it, with the whole of the energy body, and the vulnerability being a difficult emotion, but one that lends itself or has a door that opens into the possibility of humility.

So right there with the whole energy body and then the humility easily accessible—the humility of the not knowing, the humility that came via the vulnerability and the frailty, the sense of frailty of the body, both as an idea and as a sort of physical sense. And then opening to or finding within that the sense of eternality as another aspect of the imagination. I didn't approach this in a contrived way—this was just organic. This is more in retrospect; I'm reporting and articulating what stages enabled something to open up here, and these are the elements involved. As it happened, it wasn't contrived or planned. But there was a sense with the whole energy body, with that connection with the dukkha, with the humility that opened and was a lovely kind of softening there. Then the sense of eternality.

I think I touched on this earlier, just very briefly—many kinds of eternality as an aspect of sensing the soul. In this case, it was a sense of the whole life, my whole life, with its narrative and its difficulties, and particularly the physical difficulties and the sort of narrative of illnesses and physical challenges. The story including the conditions of body, of soul, of relationship with humans, with ideas, with friends, with foes, with societies, with cultures—all that was kind of sensed or moved into a mode where it was sensed or seen, so to speak, from after death.

As if the whole life, that whole narrative and everything involved in it, all the dukkha involved in it, these particular dukkhas and that whole stream was seen from a perspective out of time, from after death. Like the whole thing was just there, sort of there. As I mentioned when I touched briefly on this before, the whole theme, the whole narrative and story and all the conditions and all the difficulties seen sub specie æternitatis—in Latin, from the perspective, if you like, of eternity.

And that combination of the whole energy, the openness to the dukkha, connecting—not hiding from it, not running away, but connecting in good, healthy ways with the situation, with my feelings, with the fact of it—with the whole energy body awareness, with the humility opened via the vulnerability, and with this particular kind, in this case, of sense of eternality, then the whole imaginal sense of the whole situation opened up. Again, we could say the doors, the gates of the mundus imaginalis, the realm of the imaginal, open up.

But it's not something other than—not something other than cancer and possible early death, or possibly a longer period of time with a very frail and incapable body and severely restricted activities. It's not something other. It's this body, this dukkha, this moment, this life, this death, this story, all of that sensed with soul.

Yeah. Again, it's not necessarily that there's going to be, because of that, because that perception then feels so healing, so beautiful, so tender in the presence of the divine, so blessed in and with all the difficulties, all the vulnerability, all the unknown, all the frailty—it's not necessarily because of that level of healing that then the situation is without difficulty or without, from a certain perspective, a certain tragic element, or that my bones then miraculously go back to normal. I mean, maybe something like that happens—I don't know—but that's not the level that felt even the most important at that point.

There was such blessing, reverence, tenderness, grace, mystery of dimensionality, divinity, an attenuation of the dukkha through relating to all of it, and the opening up of the soul-making there.

To draw one element out of what I just shared: when we can sense this or that dukkha, or our life, or ourselves with soul, sometimes when that deepens or unfolds to a certain extent, we can perceive all of it as gift—all of it as grace. So that even this difficulty, even this cancer, even this possible early death, even this possible... I don't know what a life with severe osteoporosis looks like, extreme osteoporosis. I don't know, in that restriction and whatever it is, that vulnerability—all of that is felt as gift, and the gift of life, and the gift of my life, with its particulars.

Again, I'm really not wanting to force this on anyone as dogma: "You should see things this way. This is how it is." I'm talking about ways of looking, talking about possibilities, and there's always a sense of both sensing, discerning what is appropriate to us right now in our situation. What helps? Is it soul-making? Does it heal and liberate and relieve dukkha? And in what ways? Or what might be given to me—my antennae are alert for what soul might be prompting me, or handing me as clues for where the soul-making is.

But one possibility, one possible way of looking, is that in the soul-making, in the sensing the soul of all of that—dukkha, life, self, etc.—with soul, there is a sense of all of it as gift, all of it as gift.

Now when we talk about the gift of life, or sensing life as a gift, that idea has many possible different levels. We can understand it, we can have a sense of it, or it might mean something at many different levels.

For example, a more conventional way of seeing it, even for someone who has a religious orientation or attitude: sensing myself as something separate from the divine, and sensing time more conventionally, sensing life and death more conventionally. There is something or somewhere or some level that we might call divine, and we receive this gift of life from that divine—the miracle of it, the beauty of it, the dukkha in it that we can't quite fathom. But the sense of the gift of life, then, is very beautiful still. But because of the more conventional view of time, of life and death, and the more normal view of oneself being something separate from God, the beauty there and the sense of gift is only at a certain level.

There's a whole other level possible in the sense of grace and gift when we begin to sense that this self and my soul is not separate somehow from the divine, from the Buddha nature, whatever we want to call it. We participate in God and God participates in us—not separate, in the most profound way. And when life and death, my life and my death, become imaginal image for us, when they are seen and sensed with soul, seen and sensed as imaged—which doesn't mean there is no death or I'm going to live forever in some kind of afterlife or there's a heaven or whatever it is, or I'll be reborn or whatever. It doesn't mean necessarily believing any of that. It's more that life and death, as they appear to us, become image, become imaginal.

There's a whole other level here of sense of the gift of life when the self and the soul and the divine or the Buddha nature are not seen as separate. They're interpenetrating and interparticipating. Life and death become image. They are perceived imaginally, and time is recognized as empty—thoroughly, deeply empty. Then there's a whole other level of gift that opens up.

Part of that gift is exactly the sense of the depths and the mystery of participation—of our participation, my participation, your participation in existence and in the divine. And also our participation in sacralizing existence and the cosmos. This is part of the work of the soul, I would say. And what to me is so important, or perhaps the most important thing in soul-making, is the sacralizing, the making sacred, the rendering sacred, the perceiving as sacred, and then relating to as sacred of the whole of existence and the whole of the cosmos—and that in an infinitely expanding possibility of ways.

It's that sense of the depth of participation and the mystery of that which is so much a part, or which comes with a whole other dimension of the sense of gift, of the soul-making perception of gift of life.

I shared—I think perhaps on my website, I can't remember—a practice that arose organically one night. It wasn't too long after the operation, after they'd analyzed the cancer tissue that they took out and gave me a prognosis, which was not very good at all, with the stage 4 cancer and all that business.

I remember not being able... At that point, my tummy was still very unsettled, so it was difficult to sleep at night. One night I gave up on trying to sleep and sat up in bed, practicing in the dark. I'd just been given this prognosis and the news about what stage the cancer was at and all that.

I practiced in different ways with the emptiness—really seeing everything as empty: self, world, time, everything. That rendered things liquid, malleable, as we said. And in that liquidity, it was possible to sense the moment and sense also more than the moment—the whole larger situation of my illness and the prognosis that I'd been given and everything. It was possible to sense that with soul.

So here's an example of the emptiness practice opening or taking us to the threshold of imaginal potential at least. And there was a sense, through that, of sensing...

It's like my soul was sensed with soul. My soul became image for me in an emotional way, as I just described. And then with that, there was a sense of—the sense of my soul then was that the soul was somehow not separate from my life and my experiences and my death.

And it was also not separate from my time span or whatever time span has been given to me for this life, whether that's fifty-two years or a long life, or a relatively short life, or whatever—this duration of my life, my temporal duration between life and death, what happens in it, my experience of it, and my death, my life and my death, and my time, if you like, my time span. All of that, from this perspective of sensing my soul with soul, that was my soul. It wasn't other than my soul. You understand?

So instead of the soul being something in here, or as I said, an organ that perceives in a certain way, or something ethereal, like some kind of energy body that goes away when I die, or something like that—all of which are good conceptions. We said at some point when we were talking about conceptions that we want to have the concept of soul be kind of, to a certain extent, not finally defined, so that it can sometimes be expanded. The very concept and sense of what soul is needs not to be limited, because if the very sense and concept of soul becomes itself caught up as an object in the soul-making dynamic, the meaning of it, the sense of it, the concept of it for us will expand. So we can't tie down too tightly the definition of what soul is.

And in this kind of experience that opened up in the middle of the night, sitting up in bed, meditating, my soul is not something other than what I experience. It's not something other than my life, its experiences, and my death. It's not something other than the temporal duration that is given to me between birth and death. That is my soul, and all of it is theophany, because that's what the soul is. And none of it is separate from the divine, because that's also what soul is when it's sensed with soul.

Whose soul? God's soul. My soul and God's soul. Buddha nature's soul. So not separate from the divine—not just both universally in those kinds of ways that we talk about with emptiness practices and non-fabricating practices, but also this is not separate. This life that I have and this temporal duration and these experiences I undergo, my stories and my narratives and my death, is not separate from the divinity, is the divine in some sense, or participates in the divine, in and through all the particulars of my personhood, of your personhood, my choices, your choices.

So there's that divinity of the universal, there's the divinity of the personal and the particular, and we dwelt a lot on that in some of the last retreats. As we said, the imaginal perception, the sensing the soul, preserves particulars and persons as soul and as rooted in the divine. And actually will create and discover more and more facets of persons and particulars and more and more particulars of persons and of beloved objects.

So being then that my soul and my whatever duration is given to me between birth and death is theophany—that is my soul and that is theophany, and that's not separate from the divine and that participates in the divine—with all of that, there's a kind of perfection implicit there, even if that time duration is short, even if there's all this difficulty there. Perfection is implicit in a sense of divinity. But perfection—and this or that perfect—may not look like what we typically think perfection looks like. And, of course, with all that, I don't know what's going to happen.

So we said earlier that there's something we could say that is given to us, but it still needs my assent, my will, my soul-making orientation, tuning and intention, my participation.

So this is a different approach to dukkha than just regarding things as impermanent. My life is impermanent, health is impermanent, whatever—valid as that can be at times as a way of looking at dukkha, as a way of bringing some relief from dukkha. Nor is it only saying it's just empty, and adopting that viewpoint as well. And nor is it saying it's just dukkha. What do you expect? Life is dukkha or life involves dukkha, however you want to interpret the first noble truth. And this is our existential situation and kind of—face it, there's going to be tragedy. Again, valid as that can be at times for some people.

And nor is this approach saying, "just accept." So because of this sense of perfection I'm talking about, this gift or grace, it doesn't mean just accept. I deliberately seek out all kinds of treatment and am willing to put up with a lot of unpleasantness that treatments cause as well. So it's not "just accept." And again, sometimes that's a perfectly appropriate and perfectly skillful response to some kinds of dukkha.

So this whole mode of practice is not just a matter of just accepting, nor is it a prioritizing of the attitude of accepting as some kind of finality. Acceptance has to be there at the beginning in terms of connecting with one's dukkha and opening to it and feeling it. If I'm in denial about it, or if I just refuse it, or if I'm fighting it, then I can't even connect with it enough for that crucible to be formed or heated up for the alchemy to happen.

But it's certainly not—I think what I'm trying to point out now is I'm certainly not trying to point to a path of, "Oh, just accept." And that's the final delivery of soul-making practice or sensing the soul of some dukkha—that it just enables us to accept things at a deeper level always. That's what it gives us. That's where it goes.

So I think it was on the Poetry of Perception retreat, the Re-enchanting the Cosmos, when someone asked in a Q&A, if I remember, about the perception of sacredness in plastic things, or in the unpleasant also. And I can't quite remember what I said there. And another person wrote me a note—again, which I only had time to write a note back to, but I thought the question was very important. Someone saying that they care very deeply about the earth, about the environment, and about society, and struggled living in a city and moving around all day and seeing so many cars and smelling the pollution and knowing, even when she can't smell it, that the cars are releasing carbon dioxide and other pollutants.

And the question was something like, well, I've tried to practice imaginal work with that. I tried to see the cars as kind of big, cute animals or something like that. And it was really an earnest question. She said, well, that didn't really work. And there's a real earnest questioning there.

So this, again, in relation to this whole question about acceptance, and do soul-making practices, do imaginal practices, issue in a kind of depth of acceptance? Is that where it's always going? I mean, the short answer is no. But sometimes what can happen is this: if we talk about the unpleasant right now—which may be the physically unpleasant, the physically painful, actual painful situations or something else that's unpleasant, even the sight of plastic or whatever—sometimes with enough practice of emptiness, and it may be emptiness of the sensation of unpleasantness itself, or some kind of perception in any of the sense doors, sometimes with enough realizational sense, practical sense, felt sense, perception of the emptiness of whatever is unpleasant in the moment, in practice, that can automatically—sometimes, if it goes really, really deep—there's a kind of sacredness that we perceive there.

Or what can happen is that the unpleasantness itself is actually malleable. In other words, what is unpleasant can be transformed. When we understand its emptiness enough, it can be—oftentimes, not always—oftentimes transformed into the pleasant. So this pain in my back, this pain in my knee, whatever it is, with skill in emptiness practice and also with jhana practice understood the right way—we understand jhanas are a training in perception. Because perceptions are empty, they're actually malleable, including the perception of pleasant and unpleasant and neutral. I'm pretty sure I've talked—I've certainly written about this elsewhere, but I think I've talked about it somewhere or other.

But they're also malleable in the sense I described earlier in this talk, that there's a kind of liquidity that comes in, and so the sensing the soul is possible because things have been made liquid, to borrow that alchemical metaphor. And in that, even the unpleasant, even if it stays unpleasant, can be sensed as sacred. And with that, we accept it, or it becomes easier to accept them, whatever the unpleasant is there.

But there's also, I feel, really a necessary place—important to point out—a place where there's also the requirement that we see, or ask at least, what these things, if we're talking about too much plastic, whatever it is—see and ask what these things are asking of us. What are we called to? In action, in voice, or whatever. What are we called to? To redeem them.

So again, I've shared in the past this Kabbalistic notion of tikkun olam, the healing of the world or the restoration of the world. And sometimes the level of healing is just the healing of the perception of the world. And so, again, in relation to my illness, like birds weaving their bird song, weaving a healing in my energy body, magically changing and transforming the flow of energy in the energy body, stitching my body together with their melodies. And not knowing, of course, does that have any physically measurable effect on my illness? But the healing there is a healing of perception—of self, of body, of world, of birdsong, of existence, of cosmos.

So there may be a tikkun olam, a healing of the world on that level of the healing of our perception of the world, out of the flatland of being sensed without soul, and its dimensionality opened up—its beauty, its mystery, and all that—in the ways that we're talking about in all these teachings. But it may also be that these things, these ugly things, these harmful things, or these unpleasant things, difficult things, also ask us—or we are being asked—to change them, or to work towards changing them, to work towards changing the world, transforming society in some way or other.

And that might mean, again, implicitly, that it's not just an acceptance. It might mean some kind of sacrifice in our life, some kind of hard work for the sake of beauty, for the sake of justice, for the sake of goodness. It might mean in that that we have to let go of a certain amount of comfort, a certain amount of convenience, a certain amount of pleasure that we have access to in our lives, a certain amount of security that may be, again, part of what is being asked of us, part of what we might say is a calling for us.

So that in all that, in what is being asked of us, we might be stretched spiritually, or the soul might be stretched. And then, again, if that's seen also with soul, then our very stretching, our very being stretched, can be seen as part of—as I said—the soul-making of God, God's soul-making process, or the divine or a divinity's soul-making process, or the Buddha nature's soul-making.

So we always talk about a sense of the perfection of everything and the gift of things and grace, et cetera. It's not simply that all—and sensing the soul and how that opens those kinds of sensibilities and perceptions. It's not simply we're talking about moving towards a kind of blanket view of "all is perfect, all is divine, just as it is." So there are different possibilities here. Sometimes that's what happens. Other times we're actually asked for an engagement that comes at cost and risk—in our lives, in our material lives, in our relationships, in our status.

Sometimes what happens in relation to dukkha—what is unpleasant—is that a healing image constellates in relationship to that difficulty. The bird song I mentioned earlier serves as an example. Anyone would have heard the birds singing outside, but sensing them with soul, they became image—in this case, healing image—in relationship to this dukkha, this unpleasantness, this difficulty.

This could happen in various ways: Avalokiteshvara coming, or Jesus coming, or even bringing Jesus there consciously—whatever the healing image might be in relationship to the difficulty. Because of the imaginal and the way the imaginal fire catches, if it's Jesus or Avalokiteshvara, there's already a kind of divinity present. The sacredness is already there, and that sacredness begins to spread to the difficulty, so that in the pervasion and expansion of soul-making, the difficulty too is perceived as sacred.

Sometimes what needs to happen is that an image arises that's not so much an obvious healing image, but more something like the warrior image I spoke of—whether solitary or as part of a whole army or clan or group of warriors. Perhaps for the person who wrote me about the cars and pollution and her soul pain around that, rather than trying to see the cars as enchanted, beautiful images—attempting to take away the dukkha by seeing them as cute, big animals slouching along the street—it might be that the self-image is more appropriately transformed, expanded, deepened, perhaps into some kind of warrior image.

The question then becomes: how does that translate into life? What's the duty to that image? What's the echoing in the life of that image? What's the mirroring? The self, the other, the world, the eros itself—they can all become imaginatively infused in the constellation around the dukkha.

If this does move over into our life in terms of actually doing something—whether it might be standing up more strongly, civil disobedience, creating other kinds of structures, or offering a healing response—there are different kinds of tonality possible. Action, voice, commitment and image may all be involved, and they're all related.

As a partial response to the question "What is this dukkha calling me to? What is this difficulty, this ugliness, this unpleasantness asking of me?"—sometimes a healing image in relationship to it might be a partial response. A warrior kind of image in relation to it may be another partial response.

Another way of expressing what we're exploring: soul-making in general, and soul-making with respect to or in relationship to dukkha, extends far beyond just intra-psychic images. Sometimes it is just an intra-psychic image in relation to some dukkha that arises, and all it needs is some kind of reverence and recognition of the holiness of that image. There's almost no visible or sensible echo in the life that anyone else might discern at all. Sometimes that's the case.

But oftentimes, soul-making and the soul-making response—or the soul's response to dukkha—goes way beyond just the intra-psychic, beyond the confines of the intra-psychic.

This is not simple, and we cannot approach it in a contrived way, with some kind of formulaic approach. We need discernment, and that requires a careful kind of listening, a careful kind of attunement, responsiveness, sensitivity. It involves both our receptivity and our activity, our proactiveness. All that discernment, listening, responsiveness, action, receptivity—all that is in the service of a kind of inquiry: Is it possible that there can be discovered or created, or created-slash-discovered here, an image, an imaginal image that is soul-making? Can this be sensed with soul?

Take the situation I shared of the person who felt dukkha around what she regarded as a lot of papañca stirred up by seeing particular artwork, then having this column to write and the social situation she was in. She regarded it as papañca and a kind of manic energy, but it may be that there's something buried in all that which is actually potentially imaginal. Connecting with that, and practicing with it in all the ways we've discussed—the sensitivity, the receptivity, the energy body, tuning to it—allows that imaginal to blossom and changes the whole relationship with that set of circumstances in life, or changes the inner movement, the inner relationship that was perceived as suffering.

As we've said, that discovery or creation of an image that is soul-making in relation to or in the dukkha may not be what a certain ego level of us wants. It may not be the outcome that would be most obviously what everyone might deem freedom from dukkha.

We could make some distinctions here. There's the image of a situation that we believe is "how things really are"—what we might call a fixation or papañca image, a fixated image. Here's this dukkha, or this situation, or social situation, or ourselves, and we're lost in an image that we're taking as real, as true, as "this is how things are." This is something every human being knows.

Then, as dharma practitioners, we also know the possibility of an image or story or fantasy whose presence in consciousness and whose believability we are mindful of. We realize that there is this fantasy going on, this image happening. That mindfulness of the image allows less identification with it. We are less lost in it, less believing it to be true. We see what's going on.

My mind has got this interpretation through this image, and I can really feel a tendency to believe that's true. But with enough mindfulness, we can just see that, and we're not so sucked into it. There's some distance to doubt its complete veracity. So we could call that mindful observation of image or of what the imagination is doing.

And then, of course, there's the third possibility, which is what all these teachings are emphasizing and drawing out and exploring and expanding: an image that has become imaginal in the sense that we have outlined, or that we have entered as an imaginal image. When that's the case, naturally, we don't sense it as either real or not real. There's the imaginal middle way as part of the imaginal constellation when it's imaginal. It's theatre. It's the kind of middle way that we talked about. So because of that, we're less lost in it, less believing it flatly, less identified, less reified.

All this should be obvious, but the point I want to make in this context is that both the second and the third of those options are freeing. A mindfulness of image or mindfulness of what imagination is doing and what the mind is doing in regard to its tendency to believe an image—that option, the second option, is freeing to a certain extent. But just as freeing is allowing something to become more imaginal.

The mindfulness kind of keeps it at bay. I see that image is there, but it's just kind of over there, and I see the tendency for me to get sucked into it, but I'm keeping it at arm's length a little bit, mindfully, so I'm not getting so sucked into it. The third option of actually entering more fully into the imaginal, letting it become more imaginal, is just as freeing with respect to whatever image is there.

The difference, though, of course, is that in entering more fully the imaginal and allowing something to become more imaginal, the image is empowered, whereas being mindful of what's in the imagination and the tendencies around it disempowers it. So there's also a dynamic quality—based on everything we're saying, a soul-making dynamic quality—that's possible in the last option. This still involves mindfulness, so it's a mindful entering in and all that receptivity and sensitivity. The second option of just a mindful observation and, if you like, resisting what's happening in the imagination—the image that's happening in the imagination—is a bit more static.

You don't really get what's helpful in the image. What was the gift that the image was pregnant with? We don't really get that until we enter into the imaginal, until we allow it to become fully imaginal. That's maybe a better way of saying it.

So it's calling us. If we enter into a wrong relationship with it, it will bring more papañca, more dukkha. But it's also pregnant with a treasure, with a gift. And if we can allow that relationship to become fully imaginal, fully soul-making in the way that we've been outlining, then there's a whole other dimension and range of gifts that we receive there.

So sometimes the question is: is there an image here that needs liberating? I don't have so much a question as more just a subtle background attitude and style of approaching. Oftentimes, within the dukkha, there's an imaginal image that's buried there. And the liberation of it, the realization of it, the entering into and exploration of it, the filling out of it, the blossoming of it, the liberating of the image that's buried there liberates us, or liberates that dukkha. It liberates us from that.

Again, this sensing with soul doesn't mean seeing the situation differently or going away from the situation or turning away from it. Sometimes, as the Buddha pointed out, there is skillful avoidance. But this sensing with soul that we're talking about now has more to do with the situation not being different. It's the same situation, it's just sensed with soul. We're not running away; we're entering into and opening out.

CHAPTER 122

Dukkha and Soulmaking (Part 7)

Rob Burbea · 1h34

> In this profound exploration, Rob Burbea investigates how imaginal perception and sensing with soul can dissolve dukkha and prevent certain forms of suffering from arising. He examines the pain of being seen in merely human terms without acknowledgment of our soul dimension, and how being perceived imaginally by others can facilitate deep healing. Burbea draws connections to Kabbalistic concepts of tikkun olam (healing the world) and the 'need on high,' suggesting that our particular struggles may be somehow necessary to the divine's own fulfillment. He contextualizes soul-making within different interpretations of the Four Noble Truths, critiquing purely medical models of Buddhist practice that focus solely on ending suffering. Drawing from personal experience with serious illness, Burbea argues that much modern dukkha stems from soullessness and the absence of meaning, beauty, and enchantment in our lives. He proposes that after basic human needs are met, soul-making and beauty—though seemingly 'useless'—may be among the most worthwhile pursuits, addressing a fundamental form of suffering: the absence of soul itself.

We've been talking in the last few parts of this talk about the ways and some of what's involved in how the imaginal sensing with soul frees us from dukkha, relieves dukkha, dissolves dukkha, drains the dukkha out of a certain situation or thing that's happening. And I hope, again, that you have felt and experienced that for yourself in your practices with the imaginal.

One begins to get a sense, a palpable felt sense and conviction of not just the fact that sensing with soul can relieve dukkha—that's often one of the results that issues from it—but we begin to get a sense and a conviction of the necessity of the imaginal dimension, the necessity of sensing the soul, the necessity for the soul, of sensing the soul, but also necessity for our well-being, and necessity in terms of a relief from suffering. Or rather, just the prevention of suffering by ensuring that the imaginal realm is open to us and accessible by practicing sensing the soul, by having that facility and that access.

Sometimes we see that some dukkha is locked into place when there is not the access to the imaginal dimension, when there isn't that facility and flexibility. And sometimes we even sense that dukkha arises when there is the absence of the imaginal dimension, when that door is shut—that very shutting of that door, the absence, allows a certain dukkha to arise.

This happens in relationships as well. Sometimes we're with someone in some kind of relationship, it could be any kind of relationship, and in that moment perhaps, or perhaps longer in the stretch of the relationship, we sense that they are seeing us, but they're seeing us in a kind of flatly human way. They're not seeing more than our flatly human dimension. And in that, we can feel like this person has missed us. They've missed actually our personhood, the fullness of our personhood, because they've not seen the soul dimension. They've not acknowledged that. They're not sensing us with soul. They've missed us, missed our personhood, missed the fullness of it and the fullness of our humanity.

So it's not that soul is one thing and human is something else. The fully human, I would say, embraces or includes the soul dimension. Of course it does. They're not really different at all. But we can feel the pain and the dukkha of not being seen, of being missed when the soul dimension is missed in the way that we are being looked at, perceived.

And conversely, sometimes it's exactly being seen imaginally by another, being sensed with soul—it's that that heals, or begins healing, or contributes to healing, as much as, and sometimes more than, another level of being seen.

Sometimes someone sees us through a way of looking that, though it's trying to give love and compassion or encouragement or protection to some aspect or feeling or character within us, mixed up with that is a reification. And it's reifying that very part that it wants to give compassion to or love, encouragement, protection, whatever. It's reifying that and perhaps it's shrinking us to that. There is then the absence of the imaginal. There is not the middle way. Something is being reified. And if it's shrinking us, then there is not the concertina. And there's certainly not the imaginal concertina, the sense of I have, you have a whole concertina, as we described and went through the list of the elements, the aspects of the imaginal. You are a whole concertina of available images that is infinite. One senses that, so that one isn't selecting just one or two and reifying them. They're all available, they're all theatre, and they're all available.

So sometimes we're looked at in this way—there's all the good intention of love and compassion and wanting to protect us or encourage something, but something there is not imaginal. It's reifying, perhaps it's shrinking us to that. And even—so it's gone out of fashion now, but that kind of inner child work that was quite popular in psychotherapeutic circles, probably still is in some streams of psychotherapy. And even when someone recognizes or is talking to that child part with a lot of love and compassion and recognizes that this is a child part or this is a young part or this is a vulnerable part, and even they might think and communicate "I know you're also an adult and you're also strong and you're also capable," even then when they still have that "this is only part of you" perspective—and despite the intention of the healing, there's something that doesn't quite do the trick there sometimes because the soul is not seen.

There's reification and this kind of reification, and oftentimes a kind of narrowing. At least there's not the imaginal concertina. And in that, we feel unseen. Or if we're looking that way at someone else, they feel unseen. Certainly some aspect feels seen. They feel that some part is being seen and acknowledged and perhaps they're appreciative of that. But the person also can feel like something is not seen in them. It's frustrating.

And what is seen is seen in a way that actually lacks the full power of the healing potential, the full power of that kind of magic that can be communicated and the healing that can come with that, and the freeing and the kind of liberation that can come with that when the imaginal is opened, when there's sensing with soul. It lacks power because it's reified, because it's flat. It's a flatland view, flat person view, flat human view.

We sense when sometimes—I don't know if you recognize what I'm talking about here in your experience, or you might feel in the way that you have sometimes looked on another friend or whoever—we are being, in these times, if we feel we're on the receiving end, we're being somehow approached through too narrow and too rigidly held a paradigm, a psychological paradigm, psychological conceptual framework, one that doesn't recognize the daemon, doesn't see the daemon there. So there's some compassion, but it's not actually as full and multidimensional and rich and powerful as it could be.

multifaceted as it could be, and it's somehow too solid sometimes.

Sometimes we feel, or the other person feels if we're looking at them this way—from a soul perspective, but in a kind of incomplete way, in a truncated way—that we've cut off certain dimensions. Sometimes the person says, "I want that holiness in my suffering. I want the holiness in my weirdness, in my pathology to be seen, to be even celebrated, to be revered."

Yes, I know there's dukkha in that. Yes, I know I'm not completely clear about that, and I know there are other parts too. But there's something I want you to see. I want to be seen here. I want the soul to be seen—even that aspect, that daimon that has with it its arrogance or whatever. I want you to see the soul of that, the soulfulness of that. Yes, I know it's problematic. Yes, I know it has its problems socially or whatever. But I want you to see the daimon's struggle as well—the daimon's brilliance, the daimon's beauty, whatever it is—to be seen, celebrated, even revered.

Remember, reverence is part of the imaginal perception, the constellation of imaginal perceiving. But this seeing, celebrating, this reverence, this revering, is not reified. It's not a reification, because it's imaginal. It's the imaginal middle way. It's got that theatre aspect to it.

So we're going a stage further and actually pointing out the suffering of the neglect of the imaginal dimension—the suffering, the dukkha that ensues and is kind of locked into place perhaps when we don't sense with soul, or when we are not sensed with soul in relationship, when a relationship isn't that full.

I realize that depression is a complicated business and there's not one kind of depression for human beings. But I would say that some kinds of depression or some periods of depression actually are instances of, or we could say are caused by—and then of course like all these things they kind of loop around, they get into a kind of stuck place—but they're actually caused by a lack of eros, a cutting off of eros, an inhibition, a disconnection from eros and from soul-making.

Nothing is alive as imaginal, as fantasy in the good sense. Everything is flat, and the soul is deprived of its fire—if we want to use a fire image—or it's deprived of its juice, its juiciness, its moisture, its water. Flatness leads to depression. The soul-making dynamic is arrested, is ground to a halt, is inhibited, is restricted. Eros is not opening and penetrating. There's not the dynamic there and there's a depression.

So again, I hope you can recognize what I'm pointing to here in your life and in your practice. And if not, this is one of those aspects I feel would be really worth considering, reflecting with this idea on your experience, on your past, on your history, and very lightly, perhaps even on the history and the past or the situation of a friend or someone you know.

Because it's through reflection, actually making, bringing alive these ideas in your own consciousness, in your own reflection, in your mind, that they kind of go deeper and things start to connect in your understanding in the logos. I really want you to get the taste of all this, the taste of soul-making, which means experiencing it for yourself. And I also want you to get the idea of it. Do you get the idea?

And getting the idea means also really digesting and utilizing and making active and making your own the conceptual framework. Then you can actually build it or build onto it or whatever. But that together, the logos is part of the whole soul-making dynamic. It's getting the taste and getting the idea.

But I'm pointing to right now the necessity for us of sensing the soul, of soul-making, of imaginatively perceiving, perceiving imaginatively, in order to decrease suffering at times, relieve suffering at times, or certain kinds of suffering certainly, and in order that certain kinds of suffering don't arise. We need that kind of mode of being, or those kinds of modes of being that we call soul-making, a sensing of soul.

And to add to that, I want to touch on again something I have mentioned before: you will notice, as your soul-making progresses, or as you get more into this, there will arise—when the soul-making starts to go deep and starts to really get rich and in the nooks and crannies and in the soil of our being, and that soil is turned and tilled and worked and made moist and planted with seeds in the soul-making process, and the soul-making increases and expands and deepens and enriches—there is, in that process, the re-enchantment of our dukkha.

And so important—so very important. We've touched on it already in this series. As that builds, the re-enchantment of the dukkha, there is, with the soul-making dynamic, a taking up of the dukkha itself as an erotic object, re-enchanting it. Then there emerges both the perception and the idea—both the image and the logos, if you like—of my dukkha, this dukkha right now, being somehow necessary to God.

Somehow this suffering, in some kind of not fully explicable way, is necessary to God, necessary to the Buddha nature, necessary to a divinity. It's a perception and a conception that arises organically, I would say. Something like this perception or conception arises organically with, and inevitably with, the deepening of the soul-making process and the soul-making dynamic.

I think I spoke in one retreat about the Kabbalistic notion of the need on high—in other words, God's need, the divine's need, however you want to put it, the need of the Buddha nature. But that need is in and through the particular: the particular events, currents, elements of my existence, your existence, of one's life and one's unique personhood.

So the divine need is not just some abstract universal thing, nor is the divine just this—as we've mentioned many times—just this universal essence of some kind by virtue of which there is a kind of equality of what looks ostensibly different. This particular and that particular are all one because they're all of the same essence or divine essence or substance. There is that view and the importance of that view. We've touched on this before.

But this need on high that we're talking about now, this perception of a need on high, and the sensing of the divine and the divine's need in and through the particular—my particulars, the particulars of my personhood, my journey, my life, my story, my dukkha, the elements of my existence—that means my thinking, my intelligence, my emotion, my sensitivity, my body, this sense door, that sense door, all of that, my perceiving. That's only possible when the particular is sensed in an imaginal way.

This dukkha or that, when sensed imaginally, can actually rise to another level where it's not just sensed as image. As the sensing as image expands, as sensing it with the soul expands and reaches even deeper, then it senses part of the need on high. Then it's necessary to God in some strange way, this very difficulty. This is a kind of amplification, a deepening of the re-enchantment of the dukkha.

But the suffering or the element that I'm talking about has to be alive as an image for us—that is soul-making—in order for that to take place. It's as if that being alive as image is a first step that allows the perception of a particular as necessary to God.

And it's not even only dukkhas. My particular way of thinking or perceiving, someone's very particular kind of sensibility or aesthetic or way of feeling beauty, particular relationship with one of the elements or particular sense door or whatever—it's unique to me somehow, part of my personality. The dukkha and whatever it is becomes image first and then can become—the sense of it can become—necessary to God.

Sometimes this idea of the necessity to God of our particular difficulty, or some particular element of my psyche, or the way my mind works, or something in my body—this idea that you're hearing now, and maybe you've heard before, might then function as a kind of seed or spark to trigger image. We've talked about this before, so it's almost like a poetic idea or a kind of logos that goes into the mix, is taken up by soul-making, then sparks a kind of imaginal seeing of that very element, or of a particular element. So it can also work the other way around, or it can even work that the two happen together.

The re-enchanting of the dukkha, or the seeing a particular as image—any particular—and the seeing it, the sensing it, the knowing it as necessary to God, the entertaining of the conception that this particular, or this particular dukkha of mine, is necessary to God—sometimes they can even occur simultaneously. So really, any order, actually.

In a way, you could say there's a kind of mutual dependent arising there: the sensing imaginally of a particular event, a trajectory of one's life, an element of one's existence, a particular dukkha that's there, on the one hand, and the sensing of its necessity to God. We could say those two are co-dependently arising facets of a single kind of complex shift or quantum leap of perception, of relationship and way of looking, rather than two shifts where one causes the other. I mean, it can occur that way, or they can just be regarded as mutually dependent horizons.

Let me say that a little more clearly. The sense, the perception, the conception of any particular event or element of one's being or narrative in one's life or one's particular unique personhood—the sense of any of that as necessary to God—that sense, that perception, that conception will usually arise on the basis of already perceiving that particular and imaginatively sensing it with soul. So with that as a basis, then as it fertilizes more, there's this kind of fuller level of perception of its necessity to God. So usually the causality is that way around: imaginal perception first, and then of this particular, and then that particular being sensed as necessary to God.

Sometimes the causality works the other way around, of course. So we have this idea of something being necessary to God, and that idea—we might hear or read it or something—functions as a seed, a stimulus to open up the perception so that we can perceive something or other, some particular, as perceiving imaginally, sensing with soul. And then the third possibility is that both of them arise together. They occur simultaneously. We're really talking about one organic movement of soul-making that affects the perception and the conception.

But the usual direction of causality is the imaginal perception first: sensing with soul of this particular dukkha, this difficulty, this story, this current of being, this element of my existence, of my mind, of my body, of my psyche—perceiving that imaginally first. And then through that imaginal perception, fertilizing and enriching more, comes the sensing of it as necessary to God, the conceiving of it as necessary to God.

That's the probably most common order of causality.

I've also talked in the past, in several retreats, about the Kabbalistic notion of Tikkun Olam—the healing or restoration of the world. In that Kabbalistic conception, functioning as a kind of archetypal, cosmic, psychological, and philosophical metaphor, Tikkun Olam encompasses an entire movement. It includes the very alienation, destruction, chaos, or fragmentation that calls forth a redeeming, a tikkun, a restoration.

In the bigger picture, the whole process unfolds: the very difficulty itself, then the soul-making with respect to that dukkha or difficulty, and then what emerges—whether through what comes forth in action or voice, or simply as a shift of perception, a way of looking, a re-enchanting, a healing of the world through our existence and being, through life and death, through the ways we can now perceive and conceive of it.

This entire movement—the alienation, the destruction, the fragmentation, the difficulty, the soul-making process in regard to that, and what emerges as the fruit or outcome of that soul-making process, whether it manifests in concretized action and voice or simply in the modes of being, conceiving, and perceiving—all of this is the Tikkun Olam. All of this is the mystical movement that we find ourselves going through and engaging in, being inevitably drawn into in our life and having to deal with, or called to deal with. It's also the movement of the divine—a cosmic archetype.

Now, I really want to repeat: you cannot, I cannot, and you should not foist this kind of idea on anyone or try to convince anyone of this. This notion of necessity to God—of this whole movement of dukkha, soul-making in relation to the dukkha, and then what comes out of that—emerges as an idea, or as a perception, or both, through a degree of soul-making.

When we can relate to our dukkha in the right way—through connecting with it, through honesty, through humility, and then beginning to sense it with soul—it becomes image. Our dukkha becomes imaginal, or is imaginatively perceived. We imaginatively perceive our dukkha. We see it, we sense it with soul. The dukkha is re-enchanted.

The same transformation occurs with our eros. As we've discussed many times, the eros becomes an erotic, imaginal object to ourselves. So our very eros is re-enchanted, given dimensionality. Our very process of soul-making undergoes this same transformation. All these—our dukkha, our eros, our soul-making—they all become re-enchanted. They're all sensed with soul.

In this dynamic, over time, at some point they too are perceived as somehow divine, somehow rooted in the divine, somehow not separate from divinity. We sense, perceive, and conceive that through our dukkha, through our eros, and through our soul-making, we are participating—in and through the particulars of our life, including the particular difficulties and struggles and challenges—in the divine, in and through those particulars.

At the same time, the divine is participating in and through those particulars in us. The divine is participating in us. Divinity is participating in us. Divinity is being made and created in us. This is necessary to God, necessary to the Buddha nature.

For some, these may sound like strange ideas, but as I've said, I think there's a kind of inevitability to these kinds of perceptions. They're not rigid, ultimate truths. They're perspectives. They're soul-making perceptions. They're conceptions that one can eventually move in and out of, or finds oneself moving in and out of.

Some of you will recognize something in all this that parallels or has analogies to the philosophy of Hegel. I only recognized this recently, as I wasn't familiar with his ideas before. There's a kind of parallel in what he was trying to get at and what's emerged in the soul-making dharma. There are many differences, but listen to this quote from his Phenomenology of Spirit.

For Hegel, the central principle or goal or movement of evolution of the whole of existence was toward what he called spirit, or rational being, or spiritual rational being. I can't and don't want to explain fully what he meant by that right now, but he said: "Spiritual, rational being demands the seriousness, the anguish, the patience, and the labor of the negative."

If we substitute "soul" for what he means by spiritual rational being—which is more than it probably sounds at first—we get: Soul, soul-making, demands the seriousness, the anguish, the patience, and the labor of the negative.

Again, there's a necessity to soul of our dukkha. I want to be absolutely clear that I'm not communicating a dogma or religious belief.

It's rather, as I said, I just want to point out the probable inevitability of such a view emerging, such a sense, perception and conception. And also, turning it around a little bit, we could say alternatively that this view or concept supports soul-making.

So that the way we are perceiving—if we have that conception of the possibility of the re-enchantment of dukkha and the possibility of sensing it with soul and the possibility of it being somehow necessary to the divine in ways that we can't even quite fathom or completely neatly articulate. So there's a conceptual seed there, if you like, that just functions as a possibility, and that shifts or introduces, as a concept, it introduces, or it's supportive of soul-making, and it introduces the possibility of seeing and sensing in certain ways.

As we've pointed out before, it therefore becomes valuable and valid. It's valid, not so much as a scientifically provable truth or some kind of religious dogma or credo. It's valid because it's valuable. In other words, because the idea supports soul-making or can support soul-making. So we can choose to entertain such a view without necessarily believing it as true. This again to me is one of the great gifts of this approach.

Actually, just lingering with Hegel again—he wrote a lot about Christianity as well. In the time he was living in, that was the paradigm everyone was in. And for him, God didn't choose to create the world and create something that wasn't God, so to speak. Nor was it simply that everything was of the substance of God. It was more that in Hegel's thinking and his philosophy, God needed to, God had to create the world and create what looked or what might have seemed as not divine in order for God's own fulfillment.

So God needed, for God's own soul-making, to create the world—what seemed to be outside the divine—and create it with difficulty, with resistance, with finitude, in order to realize his, her, its own personhood, to become what it, in essence, really could be. In other words, the model there was the Bildungsroman, the romantic novel of someone who encounters a lot of struggles and antagonisms, and that builds their personhood. It makes them who they are. They're shaped by their struggles and by encountering adversity.

So the self at the beginning is not a full and rich personhood until it goes through that encounter and all those difficulties and works those difficulties in the ways that it can. It's an encounter with the world and the antagonism of the world and the difficulty of the world. So that personhood, whether it's humanly conceived or the personhood of the divine or angel, only emerges or is created or discovered in and through the struggle with and the ultimate victory over and appropriation of the initially alien.

I'm paraphrasing a writer called Cyril O'Regan who wrote a very interesting book about Hegel and his religious thought. He goes on to say: for Hegel, personhood, even divine personhood, is only narratively possible. And that narrative has to include suffering and the encounter with suffering and the working through of alienation and difficulty and fragmentation and destruction.

So the idea of a divine that doesn't suffer was really not attractive to Hegel. The apathetic divine, the non-suffering divine, wasn't something that, for him, qualified as divine. A divine that doesn't suffer is not worthy of the name divine in this whole understanding of things.

If I borrow this and adapt it: our suffering in and through my journey, your journey, my particulars, the particular elements both of my joys and my particular ways and styles of existence, and my dukkha and the way that becomes soul—this is part of the narrative of God, and it's necessary to God, to the divine, to the Buddha-nature, for its own fulfillment, its own coming into full being.

So this is a teleological process, as we've talked about before. The causality is kind of in the future; there's something being pulled towards this fullness of soul-making. But in our paradigm, unlike Hegel's, soul-making has no end. It potentially has no end. So the point of all this is soul-making. And that can be regarded as the soul-making of the divine. The soul-making that my soul goes through, creates, discovers, is a part of the soul-making of the divine.

And again, it's a perception or a conception or conceptual frame that arises out of experience, or that can arise out of experience. I don't mean to insist on it as a belief. I think I've traced the phenomenology of soul-making, how divinity and this whole perception and conception can arise, inevitably even, as one just works with the soul-making.

So in this path of soul-making, the logos that we have in relation to dukkha, in relation to suffering, is not primarily to explain why we suffer, or furnish reasons for our dukkha. Sometimes that's the way, as human beings, we wonder why. But sometimes explaining suffering or giving reasons for it doesn't do much for us. What would an answer for why give me? I mean, it may be that if I am blaming myself for suffering and there's some other reason given that doesn't point the blame or the causality to myself, then perhaps I can blame myself less.

So there's a point to asking that question, why? It serves a purpose. But if an answer is just an answer, and it gives you no meaningful task, gives me no orientation that is meaningful, hands me no struggle, then perhaps that's a kind of soul death. You understand?

So in creating or discovering or establishing or thinking about a logos, a conceptual framework around suffering or with regard to suffering, when we begin to think about what place suffering has or why suffering arises or these kinds of questions, we have to be careful what we're looking for and what we get with certain kinds of answers.

I remember some time ago—I can't remember when it was, a few years ago—I was invited to participate in a dialogue with a rabbi in London, a sort of Buddhist-Jewish dialogue. Several people were involved and they were suggesting themes for the dialogue that he and I could explore together from Buddhist and Jewish perspectives. It seemed that many people were suggesting this question of theodicy—the concept or explanation of why bad things happen or why suffering arises, or what is the point, what is the place of suffering? Or if God is good, how come there is suffering? That sort of thing.

When I got there, with the audience, if I remember, there were also several questions along that theme. For instance, why do bad things happen to good people? That kind of question. And if I remember, I think it was even suggested as the main theme of the evening.

Having grown up in a Jewish religious environment, I recognized there's something —particularly, I think, for some reason, it's quite a common question in Jewish circles. And I think someone asked in the audience, and I responded that we have to be careful with questions, because sometimes we can ask questions like, "Why is this happening to me? Why am I suffering?" And it sounds like a question, because it's got the word "why" in it, but actually we're not really asking a question. We're just kind of complaining out loud or to ourselves. In Yiddish, they say kvetching—it's not a question. Kvetching means to complain.

In a Buddhist paradigm, one would explain suffering as the karma from kilesas, as the outflow from greed, hatred, and delusions. That viewpoint or that answer may give us some way of going forward in the present. In other words, it may give us a task if we pick it up in the right way. As I said, it gives us then a struggle. My struggle, my task then is in relation to these kilesas and what can I do then to purify, and so on. So it gives us that kind of framework around which to structure our practice and our intention, our aspiration—to purify and eventually not make karma, in a sort of Buddhist vision.

In the soul-making paradigm, or logos, the answer is for the service of soul-making. An answer to the place of suffering or the purpose of suffering or the why of suffering or explaining it or a reason for suffering—we want the answer to be in the service of soul-making. It should support and stimulate soul-making. In other words, we want to adopt, entertain, engage conceptual frameworks, ways of looking, ideas that open, support, nourish, deepen soul-making, increase soul-making with respect to and in relation to our dukkha. You understand? This is a different paradigm than just ending dukkha and just finding some explanations—"Oh, okay, that's why I'm suffering."

Those kinds of conceptual frameworks that might support soul-making, those kinds of ideas, will involve the dukkha itself becoming image, being sensed with soul. And conversely, sensing our dukkha with soul, sensing it imaginatively, will tend to expand and stretch and impregnate our concepts and conceptual frameworks, our logos. So if we open up the logos and the conceptual framework with certain ideas, then it's easier to sense the dukkha with soul, sense it imaginatively. And sensing the dukkha, imagining, re-enchanting the dukkha, being able to sense it with soul—our dukkha, this dukkha—will, because of the soul-making dynamic that we explained with the eros-psyche-logos stretching, open up our ideas and eventually make available to us accessible concepts and ideas, conceptual frameworks, whole kinds of views or ideas about what the cosmos is and what existence is, that we can then move in and out of, that we're called in and out of.

So that's one point for right now. And the second is this: if we are thinking in terms of reasons and explanations around suffering, if the mind tends to go that way, why do we tend to think causally and in terms of temporal origins of beginnings? We tend to place the cause in the past—and I've talked about this before, but I really think it's important.

We're really not used to thinking in terms of telos. I am suffering right now because I'm called to something at which I have not yet arrived. I'm called to something I can only dimly work out. I'm called to something that's going to take some work and some reworking and reframing and turning upside down, inside out, and breaking and stretching. There is suffering because of that. The suffering is in the service of this telos rather than the suffering being a result of a cause in the past.

It's such an unfashionable and rare way of conceiving now.

As pointed out, Hegel was fond of that kind of teleological causality, that teleological way of thinking. It's a very different way of looking at this dukkha going on now. We immediately go back to the past. I'll come back to this. We immediately go back—it's caused by what happened to me when I was a child, it's caused by my family situation, it's caused by something intrauterine, it's caused by a past life. It's always past. Maybe there's a whole other way, or a whole other conception that we can entertain at times.

Again, this really isn't dogmatic. I'm not suggesting replacing one so-called truth with another claimed truth. But it might be interesting to be able to switch between, to move in and out of these very different conceptions—almost polarly opposite conceptions of causality. Cause in the past leading to the present, or cause somehow strangely teleologically in the future, so to speak, explaining, if you like, my suffering now, this dukkha now.

Again, it might arise through the practice, through soul-making practice, or it may be something—what would it be to just play with this? Not as a replacement forever, but as a very different view. What unfolds in the present moment becomes very different, because we're bringing a different way of looking. Part of the way of looking is the concept, and part of conceptuality is causality. So if the conception of causality is different, then the conceptual way of looking is different, the way of looking is different, and because of dependent arising, what unfolds is different. What is sensed in the moment is also different.

So then, practically, the question becomes: what can be created and discovered through this dukkha when the logos gives it place and relationship to soul? Now it can still do that in the conception of causes in the past, temporal priority. But what if it was the other way around? What can be created, discovered through this dukkha when the logos gives it place and relationship to soul? The logos gives this dukkha a place, and gives it a place also, potentially teleologically, when we may not exactly see clearly at all where it's headed.

And what limits do we place on what can be created, discovered through that? In other words, do we only discover that clinging and craving bring suffering? Hugely important to see. Or do we create and discover more than just that insight as well? Really important insight—fabrication, clinging and craving bring suffering. Or is there more too? We create and discover more than that. Are we placing limits on what can be created and discovered through this dukkha? The telos is open. It's not so much an arrival point as a movement, an open-ended movement. And the creation-discovery that's possible through this very dukkha is potentially open-ended, if we don't limit it.

So all this brings up questions regarding the contextualization of soul-making, logos if you like, with respect to the Four Noble Truths. And wrapped up in that, it also brings up questions of the interpretation of the Four Noble Truths. I've talked about this before, especially in those talks "Questioning Awakening" and "Buddhism Beyond Modernism" and "In Praise of Restlessness."

So Four Noble Truths—everyone agrees on the Four Noble Truths. But what is dukkha? How are we regarding that? What is it exactly that we're addressing that's dukkha? And what does the third noble truth, freedom from dukkha, look like? And what exactly is involved in the second noble truth, the arising and the causing of dukkha?

Just listening to the range of Gaia House teachers, what a range there is. Everyone uses the language of Four Noble Truths, and yet they're kind of just empty words that get filled with really very different meanings and ranges and directions and concerns and developments.

Compare, if we're talking about Four Noble Truths, a vision where the Third Noble Truth, freedom from dukkha, really means ending rebirth once and for all. Dukkha really means this whole being caught up in this endless cycle of samsara, of being reborn in different realms and worlds and circumstances and all that pain, and ending all that with the ending of rebirth. Arahantship is the priority, is really the priority of the path. That's the whole gearing and conception—everything in the path is aimed at heading towards that.

And compare that with a probably more common version in our times, where the path is primarily concerned with erasing and doing away with unnecessary suffering, primarily by simplifying the way the mind gets entangled in things and makes things complex with all its ideas and relationships and selfing and business like that, just really draining out all that unnecessary suffering through simplification and letting go. And then that becomes the vision of the third noble truth, the vision of what we're addressing as the first noble truth, and the vision of the freedom from it. The entanglement and complication, papañca, in that meaning of just the mind's complicating things, is viewed as the second noble truth.

In a way, sometimes I've alluded to this before, sometimes that kind of emphasis on simplifying is exactly, at times, in opposition to soul-making, which enriches, gives more dimension, gives complexity, invites the complexity and fluidity of logos, and also invites image and the imaginal imagination, all that.

So in those two views or paradigms of the Four Noble Truths—ending rebirth as a priority, or this erasing unnecessary suffering, obliterating unnecessary suffering by simplifying one's mind and one's relationship with the world—in a way there's no...

Looking at these paradigms more deeply, I observe that there's no conscious place—and I want to emphasize the word "conscious"—given for soul-making in the obvious articulation of either of these frameworks. I'll return to why this distinction matters.

But there's another paradigm, quite popular these days, which we might call existentialist. It's similar to the second one, except it focuses even more intensely on dukkha—clinging to the dukkha of existence and the tragic impermanence of our existential situation. Here in this world, everyone and everything, ourselves included, remains impermanent. This view seeks to alleviate some of the extra suffering of that condition, but wants to hang onto what it sees as the undoubted, basic, real fact—the facticity of existence's dukkha, the tragic impermanence of this world. There is nothing else but that.

Our task in the Third Noble Truth becomes reconciling ourselves to this tragedy, this tragic impermanence, this existential predicament. Sometimes there's an almost clinging quality to this vision, an insistence on this reality being the only reality. The existential predicament becomes paramount. One emphasizes the tragic impermanence more than the particular personhood or the particulars that are lost through impermanence. It's almost as if the impermanence itself becomes more important, more interesting, more clung to than the actual particular—the wonder that is lost, the beauty and depths of that beauty of this person, that personhood, this element of being.

In this clinging, a kind of rigidity sometimes emerges, a dogmatic assertion: no divinity allowed. Even if you experience a sense of divinity in meditation or in nature, it's dismissed as illusion. It's regarded a priori as something to dismiss. Even the idea that such experiences might be worthy—not discoveries, but creations—is seen as taking you away from the primacy and dominant, hard reality of our existential facticity, the tragic impermanence of ourselves and everything we encounter.

So a kind of clinging can creep in. For some people holding such a view, when this paradigm frames and fills out the meaning of the Four Noble Truths, there's a rigidity and a disallowing of what might actually emerge organically in perception and experience—dimensionality, divinity, soul.

But in all three views—ending rebirth as priority, erasing unnecessary suffering by simplifying the mind's relationship with things, and this modernist existentialist focus on the existential predicament and hard reality of tragic impermanence—I would say something crucial: don't believe the official versions of whatever doctrine is spelled out.

Look through the understanding of soul-making logos at what's actually happening. Soul-making and fantasy always creep in—they're always already there wherever there is love, wherever something is truly alive for us, wherever we're committed. Any of these paradigms, when a person is actually committed, when they're on fire with their practice—even if they insist they only teach the ending of rebirth and everything is geared toward that—soul-making and fantasy have crept into the whole thing, pervading it around the edges.

The same holds for someone emphasizing simplicity and letting go, erasing unnecessary suffering. There's still talk that creeps in about beauty, about something that inspires not just the heart but the soul. In the existentialist paradigm, one may be enamored of a certain fantasy of self and world, situated in a fantastical narrative that gives something to the soul—which is, to a certain extent, soul-making.

Wherever something's really alive, wherever we love something, wherever we're truly committed, soul-making fantasy is already there, already pervading, already in the cracks.

This recognition is crucial because if we don't acknowledge and identify this reality, we're not seeing what Derrida would call what's at the margins of our philosophy. We have this neat arrangement of ideas that all fits together, perhaps aligning with what the Buddha said, with terms we can translate and interpret in familiar ways. But actually, there's all this activity at the margins—where much of our juice comes from, our fire, our sense of beauty, and actually much of whatever soul-making is happening.

A fuller path, a fuller logos, a fuller conceptual framework needs to acknowledge this thing called soul-making and this thing called eros for which we don't really have adequate words, which don't usually get included in the paradigm but are there, functioning, operating, vital and vitalizing. A more adequate conception of the path, including its relation to the Four Noble Truths, is made richer by including these elements.

This is what we outlined earlier through Hegel's understanding of suffering and its direction. But more importantly, there's this vision of a path that gives soul-making priority, that re-enchants dukkha and eventually recognizes the necessity of this dukkha—this particular narrative I'm in—for the divine, or to the divine. These are quite different ways of situating or conceiving what suffering is, how it arises, what we're doing with it, where we're trying to go with it.

I believe I mentioned in the Path of the Imaginal retreat, perhaps in the Soul-making talks, that how we conceive of soul-making in relation to ending suffering—in relation to the Four Noble Truths framework—how we contextualize or inter-contextualize the two depends on our individual soul styles, our individual soul moods at any time, and our individual fantasies. This includes where we are in our own movement with all this material.

One could conceive of the whole soul-making paradigm as a movement beyond the boundaries of the Four Noble Truths and classical Buddhadharma. One could conceive of it as gently pushing at the edges and stretching them, essentially expanding what Buddhadharma is for contemporary times. Or one could conceive and articulate it as being within Buddhadharma—just highlighting certain aspects that perhaps don't usually get emphasized, but remaining within the paradigm of the Four Noble Truths.

Where we stand among these positions, which of these conceptual structures we inhabit, seems to me itself a soul question. One person tends toward a radical, wall-breaking, barrier-breaking identity. Another wants to identify with tradition, with what's more conservative, feeling themselves within that continuity. Still another wants to see their soul as on the edge of what's being developed and stretched.

We can go to a whole meta-level here and recognize that even our philosophical positioning becomes part of the soul's movement, part of how the imaginal is working through our understanding of the path itself.

In a way pointing out that the very way one might want to conceive of this whole logos that we're unfolding itself depends on individual soul styles, individual soul journeys, individual soul moods. In other words, it might even change from day to day for a person.

That realization itself is radical because it gives a kind of primacy to soul, to the imaginal, to fantasy. So not to be too bothered—do you understand? To not be too bothered whether I conceive it this way or that way. We could do it this way, we could do it that way, we could do it another way. It depends on soul. It depends on soul style, on soul mood. That itself is quite a radical position, if you like, that gives primacy to soul.

I've said this before, I'm pretty sure. Let's stay with this a little bit, because again, I'm pretty sure I've said this, but I've pointed out when I talked about the different kinds of fantasies we have of our path and goal, that what I call the medical model—the model that really conceives of what we're doing and the direction of what we're doing as the alleviation of suffering, either the ending of suffering or the alleviation of suffering—what I call the medical model, which is actually a model that the Buddha himself used, deliberately framing his teachings in an analogous way to the way a doctor would frame things in his time in India.

And I pointed out, and I still hold with it, that it may be that if we're too wedded to a medical model of the path and our path, if we emphasize that medical model too much and there's not much else going on in our fantasy and conception of the path, that restriction of the fantasy and the conception of the path may itself limit the soul-making. We're emphasizing too much a certain model that concerns itself primarily with alleviating suffering. And there may be something in that—limitations in that intention—that limit the soul-making that's then available to us.

Because an alternative would be—and I know some of you feel this way, at least at times—the sense or the feeling that something is more important to me than ending dukkha, than this Third Noble Truth of ending dukkha. Actually, to be honest, I care more about something else. Something else is more important than ending dukkha, whatever that would even look like to end dukkha. So we could frame things that way. We could arrange things that way so that the soul-making paradigm, that being more important than ending dukkha, as one point of view.

Or we could also do something else, or frame things in a different way, and suggest that much of the dukkha in modern times that you and I experience—I mean, there's a lot of horrific suffering in the world—but much of the dukkha of modern times comes from the loss of or the absence of meaningfulness in our lives, or any sense that any meaningfulness that we can feel in our life has any kind of deep roots ontologically that we can relate to. It's only a construct. A loss or an absence of the sense of dimensional-ity of existence, of the depths of divinity, a loss of enchantment, a loss of a sense of duty that again is given to us in a way that's more than just my personal decision or invention.

And it may be—or one could say and suggest—that these losses, these absences of soul permeating much of modern life in our culture, then exacerbate, give rise to a lot of the ecological crises we face. Because we look at nature as something completely flat and lacking in sacredness, and we can't galvanize a care for it, or a depth of care, a depth of reverence that would come from sensing it with soul.

So if we view things that way, if we frame things that way and make that suggestion that, hey, look where a lot of the dukkha is coming from in our modern affluent Western existence, and what ensues from that lack, from that loss, from that absence of soul, then we could say that the movement of soul-making, the engagement of the soul-making dynamic and that whole direction is actually reducing suffering because it heals, it addresses that lack, that absence of soul. Therefore, because it's just a part or a dimension or a level of the suffering that gets healed, we can place the whole thing, the whole paradigm of soul-making, squarely and easily in the Four Noble Truths. Again, with our particular interpretation of what exactly is involved in dukkha, the First Noble Truth, and what exactly is entailed by the freedom from dukkha, and how exactly dukkha arises. But the whole thing is then framed within the Four Noble Truths.

If I share just personally... The hardest thing for me—and again, this is just personal—but the hardest thing for me in being ill the last two and a half years was not the original diagnosis and realizing what that meant, to have pancreatic cancer. It was not the operation and the kind of severe incapacity and weakness that I had for about a year afterwards and still carry, really. It was not the prognosis when they found where the cancer was at and all that. The hardest thing for me, and the most dukkha for me, was not the idea of dying. It was going for the weekly chemotherapy infusions at the oncology department in a hospital nearby, which is about an hour away. That was the hardest thing for me.

And it was something very particular that was the hardest thing. It really was, I have to say, at the edge of my practice, at the edge of what I could embrace with my practice in a way that actually significantly reduced the difficulty of it. So it wasn't the unpleasantness and the pain of feeling sick and toxic from the chemotherapy. That was all there, and it was definitely difficult. Nor was it being hooked up to this infusion thing and this drip computer machine going in your veins—and I had chronic urgent diarrhea from the chemotherapy and post-operation, so you're in this ward with this, hooked up to all this considerable encumbrance of contraption, and knowing I'm sitting there and I might suddenly and urgently have to get up and run to the toilet to move my bowels, with all that chemotherapy paraphernalia attached to me and infusing and whatnot.

Nor was it—the most difficult thing was not like being really cogently reminded of my own mortality and the possibility of my dying very soon just by virtue of being in that situation, feeling the way I was feeling and having all this kind of heavy-duty chemotherapy and all that. And nor was it actually the fact of just seeing so much suffering. I mean, sometimes it's pretty grim in the chemotherapy ward in terms of what people are going through and what kind of state they're in. Sometimes young people, and the other patients. And nor was it the fact that the staff and the doctors or nurses were unkind. For the most part, actually, they were very kind and caring and helpful and sort of pleasant.

The most difficult thing for me—I can only speak for myself—the most difficult thing for me to handle and to practice skillfully and adequately with was the soullessness of the place.

That was the hardest thing.

It's been the hardest thing so far with the osteoporosis, with the chemotherapy, post-operation, with the diagnosis, with the prognosis, with the possibility of dying, with the sleepless nights, with the lack of energy, with the restriction on what I can do and where I can go and hardly going out of the house. The hardest thing was the soullessness of that oncology department for me. The absence there of any beauty or any consideration of beauty or any consideration of what we would call soulfulness in the way it was designed and how it worked. It's that plastic and stale, actually diesel-filled toxic air being recycled and death everywhere, the possibility of death all around vividly there and yet not being engaged or talked about or met soulfully, it seemed to me.

So I could say I was not able to perceive the soul in that place. I could say it like that. And all of this, all this soullessness, when in the face of death, in the face of the proximity of death, the possible soonness of death, one needs soulfulness the most. That was the most difficult thing for me.

Someone said, I don't know if it's true, I think it must be true, there's some anecdote about Oscar Wilde's dying words in bed and dying. And his final dying words, looking at the wallpaper in his room and saying out loud to the wallpaper, so to speak, "One of us has to go."

You know, he's a funny guy, Oscar Wilde, but he was also, I think, very soulful and concerned with soul. And it may be that those dying words were not so much, or not just a kind of comically out-of-place flippancy and superficiality next to death, just a concern with the decor, but actually a concern with beauty and a statement of the fundamental and absolute importance of beauty as a necessity for soul. I mean, I don't know. But I think about those words again, which I used to find just witty—it's good to go out with a witty aphorism. Maybe there's a whole other level there.

We could say beauty, soul-making, soulfulness, they're useless values. Beauty is certainly regarded as a luxury and soulfulness as a kind of luxury, and it doesn't really achieve much materially. In a way they're useless. But maybe the useless values are the most important and the most worthwhile. We can feel that they are—not instead of having our basic prerequisites met of food and shelter and clothing and warmth or healthy life for the body, safe society. Maybe when the basic prerequisites are met, when the sort of gross neuroticism is at least placated or healed, when the most difficult psychological patterns are healed, when there's a basic kindness pervading, then what? Then what? End suffering? End all suffering?

Somewhere in the Pali Canon, the Buddha says, maybe several times or implies, that basic prerequisites—food, shelter, medicine, clothing—need to be there to allow or need to be there as a basis for practice and the path for the quest for what is most important and most worthwhile, which was nibbāna. So he pointed out, this needs to be there. Without that, you can't really give your attention and give your energy and give your commitment to trying to reach nibbāna, which is actually the most important thing.

But in the paradigm of endless cycles and possibly infinite cycles of death and rebirth, that perilous process, sort of adrift on a vast cosmic ocean of enormous, infinite spans of time and infinite worlds perhaps, and just being reborn dependent on karma one didn't even know what that was—all the vicissitudes and ups and downs and kind of wild circumstances that one found oneself in. So much suffering is at stake in whether that just goes on and on and on with all that suffering or whether one can find a way out of that endless, endless suffering.

So for him, reading him as actually that vision of nibbāna, that vision of the Third Noble Truth was actually what he was orienting towards. So much suffering at stake. That was the most important thing.

But if our version of awakening or version of the Third Noble Truth doesn't involve or assume all those infinite cycles of rebirth and that degree of dukkha... And again, he was in a world where there wasn't modern medicine and painkillers and antibiotics. There's not even the possibility that people would have that. Now at least we have the possibility—it's not an actuality in our world, but the possibility that everyone in the world has access to modern medicine and painkillers, which is not the case right now. Antibiotics, etc.

But for him, looking around, just what horrendous suffering, and you're on this roulette wheel of where you end up, life after life after life, and if you have a good one, you probably have a bad one, because you've probably got some bad karma waiting to ripen that you don't even know about.

So in the absence, or when our vision or conception of awakening doesn't involve or assume all those infinite cycles of rebirth and all the horrendous pitfalls of that perilous rollercoaster, what then is the most important and worthwhile thing to practice for, to practice towards, after basic prerequisites are met? Again, the Buddha said, after basic prerequisites are met, this ending of the cycle of rebirth, ending of this again and again and again, in ad infinitum of the pain of birth, being separated from what we love, and death. What's the most important thing? For him it was ending rebirth after the basic prerequisites are met.

If we don't have that paradigm anymore, and many of you don't, what then becomes the most important thing? And could, in a way, the most important thing be something that is in some way useless? Soul-making, beauty becomes the most worthwhile.

So there's a suffering that I think probably you wouldn't be listening at this point if this wasn't the case for you, but there's the suffering of the absence of soul, the absence of soulfulness. We're missing something. There's the suffering of the failure to honour what seems or is, from a certain perspective, useless.

It's useless, but I miss it. And when we miss it, when there is that absence, when it's not addressed, when it's not included, when it's not allowed, when it's inhibited, there is a suffering—the suffering of the absence of soul.

This recognition points to something profound about the human condition. We can have all our basic needs met, live in relative comfort and security, yet still feel that something essential is missing. That something is often precisely what conventional wisdom would label as impractical or unnecessary—beauty, meaning, depth, the sacred dimension of existence.

The Buddha's teaching of the Four Noble Truths remains eternally relevant, but perhaps we need to expand our understanding of what constitutes suffering in our contemporary context. Beyond the obvious forms of dukkha—pain, loss, impermanence—there exists this subtler but equally real suffering that arises when we neglect the soul's deeper yearnings.

When we fail to honor what appears useless but feeds something essential within us, we create a particular kind of emptiness. This isn't the beneficial emptiness that the Dharma points toward—śūnyatā or suññatā—but rather a hollow absence where richness and meaning should flourish.

The path forward may require us to hold both truths simultaneously: the classical understanding that attachment to the beautiful and meaningful can indeed cause suffering, and the recognition that complete dismissal of these dimensions of human experience creates its own form of dukkha. Perhaps wisdom lies not in choosing between utility and beauty, between the practical and the soulful, but in finding ways to engage with both that honor our full humanity while remaining aware of the potential for attachment.

In this light, the cultivation of soul—through art, beauty, contemplation, and meaning-making—becomes not a distraction from the spiritual path but an integral part of it. The challenge is to engage with these dimensions of existence in ways that nourish rather than bind us, that open the heart without creating new forms of clinging.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 123

Dukkha and Soul-Making (Part 8)

Rob Burbea · 1h21

In this eighth part of his exploration of dukkha and soul-making, Rob Burbea examines how our conceptual frameworks fundamentally shape what we perceive as the causes of suffering. Through a detailed case study involving childhood images and fantasies, he contrasts traditional psychological interpretations focused on past trauma with alternative frameworks like James Hillman's archetypal psychology and teleological causality. Burbea critiques the cultural tendency to narrow explanations of dukkha to individual psychological history while overlooking broader environmental, political, and spiritual causes. Drawing parallels with philosophy of science, he advocates for flexibility between multiple conceptual frameworks rather than attachment to single explanatory paradigms. This approach, he suggests, supports more open-ended soul-making practices that don't rely on fixed developmental stages or final goals, thereby reducing the ego-measurement and inner critic that often arise in more structured spiritual paths. The talk emphasizes how our participation in perception through conception actively shapes the evolution of psychological and spiritual phenomena in time.

We've been talking about dukkha and soul-making and that whole nexus between the two—how they bear on each other. This draws in, of course, the structure of the Four Noble Truths and our interpretation and conception of them, and their relationship with soul-making, because the Four Noble Truths deal essentially with dukkha: its arising, its causes, its release.

We began this exploration many parts ago, looking at and drawing attention to the ways it's sometimes possible for imaginal practices or soul-making practices—if they're related to in the wrong way or if we don't quite have the right pieces in place—to actually give rise to dukkha. Then we moved on to examine some of the ways and aspects of how imaginal perception, sensing with soul, can actually release dukkha and relieve suffering.

If we stay with that piece a little longer—the way soul-making practices relieve dukkha—we've talked extensively about individual instances and what's going on there and how that works. We could also make an observation at a larger scale.

It seems to me that it's much less likely for the inner critic to arise, or the kind of suffering of ego measurement to arise, in the context of or in relation to soul-making practices and that whole soul-making path. It's much less likely for that kind of suffering—ego measurement, inner critic—to arise there than it is in relationship to, say, emptiness practices, or the movement and quest for the unfabricated, or jhana practice and the exploration of the eight jhanas that the Buddha referred to, or the whole search for stream entry or other stages of awakening.

This is just an observation, and it makes a lot of sense to me why that might be so. At least the way we have been presenting it, this soul-making business is without any final goal. Unlike jhana, or the unfabricated, or stream entry, there are no stages of progress or a final goal mapped out. I would actually rather conceive the path as more open-ended that way.

So there aren't these gradations of progress, stages of progress by which one measures one's progress, nor some final goal that one can say, "I've arrived at, I haven't arrived, my friends arrived, but I haven't." In the absence of that kind of ladder of measurement, the ego structures around measurement and the inner critic have no scaffolding on which to fabricate themselves. And so that whole pain—so difficult for so many people in our culture today, the whole pain of that inner critic and self-measurement and ego comparison—really doesn't arise so much. It seems really not to arise so much in the soul-making movement and soul-making practices.

As I said, this is something we'll return to. But today I want to dwell a little on a larger level, talking about paradigms and conceptual frameworks with respect to dukkha and how we conceive of dukkha and the causality of dukkha.

Let me share something from an interview some time ago with a student who asked to talk about soul-making, imaginal practice, and that kind of thing. I have her permission to share this, as usual.

Quite a lot came up, and she was telling me as part of the interview about experiences she'd had in relation to eros and image from her childhood through her adulthood. She shared that she came from a childhood where her parents quarreled quite a lot, and that wasn't something she liked at all. She really wished that they hadn't quarreled so much and found it difficult and unpleasant.

She also shared that perhaps when she was around eight, she used to go to bed and, awake in bed, would have these fantasies or images—it was a little vague, but something like some men taking her or dragging her down into some kind of mine or coal mine, and then doing sexual things with her or to her. I don't think she used the word abuse, but we were exploring this a little bit, and I asked her what that felt like, or what its effect was, and what exactly they did, and she couldn't remember what the effect was, or what her feeling about it was at the time.

Let's just slow down here. I don't want to ride roughshod over this. I know that just hearing that kind of image, just as an image, can have quite an impact. There's been a lot of news recently about sexual abuse and actually the exposure of that in Hollywood and the film industry and elsewhere. So just take time here and take care of yourself if that brings up difficult stuff for you.

What I want to focus on here is something about images and conceptual frameworks. This is an instance of an image. In an instance of actual abuse, it's really important, of course, that it needs to be exposed, addressed, confronted, and healed. And that healing actually involves not just the victim, but also the perpetrator, who can only do such things when there's some kind of wounding at some level in the psyche.

Here I'm not dwelling so much on that, but I want to make a point about images and conceptual frameworks and assumptions around causality. I'm aware that even just sharing that as an image can have an impact, so I want to take care around that.

She also shared that she was raised as a practicing Catholic in that household with a Christian education. And she also had in her youth fantasies of what she called sexual union with God. Again, they weren't very specific fantasies, but they were definitely there.

As she grew up and still in the Catholic faith, she shared several things which showed how she was not—and never really seemed to be—a weak character, easily dominated in life, nor dominating either. She had this Catholic upbringing, and around ten years old...

She had a Catholic teacher, a woman she deeply loved and admired. One day they were waiting together for confession when this student noticed her beloved teacher wearing furs—a coat or scarf of some kind. Without hesitation, she challenged her teacher directly: "Why are you wearing dead animals? Why are you wearing furs?"

The Catholic teacher was visibly stunned by this question. She actually got up, went to consult with her colleagues, and returned after several minutes with her response: "God told us to subjugate other animals."

Right there and then, this student lost all interest in Catholicism. There was a spirit in her willing to question authority and make her own moral decisions. Even though she loved this teacher dearly, she recognized that this path was not worthy of pursuit.

Later, something remarkably similar occurred when she became involved in the Zen tradition and began meditating. She questioned a roshi or teacher about the Japanese army's use of comfort women during World War II. This teacher gave her an answer that basically justified this abuse of women by Japanese soldiers, claiming it wasn't wrong.

Once again, this student immediately dismissed any authority she had granted to this teacher and that entire lineage. She lost interest and moved elsewhere, eventually finding herself in the Insight Meditation tradition.

There too, she experienced another pattern—having erotic feelings and even sexual images in relation to a female teacher, though this wasn't her typical sexual orientation. Similar experiences occurred with teachers of different genders.

Why am I sharing all this? This was part of a much larger conversation, but what I want to dwell on here relates to my earlier point about images, conceptual frameworks, and assumptions about causality.

During that lengthy interview, we explored that initial image of the coal mine—that sexual image of being dragged or taken down. One piece I brought up was the myth of Persephone, which you may know. Persephone was a young, beautiful goddess out with her friends on a mountainside in spring, picking flowers. As she stooped to pick up a particularly beautiful bloom, Hades, the god of the underworld, either disguised as the flower or somehow using it, snatched her and dragged her down into his realm.

What follows is a long, complex myth involving her mother Demeter's grief and desperate search. The outcome is that Persephone becomes Hades' wife and queen of the underworld, dividing her time between the upper world—our world of earth and nature—and the underworld, the realm of spirits and souls. She spends half the year in each domain.

I'm drawing here from James Hillman, who uses this myth as an archetypal presentation of what he calls the initiation into the underworld of soul. In his view, this doesn't necessarily have anything to do with sexual violence or sexuality per se. It's a myth of being pulled down—of apparent innocence being drawn into an entirely different dimension involving darkness that is actually about soul. The underworld is the realm of souls.

This relates to death and the seemingly pathological sides of the soul. As I mentioned in an earlier talk, Hillman maintained a real emphasis on the pathological—the necessity, in his view, for the soul to pathologize, to create complexities, ensnarements, and entanglements in dukkha.

So this myth of Persephone being dragged into the underworld, where she eventually finds herself completely in her element, represents an initiation into the underworld of soul and soul-making. It's not about evil, not necessarily about sexuality in Hillman's interpretation, but about a movement at some point in one's life into the realm of soul—including its pathology and darker dimensions.

I was sharing this perspective during our conversation, and we explored together a possible interpretation or conceptual framework to bring to bear on these memories and images the student was sharing. Perhaps this was the beginning of this kind of initiation into a darker form of soul-making.

By "dark," I don't mean evil—I don't even necessarily mean sexual, although it might be in this case, given the fantasies of sexual union with God and the eros toward different teachers. But this represents an initiation into different kinds, different faces of divinity. Persephone's mother is Demeter, goddess of earth, fields, agriculture, and earthiness. Hades is god of the underworld, of shades, ghosts, and souls—a very different kind of divinity altogether.

They are both gods. Hades is sometimes also Dionysus—they are sometimes equated. So the myth functions as a kind of initiation, an opening into suddenly a different realm, different kinds and faces of divinity, different theophanies, different kinds of beauty that are darker, more complex, more shadowy, involving death and the metaphor of death and the soul meaning of death.

And so could it be—and again, I'm not insisting on this, just opening up a possibility—could it be that what is initiated by the arising of these images for this young girl are the seeds or the prompting of a movement that may take decades to mature in the soul? Just as I think in the story of Persephone and Hades, it took her a while, it took that whole process a while to mature and reach—not agreement, that's not the right word—but a new point of balance, if you like, with her being queen of the underworld.

Could it be that, as I've pointed out, this soul-making—one of the ways I feel it's very important to see it, or one of the most important aspects of it—is this expanding of the range of the sacred, opening to more kinds of beauty, more kinds and places and directions of sacredness and divinity? And that includes, for some people at least, opening to the dark and maybe the sexual and maybe these kinds of divinity and beauty, and the possibility of sensing, engaging, and being worked on by those directions, those dimensions, those colors as soul-making—opening up and discovering and creating beauty and divinity in those directions and dimensions, with those faces and those kinds.

So that would be a very different kind of theory to "explain" the arising of these images than some of the more familiar psychological theories that we're exposed to.

So it's really this business about conceptual frameworks and ideas and assumptions about causality that I want to just open up a little bit and bring into our consideration. Very often we might hear someone share something very similar—like that image from a young time, an image of being dragged or taken underground where something sexual happens—and we might very easily infer conceptions of causality. "Infer" means to carry in—from the Latin—we sort of carry in conceptions.

Now this, of course, is related to what I've kept emphasizing over and over again: that concepts and conceptual frameworks imbue our perception. They're involved in any way of looking. Most of the time we're not conscious of exactly what conceptions are involved. Most of the time we don't have much flexibility with what conceptions are involved, but they come in, they are inferred, they are carried in, and they color, shape, and determine to a large extent what we then see—and of course how we feel about it, how we react, how we respond.

So often we hear something like that—an image like that—and almost without being able to help ourselves, the mind brings in conceptions of causality. And causality usually functions in terms of from past to present to future. Something must have happened before she was eight years old to give rise to these images. So something in the past gave rise to those images, and there's a causal explanation based on temporal priority—versus, as I mentioned the other day, what we might call a teleological explanation or teleological causality, if you like, where somehow the being, the psyche, and what arises is pulled toward something, or pulled—for example, one explanation was that the image arises and it's pulling us toward something that we don't even quite know what it is. It's pulling us toward a certain possibility, toward a certain opening or direction or door of soul-making.

So in that teleological view, the cause, if you like, is in the future. But it's not a finished fact in the future—it's a very different way of conceiving of causality, a very different conceptual framework. Rather than the view—which could be a very possible and viable view of causality—that this image arose for her when she was eight years old because something in the past happened that caused her to have such a pathological image, or what many people would interpret as a pathological image.

And that too is open to questioning, because when I asked her, she actually couldn't remember what the feeling of those images was. It might have been that she enjoyed them, that they were beautiful and rich. It might have been that they were distressing—maybe a combination. There are much richer differentiations we could make between possibilities of how it actually felt for her, what effect it had, but she couldn't remember.

The question is: could we, in a teleological way, rather than assuming something happened that was difficult and gave rise to this particular pathological expression, this particular pathological image—could we consider that actually in the seeming pathology of this image, the soul is, in a teleological way, drawing us toward something? The seeds are in the future. This is the seed being planted from the future, opening up or leading us, inviting us to a door of—in this case—wider, deeper, and different kinds of soul-making.

So one of the points I want to make is: can we look at and question, can we be aware of and then also question whatever tendencies we have of assumption and leaning and narrowing of interpretation or concept regarding causes in the psyche and for the psyche? Can we acknowledge and be aware of how much cultural conditioning there is that creates habits of assumption, tendencies to lean this way, tendencies to narrow the conception and assumption in certain ways?

So there's quite a lot to this, but let's slow down. For the most part—except perhaps in times when we're attempting to practice a very close, very narrowly focused, microscopic awareness or mindfulness or so-called "bare attention"—and in a funny way, for all the clarity that they seem to bring, they also bring their own kind of blindness. When you're myopically staring at something so close, you tend to not see the bigger picture.

But for the most part, human beings, in our awareness of things, in our mindfulness of things, in our everyday awareness, we see and experience things with and through some lens that involves concepts of causality. The causality, as I said, is part of the conceptual framework that goes on—most often not explicit as thinking, not even that conscious—but then it can become conscious, or we elaborate on it, or we draw it out as a conclusion, or we insist on it. But whether we do that or not, it's woven into our actual experience, our actual ways of looking.

Ways of looking tend to include some or other concepts around causality. When we hear about a student's images from childhood, we naturally tend to see them as results and/or as causes, or at least as nodes in a causal network of other events, inner and outer. This is either the result of something inner or outer, or it's the cause of something inner or outer. This is simply part of the way we tend to see the world. It's part of the way consciousness works, for the most part, unless we really try to make it otherwise at times, with certain ways of looking.

So whether those images the student shared with me are considered the results—as representations of some actual abuse or trauma—perhaps she was sexually abused, and these images are telling her that story, a replay or representation of that experience, or a metaphor for some other kind of psychic abuse or trauma or ongoing situation. They might be considered either representations of actual abuse or trauma, or the result of her psyche's response to that actual abuse or some kind of ongoing traumatic situation in her environment, in her upbringing, in her family.

For example, a response of avoidance through papañca, through daydreaming. Her parents quarreled—did you catch that bit? Did the mind connect that? Her parents quarreled. So this creates a difficult environment, and she's avoiding that kind of psychic pain through daydreaming, through papañca, and through craving for and grasping at the pleasant vedanā of this kind of sexual, erotic fantasy.

Or the images might be considered the result of the soul and the eros seeking what's possibly its natural and fundamental movement and inclination to create and discover new and other areas, other realms, aspects, colors and faces for soul-making—in other words, the divinity of the dark and of the sexually erotic in this case. These are very different ideas about the causality going on.

However we are considering it, we usually see and experience what we hear in this case—these images—as a result of something or other. The mind tends to put it in a causal network. And likewise, we will always tend to see it, sense it, interpret it as causal, as causally implicative of something or other.

Psychological theories and conceptual frameworks come in, and we say, "Oh, this is going to be causal of the perpetuation of that trauma." In other words, if as a little girl she has those kinds of fantasies after this or that trauma and woundedness, unless she attends to it and has help attending to it properly and understanding it correctly—understanding why she's having it as a result of this abuse or whatever—then that trauma is just perpetuated in the psyche and in the nervous system, unless it's attended to and understood "correctly."

Or from a more narrowly classical Buddhist perspective, indulging in those kinds of fantasies would just be reinforcing tendencies of craving, aversion, and the delusive habit of papañca, of daydreaming. Never mind the cause of these fantasies—these kinds of images you're having are just building craving for that kind of sexual pleasure, or aversion to what's actually going on in the moment, the way things really are, or it's just the delusive habit of papañca, just daydreaming. Imagination is nothing but that.

Or again, they're causal—they're the first movements, the first shoots from the seed towards opening different directions of soul-making, perhaps in a Catholic upbringing, towards certain colors of soul-making, certain directions. Perhaps this was the first little shoot coming out of the seed of a different direction, opening up a different direction.

These perspectives are quite different in terms of causes and causation—what might be the causes of this kind of image and that kind of indulgence, if we use that word, and what that might cause, where it might be going if it carries on, if one practices that, if one indulges in that.

We're always, or almost always, seeing things in terms of causation and in terms of past and future and the connection between things or events, past, present, and future. How we are conceiving and perceiving a thing or event in terms of its causation and its effects, or the range of possibilities we are considering as its potential effects—what we bring in, in terms of those assumptions and concepts about cause and effect, and the range of possibilities that we even admit into our conceptual framework in terms of potential effects—that determines, that's part of how we actually approach that thing or event, what we then do with it and to it, how we respond to it.

How those images and that psychic fact—that fact of the psyche of these images arising and whatever feelings—how that is then steered depends on our conceptions. We're participating in its evolution in time through our inferring, our carrying in of different ideas, concepts around cause and effect and that whole nexus between past and future and present.

Because we participate in perception that way, and we participate through conception—through different kinds of conception, we participate in perception—we then participate in the evolution of things in time. In this case, of images and of souls and of perhaps sexuality and eros and all kinds of things. We actually create and discover the effects of something by how we interpret it conceptually.

So that's an example of one level of the way that we cannot help but participate in perception. Our participation determines what we see, because how we conceive of the past in relation to the present determines what happens in the present, what we perceive in the present, what we emphasize in the present, and then what unfolds in the future, because it determines all kinds of aspects of how we relate to it.

What I'm wanting to do is open up this whole range of discourse, open up areas and directions and themes for us to consider, for you to consider. Open up the conceptual framework a little bit. Part of that, as I said earlier, is wanting to draw attention to—and hopefully we can all be aware of—just how much we are culturally conditioned in the conceptions that we bring to meet existence, every aspect of existence, from the most seemingly simple material aspect of existence to the most complex and spiritual, including the psychological and the imagination and all kinds of things.

Just to be aware of how conditioned, how culturally conditioned we are. We bring in certain ideas just because we are surrounded by certain ideas or we've been educated with certain ideas in either the larger culture or different subcultures. Then we form habits of assumption, habits of leaning, tendencies and habits to narrow down our range of assumptions.

and concepts operating, and thus what we do with things, how we respond to things, what we feel needs doing, how we conceive them, how we feel about them, all of that.

So to me this is particularly interesting around what arises psychologically for people, and also around pathology—in other words, suffering and dukkha. Sometimes I'm really saying this and pointing this out for the sake of opening up a plurality. I don't want to replace one conceptual framework around causality with another conception around causality, declaring this one's true and that one's not, this is better than that one. I'm really interested and I really hope you can hear this—I want to open up to the possibility that we can actually broaden our range of conceptions and actually learn to see things in different ways and move between these different ways of seeing things. That's the point of all this. I don't want to replace one with another in that kind of rigid movement.

But sometimes what concerns me a little bit is when I sense there's this kind of narrowing going on and this quickness to assume and a sort of lock-in to a certain psychological framework that carries with it all kinds of assumptions that somehow we've stopped questioning.

So from this point of view, and in the spirit of wanting to open up to a plurality, sometimes I wonder why is it that so often—among colleagues and perhaps in the wider culture, in the wider psycho-spiritual movements—the universal experiences and traumas of physical birth and intrauterine experience, or even sometimes the biological fact of the sperm struggling to penetrate the ovular wall, these kinds of physical material facts are given such emphasis?

I've heard people describe feeling in meditation the dukkha of the desperation of the sperm trying to penetrate the wall, experiencing that as suffering now, reliving the pain of that, and believing it's influencing their life—that if they can re-experience that in a certain way and relate to it differently, they'll be freed of the suffering that's being perpetuated in their life right now as a result of that thing in the past.

Sometimes I have no problem with the possibility of that. Sometimes where I get a little bit nervous is just how quickly it can shrink to this emphasis on the past. The past is causal. So why is it that those kinds of things—the trauma of birth, physical birth, the intrauterine existence, the struggle and desperation of the sperm—are considered more significant and more causal for what I experience and feel now, in my case fifty-two years later, or someone else decades later? Why is that given more emphasis and regarded as more significant and more causal than, say, my reading about an oil spill a month ago, two months ago, off the coast of somewhere thousands of miles away?

Why is the focus on the individual and the past of the individual, going back and back and emphasizing the past, given more significance than my reading about an oil spill and how that might cause pain in my soul right now, how that might affect the way I am in relation to the world and the whole patterns that get constructed if I'm exposed to that kind of thing, if I'm in a world that exposes me to that and also exposes me to the kind of seeming lack of care where these things go on and it seems like it's kind of okay, not really that big a deal on the scale of humanity's concerns?

Or my awareness of the demise of the number of birds in Europe—massive demise, even just in the last ten years. In the last twenty years, you know, just at Gaia House, there's a lot less birdsong, a lot less birdsong. Or the demise of forests and Amazon rainforests and actually all kinds of forests everywhere. Or the overwhelming amount of plastic pollution—even today and yesterday I was reading about this massive investment or cooperation between the Trump administration and large fossil fuel companies, ExxonMobil, agreeing to build a hundred-and-eighty-billion-dollar investment in new plastic-making factories in the Texas and Louisiana coastal areas, right when we're in the middle of all this news and alarm about the extent of massive plastic pollution and how long-term and pervading that is.

Why are these things sometimes not brought up for consideration as things that are causative of my dukkha right now? Causative, as I said, of whatever cramping I have in relationships and self-expression, or the pain for some souls when one looks at the world and moves in the world, and it seems that one is surrounded everywhere by an emphasizing and prioritizing of comfort and convenience and pleasure and security, way beyond actual material needs. Everywhere there's this kind of automatic juggernaut running on of just prioritizing those values—comfort, convenience, pleasure, security. They are values, but those values are emphasized, and then seeing, witnessing, moving in a world that for decades has and continues to emphasize those kinds of values and what that gives birth to, the concrete material things and facts and artifacts that that gives birth to in the world.

And the pain of a soul, maybe can't quite even articulate: this is my pain. I'm somehow trapped in this kind of Kafkaesque world where this goes on and so few people even seem to feel it as a concern. And those kinds of values—comfort, convenience, pleasure, security, the lower-level values—are emphasized and prioritized and invested in in this almost unquestioning way, it can seem to a soul in the world. They're emphasized over and above values like beauty and soulfulness and love and truth and exploring what does that mean, what's that journey into opening up more beauty, creating and discovering more beauty and truth? What does that mean? And what are the domains of truth and love and the kinds of love and the manifestations and the expressions and the courage to explore all that?

So all these are different kinds of potential causes of suffering, of dukkha, of pathology, if you like. For me right now, for a soul right now in this world, just as much as what happened in my birth or how it was with my mum when I was a certain age, and certainly going back even more in the womb and with the sperm.

Can we open it up, if it needs opening up?

Can we open it up?

So I have this question sometimes, and yes, sometimes a little nervousness around what appears to me a kind of shrinking and narrowing of concepts, assumptions, and the habits that accompany them. In those ideas that give real priority to what happens in physical birth, what happens in the uterus, and the sperm, it's worth pointing out that those kinds of associations and memories are actually quite conjectural.

They're usually suggested to or interpreted first by some authority figure—a psychotherapist or physical therapist of some kind—and communicated that way, then introjected into the client's experience. Only then does one begin to feel, "Oh yes, I feel this." I'm not denying the truth, but I'm questioning where it actually comes from. What's the mechanism? What's the social mechanism? We talked about how images and soul-making can be communicated in a field—this can too. Again, one wonders about truth and origin.

Whereas the pain around, let's say, oil spills and environmental degradation, and the obliviousness or lack of care that compounds such environmental degradation—what this does to a soul—oftentimes no authority figure needs to point this out. It arises more independently, it seems, at least more independently than sitting in a room with an authority figure who tells them what they're probably experiencing.

In this narrowing down of emphasis to the material past as causal, always bringing in that conception or leaning that way, we can see—from a certain perspective—the dominance of what I called in an earlier retreat the "fantasy of origin," something Nietzsche described. We're somewhat obsessed with how things start: "This is the origin of this now, and it's in the past." We also see, related to that, this logos—this conception of temporally linear causality. The past causes the present, and the present will serve as past cause to the future.

Also wrapped up in this narrowing, though more obscured in the way it's embedded, is the whole history of the modern construction of self. As I've pointed out in previous retreats, how we feel ourselves, how we think about ourselves, and our actual experience of self now in this culture is really quite different from other cultures in the world at present, and from what it was even in these same places in the past.

The way we feel ourselves—we take it for granted. The whole sense of our own individuality and our own individual trajectory, with all the conception of causality wrapped up in that—this entire understanding has a history. It wasn't always that human beings felt themselves like this, assumed that who they were and what a self is and how people feel. This whole sense—it's not even an idea anymore, but has become a visceral sense of what the self is as normal experience.

But again, please, I'm saying all this not to replace one psychological paradigm with another and claim this one's better, more real, or more true. I'm actually more interested in the narrowing, and my hope is that we can open up our views and open up the kinds of conceptual frameworks we can bring to bear and entertain.

It would be extremely silly for me to say that the past doesn't affect the future, or that trauma in one's past or difficult conditions don't affect future growth of a human being. That would be really silly. So I'm not denying that; I'm not denying the importance of those kinds of approaches to looking, healing, and thinking.

What I'm really interested in is opening to a plurality of conceptions—a plurality of conceptual frameworks and causal theories and causal thinking. What happens if we can open up to this plurality and move between different conceptual frameworks? What would that give us? What would that offer? What would that open up for us?

That's really my interest—not to disregard one and replace it with another at all. Each becomes a paradigm, a conceptual framework, a sort of lens that we can enter into regarding this or that suffering or experience, and move between these frameworks.

I think—I can't remember whether I've just written about this recently or shared it in a talk, so excuse me—but I'm not going to elaborate on it fully. However, I would say it's quite possible, using the concepts of eros and soul-making, to construct or discover a kind of psychology, including developmental psychology—a psychology of human development based on eros and soul-making as the primary drives.

When Freud made his psychological theory, it was based on the primary drive of the pleasure principle, with Oedipal fantasies as the foundational images. That was the basis of his theory—the whole developmental impetus in a human being was the pleasure principle seeking pleasure, and how that interacted with family situations and the larger situation of civilization and its laws. These two forces, often in opposition to each other, and what ensued from their contact, determined human development. But what was primary there was the pleasure principle, along with the Oedipal fantasy.

Someone like Douglas Fairbairn, a Scottish psychoanalyst who came much later, placed contact rather than pleasure as the driving principle. This is what the infant wants—contact. Someone like Kohut, in his ego psychology, places self-coherence as primary. The fundamental drive or impetus in the psyche is toward constructing a coherent and stable sense of self or ego.

So we have very different ideas with different psychologies, different psychological paradigms of what is fundamental—what's the fundamental drive. You can hear that, of these three examples—there are many others—the closest sounding to what we're talking about would be Fairbairn's emphasis on contact. The drive for contact, the impetus for human connection drives psychic growth and human development in that psychology.

Contact—you'll recognize from our definition of eros—wanting more contact, more connection, more intimacy, touch, penetration, opening of the beloved other. It's just that for Fairbairn, that contact is more limited in what it means.

It's construed in what we call more of a flatly human way. In our paradigm, it's possible—my point is it's possible—to construct a whole developmental psychology and also a psychology of pathology that's based on eros and soul-making as we are defining those terms as the primary developmental impetus, and then see what comes out of that. That might be really interesting to do.

And in what ways can that... for instance, we talked about the soul-making dynamic getting out of balance with the eros-psyche-logos, or with self, other, world, or whatever. What kind of pathology, what kind of developmental difficulty, or arrest, or imbalance would that give rise to? You understand? I'm not going to go into this. I'm just pointing out something for the sake of a larger point.

So if we talk about developmental psychology, that whole paradigm, or just the psychopathology, or those two paradigms, then we can regard a developmental psychology that focuses on causes in the material past and just goes back, back, back as much as it can to the sperm and maybe even to past lives and whatever, as one possible way of looking, way of conceiving among other options. Can we regard it as one possible angle of direction, way of looking, way of conceiving, conceptual framing, among other options.

So often it seems to me, at least nowadays in the circles I move in—it may be very different in other cultures—but so often it seems to shrink to that, though. It's not one among other options; it just becomes a kind of mononarrative or monoconception. I only have one pair of glasses, and at a certain point I forget that they're even glasses. As I said, sometimes that can become too narrow. That kind of lens can become too narrow. We might miss then the political, social, cultural, environmental causes of dukkha, psychological distress, developmental bending out of shape—and also physical.

It's quite... I think way before I got cancer I pointed out in a talk just how I felt it was really dangerous for people—oftentimes people who don't have cancer or some disease that modern Western medicine has a hard time curing—oftentimes people jump in there and say, "You have this disease, you have this cancer because you haven't dealt with some emotion from the past, you haven't processed it," etc. And it's a kind of gross assumption or a heavy accusation to bring in. And in a way it's really a step too far of this narrowing, or it's an example of a step too far of this kind of narrowing down of the causes of dukkha.

So we neglect to see, well, you know, there's a pretty mind-boggling cocktail of pesticides in our environment. Our air is polluted. Our water, our food. And we forget that because we've somehow narrowed it down to this certain range of causes in the past that actually focus more on the individual and the individual's story, wrapped up into that, constructed, if you like, by the whole construct of the modern, if you like, Western construct of self.

And also sometimes there's a narrowing, and much more often a narrowing, regarding the notion of temporal causality being in the past, as causal of present and origins being in the past. So what if there are just different options available to us in terms of conceptual frameworks? How does it feel when I say that, when I suggest that it could even be possible?

You know, one of the things I'm really quite interested in is the philosophy of science, and in science you can have—in fact you often do have in different points in history, and right now we have—different theories that have equal explanatory power and equal predictive power. And there have been times in history even when two or even three or four theories explain the same physical phenomena, but in very different ways, and predict the same things, but again, for very different reasons.

Then in the realm of science, in the world of science, what tends to happen then—this situation exists and it exists regularly in the history of science—then scientists seek to move towards a consensus where they decide, we now favor this theory. This theory edges it over that one at some point, either because we find different predictions and we do experiments and we realize that this one predicts what happens better, or for other reasons. I'm not going to go into this now, it's actually quite interesting.

There's also, if we talk about conceptual frameworks or theories and truth, there's also, again, I think very interesting debate that's been going on for decades around what actually is the status? What's the link? What's the connection between a theory, a scientific theory, and reality? And we might kind of introduce that kind of thinking here as well, or that kind of questioning.

So there is—forgive me if I get the name not quite right—but there's something called correspondence notions of truth. It means that one believes that this theory or the elements of this theory correspond to actual elements of reality. And that's what you're aiming for when you construct a theory, and that's what you're achieving when you achieve a theory that works, or you're hoping for that. So the theory is actually just a representation, a kind of one-to-one representation of—it corresponds, there's a correspondence of the elements of the theory and the elements of reality.

And there's a different kind of notion of truth that philosophers talk about, and that's called a coherence notion of truth, or coherence emphasis, or something—I can't remember. But what that means is that it's not so much that the theory, the elements of the theory correspond with elements of fact or physical reality. Actually, what you've got when we say this is a truth or this is a theory that works is that the elements of the theory fit together in a coherent way, but more than that, they fit together with other theories that we have, so that they fit well with our sort of, and in a coherent way with our, if you like, family or set of theories and conceptual frameworks for looking at the world and interpreting existence.

So that to me is quite interesting, and what if we reflect in those kind of ways? So some of you have more of a bent to think about these things conceptually, and I think actually it's—for me, it's part of the whole soul-making dynamic at some point to actually ponder these things and kind of exercise one's muscles there. It actually is soul-making.

But if we bring in these concepts or these different notions of truth in relation to the soul-making paradigm and how that may or may not affect our thinking and reflection and use or movement between all these different psychological theories and theories of human development and psychological development and theories of psychopathology, etc., and theories of why dukkha arises now and all that.

And some scientists, so for instance Einstein, actually pointed out that you never really know if it's truth that's being revealed by a theory. And again, also in a different way, Einstein's point was, being a scientist is a bit like being a watch—having a watch, an old-style watch—and you're kind of, you look at the face of it, and you look at the hands and the rest of it, and you can kind of hear it ticking, and all that. And you're really kind of guessing or constructing theories for what's actually going on inside.

But you never really get to see what's going on inside to finally corroborate your theory. And he said science is always like that. We might get to look deeper, so to speak—it might feel like we've got more access to the interior because now we have electron microscopes and other advanced instruments. But actually there's always a level at which you cannot see. So there's a sense that we never really know whether a theory corresponds to reality.

In a very different way, quantum mechanics and what's called the Copenhagen interpretation is saying that our physical theories are not really about what is there. They're about what arises in experiments—what happens on the needles and dials and readouts in the laboratory. The theories are really about that.

Richard Feynman, who won a Nobel Prize for his quantum electrodynamic theory, also said something similar in his Nobel Prize acceptance speech. I was trying to find it before this talk, but I couldn't locate it. But I remember him pointing out how interesting it is that you can have quite different theories that have similar explanatory power and similar predictive power.

Philosophers—many contemporary philosophers—are even more keen on this idea of opening up or questioning the whole relationship between theory or concept and fact, or even perception and so-called reality. There's a long history of this in Western philosophy with Hume and Kant and Nietzsche and even more so later on.

What we have here in all this is the recognition that different conceptual frameworks explain what we witness, explain what we observe in the human being, in our lives, in our experience. Different conceptual frameworks explain that differently, and they lead us in different directions. Maybe that's a better way of saying it—they point us and prompt us in different directions.

Different conceptual frameworks explain what we observe very differently or somewhat differently, and they also direct us in different directions. What I want to suggest and even hope for—partly helped by realizing the thorough and deep and radical emptiness of all things and going into that extensively—is that it's possible to realize there is no ultimate truth of things, no perspective on reality where one can say, "This is how this thing is."

That understanding extends from there. One realizes that and it extends from there. That understanding goes deep, and one realizes it extends also to conceptual frameworks. This doesn't mean they're all equal—we'll return to this in the final talk of this series. But one senses that there is no possibility of arriving at some ultimate truth in that sense.

One begins to sense through these kinds of practices—through emptiness practice, but also through soul-making practice—one really senses one's participation, as I've emphasized several times, one's participation in perception, one's participation through conception in what arises, and even deeper than that, one's participation in the truth, or in what reality is.

Maybe through that—maybe it's already accessible to you through some other facility or natural inclination—it's possible that we can open up for ourselves this flexibility of conceptual frameworks. We are actually free to move between different conceptual frameworks and become adept enough in different conceptual frameworks. We're not relating to any of them as "this is the real one, that's not the real one," or "this one is true, that's not true," or "this is the final explanation of things, of what we see," or "this is the final explanation of human psychological development," or "this is the final explanation of human suffering or pathology or difficulty."

But we can have, conceptually and practically, this flexibility. It's really available to us. Each of them, we recognize, has a different emphasis, a different way in, a different angle. Perhaps we could say it opens certain doors and directions more, and perhaps others less, and delivers certain fruits more and others less than an alternative one.

But we can, at times at least, entertain a conceptual framework because it is a conceptual framework that stimulates and supports an open soul-making. It's not so much about truth and this being the final reality. It's a conceptual framework that works to stimulate, support, nourish, and open soul-making for us.

That would be one conceptual framework among others in the ways that we relate to dukkha, in the ways that we relate to our ideas about human development and what it is to develop well and how that can be impeded or contorted. It's one paradigm among others, one conceptual frame we can entertain, we can adopt, move in and out of.

Wrapped up in that idea is a kind of meta-conceptual framework of flexibility among conceptual frameworks. There's a higher level idea that it's actually valid and valuable and helpful and really legitimate to move between different conceptual frameworks—whole different paradigms about psychology and development and pathology and suffering.

A meta-conceptual framework. And for me, that meta-conceptual framework is also a framework that stimulates, supports, encourages, and nourishes an open soul-making. To me, that's actually part of the soul-making paradigm, the larger soul-making paradigm—that there's this flexibility between conceptual frameworks. And that idea has its place in soul-making.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 124

What is Awakening? (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h12

> In this profound inquiry, Rob Burbea examines the fundamental question of what awakening truly means and how we relate to this central concept in Buddhist practice. He invites us to investigate our motivations: Are we seeking awakening to measure up or prove ourselves, or from authentic longing for beauty, sacredness, and exploration?
>
> Burbea challenges common assumptions about liberation as the mere cessation of dukkha, questioning whether ending suffering is what we genuinely want most. Drawing on insights from jhāna practice and emptiness realization, he suggests that our desires for mystical depths, soul-making, and the discovery of beauty may be healthier motivations than ego-driven achievement.
>
> The talk examines how our relationship with authority and tradition shapes our understanding of awakening, and explores the possibility of open-ended rather than final conceptions of liberation. Through penetrating questions about intention and authentic desire, Burbea opens up what he calls a "meta-freedom" - liberation from our very concepts of liberation itself.

In this next talk, I would like to explore the question: what is awakening? I want to examine the experiences and ideas of what enlightenment, liberation, and awakening might mean. Again, I hope this will be helpful for you. Some of it will be similar to the previous talks on this retreat—advice or information or clarification or outlining possibilities, pointing out and indicating possibilities for us as human beings, as practitioners.

Alongside all that, I'm partly hoping to open up the discourse around this and open up our thinking around these notions—awakening, enlightenment, liberation—using these terms interchangeably for now. I also want to open up our questioning. If you listen, you will hear that there are actually several questions interwoven in the questions I'm opening up. There are several questions, and they're connected, weaving in and out of each other.

Teaching, as I'm pretty sure I've said before, is always contextual for me. Teaching happens in a context. It's informed and conditioned by that context. It has to be. In a way, it's conveying what a teacher has received from the tradition, from different traditions, from their teachers—in all different forms and from all different directions perhaps. It's also a conveying of what one has discovered for oneself, the possibilities there, and what might be helpful from one's own experience. And it's also, of course, a response to the student or students—what has been coming from the students towards the teacher or what is witnessed there.

So, as I said, I really hope this is helpful. Sometimes a teaching is helpful only at a certain time, at a certain point in one's practice. It might be that we hear certain teachings and it's just not the right time for us to hear them. They don't impress us, we don't understand, they don't make much sense, or they just seem silly to us, or they don't fit with another idea we're more favoring at that time. So really, whether it's helpful also depends on whether it's the right time to hear a certain teaching—at a particular time in your life, in the development of your practice, in your journey.

So what is awakening? If one listens to or reads different teachers, listens to practitioners, or asks a range of teachers or practitioners "What is awakening? What is enlightenment? What is liberation? What does it mean to you?"—you will surely get these days a very wide range of answers, a very wide range of notions and responses there. You will also encounter many practitioners who don't really think about the notion at all. It's not in their vocabulary, or they make very little reference to it, or perhaps it only really means moments of mindfulness or moments of wakefulness—therefore moments of awakening. It's not really in their map, in their orientation. They're not really referring to it; it's not really a reference point for their practice and for their thinking and discourse.

But there is really a wide range. Perhaps in Buddhist circles, because of the centrality of the Four Noble Truths—which we've been discussing a little bit in the previous talks—dukkha, and then the third truth, the ending of dukkha, the cessation of dukkha, liberation or freedom from suffering might be the most common sort of nutshell response to this question of what awakening means. But then that just begs, for me, the next question: What does that mean? Freedom from suffering? Liberation from suffering? What does that mean? What would it look like? What do you mean by suffering? What kind of suffering?

To me, just that much is interesting. The fact that there's now such a wide range—I've touched on this before—but that social fact, if you like, is very interesting to me. It marks our age, and it marks the Dharma in our age, and it marks the Insight Meditation community as well.

I'm going to talk now about this kind of material, and obviously I can't help but communicate some of my thinking on the subject—my current thinking, my current approach—and of course that's going to be conditioned by, reflective of, an outcome of my journey with all this. But I want to—it's not about me—and I want to hopefully say enough that opens up this territory for anyone. Obviously it's going to be reflective of and informed by how I have related to this question in the past, which has, along with other factors, conditioned how I'm relating to it right now.

But I don't mean to communicate anything final. I don't mean to give you a categorical, final, authoritative answer to what is awakening. In a way, that's part of the very point that I want to communicate.

The relationship and the way we relate to the notion of awakening—the very idea we have of it—evolves. This is, again, a point of view. It should evolve, and it should be open to questioning. Is our notion of awakening truly open to questioning? Is the very question or the journey we have with the notion of awakening and what that might be genuinely open-ended?

So right there, it's quite a perhaps different point of view—one that you might not have encountered before or be used to. I don't want to be communicating a final "this is how it is" dogma. But of course, much of what I say will inevitably be influenced by my history with this question, my experience with practice, and my current way of relating to it in approach and thinking.

But let's start with this business of how we approach the very notion. People say awakening, enlightenment, liberation, and as I mentioned, for some people these words just don't register—they simply ignore them. For others, they're really quite alive or charged words, quite emotive for us.

One of the things I'm really interested in—I'd like to start there—is how are we approaching this question of awakening, this notion of awakening? How are we looking at it? How are we relating to it? How do we conceive of it? What intentions are we bringing to this concept of awakening, this idea of awakening, this goal, if you like, of awakening? And what of those intentions are conscious and what is perhaps unconscious in the intention? What are the assumptions—and what are perhaps the unconscious assumptions—that we bring to this word, this idea? What movements of the being, of the psyche, do we bring there?

This to me is where I'd like to start and one of the really indispensable questions to try to open up this whole field. How am I approaching it? How are we approaching it? How are we conceiving? What are the intentions, assumptions, drives involved for us? What goes on for us with respect to the idea and the notion of awakening? What goes into that relationship? What goes into that conception and that notion? What are we bringing into it?

I think it's really helpful in this area, really important, and in fact, potentially liberating. In asking what is liberation, and in asking what is awakening, what is enlightenment, it's helpful, important, and potentially liberating to draw attention to and contemplate—or at least consider the possibility—that we, many of us, let's say, will tend to approach the question and the teaching of awakening, enlightenment, liberation with motivations that are, to some extent, informed or impressed or driven by two kinds of motivation that I would highlight right now.

The question is: how much is our approach informed by or motivated by or shaped or directed or limited by these two motivations? How much is our perspective, and then the whole field, shaped, directed, limited, informed by these motivations?

One is the wish to measure where we ourselves are on some kind of scale towards awakening. So the question is: how much of the motivation involved in the way we approach the question of awakening and the goal of awakening is actually a kind of ego measuring wish, if you like—an ego wish to measure up, which is actually quite a normal movement and inclination of ego, to measure itself.

Ego, or actually self, self-sense, is conditioned by, is fabricated based on any kind of measurement. This goes extremely subtle, extremely deep. I can't remember the name of a talk I gave—something like "Beyond the Measuring Mind" or something. But really, in the subtleties of—not just in the gross way when it's really ego and inner critic, which is really important to look at—but also in the very, very subtle movements where the very fabrication of perception of object and subject is based on measurement. I'm not going to go into that right now because I've talked about it a lot before. I think that talk was called "Maya and Nirvana" or "Beyond the Measuring Mind"—something like that—but if you're interested.

Right now I want to talk about the grosser level, which is this kind of ego measurement, the sort of normal movement or inclination of ego. So how much is that a kind of motivation when we relate to and approach the notion of awakening?

And secondly, how much is there a kind of wish or inclination to frame our questioning about awakening within the frameworks given to us by the tradition or traditions we are currently viewing as authoritative?

So it's not really common, as an observation I'd like to make, it's not really common to radically question the views and definitions of awakening, enlightenment, liberation —whatever you want to call it—that are handed to us by the traditions that we are currently viewing as authoritative. In other words, wrapped up with this whole question of what is awakening and how we approach it is this relationship with authority and tradition, and how free we are to really bring a kind of radical questioning there.

So two questions for us. How much is our approach to awakening, and our approach to even the idea of awakening—what it might be, what it can be—how much is it motivated, informed, shaped, directed, limited by the tendency of the self or ego to want to measure itself, to measure up? And secondly, by a kind of unquestioned authority of tradition, or a non-questioning of the authority of tradition?

Sometimes those two factors combine, of course: the measuring self and the lack of questioning of the authority of a tradition in all kinds of ways. And sometimes it's not one tradition—it's like a tradition such as Pali Canon Buddhism, or even just insight meditation tradition. As I said, you'll get different interpretations from different teachers within that tradition, which I think is actually quite healthy. But then the question is—and this is not an easy question to answer—why do I adopt this teacher's interpretation as an authority and not that teacher? What makes sense to me? Is it just that? What's going on for us psychologically in the ways that we relate to authority, and in this case specifically the authority of certain teachers, and then the authority in relationship around the notion of awakening?

To me these are really important questions, considerations to open up, to bring to our awareness.

Regarding the first one, this tendency of the ego—the tendency of any self-sense to be built on measurement, the discrimination of measurement, better or worse or whatever—and the tendency of the grosser levels of self-manifestation, ego and certainly inner critic and all that, to be based on self-measurement. Sometimes a student who's been practicing a long while will ask me, "What do you think? What's your take on stream entry or the first stage of awakening that the Buddha outlined in the Pali Canon?"

Sometimes I find myself actually wanting, rather than just say what I think, to ask what seems like a more important question in response: Why are you asking? And sometimes I wonder—and sometimes I think it has turned out to be the case, not in every case at all, I don't want to insist on that—but sometimes I wonder, is it that you want to feel you've achieved this thing called stream entry or this stage? As if, "I want to be one of those. I want to be a stream enterer. I want to be in that club. I hear people talking. There are these web forums and people say this. Or I was at a meeting and people were talking about stream enterers, and I want to be in that club."

Or—obviously a very related question but subtly different—is it that you don't want to think and feel that you're not in that club, that you're not one of those? Why? Can we dare to really explore this question? It takes a lot of courage to explore that question. It's quite radical to turn the questioning around that way. Can we explore it vigorously? Sometimes I've brought this up and a person kind of shrugs it off. And sometimes it's been my sense that there's a lot more to investigate here.

I don't mean by this to jump to the other extreme which sometimes is communicated in certain teachings: just drop all notions of awakening, forget about it, it's just an ego trip. Don't harm yourself by even asking the question of what it might be and might it be possible and how. Just drop it, just forget about it. Don't go near it because by going near that question, you're poking the dragon of the inner critic. The dragon will be awakened and torment you.

But by asking this question—"Why are you asking? And can you really vigorously explore that?"—I'm asking it out of kindness. When I ask it, I ask it out of kindness. Part of the reason for asking it is kindness. Can you get that? If I'm actually chasing something just for the sake of satisfying the unsatisfiable inner critic—getting my stripes, measuring up, finally being good enough—that's really unkind, to live a life that way, to pursue practice that way, for one's practice to be shot through with that kind of drive.

So the question is coming, if one poses it to oneself, or with a friend where it feels safe to ask that question together, of each other, out of kindness.

But there's also a lot of boldness and radicality in the questioning. It's kind, but there's boldness and radicality there. Why am I even asking this question about awakening? What is my relationship with this?

There are aspects—this is one aspect—and there's a whole other kind of level of what we might call meta-freedom, M-E-T-A, a whole other level of freedom that can open up when we open up our relationship with the very notion of freedom, of liberation, of awakening, enlightenment. That's partly what I hope to open up a little bit. It's like a whole other level of awakening, a whole other level of freedom.

But even asking this question—why am I asking? And asking: what am I bringing to this question? What are my notions? What's my relationship? What are my intentions? These are not easy questions. I think they take courage, they take honesty, they take integrity, and they take boldness.

Personally, I am very interested in awakening, enlightenment, liberation—what that might mean, what it can be. I'm very interested in the possibilities for a human being, possibilities for consciousness, the possibilities for living, for life, for the sense of existence, the possibilities for perception. The breadth, the range, the depth, the possibilities for soul, the possibilities of what liberation of my action in the world means. And the possibility in relation to all this for society. We talk about awakening, liberation. What might that mean socially? What might it mean for the wider sphere of being and beings? I'm also very interested in the ideas about it, notions, and our relationship with it, and our relationship with our ideas about it, as I've just said.

But when someone talks to me in an interview, and sometimes the student might bring it up—they're feeling this pressure or this measurement or this way that things have just gotten really tight and constricted and painful in relation to a question of some kind of achievement on the path, meditative achievement, whether it's awakening or jhana or emptiness stages of emptiness realization or whatever it is—when someone's talking to me, one of us, either it's them or me, is wondering about how much of the intention is coming from this measuring, wanting to measure up, and how much pressure there is coming from that. Then often I feel that at that point, the most necessary and most interesting piece to explore in the conversation is exactly that. It's the relationship with.

It doesn't mean we won't get to the rest of it and the ideas and the possibilities of what it might mean and how one might move towards that or open that up, whatever metaphor we might use. But this piece about relationship with and what comes in in terms of intention and motivation is a really necessary piece. Oftentimes it's like we need to do that before we can go any further. And it's actually quite an interesting piece, I think.

So sometimes, or at different points, let's say, for a person, the dominant intention or push regarding either the whole of practice or some particular strand of practice, like jhana practice or emptiness practice or whatever, is to prove oneself. What's going on? I have to prove oneself. Is it to myself that I have to prove myself? Is it to others, and who? Is it to a certain teacher or teachers, to measure up somehow?

Like I said, if this is the case, or even if one of us in the conversation suspects that it is the case, then in my role as teacher, I actually become more interested in that at that point, or as a necessity to understand and unpack it and find freedom from that particularly narrow and painful drive. That becomes, at that point, more interesting and more necessary than attaining jhana, attaining this stage of realization or whatever.

If we just dwell a little bit with jhana practice—the same kind of psychological, painful psychological mechanics regarding motivation can go on there as they can in relation to awakening. With long-term practice, I mean really doing a lot of jhana practice, doing it very thoroughly, one sees—I think it's almost unavoidable to see, I hope it seems pretty obvious that one would see—that the attainment of any jhana is not really dependent on myself. It's dependent on the conditions in the moment. When the conditions are there, when the past and particularly the present conditions are there, then the jhana, this particular jhana, will arise or will stabilize or whatever it is, or will deepen. And it's not really to do with self.

It becomes really, really clear when you do a lot of jhana practice, dipping in and out over a long time in all sorts of conditions, and bringing a kind of intelligent attention or scrutiny or curiosity, willingness to understand: how is this even working? Why is it that some days it seems to go really well, other days not so well, and everything in between? Or sittings well, or not so well, etc. If there's an interest in that, it's kind of unavoidable that one realizes, you know, it's not really that the self is so fantastic and the architect of all this. It's the conditions.

So this realization dissolves any attempt to use the jhanas to measure up or prove oneself. It's not about oneself. That's not what it depends on.

When, though, there's just been a little practice of the jhanas and a little success or attainment—you know, first four jhanas, just a little bit—and then we go, "Oh, that's it. Yeah, I got it. First jhana, got that. Got the second, got the third, got the fourth." There's this quick sort of ticking off and getting of one's stripes. Oftentimes that realization of their dependence on conditions has not become clear yet. It's not mature yet. It's all too quick. I haven't seen, I haven't paid enough attention. I haven't had enough experience there.

So one possibility is that you get this strange effect where the practice—just a little bit—has unfortunately reinforced the whole ego-measuring, ego-proving orientation and focus and motivation. In a way it actually feels good to the ego, but it's actually reinforced that whole problematic stance.

Again, it's really important to bring a kind of curiosity and intelligence both to the motivation and to actually asking: does this even justify being pumped up about achieving this or that?

I actually think, if we just stay with jhanas for a little bit, a much healthier desire for jhanas and for emptiness experiences is a love of and a curiosity about the depths—those kinds of depths of consciousness, of opening, of perception, the beauty there, the nourishment of mystical experiences of various sorts. I think a kind of greed, if you like—if I even dare to use that word—a desire and a love for those depths and even an attachment to those depths and the beauty and that nourishment and the love of those mystical depths, that's a much healthier motivation.

Sometimes what happens is a person becomes afraid of becoming attached to pleasure regarding the jhanas. But I don't think attachment to pleasure, in itself, is rarely a problem in my experience teaching the jhanas. It's rarely a problem. What can look like attachment to pleasure arises predominantly when one or the other of two conditions serves as a basis.

In other words, it looks like there's attachment to pleasure when actually what's going on—the root of that seeming attachment to pleasure—is actually a chronic avoidance of some kind of psychological or emotional or relational pain, and one is just hiding. Or part of one's motivation, let's put it that way, part of one's motivation is this chronic avoidance of certain psychological, emotional, or relational pains or difficulties or challenges. It's actually not attachment to pleasure.

It's also the case that what looks like attachment to pleasure can only really take root when there isn't a sense of soul-making, of mystery and beauty in the discovery of the jhanas. You understand? The jhanas have become kind of flat because one hasn't opened up that dimension of soul. They're just pleasant experiences of different degrees, and one hasn't really—for whatever complex reasons—opened up to the sense of mystery and beauty that they can reveal. There's not really a sense of soulfulness, of deepening and soul-making going on there. It's just become about pleasure. And sometimes that's when the attachment to the jhana, the attachment to the pleasure, can be a motivating force—because there's nothing else. It's just pleasure. Or it's mostly avoidance masquerading as attachment to pleasure.

The pleasure of jhana—just even taking the first four jhanas—the pleasure of those jhanas and the kind of nourishment and fulfillment far exceeds the pleasure that's available to human beings in the flatly sensed senses. Not, you know, without sensing the soul—just the pleasure of a meal, or the pleasure of the sensations of taste, or the pleasure of the sensations of sex or whatever, when it's flatly conceived. The pleasure of jhana dwarfs those. You're talking about a totally different realm.

But the pleasure of soul-making, and that kind of dimensionality opening up—the delight of that and the nourishment of that far exceeds the pleasure of the jhana when the jhana is conceived flatly and felt flatly, when it's just a realm of pleasure. "That's convenient, that's a lot of pleasure, I'll hang out there in the third jhana or wherever it is."

So wrapped up in all of this is this question of motivation. What do I want? What am I wanting? Whether it's from jhanic experiences, whether it's from emptiness, whether it's from the whole path, and whether it's from awakening and that whole idea or goal.

If my motivation is this kind of proving myself or measuring up somehow—the ego measuring up—I would say that's not a deep motivation. It's not really what I would call an authentic desire. It's not a soul desire. Let's just say it's not even authentic. It's not a deep desire. It's a superficial psychological mechanism where the pain can feel like it goes very deep, but it's not what I call authentic. It's not really your own. It's somehow put on one socially. This desire to measure up is a kind of social desire.

What do you want? What's your authentic desire for practice, for the path? What kind of awakening do you want? What is the awakening that you seek? What possibilities do you hope for, long for, yearn for?

When we ask this question "What is awakening?" we could approach it by studying various conceptions and statements and differentiations of the notion of awakening. We're going to do a little bit of that in the Buddhist tradition as well as other traditions and teachings. We could also describe the apparent characteristics and lifestyles and personalities of those popularly considered as enlightened.

But as well as all that, or even instead of all that, we could ask this question: What do you want?

But do you see that the answer to what you want may be—and may be to a large extent—informed, conditioned, and even closed in by the study of various conceptions and statements about awakening, by the Buddhist tradition, by stories and images describing the apparent characteristics and lifestyles of those popularly considered enlightened? Do you see how what we receive from an authority or from a subculture actually might shape, inform, direct and limit the very answers we give ourselves when we ask what we want? It may shape, limit, inform and direct what we actually want or what we feel we want.

Of course, if we ask "What do I want in life?" this question is not just about what I want in my existence, in this movement of time that I have between birth and death. What do I want from that? What do I hope for? What do I long for?

I don't need to tell you how much we are assailed, barraged by advertising and images in the culture, pushing, prodding, dragging, harassing us to develop this desire or that one, shaping us. Sometimes we'd like to feel "I'm not—I see through all that," but it's so prevalent and so powerful. Sometimes some of that is really obvious and we can just let go of it easily—we're not pulled in, whereas we might see others pulled in by our society and culture. But this also exists in much subtler ways and in other areas of our lives.

I was reading about an indigenous native tribe in the Amazon. An oil company came—or was it a damming project, people putting up a hydroelectric plant—and they tried to bribe the tribal people. They said, "Let us give you these satellite TVs and alcohol and things." The tribe wasn't interested in them at all, but they were given them anyway. Because they had the satellite TVs and all this stuff, they saw others with all kinds of things, living very different lifestyles—affluent Western lifestyles, of course, which is what you see on TV. They were exposed to corporate advertising directing and magnifying their desires, and over not very long time, this began to shape what they wanted. They wanted all that stuff. That had devastating effects on that region of the Amazon, on the social cohesion and well-being of that tribe.

You can see this happening large-scale in the world. So the question is: to what degree is what I want the product of conditioning? How much of my answer to what I want is the product of conditioning, of ideas, of images, fantasy?

Just another thing I read recently in the Guardian—up to 1990, they did some study in Fiji. Eating disorders were unheard of there in 1990 and before that, when they did anthropological social studies. In 1995, TV was introduced in Fiji. Most of it was American TV, and it was teeming with food ads—hamburgers and sweets and this and that. Within three years, twelve percent of teenage girls in Fiji had developed bulimia.

This kind of thing is really painfully shocking, but you're obviously aware of that kind of conditioning. But the point I want to make is that we can also be subject to spiritual conditioning, a spiritual influencing of what we want spiritually by those we come into contact with—by teachers, by authorities, by a sangha, by what's popular in books, by all of that.

For some of you who've been around a while—I mean really a while—and perhaps come across or been in and out of different sanghas, different spiritual communities and teachers and fellow practitioners...

I don't know if you have wondered this as well, but sometimes in some of the communities I've moved through over these thirty-plus years—whether settled sanghas or more mobile communities of practitioners—I've noticed something curious. Sometimes I wonder whether certain figures in a sangha, perhaps senior students or teachers, seem to inhabit or project a particular persona in a way that feels almost unconscious, yet somehow calculated to influence others.

It depends on the sangha, of course. Some are monastic, others decidedly non-monastic, but there can emerge a certain archetypal image—perhaps of someone jovial and warm, yet somehow distant or aloof. There's an affable amusement at the world and at those who scurry about, busy and attached, but with genuine goodwill underlying it all. There's something about this persona that I find myself wondering about—as if someone might be unconsciously or semi-consciously inhabiting it, even selling it a little through their smile, through the way they walk or stand in the lunch queue, through the casual way their shawl falls over their shoulder.

Certainly it can be beneficial to model a certain possibility of disinterest, of non-entanglement. It's good to embody an archetype of equanimity, even one that appears somewhat aloof. But when does this become a fixated image that goes unquestioned and rigid? When does it begin operating in a way we're not quite conscious of—this pull toward conforming to what awakening should look like, this unconscious stamping or rigidifying of a model? It remains a certain style, but it becomes a fixated image rather than an imaginal one, even though it may be operating relatively unconsciously.

And again, there's this question: what do you want? What do you really want?

I was recently having several conversations around awakening, with different people presenting similar issues around this very question. When I asked them what they really wanted, very often the answer came back easily: "I want the end of suffering." But it didn't sound authentic to me.

"What's suffering?" I would ask.

A person might respond—and this has happened several times—"Well, I'm kind of addicted to food." This is actually a relatively common response. When I inquire what's involved in their relationship with food, we're not talking about anything like anorexia or bulimia, just a pattern of overindulgence.

I find myself wondering: how much suffering is there really around this pattern? How much is it actually a problem? They say they're interested in awakening, that they want the end of suffering. But is there really that much suffering involved? Many people have robust digestive systems—they can indulge in all kinds of foods and sweets and overeating and feel perhaps a little sluggish, maybe some minor indigestion. But it's not really a significant problem.

So I probe: is that really what you want—relief from that particular suffering around food? Is that really what's most important to you?

Sometimes, when we go deeper into this question, a person will think more and say, quoting the Buddha, "I don't want to be an untrained, ordinary, run-of-the-mill person." This is stock phrasing that the Buddha used to describe someone unenlightened, someone who hasn't engaged in practice or progressed on the path.

But this answer reveals something different. When I probe a little deeper, it becomes clear: is it really about the end of suffering? Are you really that concerned about the suffering you experience in your life? Actually, there isn't that much suffering present. There's this relationship with food, but it's not causing significant difficulty.

This deeper answer suggests to me the very issue we've been exploring around ego identification and ego measurement: "I don't want to be that kind of person."

I don't want to be in that camp—what the Buddha calls "untrained, ordinary, run-of-the-mill person."

So is it, again, the motivation coming out of ego and measurement? Or is that motivation—let's say that aspect of the emotional, that strand of the motivation—is it larger than the attraction to actually lessening suffering? In other words, what's the relative dominance of the different motivations?

Or is there an attraction to beauty? We haven't even said anything about that yet. Actually, we did when we talked about the jhanas. So what's the relative weighting of these different motivations?

If I say "I don't want to be an untrained, ordinary, run-of-the-mill person," it seems to be voicing, it seems to be indicating that these questions of identification, ego identification and measurement are actually dominating.

And sometimes even then, the psychology is much more complex. So a person is saying, "I don't want to be untrained, I don't want to be..." But some part of them is really rebelling angrily against the prospect or the demand of training. The Buddha talks about training a thoroughbred horse as a metaphor for the development of meditation and practice—sila, samadhi, panna.

So at the same time, one part of me is wanting this—I want to measure up and not be counted as one of those the Buddha calls untrained. And another part of me is rebelling angrily at this demand or even prospect of training. To me, that's interesting. What is going on there? Can I open this up? Can I actually look at it with honesty, with integrity, with courage?

In the absence of a cosmological belief—basically, a cosmological context of awakening meaning the ending of rebirth—that's a kind of cosmological idea that the Buddha adopted and taught. In final awakening is the ending of rebirth, the stage of awakening, the movement to the ending of rebirth in arahantship. So you get non-returner—that means you're not born again in this material existence. Once-returner—you have one more rebirth in this material existence. Sotapanna has a maximum of seven.

So the whole thing is this trajectory to end rebirth. It's a cosmological view. And wrapped up in that view is there's basically an infinity of suffering awaiting us in endless rebirth. Endless rebirth is equivalent to an infinity of suffering, albeit in a kind of seemingly random roller coaster—up and down, highs and lows, fortune and misfortune, pain and pleasure. But inevitably, the suffering there outweighs the pleasure, and a lot of it will be absolutely brutal.

So there's a kind of cosmological view. Awakening is situated in that cosmological view—ending rebirth. In the absence of such a cosmological view, which I think is the case for a lot of people these days—it's not really gripping to them, that whole cosmological view of ending rebirth. It's like, what I'm really trying to do is end rebirth and not be reborn into the human realm. It's quite the opposite, actually. If people believe in rebirth, it's actually quite an attractive notion these days.

But anyway, in the absence of such a cosmological belief structuring the larger view of what awakening is, the question comes again: what is awakening as you conceive it? And why do you want it?

A very easy answer in a Buddhist context is to conceive of awakening as the end of suffering. Again, sometimes—in fact, a lot of the time—is that what you really most want? The end of suffering. Is that really what you most want?

Sometimes when we have a lot of pain and we just feel trapped in a lot of pain, whether it's psychological or physical, that can be the dominant thing. "I just want the end of suffering." But when that goes, or when we've seen through that kind of psychological pain, or whatever it is, for our whole lives, for our whole existence—is that really what you want, what you most want, the end of suffering, the end of dukkha? Is that your greatest desire? Is that really what you're after in practice?

Often, someone is saying that, and it's palpably clear, actually, to both of us, that they don't live like that. They're not living and choosing the end of suffering every day. Far from it. There's lots of suffering in their lives, and they actually don't mind too much. It's not such a big deal—a little bit of indigestion, a little bit of sloth and torpor, a little bit of whatever it is. They're cutting deals with suffering. "I'll have this much pleasure and I accept this much suffering that goes with it when I crave that or I indulge in this."

When a person is living their life that way, they're saying "I want the end of suffering," but it's not really what's going on. So "end of suffering" is one way that one might frame it.

And it might be a valid answer. My question is simply: is it? And if it is, then great—that's your orientation. But is it?

The person might say, "Happiness—I want happiness. Awakening is happiness," somehow tying the notion of awakening with happiness. I'll just mention this observation—I'm not quite sure what conclusion to make with this, but it made me smile. Maybe you can draw your own conclusions.

From the Guardian in December 2016, there was a nationwide poll in the UK. They asked if people would regard themselves as happy. Ninety-two percent of UK residents said they were happy. Which I found very interesting.

Then they were asked another question: to estimate how many in the UK would say they were happy. In other words, what was their estimate of how many people would answer that question "Are you happy?" with a yes? The average estimate was forty-seven percent.

So ninety-two percent said they're happy, and the average estimate of what people think about how many other people are happy was forty-seven percent. I think that's interesting. I'm not quite sure what to conclude from that.

There's also the statistic—I don't know if it's just US or UK—that one in five people are on antidepressants. So I don't know quite how that squares with ninety-two percent of people saying they're happy.

Is happiness something that you relate to, or is it a goal for you? Or do you feel like you're sold that by some kind of spiritual teaching or psychological teaching? What does it even mean, anyway? I have problems with all these polls, but what does happiness mean? It's such a loose word. There's so much range to what that can mean—so many kinds of happiness, so many shades and discriminations we could make between kinds and degrees of happiness. One wonders what was the range and conception people had when they answered.

But what would it look like to say "I'm happy"? What does it look like if happiness is a goal? I don't know if that's something people commonly say. I rarely come across that as an answer, though perhaps it's part of a larger answer about what a person wants.

Then there are also considerations around—again, we're talking about notions of awakening and how we get locked into what we want, or whether it's really what we want, and how that's related to notions we have and what we've been exposed to. As I said, all these questions are interwoven together.

Why is it that we often—or it seems most common to—cling to a notion of awakening as some kind of finality? The Buddha did teach it that way, and most spiritual traditions teach it that way. They convey a sense of "this is a goal beyond which there is nothing"—no further development, this is it, the end of awakening, the final goal.

What's the relationship between a finality of goal—an awakening conceived as some kind of finality—and self-view, or the tendencies of self-view? As I alluded to at the beginning, and in a previous talk, self-view takes as a scaffold some kind of view of finality with regard to awakening. That very finality becomes a kind of basis, or support, or scaffolding on which self-view and ego-view can be constructed, fabricated, and oftentimes hardened.

Whether trained or untrained, ordinary or extraordinary—"I am X." That whole kind of black-and-white thinking, which is also quite characteristic of addiction and many other difficulties, can very much come into play in terms of both self-view and view of goal, view of what awakening is. And they go together. There's something important about that.

So we tend to think in terms of some kind of final reaching point of awakening. We might, just as we ask what does happiness look like, also ask what would the end of suffering look like? The cessation of dukkha—how would it manifest? What would it look like to live the end of greed, aversion and delusion? What does that actually look like?

Now, again, you encounter these classical Buddhist terms from the Pali Canon—suffering, nibbāna, the Four Noble Truths, the three kilesas—and each admits very wide interpretation of what they mean. But actually, with any interpretation, I would still ask: what does it look like? What would it look like to actually live the end of greed, aversion and delusion—the complete end of those?

Where are you going to draw the line for what greed is? Some of you will know my tendency, my preference regarding what delusion is—to regard it as a spectrum, and also clinging as a spectrum. So when we talk about really subtle clinging or really deep, subtle delusion, they actually are implicated thoroughly into the very fabrication of any and all perception. So that to really be without delusion is also to be in that moment without perception. And to be completely without clinging is also to be without perception in that moment. One cannot live that.

So where on the spectrum of clinging and delusion am I going to draw the line and say this is delusion but that isn't? And if—as we'll get to—if actually one's motivation, when one looks inside and asks, "Is it the end of suffering? No, not really. I'm not sure. What is it that I really want? What is it?"—if through practice and honest inquiry, you discover other answers...

This is really your question, not for me or anyone to tell you what to want. But if the answer is that actually, why am I practicing? What am I practicing for? And it's really about the love of exploration—the love and longing for sacredness, for sacrednesses opening up, the love and longing for soulfulness, the love and desire for beauty and beauty opening up, the interest and beauty of what we're calling the creation and discovery of self-other-world and all of that—if it's actually those kinds of things motivating you, why would we not allow the notion of awakening to be open-ended?

What's the limit to my love of exploration? What's the limit to the sacrednesses that can open up, or the soulfulness, the soul-making, the beauty, beauties? What's the limit to the kind of poetic and skillful and soul-making fabrication of self, other, world and eros? Would that be okay—to have an open-ended notion of awakening?

I want to continue, but again, just to sum up: I really want to stress what I feel is important to unpack, to unearth, to look at and ask. What is around and in my relationship to this idea of awakening? In my relation to my practice toward awakening, what's involved in my approach, in my conception, in my relationship, in terms of intention, assumption, drive?

To me, as I said, that question is itself motivated by kindness, but it has a lot of boldness in it—or it can have. And in itself, it can actually open up a whole other level of what we might call awakening, liberation.

Let's stop there for now.

CHAPTER 125

What is Awakening? (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h15

> In this second part of his inquiry into awakening, Rob Burbea examines the wide range of interpretations found within modern Theravāda and Insight Meditation traditions regarding what constitutes awakening and sotāpatti (stream entry). Rather than arguing over textual etymology, he explores the deeper question of what motivates our adoption of particular views about liberation.
>
> Burbea discusses the three fetters destroyed by a sotāpanna according to the Pali Canon: doubt (vicikicchā), attachment to rites and rituals (sīlabbata-parāmāsa), and sakkāyadiṭṭhi (often translated as personality view). He offers a detailed linguistic analysis of sakkāyadiṭṭhi, breaking down the compound into 'sat' (existing/real) and 'kāya' (body/collection), suggesting it points to belief in an existing or real body/collection of elements.
>
> The talk explores the relationship between knowing the unfabricated (asaṅkhata) - that dimension the Buddha said "should be known" - and understanding paṭiccasamuppāda (dependent origination). Burbea suggests these are intimately connected: seeing how all phenomena are fabricated through various forms of clinging leads to understanding their emptiness, while the unfabricated can be known through cessation experiences or sensed "shining through" ordinary perception. He emphasizes that awakening is not merely an experience but a fundamental understanding that allows fabrication to move freely along a spectrum, bringing genuine freedom from suffering.

We mentioned in the first part of this talk that even a little attentive listening and curiosity into different teachers' positions or teachings on what awakening is and what stream entry is—just even within Theravadan-based teachings or Pali Canon-based teachings, and even within the Insight Meditation tradition—will quickly reveal something important. Just a little attentive reflection, listening, reading across a range of voices of both teachers and fellow practitioners will make it obvious that despite a lot of similar vocabulary taken from the tradition—dukkha, end of dukkha, four noble truths—despite this similarity of vocabulary, there's actually quite a wide range of interpretations of what awakening and different stages of awakening mean. There are many takes on what the Buddha outlined as the first stage, stream entry.

I think that's good. I'm pleased that there are many different takes. Different visions of awakening and different ideas about what it encompasses will suit different people, and that's important. The diversity in the modern Theravadan tradition, the modern Pali Canon tradition, and Insight Meditation tradition—the plurality there, the divergence, the lack of agreement—I think that's important and healthy and actually necessary these days.

More and more, for myself, engaging in or even just hearing other people argue about etymology of certain words and quibble over texts in the Pali canon, trying to insist on just one interpretation of a certain word or passage as if it's the only true possible interpretation or the correct interpretation, narrowing down the hermeneutic possibilities that way—it seems to me, where I am right now at this point in my practice and life, which is different than what it was before, a little bit silly. Something that I would have engaged in myself a fair amount and put quite a lot of stock in now seems silly to me, this arguing about etymology and words and picking over texts in that way. That's just my personal feeling at this point in my development, life, and practice. I'll return to perhaps why I feel that way.

Related to what I said in the first talk, I feel there are other ways to orient to this question of what is awakening, rather than going back to the text and quibbling about word meanings. There are other ways which I feel, for some people or some people at certain points in their path or trajectory of practice, are perhaps more fruitful, more interesting, and actually more helpful. There are other ways to orient, which we'll return to.

Also, as I mentioned in the first talk, I feel it's important to realize, to be aware of: why am I adopting any view I have? If I have a view that this is awakening, this is what this word means—why? What's going on for me that I lean towards this view or grasp at that view or insist on this view or adopt that view, whatever it is?

For example, with stream entry—sottāpanna—as I said, the Buddha in the Pali Canon talked about different stages of awakening: stream entry being the first stage, the beginning stage; once-returner and non-returner, the second and third stages; arahant, the fully enlightened, the final stage.

Someone told me that they were speaking to a fellow retreatant after retreat, and that retreatant was saying that he thought he was a stream-enterer, or considered himself a stream-enterer, because he could go with the flow. I'm not sure where he heard that idea—not important—but he could go with the flow in life, and that made him what the Buddha called a stream-enterer, because streams flow, and if you're in a stream, you're going with the flow, perhaps.

We could get into a whole argument with that and say, well, the Buddha did not teach going with the flow. You could trawl through the Pali Canon, and there's very little language about going with flow or even that kind of trope or tenor of things. Going with the flow is quite a modern western notion. The Buddha did talk about flow in the word saṃsāra. Saṃsāra, one meaning of it, is the flow, the flowing on. Sara is from the root sr in Pali and Sanskrit, and that actually means to flow. It was exactly this flow that the Buddha was interested in stopping—stopping that flowing on, ending it, ending saṃsāra.

So there's very little textual support in the Pali Canon for teachings about going with the flow. Or we could say there was a teaching of flow, which is saṃsāra, which is really problematic. Then there's this teaching of stream entry, where with a lot of effort and with a lot of striving and diligence—and these are the Buddha's words—one attains to a stage where one has seen something or understood something, or something has opened or changed in the being that forms a kind of platform for further realization and a kind of platform from which one cannot fall. One cannot go back. One progresses inevitably from this. One has entered a stream that will take one inevitably—it's a different kind of stream, one could say. There's the stream of saṃsāra, the sara of saṃsāra, and there's another kind of stream that leads towards awakening.

Rather than argue all that, which, as I said, doesn't seem particularly fruitful to me now for different reasons that I'll mention as we go on, I'm more interested in what's going on that someone would adopt such a view and believe, "I feel like I'm a stream-enterer now because I go with the flow, and that's my understanding of it." That's what I'm more interested in: What's the motivation? What's going on that's directing, propelling, inclining the adoption of such a view and such a self-view?

As I said, it's quite a contemporary Western idea, this idea of going with the flow. You could trace it to certain Taoist ideas. It's a very simple idea, and simple ideas—and certainly ideas that are popular in the culture—can be attractive. They're attractive because they make sense to us and they sound simple to us because we're familiar with them.

it's also a relatively kind of low bar for what the first stage of awakening is.

So it's quite easy to understand what it means because we're kind of, or at least it seems easy, but actually if you probe into it, what does it mean to flow, to go with the flow? So if neo-Nazis come to power, I just go with the flow? No.

It's actually a deceptively simple idea – it's not really a simple idea, but it seems simple and it also seems like it's relatively easy to attain. And so it might be that what's going on is that because it's a popular, relatively simple sounding idea, because it sounds like it's relatively easy to attain such a thing as going with the flow, or pretty much going with the flow in one's life as a kind of lifestyle, then it might be attractive. Again, I'm not insisting or claiming that that is what was going on for this person. I don't know because I said it was second-hand. But I'm more interested in what's actually going on. What's the motivation? What's propelling me to adopt this or that idea of what awakening is and what it looks like, a vision of it, an image of it, and also a self-view in relationship to it?

So, actually, if we do go back to the text just a little bit, having said all that, when the Buddha kind of outlined the different stages of awakening and what was involved in each, he didn't say that much about it, actually. In relation to all stages of awakening, he describes ten fetters, and the different stages of awakening sort of remove or severely attenuate different of those fetters. So an arahant has destroyed, eradicated, once and for all and for good, all of the ten fetters. A stream entrant, the first stage, has uprooted three fetters, and those fetters are doubt, attachment to rites and rituals is the way it's usually translated as a second, and a third, sakkāyadiṭṭhi, is usually translated as something like personality view or the theory of individuality or something like that.

But again, it's not an easy proposition to ask what actually, exactly is meant by each of those three fetters. So even that one, attachment to rites and rituals, one has disregarded that. I've heard many different interpretations of that. Some say it's not being attached to believing rituals will have a magical effect in one's life. Some people say it's not being attached to practice meditation or certain styles of meditation over others and insisting this is the right way, that's the right way. You have to meditate like this. No, you have to meditate like that.

And especially when we get to this one about this sakkāyadiṭṭhi, this is really interesting. What does that mean? So I don't know the history of that term, but just a little kind of rummaging around makes me wonder whether it was a term – sakkāya was a term that already pre-existed the Buddha. It was something he picked up, and it might have been a positive term, and he said, no, you need to get rid of that. It's not an experience or a view you want to attain, you want to get rid of it. So the renunciation, the letting go, the seeing through of... Diṭṭhi means views, or some people translate it as theory – I'll come back to that – but the letting go of this sakkāyadiṭṭhi.

When we look, just dwell on this for a little bit, when we ask, well, what does this mean, this sakkāyadiṭṭhi? I know the translation, or the most common translations put it that way: personality view, individuality theory, or something like that, the theory of the individual, sakkāyadiṭṭhi.

In Pali, sakkāya is actually what's called a compound word, which means it's two words jammed together, like they have in German and some other languages. And those two words are... So we spell it, sakkāya, S-A-K-K-A-Y-A. And that compound is actually made up of two words: sat and kāya. So S-A-T and one word, and the other word is kāya. And what happens when you jam the words together in a compound is the T kind of elides with the K, and you just make it a double K. So sakkāyadiṭṭhi is actually short for satkāyadiṭṭhi.

So you've got two words there: sat and kāya.

Kāya, the second word, is quite an interesting word. So it means body, but just as in English, that word body has different meanings. So it means body as certainly this physical body, but even then it carries a second meaning often of like we have in English body as a sort of group or collection or a mass of things or a totality of things. So we talk about in English a body of work or a body of people or a body of water, for example. So it also in Pali carries this kind of double meaning. Sometimes the physical body was also regarded as a collection, a heap, a kind of bag of stuff – what of the four great elements, earth, air, fire and water?

So kāya has this kind of double meaning. It also can mean the term for kind of an organ, the organ of touch, meaning you touch with your kāya, you experience touch with your kāya. So like the eye is the organ of vision, the mind is the organ of thought, the kāya is the organ of touch. It can also be kind of just the locus or the seat of sensation or awareness. It can also be regarded as that which we act through. So it has an ethical component because we're responsible for our actions, we've judged our actions, and this is what acts in the world, is the kāya.

Then you've got this word sat. And sat's an interesting word. And it can mean, as some of you will know from the Hindu traditions, being or existing or being present.

That's one of the meanings. So you would have the existing or existent body—the belief, the theory, and the view of the existent body. This is what we're giving up, or the view that this collection of elements exists in some real way.

Sat can also mean real or actual. Satya, as some of you know, is the word for truth in the Four Noble Truths. So we're speaking of the belief that this group of elements is somehow real. What's real—the group or the individual elements?

This word sat can also mean "that which is," that which is real. So we're talking about this really existent or true body, if you like. With stream entry, I'm giving up belief in a true body.

Sometimes in compounds like satkāya, sat can mean "that which is possessed of"—possessed of this body or this heap or collection of elements. So I'm not believing in something that possesses all this.

Sat can also mean living—to live, to be, to exist. So I'm not believing in a theory of the living body.

You can see that a word like sakāya is quite open to slightly different interpretations. Often, as I said, it's translated as personality views—sakāyadiṭṭhi—or identification with the aggregates.

The second word, diṭṭhi, is usually translated as view, sometimes opinion, but some translations say theory. To me, that translation doesn't really work that well. If I speak to my mum about what her theory of personality is or her theory of self is, she'll say, "What the hell are you talking about?" If I ask, "Well, can you explain how you conceive of the self?" I think she would just cut short the conversation. She has no theory of self as an intellectual position to articulate.

Sometimes people interpret the giving up of sakāyadiṭṭhi—this fetter in stream entry—as a kind of giving up of any intellectual position, or holding this intellectual view or that, or positing this or that about the self. But for me, it has to be something much more fundamental than a theory. There are plenty of people in the world who have no theory of self at all, and I think one would be hard-pushed to call them awakened or stream-enterers.

Sometimes I've heard people interpret sakāyadiṭṭhi as meaning just the ending or the radical quietening of the inner critic. It's quite interesting that this view arises—it's a particularly modern, I'd say modern Western view. There's so much pain around the inner critic and so much suffering people have once they've got the basic prerequisites and are quite affluent, with material wealth and ease and comfort in their life, but they're really suffering with the inner critic. So it makes sense to fit the framework of the inner critic to the Buddha's teachings, or fit the framework of the Buddha's teachings to the inner critic, when that's what's predominant in one's life.

The freedom from that, either completely or to a large extent, is regarded by a few people I've heard—not very many—as stream entry, or the ending of this fetter, which is the most significant fetter with stream entry: this ending of sakāyadiṭṭhi, letting go of sakāyadiṭṭhi.

Other people view this personality view, or view of the individual, or self-view, differently. For them, the realization, the letting go or cutting of that fetter, the removal of that fetter, is to realize that what this self is, is a process. That realization—"I realize what the self is, it's a process"—is a process of the psychophysical aggregates in time. It's the process of the bodily processes and the processes of vedanā and perception and mental formations and consciousness, moment to moment in time. To realize that this is the true nature of the self is to realize the emptiness of self, or to let go of personality view, and let go of this third fetter. This view is around as well, quite a lot in certain circles.

The Buddha also talks about—often it's a slightly enigmatic, puzzling phrase, because it's never, to my knowledge, really explained exactly what it means in the Pali—but you often hear stories of such and such a person attaining stream entry. The epithet for that is "his or her Dharma eye was opened." There was the opening of the Dharma eye at that point. It's a kind of epithet for stream entry—the opening of the Dharma eye. What does that mean? I'm not aware of any place where it's actually explained exactly what that means.

The opening of the Dharma eye. I wonder, might it be any of these that we've mentioned—any of these interpretations of what's involved in stream entry, and particularly what's involved in letting go of that fetter of sakkayaditthi?

Might it also be when the Dharma—what's central in the Dharma—becomes clear? When the Buddha talks about after awakening, he says this Dharma is hard to see, hard to fathom, discernible only by the wise. It's somewhat ambiguous what he's talking about at that point, what he means by "this Dharma" that's hard to see, hard to attain. He wonders whether he should bother teaching it because he doesn't think people will understand.

But at least part of that quote identifies this Dharma as paticcasamuppada—dependent co-arising, dependent origination. So that's at least part of it. Opening the Dharma eye might be connected to that sort of centrality of dependent origination. When the Buddha talks about the Dharma, it's like the nutshell of his sense of what the Dharma is. Perhaps opening the Dharma eye means this understanding of dependent origination—understanding it experientially for oneself, not just intellectually.

But then we have another problem: what does it mean to understand dependent origination? Again, if you've listened to enough teachings, read enough books, asked enough questions, you'll see that the range of interpretations of what dependent origination means or points to—even the level of existence at which it applies, what understanding of it involves and delivers—all of that is up for grabs. Some of you know my version, my preferred take, would be quite different from others. So we still have that question.

At other times—and some of you have heard me stress this in various talks—the Buddha says several times, "That dimension should be known, monks and nuns. That dimension should be known where there is no seeing, no hearing, no smelling, tasting, touching, no thinking, imagining, or mental perception. That sphere should be known."

Other times he talks about what's beyond perception—the cessation of perception, no form, no mental factors, no sun, no moon, no coming, no going, no stopping, no starting, no long, no short, no coarse, no fine. There are many passages in the texts pointing to this kind of dimension beyond perception, beyond the fabrication of perception.

It's clear that when the Buddha says "that dimension should be known," he's talking about what we call the unfabricated. In his descriptions, there is not the fabrication of perception at that point. That dimension should be known. He's not saying it's just some cool experience that some of you might want to check out. It should be known—that's the grammatical construction. The implication is for awakening, for or by an awakened person. That dimension should be known.

Having said I'm not particularly interested in making cases for this or that, I just want to lay a few things out. If you go to the Pali Canon, these are the kinds of things you find. I want to spill them on the table and ask: how does all this fit together? Does it fit together? But in a way, that's secondary to the main point I'm interested in.

Regarding the unfabricated and that dimension that should be known—which the Buddha talks about quite frequently in the Pali Canon—we're really at the edge, if not actually beyond, what language can articulate. In describing or pointing to that dimension that should be known, the unfabricated, we reach the limits of language.

Sometimes the Buddha talks about it as a kind of awareness, a kind of consciousness—consciousness without limit, without feature, or consciousness without an object. Awareness without an object. Sometimes the Buddha articulates this unfabricated that way.

At other times he makes it very clear that it is not the same as consciousness or awareness. The opening to it only arises with—and he actually says this—the complete cessation of all six consciousnesses: the consciousness of sight, smell, taste, touch, sound, and mental consciousness—thought, imagery, and so forth. With the cessation of those consciousnesses, there is this opening to something, and he talks about it more in the negative.

So sometimes it's put in the positive—either as consciousness or in some other positive way—and sometimes, more often than not, it's put in the negative. We're at the point where, in trying to articulate or even point to that dimension that should be known, that unfabricated, the Buddha was at the point—anyone who tries to articulate or describe that is at the point—where language cannot do justice.

And so you get contradictory statements, paradoxical statements, completely cryptic statements. Just in what I've said so far—is it awareness, is it not awareness—it's clear that what's being pointed to here is not simple. It's not simple for us to understand.

The cessation of all consciousnesses - we can't conceive of that other than... Most people wouldn't be able to conceive of that other than being either completely dead in the modernist sense of the word, or in a coma, or under anesthetic, or something of that nature.

So in a way, there's something here that's really not simple for us to grasp - not simple for a consciousness that hasn't opened to it, or hasn't at least moved significantly in that direction, to grasp. You could say it's not simple. You could equally say it's so utterly simple that it's beyond the kind of level of simplicity that the mind can get to - or that the usual mind can get to, the conditioned mind can get to. It's simpler than awareness. It's simpler than oneness. It's simpler even than nothingness.

I want to point to these difficulties with language, which are part of the inheritance of particularly this area around awakening, and particularly the constellation of texts that describe or point to or teach the unfabricated. You get similar problems with language around emptiness, starting in the Pali Canon for sure, but picked up even more and exacerbated over a thousand years of Mahayana teachings. What you get - and I include myself in this at times - is teachers being at times very precise in their use of language with the concept of emptiness, and at times quite sloppy, the concept being used in different ways at different times and in quite a slippery way.

On top of that, different traditions use the same words like "emptiness" and mean very, very different things - different Buddhist traditions using the same word to mean very different things, almost diametrically opposed meanings. All this gives rise to a lot of confusion for the modern practitioner: what does this word "emptiness" mean? What's it pointing to? What is involved in a realization of emptiness?

Just briefly on this - what's my response? What's your response to hearing all that? It can be quite frustrating as a student, as a practitioner, to be in the thicket of a bewildering and very slippery range and use of a single concept. So what does it do to you? Does it make you want to jack the whole thing in and give up? Do you hear it and think, "Oh, that's all just intellectual and fussy, and I don't want to fuss like that, I don't want to be involved in that kind of fussing"?

Or is there something like: "I really want to find out what these two - actually way more than two - what are all these different strands of tradition, these different teachers saying? What exactly is the difference, and where do I stand in all this, and what do I gravitate to, and what can I see in my practice?" Is it over-fussiness, or is it important fussiness? What is at stake here in this profusion and confusion and difficulties with language and terms? And again, why do I have the response that I have? That it feels really important to me, or it just feels like a bunch of silly intellectuals arguing over how many angels fit on the head of a pin? Why? What's going on for me? Is it, or in what way is it, or is it not, a soul question for me?

If I was going to spill out the pieces of the Pali Canon - different references and so forth - put them on the table and see how that jigsaw, how those pieces of a jigsaw fit together, and also what makes sense for my practice, I guess I would say: what does this Dharma mean?

It means knowing the unfabricated experientially. But that knowing of the unfabricated, pursuing this meditative exploration into less and less fabrication - as I've described in detail elsewhere - also means understanding dependent origination. In other words, in pursuing this question of fabrication: how does the self sense, how does the sense of various objects in my perception, how does the world sense get fabricated, in what ways, and with what conditions? How does it get built, fabricated, constructed, saṅkhāra-ed, and how not, and how much less? Understanding that everything is a dependent arising, that everything is a fabrication, and how it is fabricated.

These two - the experiencing of the unfabricated and understanding dependent origination - should be intimately tied together with understanding the fabrication of all phenomena: that they are fabricated and how they are fabricated. In other words, understanding dependent origination not just intellectually, but in one's experience and through one's experience. This includes intellectual understanding but goes to a certain level beyond intellectual understanding, because there is the dissolving of the concepts and the elements involved.

Those two go together: the knowing of the unfabricated and the thorough, deep understanding of dependent origination. And this means the same thing as the knowing of the emptiness of things, or it's involved in that trajectory. To understand that something is a dependent arising, that it's fabricated, means to know it's empty.

Sometimes a practitioner in the broad range of practitioners of different sub-traditions of modern Theravada, Pali Canon-inspired Dharma, reports - and they've reported to me and other teachers - a cessation experience, what's called a cessation experience, the cessation of perception. In other words, the non-fabrication of perception. So an experience of what we could call non-fabricating, or the unfabricated.

Now, when someone reports an experience like that, it can be quite tricky, again, based on the language. It's really a struggle to articulate what that experience is or how it is. So someone can report an experience, and it could be, could not be...

And this is where the wisdom of the Buddha comes in—though I will dwell on this for a moment—the wisdom of focusing more on the fetters. Well, what's gone now? What's changed now? Not so much: what was that experience? Partly because the difficulty in describing such experiences is actually enormous.

People could be describing many different things. I remember being a student on a retreat, and in a group interview, someone described what sounded very much to me like just his first experience of the first jhana. What he said was "everything disappeared." It wasn't until he was asked a few more questions that it became very clear that everything did not disappear. This is quite common as one goes through the jhanas—one hasn't quite ascertained or discerned what has disappeared and what remains.

In the first jhana, hindrances have certainly disappeared, and in many cases, the solidity of body perception has disappeared. But much remains: perception as subject and object, time, piti as the main experience, sukha—all of that continues. So when people say "everything disappeared," there's both a language difficulty and a discernment question. Really, did everything disappear, or was there other stuff remaining?

For instance, all perception of form can disappear in the fifth jhana—does disappear in the fifth jhana—and a person can say "everything disappeared." Or in the seventh jhana, in the realm of nothingness, and actually there is still something there. What's the something? It's the nothing. In the seventh jhana, a perception of nothingness still remains. You see how subtle this gets, how deep it becomes.

To say there was a cessation, everything disappeared, there was a cessation of all perception—it goes very, very deep in terms of the more refined perceptions that remain and that can then be transcended.

But even if one thinks, "Well, maybe this person did have a cessation experience," my experience as a teacher is that that cessation experience, cessation of perception, may or may not bring freedom with it. In some instances, unfortunately, it just seems to give rise over time to clinging—clinging to that experience or clinging to the memory of it.

A person looks at their life, and sometimes an authority, a sayadaw or someone, has said, "No, no, it's stream entry." The person says, "But I don't feel any different." And the sayadaw says, "No, you're a stream enterer now." Sometimes what happens is a person has an experience and actually there's not much freedom coming out of it. Or even worse, the effect is to cause clinging.

Sometimes there's a kind of devaluing of the world of perception, or dualism emerges: there's that fantastic thing, and all this around me is just rubbish. In other words, their experience of the unfabricated—they have arrived at it. It has opened up through intense non-clinging in a moment, so there's not the fabricating, and then there's the opening to the unfabricated. But because they haven't been exploring in a way that prioritizes the exploration of fabrication—fabricating more, fabricating less, the dependent arising of perception—that hasn't been a theme. They've just been, for instance, contemplating impermanence really intensely.

Then what you get is this kind of amazing opening to an experience so different from ordinary worldly experience, so different from the realm of perception, which is all this. And it seems to have nothing to do—these two realms of perception and the transcending of perception, the fabricated and the unfabricated—seem to have nothing to do with each other. There's a radical dualistic split.

The function of that split sometimes can be helpful in one's life. There is something beyond, and that shines through on this life or implies something about this life that's very helpful. There can be freedom. For someone else, it might be that this dualism between the fabricated and unfabricated just creates a dismissal and disconnect from this life of perception, from the fabricated world, in a way that isn't that helpful. Then one's got just this thing that I want to get back to—this unfabricated—and what about this world of fabrication?

Now another person, another practitioner, another student coming in may be really getting interested in this question of dependent origination and fabrication—how self, other, world get fabricated through different forms of clinging and to what degree—watching this movement up and down the spectrum of fabrication. They've never had a full cessation experience. It's never been for them that everything completely disappears. But they see this movement of the relative fading of perception to different degrees, maybe really deeply, and then fabricating up and down, up and down on this spectrum. They see its dependency on the way of looking. They see the dependency on clinging.

Because they see it, they understand dependent origination more and more. Even without experiencing a complete cessation of all perception, a complete unfabricating of all perception, understanding this movement up and down—at some point, the intuitive wisdom just gets it. I don't even need that experience.

I just grasp it scientifically, inductively. I just understand something.

And this brings—they haven't had a cessation experience, but it brings a liberation that is greater than the other person I alluded to who's had the cessation experience, got the certificate from the teacher or whatever, but hasn't understood dependent arising, hasn't understood the relationship of the fabricated to the unfabricated and how fabricating works, dependent on way of looking, dependent on clinging, and different degrees and kinds of clinging.

So that's something I know will be important for some of you to know.

It also seems to me more and more, as I hear from more students, that one can have, of course, a sort of what we might call a full cessation experience. It's fully vivid and immediate—in the sense of unmediated—experience, opening to the sense experience of the unfabricated. In other words, there's nothing else going on. All other perception has stopped.

Or, at different times—and I remember saying this in a Q&A on some retreat in the last few years in response to a question—one can have a kind of sense of it, an intimation of this dimension that should be known, kind of shining through, if you like, the experience of this world.

Now, certainly one will get that sense—some people get that sense of the shining through of the unfabricated—after they've had a sort of complete cessation experience. But I think it's also possible for some people to kind of get it before they've really fully opened up to it, with something of the genuine unfabricated shining through.

We have to be a little careful here because—and again, some of you who know the different jhānas, especially as it gets into the formless realms, will know that in the aftereffects on perception of a different jhāna, it's quite common for that perception to kind of shine through the world of the fabricated, this world of experience and perception. And so what we can get is all kinds of onenesses can shine through. The oneness of cosmic love, the oneness of cosmic consciousness, the oneness of awareness, the oneness of nothingness, etc., can be sensed as shining through as we are moving about in the world with our senses open. There's this mystical shining through and the blessedness of that. There are actually many different versions.

So how do we discern the, so to speak, genuine unfabricated? I think it's difficult. I would say, though, that the unfabricated is characterized, if we can say that, by being timeless. It's beyond time. It's somehow not even a now, not even a present. And so if there's that quality of—we could say eternity, but let's say timelessness—not just beyond past and future, but beyond present as well. That quality shining through is particularly characteristic of the unfabricated, this dimension that the Buddha said should be known.

And also, secondly, and connected with what I mentioned earlier about how the Buddha talked about this realm, is that it's kind of got this... Is it or is it not aware? It doesn't quite feel right to say it is aware in the usual sense of awareness—A, because it's not in time; B, it has no object. And it doesn't quite feel right to say it's not aware. So those two elements—the timeless and this kind of middle way of whether it is or isn't aware—perhaps can help in discerning whether it's that unfabricated shining through.

So one version... as I hope you can hear, I'm actually really not interested in selling you any particular version of all this. But one way of thinking about it—and I can't remember if I shared this in talks before or just individually with certain students—one way of thinking about awakening, or a sort of metaphor I had, was of a ball bearing in a U-tube.

This ball bearing can be—when the tube is shaken, the ball bearing can kind of zip up the sides of the tube. Up the sides of the tube indicates away from the bottom point of the U. I hope you can picture this—at the bottom of the U, that's the point of knowing the emptiness of everything, knowing the dependent origination of everything. And everything means self, any phenomena, awareness, time, the now—you name it.

So this is one view. The ball bearing can be right there, in the knowing of that emptiness. And then out of that comes the freedom from suffering because we know that things are empty and there isn't the clinging.

With a stream-enterer, it's like the knock of the eight winds and just the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune and all that. Knock the tube and the ball bearing can go up the tube, climbing the walls. And as it goes up the tube, it's away from the kind of rootedness in that view of emptiness. So there is the relative forgetting of that emptiness. I might know it somewhere in my being, but right at that point I've lost access to it and I'm caught up in reification and clinging and then dukkha. In that moment the ball bearing is up. But because of gravity, at some point the ball bearing falls back. It falls back down the sides of the tube and reconnects with that place at the bottom of knowing complete emptiness.

So you can fill out this analogy if you like—it might be quite interesting. An arahant, someone who's fully awakened, perhaps is someone who doesn't move from that point at the bottom.

This, though, I have problems with, as you can maybe guess. If I completely know emptiness thoroughly, utterly and deeply all the time—or rather, in the moment that I completely, thoroughly and deeply know the emptiness of all things—there will be a cessation of fabrication of perception. I won't perceive anything except the unfabricated. So if an arahant is someone staying just exactly at the bottom, it doesn't quite work with this understanding. There's some conundrum there.

Historically—I can't remember if I've explained this again, either just individually to people or on other retreats—actually out of that conundrum was one of the philosophical conundra that the Mahāyāna had to deal with.

They had to come up with an answer. How does a Buddha get reborn into the world of perception so that he can save other beings and help them be there with the world of form when a Buddha knows all the time, one hundred percent thoroughly, about the utter emptiness of all things? Because if a Buddha is in that knowledge and with that knowledge in the mind, then there isn't the fabrication of perceptions. How can you be in the world? How is there a world then? So we could play with that analogy, but I'm just pointing that out.

The other stages of awakening might be that, just as for the stream-enterer, the ball gets knocked out of that center point of stasis, lowest gravity, and gets knocked out up the sides of the U-tube and then falls back down due to gravity, due to the stream of wisdom being in that momentum. A once-returner would be someone who, when it gets knocked up, perhaps does so less often, or the ball bearing rises less high, so it comes back more quickly to that sense of emptiness, and thus less clinging, less reification, and so more freedom, less suffering, less dukkha. So that's one way of understanding the stages of awakening—an analogy or metaphor that may be useful to some people, that's seemed useful to some people in the past.

If we dwell again, just a little bit, on the ten fetters that the Buddha outlined, we touched on three of them for the stream-enterer. For a once-returner, there are two other fetters. A once-returner makes a major dent in greed and aversion—sense desire and aversion. A non-returner has eradicated those two fetters. And then an arahant has five other fetters that they eradicate. So from non-returner to arahant, there are five more fetters.

The point I want to make, though, is that according to that theoretical scaffolding that the Buddha outlines with those ten fetters, the stream-enterer has not made any impact on sense desire and aversion. It's only at the stage of a once-returner that these are addressed. I'm saying this because sometimes what happens is practitioners get really hung up on their relationship with sense desire, their relationship with food or whatever it is. In this theoretical scaffolding, if we take it strictly as the Buddha points out, it would seem that actually the first thing to address is the sakkāya-diṭṭhi and the other two fetters that go with stream entry.

In other words, look at fabrication, in the outline that I gave. Explore fabrication, because through that you will see the emptiness of any self-view—which is to say, you would see the emptiness of any and all self-views, rather than worrying too much about your greed or apparent greed. So it might suggest something about the order of our practice, of what we kind of aim for and preoccupy ourselves with, what we focus on. This question of fabrication may be the one to look at first, and probably for a while. Then out of that, building on that, the others may be easier.

It's important, I think—again, much of what I'm saying is really a response to the kinds of things that students bring or the kind of places where people often get stuck—to point out that when we talk about awakening, we're not talking about an experience. So for some people, certain experiences like an experience of non-fabrication may be really significant, but awakening itself is not an experience. It's not an experience of no-self, for example.

The way I tend to teach is that there is a spectrum of fabrication. So when someone comes in and says, "I had an experience of no-self," in the way I would interpret things, it's really that they've had an experience of usually a relative degree of less fabrication of the sense of self. The sense of self is on a spectrum. It can get fabricated more—higher on the spectrum, so to speak—or much less, or much less. So when people say "an experience of no-self," they might mean an experience of the temporary quieting of the more gross personality constructs or beliefs. There's really a spectrum of degree of fabrication of self, and we need to understand that spectrum. But awakening is not an experience of no-self or an experience of whatever.

If it's an experience, then often what you get is someone saying, "I had this experience and it lasted for X amount of time." Sometimes it can be, "I had this experience, it seemed to last for months"—sometimes people report this. Again, one wonders about the closeness and level and subtlety of discernment involved in scrutinizing what was actually involved in that experience. Was there really no-self? And was it really without fluctuations during those several months or days or hours? Then they say, "I had this experience and it lasted X long and then now I've lost it. So I was liberated and now I've lost it. I was in awakening or nibbāna and now I've lost it."

To me, there's a problem in clinging to any experience and calling that awakening, for several reasons I've just touched on very briefly. I think there's another kind of freedom that comes from a kind of understanding—an understanding of that dependent origination, understanding of how fabrication of self and of phenomena works with clinging, and understanding the implications of that.

And when I say understanding, I don't just mean intellectual - I mean something that permeates one's heart and body almost. This understanding allows us to recognize that the self is empty. The self-sense is a dependent arising. The self is a phenomenon that gets fabricated more or less at different times depending on certain conditions.

Once I know that it's empty, once I truly understand it's a fabrication, this actually allows the self-sense to move up and down on that spectrum of fabrication. It can be more fabricated or less fabricated, appear less solid, appear very refined, appear in this way or that way, appear as a process, appear as an atomistic process of aggregates, or as a mist, or a space, or a vastness of awareness, or disappear completely at times in cessation of everything. But I understand - oh, it's just the fabrication of self. It's fine. It's really fine.

So I'm not trying to cling or believing that I should be in some kind of stasis of a certain experience - whether it's cosmic consciousness or no-self or this or that. Understanding, really understanding and digesting a certain understanding, allows fabrication to move up and down this spectrum, allows more or less fabrication of self. And we come to understand - oh, self is not-self. Self is not-self. It's just this fabrication happening. It's not self. It's okay. It's okay to move on the spectrum. It's okay to fabricate. It's okay that certain constructions arise.

In all this, you can hear how I construct the jigsaw when I want to map the Pali Canon elements to the whole picture. My solution to the jigsaw tends to be like this. Again, I'm not going to convince anyone - it doesn't really matter.

But we can step back from this and approach it with a whole different set of questions and ponderings, different probings in our approach. How high is the bar for what we're calling awakening? How high is a different teacher, or yourself, or I, or anyone, setting the bar for stream entry?

In what you've heard of my solution to the jigsaw, yes, stream entry is, relatively speaking, a pretty high bar. In fact, it's a very high bar compared to some of the other possible interpretations one could have. Seeing really the emptiness of all and any self-view involves seeing the emptiness of any and all phenomena.

For instance, to see that there is a process in time - if I then decide that the self is a process in time of the psychophysical aggregates or the five aggregates or the eighteen sense constituents, if I see that the self is that, or if I decide that's my self-view, to me that's still a self-view. I've decided that's what the self is, or I'm clinging to that position. And there are suttas where the Buddha makes it clear that any self-view is a wrong view to be let go of.

But more importantly, I think, when one realizes that those elements of the process - the aggregates themselves - are empty of inherent existence. The body, the atoms, the vedana, the moments of consciousness, time. The elements of the process and the time it happens in are also empty. That's like dissolving any possibility for forming a self-view there. It can't form on anything. You can't say the self is the process of these elements in time, because one has seen that time is empty and not a reality. It doesn't form a basis for any kind of self-view. And the elements themselves that make up this process are also empty.

So for me, it's relatively speaking quite a high bar. Just so you know.

But more interesting questions, or questions that interest me more now, include: How much is the inclination to measure myself and want to measure up, or the pain of the inner critic, or the dominance in our psyche of the inner critic, influencing the decision or the view or the interpretation we adopt of where the bar is for stream entry? Why am I adopting this or that view? Is it actually that in the background the inner critic is running the show, deciding what views I have and what practices or interpretations or views I'll turn away from because it's just too painful? Because if I feel like I can't, or I fail, or the inner critic says "you haven't yet" or "you can't" - does it pull all the strings actually? Or does it say, "just drop the whole thing with awakening - it's just way too painful"?

That's one question. There are other questions - as I said, we could argue over Pali Canon etymology and different texts that seem to contradict each other, or this one emphasizes this and another emphasizes that.

To me, that's much less interesting at this point. What draws my attention is a whole other set of questions.

In setting the bar, if you like, or the definition of stream entry at one level or at a more difficult level, what does that do? What's the result? Not so much what's the cause —"I'd set it there because I've read this in the Pali Canon" or "this word means this"— but actually, what's the result?

What kind of person is made when we set the bar here? And what kind of person is made when we include this in the definition?

If I say that stream entry is simply a softening of the inner critic, what kind of person results from that view? If I say stream entry just means going with the flow in one's life, what kind of person emerges there? If I say stream entry means seeing the radical emptiness of all phenomena through dedicated exploration of the mysteries of dependent arising, what kind of person results?

What kind of person do we want? What makes an interesting person? What are we after?

As I alluded to at the beginning of yesterday's talk, do we dare to bring a kind of radical questioning into all this—even a bold questioning of what has been established in terms of the meaning of awakening or stream entry, and the different claims that people might make? Is that possible for us? Do we dare? What would make that possible? What would justify that?

And again, we could ask: what is the soul's relationship—your soul's relationship—with this question of awakening? With your awakening and your journey toward that, or this question of stream entry? What does it mean for this to be a soul question? How does the soul hold that very question?

How does it relate to awakening, or relate to the possibility that there are potentially different interpretations, and your movement toward that or opening toward that? Is there even a soul relationship with these questions and notions, or does the soul simply not get involved in those questions and notions? And if not, why not?

Without any preconceived answers of "it should" or "it shouldn't," but just: what's actually going on there on a soul level in relation to all these questions?

CHAPTER 126

What is Awakening? (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 59 min

> In this profound exploration, Rob Burbea challenges conventional approaches to defining awakening and stream entry (sotāpanna). Rather than debating historical accuracy, he examines the psychological motivations behind setting higher or lower standards for spiritual attainment and questions what kinds of persons emerge from different approaches to liberation.
>
> Burbea addresses the complex relationship between ethics (sīla) and awakening, noting how moral standards shift across cultures and time periods. He critiques the fantasy of pure origins in Buddhist tradition, showing how the Dharma has always been a synthesis of multiple influences, from the Buddha's time through its transmission to China and the modern West.
>
> The talk outlines a possible trajectory of awakening centered on exploring the fabrication of perception through different ways of looking. This path moves from seeing the self as psychophysical aggregates (khandhas) through experiences of oneness, to realizing the emptiness (suññatā) of all phenomena, including awakening itself. Burbea suggests that true awakening involves an open-ended process of discovering infinite possibilities for perception and being, rather than reaching a final state.
>
> Drawing from his personal confrontation with serious illness, Burbea shares four insights that provide profound freedom regarding death: perceiving the unfabricated with its mystery and sacredness, sensing the emptiness of all phenomena as beautiful and mysterious, experiencing life through imaginal perception with soul, and feeling aligned with one's soul duties. This deeply personal and philosophical investigation reframes awakening as an infinite opening of doors rather than a destination.

So let's stay a little bit with these questions that I've just thrown out there. Rather than arguing about which definition or setting of the bar captures the "real" stream entry according to the historical Buddha, we could ask: why does one want the bar for stream entry lower or higher? And actually wrapped up in that, a corollary might be: what is going on for you psychologically in this kind of emphasizing of the historical Buddha's take? What assumptions are operating when we do that? When we go to the books and look there and engage in this arguing and nitpicking about the text, why prioritize that? And what are the consequences of prioritizing that?

I realize for some that's going to sound like a very odd and dangerous and radical questioning. But if you can actually open it up as a question, without any implication of "it should be this way" or "it should be that way," it's more like: Really, why? What's actually going on for you in the psyche with all that?

And then, as I threw out as well, one of the questions: what kind of a person is made in attaining a stream entry that, say, is going with the flow? What kind of person is made in attaining a much higher bar—say, this thing about recognizing everything, absolutely everything, including the elements, including time, including the now, including awareness, all of it, all phenomena empty?

I don't know, actually. But it's more like turning the question around and looking at the result of decisions rather than looking backwards for why we would choose this or that.

I suppose that if the bar was set higher—this kind of radical emptiness of everything—that person, in their journey to that, would have almost inevitably had lots of quite interesting and unusual experiences and insights, and a pretty large range of experiences, insights, and perspectives. Perhaps they'd be shaped by the really complex and challenging journey to that kind of level of realization, and also shaped by the kind of dedication, focus, and choices it took to get there.

I don't know if you've ever met anyone who declares themselves an arahant or finally fully enlightened: "It's finished for me, I've done it all." They're often not that attractive as human beings and not that impressive when one hangs around them a little bit. Actually, there's quite a lot missing there. As one of my teachers in the States said—I don't know if she had anyone particular in mind when she said it, it was just mid-flow in a dharma talk—"If that's awakening, you can keep it."

Now, this business about "I've finished," someone saying "I've finished, I've reached full arahantship, there's nothing further," or "I am an arahant, I'm fully enlightened"—I'm interested in that, or the problems with such a claim, not so much because of the kind of view like, "Oh, someone who's fully enlightened wouldn't be arrogant like that, or they'd be humble or something." That doesn't quite square with the Pali canon either, actually, if you know the lion's roar of the arahant. But actually, for another reason: this kind of "I've done it, it's finished" view does not allow the kind of open-endedness that to me is much more interesting and much more soulful and much more fruitful, really.

Another aspect of this—I haven't mentioned it so far—is one could look, in all this questioning of what is stream entry, at the ethics of a so-called stream enterer, as an indicator or a necessary and basic qualification for any kind of awakening. Somewhere in the Pali canon—I can't remember where—the Buddha actually points to that: the ethics, as a stream enterer can't go against sila, ethics.

But that, too, is a problem, or in that area. We also tend to be, in the area of ethics, blinkered by whatever is the normal ethical view of our time, of our society, or of the subcultures we move in.

You know, some of you will know my concern with climate change and flying. But it's tricky. I sometimes wonder—it's like, you know, a stance of thinking about the ethics of climate change and thinking about the ethics of carbon use, individual carbon use. Scientists calculate how much individual carbon can each—if we shared it out equally among the human beings of the Earth—how much carbon is each person sort of, what's their individual carbon allowance if it was just equally shared? And that's even disregarding the past and history and cultures and whatnot, and the kind of excessive use of modern Western cultures and people in modern Western cultures. Just from now on: what would you each be entitled to?

And just a couple of transatlantic flights a year would easily exceed my quota as a human being entitled to what anyone else is entitled to. So how am I going to square that? If I'm sitting across from someone, how am I going to persuade them that I'm entitled to more carbon and so it's okay for me to do this flying, and sorry that you can't, or it's better for me to have it than you to have it? How do I justify that exceeding of my fair share of personal carbon dioxide emissions?

Something like that, as an ethical consideration, is strange and uncomfortable to a lot of people. In a few years, it might be widely regarded as just a basic, adequate ethical consideration. It's like that just maybe becomes just how human beings think. It's like, you know, if you go to a party and you eat all the cake, or you're living on a desert island and you get to shit everywhere—how do you justify that?

In a few years, or some years, it may be that that's just adequate, basic, normal ethical behavior to not take more than your fair share of carbon, not to exceed that, rather than what it might sound right now—a way of thinking that's really kind of strange, especially if one tries to convince other people that they should think that way and they think you're just obnoxious: "Back off."

Actually, I read the other day that in the new set of interview questions that they ask candidates for undergraduate admission to Oxford and Cambridge universities in England, that's actually one of the questions.

Something like, "Well, we know that flying produces excessive carbon emissions and causes dangerous climate change that will affect people. How can you justify flying? If you know the plane will fly anyway," as people say, "I know it's going to fly whether I get on it or not, so it doesn't really matter"—is that a valid ethical argument? The candidate has a few minutes to present some kind of intelligent moral reasoning.

This is interesting because Oxford and Cambridge are rather traditional, mainstream universities. So this kind of ethical questioning may be finding its way into what becomes normal discourse. You know, ending slavery was once an outrageous proposition, but eventually it became simply basic ethics—of course you don't own slaves, you don't treat human beings that way. But at the time, during the abolition movement, it was hotly debated. If you freed a slave in some places, you were breaking the law. Campaigning to abolish slavery, or working against Nazism, or fighting to establish female suffrage—retrospectively, all these actions are regarded as brave and ethically correct, as basic responsibilities. But at the time, it wasn't obvious to most people, and some actually regarded such actions as unethical.

People are going to prison now, being sent to prison for civil disobedience of different kinds in relation to climate, environment, all kinds of issues. They are viewed by various states as engaging in unethical behavior. So our views of what's ethical and what's not are really influenced by the contemporary culture we live in and move within.

So ethics has something to do with awakening, but what exactly?

A person may simply be an ethical conformist, rather than someone who considers their ethical choices deeply, who questions deeply, who wrestles with these difficult questions. These questions are especially difficult now in the time of globalization, where we actually know and can see and measure our effects. We're aware of our individual impacts on all parts of the globe—on people, animals, and plant life everywhere. This makes ethical questions much more complex.

So what should the requirement be regarding ethical conformism for a stream-enterer? Is stream entry just adopting the Buddhist precepts? And is that adoption merely another form of ethical conformism—just accepting what's given by the tradition without questioning?

There are aspects of the Buddhist tradition that many people these days are questioning ethically. For example, the ordination of women. I've stayed at monasteries where they weren't recycling. When I asked about it—how come you don't recycle this plastic and paper?—the answer I got was, "This is just samsara. Who cares? Who cares what happens in samsara? We're on our way out." This was a Theravada monastery.

Is that ethical? It's not breaking the Buddha's five precepts, or at least not in a certain interpretation of them. There's strict conformity to the monastic rules there, but the rules don't say anything about recycling.

And when you get into the five precepts themselves, as I'm sure you're aware—what exactly does the third precept mean? What exactly does the fifth precept mean around sexual behavior, around alcohol, drugs, and so forth? The range of interpretations, just within the insight meditation world, is actually quite large.

So if we're saying that ethics must have something to do with awakening—and somewhere in the Pali Canon that connection is made with stream entry and keeping ethics—what exactly is this relationship? What ethics are we talking about, and what kind of relationship is it?

When we consider awakening, much of what I've been saying relates to this: awakening, liberation, enlightenment—whatever we want to call it—is a concept and a vision set within the context of a dharma. In our case, Buddha dharma, but it could be Hindu dharma or another tradition. Awakening is a concept and vision set within the context of a dharma, a tradition. It exists within a particular vision and understanding of what that tradition offers.

When I consider awakening in this light, I realize that awakening—liberation, enlightenment, whatever we choose to call it—is fundamentally a concept and vision set within the context of dharma. In our case, Buddha dharma, though it could just as easily be Hindu dharma or another tradition. Awakening exists as a concept within the framework of a particular spiritual tradition.

If I were to ask my mother what awakening means to her, what liberation signifies—well, these words would mean nothing at all to her. She's not involved in any tradition that employs such terminology, so these concepts remain completely foreign. This illustrates how awakening is inherently a concept embedded within tradition.

When we examine traditions and our relationship to them, certain modern philosophical perspectives offer valuable insights. Thinkers like Nietzsche and Michel Foucault explored what they called genealogy—not quite history, but rather an investigation of the diverse elements, fracturings, strange combinations, and external influences that converge to form entire streams of thought and practice through historical time.

This genealogical approach critiques what Nietzsche identified as the fantasy of origins—the belief that something existed in a pure, superior form at the beginning. It also challenges the fantasy of a single, unbroken trajectory, the notion that we can somehow locate and follow a purely authentic tradition. These fantasies, these unfounded beliefs, often accompany discussions of Buddhadharma.

Sometimes people, wrapped up in this fantasy of origins, argue that the Buddha existed in radical independence from his historical context, that everything he taught was boldly new and original—a completely unprecedented appearance of spiritual wisdom in human civilization.

But consider Einstein's theory of general relativity and its revolutionary understanding of gravity. While dramatically different from Newton's gravitational theory, it simultaneously borrowed from, built upon, and retained much of Newton's scientific framework. Scientific revolutions, like spiritual or philosophical ones, change certain elements while continuing others uninterrupted, using previous foundations and retaining aspects of earlier worldviews.

The Buddha operated in precisely this way. He found himself within a particular culture, country, and historical context rich with diverse spiritual, philosophical, and cosmological perspectives. He adopted much of this existing framework, modified certain aspects, and preserved others. The Buddhist tradition didn't begin with the Buddha—this is my central point here.

When we speak of tradition, we easily slip into idealistic thinking, imagining some pure tradition we can somehow locate, something that started with the Buddha in pristine form and perhaps suffered contamination later. But the tradition already existed before the Buddha encountered it. There were multiple traditions that the Buddha engaged with and incorporated. What we call the Buddhist tradition already represented an confluence of ideas from that time, place, and culture—those ways of thinking, worldviews, and conceptual frameworks.

This reality becomes even more pronounced in the modern West. Dharma teachings arrived here during the twentieth century in various waves, and as modern Westerners, we inevitably bring our complete set of assumptions, interpretations, needs, dispositions, and what might honestly be called errors or directional changes to what we ostensibly receive from the dharma. And remember, what we're receiving was already a multiplicity of different traditions.

Our contemporary engagement represents a genuine mishmash—Theravadan traditions mixed with elements of Zen, Tibetan Buddhism, Advaita, and substantial Western worldview. We cannot avoid this synthesis. Even if we could somehow separate what we receive from what we bring to our receiving—which is impossible—what we receive was already plural, the result of 2,500 years of genealogical development, misinterpretations, contradictions, and cultural influxes.

The historical transmission of Buddhism to China illustrates this process perfectly. Initially, Chinese culture rejected Buddhism outright—it made no impact whatsoever. Later, when Buddhism gained acceptance, the Chinese culture accepted only certain elements, creating a form of Chinese Buddhism dramatically different from Pali Canon Buddhism. The Chinese mixed Buddhist concepts with Taoism and Confucianism, filtering everything through distinctly Chinese cultural dispositions and sensibilities.

Chinese culture harbored a particular abhorrence of anything transcendent, emphasizing instead this-world tangible experience—a perspective radically different from the transcendent thrust popular in Indian spiritual circles and evident throughout the Pali Canon. The Chinese essentially rejected this transcendent dimension entirely, excising it from their Buddhist practice.

They similarly rejected or significantly downplayed rebirth teachings, partly because Chinese culture placed enormous importance on honoring personal family ancestors through prayer and respect. The logic of infinite rebirths, as Tibetan teachings explain, means that everyone eventually becomes your ancestor, dissolving the significance of one's particular lineage in an infinite sea of ancestral connections.

This pattern repeats whenever dharma encounters new cultural contexts. There are inevitable tearings away, influxes, reinterpretations—people bringing their needs, dispositions, and assumptions to whatever they receive, transforming it in the process. The same dynamic unfolds in the West. This cultural transformation is not an aberration but an integral aspect of how spiritual wisdom travels and takes root.

It's part of what must go on. It's unavoidable. You and I cannot step out of our own cultural Weltanschauung—our worldview, self-sense, the way we feel existence, our sensibilities. We cannot step outside; you can't step outside of your time in history and receive the Buddhism in some pure way.

So we bring to it all kinds of things, some of which we're conscious of, and much of it we're not even conscious of—exactly what we're bringing in terms of need, belief, disposition, assumption, interpretation, emphasis.

The modern West, to my view, is characterized by complexity and plurality, but perhaps the most dominant worldview is a very non-transcendent view. We believe much of the time that this is it. Any kind of talk of something transcendent is not popular in the dominant culture. This shapes the flavor of the Dharma that takes root in the West—what we keep and what we reject, what we emphasize.

This is it. This is it. This sense is quite dominant in Western culture—there's nothing more than this, no other dimensions. Anything transcendent or unfabricated would be baffling. This "this is it" tends to find its way into the colors, emphases, and teachings of the kinds of Buddhism that proliferate and become popular.

I'm saying this not just for abstract historical reasons, but to make these points about tradition. Awakening is rooted in tradition. What is a tradition? What's involved in our sense of tradition? Can we be more realistic, or at least more wise, about what actually is involved in a tradition?

When we see all this about the dependence on culture and the breadth and complexity and plurality of what a tradition encompasses—any tradition is a multi-tradition full of tangents and contradictions and borrowings and influxes and often shavings off—then awakening is rooted in tradition. What does awakening mean?

When you actually realize what's involved in tradition, the question "What does awakening mean?" might actually become "What can awakening mean?"—as if there isn't one singular version of it. Because we're actually in a moment of creation in the modern West, as the Dharma comes into the West, and there's this mixing of everything that we as modern Westerners bring to it—intellectually, aesthetically, in all kinds of ways—"What does awakening mean?" might become "What can awakening mean?"

Even more than that, modern Western culture, perhaps even modern global culture, could be characterized as postmodern—not even having one dominant view of this non-transcendent view, but characterized by plurality and utter diversity of views and worldviews and senses of reality. So the whole question around awakening might move from "What is awakening?" or "What does awakening mean?" to the much more open question: "What can awakening mean?"

Beyond that, we might look into what I said earlier about approaching the question from what it results in. Rather than "awakening means X," we ask: What does such a view or opinion or way of conceiving of it result in? What does this view of awakening result in? What does that view of awakening result in? What does a third view result in? It's approaching the question from the other end—what does it result in? Again, what do I want? Where do I want to go?

Having said all this, and not arguing on grounds of historical accuracy—though I could—but for the reasons I think you can probably grasp by now, such arguments don't seem that interesting or fruitful. It seems a little silly to me.

So not arguing on the ground of historical accuracy, though we could, and not trying to persuade you, I could outline a trajectory—let's call it a trajectory—that is or might be a central strand in one notion of awakening. Or it might be, if you like, a direction of development, or better yet, exploration or discovery that leads to what? Freedom? Freedoms?

Plural?

That's certainly interesting in terms of what senses of self and world it allows—the senses of self and world that open up, beauty. So I could outline a trajectory that is a central strand, might be a central strand in a notion of awakening as a kind of direction of exploration, discovery that opens up freedoms, interesting senses of things, beauties and more.

One strand—this trajectory—among others which would include psychological and emotional awareness and skill, relational awareness and skill, development of the heart with kindness and compassion and generosity, some of which will emerge from this more central strand.

But again, not claiming historical accuracy, though that would be possible, not trying to persuade you, but just putting out something—a possibility of conceiving, taking as fundamental, as central to this exploration—the exploration of fabrication, the fabrication of perception, of all perception of any phenomena. So that means not just the self-sense, but also any object sense, inner and outer, time and space—all of it. Exploring fabrication through playing with different ways of looking, and that whole direction and thrust of investigation, of meditative exploration.

In so doing, if one stayed with it and learned to play with the richness and depth and beauty and subtlety of it all, and the joy of that play and exploration, one would come to a level—one kind of simple level—of seeing: "Oh, I get this experience of the self as just a process of the psychophysical aggregates, the skandhas in time." There would be a certain seeing, a certain level of relative lessening of fabrication.

But one could go beyond that. One will go beyond that if one kept up this exploration, didn't stop there and kept exploring this direction of fabrication and unfabrication, playing with different ways of looking, seeing how much they fabricate and in what ways, what they fabricate and how they unfabricate. One would open up to all kinds of perceptions of oneness—different kinds of oneness—and the self being one with that: I am love, I am awareness, and all these.

One would eventually, in this direction, open to the unfabricated, and one would also realize that all dharmas are empty. Selves, any constituent of the self, any element of existence, any object, any subject, time—past, present, future—awareness, consciousness, space. All dharmas are empty. One would realize that in this ongoing deepening of exploration.

And then one would realize, as I said making the connection earlier, that all self-views are not to be clung to. Any self-view. Because you realize the radical, thorough emptiness of absolutely everything, all self-views collapse as objects of clinging to, of believing in, of being real. This is what the self is.

One can go even deeper—and I've outlined this in quite a lot of detail elsewhere—to see that even this notion of fabrication, which was the very notion that we started with, you start to see: oh, that's empty too. Because if time is empty and the things that are fabricated and fabricating—the elements that are fabricated and the elements that are fabricating—they're also empty, and the time in which fabrication happens is empty, the whole notion of fabrication starts to crumble as a real notion.

And then, because fabrication is empty, the whole notion of the unfabricated is recognized to be empty in a whole other way, a whole other level. The whole duality between the unfabricated as something holy and the fabricated as something unholy—that collapses. Radical non-duality between the unfabricated and the fabricated.

As one goes even further, one sees there's no—because of the radical emptiness of all things—there's no singular way things are. There's no way of looking that one can snuggle into and adopt and hold and say, "This way of looking reveals how things are, the real way things are, what is." There's no way of looking that reveals a final truth of how things are.

With that, one begins slowly to realize it's almost like that also relativizes all conceptual frameworks. It doesn't mean that any conceptual framework is as good as any other and I can believe we're all bananas—I mean actual bananas like fruits, I don't mean that we're all crazy—that's as good as believing the more conventional view of reality.

But it's a more subtle point that no conceptual framework will reveal the ultimate truth of things, and no way of looking will reveal "this is how things are, this is finally, this is the take on things."

Then on this trajectory, one begins to open up to that really radical sense of possibility. One sees even deeper—not just the participation in perception, which was clearer before with this business about fabrication and ways of looking—but actually participation in the whole notions of truth and also in the notions of what awakening is. We participate, or we can participate, we do participate. There's a whole participatory view that becomes viable as a conceptual framework.

So I could have outlined very briefly a trajectory that might be a central strand, as I said, of one possible notion of what awakening might be, among other strands involved in it that seem very important to me—psychological, emotional, relational awareness and skill, development of the heart, generosity and love. Generosity and love I would expect to come out of the metta as well, by the way.

Now, we could say, okay, so where do we place the stages in that? But again, I would just say: why is that important? What's behind the question? What's driving the necessity to place stages there or map it onto this or that?

In that conceptual framework—in my conceptual framework, which is maybe how I tend to think at the moment—awakening includes ending the inner critic, certainly, freeing oneself from that. It includes, more broadly, healing our psychological wounds to a significant extent. It includes being able to flow with the stream of life. It includes the direction of eradicating the kilesas and moving in that direction.

Some of these conceptions, as I've pointed out before, might be quite popular, but when you probe them a little bit or explore them in actual life, you begin to ask the question: what does it actually mean to go with the flow? What does it actually mean to really eradicate those kilesas of greed, aversion and delusion, as I've talked about?

And something in those notions begins to lack a little coherence. Nevertheless, they can be helpful as elements to include in this larger direction, this larger conceptual framework.

It includes the transformative experiences and perceptions and understandings of oneness of different kinds, of anatta, no-self, not-self, all that. But for me, I want to say something further. It also includes this radical emptiness of all phenomena and this non-duality that I was talking about earlier.

But for me, awakening, though it includes all these experiences, insights and directions—as much as they are not ultimately incoherent—is beyond all that too. It includes and involves something more. It includes even the seeing that awakening too is empty. Awakening too is empty. Many Mahayana texts point to the emptiness of awakening, the non-duality of nirvana and samsara.

But this emptiness of awakening doesn't mean that we throw away—for me, doesn't mean that we should throw away—the concept of awakening, the notion, the goal, the vision. It doesn't devalue it. It doesn't say it's empty, therefore it's a lie, therefore it's just a con, or it's rubbish. As someone once said to me, "We're all stuck anyway, we're all schmucks," or something like that. They were talking about a certain spiritual teacher that they felt disillusioned about, and then they'd just gone to this: "Oh, we're all the same, there's nothing possible."

To me, the emptiness of awakening is not saying that. That's not what it opens, that realization. But awakening is empty, in several different ways. And one of the ways it's empty is that if it involves what I was tracing in that outline of a trajectory, awakening will also open all kinds of doors, all kinds of possibilities in many different directions.

That whole movement of awakening will open all kinds of doors, gates, possibilities, and many different directions—manifold and perhaps even infinite possibilities for ways of looking and ways of conceiving. And it will open them for actual use in life, to be engaged, to be lived, to be practiced, knowing they are all empty and at the same time viable, workable, practicable. This is part of what awakening does in this vision of awakening.

And because there's infinite possibility there, there's not an end to this opening. There's not an end to this movement of opening. It's open-ended.

So that's a possible trajectory. I offer it as a possibility, again, without trying to persuade anyone or play other games. I just offer it as a possibility. To me, it's a very beautiful possibility—a possibility of doors and gates being opened by this journey of exploration, in this journey of exploration, through this journey of exploration. And that process itself becoming open-ended in terms of the ways of looking and the conceptual frameworks that open. The whole thing just opens up realms and worlds of possibility of experience and conception.

Let me share something personal about freedom from suffering and equanimity. All this trajectory I've outlined—what does that have to do with freedom from suffering? There are all these different possibilities of views and maturings of view opening up further to another level.

If I just share for me—and it's only for me, personally—it's not the emptiness of self, the insight or view encapsulated in the question "Who dies?" I'm talking about my relationship with the possibility of dying, and dying an early death, or dying soon. It's not so much that question, "Who dies?" that kind of question, the emptiness of self that seems to capture... Or the view that at death there is just the disbanding of this process of the aggregates. It kind of falls apart as a process. This process of the aggregates in time that stuck together makes the self. Or the view that the process was all there was, or is, or was the self.

For me, those kinds of views don't really make a difference and bring deep freedom and deep equanimity with respect to the possibility of dying soon, dying a relatively early death. Even less is it a reflection on impermanence—just the fact that we all die and that everything is impermanent, is born and dies. Nor is it, or was it particularly, the perception—the available perception for me—of oneness with nature and oneness with the elements.

I remember being struck immediately after I got the prognosis. I had a CT scan and the doctor said to me, "You've got a tumor in your pancreas." And I had heard enough about pancreatic cancer to know what that implied. I remember coming back to Gaia House—it was summer—and sitting in the walled garden, reflecting on it, taking in and digesting that news.

Looking around at the beauty around me, I had a possible perception, a possible experience. I was able to enter into that way of looking that just saw myself as one with nature, the body at death dissolving back into nature like that, becoming earth, becoming air, becoming water, and energy. It was available and it was helpful to a certain extent, but it wasn't really a view that brought a lot of deep freedom or equanimity or transformative power.

Rather—and again I'm just sharing for me—I suppose I could list four insights that really were helpful instead, that over the last few years in relation to this possibility of dying, this news, this very real possibility that I am confronted by and live with. Four insights, four ways of looking, four perceptions.

One is the insight into the unfabricated world.

The sense, the perception of that unfabricated realm. But in a way that includes—and this to me is important—in a way that includes a sense, a palpable sense of the mystery there. The mystical beauty and sacredness of it.

In other words, it's something that's functioning in a way that's saying something more than "everything's empty," or something more than "there's just this beyond." It has a soul element in the mystery that I perceive and sense there—the deep, unfathomable mystery, and the beauty, the mystical beauty and sacredness of it. That perception, for me, makes a huge difference.

Secondly, the related insight or view that knows and perceives the emptiness of everything—of all phenomena, of space, of time, past, future, and present, of the now, of consciousness, awareness, and so forth. And again, it's not that I see the emptiness and realize nothing matters because it's all empty. It's not that view or that sense of "nothing matters" that I feel is making the difference for me, the liberating difference.

Rather, it's this realization, this insight-view of the emptiness of all things in a way that makes felt some unspeakable mystery, beauty and sacredness again. It's in the emptiness that there is this sense of this indescribable mystery of everything—everything, everything—and the whole of existence. And that's palpable in that insight or way of looking or sense of the emptiness of all things. It's not that everything is empty, therefore everything is worthless or it doesn't matter. There's some soul element, some element of mystical appreciation, resonance, beauty. That makes the difference for me. That's what I find when I connect to it—that's what cuts through everything. That's what opens it out.

Third, the insight or way of looking that I've described earlier—the sense, the perception of myself and my life and the things and events in my life and in the world as image, the imaginal perception of all that, the sensing with soul of myself, my life, and the things and events in it.

This isn't a constant perception; it's something I move in and out of. This sensing with soul, this imagining, perceiving with all that is involved in that—as we described in the first talk of this series, all those elements and aspects of the imaginal—including, as I described in the last talk on dukkha and soul-making, the sense that when I sense my soul with soul, there is the sense of the non-separateness from the divine of my personality.

And the sense of in and through and as my personality, my individuation, my uniqueness and even my weirdness and my particularities as necessary expressions and fabrications of the divine's unfolding—the soul-making of the Buddha nature, of the cosmic Buddha nature, of whatever you want to call it, of God.

There's this perception of that, as I described in one of those dukkha and soul-making talks. And there's also, as I described there, a sense then that the time span of my life, whatever that turns out to be, the duration of my life, is itself an aspect of my soul. The time and soul are somehow not separate. And the time given to me or allotted to me, whatever that ends up being, is somehow an aspect of my soul. And my soul is not separate from the divine. And in that way, the soul and what is happening and these events and the time and all of it is perfect in that strangely indescribable way that I alluded to in that talk.

That kind of perception, that kind of way of looking, that kind of opening up of the sensing with soul of myself, of my existence, of my life and the events and the story and the personalities—that makes a big difference, huge difference in terms of the relationship with death and the equanimity that comes with that. The sense of grace, gratitude, blessing, ease, peace.

And lastly, again related to imaginal perceiving or sensing with soul, is when I feel myself on track or devoted to my soul duty or duties, which, as we've pointed out, are imaginal perceptions. The perception of duty is part of the imaginal constellation. It's an imaginal perception, which means it's neither real nor unreal. My sense of what my soul duty is in life, or soul duties are in life—it has that theatrical element. It's neither real nor unreal. It has that imaginal middle way. And yet when I feel myself on track and devoted and plugged in to that constellation of duties, that makes a big difference in relation to death.

So I'm just sharing that. We could ask: what insights, what ways of looking make a really radical difference with respect to what matters most? What insights, what ways of looking? If we're opening up this question of awakening—what does it involve? What does it mean? What is achieved there?—what insights, what ways of looking make a really radical difference with respect to what matters most?

Life, death, personhood—what matters most? You tell me, what matters most to you? And what insights and ways of looking make a radical difference and give deep freedom, deep equanimity?

That's the question for you. But still, even that, in relation to freedom and equanimity, I would still place that in the even larger vision that I outlined—that trajectory and that whole strand and the other strands that were involved. I would place even that in that larger context.

in a larger vision.

And that's the vision of this possibility of a movement of awakening, opening doors for us, opening gates of possibility—of perception, of the sense of being, the sense of existence, possibility of action as well. And that opening of doors, opening of gates is potentially infinite and open-ended. Open-ended.

This vision encompasses not just our individual liberation, but a continuous unfolding of what's possible. Each insight, each moment of freedom, each deepening of equanimity opens onto further possibilities we couldn't have imagined before. The path doesn't end with some final attainment, but keeps revealing new dimensions of awakening, new ways of understanding, new capacities for compassion and wisdom.

So when we ask what matters most, when we seek those radical insights that transform our relationship to life and death and personhood, we're participating in something far greater than personal salvation. We're contributing to an endless flowering of human potential, an ever-expanding recognition of what consciousness can become when freed from its habitual limitations.

This is the magnificent scope within which all our practice unfolds—not just individual peace, but the infinite opening of possibility itself.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 127

What is Awakening? (Part 4)

Rob Burbea · 1h37

> In this fourth part of his inquiry into awakening, Rob Burbea presents a radical reimagining of liberation through what he calls the "phenomenological approach" - exploring fabrication and ways of looking in practice. He traces a possible trajectory from understanding the fabrication of personality and self-sense, through experiences of universal oneness, to opening to the unfabricated and realizing the complete emptiness of all dharmas. This leads to recognizing that fabrication itself is empty, creating non-duality between the unfabricated and fabricated realms.
>
> Burbea introduces the soul-making paradigm as expanding awakening beyond traditional boundaries. He distinguishes between "icons" (imaginal forms with infinite depth and soul-making potential) and "idols" (rigid, limited concepts), arguing that awakening must involve the liberation of eros, psyche, and logos in dynamic interaction. This includes embracing conceptual frameworks as creative tools rather than final truths, allowing for reconstruction after deconstruction.
>
> Drawing on Biblical imagery of Abraham's call to "leave your country," Burbea presents awakening as an ongoing movement - not a fixed attainment but a perennial calling to venture into new territories of soul-making. He advocates for freedom in relationship to awakening concepts themselves, suggesting we can move fluidly between different frameworks while remaining unattached to any single vision as ultimate truth.

Somewhere in the last couple of parts of this talk, and certainly in much more detail elsewhere in other talks and writings and courses, we've explained how a practitioner might at some point cotton on to this idea of fabrication—fabrication of dukkha, fabrication of the self-sense, or of some perception of issue or whatever. Having seen that things are fabricated through the way of relating, through the way of looking, they might get interested in these two related concepts: fabrication and ways of looking.

They might decide to keep open that question: "Well, I can see this is fabricated—the self-sense, for instance. What else is fabricated? What is not fabricated?" And they might pursue that question with the tool of ways of looking, developing the skills and arts involved in different ways of looking with different degrees, depths, subtleties, and kinds of clinging involved. They pursue this double question of fabrication and ways of looking in practice—not just as some abstract intellectual idea, but actually getting hold of this and running with it in practice.

This is what I've referred to elsewhere as the phenomenological approach: dealing with and meeting one's experience, bringing these concepts to bear—fabrication and ways of looking—and seeing what we can learn about experience, about fabrication of experience and ways of looking, through exploring them, through playing and experimenting with that.

As I've explained elsewhere in quite a lot of detail, and briefly in the last couple of parts of this talk, if a practitioner does this in practice—explores fabrication and ways of looking, probes fabrication with ways of looking—then a possible trajectory will almost inevitably arise out of that. A trajectory of developing insights that we could conceive of as forming a central strand for a notion of awakening, or one of the notions of awakening, or part of the notion of awakening I'm offering as a possibility.

This direction unfolds as a deepening, a developing of insights, including insights into the fabrication of the personality and the perspective of not identifying with one's personality at times. So, for example, one would experience and understand the perspective that the self is just a process of the psychophysical aggregates. One would move beyond that in time, eventually, with the ripening of things, into views and experiences of universal oneness—the self being part of that oneness, all things being part of different onenesses at different levels: of love, of awareness, of nothingness, of all kinds of things.

Pursuing this non-fabricating direction even more, one will eventually open to the unfabricated, the deathless, and understand with that the thorough, complete, and radical emptiness of all dharmas, all phenomena without exception. Then, realizing based on that understanding that any and all self-views should not be clung to, cannot really be clung to as any kind of final position, at least, because one knows the emptiness of all phenomena, all the elements that might possibly make up or be a foundation for any self.

Eventually one sees that fabrication itself is empty, and that relativizes the whole sense of the unfabricated so that there's a non-duality and a non-elevation of the unfabricated over the fabricated, the beyond over this world, so to speak. The holiness is then everywhere.

Pursuing it even more, one begins to open up to the realization that all conceptual frameworks, conceptions and conceptual frameworks, are in a sense empty. They're not finally true. They don't reflect or summarize or articulate a final truth, an ultimate viewpoint on how things are. Through that realization comes an even deeper sense of participation in the cosmos, participation in perception, participation also in truth, and even in the notion of what awakening is.

This possible trajectory perhaps makes a pretty good solution to the pieces of the jigsaw that we find in the Pali Canon—fitting together the Buddha saying this and the Buddha saying that—together with some Mahayana elaborations of what the Buddha said that are found in Mahayana texts. These elaborations go back to the Pali Canon, but the Buddha didn't really pick up on and elaborate there—for instance, in the Kaccāyanagotta Sutta and similar texts.

Now, I've outlined this trajectory. It may or may not be attractive to you. I try to present it quite neutrally, but is that attractive—that sort of journey, that sort of unfolding, all that's involved in that? Again, this question: if it's not attractive, why? What's going on for you? And if it is attractive, what's going on for you? What is it that you want? What do you want?

All those questions I threw out in the first part of this talk are very much connected. They interweave all the way through this question of what is awakening and this discussion of awakening.

Actually, trajectory is the word I've been using, but it's not quite the right word because it implies a kind of linearity, a movement from here to there along a certain line. My experience as a teacher is that things are not always linear. Even with that group of insights that I just enumerated very briefly, the movement of realization, the movement of opening up of experience and understanding, is not always linear.

Yes, those are deeper insights. Generally speaking, they're harder to understand, to open to, to realize, to experience. They're more comprehensive, they take in more, they're more inclusive. For example, the experience of the unfabricated in a way that's dualistic with the fabricated—not yet moved to a level of non-duality—doesn't take in the holiness of the fabricated, doesn't include that. So the latter end of that list is more inclusive, more comprehensive, more fundamental in some sense.

Yet my experience, both for myself and working as a teacher, is that intuitive wisdom can make all kinds of leaps at any point in practice, or in one's life of practice, that make a bit of a mockery out of any linear map. So trajectory isn't quite the right word.

At some point—whether right near the beginning of someone's practice along this trajectory of exploring fabrication and ways of looking, or whether they've gone through that whole trajectory and then start hearing about soul-making and the erotic imagination—one might add in, or perhaps better, weave in to that...

trajectory or set of insights that I described there—weave in, add in the whole paradigm and whole exploration of what we call the soul-making paradigm or the erotic imaginal exploration. The erotic imaginal, in itself, is not linear at all. There's no real linearity—well, perhaps there's a little bit of linearity, but generally speaking, it moves in many different possible directions, not really so much as a linear movement, as I've alluded to earlier.

But start to weave that in with the other trajectory regarding fabrication and ways of looking and emptiness and all that. The whole thing becomes really not so linear. So the trajectory is not necessarily—or at least as a universally common trajectory—perhaps not really adequate as a label.

But this question, "What do you want?" With the soul-making side of things and the erotic-imaginal side of things, perhaps what you want or the desire operating must be authentic, because the eros and the desire is integral to the movement of soul-making. It's indispensable, it's fundamentally wrapped up in the movement of soul-making in the erotic imaginal. No eros or desire—very little eros and desire—means very little soul-making. So the question of what do you really want, the authenticity there, is oftentimes in the soul. When we can speak kind of more purely of soul-making, it's kind of inevitable there.

Remember too, just as a sort of footnote here, that the paradigm of soul-making includes eros with images or in relation to images, and also eros without images, without the imaginal. I've elaborated this in the Eros Unfettered talks. Eros without the imaginal or without images means that eros for the unfabricated, or for the realization and the opening to those realms that are less fabricated—that have less to do with image and perception in general on that whole spectrum.

But eventually, that movement, that eros for the unfabricated or eros in the direction of unfabricating along all that spectrum of onenesses and jhānas and all that—eventually, with its maturity, as we mentioned, there's the realization of the emptiness of all things and the non-duality there between what is fabricated and what isn't and different degrees of fabrication. And then this opens up the legitimization, the possibility to fabricate skillfully and fabricate in a way that includes images.

So even the eros—there is eros that doesn't include images, but if I go deeply enough into that, it kind of delivers me a legitimization and a platform from which to explore fabrication with images, and then the eros with that. And then there's also eros with images, the erotic imaginal, and that directly involves itself in the participation of fabricating images. It participates in the fabrication of images with the erotic imaginal, with eros that is in relation to images.

But when we include the soul-making, when we include the erotic imaginal—I should say, when we include sensing with soul—this will open up the whole sense of awakening and the whole sense of the path much wider than that trajectory that I outlined in the last couple of parts of the talk. Sensing with soul opens out the whole sense of what awakening is and can be, and the whole sense of the path opens much wider.

And in so doing, in this opening, it will push on the influences of however we have conceived of or imagined the tradition, what the tradition says about awakening or what we have conceived of or imagined the tradition says about awakening. It will push on this soul-making movement. This expansion of the soul-making dynamic will push on the unquestioned images that we have of awakening—the fixated images, the rigid images. Sensing with soul, the erotic imaginal, that aspect of the soul-making dynamic will really push on that.

Some of the ways this happens—in small ways and in large ways—for example, we might have, and it would be very understandable (I think a lot of people do have), a kind of fixated fantasy or idea. By fixated fantasy, I mean not one that's rich in soulfulness and eros, but one that's got that kind of rigidity to it and clinging to it. But fixated fantasy or image or idea regarding awakening that it kind of happens in a sudden moment.

One of the places we get that is from the myth of the Buddha, who sat up all night, made a strong vow, sat up all night in meditation, and just as the morning star was appearing, that was the moment. And everything permanently changed in that moment, at that moment. "Done is what had to be done." And there was, in this assumption, this idea, this image—it happens very suddenly, all done, everything is permanently changed. And there is also the freedom and the liberation that ensue, that open up, are pervasive. They're total and they reach to every part of the practitioner's life.

Now, that makes a good story, doesn't it? The suddenness of it and the kind of black and whiteness of it. It's sudden, it's very dramatic. But again, I'd just like to question that. Is it a true fact, or is it a kind of myth in the poor sense of the word?

Oftentimes there are many people you can meet who will share similar accounts, not necessarily with that degree of effort involved, and oftentimes they emphasize the exact absence of effort. But for myself—and you'll have to find out for yourself—but sometimes I meet these people, listen or read their accounts, and sometimes look at, hang out with, hear about the resultant awakenings. And sometimes it's really not that impressive. Oftentimes it's not that impressive what happens when there's that kind of story of sudden and then assumed pervasive liberation and deep awakening.

The awakening often doesn't seem that deep. It's not also that pervasive. The insights are not so deep, nor are they pervasive, nor the freedom. So there's a kind of—I would call that a small way, it's a small point.

But there are bigger and I think more important ways in which the opening up to sensing with soul, the imaginal perception, will push on the whole notion and the whole image and fantasy of awakening and what's involved in it. This is very interesting to me, but I have observed that certain areas or kinds of freedom—areas or kinds of liberation—may open at different times for a practitioner, and not by, for example, realization of the unfabricated or emptiness, or the so-called eradication of greed, hatred, and delusion. Certain areas, certain kinds, are not going to be opened by those traditional means, those traditional ideas.

So for example, can we even talk about sexual freedom? What is that?

What does that mean? What even happens when you notice inside, when you just hear that? What does it mean? What is that?

So I want to say very clearly right now that I do not mean by the notion of sexual freedom acting in any way that is not respectful of another human being, or in any way that is unkind. So that's not sexual freedom. Whatever sexual freedom or freeing might be—and freeing might be a better way of putting it—it doesn't mean that lack of kindness, lack of respect in sexual relations, lack of attunement, grossly misattuned to what's going on there, what the other person wants or needs, or what you want or need.

For both oneself and whoever one is being sexual with, there needs to be kindness, respect, attunement. It needs to be consensual. There's no question about this. Whatever sexual freedom or freeing means, it doesn't go against that. It doesn't cross those lines. And whatever you hear me say or have heard me say, or perhaps another teacher around exploring eros and sexual images and sexual eros, it never contravenes that in practice.

And also sexual freedom, again, whatever it might mean, to me doesn't mean that we necessarily have to open to what someone else or some subgroup considers more free or better, or what we are feeling pressured by some should or some fashion around sexuality or orientation or self-identification or morality. You decide if something's not okay for you. You decide if it's okay and if it's interesting. Not pushed around by subcultures and the kind of rhetoric that can happen there. So that's just an aside, but I consider it so important, just in case there's even the slightest misunderstanding in what we're saying here.

But the main point here that I was trying to convey is that certain areas and kinds of freedom may not be opened up through realizing the unfabricated, realizing emptiness, eradicating greed, aversion, delusion. What's that going to do in regard to my sexual freedom? I mean, do you really think, is there any evidence, does it seem that the spiritual teachers who claim awakening—that their liberation really extends fully to their sexuality? Fully? I mean, they might just choose celibacy and keep to that. That's not quite the same thing as sexual freedom in the sense of the more open possibility of what that might mean.

Or not just sexuality—what about the area of intellect and ideas? You think that's going to open just because one has realized the unfabricated or the so-called eradication of greed, aversion, delusion? What does it mean to be free? What is a freeing in relationship to the intellect and ideas? What is a freeing in relationship to creative expression? What is the liberation of personae as masks of God?

So what kinds and what areas and directions of liberation, of opening, of freeing are possible to us, and how do they arise? If I'm locked into too narrow a view of what liberation delivers and also what is the path to liberation—I expect this kind of path to bring that kind of liberation—is that realistic?

But it may be that imaginal practice and practice with particular images leads to all kinds of very specific liberations with regard to whatever that image or imaginal figure embodies in a certain area. Sometimes I meet people who are practicing fairly diligently and steadily over some years. Maybe they've done some therapy and found that useful and it's an important part of their process, and they're practicing, trying to deepen their emptiness inquiry and their inquiry into fabrication. But there are areas that none of that has reached—not the psychotherapy in whatever traditional forms and attitudes, and not the emptiness practice.

This person is a very balanced, sane person, but the courage to stand up publicly and stand behind one's deepest convictions and passions has not been liberated—the courage to do so even at the risk of upsetting someone, of being disadvantaged perhaps in terms of one's career, or maybe people won't see me as a nice guy, or I'll piss someone off, or I won't be a good boy, or whatever it is. More than the emptiness, more than even many kinds of therapy, it might be that working imaginally, in the full way that we've talked about, with images that involve such courage, such expressions—areas that are really not being opened up after years of steady practice in certain directions.

It may be that images involving those kinds of things—and they have to be arrived at in all the ways we talked about and emerge in all the ways we talked about—but it may be that might open up areas and directions of freedom, prisons that don't even really feel like a prison. One is not even really realizing the lack of liberation there. But the imaginal practice may open up those areas where the other practices won't.

So it's easy to find a spiritual, or certainly a Buddhist basis, to simply ignore those areas that I alluded to and those kinds of freedoms—not to be free in those areas with ideas, with sexuality, with creative expression, with the liberation of personae, but to be free rather from sexuality, from desire, from active engagement, from intellectual questioning and expansion. Because we can always find a teaching that says sexuality is just greed, activism is not equanimous and peaceful.

It doesn't fit the image, the archetype. I've explored this in different talks previously.

And with intellectuality, we can always find rationale that says intellectuality is just conceptualizing. "That's just conceptualizing, and we want non-conceptuality, or we want something called just being, or being simple," or whatever it is.

So there's the possibility, through the erotic imaginal, of opening up wider areas and different kinds of liberation, awakening, freedom—awakening and liberating a whole other range, or greater range of images and archetypes, breaking the lock of certain fixated images or a narrow range of archetypes that we might be operating unwittingly under.

So that's part of what's involved in this larger and, I think, richer and more multi-dimensional possibility of path and vision of awakening. The very images of awakening and the areas of awakening open up.

Now, again, we've explored this in detail in other retreats, but we said when the soul-making process gets going—the soul-making dynamic—it involves the mutual feeding, inseminating, widening, deepening, complicating, enriching, stretching of eros, psyche, and logos. They feed into each other and create and discover more of each other. The whole thing expands. We've explained that many times over the last few years.

The soul-making dynamic is liberated. In other words, rather than being stuck in one particular circumference or range or way of relating, the soul-making dynamic—the eros, psyche, logos dynamic—is liberated. Eros, psyche and logos are liberated to some extent in that soul-making dynamic. That's another way of saying what's going on in soul-making.

And as well as images getting pushed forward, as we talked about just now, the logos —ideas—will also get pushed forward. And more than just get pushed forward: ideas, logos, as one of the elements of soul-making, is exactly that. It's an element of soul-making. It's involved. It's worked. It's stretched. It's relied on. So that's part of soul-making, what a vision of soul-making awakening and path must involve.

Logos must involve concept, must involve idea as something creative, fertile, active, experimental, so that the exploration of and the experimenting with ideas and with conceptual frameworks—different ideas, different conceptual frameworks—exploring and experimenting with them in practice so that they inform ways of looking and thus open up different perceptions and experiences, and that feeds the whole process.

But that whole involvement and inclusion of ideas deliberately, and conceptual exploration, conceptual flexibility is, in our definition, part of the very soul-making dynamic, part of what is liberated and part of what moves in the direction of awakening.

So we borrow, discover, create ideas and conceptual frameworks. And then in the practice, in the soul-making that happens in practice, those ideas get stretched or they break. And then we forge, discover, borrow, create new ideas and conceptual frameworks—perhaps built on those old ones, perhaps different, whatever. And all of that, and that whole process, is included in awakening.

And awakening—notice—is a verb form. Well, it can be used as a verbal noun, but it's actually also present participle. Awakening: it's something that is happening, ongoing awakening, this open-endedness that I referred to.

So sometimes, for different reasons—and I've talked about this before—there's a real shunning of the conceptual, not really an inclusion or an embracing or a willingness to play with and experiment with ideas and conceptual frameworks. And that hesitation or suspicion or refusal comes from many different directions.

Some of it comes from teachings of non-conceptuality, as we mentioned just a few moments ago, as being somehow more spiritual, the direction of spirituality or whatever. Other hesitations come more from modernist Western philosophy, which is really suspicious of any kind of metaphysical systems, metaphysics in general, or conceptual frameworks in particular. Even just building an edifice of concepts or a system —quite popular in the last, I don't know, let's say 100 years—is this suspicion of systems and conceptual frameworks.

And it goes with postmodernism, I think, at its less well-considered depth, because oftentimes people think that if you have a conceptual framework, if you have a system, you must be claiming that as an ultimate truth. You must be claiming that as a kind of all-encompassing final take on what reality is. And that's not the way we're using concepts. That's not the way that this soul-making dynamic engages with ideas. It's not the relationship it has with concepts, conceptual frameworks, and ideas.

So a philosopher called Richard Bernstein was writing, and he talked about several other philosophers—one guy called Jürgen Habermas, a 20th century philosopher, I think he's still alive—and he's talking about some other figures like Heidegger and Adorno and Derrida, and pointing at these thinkers and saying all these people defend themselves as if they were living in the shadow of the last philosopher.

They are still... This is Habermas talking about Derrida and Heidegger and Adorno. They are still—these figures who are quite adopted by postmodern thinkers—Habermas continues, they are still battling against the strong concepts of theory, truth, and system. By this he means what I just described: to say X or Y, this is my theory, or this is the conceptual framework, or this is the system. A strong concept of that means one pushes it forward as all-encompassing, ultimate reflection of reality. They are still battling against the strong concepts of theory, truth, and system that have actually belonged to the past for over a century and a half. They believe that they have to tear philosophy away from the madness of expounding a theory that has the last word.

And this philosopher Bernstein continues, "Their failure, according to Habermas, is not to realize and fully appreciate that the fallibilist consciousness of the sciences caught up with philosophy too a long time ago." By fallibilist consciousness, he means fallible—able to make mistakes. According to Habermas, science has this idea that you tentatively put forward a theory, and if it matches the experimental results, great. But you never claim it as a final truth in that philosophy of science, and you realize that it's fallible. Someone might do an experiment, or some experimental result might show up at any point that proves your theory is not quite right.

So that's the fallibilist consciousness of the sciences, and according to Habermas, this caught up with philosophy a long time ago. What you get in some strands of philosophy is this idea where all they want to do is tear things down—tear down systems, tear down ideas, tear down truth claims, tear down theories, tear down conceptual frameworks. Deconstruct, deconstruct, deconstruct.

Bernstein is making the point—and this is where I would really agree—that deconstruction is not sufficient. It must be complemented by reconstruction.

Just a word more about this business of fallibilist consciousness of the sciences. That reflects another philosopher called Karl Popper, whose theory of philosophy of science was that it tentatively puts forward theories which approach the truth. Theories approach the truth incrementally, and they get proven wrong, and then another theory replaces that, but you're approaching something called "the truth." So it's quite a realist philosophy. It says we may not know whether this theory that we have now is completely true, because it can always be proven wrong by some as yet undiscovered experimental result. But there is something called truth, and we can approach it. There's a kind of realism there, and Habermas is a kind of realist. That's a different idea, a different notion than, say, a participatory notion of truth based on the deep notion of emptiness and ways of looking, as I've talked about. But that's just a side point.

Let's come back to this: deconstruction is not sufficient. Any deconstruction we do must eventually be followed by reconstruction—reconstructions.

That's what's happening both in the trajectory of emptiness exploration, of exploration of fabrication and ways of looking that I outlined. One deconstructs—less and less fabrication, one learns how to do that. And eventually, having reached the unfabricated, then seeing the emptiness of fabrication, because time is empty, and what is fabricated is empty, and the elements of fabrication are empty—then that opens up this non-duality, as I mentioned, between the unfabricated and the fabricated, and it legitimizes and sacralizes fabrication itself. There's no duality. The unfabricated is not better than the fabricated in any way. It's not more holy. It's not even more real. And so that legitimizes, opens the door to, opens the gate to the possibility of skillful fabrication—and part of that can be soul-making fabrication.

So on the trajectory of deepening exploration of emptiness, fabrication, ways of looking, and also in the practices of sensing with soul, which include the flexible, temporary adoption, entertainment, trying out, playing with, experimenting with, constructing, and then brushing aside or adopting conceptual frameworks and brushing them aside, adopting another one, deconstructing them, reconstructing something different—logoi, ideas, conceptual frameworks. Both in the emptiness trajectory and in the sensing with soul practices, there's this indispensable element that involves deconstruction and reconstruction many times, with endlessly variable possibilities.

Sometimes what happens—I want to linger with this business about conceptuality because I think it's so important and so subtle—occasionally, I've encountered a student who is practicing with emptiness and practicing quite creatively with emptiness, deeply, and sees, glimpses the non-truth of all concepts, as I said earlier, in different ways. But then after that, picks up on teachers—for instance, ancient or translations of ancient Zen teachers from centuries ago—who seem to be saying, "Drop concepts," or "Just sit quietly and do nothing," or "Just be simple," or that kind of thing. And this person who has actually glimpsed the non-truth of concepts through practicing with fabrication and ways of looking and really contemplating conceptuality and perceptuality tries to adopt this kind of teaching, or believes that their realization of the non-truth of all concepts issues in this teaching of "drop concepts, just be simple, just sit quietly," and doesn't realize that this is a concept.

It's not just a concept, it's also a psychological style. It's one style of soul, one kind of archetype. It's the archetype of the simple man, if you like, or the natural man, or whatever. So to settle or fall back into that without realizing that conceptuality is actually operating and supporting such a stance, and without recognizing the pull of an archetypal image or fantasy, that's not liberation.

One has seen something deeply, yet remains caught in subtle conceptuality that's operating there, and in a kind of predilection for a particular archetypal image. It's like walking into a prison cell that happens to have a sign hung over the door by some long-dead inmate from centuries ago reading "Liberation, Nirvana and Freedom." You walk into that cell, sit there, shut the door, and just because of the sign, believe yourself free. Yet actually, one is imprisoned both in terms of soul—because of the limited archetype—and in terms of not realizing the subtle conceptuality that's involved.

When we talk about the sense of what awakening might be in a soul-making paradigm, it includes this deconstruction, reconstruction, involvement, experimentation, fracturing, breaking open, stretching, forging ideas and conceptual frameworks. So there isn't this stasis to it. It doesn't get stuck with a certain conceptual range or conceptual idea. Or if it does, that's only temporary, because soul-making will keep pushing and breaking whatever vessels at some point. Pushing on and breaking whatever vessels.

Do you remember Carl Jung's observation about the scientific revolution around the time of the Renaissance and the Western Enlightenment? He pointed out that it was this newly won rational intellectual stability of the human mind that came with the Enlightenment and the scientific revolution. It managed to hold on against the older ways of thinking of the Middle Ages and medieval thought. It managed to hold on and penetrate further into the depths of nature, further even than earlier ages had considered possible.

Then he writes: "The more successful the penetration and advance of the new scientific spirit proved to be, the more the latter, as is usually the case with the victor, became the prisoner of the world it had conquered." In other words, that whole brilliant opening that happened around the time of the Scientific Revolution and the Western Enlightenment in Europe—that whole brilliant opening, the conceptual framework that crystallized with that—over time, over some hundreds of years, developed and also became a prison, became hardened. As Jung put it, the victor—that conceptual framework won out over the medieval ways of thinking. It was a victor, but then it became the prisoner of its own system.

The soul-making paradigm of awakening would, in a way, if it's working, not allow that. Inevitably, in the vortex and the movement and the expansion, the widening and deepening of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic that soul-making involves, that cannot happen. As I said, we will break out of any conceptual framework, break out of any kind of rigidified structure of conceptuality and spirituality.

Very easily for us, awakening, liberation, nirvana, enlightenment can become what Ari Kobach calls an idol in distinction to an icon. An idol is something taken to be real and has a kind of limit to it. Sometimes people have said, "You're such an iconoclast, Rob." I'm not sure that I am, but I think what I'm interested in here is more smashing idols or exposing what we might call idols and idolatry. And along with that deconstruction, creating icons.

The difference between icon and idol—I'm borrowing this distinction from Henri Corbin and also from another French theologian-philosopher called Jean-Luc Marion. The icon possesses infinite depth because it's imaginal. So it might be a form there, but remember the elastic soft edges being one aspect of the imaginal? The imaginal form might be really vivid as a sensible form, as an aesthetic form, really vivid and sharply defined, but the being of it has soft and elastic edges. It has this capacity through soul-making, through the erotic relationship with it, to be perceived with more and more depth, more and more dimensionality will be perceived as part of it, as an aspect of it. It will open up a sense of itself having more dimensionality, more depth, more possibility, more divinity.

Soul-making is possible in relation to an icon. But when soul-making gets hold of an idol—something rigidly, solidly defined and believed in as real, with tight, rigid boundaries, not soft, not elastic—then soul-making will make those boundaries of an idol elastic and soft or smash it and expand it or replace it until we have an icon. Soul-making needs icon, not idol. And there won't be an end to that.

So an icon is something with this potentially endless possibility of dimensionality and divinity and depth, soul-making potential. In questioning typical ideas of awakening that have actually become what we could call idols—solid, unmoving, rigidly and tightly boundaried, fixed and limited forms and depths—in questioning in that way, and opening up instead new possible visions or ideas of awakening, where awakening is not limited either by an end point or in terms of direction, that converts the whole process, converts idol into icon.

Soul-making has gotten hold of the notion of awakening and creates, discovers its own meanings of what awakening is and involves. It stretches whatever original concept, image, idol we might have started with. With an icon, as I said, it's not limited, its being isn't limited in that way, because of these soft elastic edges.

We will, Eros, in relation, soul, in relation to an icon, discovers, creates more and more dimensions and depths. And in that way, eros doesn't collapse then. It doesn't run out of space, of beyond, to long for, to move into, to create, discover. It has—eros in relationship to awakening doesn't collapse, because it has an infinity of possibility in which to move. Infinity of possibility for the expansion of psyche and logos. Understand?

So the title of the talk is, What is Awakening? What is Awakening? And we could hear that in: what is awakening? What is awakening, as in what awakens or who awakens.

If we answer it's what awakens, what is awakening, who awakens—if we answer it's soul, it's soul-making that awakens. That is what is awakening. That is, if you like, the subject of awakening. That is who is awakening. It's the soul and soul-making.

Then that implies in our definition that there's this infinite possibilities that come with the soul-making dynamic, with the involvement, fertilization, insemination, widening, deepening, expansion of the eros, psyche, logos. And that means, that implies this open-endedness, same thing.

Important note in relation to that: when we say infinite, there can be an infinity of possibilities, an infinity of potential, and even infinity of actualizations, but infinite doesn't mean all possibilities or every possibility. So this doesn't mean that awakening means everything. It means every possibility gets actualized or is even a potential direction.

So, for example—if that's a hard concept—imagine, let's say, a circle, which is like the face of a clock or a watch. And you could say, these directions—the 12 o'clock, the 3 o'clock, the 6 o'clock and the 9 o'clock, directions on the face of the clock—they are not directions that soul-making awakening will pursue. It just won't pursue those directions. That won't happen in the possibility of soul-making. That still leaves an infinity of other directions just on that circle, because you can divide up the areas that remain—say between the 12 o'clock and the 3 o'clock, or the 3 and the 6, and the 6 and the 9, the 9 and the 12—you can divide up those areas infinitely. So infinite possibilities of direction doesn't mean all and every direction will be viable or is open as a direction of soul-making.

Sometimes when this question is put, what is awakening? And one can hear that in two ways. So as I just alluded to, what is awakening? The question can be heard in two ways. What is awakening? What does that concept mean? And we've talked about that a lot and the possibilities there.

But as I said, it can be heard in a second way. What is awakening? Or what awakens? Or who awakens? Who is awakening?

Regarding the question when it's heard that way, one could give—or there are certain answers to the question that way that are quite popular in kind of Neo-Advaita circles or whatever. And the answer given is, who awakens or what awakens? No one. The answer is no one awakens. Or awakening is awakening. Or the universe is awakening.

So answering that question, what is awakening or what awakens, answering it in that kind of way helps take some of the restriction, imprisonment, weight or burden out of a desire for awakening when it's coming out of ego, when it's for the sake of ego or self-measurement or in reaction to the inner critic or it's trying to—this desire for awakening is trying to prove myself to myself or to the inner critic or to my parent or parents or my teacher or teachers or to the world. We've touched on this.

So this notion—no one awakens—it does have a certain unburdening effect, so it can be useful. But there's something about such an answer that in insisting on a kind of non-definition or nebulous, vague kind of openness, that kind of answer, those kind of attitudes or conceptions—and there is a conception involved there, or conceptions involved—those kind of stances, they might be forming their own strange kinds of prisms.

In that very non-definitional vagueness. Why? Because there's not much fertility or movement possible within that view. Something about the vagueness doesn't allow me to actually posit and work with different concepts within that, or answers to that question, and work with different conceptual delineations, perspectives, and ideas.

If you contrast this—"What awakens? Who awakens? No one. No one awakens"—with, for example, the conceptual frame we're trying to encourage, you'll notice something different. This is a conceptual frame that itself allows, encourages, and actually expects soul in the process to notice, to discover and create ever more delineations, concepts, and perspectives. Create and discover all that in time regarding what awakening is and regarding who or what is awakening.

Do you understand the difference? In this paradigm, none of those delineations, concepts, perspectives regarding what awakening is, or who or what is awakening—none of them are clung to as truths or reflections of reality. Nevertheless, they can be entertained and lived and practiced with, and they can bring all kinds of fruits and results and openings, none of them being regarded as final.

Like we said when we talked about what is soul—if I say "sensing with soul," that begs the question, what is soul? Remember that? We said we can say something about what soul is, but we want the concept of soul to have these soft, elastic edges. It's not a rigidly fixed and limited concept, so it can stretch.

What awakens? Soul awakens. Soul-making awakens. What does that mean? There's not the shunning of concepts—"No one awakens"—but rather the using of concepts. And then those concepts get enlarged, broken. New concepts get forged.

Sometimes the answers we give to these questions—what is awakening, what awakens, who awakens—they help in certain ways, but they also limit the possible fertility for the being, for consciousness, for the sense of existence, for soul. They don't stimulate and support the creation and discovery of further delineations, further discernment, more and more aspects, facets of self, soul, being, others, objects, world, awakening.

Again, in this soul-making paradigm, we're really not shunning or disregarding discriminations, discernments, delineations, and concepts. We're using them for the sake of soul-making. And the soul-making process will actually stimulate more of that as part of its endless possibility of riches.

So again, this question: What do you want? And is that what soul wants? Or is what comes through and seems to be my desire actually driven by something else—ego or measuring up? Or is it that what I want is culturally influenced or indoctrinated, or I've taken a certain idea or fixated image of what the tradition is? Or is it that what I want—the "I" there—is actually quite a limited self-image? I'm not imaginably open. The self is not imaginably sensed in the "what I want."

What is the relationship of who desires or has eros for awakening to who awakens? Again, what is the relationship of who desires awakening to who awakens? You may have heard answers to that kind of question, for instance, in certain so-called non-dual teachings or according to classical Buddhist Abhidharma psychology. What would a soul-making answer say to that?

What is the relationship of that which, or the one who, desires awakening—the relationship of that to the one who awakens? The relationship of the desire for awakening to the awakened?

What awakens is what has wanted awakening. What awakens is what has the eros for awakening.

Fantasies, images, and ideas come in—all kinds of fantasies, images, and ideas—and influence the fantasies, images, and ideas we have of awakening. Some of those can be what we call fixations, or not, or more or less so. And some of them are fantasies and images and ideas of self and also of the world. The fantasies, images, and ideas of self and of the world condition the fantasies, images, and ideas we adopt of awakening.

I wonder if this has occurred to you—do you realize that when you or I choose or accept a notion or vision of awakening or enlightenment, in doing so you are essentially signing up for, plumping for, choosing a worldview, a cosmology? It's not just a view of awakening. In choosing a view of awakening, in adopting a certain view of awakening, I'm also choosing and adopting a certain cosmology at the same time. They go inevitably together.

So for example, if I have the cosmology of endless rebirth, then the vision of awakening as ending rebirth brings with it, goes with, a cosmology of rebirth. Or the vision of awakening as somehow bearing up to, putting up with our existential predicament as tragically impermanent and frail in a kind of essentially meaningless cosmos—the image of the liberated one, the awakened one, as one who is willing to confront that and be with the tragedy of that, open to it, and still lives their life creatively. This image of awakening, this idea of awakening, brings with it, goes together with, a certain cosmology.

And in the soul-making dharma, it's exactly the same. The soul-making awakening vision that we're perhaps opening up, or possibilities that we're opening up, goes with a certain cosmology, which includes possibilities of cosmopoiesis and participation and all that—divinities and dimensions.

So when we choose or adopt an idea or an image of awakening, we're actually also choosing and adopting ideas of world. Self and world. And the causality—who knows what's going on there?

So again, the question is why? Is it really the cosmology that I'm attracted to? Am I just set on that cosmology and insisting on that cosmology, and it's working that way around from the worldview to the view of awakening? Or how much is self-view wrapped up in that?

The choice of cosmology may in fact be the primary reason for you or I choosing or accepting a certain notion or vision of awakening. You understand? That may be actually what I long for more—a certain cosmology, a certain worldview. It's all wrapped up together. And the self-view or the ego-view. If it's regarding measurement or proving myself or achieving or failing, that can come into it like we've talked about before. Or it might be that there's a certain soul-making or self-image in relation to the worldview cosmology that's coming in here, that's being chosen.

We're choosing a package. So for example, bravely and honestly facing up to the tragic existential predicament is one self-image, and it may be soul-making for some people to a certain extent. Or the self-image of what a human being is—a human being opens to all kinds of dimensions. Human beings participate in the cosmos, in the divine, in the creation and discovery of all this. It's a very different sense of self and image of self, an idea of self.

But again, back to this question—why am I choosing or adopting a certain idea or image of awakening? What's involved there? One of the things that's involved is cosmology and self-sense, or you could say anthropology.

I've pointed out in this connection several times before that the contemporary dukkha, the dukkha in contemporary times, may well involve kinds of dukkha that are prominent in what we deal with or have to face that weren't there at other times. So for example, our modernist notion of self brings with it, as much as a lot of possibility, a certain kind of dukkha. I'm not talking about how busy we all are and how we're harangued by mobile phones and emails and text messages and all that. I'm talking about just the modern notion of individuality and the culture of individuality and the pressures and expectations that brings alongside the possibilities. And I'm talking also about our very sense of our own psychological complexity and interiority and also responsibility.

Michel Foucault, one of the things he did was trace, in regard to sexuality, how through the tradition of the Catholic confessional, and then later through the very similar and connected tradition of the psychoanalytic confessional, which became the psychotherapeutic confessional, there was actually a broadening, a stretching of what the individual was then deemed responsible for. So at first, with regard to sexuality in the Catholic confession, it was just around the ethics of that and the way you're responsible for good or bad behavior sexually and thoughts and all that. But through that process and through the pressure and minutiae of that, this got expanded. And then through psychoanalysis and through the sexual revolution, the responsibility of sexuality was not just ethical, because now we're supposed to—there's a kind of responsibility to be interesting sexually or this or that around our sexuality. Sexuality has become, not for everyone but for a lot of people, in some ways part of identity and part of my responsibility for my individuality and what I am or have achieved or am okay with or have liberated or whatever.

Someone in the time of the Buddha in India didn't have this kind of complexity, didn't have that culture of individuality, didn't have that kind of responsibility in regard to their sexuality, of being interesting or this or that, or individual in that sense.

So there are certain dukkhas around self that go with contemporary cultures, contemporary society, and also certain dukkhas around the world. And again, I've mentioned this as well—the disenchantment of the cosmos, the meaninglessness of the cosmos, that is the kind of pervasive backdrop, if not foreground, of our worldview. And that is certainly characteristic of our modern culture in differentiation to earlier cultures in some ways.

But if you also think about the whole notion of rebirth that's in the Pali canon, in some ways it presents an enchanted cosmos with devas and celestial realms. Yet in other ways, it's a frightening cosmos—again, essentially meaningless. It depicts a meaningless predicament that one must find a way to escape. One is essentially just flotsam and jetsam on the ocean of endless cosmic rebirths and deaths, tossed this way and that by waves and tides. It's a rather terrifying cosmic picture.

Nevertheless, there are certain kinds of disenchantment and meaninglessness that plague and pervade contemporary society. Along with the problematic complexity and individuality of the modern self, this serves up a more difficult—or at least different—kind of dukkha in relation to both self and cosmos.

As I mentioned recently, we are becoming conscious, some people are beginning to be conscious, of the moral and environmental implications of perceiving and conceiving the cosmos in a disenchanted, flattened way—especially given the consequences in our globalized world. There is a sense, for some people now, that we need a different view, a different worldview. We need the different visions being offered to us—a different picture, a different concept of what existence is, both for the self and for the self in the cosmos, and what the cosmos itself truly is.

In this possible understanding of what awakening might be—in a way that includes the soul-making process and dynamic and movement—such a view will include more and more facets of our being. Simply because of the way the soul-making dynamic works, it will draw in, involve, and begin to relate to all these different aspects of our lives, dimensions, and facets of our being. It will create and discover such facets of our existence and make them objects of eros, imaginal objects. They get drawn into the whole soul-making process, and in so doing, they get drawn into the awakening process itself—the movement of awakening. They become included as directions and expansions and unfoldings of awakening.

This process will continue creating and discovering—not always at some uniform rate, of course. There will be stops and starts and stuck places. But potentially, at least, that is the movement. It's open-ended and multiple and multi-directional.

Some ideas we encounter of awakening, or even what's communicated to us sometimes by people who claim awakening in certain traditions or communities—certainly ones I've encountered—can be more stagnant than the kind of dynamic, endlessly enriching, dividing, branching growth of a living organism that I've tried to describe.

In some traditions and sanghas, it's relatively common for people to consider themselves awakened. But as I say, often there's a kind of stagnation with that awakening. We can look at that stagnation from the paradigm of the soul-making logos and recognize that either there is not enough eros—for instance, "I'm awakened, and yes, there's definitely a certain amount of happiness, a certain amount of freedom and ease of movement, liberation from the inner critic, a certain amount of peace, even-keeledness." But it's just kind of stagnated there. "I've been awakened for X years, and now what?" Until one begins to teach or write a blog or hold darshan or whatever it is. But something is actually just stagnant.

There's perhaps not enough eros to open up further territories and possibilities for consciousness, for questioning, further liberations, explorations. So either not enough eros to stimulate and push that whole soul-making dynamic in a way that opens up further territories, or the logos is blocked—stuck in some conception, for example, that awakening means this particular thing. "This is what awakening is, and I now seem to have achieved that," or "awakening means X," or "I am awakened."

Here it's not so much the "I" that is the problem. Some non-dual people will be quick to say that's the problem—"I am awakened," that's the problematic view. "There is no one, there is no I who awakens or is awakened, there is just awakening." But that's not the problem I want to pinpoint right now. The problem lies in the reification and limitation of the vision and idea of awakening—of what it is, what it involves, and where it goes.

So either there's not enough eros, or the logos is blocked and stuck in a conception of awakening—in some particular narrow conception of awakening, despite the relative ease and happiness and spacious existence. Or logos is stuck in the sense that we're trapped in a conception that conceiving itself is bad, not spiritual, and so forth.

Either way—whether it's that there simply isn't enough eros, no more fire, no more flow of eros to the extent that really pushes things and continues to expand, or the logos is blocked in some way regarding awakening—the soul-making dynamic, the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, is arrested or at least limited. And because of that, no further or greater or wider awakening can open.

Just to share one more thing to finish. In the book of Genesis, God said to Abraham: "Leave your country, your people, and your father's household, and go to the land I will show you. Leave your country, your people, and your father's household, and go to the land I will show you."

Actually, I prefer that old-fashioned translation—I don't know if this is King James or something similar: "And the Lord said unto Abraham, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto the land that I will show thee." This is a very crucial passage for those familiar with the Old Testament.

The Hebrew is Lech Lecha—leave, go from here. Actually, it can also mean "go to you"—lecha, go to you or go for you. But let's say "go from here."

We could hear this in a very historical, literal sense. But what's perhaps the more poetic meaning here? The soul meaning. Go from here—go from bondage to liberation, go from non-awakening to awakening.

Certain teachings, perhaps certain so-called non-dual teachings, might say: you're always here, or you're always there, you're always in perfection. There's nowhere to go, nothing to do. Awakening is just realizing that there's nowhere to go. But there in Genesis it says, Lech Lecha—go from here. Beautiful. I love that.

Let me read it again: "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto the land that I will show thee."

A soul-making Logos might interpret that passage differently. Go from what? Get thee out of thy country, away from here, away from thy kindred, away from thy father's house. Go from whatever is not soul-making anymore, into new, expanded, expanding, deepened, deepening soul lands. To the land that I will show you—the landscapes that open up with soul. The land that I will show thee—new pastures, new fields of Eros-Psyche-Logos for soul-making.

This is always a possibility—this leaving the stagnation of structures that we know, of beliefs, the limited fixated images, the rigid concepts, beliefs, assumptions. It's always a possibility, since the possibilities for soul-making are infinite. So wherever we are, there's the possibility of more at some point.

It's hearing that passage—God's commandment in Genesis, God's calling, the call to Abraham—as God's call to us. We can read it in this very historic, literal, flattened way, and then it becomes all about territory and land and literalized nationalism. Or you can hear it as something speaking to you—God's calling, and it's eternal, it's always now. Always now. Lech Lecha, go. Go from here. Be ready.

Or if you say not eternal, perennial—perennial is maybe a better word. Again and again. The soul-making dynamics, as I said, are not always on the move. There are times of consolidation, of getting used to new structures, new landscapes, new visions, new images, new sensings. But perennially, again and again, there's this movement, this expansion of the soul-making dynamic. And with that, the whole territory, the whole land that we perceive ourselves in expands.

So again and again, forever, whenever, God calls, the divine calls, the Buddha nature calls, soul issues a calling to soul: "Get thee out of thy country and from thy kindred and from thy father's house"—the father's house, the way tradition has rigidified—"unto the land that I will show thee." The land that soul opens up. The land that Eros-Psyche-Logos opens up as the soul-making dynamic calls.

I'll just finish now. I said that sometimes people ask me what my position is on what awakening is, what stream entry is, what I think about this or that idea of awakening. I've shared a good deal in this talk, but actually, following from what I've said, my position is that I actually adopt and move between different conceptual frameworks.

And that feels to me right now as the most beautiful and viable and, if you like, true way of orienting and relating to this whole question, this whole notion of awakening. And it is possible to do that—to pick up and put down and move between different conceptual frames and do that relatively freely, dependent on who I'm actually talking to and what they want or need at a certain time.

You could say there's a kind of, or there's the possibility of a kind of—you could say freedom from awakening. But I think better: a freedom in relationship to the whole notion of awakening. Freedom in relationship to the whole notion of awakening. That's a freedom in relationship, not throwing it away—freedom in relationship to the whole notion of awakening. Freedom in relationship to the whole notion of freedom. Someone can actually know the emptiness of it all and know and play with the poetry and the possibility of it all.

The whole notion, idea, sense of awakening can be opened up.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 128

Between Ikon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h30

In this opening talk of a series, Rob Burbea examines the profound ways that ideas and concepts shape all perception and experience. He traces how the scientific revolution's legacy—including beliefs in singular objective reality, Cartesian dualism, and reductionist materialism—continues to influence our contemporary worldview, often limiting our freedom to engage in sensing with soul and imaginal practices.

Burbea discusses how quantum physics has fundamentally challenged classical scientific assumptions, yet these older paradigms persist in our cultural 'bedrock,' creating what William James called 'vicious abstractionism'—the tendency to reduce rich phenomena to narrow concepts. Through examples including a practitioner's relationship with the moon, he shows how epistemological doubts can undermine confidence in soul-sensing experiences.

The talk weaves together themes of ontology, epistemology, and hermeneutics, examining how the dominance of scientific materialism has created an 'epistemicide'—the invalidation of other ways of knowing that include emotions and imagination. Burbea argues that even within Dharma contexts, reductionist views can imprison our practice, limiting our understanding of concepts like eros and soul-making that are essential for a complete theory of spiritual motivation and awakening.

I hardly need to point out that much—perhaps most—of what we are referring to as sensing with soul, most of the range of sensing and perceiving and sensibility that's involved in sensing with soul, is really not very usual in our culture, in our time. These kinds of perceptions, these kinds of openings and sensibilities, and also the ideas that undergird them and support them, are not conventional ones. They're not commonly found in our culture or commonly sanctioned.

For that reason and for others, this sensing with soul—that whole opening of that possibility—needs perhaps for many of us, not for all of us, but for many of us, a bit more grounding. We will need to feel that it makes sense, that it's grounded, that it's legitimized. Even if one is very attracted to these practices, and even if one has been practicing them already, there will very often be a nagging doubt creeping in for people, or a tendency to want to dismiss at times the perceptions, the sensibilities, the senses that have opened up and the experiences there and the whole approach.

So I feel it may be valuable, perhaps for many and perhaps at different times—not necessarily just at the beginning of one's explorations—to see if we can give a bit more ground, theoretical ground if you like, to what we're doing.

Another way of understanding or conceiving of what's needed here is, as I've said before, to elbow a bit more room, to create a bit more space, to be free to practice in this way without being hemmed in, crowded in, imprisoned by the conventional view and the dominant paradigms. To create a bit more space, to find a bit more ground, to give the whole thing more legitimization in one's mind.

Partly our freedom to practice this way is impinged on, or we feel a little bit reluctant. Sometimes that's because sensing with soul opens us, and that can be tricky. It's tricky to be open, and opened in different ways. The heart is opened, or sensing with soul involves an open heart, and it may open the heart further. The soul is opened. There are demands on us in terms of attention, attunement, humility. The sense of self and the sense of world is opened. And there may be a sense of responsibilities that come with all that.

So all this sometimes makes us a little bit ambivalent about treading this path, or even in any instance about entering into sensing with soul or opening a certain sensing with soul. Partly the demands are, if you like, on the emotions and the responsibility in the heart and the soul in that sense. But partly, the ambivalence that we have is also partly as a result of ideas—ideas that we have, that we have usually absorbed from somewhere or other: a teacher or teachers or teaching or tradition or the wider culture or this or that subculture.

Those ideas that we have shape our worldview, our Weltanschauung, and our sense of what we are, what life is, existence and all that. And those ideas can either give us confidence and a sense of legitimacy to this kind of practice, to sensing with soul, and support our freedom to practice that way, to sense with soul—or they can undermine our confidence, undermine our sense that this is a legitimate way of engaging with the world and with ourselves and with experience, a legitimate way of experiencing, and cramp our freedom, the freedom we feel to do so.

In this talk—or group of talks, depending on how you count it, I'm not sure how many parts there will be—I want to weave a few things together if I can. One is to open up some very specific practice possibilities that we'll get to, that may then suggest avenues for you or things you can experiment with or kinds of directions. That's one thread of what I want to do in this talk.

A second is actually to look at the place of ideas in those practices that I want to talk about, but also in the larger opening, and as I said, the legitimation, the ground, and the creating space for sensing with soul—so the place of ideas, and weave that together.

I will say something right at the beginning and say it again. I've said many times and I've written about it: that ideas or concepts are present in all and any perception, all and any experience, all and any experience of appearances. Ideas and conceptions are present in that. Moreover, they shape our perception, our experience. They shape appearances. They limit also what an experience is, how it is formed. And they're part of the fabrication of all and any perception, experience and appearance.

The only experience—in inverted commas—where that is not the case is the opening to the unfabricated. And that's an experience that I'm not even sure we can actually call an experience or a perception. But all and any other perception, experience, appearances involve intimately and fundamentally all kinds of ideas and conceptions.

Now, I can just say that and say it emphatically—and I'm aware that's how I'm saying it—but if you're not sure about that, then investigate. Find out. How are you going to find out if that's true or not? One way of finding out is by exploring this double intertwined path of exploration that explores fabrication of perception and ways of looking together. In the course of doing so, as things begin to unravel, so to speak, or fabricate less, one will see that this is the case: no conception, no perception. No conception, no fabrication of perception.

What we perceive, what the experience is, and what the appearance is at any time is, as I said, shaped, fabricated, limited, constructed by the idea or ideas, concepts present in consciousness at that time. One can also experiment with entertaining different ideas and concepts and seeing—letting them, entertaining them in a way that they're actually translated practically into ways of looking—and then seeing how the ideas are formed, shaped, limited, fabricated, dependent on that conception, in line with that conception, determined by that conception.

So any and all experience, any and all appearance, perception, ideas, concepts are present in a fundamentally formative way. When we come to sensing the soul and imaginal perception, those kinds of sensing, those kinds of experiences and perceptions also include ideas. And as a subset of the kind of ideas, they also include values. And I'll come back to that, the idea of this or that value.

The Greek word eidos is where we get our English word idea. And actually, eidos in Greek has a kind of double meaning. It means shape or form or vision or image. And it also means idea. The verb form reflects this kind of double meaning. So the verb form in Greek from eidos means I see or I know. As we say in English, I see, meaning I understand, not just I see visually. I understand. I grasp the idea or what.

So there's a way in particular ideas are central aspects that we can kind of tease out or focus in on within sensing the soul, and I hope to come back to that.

But really what I want to do in this talk or group of talks is weave together a few things. I want to talk partly about the ideas that influence us and influence our perceptions, then our experience and what appears to us in our contemporary culture. The ideas in our contemporary culture, you and I are influenced by certain ideas and that influences our very experience. So that's one theme.

And woven in as well, secondly, about ideas specifically in or involved with sensing the soul or images or imaginal perception. And that latter thread I want to use to open up some meditative possibilities of things that it is possible to explore, to experiment, perhaps that will suggest certain experiments or explorations or practices for you.

Among those, some of what I want to at least touch on or draw out the possibility is that it's actually possible to meditate on an idea, not in an intellectual sort of thinking way, that's possible at all, but what I really mean is, if you like, the essence of an idea. And it's a kind of very beautiful and soulful meditation on ideas that I hope to outline as a possibility in several different ways.

But more generally I want to also talk about some possibilities in practice, possibilities for imaginal perception, sensing the soul, specific possibilities that might easily be dismissed or closed off to us as possibilities because of the ideas that influence us in our contemporary culture, or in some subculture that we move in.

So, partly, as I said, what I want to do is, as I mentioned at the start, is to help legitimize those kinds of sensings with soul, those kinds of practices and directions. And part of that, it will be important to talk about ideas. And ideas includes ideas of ontology, that is, what we believe is real and what we believe is not real, ideas about epistemology, what we consider a valid way of knowing things or knowing what is real, cosmology and anthropology, what is the nature of this universe that we find ourselves in, and what is the nature of a human being.

And all of that, interrelated with all of that, is hermeneutics, which is really the philosophy of interpretation, if you like, originally applied to sacred text, the interpretation of the Bible or the interpretation of some other spiritual text and some other tradition. But more widely in philosophy, it's come to the interpretation of existence as well.

So existence, this world, ourselves, if you like, is a kind of text, albeit not necessarily primarily linguistic, and we are involved in interpreting that, whether we realize it or want to admit it or not. We are involved in an interpretation of existence or interpretations of existence. So all this sensing with soul has also interwoven with all that and interwoven with all this business about ideas is just generally hermeneutics and what are the possibilities or the limitations on our kind of lived hermeneutics. So of tradition and what comes to us through tradition and texts and teachings, but also of existence itself.

So I want to try and weave those themes together in this talk or this group of talks.

To start, I want to try a little bit of a historical perspective. I'm talking about the ideas that influence us. Why? Because those ideas have a huge effect on what we consider real, on what we consider knowledge, on our sense of existence, of ourselves and of the world, and therefore what's legitimate or not in practice.

So a very brief, necessarily oversimplified historical perspective. You could say that medieval culture was actually very, in Europe, was actually very sophisticated, in many ways, and particularly around religious thought and theology. And somehow coming out of the intense and brilliant religious and theological kinds of debates and writings and thoughts and ponderings, coming out of that, in a kind of strange way, emerged the scientific revolution and the Renaissance and the Western Enlightenment.

Actually, it wasn't at a certain point. It was a graded transition, a scientific revolution, and the Renaissance. Well, this didn't happen just one day. It's now the Renaissance, or it's now the Scientific Revolution. Even the ideas that were at the fundament of the Scientific Revolution took several hundred years for the culture to really digest them fully, so that it became everyone's basic point of view, or at least it heavily influenced everyone's basic point of view.

So I want to draw out three strands or elements of the classical scientific view—in other words, of the view that emerged with the scientific revolution in Europe after the Middle Ages. I want to draw out three strands, not that these are the only elements, but just for our purposes.

The first aspect that gradually came to dominance was a belief in a singular and objective reality. Objective meaning it's real—things are this way whether or not I choose to believe them. This reality exists independent of how I tend to look at things, what I'm feeling at any time, or what my imagination is doing. So with classical science, in time, with the scientific revolution, emerged this worldview that held there is one reality. That reality is independent of the way of looking, independent of mood, independent of my emotions, independent of my point of view, independent of the observer—basically, independent of the subject. It's singular and objective and real.

The second element that emerged was what we can call Cartesian dualism. René Descartes divided the world basically into res cogitans and res extensa—mind and matter. They're just very different, two different things or realities in the world. There was that division, a dualism between mind and matter. You can see how this objectivism, the subject-object distinction of that first element—the singular objective reality—has a link with the distinction between mind and matter, subject and object.

The third element grew somewhat more than was originally intended. Originally, with the scientific revolution, the intention was to disregard anything that wasn't empirical—anything that couldn't be sensed with the senses or verified in experiment. There was a kind of anti-metaphysical trend there, starting with attention to what was visible or sensible, what was empirical.

But as science developed and discoveries were made and theories formulated, there was a growing structure of what was in essence behind appearances. The empirical inclination was to pay attention to appearances, to what can be sensed, and not speak of anything that can't be sensed. But as science probed deeper, it went behind appearances more and more.

For example, an electron—I mean, atoms were once an idea behind appearances, but electrons, even today, are still behind appearances in the sense that no one has ever witnessed an electron. An electron is a theory. It works very well. Actually, there are different theories of the electron, quite different theories. But as physics in particular developed, there was more behind the appearances.

Another dimension behind the appearances were physical laws. Again, no one has actually directly witnessed Newton's law of gravity or Maxwell's electromagnetic laws. They are, so to speak, behind appearances. No one sees F equals GM_1M_2 over R squared. And quite different laws, like Einstein's law of gravity, can be applied behind the appearances to explain them.

So in the movement of science, with its progress, the initial anti-metaphysical emphasis and attention to appearances and the empirical actually opened up more and more behind the appearances. This behind-the-appearances was partly what some people at the beginning of the scientific revolution—for instance, Francis Bacon and Locke—actually wanted to do away with.

So these three elements I want to draw out: the belief or assumption of a singular objective reality; Cartesian dualism of mind and matter; and the inclusion of what is actually behind appearances in the form of subatomic particles, which are not directly sensible, and physical laws themselves.

There was a wonderful and just staggeringly breathtaking expansion of scientific knowledge, with all its brilliance and creativity, until early in the twentieth century, when some discoveries were made, some experimental results came out that called everything into question—the very basic fundaments of that classical scientific worldview. What emerged was relativity and quantum mechanics, and they were an absolute revolution.

Those three principles were affected. Those three elements of the classical scientific view were affected. There was a huge shaking up—in fact, complete fracturing or dissolution of the unanimous belief in a singular objective reality. It was found that many of the properties of subatomic particles and fields and waves were indeterminate—they weren't this way or that until the observer came into the picture.

It was no longer objective or singular. Things themselves—until an observer actually conducted a specific experiment in a particular way—existed in an indeterminate state. We couldn't definitively say whether what was happening was a wave or a particle, where it was located, how fast it was moving, what its mass was, or what size it possessed. All these fundamental constituents or aspects of reality that were previously conceived as objective and singular were now severely called into question, thoroughly undermined.

Before observation, a thing exists in what's called a state of superposition. It is simultaneously both particle and wave—neither here nor there, neither this fast nor that fast, neither this mass nor that mass, neither this size nor that. Some physicists are even beginning to question whether temporal sequence itself—the notion that things happen before or after one another—actually applies at this quantum level. Everything gets called into question.

What exists is this state of superposition—wave and particle somehow coexisting at the same time in a completely illogical manner. Statements about where a thing is, how fast it's moving, how heavy it is, or what energy it possesses become meaningless. What actually takes the place of any singular, objective reality is a waveform.

Before we make a specific measurement, we can think of a subatomic particle as existing like a probability smudge—quite probable that it's here, somewhat less probable that it's over there, even less probable that it's somewhere else entirely. This probability is smudged across an area rather than existing in one discrete location. What we have is an equation that describes this probability distribution for various fundamental aspects of reality.

Heisenberg, one of the founders of quantum physics, initially tried to explain this through his uncertainty principle by suggesting that observation itself disturbs reality. He theorized that when we look to see where an electron is, we need a photon to bounce off the electron back to our eye—and in this process, the photon moves the electron. But he later admitted this was an oversimplification, even a mistake.

The more accurate explanation has nothing to do with measurement disturbing an otherwise determinate reality. In itself, the electron or subatomic particle simply does not have any particular velocity or position. It exists more as what's called a wave function—an expression that describes a probability smudge distributed across space and time.

This collapse of belief in a singular objective reality was one revolutionary aspect of quantum physics. The second was a shaking—though less complete—of Cartesian dualism, the separation between mind and matter. Some physicists desperately wanted to preserve this division. Others moved toward materialism, insisting that everything, including mind, is ultimately just matter. Still others—perhaps a minority, though I'm not certain—suggest abandoning the mind-matter duality altogether and developing a physics that genuinely includes consciousness.

What emerged was a thorough questioning of the mind-matter divide, without any definitive conclusions. But certainly the observer appears to be involved, and the act of measurement seems integral to reality in ways that cannot be radically separated from what we then perceive as real.

The third classical principle—that behind appearances lay discoverable, concrete realities—also underwent profound transformation with quantum physics and relativity. The laws governing reality, and even our concepts of subatomic particles, became extraordinarily abstract. These governing principles became so removed from direct experience that they're utterly dependent on appearances for their meaning. An electron is not an electron without the laws that explain it, yet I cannot see those laws directly.

This entire dimension of what lies "behind appearances" became so abstract that the human mind cannot conceive of it except through highly sophisticated mathematics. That probability smudge I mentioned is actually an equation existing in multiple dimensions—potentially fourteen dimensions or more, depending on how many particles are involved. When you square the solution of that equation, you get the probability density of this probability smudge at any given location and time.

Really abstract. Or consider Einstein's general theory of relativity about the curvature of space and time. This too exists behind appearances, so to speak. But particularly with quantum physics, the dimension of reality that lay behind appearances grew larger and larger, becoming increasingly abstract.

Wolfgang Pauli, a Nobel Prize winner in physics, wrote in a letter to a friend—this was from 1948, though he could have written it earlier—"When the layman says 'reality,' he usually thinks that he is talking about something evident and well-known. By contrast, it seems to me that it is the most important and exceedingly difficult task of our time to work out a new idea of reality." He goes on to say something we may return to at the end of this talk: "What I have in mind concerning such a new idea of reality is, in provisional terms, the idea of the reality of the symbol. The reality of the symbol."

This Nobel Prize-winning physicist later in his life became a patient of Carl Jung, the analytical psychologist. Only for a short time—Jung actually passed him over to someone else because Jung was deeply interested in Pauli's ideas regarding the cosmos, mind and matter. Jung and Pauli developed a long and fruitful correspondence and friendship over many years, developing what some people call dual-aspect monism.

What this really involves is, again, a singular view of reality—but reality as something that's neither mind nor matter, neither psyche nor physis, from the Greek word from which we get "physics." Rather, both mind and matter are different aspects of an underlying reality that coordinates with itself in various ways. That reality is, so to speak, beyond mind or matter. It's neither mind nor matter, but something from which mind and matter emerge epistemically—meaning in our consciousness when we experience, in our knowing, this singular, transcendent reality. This monistic structure, this one kind of thing, splits into subject-object, mind and matter.

So again here, in what Pauli hints at and worked out, there's something behind appearances—a singular idea. It's not entirely objective because he's tying together mind and matter in terms of what gets experienced. He had to do this because he was at the forefront of the quantum physics revolution and could not completely believe in purely objective perception of reality.

Notice he also spoke of "the reality of the symbol." For him, symbols were archetypal—this is where his interest with Jung and the unconscious and psyche emerged. But also mathematical symbols. He did fascinating work tracing archetypal ideas in the evolution of scientific ideas, particularly with Kepler, the beautiful astronomer who developed mathematical theories of astronomy. Pauli showed how driven Kepler was by certain religious and archetypal ideas—that Kepler actually discovered his theories based on archetypal images and symbols that shaped those theories.

One of Pauli's key points concerns "our time." He was writing in 1948, and now, seventy years later, it's still our time. These conundrums, this situation of what influences us, what has evolved in science—no one has really gotten their head around it. Quantum physics has made tremendous inroads into technology and culture, but not into how people actually conceive existence and sense experience.

So it's still our time. The sense of reality remains—what were his words?—"the most important and exceedingly difficult task of our time to work out a new idea of reality." We haven't worked that out in a way that really shapes our perceptions.

I want to highlight and draw attention to some of our legacies—the legacies we inherit that influence our thinking, our beliefs, our assumptions, and our experiences, and then what we dare to do in life and how we relate to life, but also as practitioners.

Now, this is an oversimplified story, but one important thing to acknowledge is that the legacies we have are complex and contradictory. Let me pull out a few threads here.

I was reading Christian Fuchs, another physicist—a contemporary quantum physicist interested in quantum Bayesianism. He was discussing Richard Feynman, whom I mentioned the other day, another Nobel Prize winner in physics. Feynman was quite a character, and some of his interviews are famous. He once said something like: if there was a massive catastrophe—he was probably thinking of atomic bombs or atomic warfare—and everything of culture was destroyed...

little snippet of wisdom that I would hope survives and that would be the basis to then build everything worldwide—I'm paraphrasing him—would be the statement that, the nugget of knowledge that everything is made of atoms. That is the key hypothesis. So this is what Feynman said. Once you just pick up that hypothesis, everything else follows. He was more interested in science than anything else.

Christian Fuchs wrote, "The problem is the imagery that usually lies behind the phrase 'everything is made of.'" I'm going into all this because I'm really interested in the ideas that influence and limit us and direct and shape our experience, both meditatively but also just our life experience.

So Fuchs writes, "The problem is the imagery that usually lies behind the phrase, 'everything is made of.'" And he cites William James, the philosopher and psychologist, who called this problem "the great original sin of the rationalistic mind."

Then Fuchs quotes William James from his book The Meaning of Truth. This is William James now: "Let me give the name of vicious abstractionism to a way of using concepts which may be thus described. We conceive a concrete situation by singling out some salient or important feature in it and classing it under that. Then, instead of adding to its previous characters all the positive consequences which the new way of conceiving it may bring, we proceed to use our concept privately"—I think what he really means is singularly. "Reducing the originally rich phenomenon to the naked suggestion of that name abstractly taken, treating it as a case of nothing but that concept"—that's the key point, nothing but that concept—"and acting as if all the other characters from out of which the concept is abstracted were expunged."

"Abstraction, functioning in this way, becomes a means of arrest far more than a means of advance in thought." It's stopping something. It's limiting something. "It mutilates things," he continues. "It creates difficulties and finds impossibilities. And more than half the trouble that metaphysicians and logicians"—but I would say human beings, scientists, Buddhists, whatever—"give themselves over the paradoxes and dialectical puzzles of the universe may, I am convinced, be traced to this relatively simple source. The viciously private"—again, maybe it's a historical thing, but I think the word singular would be better—"the viciously singular employment of abstract characters and class names is, I am persuaded, one of the great original sins of the rationalistic mind."

So, in other words, and this is really key: Feynman says the key thing is everything is made of atoms. And then what creeps in for us as that view—and that view that emerged with the scientific revolution—really gained hold as the fundamental view, the fundamental take on what is real. What's real? An atom is real. Or he could have said a subatomic particle is real, getting more, quote, fundamental. I think what he means is if you think everything is made of atoms, then you ask, well, what is an atom? And you'll get beyond what we nowadays call an atom to the fundamental particles. Everything is made of fundamental particles, is probably what he wants to say.

And then what creeps in as a kind of axiomatic dogma of our present culture is that this becomes a dominant view: Everything is really only made of the meaningless movement and combination of material particles.

So, we have here an instance of what Jung described—how the victor of the scientific worldview over the kind of medieval religious worldview actually becomes a prisoner because, and this is quite subtle, it's subtly present in the background of our thinking about the world and of our opening or closing possibilities for perception and interaction and relationship with the world. Undermining subtly—subtly present and subtly undermining a kind of ground for meaningfulness, for soul and sensing with soul—is this kind of dogma of what William James called the vicious abstractionism of "everything is made of."

In other words, it's really, A, the realism, and B, the "only." It's really only, and only what? Particles. What Feynman really meant to say: Everything is really only meaningless movements and combinations and interactions of atomic particles.

So whatever we engage in as human beings, and even if it's spiritual work or soul work or psychological work or whatever, there's somehow pervading in the kind of groundwater of our mind this: "Oh, but it's really only..."

Now, sometimes that comes to the forefront, and for some people it's really at the forefront all the time, and for others, it's just there in, as I say, the groundwater. It's in the bedrock, and it exerts its influence. This vicious abstractionism, which is one of the problems that grew out of the success of the scientific revolution, became scientism. It's "nothing but." That's the only thing that's real. Everything is that.

So hooray for William James to point out this vicious abstractionism. He was actually a scientist himself, which makes his critique all the more valuable.

Let me share an example that illustrates how this epistemological narrowness affects our capacity for soulful perception. Someone told me recently of a beautiful soul-sensing experience with the moon. She was sitting outside on her back step some months ago when the full moon suddenly began talking to her—speaking in a very personal way, with tremendous love and tenderness. She opened to that communion and entered into a whole series of meditations, sensing soul and relationship with the moon. This profoundly changed and opened up her perspectives on matter, soul, life—all kinds of fundamental questions. It was very moving and deeply soulful, genuinely important for her spiritual development.

This is not someone ungrounded or disconnected from ordinary life. She pays her bills, maintains functional relationships as well as anyone I know—in all practical ways, she's thoroughly integrated into daily existence.

Recently, near another full moon, she found herself again within sight of that luminous presence. Similar experiences began opening up for her—that same personal love and intimate relationship, the moon speaking to her personally with great tenderness. There was quite a richness to these encounters that I cannot fully convey here.

What I want to emphasize is that while the first experience flowed quite naturally, the second time she noticed some hesitation—the kind of ambivalence and reluctance to open to soul-sensing that I mentioned at the beginning. She experienced doubt.

Part of this reluctance arose from very practical considerations. She recognized that sensing with soul demands a high quality of attentiveness—a refinement of sensitivity and openness that can be quite demanding to sustain. It requires being truly present and available in ways that ask a lot of us. We have to be genuinely prepared for such encounters.

This mode of perception also demands sometimes inhabiting a certain vulnerability. As I've mentioned regarding the necessity of open heart and humility, we sometimes need to really connect with what's emotionally difficult and remain present with that discomfort. In this case, there was a particular vulnerability she had to actually inhabit—and that's genuinely challenging. We must be willing to do this inner work, and soul-sensing might open us even further into tender places.

When we're truly open as human beings, we often equate openness with vulnerability because we're not protected, not walled off, not defended. So there was understandable ambivalence arising from these factors.

She also experienced hesitation because of what she called "the current drama"—the immediate life situation requiring attention. This wasn't papañca, mere mental proliferation, but genuine relational and work issues that needed addressing. The soul-sensing with the moon relativized this current drama, placing her immediate concerns within a much larger context.

But this relativizing doesn't happen through transcendence or dismissal, not through aloof disinterest or detached equanimity. Rather, the view opens and the whole sense of existence expands, contextualizing whatever is occurring in one's immediate experience. This opening of perspective can feel threatening because we become accustomed to certain views of existence. When we suddenly see that our current situation is only part of a much vaster landscape—a soulscape with tremendous panoramic depth—that expansion can be unsettling.

But beyond these understandable sources of ambivalence, there were also intellectual doubts—and this is what I particularly want to emphasize. These doubts were partly epistemological in nature. How can I trust this experience? What gives it any sense of reality or validity? Can I call it genuine knowing, or is it merely a strange delusion?

She was also dealing with flu at the time, which created additional doubt. Flu brings an extreme assault on the physical system and a corresponding emotional vulnerability that accompanies bodily weakness. Understanding how body and mind affect each other, she wondered if her vulnerability was creating this experience—fabricating it in the problematic sense of fabrication because she was ill and needing comfort.

Drawing on psychological knowledge, she thought this might be a kind of regression to early narcissism, when the vulnerable infant believes everything speaks personally to them. Perhaps her perception of the moon as personally concerned with her could be explained away as emotional and physical vulnerability creating need, which activated strategies from infantile narcissism.

This brings me to what I've discussed in the Eros Unfettered talks—the epistemicide that has occurred in the name of the scientific method. With the global dominance of modern Western culture, there has been both a tremendous liberation from superstition and dogma, and simultaneously a devastating narrowing of what we consider valid ways of knowing.

in our place geographically and also in other places geographically in the world, there is the insistence, or at the very least the sort of strong insinuation and superciliousness regarding the classical scientific method and its assumptions as the only valid way of knowing. It's the only valid epistemology. That combination of rationality and empiricism, that particular combination of rationality and empiricism, with all the reality assumptions woven in there.

As I pointed out earlier, what happens then is there is an invalidation in this epistemicide—in this killing off of other kinds of epistemology, of other possibly valid ways of knowing, other ideas about ways of knowing reality and realities. In this killing off, in this epistemicide, only the scientific method remains valid, which means disregarding, preferably getting rid of one's emotions and one's imagination. The invalidation of the emotions and also the imagination in epistemology—in what we regard as knowing.

So you don't want to be swayed by your emotion. It's better that knowledge is what happens when you have put emotions completely aside, when there is no emotion, or when you kind of discount what emotions are present.

Contrast that with a possible epistemology which actually includes the emotions as a range of different perspectives or doors, if you like, to reality. So including difficult emotions of vulnerability and grief—these emotions become valid, valuable, valid different lenses or perspectives on reality. An emotion like the kind of vulnerability my friend was feeling, or like someone else wrote me an email describing very deep grief at the death of her mother and another death of someone close. And that grief opening up a whole perspective, a whole soul, sensing the soul.

Could we have an epistemology that actually includes emotions, including emotions that are vulnerable and grief and whatever, as valid different lenses or perspectives or ways of knowing? In other words, including the emotions in possibilities for ways of knowing. They open up our sense of things, our senses, in ways that might not otherwise be possible.

Again, talking about the kinds of ideas that have just kind of got into the bedrock of our psyche, conscious and unconscious minds. And they really have an influence and an impact—in this case, doubt or that kind of ambivalence or hesitation or reluctance, or in some cases just actually cutting off a certain door or gate or avenue of sensing, of experience, of validation of experience and perception.

But it is complex, I think. As I said, we receive multiple legacies from our cultural past, and it's complex. So despite this kind of vicious abstractionism lurking in the bedrock of our psyche, especially regarding matter, it's also true in the complexity of things that we don't, generally speaking, most of us don't completely believe that kind of what's called scientific materialism or reductionist materialism, or physicalism is probably a good word—that kind of physicalism. Everything is really only this meaningless movement, interaction of material particles.

Some people want to kind of go that route. You know, Descartes, at the beginning of the scientific revolution, started, you could say, with a three-part division, not just a two-part, a dualism of mind and matter, but also there was God. And so you had God, mind, and matter. It didn't take very long for God to—actually, it was Descartes who partly was responsible for sort of demoting God as a sort of... He did the creative work and then he just sort of steps back and sort of looks on at the machinery of the universe and the machinations of mind and matter.

So God was kind of demoted right at the beginning and then just gradually more so and more so until there was no real need for a view of God. It was thought and so what we just had was left with just mind and matter. And then within that, there's even a strong movement, and some people are loudly insistent that actually it's all just matter. So mind is just what's called an epiphenomenon. It's just a kind of emergence out of matter. It's just one of the clever things that matter can do is be conscious, be cognizant, be aware of other matter, if you like.

I don't think we live that way. Even the people who really try and push that quite loudly in our culture, that kind of radical physicalism, that particular vicious abstractionism of physicalism, of scientific materialism—I don't think even they really live that way.

If it were the case, this kind of fundamental materialism, scientific materialism or physicalism, then it would mean that our mind contents are essentially matter, they're material. Your happiness or your suffering or your perception of beauty or whatever, or your meaningfulness, or your being in love, or whatever—really, they're just certain neurons firing, or certain chemicals, chemical molecules or atoms reacting in the brain, or electrical impulses just matter. Essentially, that's what they really are.

So your falling in love is just the movement of certain particles, material particles, and their interaction, usually considered in the brain, sometimes considered in the whole body. And then your falling out of love and your suffering there is also just matter doing different things, being in different places or moving in different places or different interactions between matter particles in the brain.

So in that sense, the suffering of falling out of love or the suffering at the loss of some beauty—that too is just illusion. It's really just atoms or particles or molecules moving or combining. That's what the universe is: the movement and combination and interaction of particles.

Amazingly, leave this matter in the universe alone long enough with the physical laws, and you get life. Out of life emerges consciousness in some forms, and eventually the extraordinary consciousness of human beings. But essentially, what's really happening is just particles moving.

Yet even those who push forward such a view don't actually live or think that way. We don't run our societies that way. We take human suffering very seriously. We try, for the most part—or at least some human suffering—to address it in law, in morality and ethics.

But this view of radical physicalism or vicious abstractionism that extends to scientific materialism and scientism—if we're going to say we do take suffering as real, that we consider it real as something meaningful, then we don't live in a way that regards suffering as merely the movement of atoms in the brain or electrical impulses.

So if suffering is real, though it's built or fabricated as a mental construct from matter, then so is happiness. And so is beauty. As we say, beauty is in the eye of the beholder—it's not in the thing itself. And so is love. And so is meaningfulness, and so is soulfulness, and so is the sense and perception and conception of divinity.

All these are as real or unreal as suffering or pain—even physical pain. Physical pain is, if you like, mental. Atoms or particles themselves don't experience hurt. Pain is a mental experience, not a physical one. Emotional pain, definitely; physical pain also. All are merely—can be regarded as—the movement and interaction of material particles, which are not immediately perceived or conceived as such.

When we move in the world, we don't live in a way that reduces something like suffering or pain to this view of radical physicalism and its vicious abstractionism. But actually, happiness, beauty, love, soulfulness, meaningfulness, and the sense of divinity are all just as much mental constructs as suffering.

So you could say: if you're going to respect suffering, all these others are equally worthy of respect. Or if you're going to disrespect suffering by holding to that radical physicalism, then you have to actually disrespect suffering—probably a lot of suffering—and make a case for respecting only certain kinds.

But if you reduce everything to this physicalism, you circle back again to a possibility—you open the door again for the respectability of soul, soul qualities, and soul experiences. All of these are equally worthy of respect or disrespect. All have equal value. So the perception of divinity, beauty, even the sense of the ideal—the idea of beauty and essence that we'll return to—soul, all of it, as much as pain, as suffering, even as physical pain.

Even in that radical view, it's complex. We don't actually live that way in this vicious abstractionism, but it nags at us. We're pulled in different directions.

There's a rabbi—I think he's still alive—called Adin Steinsaltz, somewhere in the States, in New Jersey. He points out another example of how we're influenced by contradictory ideas that shape our sense of existence, right and wrong, value, and meaning.

He observes that one of the most obvious things in the world is that all human beings are not equal. It's obviously not true that human beings are equal. There are vast differences in all kinds of ways between this human being and that one—better at this, not so good at that, more developed here, stronger there.

But democracy—our institution that we respect so much, although I sometimes wonder myself—theoretically, at least, democracy and the humanism that underlies it enshrines as law the principle that everyone is equal.

That the opinion—everyone's opinion is somehow equal. And he said, because it's obvious that you just have to look at human beings or pay attention to what they do and what they say and how they think, their acts and what they're capable of, it's obvious that humans are not equal. So our institution of democracy is kind of assuming soul, he would say. We're assuming something that we can't directly see that has some kind of universal value in everyone. And it's somehow inviolable, no matter what the apparent differences in human beings, the apparent inequalities between human beings.

So again, you get a whole other kind of influx into our modern worldview than this vicious abstractionism of scientific materialism or reductionist materialism. It could be—I mean, I'm not sure about what Steinsaltz says there, because it could be that our enshrining of a kind of equality between human beings is just silently acknowledging our postmodern uncertainty or agnosticism regarding what is of value. We are so confused about values that we can't say or declare, and so we just say, "Everyone's equal." I don't know, and actually there are other ways to look at all that, but I think it's an interesting point that Steinsaltz makes, and possibly that really is coming in, that sense of soul that's sort of hiding behind. Again, it's somehow worked its way into the bedrock of our worldview.

But as I said, we are heirs to a complex legacy, a legacy that is a complex of contradictory influxes of ideas, and in a way it's confusing. We are confused. But still, there's a way in which, as I pointed out, I think what Jung said is true: the scientific revolution's way of thought was a victor at that time, but the victor slowly becomes the prisoner of the world that it conquered. And so, for example, we find ourselves not entirely free to pick up that exploration of the range of possibilities that we call sensing with soul, because we're a little bit imprisoned, or a lot imprisoned, by these influxes of ideas that become dominant ideas and become—they won in the cultural debate, but they become, we become their prisoner, or it becomes, that view becomes imprisoned itself, it can't move out of itself.

So ideas, as I said, shape and limit our experience. They shape and limit what we consider worthy of practice or legitimate practice. They shape and limit our perception of self, other, world. They shape how we sense existence in terms of life and death, and also they shape and limit what we do in the world, our acts and what we devote our energy to and our intention.

Now, can you see that this will still apply in terms of practice, in terms of Dharma practice? So for example, and you've heard me allude to this several times over the years, we can get a kind of reductionist Dharma. So oftentimes Abhidhamma teachings are reductionist. They reduce things, again, to atomic units—both matter and mind, atomic units—and then these discrete atomic units working in a kind of process. And the practice is shaped in accordance with that idea of what reality is, and so one goes for this kind of micro view that will expose this, that will actually experience this atomic reality or as close to it as possible. One works towards experiencing that.

And then that whole process, that whole approach reinforces itself. I believe this, I look for that, I believe this, I look in a certain way, I see that. My seeing that confirms my view of it as a reality, as a truth, rather than as a perspective. A microscopic view, a narrow focus of awareness, a very sharp attention or mindfulness is a perspective. And that view of atomism is a perspective. It's part of the idea that influences the perception. It's a perspective. It's one perspective among many.

Sometimes a person's Dharma practice and understanding and whole trajectory is imprisoned in a kind of reductionist view of different kinds within the Dharma. Perhaps also you can be aware of sometimes when I refer to the epistemology, the dominant epistemology or the epistemicide that does away with or disvalues emotions, devalues emotions as having a place within, as opening up ways of knowing, as opening up perspectives, and strives even for a kind of emotion-free state. You can also witness that in certain kinds of Dharma approaches very easily.

We conceive of an ideal state of certain emotions, particularly equanimity. And the common view of equanimity is that somehow in equanimity everything's calmed down and we're just really seeing clearly without any distortion of any emotion because we're just really steady. The lake is clear and we can see clearly. Or, as I said, certain emotions. Or, with mindfulness, the idea is that a certain emotion might be there, but if I keep practicing mindfulness, actually there's a quieting of the emotional state. But when I'm practicing mindfulness, when I'm mindful, even if an emotion's there, I've somehow got some distance on it so that I'm not so much seeing through the emotion as I'm devaluing what it tells me because there's an epistemic devaluing because of the kind of aloofness or distance we have, or perspective actually we have, on emotions. So that can creep in as well.

So this reductionist view and the atomism there was exactly one of the things that, if you like, Nāgārjuna as the father of the Mahāyāna, or one of the fathers of the Mahāyāna, was exactly what he took issue with. And you can read his whole body of work as really picking holes in that reductionist dharma, that kind of atomic realist view.

Or, again, so I'm talking again about ideas that limit our experience. In this case, what about Dharma ideas or the ways that this limitation that comes from certain ideas happens within a Dharma context? So another one, again, we've touched on it either directly or indirectly, is the absence of the concept of eros and soul-making, the concepts of eros and soul-making. If you just consider the concept of eros...

And the absence of that concept doesn't allow, for me, doesn't allow enough differentiations of desire. It will lead to certain blind spots. It will lead to certain gates closing, not even witnessing, oh, that's a possible gate. It will lead to a certain very tightly circumscribed notion of what awakening is or could be.

It will lead also to, because of the way eros will stimulate the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, the soul-making dynamic, and that stimulates and stretches and expands and deepens our ideas and perceptions of things in sensing with soul, the absence of eros will also lead to a kind of rigidification and a narrowing, a narrow rigidification of what, for example, matter is. Matter is this. It's the four elements or whatever. Mind is this, in some view of what mind is or what mental elements are. Awakening is this.

So there isn't, because of the absence of eros, there isn't the possibility for the eros-psyche-logos dynamic to really get going and stretch and expand and add dimensionality and open up the view and open up the ideation.

And then a further problem or limitation coming from the absence of the concept of eros comes from, for me, if we don't have the idea of eros, then we actually don't have an adequate understanding of our motivation or our desire in practice and how it works. Without the concept of eros and soul-making, we don't have an adequate or wide enough or rich enough complete enough understanding of what is motivating us, what are we actually desiring when we practice and when we practice consistently and with a lot of love and dedication.

There's not therefore an adequate understanding or model or theory of our motivations and desires as they already exist. It's already driving us. Someone who loves practice already has eros and soul-making involved in that love, in that dedication of practice. As I said, where we love, where we're dedicated, where we're devoted—I don't mean just devoted in a typically religious sense, I mean devoted, just devoted to something. You know, devoted to doing, devoted to practicing, for example, devoted to awareness, whatever it is. Where there is love, dedication, devotion, there is eros and a sense of soulfulness and soul-making in the ways that we would use them. It might be limited, but they're still operating there.

So with the absence of the concepts of eros, ideas of eros and soul, we don't actually have an adequate or rich enough, complete enough theory of what motivates us, what we desire, and how that actually works to propel and prolong a life of practice.

I'm going to stop here for today, but I want to continue just on this theme. I'm reluctant to rush through it because I think it's so important and it's also opening up things from a slightly different perspective than what I've done before. So I'm hoping that not rushing will be more helpful.

So let's do the second part of this business about ideas tomorrow.

CHAPTER 129

Between Icon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h38

In this continuation of his examination of image and hermeneutics in meditation, Rob Burbea delves into Western philosophical traditions that can support soul-making practice. Drawing on phenomenologists like Husserl and Dilthey, he explores how our cultural inheritance of ideas forms a psychological bedrock that may unconsciously imprison or liberate our capacity for sensing with soul.

Burbea examines the limitations of phenomenology's attempt to investigate the "life world" of appearances, showing how even "bare attention" and mindfulness are themselves ways of looking embedded with metaphysical assumptions. He explores how different philosophical attempts to question established epistemologies and ontologies often fall short because they remain influenced by the very limited thinking they sought to transcend.

The talk emphasizes how all perception depends on ways of looking and includes metaphysical concepts - ontological beliefs about what's real, epistemological assumptions about valid knowledge, and cosmological views about the nature of existence. Using the Jewish Midrashic tradition as a model, Burbea presents an alternative approach to truth as multiple, contextual, and requiring passionate engagement rather than detached observation. This passionate participation in questioning our conceptual frameworks can itself become soul-making, opening space for the fertility of imagination and the sacred dimensions of existence.

We started this talk by pointing out that for many people, even when there's considerable interest and attraction to practicing this way and exploring this whole realm and the possibilities of sensing the soul imagining and perceiving, there can still be a kind of force or pull from the culturally dominant view that is entrenched in our psyche and exerts its influence—its stern judgment on what we might be thinking or how we might be practicing, sometimes in very quiet and subtle ways.

It may be that for many people, the practice of sensing the soul and that whole orientation needs some support through intellectual exploration of ideas and concepts that might be inhibiting it, preventing it, judging it, dismissing it. By being aware of these ideas, looking at them, questioning them, and seeing if there are other possible ideas that can give this opening legitimacy and support, we can feel space in which to explore. Can we pry open this space by considering the influence of ideas, questioning them, and finding ideas that will open up space and provide ground and legitimization for sensing the soul and all the possibilities that brings?

As part of this work, we are heirs to a complex and confusing legacy of ideas coming to us through culture and history, forming something of a bedrock in the psyche. In recognizing this fact and being aware of what exactly these ideas are, where they come from, what influence they have, we can begin to question and poke at that bedrock and the rocks that make it up, so that imprisonment doesn't happen automatically and unconsciously. Perhaps we can then turn the soil, to use a different metaphor, of the ground made up of these clumps of ideas and rocks. In looking at and working that soil, we can turn it so it becomes a different ground—soil that now supports fertility and fecundity for imagining, perceiving, and sensing the soul.

At some point, for some of you, this very questioning and consideration of ideas and playing in the realm of ideas as they relate to, inhibit, support, or open this whole direction of practice may itself become soul-making. One's sense of being at a certain place in a certain culture with certain needs, perspectives, and dominant trends, and one's whole participation in the culture and the evolution, contest, or conversation of worldviews within a culture as it moves forward in time—that whole vision and sense of engagement with different ideas can become soul-making.

In the first part of yesterday's talk, we looked at some threads we can identify within the legacy from the scientific revolution and the classical scientific worldview overstepping its boundary into scientism, including what William James called "vicious abstractionism." We explored how this comes into our life and gives rise to doubt, inhibition, hesitation, or downright forbidding of certain orientations in practice, certain directions, devaluing certain perceptions, experiences, openings, and aspects of our being.

Alongside the scientific legacy, we can consider the Western philosophical legacy—a complex and rich interweaving of different philosophical traditions in dialogue with science. I'd also like to weave in some attempts within Western philosophy to open up and question the established epistemologies, ontologies, and worldviews that became entrenched with the Western Enlightenment and shaped what some call the modernist worldview. These were attempts to challenge the domination of scientific thinking.

As we examine some of these attempts, we should also notice how they often fall short of what we might need to support our work, how some fall short because they remain influenced, often unwittingly, by some of the limited thinking they sought to break free of. Hopefully we can consider where they might be expanded, added to, or themselves challenged and opened up in different ways.

I'd like to pick up this story in the early 20th century. There was the evolution of science I talked about, the First and Second World Wars, and obvious concern about values, morals, and where humanity was heading. Several people pointed out the divorce or disconnection between scientific exploration on one hand and the human context in which it happens on the other, including consideration of moral values and other values. Science tells us nothing about value, certainly not moral values.

Edmund Husserl, the German philosopher, wrote a book called The Crisis of European Sciences and Transcendental Phenomenology. He was living in Germany after the Nazis rose to power, and part of his concern was pointing to science and what he called "the positivistic reduction of the idea of science to mere factual science." Positivism basically holds that if something isn't material and measurable, it's nonsense.

This idea of positivism started to take over in certain philosophical lineages and more widely in sociology and as a life view. Husserl points out that the positivistic reduction of science to mere factual science means that science has nothing to do with human values or questions of human freedom. It "excludes in principle precisely the questions which humanity, given over in our unhappy times to the most portentous upheavals, finds the most burning"—questions of the meaning or meaninglessness of the whole of human existence.

Can we not say something similar in our time?

This way of thinking had forgotten about or devalued the human context, treating it as something material and measurable, applying classical scientific methodology to human sciences and the study of humanity, leaving very little to say about values and human life.

One of Husserl's responses was to focus on what he called the "life-world." This concept...

If you're somewhat interested in these ideas but don't want to dive deeply into reading volumes of philosophy, there's an excellent introduction to many of these philosophical concepts in David West's book Continental Philosophy. I think it's really accessible—not too long, and you can dip in and out of it. If you find yourself drawn to these kinds of ideas, it might be an interesting book for some of you. I'm paraphrasing a bit from what he said there.

Husserl responds to this kind of crisis, partly, with his idea of the life world. He wants to explore this life world, which is basically our sense of life as we live it. It's the ordinary context—the conventional presumption that I exist and you exist separate from me, that I'm in my house right now, that the table is in front of me—just the conventional view of the world. This life world forms the context and the basic presupposition of all thought and action.

It's almost like giving a context to science and philosophy, understanding them as practices that take place within the life world and derive their power through the life world, through our culture, through social networks, but also through what Husserl called "an unquestioned ground of presuppositions." This is really important—an unquestioned ground of presuppositions, a background of unreflective assumptions, values, and practices that make up the life world.

Husserl says that in all scientific inquiry, philosophical inquiry, and so forth, "the everyday surrounding world of life is presupposed as existing. The surrounding world in which all of us, even I who am now philosophizing, consciously have our existence... here also the sciences as cultural facts in this world with their scientists and theories. In this world we are objects among objects in the sense of the life world, namely as being here and there in the plain certainty of experience before anything that is established scientifically, whether in physiology, psychology or sociology. On the other hand, we are subjects for this world, namely as the ego subjects, experiencing it, contemplating it, valuing it, related to it purposefully."

There's a lot in that dense quote, but one piece I'd like to highlight is the emphasis on the life world. His philosophy then emphasized and limited itself to the investigation of the appearances of the life world—this idea of staying with appearances, the appearances of life as we experience it in everyday existence that we take for granted, containing all these unreflective presuppositions and assumptions.

This wasn't a completely new word or philosophical direction, but in a way he gave birth to or started the phenomenological movement, although Hegel and Kant had used this term before. But phenomenology as the study of—the limiting of philosophical investigation to—the appearances that are part of our everyday life, inner and outer. And so this phenomenological movement was born in philosophy: staying with the appearances of the life world.

You can hear, if not the exact language then at least some of the tenor of this in many of our current explorations of Buddhist practice, insight meditation, or mindfulness. People use slightly different emphases, but there is also in contemporary dharma this emphasis on attention to and investigation of the appearances of everyday life—the experiences and appearances of our lives. Can we bring attention to that with mindfulness? Can we bring bare attention to that? These are common themes in contemporary dharma teaching.

But again, even though science started with "let's give attention to the appearances," both the presuppositions that exist there and the ways these practices develop bring new appearances as I'm investigating appearances. It moves out of the life world. In other words, we start with appearances, but either we're approaching with a certain network of ideas that become concepts that influence the way of looking and thus what is experienced—as I'll return to shortly—or we're simply saying, "Give really close, bare attention to my experience of the world and my inner experience right now, the life world."

What happens is that the attention starts to deconstruct one's everyday life world experience. Then, as I mentioned before, there's a kind of reductionist paradigm or deconstructionist and then reductionist paradigm operating. "Ah, you see, when I look closely, this is what I find—that must be reality: these atomic units of perception, sensation, vedanā, consciousness, and so forth."

Sometimes this kind of phenomenological intention in mindfulness and bare attention actually pushes and opens up this sense of the range of what the life world is, and sometimes it declares what it experiences through a certain lens as reality.

But let's stay with Western philosophy a little longer. We'll return to dharma shortly.

Italian philosopher Gianni Vattimo makes a point that I really want to highlight. Husserl, with his idea of bringing it back to this basic sense of existence and the basic experience we have of life—world, inner, outer, and all that we take for granted wrapped up in that experience—had a really good idea. But there are problems with it, quite a few problems.

One is, as Vattimo points out, there is no "phenomenological analysis of experience."

So this is what Husserl wanted to do—a phenomenological analysis and description and investigation of experience. But Vattimo points out (he's a much more recent philosopher) that there is no "phenomenological analysis of experience," and he places "phenomenological" in quotation marks deliberately. The quotation marks cannot be avoided here. There is no phenomenological analysis of experiences that is not conditioned—that is, made possible and qualified by the fact of belonging to a tradition.

In other words, everything that Husserl wanted to see as a kind of universal of human existence was actually how everyone in his society at his time, within a certain tradition, sensed existence. How different it would be if we talked about a phenomenological investigation of, say, a tribe in Papua New Guinea or the Amazon that had never had contact with Westerners. Their experience, their—phenomena means "appearance" in Greek, by the way, so it's the investigation, the logos of phenomena, of appearance—their world, their life world, would be completely different.

So Vattimo is pointing out that we're always belonging to a tradition. It's not as though there is an experience, and then after that, we add intellectual abstractions to it. Vattimo goes on to write: Is not this fact of belonging to a tradition—which colors, shapes, limits our phenomenological analysis as well as actually being part of the fabrication of our life world—is this not a situation familiar to hermeneutics, familiar to this whole branch of philosophy that deals with the interpretation of texts and of existence? That one who is dominated by prejudices cannot recognize and thematize them as such. Something Nietzsche pointed out even before Husserl was writing.

So the life world is something that exists for a certain history, for a certain historical cultural context. And then the analysis of that life world is also an analysis dependent on a historical cultural tradition, philosophical tradition, and context.

One of the things Husserl was famous for saying was "to the things themselves." In other words, let's put aside metaphysics, let's put aside this kind of positivism of science, and go directly to the things that present themselves to us. But when we consider the historical cultural context and what we bring to that investigation—and also to our experience itself—that rallying cry for phenomenology "to the things themselves" seems rather naive. This becomes clear once we've seen the dependence of any perceptions of things on the way of looking in the moment (which I'll return to) and on the concepts entertained within the way of looking at any point (which I've mentioned and will come back to).

Those concepts that operate in us will include scientific and other ideas for us now—different from what they would be for someone living in exactly this spot where I am now in England, say, hundreds of years ago in medieval times, before the scientific revolution. The very way we perceive "the things themselves," so-called, would be colored by—or rather, implicitly, almost tacitly colored, infected, shaped, and limited by—a scientific worldview that we've all been educated in, along with other ideas.

So actually it becomes hard to separate phenomenology from science, or rather it becomes hard to separate a phenomenological investigation from being infected with ideas from science.

More generally, we see that a person's experience of phenomena is hugely conditioned, shaped, determined, allowed or disallowed—this or that sense of things, this or that experience—by the current worldview, the Weltanschauung, in the culture in which they live.

But even this is not quite right; it's a little too simple. Heidegger, or some interpretations of Heidegger, stressed what's called a kind of historical "thrownness" into a zeitgeist. In other words, I am born at a certain time in a certain place in history; I'm thrown into a cultural worldview. And that's part of the problem that needs to be realized. This changes over time.

But even that is not universal. Not everyone thrown into—let's say, like I was born in England in the 1960s and then lived through that, spending some time in the States and coming back—is going to have the same worldview, or even the same set of influences, strands of influences. The currents in history now are broad, so it's not universal. Even the influences operating for someone in a certain location in time and space, thrown by their birth into that location, vary considerably.

For Westerners living today, there is no longer just one common worldview or way of experiencing the life world. So this historical thrownness, or what's called the zeitgeist (the spirit of the times), is not an objective fact, a reality, what some philosophers like to call a "facticity"—something that's just there and you can't do anything about it.

There are lots of different influences of ideas, and it varies from individual to individual and subculture to subculture—which influences are dominant, how they are valued, and so forth. Even the whole movement of history is shaped by perspective: the victors of a war, even if it's only a cultural war, write the histories. Some of you might know Howard Zinn's book A People's History of the United States—a history of the United States that doesn't get taught in high school. It's history from the perspective of Native Americans or African American slaves. Who writes the history books?

So there are many histories and many influences of ideas, given different weights and different influences in shaping, limiting, and fabricating the worldview—and then the analysis in what we might call attempted phenomenological analysis of that worldview. All this needs to be taken into account.

Sometimes with insight meditation, we might be tempted to assume that we are employing an attention or mindfulness that reveals what things are, the way things are. If we employ an attention that "reveals"—and I'll put that in quotation marks—an atomistic world of sensation and experience, we might be tempted to think: "Oh, that's a phenomenological approach because I'm just looking at my experience, looking at the appearances, taking them as I find them, investigating them carefully. I don't have any presuppositions."

Then what we see reveals—depending on how you're applying mindfulness, and that's the key point—perhaps an atomistic view. And we think: "Oh, so this is the phenomenological approach. When I employ the phenomenological approach, this is what I see."

And then I'm corroborated by certain texts. I say, yes, there are just... The self is the five aggregates. There is just this... and so forth—atoms of vedanā and sensation, moments of consciousness, and so on. So there's that approach in philosophy and there's sometimes that approach within Dharma where we think, oh, that's something like the phenomenological approach.

There was another German philosopher, Wilhelm Dilthey, and in some ways he could be regarded even more than Husserl as the grandfather of the phenomenological movement in the twentieth century. He really didn't like this kind of reductionism in psychology or philosophy, and so he was rather scornful and pointed out that—I'm quoting now—we live and move not in a sphere of sensations, but of objects presenting themselves to us. Not in a sphere of feelings—sensations and feelings are in inverted commas here—but of value, meaning, and so on. In other words, we can deconstruct appearances, but in deconstructing we also miss something. It's like not seeing the forest for the trees.

To me, neither perspective realizes fully enough the dependence of experiences on ways of looking, nor how broad and diverse is the range of ways of looking, and therefore of experiences. In other words, when I look in a certain way, I get this experience—and it might be an atomistic sense of appearances, appearances as atoms. When I look another way, I get very different experiences of objects and values and meanings, and so forth. And the range extends way beyond all that.

So insisting that one or the other is the real way we experience things just misses the whole dependence on ways of looking.

I want to challenge the typical conception of phenomenology as a kind of investigation and uncovering of the universal human experience of a life world or the life world. There are lots of problems with that approach. What I would like to stress and open is a conception of what I call the phenomenological approach—as far as we're concerned, what I have been calling the phenomenological approach in previous talks over the last few years—as an investigation of how experience of the life world, or how appearances, vary. They vary in a historically contingent way, as Heidegger emphasized, and also depending on mood, or what we could call mind state in Dharma language. But far more widely than any of that, and subtly—the gradations are extremely subtle—they vary depending on what I've been calling the way of looking in the moment.

There's another philosopher, Richard Palmer, who wrote a book on hermeneutics in philosophy. He writes about Wilhelm Dilthey's thought: "Experience is precisely the reality of what is there for me before experience becomes objective and therefore admits of a separation from the subjective." Palmer is emphasizing that idea of Dilthey's, that his fruitful insight—again I'm quoting—is "in seeing experience as a realm before subject and object."

This is quite a common theme or emphasis of some phenomenologists: saying that actually, experience is—when we really look at our experience—there is no subject and object. That comes later. That's some kind of intellectual superposition or superimposition. When you investigate experience, experience is just before subject and object division.

Continuing with Palmer writing about Dilthey: Dilthey's "fruitful insight lay in seeing experience as a realm before subject and object, a realm in which the world and our experience of it are given together. He saw with clarity the poverty of the subject-object model of human encounter with the world."

I personally have problems with this, and if you've done enough practice in some of the ways that I've suggested, you would have problems with it as well—you should have problems with it. Because the sense of subject-object split that I or you experience—the sense of them being split, that there is a subject and there is an object, they're somehow loosely connected but they're really split, or them as being kind of poles of a polarity, or the dissolution of that polarity in some kind of oneness or unity or whatever—varies in experience dependent on the way of looking. The very sense and experience of subject and object and their relationship, or what they are in relationship to each other, varies dependent on the way of looking.

So yes, there is a poverty, as Palmer points out, to the subject-object model of human encounter with the world. But it's not because the reality of our basic experience is devoid of the subject-object split. A model that insists that experience is always pre-reflectively devoid of, or that pre-reflective experience is always devoid of or before subject and object, is equally poor. The idea that this is how it is, and then we add something—the idea of subject and object based on intellectual ideas or whatever—that's equally poor.

To insist on the reality of subject-object split, either implicitly or explicitly, is as poor a model as it is to insist that always there is no subject-object split, that it's only added later by the intellect or whatever.

The sense of subject and object—and I mean the pre-reflective sense, not the intellectual—depends on the way of looking in the moment for its intensity, its vividness, and the degree of its separation. Where and how much of a duality or polarity or oneness or total alienation exists between subject and object depends entirely on the way of looking in the moment. A meditator will see this very clearly.

What's more, the state or perception of the subject-object polarity in our experience is affected by the very investigation of it. In investigating, in giving it careful attention, in paying attention to it with curiosity—"Let's see, where's that subject-object split now?"—that paying attention itself is a way of looking, and it changes everything. The attentive curiosity toward the state of the subject-object nexus or gestalt affects the state of it, and therefore the perception of it, just as Heisenberg pointed out with the observation of matter. His uncertainty principle became a fundamental tenet of quantum mechanics: the observation itself depends on the way of looking.

What's common to many of these endeavors is perhaps just a human tendency—maybe part of what the Buddha called basic avijjā—this need or want to say, "This is how it is." So Dilthey says this about subject and object, someone else says that. "This is how it is." And "this is how it is" means this is how it is independent of the way of looking.

Historical context serves as a conditioning factor in what appears to us in our sense of the life world. That historical context isn't even universal for everyone alive today. And even more than all that: dependence on ways of looking.

Ways of looking can be deliberate, consciously played with, manipulated, experimented with. But they operate anyway—there's always a way of looking when there's any experience, any appearance, any life world at all, any perception. That way of looking includes concepts, even if we're not conscious of them at the time. They're implicit, tacit, very subtle.

When I refer to the phenomenological approach in our work, it's really the investigation of how different ways of looking affect or fabricate appearances differently. How does the world, inner and outer—how does experience, appearance, perception—get constructed, built, experienced differently, dependent on the way of looking in the moment? What's involved in that? What's the possibility there? Is there some stance or perception or appearance that we can say is not dependent on the way of looking? Find out.

The phenomenological approach, when I borrow that word from philosophy, really means the investigation of how different ways of looking fabricate differently.

In that context, bare attention or mindfulness are ways of looking. They're not revealing any kind of objective reality. They're ways of looking. What we see with any kind of mindfulness, bare attention, or this or that is what we experience and sense through that particular lens at that time. Involved in that are concepts, and involved in that is metaphysics.

I really want to insist on this. What do I mean by metaphysics? It's actually a big, problematic, and contentious word. I'm going to say that it includes ontological beliefs and assumptions, epistemological beliefs and assumptions—in other words, beliefs and assumptions about what's real and about how we know or what constitutes valid knowledge concerning what is real or not real. It also includes a whole cosmology: what is the nature of this world, and of a human being.

Metaphysics exists anytime there's any belief or assumption—conscious or unconscious, implicit or explicit—around ontology, epistemology, or cosmology. These aren't just abstract concepts; they're commitments we have. They shape what we value, how we practice, what we intend, how we invest our energy, what we devote ourselves to. They also shape how we move in the world and how we talk to each other. Ontological, epistemological, and cosmological commitments, beliefs, and assumptions are wrapped up in perception—any and all perception.

But metaphysics has also come to be very contentious as speculation about anything that's behind appearances.

So if you talk about gods or souls or any kind of mysterious energy or something like that, this is regarded and dismissed because it's metaphysics. And modern people are not interested in metaphysics, so the sort of thrust goes.

But as we pointed out when we talked about science, even fundamental particles are something behind appearances. They're not immediately discernible to the senses. And they're not even discernible with high-powered instruments. An electron microscope still can't see an electron, let alone a quark or whatever. So assuming that there is a reality behind our everyday appearances—the atomistic reality or atoms of matter or atoms of sensation and consciousness—assuming that's the reality behind appearances, that too is a metaphysics. And as I said, even physical laws are something, so to speak, behind appearances. It can be extremely abstract.

We might say, "Ah yes, but scientific laws are at least amenable to empirical checking through experiment and whatever, and we can kind of hone in on the truth there." Not so simple, that distinction. Spiritual laws, if we can even use such a term, psychological laws, soul laws—if we can use those kinds of ideas—are also testable and can predict what happens.

But anyway, there's metaphysics as ontology, epistemology, cosmology. There's metaphysics as the postulation of what is behind appearances as a reality. And then there's also a very important aspect I want to draw out. It's kind of wrapped up in those other two definitions or aspects of metaphysics. But there's also what I would call the metaphysics of objectivity. And that is the assumption of a singular objective reality that it's possible for us to know. "This is how things are."

So that metaphysics of objectivity, it's all over the place. Even when people say, "I don't believe in truth" or "the Buddha wasn't interested in truth" or this or that, it's hiding in one's approach to existence. This metaphysics of objectivity—an assumption of a singular objective reality that's possible for us to know—actually is an ontological, epistemological belief, assumption, or commitment, as I said in the first aspect.

But these metaphysical concepts and ideas are wrapped up in perception. They walk around with us and they shape things for us. So sometimes it's possible to just get rid of metaphysics, dispense with it, put it aside, cut it out. And that's often the rallying cry of people who have a more existentialist bent.

But I'd say we can truly avoid or dispense with metaphysics about as successfully or to the extent that we can truly avoid or dispense with experiences in the six sense spheres. In other words, where there is sensing, where there is sensation, there is metaphysics. There are ontological beliefs, assumptions about what's real, about what experiences we can trust, about what constitutes knowing something—all of this and more. And also the sense of something being, so to speak, behind that we don't have direct experience of, but we can trust and it's part of reality.

So cut out the metaphysics, throw it away? Great. You can do that about as easily as you can get rid of all of your sense experiences in the five sense spheres and the mind of thought and imagining. I think it's important to point out: we can't just pretend that we don't have ontological, epistemological, cosmological commitments. That's actually where we invest our energy, our time, our dedication. And also what we trust, what we rely on, and what we value.

One of the even more interesting things about all this is that epistemology is the kind of ideas about or beliefs about or exploration about what knowledge can we trust concerning what is real. But when you really probe and ask questions epistemologically, you will inevitably come to some kind of answer that you realize rests on some kind of other assumption, and that assumption, whatever it is, is actually ultimately unprovable.

In other words, if you really probe: "Well, how do I—okay, I think this is real, how do I know?" "Well, because I value this kind of way of gaining knowledge and that kind of way of gaining knowledge. I don't value that one and that one." "And so why do you value that?" And then you keep asking, "Why? Why? Why?" You'll come down to some kind of assumption that you then can't prove.

This is a really important thing to acknowledge. So as I said, a lot of this ontology and epistemology operates wordlessly and unconsciously as logoi in the perceiving consciousness, so to speak. Any moment of mindfulness has some metaphysics with it. And you can see, again, if you've done a lot of more intense mindfulness practice, you will see how, for instance, the sense of materiality varies. Once there's a lot of momentum to the mindfulness and close mindfulness, the solidity of things, of materiality, actually starts to unsolidify. And so the separation between mind and matter begins to—the subject-object separation between mind and matter also begins to kind of loosen or melt a little bit.

Depending on how much and what kind of mindfulness one is applying. When that dichotomy between mind and matter begins to melt a little bit, when the split between subject and object eases and the polarity softens, something profound happens. The two poles—mind and matter, subject and object—begin to melt together. At that point, the mindfulness carries with it a different ontology and epistemology than it did when it started, if one really goes with it and into it.

Even with just the instructions of mindfulness in the Satipatthana Sutta, the experiences that open up when applying different mindfulness practices bring with them, or carry with them, different ontologies and epistemologies that then unfold. Mindfulness is actually not one way of looking—it's many ways of looking.

Consider the instruction to imagine your corpse disintegrating and falling apart in a charnel ground—this is one of the contemplations in the Satipatthana Sutta, in the Buddha's discourse on mindfulness. That's a certain way of looking. The experience of sitting in a very calm state and contemplating mind states, or contemplating the presence and absence of the seven factors of awakening—this is a very different way of looking.

Any moment of mindfulness carries with it a certain set of metaphysical assumptions, a certain metaphysics. Our lives are lived and experienced with, or from, whatever constitutes our habitual set of metaphysical ideas, beliefs, and concepts.

Heidegger wrote: "Metaphysics is not something which can be put aside like an opinion, nor can it be left behind us like a doctrine in which we no longer believe." So this whole idea of putting aside metaphysics, cutting it out, just not engaging in it—when you actually understand what's involved there, you realize we can't do that. We carry it with us. What we can do is explore different metaphysics and see how different metaphysical concepts affect our experience.

There was a phenomenological current in Western philosophy, and from a whole other direction, we have someone like Richard Rorty, an American philosopher who died not too long ago. He was quite influential and wrote about two other philosophers: Wilfrid Sellars and W.V.O. Quine. They were what are called analytical philosophers—very different from the philosophy we discussed earlier with Rousseau and Dilthey. This analytical tradition focuses on analyzing human thought, theory, and the elements of reality, examining how we can form scientific opinions about things.

Rorty investigated all this and came largely from that tradition. He said: "I interpret Sellars' attack on givenness..." Sellars had addressed our idea of what is given to us by experience—this notion of basic givenness, that life simply gives us this or that appearance, and then we do something with it. But Sellars demolished that idea.

Quine, another analytical philosopher, became famous for concluding after his investigations that "all so-called raw data are already theory-laden." This echoes Sellars' attack on givenness and resonates with what we've been exploring about emptiness and ways of looking. The very attractive idea of getting to basic facts without adding anything more to them doesn't hold up under scrutiny. After all his scrupulous logical and philosophical investigations, Quine concluded that all so-called raw data are already theory-laden. We're already bringing concepts into the ways we look at experience. There is no raw data that we can have. There is no pure givenness.

Rorty explains: "I interpret Sellars' attack on givenness and Quine's attack on necessity as the crucial steps in undermining the possibility of a theory of knowledge"—in other words, epistemology. "The holism and pragmatism common to both philosophers are the lines of thought that, when extended in a certain way, let us see truth as, in William James' phrase, 'what is better for us to believe' rather than as the accurate representation of reality."

What is better for us to believe? This is profoundly dharmic, at least as I would present the emptiness teachings. What is better for us to believe—or perhaps more precisely, how is it better for us to look?—rather than seeking what we usually think of as truth: the accurate representation of reality. We often approach meditation with the assumption that we can look in a certain way and see "how it is"—the accurate representation—especially when we're super equanimous, very calm, unruffled, unemotional, or deeply mindful.

Or to put the point less provocatively—though I think this is more provocative anyway—they show us that the notion of accurate representation is simply an automatic or empty compliment which we pay to those beliefs which are successful in helping us do what we want to do.

In other words, we call real just what we want to call real. It's convenient to call something real depending on what we want to do with a certain point of view or a certain assumption about reality. It's a little unclear from that quote what he means by what we want to do. He might mean whether we want to apply technology or whether we want to build up a relationship with someone.

But there's a quote from Nietzsche—and Nietzsche is so much the forerunner of this kind of thinking in philosophy—though I can't find the exact reference. He said something like, people select their philosophy about reality based on what kind of freedom their soul wants. In other words, if they want to set something free in themselves that they really care about, set their soul free in relation to that, then they adopt a philosophy and therefore a whole worldview and sense of existence and real and unreal, dependent on just what the soul wants.

What do we want to do?

When we're practicing mindfulness, mindfulness is also wanting something. It's set in and determined by a context of desiring that is shaped by the Four Noble Truths. What do I want when I'm mindful? I want liberation. I want ease of dukkha. I want to move towards the Third Noble Truth. What's that? Well, I have to understand the First Noble Truth. Mindfulness is also set in the context of the Fourth Noble Truth—the Eightfold Path—and a certain understanding of what gives rise to dukkha in the Second Noble Truth.

So it's set in a conceptual context, but it's also wanting something. There's a desire there. What we want to do, says Rorty. What do we want to do? Letting that question actually shape our ideas of what truth is and reality—what we might loosely now term truth or reality.

Collectively, this is interesting because of our global crisis now—the crisis of the species and the earth and the climate. What do we want to do? We want to solve those crises, I hope. If we want to solve the crisis by purely technological thought, technological thinking, technological perceptions—purely an issue about carbon dioxide levels, and if we can get some technology to remove the carbon dioxide—great, really important. But is that the limit of what we want to do? Solve our crises by those kinds of ways of looking, those kinds of value systems, ontologies? Nature as machine and commodity might have been part of how we got into this mess in the first place.

What do we want to do?

And in caring for people, what does that mean to care for people? What do we want to do? What is a human being? What is a person? Are we caring by giving so much attention to the GDP and relentlessly being entrenched in the view of growth economics? What do we want to do, and what's the relationship between what we want to do and our views of what's real and what is the case—what a human being is, what nature is, what the world is? And what do we want to do together as a society? What do we want to do as individuals? Because individuals have very different directions of their desire, of their longing, of their aspirations.

One of Richard Rorty's main concerns was actually social. He was famous for saying—I can't remember the exact quote—but his basic intention or the point of all his philosophy was just to keep the conversation going. In other words, he wanted this idea of non-truth, his statement about why it was important, so that we can keep talking to each other, so that there is this kind of conversation that's possible between different points of view.

I don't know all his writings, but I read some. What seems strange to me is that he kept saying this thing about the basic point of all this is to keep the conversation going. There's a social concern there. But I'm not aware of him actually engaging in much conversation about different points of view in a way that was really productive or changed anyone's mind, or brought anyone into at least being able to experience someone else's worldview and what opened from that. Is the conversation ongoing? I'm not sure, in our wider culture. Did he take part in that? I'm not sure.

And if so, how much power and significance? Because if it's just an intellectual conversation, it actually doesn't enable one, as I said, to really open up the sense of existence and the worldview. The playing with ways of looking, the flexibility with ways of looking—that's what I call meditation. And that actually allows an altering of view, meaning experience, meaning appearance.

This idea that Rorty actually at least said that he felt was important—to keep the conversation going—as a model of that or an example of that kind of social opening up and social cohesion and openness of conversation and openness of relationship with truth, as a model there is the Midrashic tradition in the Jewish tradition. Midrash is a kind of commentary or interpretation of the whole set of sacred scriptures.

Now I'm paraphrasing another philosopher called Gerald Bruns, who writes about hermeneutics, but in this chapter, he's writing about the Midrash. He's talking about people going to study in the Beit Midrash—the house where this kind of hermeneutics of the Bible is studied—and there are these fierce debates going on. But fierce as they are and polarized as they are in terms of the difference of opinions, they don't split the community.

So there are polarly opposite opinions on the interpretation of this passage or that passage. This rabbi says this, the other rabbi says completely the opposite. A student asks, "How can I study in such an environment? What is this? It's chaos—this chaos of opinions and contradictory viewpoints. One guy says this, the other guy says the opposite, a third guy says a third thing. What am I supposed to do with that?"

And the idea is that this is exactly the perfect environment for studying, for relating to, for opening up and being opened up by the sacred text. As I said right at the beginning of this talk, let me remind us that hermeneutics means the interpretation not just of texts, but also of existence.

Here's a social situation that took place—ongoing for hundreds of years in Judaism, I'm not sure if it's still going—of this kind of openness to different points of view. Multiple interpretations were viable. An infinity of interpretations was conceivable, and there was this great fecundity of different viewpoints, different chewings over, different reworkings, different connections made regarding any passage from any sacred text, and regarding the whole thing as well.

In this social context, those engaged in relating to—in this case, the Torah or other texts—this way, we see that they imagine themselves as part of the whole, participating in Torah. Torah is the Old Testament in Hebrew. Participating in Torah rather than operating on it at an analytical distance. Participating in it.

So it's not something that I look at from a cold distance. I'm actually somehow part of it in my engagement with it, in this whole tussle and multiplicity of opinions and interpretations and slants and elaborations and connections. That actually is part of it. I'm participating in it. We are participating in it. This conversation is participating in it. This social scene is part of it.

From that idea of participation, it follows that the words of interpretation cannot be isolated in any rigorously analytical way from the words of Torah itself. In other words, where does the Old Testament end and the interpretation of it begin? It's all Torah—all of it is this whole. The subject and the object, the way of looking and what appears, the concept brought to bear and the world that opens up there—it's all Torah. You cannot separate the text. You cannot separate existence. If we elaborate what's said here in terms of text and extend it to include existence, you get this understanding.

Again, in other words, the Torah is constituted as an open canon. To be sure, the letters of the original scriptures are fixed, but they are not dead. So there's something alive here. Openness here has to be construed as the openness of what is written—that is, its applicability to the time of its interpretation, its need for actualization. We'll come back to that point shortly.

Now you must picture the text not as a formal object—so many fixed letters—but as an open canon whose boundaries are shaped and reshaped by the give and take of midrashic argument. Here's this whole community of passionate debate and creativity and probing and wider study and elaboration and contextualization. And that is something that shapes and reshapes the boundaries of, in this case, the scripture, the text. And we can also, again, say this about existence.

Those who study in this way—with passion, knowledge, and deep elaboration—make the text what it is. Above all, they make it open. They open it to the present and the future. The Torah, the text, or existence itself emerges as what it is and comes into its own only in the dialogue it generates. Only by entering into this dialogue can one enter the Torah, enter the text.

Now this is a social situation, which I'll return to, but we can also translate this to our own individual experience—if we can even conceive of the individual as truly isolated. We're always influenced by ideas we receive from the past and our contemporaries, as much as by what emerges fresh for ourselves today. There's this dialogue, this flexibility of interpretations, elaborations, contextualizations—and multiplicity, a rich multiplicity of interpretations.

This would be an example, socially, of the kind of thing Rorty claimed to be interested in. But it's more than what Rorty was getting at. It's a different notion entirely. Because of this idea of participation—there are those who study, who passionately engage with the text, or reality, or the sense of existence itself. They're participating. They see themselves as not separate. This isn't the kind of objective stance we find in scientific epistemology. This is participation—participating in the text and participating in the holiness.

So this whole view, very different from Rorty's, presents a vision of a social situation, of a conversation that keeps going, of an openness regarding notions of truth. But it preserves holiness.

I think with Richard Rorty—quite an influential and popular philosopher in some circles—I really get the sense from reading him that he had a hidden agenda and a hidden dogmatism of physicalism. Despite all his talk about open truth, he often lets slip statements or passages that sound like his basic view is one of atomic, meaningless movement of physicality—meaningless material particles in a meaningless universe. This was a kind of bedrock he couldn't shake, a hidden dogmatism that spread through his writings and created a hidden agenda that favored that particular metaphysics, that ontology and epistemology, over and against any kind of religious or spiritual view.

But again, this midrashic example—this passionate give and take, this complexity and variability and vastness and multiplicity—was actually creative. I'm not sure if it's still ongoing or came to a halt perhaps a few hundred years ago, but it was a creative, ongoing debate that worked its way into people's psyches and then into their actual views and how they lived their lives. In other words, it was an actual conversation that affected perception, senses of existence, commitments, practices, devotions, orientations—all of it.

Let me quote from Rabbi Efraim of Sudolkov, because he points out something crucial. We're talking about hermeneutics now—the interpretation of usually sacred texts. But as I said, I want to expand this to the interpretation of existence itself. The interpretation of texts and teachings, yes, but also of existence. Using this model that's quite alive and insisted upon in the Jewish tradition—this multiplicity, this non-singleness model, this non-objective status of truth. Truth as something multiple, amenable to multi-perspectives, infinitely variegated, infinitely mineable, infinitely fertile, and dependent on our participation—dependent on all kinds of things.

So Rabbi Efraim writes: "Until they had interpreted it"—and he means the people who are engaged wholeheartedly, passionately, with integrity and commitment in this interpretation of sacred text, of Torah—"the Torah was not considered complete, but only half finished."

Again, it's not a thing existing by itself. It depends on my participation. The wider point is the same with existence, the same with Dharma. "Until they had interpreted it, the sacred text was not considered complete, but only half finished. It was the rabbis, through their interpretation, who made the Torah whole."

He continues: "Such is the case for each generation"—and its leaders or explorers —"they complete the Torah, they complete the text. The Torah is interpreted in each generation according to that generation's needs."

Nowadays we say the needs are diverse. That's part of what some people call the postmodern condition. We have different perspectives and different needs. But the point here is, again, this non-fixity of truth, the amenability to different situations, different interpretations, which are also historically contextualized.

"The Torah is interpreted in each generation according to that generation's needs"—which we might add now today are multiple and varied—"and according to the soul root of those who live at that time." That may be an idea we return to. "God thus enlightens the sages of the generation in the interpretation of his holy Torah."

He who denies this is as one who denies the Torah itself. God forbid.

You could read that as a kind of attempt at consolidating rabbinic authority, but actually it opened up. It was part of a movement that kept open and insisted on keeping open this multiplicity of interpretation. It kept open not just the possibility, but the fact of interpretation evolving and changing over time, dependent on the historical cultural context.

Isaiah Berlin, some of you will have heard of him, was another philosopher. He wrote extensively about Gian Battista Vico, an Italian philosopher who lived in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Vico wrote about history and had quite revolutionary ideas for his time on history, culture, and worldview.

This is a passage from Isaiah Berlin, writing about Vico: "Vico's importance in the history of the Western Enlightenment consists in his insistence on the plurality of cultures and on the consequently fallacious character—the mistaken character—of the idea that there is one and only one structure of reality which the enlightened philosopher can see as it truly is and which he can, at least in principle, describe in logically perfect language." He describes this as a vision that has obsessed all kinds of thinkers, then names various philosophers.

There again, we see the singular objective—the notion of a singular objective reality that's universally true for all people, all times, all cultures, and all situations. How endemic that assumption is, whether or not you're a philosopher or consider yourself an intellectual. It creeps into our dharma practice, it creeps into our everyday discourse, it creeps into all kinds of things.

Berlin continues: "For Vico, humanity asks different questions of the universe and their answers are shaped accordingly. Such questions and the symbols or acts that express them alter or become obsolete in the course of cultural development, in the course of history. To understand the answers, one must understand the questions that preoccupy an age or a culture. They are not constant, nor necessarily more profound because they resemble our own more than others that are less familiar to us."

Different questions. Back to this question I posed earlier: What do we want? Rorty—we were left hanging with his quote about what we want. And Nietzsche's quote that I couldn't remember—we actually have different questions that we bring, and we want different answers, or we choose different answers depending on what we want, depending on the worldview that we want to support because it supports something in our soul.

Different questions. When we talk about all this in relation to practice, that's why I emphasize the passion and the involvement of the midrashic context—that kind of heated debate and the endless, soulful investigation and probing and teasing out of text. It matters.

For all this that I'm saying to make sense, it makes sense in the context of it being passionately important. Something in us is important to us. If someone was just listening to this and they just weren't interested in opening up a sense of existence or what truth was or any of that, none of this would matter. It would be completely ridiculous to be hearing it and would just sound like a bunch of words that's perhaps mildly interesting.

Mattering matters. When we talk about hermeneutics, when we talk about the sense of existence, what we're bringing to it and how we can see or sense existence and how we can legitimate this or that—it matters that it matters to us. When we talk about the way we sense existence and when we want to open up those possibilities, we're talking about something that some level of our soul, its passion, is connected.

Again, Gerald Bruns points out that an interpretation, whether it's a sacred text or whatever, it has to matter. You can't have a good interpretation by anyone of anything when that thing—text or sense of existence—doesn't really matter to them.

Quoting Gerald Bruns: "Say that interpretation, hermeneutics, is an act performed by a person to whom things matter, not by a consciousness primed to produce pictures of how things are in the world, or in the text, or in whatever state of affairs is put before it in analysis." This is different than the picture of cold scientific epistemology that we talked about—the absence of emotion.

He continues: "The Torah is a text that makes things matter. It preserves the smallest details of life from inconsequence and triviality." If you know the Torah, there are hundreds of pages about every little minute detail of life, bringing all that into the realm of mattering passionately and bringing all that into the possibility of being made holy, being sacralized, being sanctified.

Again, Bruns: "Mattering at all events is what the Midrashic text I have been quoting from presupposes with respect to interpretation. Midrash is not a formal operation, but a form of life lived with a text that makes claims on people. A text that makes claims upon people turns them into respondents. They are answerable to the text in a way that is qualitatively different from the answerability of disengaged observers to the scenes they wish to depict."

Now we could substitute the word "existence" for "text" and talk about what we are exploring now—this whole investigation of ontology, epistemology, conceptuality, and opening up the sensing with soul. This whole probing of ideas and the possibilities in sensing with soul is not a formal operation, but a form of life lived with an existence or perceptions of existence that make claims on people.

That kind of sense of existence that makes claims on people turns them into respondents. They are answerable. We are answerable to existence in a way that's different from someone who's just coldly, aloofly, analytically describing it.

So we're talking, again, notice there: desire, eros, this longing to understand, this passion connected with what I want to open up and how I perceive existence and what is legitimized or not and what senses are valued or not. There's passion and there's desire and there's eros in that investigation, in that debate that we're talking about. There's emotion there.

So desire, eros, and emotion—because they're necessary for the kind of hermeneutics that we're talking about and the kind of debate about hermeneutics that we're talking about—they are necessary, they are included in the epistemology. We're not talking about: "Now I'm in a neutral mind state, now I don't want anything, therefore I see clearly." Nor: "Now there's the quietening of emotion and a calm, equanimous mindfulness, therefore I trust what I see." Nor the kind of scientific epistemology that I pointed out devalues or tries to put aside emotion or any kind of wish. It theoretically pushes that aside, though it doesn't really.

Desire, eros, emotion—necessary and included in the kind of epistemology that we're involved with and trying to open up, and in the whole debate around that.

So it needs to matter. You wouldn't be listening, I presume, at this point, if none of this mattered to you. It needs to matter passionately. We need to be involved, engaged. Our lives are on the line. Our sense of existence is on the line. It needs to matter for us, and it matters also in what comes out of it.

It matters because, as Moscovici wrote and pointed out, questions of epistemology are also questions of social order. Questions of epistemology are also questions of social order. We might say pecking order.

So I've talked in the past about epistemicide, epistemic cleansing, epistemic colonialism. In other words, the dominant worldview of epistemology—secular modernism—taking over other cultures and disregarding, devaluing, dismissing, putting aside, sometimes even outlawing their worldview, their ontology, their cosmology, their epistemology.

Questions of epistemology are also questions of social order, questions of hierarchy and pecking order within a culture. Whose voices get ridiculed? Whose voices just become the entrenched, dominant, unquestioned, accepted view of what reality is? And therefore policy—political, economic, governmental, social, environmental policy—is based on certain worldviews which are based on certain epistemologies. Certain cosmologies are based on certain epistemologies.

So this needs to matter to us, and it matters in the world. And then, again, does the victor—the cultural victor, or the epistemology that is a cultural victor—become at some point a prisoner of that very epistemology, of the very rigidifications and entrenchments of whatever epistemology one is in? The victor then becomes the prisoner.

CHAPTER 130

Between Ikon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 57 min

In this profound exploration of epistemology and meditation practice, Rob Burbea examines how our philosophical commitments fundamentally shape our spiritual experience. Drawing on Nietzsche's perspectivism, he argues that all knowing is interpretive and influenced by our desires, affects, and cultural positioning—including mindfulness itself. Burbea critiques both reductionist approaches that atomize experience (as found in some Theravāda teachings and Marcus Aurelius's Stoicism) and existentialist dharma that merely copes with obvious truths. He questions whether accomplished practitioners become prisoners of limited worldviews, unable to access the full spectrum of spiritual sensing. Through examples of sensing with soul—like perceiving the sacred intelligence of stone or the subjectivity of celestial bodies—Burbea demonstrates how different philosophical frameworks open or close possibilities for practice. He advocates for philosophical pluralism not just for social harmony, but as a more rigorous understanding of how reality appears through multiple valid perspectives. This teaching challenges practitioners to examine the epistemological assumptions underlying their practice and consider how soul-making offers an alternative framework for spiritual development beyond traditional liberation paradigms.

So what if, instead of one worldview, reality view, ontology, epistemology, cosmology being declared the singular truth over another or others, instead of that kind of cultural war? What if we opened up to the idea of pluralism? Not just because we think we should be nice to each other—and we should—but actually on philosophical grounds, because we realize the mistake in insisting there is a singular reality, a singular truth, approached by a singular epistemology.

Again, so much at the forefront, ahead of his time, Nietzsche points out how much what's going on for us emotionally, our affects, actually affect the perspectives we have. Let me read a passage from On the Genealogy of Morals. Let us guard, he says, against the snares of such contradictory concepts as "pure reason," "absolute spirituality," "knowledge in itself." These always demand that we should think of an "I" that is completely unthinkable, an "I" turned in no particular direction, in which the active and interpreting forces through which alone seeing becomes seeing something are supposed to be lacking. Those kinds of ideas about pure knowledge always demand of the eye an absurdity and a nonsense. There is only a perspectival seeing, only a perspective knowing. And the more affects, the more emotions or emotional drives we allow to speak about one thing, the more eyes, different eyes, we use to observe one thing, the more complete will our concept of this thing, our so-called objectivity, be.

So, plurality. More affects equals more perspectives, more eyes. And then, if you like, reality or a thing—as I said, text or existence—being multi-aspected, amenable to multiple perspectives, rather than just one.

So that our knowing is always—it's always got, as I said, a desire. It's interested in something. We've always got some kind of affect going on, some kind of mind state and some kind of drive or intention. And so it's always situated. The knower, the seer, the meditator, whatever it is, is always situated. There's an entwining of our desires, our drives, our thought, our concepts, our affect, all of that.

A writer named David Owen writes about Nietzsche: our consciousness is neither disembedded from all of that, and from culture, nor disembodied. Knowing, like seeing, is an activity which attends the embedded and embodied character of human subjectivity. So whether it's perception or conception, it's influenced by desire, affect, perspective, body, all of that.

Nietzsche talked about knowing as interpreting. All knowing about the world is necessarily an act of interpretation, a selection of certain features and a disregarding of others. All knowing about the world is necessarily an act of interpretation, of hermeneutics—a selection of certain features and a disregarding of others—and that's exactly what science does. We only know, quote, "according to our point of view, our particular cognitive and affective perspective."

I'm actually quoting now from Christopher Hauke, who wrote a book about Jung and includes discussion about postmodern thought and Nietzsche. So we only know according to our point of view, our particular cognitive and affective perspective. And no knowledge, including that of so-called science, can be exempt from this. Moreover, we select according to our interests. So we're back with this: what do we want? And can we actually admit that what we want is influencing our concepts, worldview, perspective, interpretation, slant, perception, conception?

There is no disinterested knowing, and Nietzsche writes in Beyond Good and Evil: "It is perhaps just dawning on five or six minds"—he wrote this at the end of the 19th century—"it is perhaps just dawning on five or six minds that physics too is only an interpretation and an arrangement of the world according to our requirements, if I may say so, and not an explanation of the world."

So the affects, what's going on for us emotionally, and our intentions and our desires affect our perspectives. Knowledge is perspectival. The ideas—in other words, the ideas and the perception, the conception and the perception, all our cognition—are dependent on what's going on emotionally and what our desires are. Knowing is interpreting, which involves selecting, emphasizing certain aspects, disregarding others. Interpreting is another word for hermeneutics. And our interpretations depend on our interests. It's wrapped up with our desires. What do we want?

As I said, mindfulness too is not divorced from desire. Mindfulness wants something. What does it want? Always our interests, our desires are wrapped up in our perspectives, which give to us then what we see and what we think.

Then there follows this David Owen, who's writing about Nietzsche, talks about pluralism. So this is what I wanted to emphasize: that an interpretation about the world—in this idea of pluralism, this idea of interpretation that Nietzsche had—does not exclude the truth of other interpretations of the world which serve other interests.

It is an important feature of perspectivism, this idea that reality and existence is open to multiple perspectives. It is an important feature of perspectivism that it rejects the idea that the truth about the world could be exhausted by any single description of it. So there's actually an insistence on pluralism, not just because we need to get on with each other—which is important—but also on philosophical grounds. Actually be honest, be rigorous. Look what's happening in perception and conception, belief and assumption and mindfulness and philosophy and science and all the rest of it.

So the truth of a certain interpretation, of a certain hermeneutics, of a certain perspective, doesn't imply the lack of truth of other interpretations. Again, Isaiah Berlin, writing about Vico and talking within the context of pluralism, says: "I prefer coffee, you prefer champagne. We have different tastes. There's no more to be said." That is relativism. So that's not pluralism. It's just, I like this, you like that. We have different tastes, that's it. That's relativism.

Vico's view, Berlin writes, is not that—it is what I should describe as pluralism. That is the conception that there are many different ends that human beings may seek and still be fully rational, fully human, capable of understanding each other and sympathizing and deriving light from each other. So it's not an exclusive singular truth. There are different takes, different perspectives, and they can all have truth. They can all be true. They can all be rational because they serve different ends. In other words, what do we want? What's our interest? That will shape the perspective, that will shape the interpretation, that will shape the perception and conception. And all wrapped in that is the epistemology, the ontology, the cosmology, the metaphysics, and all that.

So we human beings have different ends and we may seek different ends and still be fully rational, fully human, capable of understanding each other and sympathizing and deriving light from each other. So again, it's a social concern. But for me it's more than just a social concern—it's a philosophical concern as well.

So we have, in our soul-making logos and practice, the end of soul-making. That's the ends to which we're aiming. And aiming it at that is different than aiming it at an objective truth, or saying this is true and that other thing isn't. So we're employing rationality. Some of this logos employs rationality in the service of the end of soul-making, the goal of soul-making.

We come back again and again to this question: what do you want? What do I want? What do you want? Of course, that changes at different times. In some situations, I want this or that, and I have this perspective or that perspective. What do we want now?

I heard two stories about a Burmese Sayadaw. And these are secondhand, but... One said that he must have ordained as a monk after he had children—or a child or something—and he had been practicing as a meditator before that. Otherwise it doesn't quite make sense to me. He says he was present at the birth of his child and lifted the child as they were born and held the child. And then he said, "I looked inside myself and there was no emotion. There was no emotion." And this was described as a triumph of Dharma practice. This was the fruit of his Dharma practice: that here was his own son or daughter lifted up from the birth and there was no emotion. This is a triumph of practice, or being portrayed—or conveyed, as I understood it—as a triumph of practice.

And the person who conveyed this story to me said she was... horrified was not her word, but she was saying, "Boy, is that what I want?"

I have questions about this approach.

Another story involved this same Sayadaw walking in the beautiful hills of Burma—I've never visited them, but apparently they are exquisitely beautiful rolling green hills that fade into the blue of the sky. The monks were walking mindfully through these hills, and this person who shared the story was a monk at the time, serving under this Sayadaw.

At a certain point, the junior monk stopped, completely overcome by the beauty of the environment around him—these hills, the sky, the nature there. He stood in rapt awe for a minute or so. The Sayadaw, who had been walking in single file, came up behind him and simply said, "What is beauty? It's just form and color."

This junior monk thought to himself, "I don't think you and I understand each other." He didn't say it aloud, but that was his inner response.

So again, the question arises: What do you want? What kind of sensing do you want to open up? What kind of emotional life do you want to cultivate? Where is your practice headed? Where do you want it to go?

I read about another Burmese teacher who described what he conceived of as the Arahant experience. It basically sounded like an impersonal machine, simply aware of atomistic processes unfolding in time. This, according to him, was the fully enlightened being's experience of existence—a kind of ticker tape of life and being.

So does the victor—Arahant, by the way, means victor or foe destroyer—does the victor become a prisoner? A prisoner of a certain mode and direction and scope of sensing, perceiving, believing, and conceiving?

It's a whole other question whether these descriptions really represented the totality of these monks' experience. Was it really true that he always had no emotion regarding his children? Did he always perceive beauty only to deconstruct it as meaningless shades of form and color that we can only get attached to in problematic ways, and therefore must see through? Does the Arahant really experience only that atomistic process and its impersonality?

Or is it that the conceptual framework doesn't allow them to articulate different experiences and different dimensions of being? Is it really that they've created such a prison that they've completely cut off certain kinds of sensibilities and experiences? Or is it simply that they lack the language and conceptual structure to articulate, give value to, or even admit experiencing something different?

This connects to what I used to call—and still call—"dot-to-dot meditation." I taught this in the context of emptiness practice, and it's quite an easy meditation to do with basic mindfulness. It involves a kind of reductionism. Instead of allowing experiences to join up into one big problematic thing, or something lovely—perhaps anticipating a fantastic experience where the mind has joined together these atomistic dots—you deconstruct that, seeing the dot-to-dot nature.

I called it that because of those drawing books I had as a very young child, where you have numbered dots and you draw lines between them with pencil or crayon, and suddenly you have a complete drawing from these separate atoms. This meditation involves seeing a certain level of fabrication in experience, so you can unfabricate by becoming aware of that process. There's a reduction involved, and a reductionism in the view that follows.

There is indeed a strong strand of reductionist perception—reductionist ontology and epistemology—in the Dharma, something I've employed myself. Interestingly, you find this in other traditions as well.

I was reading about Marcus Aurelius, the Roman emperor who was also a highly respected and influential Stoic philosopher. Through Michel Foucault's analysis, I learned that Marcus Aurelius describes three types of practices: exercises decomposing the object in time, exercises decomposing the object into its constituent parts, and exercises of reductive disqualifying description—all very Dharma-esque approaches.

Foucault gives a striking example involving musical notes or dance movements. Marcus Aurelius's philosophical instruction is: pay attention to music, but when you're around beautiful music or dance, pay attention in a way that atomizes the experience. Focus just on this note right now, not the whole sweep of melody or the flow and integrity of the dancer's movement—not the gestalt or wholeness of the motion.

Why? Marcus Aurelius explains that this approach allows you to "scorn a delightful song" or dance. He advises: "Always remember to go straight for the parts themselves and by analysis come to scorn them"—to look down upon them.

The reasoning is clear: if we experience a dance in the continuity of its movements, or hear a melody in its unity, we will be carried away by the beauty of the dance or the charm of the melody. We will be weaker than it. But if we want to be stronger than the melody or dance, if we want to prevail over it and retain superiority—if we don't want to be weaker than the wholeness of the melody—we must dissect it instant by instant, note by note, movement by movement. When we do this, we realize at once that there is nothing good in these individual notes and movements.

This text on musical notes and dance concludes with Marcus Aurelius saying: "Always remember to go straight for the parts themselves and by analysis come to scorn them"—though he does make an exception regarding virtue and morality of the self.

And now, apply the same procedure to life as a whole.

So this analytical deconstruction of the perception of continuities extends to life itself. This approach was very popular in Pali Canon Buddhism and other Buddhist traditions, particularly in Theravada, as well as in different kinds of spiritual traditions that mirror this methodology.

But what's particularly interesting to me here is that the very examples Marcus Aurelius uses are music and dance. This is exactly, I think, the sort of thing that Nietzsche, were he aware of it, would howl at with outrage and his own kind of scorn.

When does disenchantment become just silly? When does reductionism become silly and serve only limited ends?

We can end up applying this analytical approach to life as a whole and then actually clinging to the view, the interpretation, the hermeneutics of reality that ensues. Why? Again, it's because then we will conquer. We will be stronger. We will not be weaker, we will not be attached.

And again one asks: is the victor, the one who is stronger, actually imprisoned by the limitations of the worldview then? The limitations of what's allowed by a certain philosophy?

Beauty in art or in nature, music, emotions, narratives, selves—if we're always going to deconstruct these things, the beautiful, the artistic, the lovely music, the emotions, the narratives, the selves, if these are always deconstructed, that is silly. I think that's silly.

Sometimes we have other ends. We have other wants, other desires. We want our sense of whatever this thing is to open up differently rather than just that we don't feel weak in relation to them, that we don't feel attached in relation to them. We want, for example, a sensing with soul, with everything that comes with that—the meaningfulness, the beauty, the dimensionality, the divinity, the duty, all of that.

Not too long ago, I was practicing with a friend, and this perception opened up somehow of interstellar rocks, or the kind of fragments of rock that you might find in Saturn's rings—little lumps of everything from granular molecules all the way out to little rocks. And that vision, and then of my body and her body as made up of stone, if you like. So it was a sensing the soul into the earth element, into the element of solidity.

Usually when that meditation on the four elements is given in a Theravada context, it's for the sake of deconstructing the body and making us unattached, or in the service of less attachment to the body and the physical form of the body and what happens to the body. So again, it's like Marcus Aurelius—we don't want to be weak in relation, we don't want to be overpowered by an attachment to that, so we reduce, we employ a mode of looking. That's the four elements meditation found in the Satipatthana Sutta, but usually the way it's taught, it disenchants and unattaches.

This sensing with soul of this cosmic earth element and the stone element in me, the earth element in me and in my friend, was not, however, lacking in holiness. It wasn't flat. There was a dimensionality there. And I stayed with it—I was really struck by it. It was as if the stone had its own soul and it had its own subjectivity and it had its own intelligence.

If you've listened to the Eros talks, I think I described how that kind of intersubjectivity and recognition of soul in the beloved erotic object will open out to a sense of soul there, a sense of subjectivity there, a sense of intelligence. There's a particular kind of intelligence and a particular kind of seeing. What is it to see and to sense existence as the stone senses it?

The holiness was there, the dimensionality was there. It wasn't a flattening and a deconstructing that took away that enchantment. So there's something similar there perhaps to some tantric or vajrayana meditations on the elements—very different meditations, very different orientation and relationship with the earth element or the water element or the fire element. Its holiness is there. Its holiness is amplified. It's more than just flat.

So sometimes we might want to be, as Marcus Aurelius puts it, greater than something, not weaker than something, not attached to something, not subject to something so much. But sometimes we want sensing with soul. And sensing with soul, as I pointed out at some point near the beginning of this course, sensing with soul involves humility. It's not about being greater than, not being weaker than. There is a sense of this thing, this beloved other, this thing that I am perceiving, sensing, is somehow bigger than me. Sometimes we want that.

Again, we're talking about the ways that we can very easily become imprisoned by certain ideas, certain teachings, certain traditions, or takes on teachings, or takes on traditions. And some of this happens in really gross ways. I've heard about certain teachers or authorities in some situation being really quite aggressive and angry even with a student, perhaps in a one-on-one situation or in a small group or in a group of teachers, really aggressive in a kind of anti-religious way, or certainly what we might call anti-soul or anti-spiritual, anti-transcendent kind of approach.

thrust, and I wonder why the aggression, why the anger in this insistence that anything called the unfabricated is rubbish, or that it only confuses people, or that there's just this world, just this flat materiality. They wouldn't use the word "flat," but it's what we might call flat. Why the anger? Why the violence? Why the aggression?

Sometimes what's communicated is conveyed in a very aggressive way, with the throwing around of power or the exertion of power. As we said earlier, questions of epistemology, as Guy Moscovici wrote, are questions of social order. Questions of epistemology, ontology, and cosmology are questions of social order and hierarchy.

So sometimes there is this very obvious use of one's power position to insist on this or that take on epistemology, ontology, cosmology, reality. What's going on there? Is it a personal thing or an ego thing? Like one feels lacking? I don't know. Lacking because one hasn't had certain experiences that other people have? Or is it something else—this kind of grasping at a certain world, a certain cosmology, which is actually more important than anything else, more important than freedom itself? One is grasping at cosmology.

So I'm curious: what goes on? I don't think it happens that much, but when it does, why the anger? Why the pushiness? Why the throwing about of one's power? Why the aggression?

Most of the time, the ways we are affected by these ideas are much more subtle, and the ways we become imprisoned are much more subtle. It's simply that we haven't considered the ways those ideas are influencing us. We haven't considered them fully. We haven't questioned them.

For example, when I was discussing science and its attitude toward emotion—the way emotions were devalued in that epistemology—I contrasted it with my friend's experience of sensing the soul of the moon in an emotionally vulnerable state. That kind of epistemological idea that we absorb, either from science or sometimes from dharma contexts, or the notion that imagination plays no role and has no epistemic value, contrasts sharply with Pauli and Jung's conversations and their beginnings of a theory that actually gave place to archetypal imagination in epistemology and the construction of reality.

But the point is, these ideas work subtly. We don't consciously trace the fact that we tend to dismiss a perception that happens when we're feeling, say, a lot of grief, and we don't give it epistemological validity. We don't trace that dismissal back to the scientific revolution. But it's quite subtle, the way that works.

We've been talking about atomism as well. We may have imbibed that from the tradition. But you might be a practitioner who is not really into a kind of dharma practice and meditation that has any atomistic, reductionist, process view. That's not how you view things. You may be more of a practitioner who's into a warm, kind, open being with the emotions in the body and the connection there. Regarding that: this is what is happening. This is what I'm asked to be with, to meet, to see as it is, to open to.

This is what is happening. This is what is arising for me now—these emotions in the body, this mind state. And then being with the breeze on the cheek when walking outside, or the taste and sight of food. And then maybe there's an opening to nature connection with the food, the soil on the carrots and all that. And all of this is conceived of as what is. All of this is what is, and what one needs to address.

And still the question remains: why limit the life world? Why limit that as the range of what one pays attention to? Why is that worthy of attention or considered real over and above, say, my friend sensing the moon in a certain way? You understand? This is real because it's real—it's an emotion, probably connected with my history, and I feel it in the body. The soil is real, and the carrot and potatoes, and the breeze is real as a sensation.

There's a limit to the life world, a limit to the appearances and experiences that are worthy of paying attention to. Implicit in all that is an epistemology and an ontology. These are considered real, these are considered worthy of attention, and this is how I can relate to them and know them.

That's much more subtle—where we've got that kind of limitation in terms of the scope of the life world, the epistemology, the ontology. It operates more subtly, and we're not even quite sure where we've gotten those ideas from. Often what happens is there's a combination of influences into how we practice, how we think of practice, and how that affects our life. There's the encouragement to deconstruct in this reductionist, atomistic way that we described. There's the absence of any...

There's the absence of any conceptual place for or encouragement of eros, or even the discerning of eros. There's this notion repeated over and over about "what is" and being with things as they are, or being with what is. All of that together may then have, for example, an impact on how we might relate to something like music and the arts.

With this emphasis on deconstruction and no notion of eros, when we're simply concerned with the idea that "what is" is important, we might listen to music, we might even enjoy music, but there's not really a conceptual opening out of the possibilities for music or art. There's no positive place for art or music in this framework. Music might even be regarded dismissively—perhaps new age music is acceptable because it's calming, and maybe that can serve some purpose. But what's the real point of music if we're buying into, or if we've got the constant pull in the background of this emphasis on deconstructing, reductionist, atomistic worldview, with no place for eros and this emphasis on just "what is"? What can't really open now are all the arts.

I'll return briefly to Michel Foucault, who points out quite interestingly in his book The Hermeneutics of the Subject that we can say we enter the modern age—the history of truth enters its modern period—when it is assumed that what gives access to the truth, the condition for the subject's access to the truth, is knowledge and knowledge alone. Truth becomes simply something you either know or you don't. If you acquire the knowledge, then you know what's true.

As he explains, this occurs when the philosopher or scientist, or simply someone who seeks the truth, can recognize the truth and have access to it in himself through his acts of knowledge alone, without anything else being demanded of him and without his having to alter or change in any way his being as a subject. What he means is that it used to be that to have access to the truth, you would need to engage in spiritual practices. You would need to purify your being ethically, intentionally. You'd need to purify your mind. You'd need to work on yourself and your capacity, your ability to actually know the truth. Then something happens and we enter the modern age when it just becomes about whether you know or you don't. You don't need to work on yourself in any way.

This is also interesting in how it translates to Dharma. For a kind of Dharma that essentially—what I might call existentialist Dharma—equates practice with coping with the tragedy of the real world, the impermanence, our existential predicament, Dharma practice essentially becomes coping with that. That's the view of Dharma. There's very little truth to be discovered or ascertained or arrived at that we don't already know, that's not already obvious, and certainly none that requires a difficult course of practices, purifications, and spiritual exercises. Just what we see—for the most part, maybe the self is a process, everything's connected to everything else, but it's not that hard to see. Mostly it's just this existential predicament that is said to be obvious to everyone, and that's what you practice: coping with that in some way.

Truth is still assumed here as the evident reality that one must relate to and cope with. It's just evident what truth is. I would read the Pali Canon as insisting rather that the Dharma is predicated on the difficult practice of gaining insight into reality and truth. That's what the Buddha means by insight into the nature of reality—it's a long journey, it's hard, and it's rare for someone to really go deep in that. Some modern interpretations of the Dharma simply say no, Dharma practice is just coping with this obvious reality of impermanence and the toughness of our existential predicament.

So we have one perspective that has truth with some kind of metaphysical status of objectivity—we can do all these difficult spiritual practices and gain access to the truth that's hard to see, that's concealed from us by our avidya, by our impurities. And the other view is that truth is obvious and practice is learning how to relate to that, how to cope with that.

What happens, I want to ask, what happens to either of these perspectives when truth, or the idea of truth, loses its metaphysical status of objectivity? There is no objective truth that I'm going to arrive at, either because it's pretty obvious anyway and it's just what everyone agrees on in our modern world, or because it's some kind of transcendent, unfabricated reality. What happens to either of these perspectives when the idea of truth loses its metaphysical status of objectivity? And what happens, too, to the notion of care of the soul? This is actually what Foucault's book was about—how knowledge and care of the soul go together so that if we have knowledge of the truth, we're caring for the soul.

In the kind of existentialist, coping approach that I just described, which is quite popular these days in some circles,

What does care of the soul mean? It means learning to cope with the obvious truth. If I learn how to cope—developing the attitudes, reflections, and stances that allow me to navigate this obvious truth and the difficulty of our existential predicament, the tragedy of impermanence—then that learning to cope becomes caring for the soul, caring for the self.

In the transcendent or spiritualist approach, care of the self includes practices that allow the discovery of liberating truth. Because in that view, when I see that transcendent unfabricated reality—that truth which is obscure and requires difficult practice to perceive—when I see that truth, the knowing of it serves to care even more deeply for the self.

So there's care for the self in coping, and that's the limit of self-care in one paradigm. In the other paradigm, there's some coping and development of various capacities, but then seeing the truth becomes the ultimate care for the self. Because that truth liberates me and takes care of me. Or rather, knowing that truth takes care of me—the wisdom that emerges from it, the attitudes, the non-attachment that flows from it.

So I want to ask: what happens to either of these perspectives when truth loses its metaphysical status of objectivity? And what does care—self-care—mean when the self is realized to be empty and not knowable as it is, but dependent on the perspective and way of looking?

We're not saying there is no self. We're saying there are multiple perspectives on what the self is. And what is this self that I'm caring for? Is it the soul as we're discussing? Is it a process? Is it the frightened human being daring to look at the existential predicament and its facticity?

How do these conceptions of Dharma transform when we realize the emptiness of truth, the plurality of truths? And when we also realize that no self-view—no particular conception or perception of self—is ultimately true?

This whole question about knowledge and what it means to care for the self is what Foucault's book traces through history. These are things we care about, wrapped up in Dharma practice. What does it mean to know? What does it mean to care for ourselves, to care for our life? And what does it mean when we open up the notion of truth, see its emptiness, and embrace a plural understanding of truth? When we see that any particular self-view won't be the real, ultimately true take on the self?

To me, when we're no longer gripped by the view of singular objective reality, and when we're no longer caught in believing there's a particular view or conception of self that is the real one, then possibilities open up. The whole realm of our possibilities for practice, for thinking, for perception, for sensing, for exploring becomes available.

One way we can think about care of the self is as care of the soul—in our sense of the word—which means soul-making, because that's what the soul cares most about. We can view care of the self in this way, and we can view knowledge and truth as participatory.

Can we be aware of and understand how ideas of the real—ontological and epistemological assumptions, beliefs, commitments—come into our practice to shape, limit, and direct it? How they influence what practice can be, where it can go, what it can do for us, and what it can open? How they enter our life and experience?

These ideas shape and influence our experiences, our very sense of things—of world, self, others, existence. In that shaping and influencing, they either limit or open, or they limit in certain ways while opening in others. Can we see, recognize, be aware of, and understand this influence of ideas regarding reality?

Jean Baudrillard, the modern French philosopher, said, "The map precedes the territory." Our conceptual frameworks, our ideas, shape the actual landscape we create—the territory we then find ourselves traveling through and experiencing. I can go with that, though it might be somewhat extreme as a view.

There's another writer, Boaventura de Sousa Santos, who writes about epistemic colonialism and epistemicide. He says: "Let's enlarge the present and the space of the world. Let's travel with crude maps. Between theory and action, there may be correspondence, but there is no sequence."

Between theory and practice—between our ideas and conceptual frameworks and how we practice, how we experiment with perception—there may be correspondence, but there is no sequence. He's not as extreme as Baudrillard's "the map precedes the territory." There's a give and take in our practice of sensing the soul. Ideas shape perceptions, shape the sensing.

The sensing that we experience also calls into question ideas, opens them, expands them, suggests new ones.

Isn't that exactly what we're talking about when we describe the soul-making dynamic as the mutual involvement and dialogue and enriching and interpenetration and impact of Eros, Psyche, Logos? Enlarging, being enlarged. The logos—the idea, the concept, the ideas, the conception—influencing the perception, the psyche, what we call the image of things. And the images, the perception of things, the psyche influencing the logos. Included in that is our affect, our emotions, and how they color and push and influence and open different doors, shining different perspectives. The desire and the eros—all of that is included in the way this works, in the way that the territory then opens up, in the way that we discover the territory and construct our maps as we're going. So that could be what Boaventura de Sousa Santos writes—could be a kind of metaphor or encouragement for what we're doing as well.

I haven't focused too much on the direction in relation to all this from the emptiness point of view. But either with—or both with—understanding emptiness very deeply for oneself in practice, the emptiness of all phenomena, and actually that understanding being digested, going deep, maturing and affecting one's outlook and gaining confidence in that perspective. So either with that, or both with that and with this brief sort of questioning or poking a little bit or critique or opening up of these perspectives—ideas that have influenced us: epistemological ideas, ontological ideas, metaphysical ideas, hermeneutic ideas, both socially in terms of their social aspects and their philosophical aspects.

Either from what we've been talking about over the past few hours, or from the emptiness perspective, or even with both—hopefully, or my hope is—that will help create a little more space for us, and a sense of freedom, possibility, legitimacy, to explore this sensing the soul and the range that's possible there. And create, also discover, a kind of ground—a different ground philosophically, in terms of our beliefs and thoughts and ideas—on which it can rest, this sensing the soul.

From here, I hope that some of that is helpful, or at least sprinkles some seeds that may be helpful later on. And then we can go on now to look at specific practice possibilities and the relationship with ideas and how they open up the possibilities in practice.

Let's stop there for now.

CHAPTER 131

Between Ikon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 4 - The Three Characteristics)

Rob Burbea · 1h03

In this fourth part of his series on ideas and hermeneutics in meditation, Rob Burbea examines how Buddhist concepts must become "ways of looking" rather than remaining abstract ideas. He explores the three characteristics (tilakkhana) - dukkha, anicca, and anatta - showing how they can function as meditative lenses that fabricate less when skillfully employed. Through deep practice with these ways of looking, practitioners can discover their radical emptiness and even their apparent opposites: bliss, eternality, and selfhood become available as equally valid perspectives.

Burbea demonstrates how concepts like dependent origination (paticcasamuppada) can be translated from intellectual frameworks into subtle, fluid ways of perceiving that liberate through unfabrication. He emphasizes that these traditional Buddhist categories are not ultimate truths but skillful means - rafts to be used and eventually transcended. The talk reveals how deep emptiness practice or sensing with soul can make perception malleable, allowing dukkha to be seen as perfection, impermanence as eternality, and non-self as divine selfhood. This points toward a more comprehensive understanding of perception as gift and grace, work and opportunity, participation in the divine mystery of incarnation in all appearances.

Our larger theme at the moment is ideas and concepts, and particularly the implication of ideas for sensing with soul—how the ideas we have influence our experience. We talked about how the ideas that we inherit often operate unconsciously and influence, limit, or open certain directions of experience and understanding, affecting whether we sense the soul or not. Ideas unconsciously have that power, and consciously too, of course.

So we want to be talking about what it means to incorporate an idea so that it influences the sensing or opens the sensing, making this or that possible in sensing with soul. Part of all that I'd like to weave in is the relationship between ideas and images, between eidos and ikon, and the place of ideas in sensing the soul. Over the course of the next few talks, I also want to explore what it means to meditate on an idea or with an idea—what that might look like and involve for us.

I want to point out certain specific possibilities and discuss them. We'll start with what will probably be relatively familiar for many of you, but before we even get going, it's important to point out that when I'm using the word idea, sometimes people very easily take that to mean something only or mostly abstract—a certain thought that happens in your head in a way that's abstracted, taken away from the world or particularly the world of perception.

Unfortunately, the way we tend to think about ideas and ideation in our larger culture is not a way that allows them to translate easily into actual ways of looking, into meditations, into perception, into sensing. But that is what I'm really talking about. I'm not particularly interested in ideas that remain purely abstract. What I'm wanting to point to is that ideas can, and in our case should, translate into actual ways of looking that operate in the moment to open or shape the sensing in particular ways.

This skill—to be able to translate ideas into perception, to hold them subtly at the back of the mind so that they become ways of looking—is such an important skill as a human being, especially in terms of practice and what can be possible in practice. Sometimes I think I slightly overestimate what's involved in making that transition, or in people understanding that's what we're talking about. So right from the start, when we say ideas, it's for the sake of their implementation as ways of looking to open up a whole sense of existence—as an actual sense, in the actual senses, not abstracted.

It's interesting—I was thinking about the word reflection. That word also suggests that through an idea or concept, the looking occurs, and what is perceived in the looking is reflected according to that idea or concept. We say "I reflect on an idea" or "I reflect on this or that," and we tend to think of mental cogitation, but the word reflection may have intimations of this idea of reflecting—how the world is reflected through an idea or ideas. The idea is part of what forms the way of looking at any time, and we want to be very agile with that, nimble and facile and dexterous.

There's obviously a limitation to using that word reflection, because it implies a world that's independently existing, that is then reflected in this way according to this idea, or in that way according to another idea. Our logos, our larger conceptual frame, is more in favor of the create-discover model. But that works too, this idea of reflecting.

So when we talk about ideas and concepts, we're talking about something that needs to somehow become a way of looking, needs to be translated into and incorporated literally into a way of looking. And then that way of looking can refine and deepen. This goes for any way of looking. When we get to talking about meditation on ideas, just like any way of looking meditation, they need to move from the clunky and gross into the more subtle. They need to be able to refine, deepen, become more subtle and involve more and more of the being and the levels of the being and the levels of perception. That's the possibility of meditation—to deepen, to refine.

For example, one could have a practice of giving my aggregates to the divinity—to a god or the gods or the divine or the Buddha nature. Perhaps one is tired at the time of doing that practice. So including the tiredness as part of the aggregates that are present, one gives that to the divine. When the sense of self, the I that is giving in that way and that is experiencing the tiredness, when the divine and when the tiredness itself are all somehow seen as empty, or more empty, or less substantial, or more transparent, or void—in some way through some way of looking that sees their emptiness—there's a larger practice there of giving the aggregates to the divine, perhaps back to the divine.

But part of that is that self, divine, and aggregates—including perhaps what everyone is struggling with or feeling joy over or enjoying—all are in some way seen as empty. So there's a larger way of looking and another way of looking, the seeing of emptiness to some level, that's wrapped up in that larger way of looking. You could say it's an amalgamation of a few different ways of looking.

It's actually gone to another level by virtue of some degree of emptiness perception being involved in the giving, in who's giving and what's being given and who it's being given to. When that's the case, then the whole movement, the whole gesture and the whole sense of that idea of giving my aggregates to the divinity deepens. It's deepened by that. It actually becomes much more freeing and much more beautiful and will feel more sacred, generally speaking.

The point really, I could have picked any example, is that there's always this kind of possibility for any way of looking—whether it seems obviously to involve an idea or not—to deepen, to refine, to become more subtle. And also to become more comprehensive. This is possible for most meditations, any way of looking, meditation on an idea, meditation on an image.

If we talk about incorporating emptiness into it, there's a spectrum of how much emptiness is included, or how deep it goes, and anywhere on that spectrum is available as a sort of variation on the larger way of looking. Similarly, we could say if the whole thing is seen as image, imaginally, and there's the middle way of the imaginal where neither real nor not real operates, it will function in a similar way to the emptiness—allowing more beauty, more sacredness, becoming more freeing—in that example of giving my aggregates to the divinity.

I think I've mentioned this before on retreat, perhaps on the re-enchanting retreat: if we were meditating with receiving love or light from a divinity, I would say that rather than being more interested in incorporating more emptiness into the whole gestalt of the view, it's actually quite important to explore all the positions on the self-spectrum. A very solid, contracted, reified self-sense—it's really important that this self-sense (because it's often quite a suffering self-sense) puts itself or feels itself in the stream and bathed in the stream of the divine light and divine love. That's very useful to include, that more solid self-sense and views, but also the less solid senses of self. It's all important.

But generally there's this possibility in any way of looking for it to refine and deepen and open up in that way.

Wrapped up in what we just said is this idea that when we're talking about ideas, they need to come into the way of looking. For that they need to be a bit more subtle. They can't be too gross. For the way of looking to be agile and actually to be able to work in the moment with different conditions and to go deep, the way the idea is incorporated has to be quite subtle.

Sometimes, as an example, we could take the whole idea or conceptual framework of dependent origination that the Buddha came up with—twelve links, or sometimes ten links, or sometimes thirteen. But let's say twelve links. That whole conceptual framework is really a network of ideas. What I've noticed teaching this in different situations with people is that oftentimes people really seem to enjoy the categorization of their experience.

Sometimes I'll do this with a group: sort of look back on some whole scenario of dukkha that transpired perhaps in a social situation or work situation, and use that grid of concepts and the dependent origination, the twelve links there, to file things or categorize things. When that happened, that was a saṅkhāra in the form of previous belief structure or expectation or conditioning. When that moment happened, it was the shrinking of the consciousness. When that moment happened, that was the aversion to the unpleasantness in the contact.

People seem to really quite enjoy doing a bit of a post-mortem on some kind of suffering, or even just a categorization of some made-up situation. There's a way that's helpful because it helps digest that conceptual framework and the concepts that make it up at a certain level. But that, to me, is not full enough understanding.

We can have a feeling—I've touched on this before—we can have a kind of enjoyment that many of us have as human beings when we've fitted this experience to that concept, and we've broken things down, found a way that we can file all the words of what we find in the text and what the Buddha is talking about. We file it: it means this, and that translates as this, and in that situation it meant this. There's a kind of relatively neat filing away of all the concepts. We can sometimes enjoy that and mistake it for the kind of level of understanding that's really going to be liberating, which goes beyond that.

Certainly not just post-mortems on our suffering that has already transpired—that's not really going to help that much. But nor is this just the satisfaction of neatly putting concepts in boxes and neatly mapping them to circumscribed experiences or movements of consciousness in our life.

It can be useful, but actually, what we need to do is live an understanding of dependent origination in ways that liberate. That means translating it to actually become not just a way of looking, but lots of ways of looking in the moment. There is a whole network of concepts there, all the links and all the interconnections. So many, many possible ways of looking are available there from that classic Buddhist teaching of dependent origination.

Again, if we take that map of dependent origination, that network of concepts, a conceptual framework, what can often happen is that someone doesn't just stop at a kind of relatively gross intellectual categorization of what might happen. They don't just stop even with a relatively gross labeling in the present moment of what's going on: "Ah, yes, there's aversion here. Ah, yes, there's selfing here." That kind of observation will be helpful if I catch it in the moment. That's going to be relatively helpful—just there's enough mindfulness there to not get completely sucked into something. It may create a bit more spaciousness, a bit of a breakup of the momentum of the saṃsāric flow.

But there's the possibility of much more: a subtle wielding of the concepts involved, much more subtly incorporated into ways of looking in a much more fluid and agile way. Someone might take it to another level and, for instance, look at the link between vedanā and taṇhā—vedanā and craving—and have a practice derived from that map of dependent origination. From that particular link between vedanā and craving, have a practice of stationing the awareness on unpleasant vedanā, or pleasant vedanā, whatever...

and stationing the awareness on the vedana and observing moment to moment the rapid changing of the vedana itself, or just being with the vedana.

In that kind of intensity and acuity of attention on the vedana, there's a marked slowing down or attenuation of how much craving the vedana then gives rise to, either in aversion or desire to have more or to hold on. So it's a very specific way of looking: stay at the vedana, focus on the vedana as they're happening right now. That very focusing—even if it doesn't have a contemplation of impermanence, just seeing pleasant, unpleasant, pleasant, pleasant, pleasant, whatever it is—will attenuate the craving that comes out of that.

I've talked and written about this in the past. It's a very skillful practice, stationing the awareness on the vedana. Some people, though, take that as the pinnacle of what's possible as a way of looking that might come out of the twelve links, the map of the twelve links of dependent origination. There I would say that actually a lot more is possible, a lot more subtle than that and a lot more liberating than that.

Some people even would say that this is what the experience of an arahant is—that vedana arises, unpleasant or pleasant, whatever, and there is no craving. This kind of practice that we can do of stationing the focus of attention on the vedana, thus having the craving attenuated through the intensity and steadiness of that gaze on the vedana—some people would say that's practicing the way an arahant would see anyway, the way an arahant would experience anyway. That's practicing a state of liberation or arahantship.

But then what can often happen is quite a lot gets clung to in there. One is the view of what awakening is, and the other is just quite what is possible through the translation of those concepts of dependent origination that the Buddha outlined into ways of looking. One limits because one's stopped somewhere—that's it, that's what I need to see now, everything else, there's not much more there. One has stopped the possibilities for this translation of concept and idea into a way of looking.

One of the things I feel is very important as a general statement is that all these Dharma categories—for example, those twelve links of dependent origination: avijja, sankhara, vijnana—delusion, fabrications, fabricating forces, consciousness, perception, all the rest of it, craving—to me, and to many, or at least some Dharma teachers and Buddhist teachers in the history of the wider tradition, they are not truths. They are not ultimate truths.

These categories, these Dharma categories—the twelve links of dependent origination, the three kilesas, the five aggregates, awakening, whatever—all of them, first of all, we can notice how they've been translated and shifted and given different interpretations at different points in the history of Buddhism and different locations in the dissemination of Buddhism over the globe.

But more importantly, they're also empty. We can realize that they themselves do not have inherent existence. So they are not truths. These twelve links, these five aggregates, these three kilesas—they're not ultimate truths.

Even in the Theravadan tradition, Ajahn Buddhadasa used to say everything that's involved in the Four Noble Truths is a relative truth. The twelve links of dependent origination are the Buddha's long-hand version of the second noble truth, the causes for the arising of dukkha. Craving being the shorthand version, clinging being the shorthand version. But the long-hand version is dependent origination in that model. And Ajahn Buddhadasa says this is all relative truth. When you take the raft of the Four Noble Truths and that teaching of dependent origination, you go beyond it.

To me, there's a whole other level here, way beyond that stationing of the attention on vedana, where all the links of dependent origination begin to melt through actually contemplating the very mechanism of dependent origination and what it is. You take that teaching to a deeper and deeper and deeper level. I used to say it's like a snake swallowing its own tail. Maybe better to say is they melt—those concepts melt under the gaze of the understanding of dependent origination, which is the understanding of emptiness.

So they're not truths, they're rafts, they're part of the raft of what the Buddha talked about. They're skillful means, they're relative truths that can be helpful when they are translated into ways of looking. The worst thing would be to cling to them intellectually as truths and statements about "this is my philosophical position on what life is," when they haven't actually become really fertile and really taken this journey into depth and radicality that they can when they're translated into ways of looking that bring levels of freedom dependent on the levels in which that translation has actually been worked by the practitioner.

So as an example—and I don't know whether I've mentioned this anywhere else in a talk—the three kilesas were picked out, the three defilements. The Buddha used to say these are three fires you have to put them out: greed, aversion, delusion.

In a way, he was responding to the spiritual culture at his time in India, which was dominated by the Vedic teachings and the Brahminical teachings. In the Vedic and Brahminical religions, they used to burn three fires, and the idea was to keep them burning. The Buddha came along and said you've got to put them out.

Now, we could say, well, if he happened to be in a different spiritual culture or time where they had, say, four fires or two fires, would that have shaped his teaching of the Dharma? Would he say there are four or two kilesas? Because he was really spinning something taken for granted in people's spiritual understanding—he was just spinning it the other way, the way Jesus would do things.

When he says, in different teachings, it's a kind of, "Hey, think about this." So you see the historical conditioning even of the original Buddhist teachings there.

From many angles, we can see these dharma concepts are not an absolute ultimate truth. They're for the sake of becoming ways of looking. They're optional lenses that we can put down, pick up, and go for a ride on. Sometimes I call them avenues, which is something I'll come to in a minute.

We use them so that they become ways of looking, ways of sensing. Something like the teaching of dependent origination with those links—as I said, there's a whole plethora of potential ways of looking that can be extracted or constructed from those concepts. They are taken at different levels.

Actually, that leads me on to something else. I said I would start with some familiar ideas, and so we touched on dependent origination. I didn't really mean to go into that so much, but what about the three characteristics? Tilakkhana in Pali, trilakshana in Sanskrit.

The three characteristics, sometimes called the three marks of existence, has become quite a common Buddhist category. So dukkha, anicca and anatta. Dukkha meaning suffering or unsatisfactoriness really. Anicca, impermanence. And anatta either usually translated as not-self, or not belonging to a self. Sometimes it's translated as "there is no self," and occasionally it's translated to refer to what I would call the emptiness of inherent existence of phenomena.

What I would like to open up—and some of you will be familiar with me saying this from before—is just to point out that we can relate to these three characteristics, three marks, as facts, as realities or truths. The truth of everything is that it is dukkha. So even if something is pleasant, it's not going to be finally satisfactory, and hence it's unsatisfactory. The truth of anything at all is that it's impermanent, and it's not self, or it doesn't belong to myself.

So we can take them as facts, these three characteristics, and make that either just an abstract philosophy or a kind of attitude to life, or take them as facts and plug them in as meditations and go a bit deeper than just a general life attitude. As facts, they're part of what some modern philosophers call the facticity of our existence—the sort of unavoidable, hard realities of our existential predicament. Unsatisfactoriness, impermanence, and this absence of a kind of self-essence to ourselves.

So one can look at them as facts and part of the facticity of our existential situation, or one can pick up these three characteristics as ways of looking. And then they have to be meditative lenses, meditative tools, and it will turn out, meditative avenues.

I've pointed out elsewhere that oftentimes they're given or referred to as anicca, dukkha and anatta—three characters, three marks. Lakkha or lakshana in Sanskrit. But sometimes the Buddha referred to them, or when he was talking about them, he talked more in terms of what I would call a way of looking. So he talks about dukkha, anicca and anatta saññā—perception, perceiving, perceiving in those terms. Or dukkha, anicca or anatta anupassanā, which means a kind of observing, looking at, contemplating, considering or viewing. Passanā, anupassanā, is to view, which would translate very well to ways of looking.

So anicca as a way of looking—what does that mean? Probably familiar with my teachings about this, it's like looking, plugged into, focusing on, attentive to, interested primarily in, in that moment, the impermanence of things, and just sustaining that as a lens. All I'm interested in now is the impermanence. It might be long-scale impermanence—the impermanence of vast stretches of time, or ordinary time scales, or very, very micro time scales—but all I'm wanting to see, over and over, when I've got that way of looking, those lenses on, is impermanence.

Or anatta—just not self, not me, not mine. I just sustain that for a period: half an hour, ten minutes, an hour, whatever it is. And what happens? Where does it take me? It's a way of looking rather than a truth. As I employ it as a way of looking, I let it unfold. I don't a priori fix a limit on what I will see or what that lens will reveal to me.

Similarly with dukkha—it's just unsatisfactory. And there's another way of doing it I'm not going to go into now.

Then the question becomes: when I look this way, what happens to my experience? What happens to appearances? What happens to perception?

Here we find ourselves with a choice. On one side lies the possibility of taking these three characteristics as facts. And what will happen if we follow this path? If I plug them in as established truths—not leaving them abstract, not employing them as ways of looking but deciding they are facts—I've already placed a limit on them. There will be some degree of less fabrication, certainly less clinging, because when I see things are unsatisfactory, I naturally let go. I'm moving through this very quickly, as I've explored these territories elsewhere many times.

There will be a little less clinging, perhaps quite a lot less clinging, and less fabrication of perception. But when I leave these characteristics more open-ended and employ them as ways of looking, something far more profound can unfold. There can be actually a lot less fabrication. I embark on a genuine journey with these ways of looking.

Because I've adopted what we're calling the phenomenological approach, I'm positioned differently. I'm actually looking for the effects on perception and the effects on fabrication. So I begin to really notice—oh, with these ways of looking, there is less fabrication. What I perceive, what appears, depends on the ways of looking. These ways of looking fabricate much less.

How much less? I simply keep going with them. And I discover that with anicca to some degree, with dukkha more so, but with anatta even more profoundly, these ways of looking can take me deep into an unfabricating state of much, much less fabrication. Because I'm connecting fabrication and ways of looking, I begin to understand that phenomena are empty.

I develop this skill, expanding my range with these three ways of looking. I see more and more phenomena dependently arising—empty of inherent existence. What this accomplishes is a kind of coming full circle in understanding. I began with ways of looking simply as an experiment, agreeing that yes, we can look at things differently. But because I see their radical and total emptiness, I return to ways of looking in a way that validates the entire idea and practice at a completely different level.

Because things are thoroughly empty, we're left with nothing but ways of looking. Phenomena don't exist independent of the way of looking. I look this way—a phenomenon appears like that, then disappears. I look that way—it disappears, something different emerges, through all the gradations in between.

This whole journey into emptiness liberates and legitimizes and opens up the entire possibility of conceiving practice as a playing with ways of looking.

Let me explore this more specifically. Either through developing some understanding and practice of emptiness, or through developing jhana practice—even just the first three or four jhanas—if one gains some mastery in the jhanas, something remarkable becomes possible. Where there is pain in the body, you can simply decide to see it as bliss, as happiness or pleasure. And the perception, the appearance, the sensation of the vedana actually changes.

So either through moving toward mastery of jhana practice—and not everyone will teach what I'm discussing now—or through some understanding of emptiness, you come to realize just how malleable perception is. This malleability is intimately related to ways of looking.

Here's pain in my knee or back. This transformation doesn't happen every time, isn't possible all the time, but just the fact that it's possible quite frequently can profoundly impact both understanding and being. You come to see how malleable the perception of vedana truly is. So dukkha—what the Buddha calls dukkha-dukkha, the dukkha of plain pain—begins to become relativized. Is it necessarily that? No. I can look at it and see it, feel it as something different, as pleasure, as bliss, as whatever arises.

Moving further into understanding emptiness, one begins to see the emptiness not just of phenomena but of all phenomena—anything, even micro-phenomena, mental phenomena, momentary phenomena. One sees the emptiness of all phenomena and also the emptiness of time itself.

Seeing all this together, understanding it, feeling it, sensing it in one's practice—where does this leave the notion of impermanence as truth? Where does it leave that characteristic? If time is empty and things are empty, can I really speak about the impermanence of things? Even micro-phenomena, even a moment of vedana—it no longer stands up as ultimate truth.

As we take these whole ways of looking—these three characteristics—deeper into practice, extraordinary fruit can emerge if we truly take our time to develop them, cultivating the art and everything they can involve.

Through the profound emptiness understanding that can emerge, or through what we've been calling sensing with soul, something remarkable becomes possible: we find ourselves able to regard phenomena—even what would typically be classified as dukkha—as perfect. I spoke of this when discussing my illness and cancer, the possibility of dying, and how sensing with soul revealed the whole situation as perfect. This arose directly from sensing with soul, but we can also arrive at this understanding through emptiness practice, because of the malleability that emerges—the capacity to see phenomena as bliss. Those familiar with Vajrayana teachings will recognize this seeing of all phenomena as bliss, though there are different levels and colors of meaning here that I won't explore right now.

Consider what I call the dukkha of finitude. Things feel unsatisfactory because they're finite and limited—finite in time, so impermanent, but also bounded in scope. We sense things, whether outer or inner, subtle or gross, as having hard edges, rigid boundaries, as sharply defined. This characterizes our habitual perception. There's dukkha simply because things have finitude in time—they're impermanent—and because they can't ultimately satisfy. I'll outgrow this thing, desire something different, seek what lies beyond its limitations.

Yet through sensing with soul or through deep emptiness understanding, we begin to see and sense things as infinite. Remember that soft edge, that elastic boundary of how things appear when we sense with soul? Through the soul-making dynamic—eros pushing further into the image and logos, expanding the psyche and logos of any phenomenon—it's no longer finite. It becomes infinitely expandable, infinitely dimensionalized.

When we see the emptiness of phenomena, those hard edges that seem to separate one thing from another, from us, from all else, reveal themselves as illusory. Because a thing can be seen as no longer carrying the unsatisfactoriness of finitude, we can look at it and declare: this is not dukkha, this is perfect, this is bliss, this is divine.

Similarly, while we can certainly see a thing's impermanence, through seeing the emptiness of time itself, or the emptiness of phenomena, or through sensing it iconically—sensing with soul and touching that timeless, eternal quality—we can just as validly see the opposite. Yes, it's impermanent, but it's also somehow eternal.

Just as we can see something as dukkha or as the complete opposite of dukkha, we can see it as impermanent or as eternal, iconic. These ways of looking become available to us. The very characteristic flips into its opposite.

With anatta—not-self—having seen the emptiness of all phenomena and the emptiness of all self-views, we become free to entertain, to play with, to enter into any self-view whatsoever. Everything becomes available because it's all empty. It's not that one self-view is acceptable—say, seeing self as process—while another is illusion. Any self-view becomes workable. We can move from anatta to atta, from no-self to self, and we're simply playing. Ways of looking open infinitely.

So these characteristics function as doors or gates rather than ultimate truths or final goals. They are doorways to that avenue of less and less fabrication, to the radical understanding of emptiness that emerges from such investigation, and to the liberation that flows from that understanding.

What exactly is liberated when we see the profound emptiness of things? We can still employ these characteristics in their more conventional meanings and applications. When I contemplate impermanence while simultaneously knowing that time isn't ultimately real, the practice can actually deepen in terms of liberative efficacy. Impermanence itself isn't real, yet I'm still looking at impermanence—and this takes the investigation to an entirely different level.

Or I can veer away from impermanence altogether, focusing instead on eternality, or total emptiness, or any number of possibilities.

One possible meaning of lakshana is "the act of aiming"—not the goal or target of aiming, but the act itself, the dynamic process rather than the static endpoint. I'm not interested in playing etymological games or insisting on particular interpretations, but I view etymology poetically, as something to explore creatively.

In this act of aiming, it's possible that the arrow takes us on a journey, emerging eventually in what appears to be the very opposite of what we originally aimed toward. This kind of reversal of original teachings appears frequently in Vajrayana traditions—like discovering treasure in the kleshas, as we've seen with the three characteristics here.

Lakshana in Sanskrit can also mean the sign or line that one draws—that one creates—on ground prepared for sacrifice. Again, we can understand this as creation rather than discovery of pre-existing reality. It's a way of looking rather than a facticity, a creation designed to open or discover holiness.

I'm not claiming this as historical etymological fact, but these meanings resonate with our exploration of the characteristics as creative, liberating tools rather than fixed metaphysical truths.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 7/8). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

So, with these three original characteristics—dukkha, anicca, and anatta—it's almost like they can become their opposites. Again, not as truths, not as ultimate truths. Rather as weighted looking.

When we're talking about ideas in the bigger picture, we can also explore what ideas we have about perception itself. What are our ideas about perception? How much do these ideas shape our experience? Often they remain unconsidered, inherited from the legacy and influence of dominant culture or historical conditioning.

What are our ideas, or what are the possible ideas we might cultivate if we become more conscious and till that soil, turn that soil as I've spoken of? What are the possible ideas we can have about perception?

We can have perception as simply factual—the idea, either unconsciously or deliberately embraced, that perceiving means you just perceive what's factually there. You perceive the truth of reality out there in the world. Remember when I spoke about different skillful modes of sensing? There's an overlap here. That's one skillful mode of sensing. When I need to accomplish something in the world, I sometimes enter this mode—it's factual, functional. It's not merely automatic, but deliberately engaged.

But I could hold another idea about perception: that its purpose, aligned with the ways of looking, is to deconstruct. This is what the Buddha was pointing toward. Deconstruct. "You should smash, destroy the aggregates," he says. Deconstruct them through the way of looking so that there is eventually an opening. So there's less and less fabrication and eventually an opening to the unfabricated. One goes beyond the world, so to speak.

This represents a wholly different idea about perception—that perception is a delusory construct, or certainly a problematic construct, and one can break free of it or see through it, going beyond this world of avijja and fabricated perception.

Or, touching again on what we've explored, one could say that perception serves the function of operating in and coping with the world. Or the idea about perception is that there's a play that's possible, an art that's possible—the creation and discovery of all kinds of landscapes and vistas, appearances, perceptions, experiences. For what? For the sake of soul-making. This would be another view.

There are many possible views, ideas, concepts about what perception is and what it's for. One possibility is playing with perception in service of creating and discovering what opens soul-making.

Contrasting what I just described—one whole attitude and idea related to perception being that it's simply reality, flatly perceived truth and fact that one copes with skillfully—there's another possibility. In Jewish mystical tradition, there's the concept of tikkun olam, healing the world, or restoration of the world. This can also mean restoration of the universe. We hopefully engage in acts and service and speech and behavior that heal the world.

But there's also the level of healing the perception of the world—redeeming it from soullessness, flatness, lack of divinity, lack of beauty in perception. So yes, hopefully we make beautiful things in the world, offer beautiful things, speak beautiful things, sing beautiful things into being. But also in the eye of the beholder, in the creation and discovery of soul-making perception, we can create beauty and heal the perception of the world.

I want to explore different possible ideas about perception, or ways of understanding and conceiving what perception is. And by this, I mean not just abstract concepts. One can actually have a sense, a felt sense and conception of perception as gift and grace.

By this I don't mean only the passive receptivity of sense organs to impinging vibrations of air creating sound, or photons and waves of light on the retina—that simple receptivity. I mean gift and grace as all the fullness and open-endedness of what that might mean when infused with soul. Something we're receiving. Sometimes it feels like the soul has designs for us, gives us something.

And we receive a certain perception from soul. Some experience opens up, some way of relating to the world is given to us. So there is that real felt sense, a conception wrapped up with a felt sense of perception as gift and grace that's possible.

Or one can put the emphasis more on my work, if you like. So gift and grace—a second possibility of conception and a felt sense of perception is as work. Because of the potential malleability of perception through ways of looking, I can work in the moment, and practice is possible. Work is possible to fabricate or unfabricate or shape perception of self, other, world, etc. And again, what for? What for? What's the end there? Always back to this question, what's the end? What do you want? And that might vary in different situations. That's part of what a larger view of skill might mean.

So gift and grace as a conception, a felt sense of what perception is. Work—perception as work, something that I work at, something that I am working at, something that takes a bit of effort. But also as opportunity, as a third possibility. And opportunity comes etymologically from porta, which means door. So perception as a door, as we said with the three characteristics, doors to possibilities. Now that's implicit in the whole idea of working and maybe even in the idea of gift and grace, because there's an opportunity to know perception as gift and grace, as participation in the divine.

That's another sense of perhaps a refinement of the gift and grace idea—we're participating in the divine through our perception. I've touched on all this before, I'm not sure when, but this sort of participation in the divine in our existence is through, certainly through embodied action, but it's also through our perception and our experience itself.

A teacher, ancient teacher from the Eastern Orthodox tradition, Maximus the Confessor, his name was, wrote: "God, the divine logos, wishes to affect the mystery of his incarnation always and in all things." The divine wishes to affect the mystery of its incarnation always and in all things. And we can hear that and take that word incarnation loosely, or with a lot of breadth as to what it might mean. And part of that is we can hear the divine wishes to affect the mystery of its appearance, of its appearing always and in all things—always and in all things.

Whatever the perception is, there's this possibility through our participation, through all this—either the gift and grace or the opportunity or the work of perception. Through our participation, we participate in the divine which wishes to affect the mystery, to appear, to incarnate, always and in all things.

And in a way, that's, one could say, the whole point of tantric teachings. The whole point of Vajrayāna is, from a certain point of view, you could say, to see appearances as divine, which is how a Buddha sees them. To become a Buddha, which means partly to see appearances as divine. It's just in the Vajrayāna tradition, as we've received it, it may be that they're kind of relatively circumscribed, limited and generic kind of options for what that actually is then experienced as, what that divinity, how that divinity is experienced, or the kinds of experience of divinity. And in the work that we're doing, Sensing the Soul, we're actually opening up more possibilities, potentially infinite possibilities.

So when we talk, if we go back to the three characteristics, we can consider them as fact. We can consider them as kinds of ways of looking that are in the service of and for the sake of deconstructing, unfabricating. And the question is just how deep do we go down that avenue? How deep do we go with those ways of looking into deconstruction, into unfabrication?

And there is the possibility to go very deep with that or just a kind of very limited depth of unfabricating. And we can go so deep with them that they begin to deconstruct themselves. Impermanence begins to lose its meaning. It begins to be revealed not as an ultimate truth, etc., and the others too. And then they themselves, those three characteristics, are kind of loosened as concepts.

And here we have again an instance where a journey of deconstruction, a movement of deconstruction, can then, when it goes deep enough, then makes available the opportunities for reconstruction as perceiving of divinity, of sacredness, of bliss, of perfection, of eternality, etc. Those kinds of opposites which are very commonly found in Vajrayāna teachings.

CHAPTER 132

Between Ikon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 5 - Bodhicitta)

Rob Burbea · 1h00

> In this profound dharma talk from The Mirrored Gates series, Rob Burbea examines how fundamental Buddhist ideas shape our practice and perception. He critically explores the popular notion of 'living life to the full' as a practice goal, questioning whether conventional mindfulness approaches truly encompass life's dimensionality and infinite potential for meaning.
>
> Burbea then turns to bodhicitta - the aspiration to attain awakening for all beings - investigating how this Mahayana ideal functions both as devotional practice and imaginal engagement. He explores the rich ambiguity of Tathagatagarbha (Buddha nature), showing how different interpretations can become ways of looking that transform perception of self and others. Through careful analysis of Sanskrit etymology, he demonstrates how 'all beings are tathagatagarbha' can mean we are Buddha's womb, hidden treasure, or born from Buddha - each offering unique contemplative possibilities.
>
> The talk distinguishes between generic spiritual ideals and the deeply personal process of individuation, drawing on Jungian concepts and philosopher Nikolai Hartmann's insights on personality development. Burbea emphasizes how authentic spiritual development requires personal resonance with values and images, leading to one's unique 'angel out ahead' rather than universal archetypes. This exploration reveals the intimate relationship between eidos (idea) and icon (image) in transformative practice, showing how soulful engagement with concepts can open infinite dimensions of meaning and beauty.

So three characteristics—a kind of classical Buddhist teaching that many of you will be familiar with.

If we briefly move to a much more modern kind of idea and vocabulary, consider the concept of "living life to the full." I've heard that a fair amount, and sometimes it's conveyed as the point of practice—that the point of practice is to live life to the full.

I heard this in a talk one time, years ago, and someone was describing a walk that they'd done when they were on retreat at Gaia House. He was describing how something had been going on in his mind in preparing for this walk. Perhaps it was towards the end of the retreat and it was a longer walk, and he was trying to arrange the perfect experience or day as he was transitioning out of retreat. In doing so, he actually missed the opportunity to be present to the trees and the breeze on his walk, because he was busy figuring out how he was going to have the perfect day. This was in the context of explaining and emphasizing living life to the full as the aim or purpose of the path in practice. I've come across that idea in quite a few places.

Again, it's an idea. There's quite a lot involved in it. Maybe just to say a few things about it: Is that idea of living life to the full, as it's commonly conveyed or commonly understood—because a person might mean a certain thing by it and someone else understands something differently—but as it's either commonly meant or commonly understood, is it actually living life to the full?

It's quite a big phrase, living life to the full. What might be missing? What's involved in that phrase and what's left in that idea and what's left out?

If this person had been walking and perhaps consumed in thinking or outrage at some political injustice, or trying to understand something in the Dharma, would that be disqualified from living life to the full because they were really wrapped in that? Or is it dependent on how mindful one was of the experience? Like, "I really know now I'm doing this thinking," versus just being lost in it. Does that influence whether we consider it as living life to the full or not?

If one was walking and lost in nature, is that living life to the full or not? It's somehow wrapped up in the way we hear it or the way it's communicated—somehow being related to mindfulness in a modern sense. But it's not quite clear, to me at least.

What is clear is that the more usual notions of being present or being mindful do not imply or include a sensitivity to or a perception of anything more than what we've been calling the flatly material in nature, or an attention that is more than flatly sensual. There's a kind of uni-dimensionality, or very limited dimensionality, to the sensitivity and the perception.

Although there is awareness of mental movements that might be happening at the same time, or awareness of how one is interacting with the experience—with aversion, with craving, with thinking, with planning—dimensionality in that kind of presence or awareness or mindfulness, as it's commonly understood, is missing or limited. Sometimes it's even construed as an awareness that excludes or shaves off any sense of dimensionality. We're just cutting off and being really simple, focusing on the bare actuality of it all.

One could say—and some people would want to be all-inclusive and open and say—"Oh, but seeing or sensing the dimensionality and divinity of things can be or even is included in that mindfulness and in living life to the full." But the fact is, however it's not mentioned much at all. We don't really have that language yet in the wider culture. It's not mentioned much about dimensionality and divinity in the wider culture, but also in our teaching culture.

When we use common phrases like "being present to the moment" or "the touch of life" or "the breeze on the cheek"—we use those phrases quite a lot as teachers—if we only use those phrases and talk that way, then it may be that those phrases carry with them, in the minds and souls of the speakers and the listeners, all kinds of fantasies and ideas, cosmologies and visions of awakening. Again, sometimes they're spelled out and sometimes they're not. Again, I'm talking about how pervasive and subtle can be the ways that ideas come into the way we communicate, the way we think, the way we listen, the way we speak.

But I would say that probably the more dominant interpretation or framework underpinning and connected with that kind of language—being present to the moment, being open to the touch of life, being present to the breeze on the cheek and all that—is more implicitly materialist, simply sensual in the sense of truncating or cutting off any kind of dimensionality in the way that we would use that word. It's what I would call a modernist understanding. It's shot through with or undergirded by a modernist understanding. Or sometimes a simply unitive understanding—some kind of mystical oneness is going on—even if the speaker is meaning something different, a person hears it that way.

These are the common ideas that influence this kind of language or the concepts that we often use when we're talking about mindfulness, the phrases that we often use when we're talking about mindfulness.

Someone who is listening from the perspective of those more common views won't have their perspectives and ideas challenged or expanded if we just stick to those same phrases. Someone who might be open to perceiving dimensionality is not really having that openness and those ways of looking supported by the teachings unless it's explicitly mentioned, unless it's drawn out, elaborated on, filled out, pointed out.

Usually the sensing of dimensionality—that level of experience and that potential function of mindfulness—is not being drawn out, not being legitimized, not being given value, not being prioritized, amplified, explained, or understood more widely, because it's not being articulated. The ideas don't get a chance to function as seeds because it's not being drawn out in the communication.

And as I said, some people would say, "Well, good, because that kind of business about dimensionality doesn't have any place at all in the Four Noble Truths." And then we're back to this whole debate about what is awakening and what are the Four Noble Truths and where does soul-making fit with them. I've been through all that.

But we could ask, living life to the full—come back to that, living life to the full. Am I living life to the full if the soul dynamic of eros-psyche-logos and its mutual insemination, expansion, and so forth is cramped and blocked? How full—whatever that means—how full can such a life be? That soul-making dynamic is a part of life. Even if we've never heard of it, even if it's only functioning in a limited way, it's part of life. It's part of how the psyche works, we could say.

And as I've pointed out before, without the expansion of psyche and logos, then the eros and the pothos can only expand outwards, horizontally, at the same level, and flatly, unidimensionally, to more and more, trying to get more and more experience at that same level, or of the same kind, or whatever. So then living life to the full becomes about, "Now I'm going to bungee jump," and what are they called—bucket lists, and all that, and travelling more widely. Or it becomes an endlessness of this kind of one-dimensional mindfulness, flat mindfulness, so-called presence to a so-called or so-seeming reality that's actually limited in depth.

Actually, what happens—long-term practitioners of mindfulness or presence or whatever, as it's so conceived—many of them begin to want more than that. I'm talking about people who have been practicing really for some years. It depends a lot on the soul type as well, on the eros, and I've talked about that elsewhere. But many long-term practitioners who are practicing in that kind of way—where the mindfulness or the present or whatever you're going to call it doesn't have a dimensionality and that ongoing opening of the neurofantasy is not supported—they begin to want something more than that kind of mindfulness and presence.

So in most cases, in a lot of those cases, they'll begin to explore other paths. Either they'll change paths or they'll use other paths that have a bit more psychological richness or a bit more allowance of something a bit more erotic or whatever it is, or devotional or this or that. Or they get into more study. "Let's say I really want to study mindfulness." And again, without being aware that study itself is imbued with fantasy, that one is soul-making in the study. It's not just "I want to kind of intellectually understand more" if the study is really rich. But there's often a blindness behind—there's not the questioning or realizing fully what is behind this movement to want to expand from just this flatly conceived sense of presence or mindfulness.

So in this idea of living life to the full, which can be, for some people, quite a commonly used idea—question: How do I know it's full? What does that mean? Full means it's reached its maximum. Living life to the full—how do I know that you're... How do you know that it's full, that it's reached its maximum? How do you know that more is not possible? What does it mean? And I don't just mean more flatly, horizontally. How do you know that more of even what life actually means is not possible? So what is included in this fullness that one alludes to, if one's using that phrase or hearing that phrase?

Fullness, to me, must include meaningfulness. And as we touched on earlier, much earlier in this course, meaningfulness means more than only actualizable meanings or purposes. So they're important in our life too. I had this purpose, I achieved it, or whatever, and that's a meaning for me. But meaningfulness must actually be something infinite and not ever finally achievable. It always is bigger than what I can achieve. And wrapped up in meaningfulness or wrapped together are meaningfulness and fantasy or image. And as we said, that also has a beyond to it.

So, but even still, it's like living life to the full—if it includes meaningfulness, then wrapped up in meaningfulness with something of fantasy and image, and then it's no longer that flat thing anymore. And we could also ask, you know, really what we're saying is, what is life in this version? Living life to the full—what is life? What's included in this vision or idea both of full and life? And again, what is not included or not even intuited as a possibility, not even admitted as a possibility.

So one of the things with that is the whole notion of what life is, and related to what life is, is what is the world? Because we live life in the world.

So this "living life to the full" takes its place in a particular historical context, and you can hear it resonating with our contemporary sensibilities. It's not something you would ever encounter in the Pali Canon - this notion of living life to the full, tasting life fully, or anything resembling that. It's fundamentally a modernist conception, and that's precisely why it feels so comfortable to people and makes such immediate sense. "Oh, that's what mindfulness is for," they think.

This stands in stark contrast to the traditional understanding, where mindfulness serves the purpose of ending rebirth, of transcending all fabrication of perception, unfabricating completely so that one might know the transcendent unfabricated. The ultimate goal was to reach a point where one would not be reborn into the world of fabrication at all - not into any perception whatsoever. This is hardly a common modern aspiration.

Wrapped up with this "living life to the full" is a particular relationship, view, and stance toward the world - both in terms of how we relate to the world and how we understand practice in relationship to the world. Embedded within it, I believe, is a massive toning down or outright reversal of any kind of aversion to the world, any anti-eros toward the world. Instead, there's a modicum of allowance for, or inclusion of, a certain amount of what we might call relish or juiciness with regard to the world.

This is what makes it attractive to us, because in modernist times, most people don't really embrace this notion of getting beyond the world. There's something present here - we could almost call it eros, though in quite a limited sense. There's a view and relationship with the world, a certain stance toward the world, that's more common and therefore more easily popular these days.

So while it's not quite eros in the way we would fully understand it, there's some kind of mild erotic connection between self and world, between life and world. But if the eros is really large - and I've spoken about this before - if it grows bigger through the fertilizing of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic in the ways we've described, then one can have, and will have at some point, both an eros for the world and an eros for the beyond, the transcendent, the unfabricated.

The eros for the world, when it becomes wrapped up in and allowed to invigorate and catalyze the soul-making dynamic of eros-psyche-logos, will begin to reveal dimensions to the world, to ourselves, to others. A kind of divine immanence will come forth through, in, with, and as that dimensionality - not as something beyond the world, but in, through, and with the world itself. Simultaneously, there will be eros for the transcendent.

When a person has big eros, or when their eros is allowed to become large and is worked with so that it grows, there won't be merely this attitude of mild erotic connection with something called "life and the world." There will be something much fuller than that. There won't be just that mild eros for life and the world coupled with an abhorrence for a beyond, a transcendent beyond. Instead, there will be, in some mysterious way, what Bella might call both world rejection and world affirmation - both erotic thrusts, both erotic openings and desires.

As I've said, when eros is allowed to stimulate and then become involved and enriched and deepened and widened in the soul-making dynamic, life and the world begin to gain dimensions. They begin to be perceived imaginally, as image in all that this means, and they become infinite in this way. This happens precisely for the reasons I mentioned when we were discussing dukkha - because things don't have sharp and hard edges. They possess this infinity of possible dimensions and soft, elastic boundaries.

Life and the world become infinite in this manner, and we find ourselves attracted to that infinity there. In this context, fullness is not something static or achievable. But it's also possible that there's eros for the unfabricated, and then there's that particular kind of fathomlessness and infinity - if we can call it that - belonging to the unfabricated. Both are possible.

So loving life comes to mean more and more - it comes to embrace more and more. I don't simply mean embracing more and more experiences because we learn to be mindful or present to a greater range of experiences. It certainly comes to mean much more than vivaciously enjoying good times and the sensual and interesting pleasures and experiences available to many human beings today, provided they're affluent enough.

That kind of loving life—the zest some people have for going to parties and dinner parties and skiing and going to beaches and wild water swimming and fine dining—can mean way more than that. As it becomes ensouled, loving life means something much more expansive. It may come to mean being deeply and widely and reverently attuned to the beauty and to the mystery of being. It may mean endlessly discovering and creating an infinity of dimensions of beauty and mystery in life.

Yet it's so deeply profound that it's not only life, but the whole of existence, to which one is keenly, profoundly, devotedly receptive. In the sensing of the soul, in the movement and love of soul-making, and in that whole relational stance, attitude, and poise that it favors and opens up, this becomes the inclination. One is attuned to the whole of existence in this profound and devoted receptivity, openness, and sensitivity.

That whole of existence includes death. So that in loving life so deeply, one is not afraid to let its appearances fade. One is not afraid to let go into death. Loving life, if that really opens for us, means loving life and death. It's more than only accepting death we're talking about, because a true love, a soul love, ensouls all that it embraces, all that it touches. So death too is ensouled—it becomes image, becomes deeply and endlessly beautiful, a deep and endless mystery. All of this is opened again by the journey into deep unfabricating and by the sensing with soul.

We get these ideas, and again they influence us and may limit what our practice is, and also how we sense existence, and then how we live our life. Another idea that many of you will be familiar with is mostly used in the Mahayana traditions—it's spreading now, though it originally came from the Pali Canon. This is the aspiration of bodhicitta. That can actually be delineated as having two aspects: there's an ultimate bodhicitta and there's a relative bodhicitta. The ultimate bodhicitta is actually the realization of emptiness. The ultimate Buddha mind is bodhicitta—the ultimate awakened mind is the understanding and the perception of emptiness.

Relative bodhicitta is what most people are more familiar with: the aspiration to attain awakening, to attain Buddhahood for the sake of all sentient beings, so that one can serve them. Certainly the relative bodhicitta—and in some meanings also the ultimate—is based on the notion of Buddha nature, or tathagatagarbha in Sanskrit. It's because we have Buddha nature that there's the possibility we can become awakened and become Buddhas and serve other beings. But this tathagatagarbha, this Buddha nature, has really widely different meanings. It's used in very different ways across even just the Mahayana traditions.

What I'm interested in with this idea are a few things. One is: how does this work for us? This aspiration, if it's something that's alive for you—this bodhicitta aspiration, if it's actually part of your practice. For some people it will be, and for others, not really, and that's fine. But if it is, how does it function?

Here I think one of the things going on worth pointing out is the involvement of idea in image, or sometimes the possibility of them being interchangeable. In aiming at or aligning ourselves with or being devoted to something more than this life—usually the bodhicitta aspiration is viewed over lifetimes, the notion that I'm on a track that will ripen in awakening and Buddhahood in future lifetimes—is that aligning, is that aiming, is that devotion to something more than this life living life to the full?

If I don't think of it in terms of future lives, then just the value and the ideal of that kind of self-giving, that kind of outpouring, that kind of serving and dedication, that kind of goodness—there's a kind of ultimacy, a kind of ultimate value, an ultimate ideal there. If that's what's going on in the aiming and aligning and devotion, that being meaningful to you, then again, is it living life to the full? Because it's more to do with something that either ripens beyond this life, or that in the very ultimacy of the value and the ideal, it kind of is beyond what can actually fully be reached ever.

I mentioned—I think I mentioned, but I'll come back to it because I feel it's an important thread to weave through—goodness, beauty, love, whatever, these values have kind of no limit to them. They always have a beyond. They're always transcendent of wherever we are.

To aim at, to align oneself with, to be dedicated to and devoted to those ideals that are wrapped up in the bodhicitta aspiration—to be moved by them—this must be reflected in my life. It's quite possible that someone could simply mouth the bodhicitta aspiration and then live a completely unscrupulous life without any dedication to other beings. But it needs to translate into something real. We're talking about that which moves my heart, moves my soul, something I can feel my being aligned with.

I practice bowing to that, aligning my being, sitting in the dedication, sitting in the devotion, kneeling toward that ideal, feeling the reverberation of my being, my heart, my soul, my energy body with this ideal of bodhicitta aspiration. I can feel the meaningfulness of that, the beauty of it, the effect it has on my soul, on my energy body, on my heart.

This must translate somehow into life—into how I choose to live, what I choose to do, in the widest possible way. Or there must at least be attempts in one's life to live in the direction of that ideal. But it is just a direction. Either because it cannot ripen in this lifetime—I cannot possibly become a Buddha in this life, especially if I hold a Mahayana conception of Buddha—or because, being primarily a conglomeration of values and thus an idea, it has something that is beyond. Values always have a transcendent dimension. We cannot possibly fulfill these kinds of values. However good I am, it's possible to be better. However loving I am, it's possible to be somehow more loving. However beautiful something is, it's possible somehow for it to be more beautiful. At least one might conceive of that possibility. There's always a transcendent beyond to values.

As I mentioned earlier, this is one way that values as ideas—goodness, beauty, whatever—relate to and have similarities with images. They overlap and bear on images through this shared quality of transcendence.

But in the fact that it's somehow beyond this life, does this relate to what we were discussing—this third idea of bodhicitta aspiration to the second idea of living life to the full? Is it somehow more than living life to the full? Because I cannot actually achieve it—the fullness, the ripening is beyond this life, or exists in the ever-transcendent. The value is somewhat achievable, but it will always have this transcendent dimension.

Consider when the bodhicitta aspiration manifests as an image through, say, a tantric deity embodying or representing that bodhicitta aspiration. The aiming at and aligning with and devotion to becomes directed toward an image. Image too, in the way we've been discussing, creates this erotic imaginal quality that always has more and beyond. It's part of what we've explored—part of what eros creates and discovers. There's always a beyond.

So as an image—if there is an image of Tara, for instance, that condenses the bodhicitta aspiration for us—there's both eidos and icon present. There's icon in the sense that it's imaginal, an image that has infinite depth and potential to open. And there's eidos—it's idea as well, this conglomeration of values. Something exists here about how image and idea relate, but there's something about being more than living life to the full. It's beyond living life to the full.

This word for Buddha nature that I mentioned, Tathagatagarbha—Tathagata has its own etymology, but we could simply say Buddhagarbha, since Tathagata is another word for Buddha. Garbha is the interesting word here. Garbha can mean a womb or a matrix. It can also mean an embryo—that which is in a womb or emerges from a womb. I'm drawing this etymology from a passage by Shenpen Hookham in a book called The Buddha Within, which is quite interesting.

So garbha in Sanskrit means womb or matrix or embryo or, for instance, the gold that is in a gold mine or the diamonds that are in a diamond mine. There's quite a range of what it can mean. Garbha can also mean "born from."

Partly because of this variation in what garbha can mean, and partly because of the way Sanskrit works in creating compound words that you stick together, you can relate the two words of the compound—buddha and garbha, or tathagata and garbha—in different ways to each other, generating different meanings. It's an inherently ambiguous language, or rather a language amenable to multiple interpretations, very commonly.

For example, when it's said that all beings are—and often there are no verbs in Sanskrit sentences—so this is "all beings buddha-garbha." All beings are the buddhagarbha, or all beings have buddhagarbha.

That much is ambiguous, or open, let's say.

I'm mentioning all these because there's a possibility of meditating on bodhicitta as a meditation on an idea, a set of values, and as a devotional meditation that really involves the energy body, the soul, the heart, the being, the focus, the surrender, the intention. And there's a meditation that can be more on an image.

If we talk about the notion of bodhicitta as an idea rooted in, or dependent on, the notion of Buddha nature, tathagatagarbha—if we go through the different possibilities of what tathagatagarbha might mean, and then this idea of all beings tathagatagarbha, all beings are the Buddha nature, or all beings have the Buddha nature—I'm going to go through some different possible variants of meaning it could have for that common Sanskrit phrase in the Mahayana tradition. And hopefully what you can get from this is it generates different meanings, and each meaning can be an idea that can be converted to a way of looking.

So, for example, all beings tathagatagarbha could be all beings are a womb of the Buddha, or all beings are the womb of the Buddha, or all beings are a womb of the Buddhas. And even then, a womb of the Buddha could be the womb that gives birth, or that holds the Buddha before a Buddha manifests. Or it could be the womb of the Buddha could be the Buddha's womb. So you have to play with this. You actually have to think about it a little bit.

All beings are the womb that give birth to the Buddha. So that means you are a womb from this idea, which can be translated into a way of looking with a little playing with it, and then meditated on. All beings are the womb that gives birth to a Buddha. You are a womb, a matrix, that gives birth to the Buddha. To a Buddha. And what does that do? Your body, your soul, your psyche, your practice.

And again, one can actually take that in quite a flatly conceived way: "Ah yeah, so that means if I really practice hard, then I'll, you know, become a Buddha." Or, you are the womb that gives birth to a Buddha. What might that mean? Sensed more with soul, felt sensed into more imaginably. What might that mean for this moment? Not just as a future potential that tells you to hit the cushion again, practice harder.

Or they said, you are the Buddha's womb. All beings are a womb of the Buddha's. And again, play with this. Turn the phrase over. See that each one of these can have different directions of meaning. And they can become temporarily crystallized as something to meditate on, an idea, and then through which you can see another, or see yourself, and see beings.

And again, because garbha can mean born from, all beings are born from the Buddha. What does that mean? What might that mean? All beings are born from the Buddha. Can you feel into that? Can you sense into it with soul? So there's a kind of soulful thinking that has to go on a little bit. And kind of hearing it poetically. All beings are born from Buddha. What Buddha? Where? How? What does it mean? What might it mean?

Or, again, it could be all beings are tathagatagarbha. All beings are the Buddha's hidden treasure. Again, it's the Buddha's hidden treasure. So that, again, has this one possibility. There's a corollary: We are the hidden treasure of God. We are God's necessity. We are the divine's necessity.

We are the divine's treasure, if I participate in it, if I see it a certain way—and it means me and you and my life and my perception. All beings are the Buddha's hidden treasure, the diamonds, the gold in the mine. We belong, you know, that corollary with this idea of belonging to the divine or having our roots in the divine. How is that communicated to us? How is that felt? And maybe it's communicated and felt through other images.

Again, in Tibetan, which is mostly where we get this Tathāgatagarbha—well actually also Zen, but when we get it through the Tibetan at least, it gets translated in a certain way. Apparently in Tibetan, I don't know Tibetan, but all beings have the essence of the Buddha. That could mean all beings have the essence that the Buddha is. Or all beings have the essence that becomes the Buddha, have an essence that becomes the Buddha.

So again, if you're listening to this, you'll probably have to rewind. If you want to get into this, rewind and just write these down and then take individual ones and meditate on them, which means playing with them as ideas, very lightly, very poetic ideas. And then when something feels, oh yeah, that's lovely. And then it's like, okay, can I sit with that and let that idea kind of percolate down into the soul and infuse the sensing—the sensing the soul of oneself, of other, of life.

Again, essence in Tibetan apparently has the meaning of some kind of good stuff that's extracted by purification from something else. So for example, gold from gold ore or sesame oil from sesame seeds. All beings have that essence of Buddha. So there's actually many possibilities here. All beings, Tathāgatagarbha.

And one can see the flexibility again. Plurality, flexibility. And there's a lot of beauty here. And a lot of art possible. And we can get quite adept at translating this kind of thing into a way of looking, or letting it translate into a way of looking. Sensing with soul, sensing self, sensing others, as I said.

I just want to finish today with one other thing to point out about this bodhicitta aspiration. It may well be that in more—if you're used to this bodhicitta aspiration and from some Buddhist tradition or other, it may well be that it functions through an image, say an image of Tārā, or even a kind of more vague internal image that you've come up with of what a bodhisattva is and what a bodhisattva does, etc.

But it may well be that that image is kind of universal and, let's say, generic. We have a kind of universal, generic image of a bodhisattva, either because it's one given to us, say, Avalokiteśvara or Tārā or whatever, or just operating for us in our psyche, whether it's kind of perceived vividly, clearly, or more vaguely. It may well be kind of universal and generic.

It can, in that becoming image or being given an image, it can lose the particularities of one's own personhood. It can lose the kind of particular ways of this infinite echoing and mirroring of my personhood. So it just becomes a vague sort of—a vague image of bodhisattva, you know, being a bodhisattva or moving towards Buddhahood or whatever. Do you understand? So that's quite common in a lot of these traditions.

Again, we've touched on it so many times, to lose the particularities and to lose or erase or make more vague the personhood and the particular ways the personhood is echoed, mirrored—my personhood, your personhood—in all this. So we're somehow just aiming for a universal, generic, or somewhat vague bodhisattvahood.

Contrast that with a too sharp delineation of exactly what I'm going to be and what it's going to look like and how I particularly will do this. Too tight, too rigid boundaries as well. The Jungian concept of individuation is quite an interesting concept, or at least can be molded to be something more in line with what we might be interested in. It's a moving towards or a growing towards and a groping towards my individual sort of blossoming, but that blossoming has no end.

And so it's personal. In Jungian therapy, I think it would be, and certainly in the way we're talking about it, it's mediated or supported by the imaginal. So that in Jungian therapy, one would be looking at one's dreams and images and things that came up for at some point beginning to give us the clues as the analysis matures, to give us the clues of the threads of the individuation for me. My individuation is different from yours, different from the next person.

So it's very personal and very unique and retains my particulars and maybe even my particular difficulties are redeemed and transformed, not erased necessarily. So that's more akin to the kind of work we're doing. And if it's mediated and supported through images, this movement to something beyond, this angel out ahead Henri Corbin talked about, then it's my angel out ahead.

There's a difference between that idea—what's the angel out ahead for me, or the angels, because sometimes it's plural, oftentimes it's plural—but then it's individual. It's not just Tārā, or it's not just Avalokiteśvara or whatever. It's unique to me, individual. There might be a few different angels calling me, and that's also interesting as well. But that becomes my movement, let's say, towards something like the bodhicitta aspiration, or I might give it a different name.

I might just say it's the images that are calling me, the angels that I'm moving towards. It's the process of my individuation. Whatever language, it can be more inclusive of and richly fulfilling and attentive to and involving my personhood, your personhood and all the particulars of that.

But the angel out ahead is image, is icon and therefore infinite and unfathomable and always having a beyond. It's always out ahead. We never reach that angel out ahead fully. We never, if we move towards it, it takes a step back. But we're always in connection with that. There's always that erotic relationship and coupling. It's with us. There's the eros both ways. There's the togetherness. But we never become it fully.

My process there, if that's what I've got, my soul-making journey or opening, is also then based on my image and on my values. So we can talk about values like compassion and goodness and love and generosity, but there's perhaps a need for them to be translated personally. When one really starts to attune the heart and the soul with ideas and ideals—ideals are ideas and values are ideals are ideas—the particular way generosity speaks to me, the particular feeling and soul opening and resonance I get with that, which is also mediated through images and stories and examples. But again, it's a combination of eidos and icon that we're talking about here. But it has to be personal. It's got to be a really personal connection.

There's a philosopher I've just discovered very recently that I'm really starting to get very interested in, Nikolai Hartmann. And he talks about ethics a lot. He talks about a lot of stuff, but one of the things he discusses is personality and the development of personality. How do you develop your personality, your particular personality, your unique personality? You can't just copy someone else you admire. You can't imitate because that would just be a lie and you won't be true to yourself, true to the image that wants to come through you, the ideal, in a more Platonic sense, you that wants to come through.

I would actually insert that although we might not imitate someone else, they can become image for us. And that my being with that meditatively and resonating with it and being moved by it is part of me developing, let's say, developing my personality. I think he means that in a much broader sense than some of the more tight and shallow meanings that sometimes get used.

But one of the points he tries to make is you can't imitate someone. You can't just kind of chase personality itself, chase this development of—we could say, what's the particular way that your bodhicitta will come to fruition? The particular personal way your bodhicitta will come to fruition. If we take this original idea of the bodhisattva and bodhicitta which was there in the Pali Canon actually and then Mahāyāna really amplified it and we kind of take it and open it up according to some of the ideas that we've been discussing, what might it do?

But Hartmann says you can't just kind of make personality happen by focusing on personality. Personality comes—he says, "Personality as a value is never by its nature actualized in reflection upon itself, but in reflection upon other values." In other words, it's through meditating this devotion to, this feeling the effect of, putting myself in relationship to, in soul relationship to, in energy-body relationship to, in heart relationship to, in meaningfulness relationship to, the ideas and the values that touch my soul. It's through that and through choosing and committing to act on them and it's through that that my personality is forged. It's through that that I move towards my angel, let's say.

So one's personality—you have to follow your own feeling of value, your own kind of, which is an idea, and this soulful meditation on ideas. And no one can kind of give you your particular kind of value resonances, the particular kind of distribution of emphases and resonances that your soul has with different values at any different time. And that happens also in and through meeting life and the complexity of life and the joys and the ups and downs and the difficulties and the ethical ambiguities and choice moments, et cetera.

So these ideas have to be obviously connected to life, but they also, again, they have this kind of beyond dimension always.

We'll stop there and then as I said, starting with more familiar ideas and just trying to open them up, offer some different possibilities for practice, and then we'll gradually get into more probably for some people less familiar ideas and less familiar practices.

CHAPTER 133

Between Ikon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 8 - Talking with Trees)

Rob Burbea · 1h55

> In this profound exploration of sensing with soul, Rob Burbea examines our capacity for deep relationship with trees and the natural world. Drawing on the understanding of body and earth as sacred texts open to infinite interpretation, he investigates how we can communicate with trees through reverence, touch, and even speaking words of love. Burbea explores the participatory nature of knowing, comparing how lovers know each other's love to how we might sense and receive communication from trees.
>
> The talk delves into the role of speech in opening perception, examining how right speech affects our being and sensitivity, and how speaking to trees with love can create openings for deeper connection. Referencing philosophers like Goethe ("A human being does not begin to understand anything unless he loves it") and Nikolai Hartmann's concept of personal love, Burbea distinguishes between universal metta and the particular love needed for imaginal perception.
>
> A significant portion addresses the epistemological challenges of sensing with soul, drawing parallels between the difficulties of knowing aesthetic and moral values and the challenges of imaginal perception. Burbea explores how values are woven into soul-making perception, examining antinomies (contradictory values) and the transcendent nature of values that always point beyond any particular manifestation. The talk concludes with reflections on environmental ethics, the "age of loneliness" from disconnection with nature, and the duties that arise from sensing the earth with soul.

In the last talk we were discussing ideas of the body and of the earth, looking at some examples of sensing with soul the body and the earth and the possibility of approaching them with the sense of body and earth as sacred texts. In that way, they are open to possibly infinite interpretation and hermeneutics. We discussed a few examples, a few possibilities of the way ideas of the body come into sensing with soul and expand, open, and deepen the perception and the sense, as well as the idea and concepts of body and earth. We could have given many examples, so we just chose a few.

For example, what is it to sense, to perceive, to feel and to conceive of the body in the present moment—not abstractly, but with a felt sense, with a heart sense, with a soul sense—as somehow rooted in divinity? This body as a unique expression, a unique gift from the divine. Perhaps a theophany, the body itself as theophany.

With that iconic perception or perception of icon—body as icon, my body, your body, this body—there is in the nature of the iconic perception, in the nature of sensing with soul, that sense of perfection. But perfect doesn't mean perfectly healthy. It doesn't mean perfect looking, whatever that might mean anyway. An icon that is chipped or old and somewhat worn, or perhaps not exactly geometrically balanced, can still have all the power and depth and beauty and perfection as an icon. It can have the same perfection as a less worn, unchipped, more perfectly geometrically balanced image. Same with the body as icon. Same with the body when it's sensed with soul.

The perfection of the body—this sense of this body somehow being rooted in divinity—isn't because it's a perfect feat of biological engineering, marvelous as that is. It's a perfection of a different order, a different sensibility. Can one feel and sense oneself and one's body as holiness, as a holiness, as in holiness or as holy gift? The holiness there doesn't necessarily at all go with a more ethereal range of the bodily perception or image or energy body feel. The holiness is not only in that upper, less substantial range.

When there's the sensing with soul, when there's the openness and the fertility of the intellect and the concepts and ideas that are operating, there can be a sense and an idea of a kind of plurality of worlds that are somehow harmonized with each other—a spectrum, as it were, of worlds at different levels. I mentioned that yesterday, and we talked about it on the Re-enchanting the Cosmos retreat and several other places. It's quite a common idea in different traditions.

There is this plurality of worlds, and the world I see, the world I sense, is dependent on the way of looking. Part of the way of looking involves the concept—concepts of body, earth, world, and of course wrapped up in that, the ideas and the senses of matter and things.

I meant to include a brief anecdote regarding matter and things and this perception or sense and idea of a kind of plurality of worlds that are harmonized with each other. This is an account by Henri Corbin of attending a meeting in 1954 in Switzerland. There were many people there—Jung was probably there—and also D.T. Suzuki, whom I mentioned the other day in his description of the Dharmadhatu in the Avatamsaka Sutra.

Corbin and a few others were asking D.T. Suzuki about his impressions and what he knew about Western spirituality. They learned that he was interested in Swedenborg and other things. Later they asked him what homologies, what similarities in structure he found between Mahayana Buddhism and, for example, the cosmology of Swedenborg, in respect to the symbolism and correspondences of the world.

Corbin says, "Of course, we expected not a theoretical answer, but a sign attesting the encounter in a concrete person of an experience common to Buddhism and to Swedenborgian spirituality." He continues, "I can still see Suzuki suddenly brandishing a spoon and saying with a smile, 'This spoon now exists in paradise. We are now in heaven,' he explained." Corbin notes this was an authentically Zen way of answering the question.

So the things and the elements, the material elements of this existence can be perceived—this material existence can be perceived—as we are already in the pure land. This is the lotus land if I look the right way, if I sense with soul. There's the possibility of this appreciation or sensing and conception of a spectrum of worlds, worlds at different levels, somehow harmonizing, echoing, mirroring each other, so that all this exists in different dimensions.

Much earlier in the retreat, I talked briefly about loving trees and feeling loved by trees or particular trees. I think it was in the talk on sensing with soul. And so how do I know that this tree I love loves me? How do I feel? How do I sense?

How do I receive that communication from the tree, which includes the communication of love? I think I said I know like lovers know. I know as lovers know. And the communication is the communication of lovers.

How do lovers know that the other loves them? How do they feel that love? How is that communicated? One possibility for human lovers, but also between tree and human, is through touch. This tree that I love communicates to me and communicates its love also when I touch it with love, with reverence, with openness, with a refined attention and sensitivity. Just placing the hand on the limb or the trunk, hands there, touching it with love and feeling that love—somehow it's communicated to me.

If another person were to touch you with love without moving their hand, and just place their hand on your arm or your shoulder or your back, without moving, in the same way that the tree doesn't move when I touch it—there's no movement of my hand either—is it possible to feel the love through an unmoving human touch? Can you feel when you're touched with love?

Is that scientifically measurable? You can measure how hard or how soft or how much pressure there is in the touch, how much humidity perhaps. But can you sense—is that possible for human beings to sense love through touch? And what actually is communicated this way between lovers or when there's deep friendship between human beings in that touch? Or in the silent gaze of eyes? Or in the communication of bodies that aren't even touching? How does it carry? And what is communicated?

Communication—we tend to think of information. "Ah, sweetheart, I left the tofu casserole in the oven. Would you mind turning the oven off?" That kind of communication contains information. Maybe that's involved, but there's a whole other kind of communication that's not information in that sense. It cannot be translated so much, perhaps, into linguistic ideas or syllogistic ideas.

Perhaps you could say it's information that there is love there, that I am receiving love, that there's love flowing both ways. It's information that there's some awareness, some intelligence, some mutual awareness of other, some mutual intersubjectivity. This is a kind of information. But what is communicated? How is it communicated? How do we feel it? What happens between humans when there's deep love there?

When we extend this possibility for communication and for receiving love and feeling love and sensing love and knowing love from, for example, a tree—for some of you, that idea is already quite familiar, and you're quite comfortable with it, and you perhaps already practice that way, live that way. For other people in our culture, probably—certainly for the majority of people in our wider culture—that's going to sound like a very strange idea. But with all this talk about sensing the soul and the ideas involved and the ways of looking and perception and all that, even if it's strange, you may want to try.

Put yourself in a mode of practice, in a mode of humility and openness, and just try. And like all practice, we develop it. It gets refined, it deepens, we discover things, we find our own way, our own ways.

What would it be? If you feel—and you don't have to do anything, of course—but if at some point with all this business of sensing the soul, you feel that's a possibility of something you want to experiment with, what would it be to approach a tree with that openness, with the willingness to experiment, the willingness to discover, and take in the tree with your senses?

Perhaps sight. You can touch the tree with your hands—and how are you touching it? How are you sensing into that contact, the hands on the bark, or the leaves? Perhaps smell. Perhaps even the sound of the wind in the leaves. Bringing your senses there with openness, with the poise of sensitivity.

Touching the tree, looking at it, open to it with your senses. And what if one were, as much as possible, to, through the openness of the senses and the contact, make oneself available or support a sense of your appreciating that tree, that being? Deep appreciation. Honouring it. Revering even. And what if...

What if that's possible to actually bring that attitude, or just try to move toward an opening of those kinds of attitudes? And what if you were to actually speak to the tree and say hello, and say, "I love you. I love you."

Perhaps you can be aware and feel, be conscious of the way the tree is connected into the soil and the earth and the sky and the air and the light. And your body, if you're standing, touching the tree, your body is parallel with the tree and the whole body can be open to the tree. Whole energy body in relationship. Knowing the tree with your whole body and that openness and attunement and delicacy and sensitivity of the attention and the openness of mind.

And what might you notice? Who knows?

And perhaps some of it, if we talk about the character of this tree and perhaps the mood of this tree in that specific moment and how it feels about the encounter and what's being communicated there, perhaps all this might be very subtle. You might need that sensitivity and subtlety of attention and the kind of ability to tune in and focus on a certain wavelength or frequency of, let's say, energetic vibration or communication, similar to the way one focuses on frequencies or wavelengths in working with the energy body in jhāna or more widely in jhāna anyway.

So these are some possibilities to try, and if you feel called to, as I said, you don't have to do anything, but just in the spirit of openness, in the spirit of experimentation. And one could start something like what I just suggested, but as I said, all practices will develop in time and they become personal. We need to make any practice that we do personal. We discover, we create the practice and we find in responsiveness to what feels like it's working and the threads that are suggested to us.

So in this, a tree that we love, that we're approaching that way, might communicate something verbalizable, so to speak, some information or something visualizable. And it may be that the communication and therefore the sensitivity that I bring has to be open to a certain, let's call it a range of wavelengths that's more dark and more dense, very different than a typical human conversation, typical human communication.

Now, of course, some people will hear this almost certainly and say that's just crazy. Crazy. Tree huggers. Mark Twain, with his sharp brilliance, wrote: "It is just like man's vanity and impertinence to call an animal dumb because it is dumb to his dull perceptions."

Again, it's a matter of the refinement, the sensitivity of the perceptions and the openness of mind and sense. So what he says about calling animals dumb and that being vain and impertinent—same we could say of the earth, of the trees, of the forests, of the stones, of the rivers, of the stars.

I think I said already somewhere or other that we bring so much cultural conditioning to ideas that we hear and suggestions and to our perceptions. And that limits and conditions them. And in some cultures and times, and maybe in our culture, in these places where we are today, where you are today, in the future, whether or not we call that the same culture or not, because this is quite a considerable shift—but in some cultures and times, they would consider crazy our assumptions and our inability to feel, sense, respect and revere the tree's fullness of being, its particular intelligence, its kind of loving, its communication. Why are you so stunted? Why are you so stuck on those assumptions? And they might think we have some kind of mental disability collectively, a bit akin to, I think someone used the example of autism.

Autism is an interesting example. One theory of autism is that it's diagnosed when there's an inability to sense that another has a mind. It's called the absence of theory of mind. I think it's in severe autism—it's that absence of the ability to sense another mind in another person. And we regard that as a kind of problem of deficiency and incapacity, generally speaking, in the way the dominant culture diagnoses mental health issues and mental capacities.

Maybe those of us who now laugh at the idea of relating to nature this way, who might pour scorn, as I said, on tree-huggers or whatever they would call them—maybe there's something lacking there. Maybe we're not as superior in intelligence as we assume ourselves to be. And again, why are we so convinced of that? Is it really that we're such radically independent thinkers that question and deep questioning led to this belief about trees? Or is it actually really just the product of how we've been, what's been communicated to us through the culture, a kind of indoctrination? It's not really that one is so clever for believing that that I love loves me. I can feel that. I can know that.

I read a little while ago that a medicine man or woman, a medicine person from the Lakota tribe, a Lakota medicine person, speaks to a stone and calls it Tunkashila, which means grandfather, this stone, for example. It's a completely different relation. It's more than a metaphor. I call you grandfather because you've been around a long time because stones really last a long time. So it's a kind of like, it's a flippant metaphor. There's something else going on there of a very different order, a very different dimension, a very different attitude.

Some of you know St. Francis of Assisi, that beautiful, beautiful spirit.

Father Sun, Sister Moon, speaking to the birds, and so forth. Here we see a different relationship altogether—a sensing with soul, a fundamentally different understanding of what is happening, what is real, what is true, what is worthy of respect, what deserves our attention. This transforms the very nature of speech itself.

I deliberately suggested speaking to a tree and saying "I love you"—to say hello, to express love, and as much as possible, to try moving in the direction of actually meaning it. Just try it. This aspect of speech fascinates me deeply—this quality we find in the Lakota medicine person, in St. Francis. Let's dwell on this a little.

You know that the Buddha taught right speech as part of his ethical training, as part of the precepts and the Eightfold Path. Here's something important to realize, and I hope you've noticed this about right speech: when we gossip or talk behind someone's back, or generally don't maintain the precept of right speech, can you notice—do you notice immediately in that moment and in the moments afterward—the effects in body and mind?

Even when it's subtly wrong speech, not quite right speech, it's noticeable immediately. The effects in body and mind create a slight toxic feeling, agitation, contraction, a subtle dis-ease. All of this may be very subtle, and again, it requires sensitivity. Without sensitivity, I won't even notice.

Part of the function of ethics actually works in a kind of loop. As I practice right ethics and maintain the precepts, it clears the coarse vibrations, because these vibrations of toxicity, agitation, dis-ease, and contraction actually block or hinder my sensitivity. So one function of ethics is this: as I engage less in behavior that agitates me and creates dis-ease, toxicity, or contraction, I actually become more sensitive. It's like the surface of a lake growing calmer—I can see more, and I can pick up more subtle vibrations. I become more attuned to how it feels when speech is not quite right speech, to the vibration that sets up, and to the actual effect in heart, body, mind, and soul.

Sometimes, curiously, it's a little harder to notice the converse, but we can feel the positive and beneficial effect of wholesome, kind, insightful speech. There's a huge range in what I'm describing here. When we speak beautifully, there's beauty in the being—we feel that. It's clear and open, and it harmonizes something. The opposite creates the converse effect.

This is a big range, but again, we're talking about language as spell, with what we could say are almost magical effects—though it's not really magic. When facing a tree, being with a tree, touching it and approaching with reverence, humility, appreciation, gratitude, and love as much as possible, and saying out loud "I love you" or addressing it as "my love"—this speaking has an effect on you, on your body, mind, heart, and soul. It opens you. It opens heart, body, mind, soul.

With that openness, one becomes more able to tune in to the tree's being and the tree's knowing. The speaking of love has an effect on your being, and that enables a greater degree of sensitivity—just as when we speak to another human being, whether it's right speech or wrong speech or somewhere on that spectrum.

We can also receive and feel ourselves receiving something from the tree—what we might call love, energy, wisdom, goodness. The body, the whole energy body, can be open to receiving this.

As I mentioned, we tend in our culture to assume that only humans and perhaps some animals have intelligence. We have a very narrow idea of what intelligence means—we think of IQ tests and such. But what is this tree being? What is its intelligence? And again, I don't mean this as a metaphor for the passively endowed biological function of photosynthesis conceived mechanistically, as we learned in school biology.

Another piece here is my mind and its ideas, your mind and your mind's concepts and assumptions—epistemological, ontological, cosmological, the metaphysics involved. If those ideas absolutely rule out any intelligence or consciousness in a tree, or in inanimate matter, stones, plant life, or some forms of animal life (because we tend to draw a line, don't we? Perhaps only cats and dogs because they're common pets), then if that idea is locked in, I'm unlikely to develop the kind of sensitivity that would enable me to perceive and even dimly sense or intuit such different kinds of intelligence.

It might be quite dim at first, very vague. And again, there's that doubt: What's going on here? Am I imagining it? Like all practices, especially the soul-making practices, doubt is fine.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 5/14). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

It's a part of it. It shows your critical intelligence is working. But reverence, love, respect, gratitude—what is it to be grateful for this tree? Humility. As well as that delicacy and subtlety of attention. And a kind of training of the attention there. Again, with practice. All that will help. All that will help the consciousness, the citta, the soul to become more sensitive. And reverence is a part of it.

Speech might be a part of it. In the Jewish tradition, in the Pirkei Avot—which I think means the sayings of our fathers, or the proverbs of our fathers—it says somewhere, "If there is no reverence, there is no wisdom." If there is no reverence, there is no wisdom. And with all these things, there's a mutual dependency, so we could also flip it around and say: if there's no wisdom, there's no reverence. Where there's wisdom, there's reverence. Where there's reverence, wisdom. And this wisdom will come.

There's something about speaking we mentioned. And it's interesting—when we conceive of speaking, we spoke a little bit about language and communication and sound last night. But typically we believe that when we speak or share or voice something, we're expressing something that already exists as something that's, for instance, true to me. So there's a truth in me or for me which is then somehow expressed in speech.

Sometimes I feel like I'm not even aware of or clear about what's true for me until I start speaking and express it. And then I kind of discover—some people, their minds work that way. But even if we chose not to express it, if we wanted to hide it or to mute it or to speak contrarily, opposite to what was true for us, we typically assume the truth—my truth—pre-exists the expression.

But if we are open, if we are sensitive, or when we are open, sensitive and attentive, we can also notice that what we voice poetically can become a truth, so to speak, for us. What we voice poetically can become a kind of truth for me. The verbalization, the writing, or sounding, or gesturing comes first sometimes. And then through that, the creation and the elevation of its value and status as true for me, for us. It's like in the speaking we're creating something, and we create what becomes a kind of truth for us. There is a way that this can happen in the poetry of things. But as I said, attitude, ideation and attitude and poise here is crucial.

So again, I'm picking up and repeating—and I think it's so important, it's worth repeating—something I must have said at the Re-enchanting the Cosmos retreat, but I'll say it again. We talked there about fullness of intention being one of the necessary aspects for the fully imaginal or genuinely imaginal, authentically imaginal. And fullness of intention, part of what that meant was that I am engaging with this image, I'm seeking it out, I'm practicing with it, I'm sensing with soul in this way, not primarily for myself, even for my spiritual growth, psychological process, and so forth. So the emphasis and the intention is more for the sake of the divine, for the sake of God, for the sake of the divinity. And there's a kind of—it's not that it's not for myself, but there's a relative weighting towards—it's for that, it's for the divine, it's for divinity, it's for God, it's for soul-making, not for me.

And this applies also when we're talking about the enchantment of things and objects, as well as the enchantment of self. But if we stay with the enchantment of objects and things in the world, like trees or whatever—if the intention, conception, aspiration is more about self, then the enchantment of things, of objects, can tend very easily to go into, for example, a kind of infatuation or superstition with lucky charms or amulets.

We're talking now about sensing the soul and the enchantment of things that comes through that kind of perception. But there's what we could call an immature enchantment. I believe if I hang on to this—whatever it is, piece of stone or a bracelet or necklace or whatever—it's a lucky charm and it will mean I will be lucky and I'll be safe and I'll be rich or whatever it is. The whole thing, that kind of immature enchantment is partly immature because it's reified in too narrow a way, and because it's about the self. It's for my sake. So we're enchanted with this amulet or little statue or whatever it is because we're seeking good luck for the self or protection or something.

Compare that with seeing things as theophanies—opening up a sense of beauty, of meaningfulness, of divinity, of sacralization. And the whole soul-making dynamic, the mutual insemination, widening, enriching, deepening, complicating of eros, psyche, logos—that whole dynamic of soul-making is involved, which it very rarely is with something like an amulet.

Or, you know, I've read about someone suggesting approaching trees in order to get the sustenance of their energy or for them to heal us, and so forth—all of which may happen in the encounter, as I'll touch on. But there's something about the intention and the emphasis of the attention and what's primary there.

As I've already mentioned, we may feel like we receive, for example, from this stone, from this rock when I'm sensing it with soul, from this tree when I approach it in that manner and sense with soul, interact with soul—we may well receive something there.

But I would still say primarily that in order to receive energy healing or whatever from a tree, I would focus more on the tree in appreciation and love rather than on what I can get, what I can receive, and me focusing on even trying to open my energy body so I can receive something there.

But here, in soul-making perception, in sensing the soul, we are appreciating the particular. We're loving the particular, and it's through that love of the particular that the understanding opens. It's through the love of this particular tree, with its unique form, its specific presence, its individual character, that understanding deepens and soul-making occurs.

So I was mentioning that this angel approves of me and gives me something of itself. And actually, when we go deeper into imaginal practice, into the sensing of soul relationships, we realize that this giving and receiving is actually mutual. There's a mutuality there. Something is given to me from this imaginal figure, from this tree, from this stone that I'm sensing with soul, but something is also given from me to it.

This is quite important to understand. It's not a one-way street. It's not that I'm just receiving energy or healing or whatever from this being. There's actually a mutual exchange happening. And in fact, we could even say that what enables the reception is often the giving. When I offer my love, my attention, my appreciation to this tree, that very offering opens me to receive what the tree might offer in return.

And this gets us into some very beautiful territory that I think is quite profound and moving. When we approach a tree, for instance, with this quality of soul-making perception, with reverence and love and openness, we're actually participating in what we could call the tree's awakening. We're participating in the tree's own journey toward its deeper nature, its fuller expression of what it is.

In other words, through my perception of it as beautiful, as sacred, as meaningful, I'm actually helping to awaken those very qualities in the tree itself. My seeing it as divine helps it to realize its own divinity. My appreciation of its beauty helps to actualize its beauty. This is the profound reciprocity that happens in soul-making perception.

Now, this might sound quite strange to our usual way of thinking. We tend to think of trees as just sitting there, being what they are, independent of our perception. But in the world of soul, in the realm of the imaginal, perception is creative. Perception participates in the very being of what is perceived.

And this is why I emphasize again and again that this is not mere projection. This is not me just projecting qualities onto an inert object. Rather, it's a co-creation. It's a mutual participation in meaning-making, in beauty-making, in the revelation of the sacred dimensions of existence.

We don't see this idea that the one who loves is the only one who sees, while those without love are blind to this personal love. We don't recognize this because we have too narrow a conception of knowledge, as Chiriakaki observes.

It's wrong, in this larger view of knowledge, to limit our understanding to thinking, reflective, or rational consciousness of an object. Hartmann calls this "valuational knowledge" - knowledge of the individual and unique that is based on feeling, on a sharpened and sensitive intuition for the richness of values. I'll return to this question of values shortly.

Personal love makes possible the participation in each other's souls. It makes possible the intuitive vision of the best and the highest in another as another.

In this connection - and I think I mentioned this as an aside in a previous talk - I would say that skill in human relationships requires more than what we typically discuss. We talk a lot about bringing kindness, about right speech and how to communicate what's difficult, how to negotiate and empathize emotionally with what's happening. But I would say that our skill and capacity in human relationships needs our sensing with soul.

For the fullness of human relationship, I need to see you, I need to sense you with soul. In our relationship, we need the imaginal perception to be present - the sensing of soul has to be connected, has to meet somehow on that level.

There will be times when we feel we haven't been fully related to as human beings, because this person is not sensing us with soul, is not seeing our dimensionality, our divinity even, is not seeing us imaginally.

We can have all kinds of theoretical frameworks about what constitutes skill and capacity in human relationships, about what it means for there to be fullness in our connections. But I would, in slightly different words, echo Hartmann's insight about the unique way that personal love reveals what would otherwise remain hidden.

The human is not other than the imaginal for me. The imaginal includes the human; the human includes the imaginal. Sometimes it's the image—tuning into, speaking, recognizing, or including the imaginal sense of the other, of oneself, or of the relationship—that allows the relationship between two human beings to open up, to flourish, to be healthy, and I would say to be fully human.

When we talk about sensing with soul—just sensing with soul, sensing anything with soul—there's a beautiful teaching from Abraham Abulafia, the Kabbalist I mentioned the other day. He works with gematria, that numerical manipulation and playing with the numerical equivalence of letters that make up words to generate other connections of idea and meaning, and to generate, in our language, the soul-making of perception of divinity, other senses and ideas of divinity.

He says that in Hebrew, the word for love is ahava. When you write out the letters and count them up, it adds up to thirteen. Thirteen plus thirteen—in other words, two loves—is twenty-six. And twenty-six is the numerical equivalent for the name of God, for one name of God: Yahweh. So two loves make up God. Do you understand?

The love that I feel in this love for this tree, in this love for this beloved, erotic, imaginal other, and the love that I feel from, and know, and sense and receive from this beloved, erotic, imaginal other—these two loves make up, give us, or we could say are divinity, are God somehow, are Buddha nature. What I want to say is they make that. They make divinity. These two, this reciprocity of love that we have, make divinity.

But Abulafia adds something else. He says the word for "one" in Hebrew is ehad. When you add it up, it makes thirteen. So again, two thirteens—two times thirteen is twenty-six, the same name of God, Yahweh.

So two ones make God, make the Divine One. Two ones and two lovings in the mutual autonomy—in the autonomy that we talked about as a necessary aspect of the imaginal, the autonomy of the beloved erotically imagined other and the autonomy of myself in that interaction. Those two ones, loving with two loves back and forth, that eros there—the two ones and the two autonomies of eros. Remember, eros needs that autonomy. It needs the two-ness. We could say they make God.

There's a different interpretation I'm giving to that than Abulafia's, a different direction in terms of the numerology. But this is part of what's happening when we sense with soul—we're making the divine. And making has to do with that create-discover-create. The affinities are with art. We've touched on this before over the years. Art has the truth of art. In our making, we're participating in art. We're making art. And art has a certain kind of truth—artistic truth, poetic truth—that is powerful still.

We said earlier that we somehow create what's true for us in speaking, in verbalizing, whether we write it or articulate it with our voice. So there's a creation, an artistic creation in speaking. But there's also a...

We can draw fascinating parallels here, dwelling a little on ontology and epistemology. When we talk about appreciating art or even studying it, sometimes we discover something in a piece that's genuinely there—a kind of deep structure in the symphony, the novel, the painting. We perceive these deep structures through our engagement.

Yet some of what we perceive, we cannot be certain is objectively true. We create meaning through our study, through our interpretation that matters to us. We cannot be sure these structures are significant. We cannot be sure that the author, composer, or artist actually knew about them—perhaps they emerged unconsciously rather than through intention. We cannot be sure the creator felt they were significant, or how significant.

And yet these patterns might still be difficult to uncover, challenging to perceive. They might indeed be deep structures in the artwork, though we can look at this claim of depth less as an ontological assertion—that something really exists in some deeper dimension—and more cautiously, more conservatively, as simply an epistemological claim. It's hard to see, hard to sense, hard to notice or recognize these structures. They're not obvious. They're hidden in the deeper texture of things, in the larger framework or trajectory of the art.

We could also say they're deep epistemologically because they require a certain kind of attention and training. Not everyone can hear the subtle layers in a symphony without extensive training of attention and ear. The same applies to visual art. There's a way of thinking about what we perceive in art that makes not a truth claim, but simply recognizes an epistemological distinction, a spectrum of accessibility.

The same applies to the hermeneutics of existence. Returning to our parallels with making—we're making divinity, creating God in some way when we're soul-making. Taking that word "making" seriously, acknowledging it as art, we recognize the parallels between art and soul-making. We can make distinctions that are epistemic, epistemological—this is harder to see without certain sensitivity or training—but we still don't know if they're true structures. Do they have the composer's, artist's, or author's intent, or even awareness? Are they significant, or is it merely our interpretation that makes them so? Can we trust our sense of the significant?

All this applies equally to our hermeneutics regarding art and to the hermeneutics of existence.

Many people today recognize that the audience—the viewer, the reader—is granted a degree of creative status, perhaps even equal to the artist, writer, or creator. The participation together of composer and audience, of artist and viewer, is creative, co-creative.

Again, opening up these ideas about epistemology and ontology, we can take a quite cautious, relatively conservative position, or we can take bolder positions. But there's also a parallel between the epistemological difficulties regarding art and the difficulties regarding sensing the soul. This relates to a larger issue of epistemological difficulty—the challenge of saying "I know"—with regard to values, whether aesthetic values like beauty, or moral values.

To me, this is quite an interesting parallel. We're in a similar situation regarding the epistemology and ontology of sensing the soul as we are regarding aesthetics and moral values. There are parallels here.

Moral knowing—"I know this is good, I know that is bad"—and despite all the relativistic postmodern discourse, something in me, something in you says, "I know that is good and I know that is bad," whatever that bad might be. Similarly with aesthetics, when I compare the Smurfs to Beethoven or John Coltrane, Keith Jarrett, or Rothko.

Moral knowing and aesthetic knowing are participatory. Unlike, or at least much more so than our conventional knowledge of material facts—"I know the lamp is on the table, I know the microphone is on"—these forms of knowing require our creative participation.

Whatever.

The moral knowing and aesthetic knowing involves much more participation. We usually don't think of our conventional knowledge of material facts as participatory. That whole theory of knowing established with the scientific method that I talked about in an earlier talk on this course—that conventional knowledge of material facts is not supposed to be participatory.

But when we come to aesthetic knowing, we say beauty is in the eye of the beholder. And with moral knowing there's a similar parallel in that they share this participatory nature.

Our souls resonate with goodness. And that resonance—we resonate with goodness—that resonance is part of how we know, and we need to participate in that to know. And with a moral value like kindness. And also with beauty. We resonate, so to speak, with beauty. We participate in the perception of beauty. We participate in the perception of goodness, in the knowing of goodness.

The knowing and the actuality of the object is created and discovered in the subject-object interaction. Whereas classical scientific method presumes and actually strives for a kind of independence and non-participation of the subject in the object or with the object.

So this participatory knowing is a fact of aesthetic knowing, so to speak, and moral knowing. And yet, as I pointed out when I talked about this some days ago at the beginning of this course and just now, to say it's all in the eye of the beholder—that there really is no difference of aesthetic value between the Smurfs and whatever it is, John Coltrane or Messiaen—that sits wrong in the soul. And I think that's true of everyone. No one really believes that statement that it's all completely just participatory. Both are involved.

Similarly with moral knowing. It's participatory. Both subject and object are involved. There's a resonance there.

So values are part and parcel, are included, are woven into sensing the soul. When we sense the soul, we also sense and attune to values. We've talked about meanings being wrapped up in and implicated in images, but we can't reduce this imaginal figure, or what I've sensed with soul here, to one specific meaning. Similarly with values. Values are wrapped up and implicated in an imaginal figure, in images. But an image is not reducible to that value or those values.

If we do reduce an image to a certain meaning, or even a few meanings, or certain values, it will kill and truncate the depth and the vitality of an image. Remember we talked about this from the beginning. When we try to reduce them in that way, they do include values, and they do include individual meanings, but when we reduce them to those, we will kill something in the image, we'll flatten it. Or it will die, let's say that.

I think it's important to recognize that when I am in erotic, imaginal relationship with an image, that image is shot through with values for me—values that are alive and meaningful and important. But it's also that there's a plurality of values and also meanings, as we said, implicated, wrapped up in an image.

Sometimes the values in an image are kind of opposite, antinomic, it's called. The difficulty we have epistemologically and ontologically with values is replicated in sensing the soul. Part of the reason is because wrapped up in sensing the soul is a sense of values. And values are often multiple. They're wrapped up in this image and it's multiple values. And sometimes they're contradictory values.

There's something about values—they're always beyond what could possibly be instantiated or brought to bear in manifestation as an example. So any example of goodness could always be more good. So the value of goodness is a kind of—it's always got this beyond to it, always beyond any instantiation of goodness, is just goodness, kind of the value of goodness.

We have to recognize and understand something important here. We can't reduce an image to a representing of this and that value, or this and that meaning.

But it may be that values—which are ideas, the idea of goodness, the idea of beauty, the idea of love—represent a different perspective on something than looking at it imaginally. So there's a kind of ideational perspective and an imaginal perspective.

As I said, images include ideas; they're woven together, and we can focus on one or the other—on the ideas in the image, part of which will be the values, the moral and aesthetic values wrapped up in this image that it somehow expresses, that it channels. Another perspective on something is the purely imaginal, where that sense of value is not so much brought to the fore, but where we're still tuning to it without reducing something to those values.

Both ideas as values—or values as ideas—and images have always a beyondness, a mystery, an unfathomability. And that's why we can have eros and soul-making with respect to ideas as well.

Let me expand this and explain it a little better. I mentioned the word "antinomies." Part of the reason why clear knowledge or truth claims—"I know this, this is true"—are difficult to justify with respect to soul-making perceptions of the world, with sensing the soul, is exactly the same reason why such claims are also difficult to establish with respect to moral and aesthetic values and virtues.

The set of values that we actually value involves ultimately irreconcilable antinomies—contradictions, principles that are in opposition or contradict each other or are paradoxical with each other, if you like—when it comes to any instantiation or example of anything.

Courage and prudence, for example, could be called antinomical. In other words, the fullness of courage is in opposition, perhaps, to a fullness of prudence in any situation. Or a kind of sharp, discriminating discernment—that kind of prajñā—compared with or in opposition to a kind of accepting inclusivity. Or simplicity and complexity in an aesthetic object.

What we have as human beings is that we encounter disputes about value. Partly it's because we focus on a certain value and we value it, and then we disagree with someone who values something that is in opposition to that. Both people could say, "Well, this has value," or "This has more value," and the other person says, "No, this has more value." And those two things cannot exist together. We can disagree with each other. We can also disagree with ourselves at different times.

This thing, this object, this person, in any instant, cannot exemplify and instantiate both of those contradictory antinomical values at the same time. It cannot instantiate the fullness. It can instantiate a partial kind of compromise between them. Or if it instantiates the fullness of the one, we feel that it's lacking because it doesn't have the other.

So, for example, an utter fullness of courage might also be a lack of prudence. Utter simplicity and the value of simplicity might be a lack of complexity. Or utter complexity in a work of art might be a lack of simplicity. Or love and justice. Dynamism and stability, or innovation and tradition, or altruism and self-care, or being responsible for caring for oneself. I'm so altruistic that I neglect myself to the extreme. When it goes to extreme, it sounds like either it's idiotic or fanatical—there's something wrong. Yet if I make a balance there, then I'm not really living out the fullness of altruism and perhaps not the fullness of self-care.

Some people make an antinomy of what they call brotherly love—in other words, love of one's neighbor, the people, friends and family that one is in immediate contact with, particularly family—and on the other hand, love of the remote person, which is such an important value when we talk about mettā and universal love.

But what happens when we talk about love involving generosity, and it's the remote of future generations? That kind of love is one of the issues at stake when we talk about climate change and species extinction and resource depletion, environmental degradation. Because the absence of that love, or that kind of even consciousness of future generations, love of the remote future generations and those far away on the globe, on the one hand, and love of one's children on the other—the fullness of one, some people say, is antinomical with the other.

Maybe pride and humility—I don't know if those are quite the right words—but pride in its good sense, and humility. So change and variety on the one hand, and constancy, steadiness, uniformity on the other. Harmony and conflict, et cetera.

So there's a difficulty here. As I said, cultures as a whole tend to—of this, what Findlay and Hartman called the value firmament, the sort of ideal existences of these different values—we tend to narrow down on certain values at different times in history or different times in our individual lives. Or we have value disputes with others, we disagree, or we change our opinion all the time.

And what that means is that because these values exist in these antinomies, any instantiation of a value in practical life or in an image or in a sensing with soul is always open to be viewed from the perspective of another value's primacy. That soldier image that I've shared many times is not a pacifist. If I take non-harm as a primary value of pacifism—I mean it's just an image—but then I lose the value of the courage of the soldier willing to battle and do what it takes and take affirmative action.

So the problem here with epistemology is that we change our mind, cultures change their mind, and people disagree. So it becomes very hard to say, "I know this is valuable like that." Same in aesthetics and morality. And because values are wrapped up in the perceptions we have when we're sensing the soul, we have the same issue there.

So it's hard to have that kind of firm sureness of knowledge that we have in respect to more simple material things. We can't sometimes even agree with ourselves from one day to the next on the truth or reality of our perceptions of value, let alone agreeing with each other.

So when we sense with soul, when we have imaginal perception, values are woven in. And values, one of the difficulties there is these antimonies, the cultural uncertainty of our epistemology regarding values, our ontology regarding values. All of that.

So values—goodness, beauty, love—are essentially transcendent. There's always a beyond to them. One reason is because they're infinitely perfectible, as I said. However much love is possible in this instance, in this person, in this person's doing this, in this moment, it's always possible to have more love. However much goodness is possible, it's possible to have more goodness in any instance. They're infinitely perfectible.

Any instantiation, any manifestation of a value, one can always conceive of a beyond to it, of a more, a better. And in any instantiation, it calls in this whole field of what some philosophers call antinomies—values that are in opposition or contradictory to this one.

So we say, ideally, all of these values—for instance, love of one's family, immediate family, and love of the remote; dynamism and stability; altruism and self-care—ideally, if we say, they will all be fulfilled, they will all be at their maximum together. But that's actually impossible. It's impossible for them to manifest together that way.

But we have a love—well, let's say most human beings have somewhere in them a love for values, a devotedness to values. We have even eros for values. It's the beyondness in values that again forms, offers itself as a beyondness which is needed by eros. And the eros, again, will create more beyondness. So values, again, they share something in common with the imaginal—this dimensionality of beyondness that is so necessary for the pothos and the eros and the whole soul-making dynamic.

Because we—something in us, something in most human beings—love certain things. I love, I have a love, a devotedness to goodness. I have a devotedness to kindness, to beauty, to altruism, whatever. That devotedness—we also mentioned the other day when we were talking about bodhicitta—and the eros there allows us to have soul-making with respect to values. And values, as I said, are ideas. So there can be soul-making with respect to the ideas that are values.

And as I said, sensing the soul involves values—that imaginal figure's goodness, or that thing, that being's beauty, love, courage, nobility. Sensing the soul involves a perception of values, even if it's not clearly articulated. And often they're mixed up, and it's mixed in with the sensing. But that value, the love and the eros and the devotion we have to values forms part of, constitutes part of the eros to what we sense with soul.

So when I say we love and we feel devoted to values and they can be soul-making with respect to values, and eros with respect to values, I think that's really important to acknowledge, just psychologically, certainly in terms of soul work, but also in terms of when we think about ethics. We tend to only consider the question, "What to do? What should I do?" And "What's the effect or the result or the practical outcome of my action or non-action or whatever it is."

But when we consider them as values, as ideas, then we recognize this beyondness that they have. They're always going to transcend any instantiation. And that beyondness, as I said, can constitute an erotically attractive dimension or region or field for the eros. And it brings also, constitutes eros and soul-making in relation to, say, goodness and beauty, and so forth.

I can't remember if I've told this story before, but it always touches me. And when I talk to people who are in a conundrum about certain ethical situations and what to do and what not to do, or what they should do, and they feel like, "Even if I do this, it's not going to help, for example, climate change."

I heard that when the Titanic was sinking, and they evacuated all the lifeboats they could, primarily women and children first, and there were—I don't quite know the story, it might have been there was some other stuff going on about who got to get into the lifeboats. I don't know. I didn't see the film either, so I don't know if this was in the film. But those who didn't get into the lifeboats were on a clearly sinking ship in freezing cold Arctic waters. And they knew they were going to die in moments, and they began singing a hymn. Or hymns. And you think, "Well, what's the point?"

You're going to die soon. But there is an orientation there to something greater, to the soul-making, to the dimensionality, to the beauty, to what is of value. It doesn't make any practical difference.

I think I talked about in the Ecology of Love talks how we can discern two different kinds of activism, whether it's to do with environment or whatever it is—a kind of instrumental attitude, let's say, which is very focused on achieving certain ends, practically making policy changes. It's so important. Of course that's important. But there's also another kind of activism that has more to do with soul-making, and if you like, the health of one's soul as well. But it's more to do with a reverence for, an eros for, a devotion for, a love for values.

Now, it can't be only that, out of connection with what actually changes in life and trying to affect changes that are ethical and helpful. We can't only be focused on this transcendent beyond of the ideal values. Things—goodness, beauty, love—need to manifest. And we have to make practical choices in our living. But they can be both, I think, and to me a fullness of ethical sensitivity includes an attention to both and an awareness that both are operating.

We actually need the impossibility of perfection and completeness of values. There's something about that beyond that we need. There's something about that kind of impossible idealism that the soul needs. The always beyond, always more. The infinite for the eros and the soul-making. So just like anything imaginable, there's the immanent and the beyond that's also the transcendent that sends through the immanent.

One other thing to say about values is that there's something about useless values in soul making. Sometimes it's the useless values that feel—I think I mentioned this in an earlier talk—that feel for the soul somehow the most important, the highest, let's say, the highest values.

So, if we touch again on environmental ethics—oftentimes, in fact, I saw half of a program the other day on the BBC about trees, and again, it was someone trying to share their love of trees, but it was all explained in scientific terms in one sense. That actually wasn't what she most loved about trees. She was relating to them as persons. But there just wasn't the language and wasn't the conceptual framework to open that up and explain it. So in the programme that was made, in the explanation, it all got put in terms of, again, photosynthesis and the way that sap is sucked up, the fluids, the water is drawn up from the roots, and how clever that was. But one really got the sense that that was not to the point of why she actually loved trees so much.

Or when people make environmental appeals for the fate of the Amazon, and more generally of trees and forests on the planet, on the Earth. "The trees are the lungs of the planet," they say, in a kind of metaphor to explain and to persuade. They purify the air, they provide tranquil refuge and pleasantness. But when all these are regarded as elements, flatly regarded, when those "lungs of the planet" and the purification of the air, the services, the sort of environmental services that trees provide—and then sometimes that even gets given an economic fiscal value—it's all being perceived flatly, conceived of as elements of a flatly materialist interconnected system. It's still a sense of regarding trees as commodities. It's a commodity somehow.

And soul-making, sensing the soul and eros depend a lot on the uncommodified and uncommodifiable dimensions of beings and things. And also, as we said before, it's not being for me, this image, this sensing the soul, this thing that I love, this tree that I love, whatever, and this forest that I haven't seen but I love—it's not for me. It has a worth independent of what it gives humanity, independent of the economical, so it's independent even of the tranquility or whatever, or pleasantness, if we grasp them again flatly. It's not commodifiable. It's useless in that sense.

One could make parallels with falling in love. It's full of a sense of value and imaginal perception. Unless you really believe that the function of falling in love is—and you conceive of it as just a biologically driven illusion that creates a tendency to procreation, a kind of evolutionary advantage—if you really want to conceive of that soul opening and movement of falling in love that way, then it becomes merely functional. If you conceive it other ways, it's useless. It's a useless value.

And there's something about useless values that the soul thrives on, needs, creates even. I think—I'm not sure, but there's this phrase, "the age of loneliness." I'm not sure if it was George Monbiot who coined it.

And I'm not sure quite in what connection, but I think he was talking about, for instance, the decline in species and actual numbers—not just species, but individual animals and birds. Just in the last five years, almost 10%, 9 or 10%, just in the last five years, of the number of birds in Europe. Not so much species, but the actual number of birds. Five years, 10% less.

As I mentioned in one talk, that's actually noticeable at Gaia House. If you've been in one place for a long time, I notice a lot less birds, a lot less foxes, a lot less deer, a lot less badgers. George Monbiot wrote about the age of loneliness—human beings living at an alarming rate toward an absence of other life forms, of other species, of friendliness with animals, of connection with animals.

Could it be that the absence of sensing the soul, the absence of the vocabulary and the conceptuality and the conceptual architecture and frameworks to even support the views that would bring us out of flatness and into deep connection and reverence and care—that actually, out of the conceptual structure comes the perception, out of the perception comes the lack of affect and the lack of connection, and then we don't care? And so we make choices prioritizing profit, convenience, comfort, security—because those are the values that we end up centering on, because we don't have the apparatus to sense the other values and the love of them.

We don't have the apparatus to sense with soul and the much fuller connection and reverence and care that brings in conception, through perception and through action and behavior, attitude, poise, listening, receiving also. So the age of loneliness, the disappearing of both species and individual animals and trees, and other life forms, corals.

I want to add to that: could it also be that even in the presence of nature—one could be driving by a forest or walking somewhere—because there isn't the openness to sensing the soul, we don't feel the connection? The magnificent, glorious theophany is there of the trees, of the animals. And we're lonely because we don't have the apparatus to sense the deeper connection. Even when it's still there, before we've destroyed it or neglected it so much, prioritized something else, that it disappears. Even when it's still there, there's the loneliness because we don't have that capacity to connect.

I think it was in the Awakening talk, but I talked about that passage from Genesis where God calls Abraham and says, "Lech lecha. Go, leave this place, leave your family, leave your father, leave your household, leave the lands that you know. Go to the land that I will show you." Lech lecha—go from this country.

I would like to, in the spirit of play and openness and creation discovery, add something, a possible gematria there, a possible amplification of what's involved in that, what I call the perennial call of soul, the perennial call of the divine to the soul. Lech lecha: Open to the soul-making dynamic which will open your soul landscape. Leave behind what is not soul-making. Move on. Things may break. Things may stretch. So this perennial call lech lecha.

I'm reading the biblical text that way more timelessly as a soul narrative. There's a possible gematria here in Hebrew: lech lecha, if we take the individual letters there—lamed kaf, lamed kaf—adds up to a hundred, which is the face value of the letters. Another word whose letters add up to a hundred is al. And al can mean height, as in the supernal, the divine, the heavens. In our translation, it means the dimensionality, the height, the depth, the divinity. So al has the connotation of divinity.

The same letters, but with different vowel inflections, ol—also a hundred, because it's the same letters—means yoke. Not an egg yolk, but a yoke as in, as Jesus said, "My yoke is easy and my burden is light." What you put around the neck of an oxen or a horse to pull the plough. Yoke.

So in the soul-making, in the lech lecha, in the call to the soul to move on, to expand, to make soul, the call of the divine to make soul, there is the opening of the divine, the dimensionality—this we know. But there is also the duty, the yoke, that comes with it.

What is the yoke now? What is this duty now? What are our duties? In opening up the soul-making with respect to earth, with respect to trees, with respect to existence, we open up the dimensionality and we're given—perhaps it brings duties or duty. We could also say it is a duty. The soul-making is a duty.

Go. Go from what you know. Go from the familiar. Go from the stuck places, the small circumference that is no longer soul-making. Let the dimensions open to your senses. There's a duty in that, and it will bring duties. It will bring duties.

What are the duties to that which we sense with soul, to the earth, to the trees, to the animals, to existence?

CHAPTER 134

Between Ikon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 7 - The Scripture of Body and Earth)

Rob Burbea · 1h29

> In this seventh installment of The Mirrored Gates series, Rob Burbea delves into the profound relationship between ideas and soul-making, particularly focusing on how our conceptions of body and materiality shape and are shaped by imaginal practice. Drawing from hermeneutical philosophy, he explores how the body can be approached as a sacred text open to multiple interpretations, moving beyond conventional Buddhist frameworks that view the body merely as an object for detachment.
>
> Burbea discusses how energy body awareness can transform our understanding of materiality, opening possibilities for sensing the body imaginally - not just as flesh and bone, but as light, cosmic elements, or healing presence. He shares a detailed practitioner report illustrating how imaginal practice can heal grief and expand devotional capacity. The talk examines how different conceptual frameworks - from Theravāda contemplations of the body's impermanence to tantric visualizations - create entirely different experiential possibilities.
>
> Weaving together insights from Heidegger and Gadamer's hermeneutical philosophy, Sami yoik traditions, and Mahāyāna teachings on the three bodies of Buddha, Burbea demonstrates how sensing with soul naturally expands our ideation about reality itself. He explores how sacred texts can be 'heard' not just in scripture but in wind, birdsong, and the very fabric of existence when approached with the proper purity and devotional stance. This teaching reveals how imaginal practice opens us to a pluralistic understanding of truth while maintaining the healing power of praise and eros.

So we've been talking about ideas and concepts and the way they impact the possibilities for sensing the soul. We talked about the different ways that we receive a legacy of ideas—a mixture of ideas from the past—and the influence that has on possibilities of our experience and our conception. We talked about the possibility of other ideas rather than limited ones, and we talked about the possibility of actually questioning ideas to open the realm of possibilities for us. We talked about certain ideas that we can open up a bit more to expand the range of possibilities available to us.

We talked too about the possibility to listen or read—to listen for ideas. This isn't some big intellectual exercise. There are ideas flying around all the time. And listening for ideas and then lingering with an idea if it feels like something about it speaks to you, speaks to the soul—that lingering, listening and lingering, gives those potential seeds of ideas a place in the soul womb, a place in the soil. It's planting them in the soil, and perhaps reflecting on them is turning that soil to nourish the seed more so that it might give rise to, might suggest, might open out into a way of looking or a range of ways of looking and sensing the soul.

We also mentioned the important place for the emotions in all this. When we're talking about ideas and the place of ideas in sensing with soul and the importance of ideas in sensing with soul, those ideas are, again, not abstract. They are connected to, informing and informed by, shaping and shaped by, and grounded in the emotions that are in our heart. So there's a necessary place and necessity when we talk about ideas giving rise to or helping seed sensing with soul—emotions are included, wrapped up, interwoven with that.

We talked about, for example, emotions like devotion and devotional yearning and just the general fact of it needing to matter. This idea needs to matter because this way of sensing matters to me, to my soul, right now, to my sense of existence. So that sense of mattering—we could say that's an affect, partly, an emotional condition. It's also a soul condition. But that water of the emotions is like we're watering the seeds so that these seeds can come alive, the ideas can come alive again and spring forth, suggest sensing the soul.

And, of course, implicit in a lot of what we've been saying is that practicing sensing the soul, opening to those kinds of experiences, also opens our ideation, it opens our conception, it expands our ideas about things and our conceptions of them. It gives rise also to new ideas—new ideas, different ideas that we haven't had before, sometimes we've never heard before. The very perceptual experience, the very sensual experience of sensing the soul gives rise at times to new ideas or expands our range of possible ideation in regard to some aspect of existence.

Now all that is implicit just because of the way the soul-making dynamic works. We've talked about that. In the interfusion, the interweaving, the inter-insemination of the eros, psyche, logos elements of the dynamic, the enriching, deepening, widening, complicating, and making manifold of the image—of the psyche aspect, what we're calling the psyche aspect, the image, the sense of something—in the expansion of that, after some time (as we said, the logos is a little more slow to move generally), as that keeps happening, we keep opening up to different images and different aspects. That whole imaginal range, the range of sensing the soul, the perception of things, all kinds of things, starts expanding more and more. It impacts us, it impacts the soul, it registers, and this feels important, and this feels beautiful, and this feels meaningful, and this gives another dimension.

And we sense a kind of truth in that, a kind of truth. Anything and everything—this sensing the soul can touch. And so the idea of any and everything will be gradually expanded, gradually filled with new possible ideas. Not, again, in a narrow conception, but in a wider conception of possible plurality of truths, perceptions of the truth. So not "this, only this, and not that," but "this and that." This way of seeing, this way of conceiving, and that way—an embrace of a pluralistic understanding, the generosity of a pluralistic understanding of truth.

But sensing the soul will begin to impact our conceptions of what is real and what is true. Over time, it expands that. And part of—so that's a really important point. That's a general point that I want to make today. And part of what it means is that the sensing of soul will impact the ideas, expand the ideas of any and everything that gets involved with soul, that becomes an erotic object, an erotic imaginal beloved—anything at all, whether it's part of us, or material, or someone else, or whatever.

Included in that fertilization and expansion of ideas about what things are includes ideas about the earth, about where we are, about these surroundings, and ideas about nature, and also ideas about body and materiality.

Now we've placed—so this is where I want to start—ideas about body and a little bit about earth and nature. But we've talked a lot about body, placed a lot of emphasis on it, a lot of emphasis on practicing with that kind of sensitivity to the whole energy body. And we've stressed as one of the aspects of the imaginal that might help to move things along, to open things out further along the spectrum of what we might call the spectrum of the imagination towards more fully, authentically, genuinely imaginal, we've pinpointed one of those aspects being the whole energy body awareness—that kind of poise and sensitivity and consciousness that pervades the body that way.

And one of the things we said at some point, probably a few times, is that doing that is one of the things that can help transform, transmute craving into eros.

So there's this transformation from the problem of craving into the gift of eros, the bounty, the opening of eros and the gift and the opening of what it brings.

With awareness of the whole energy body, this becomes a constituent of the wider approach that is a necessary element in supporting the soul-making, supporting and sensing the soul. As we become aware of the energy body in this way and the sensing with soul opens in any moment, lingering with that awareness, one of the things that happens is that as the sensing with soul begins to spread or to include and embrace and touch more aspects of our experience in that moment, it can and will start to include the body as an imaginal body.

We begin with energy body awareness, which is a way of paying attention to our body. As the sensing with soul gets established and opens out, in its opening out, the body then becomes imaginal. And what does it mean to sense the body imaginally, the imaginal perception of the body? This will have all those aspects that we outlined in the first talk of this course.

Sometimes we can actually start with deliberately imagining the body alongside the energy body awareness. We can start with a deliberate imagining of a body, even if it doesn't feel imaginal at first. It might become imaginal when we have the energy body awareness and we just start to get into that image.

For instance, one could sometimes ignite an opening into the imaginal, an opening into a wider sensing with soul, by just settling into the body—being with the felt sense of the energy body, and then maybe lightly, with that sense, deliberately imagining the body in a certain way. It could be anything: a body of blue light, for instance, with the contours that this body has, but made of blue light with that texture and that substance and that appearance. It might be that as I resonate with that deliberately imagined image, it becomes imaginal, and I can support it in that way. In that opening, then, the world and the sense of self, and perhaps others as well, will become imaginal in the usual way that the cosmopoesis spreads when there's imaginal perception.

This is worth trying—actually deliberately imagining the body a certain way, and seeing if it becomes imaginal. Because once it becomes imaginal, as I said, the impactful experience of the imaginal in general, sensing with soul, eventually, with a slower pace and tempo, begins pushing at the edges of our logos, of individual things and our wider logos, our wider conceptual frameworks, and stretches them or breaks them open or enlarges them.

This little suggestion of deliberately imagining the body is interesting. When I said "a body of blue light," that already implies a more ethereal register on the spectrum of the energy body from very solid to very ethereal. For many people, it will likely be easier then. Things are more labile, more easily moved, less tending toward a heaviness and stasis with the imagination and with the whole sense of it. So it might be that for many people it's easier when the body is perceived deliberately and lightly that way, for it then to open into the imaginal.

But it doesn't actually have to be that way. We've stressed this several times, and I want to re-emphasize it. Just as we can have a sensing with soul of the body—as I think I shared the other day—the body sensed in, tuned into the earth element. This earth element is stone. It's hard. It's dense. It has a kind of darkness to it. It's somehow related to the cosmic stone that's around planets or on planets. It begins to have this cosmic earth element. It begins to have its own personhood and its own way of perceiving and sensing its own kind of intelligence—very different than typical human intelligence, of course.

One could start, then, this deliberate imagining with a much more solid, dense image that's much more solid and dense on that register—lower on the register, so to speak, less ethereal. Play with all of this and see what happens, see what's possible.

Would this little exercise work if one is perceiving one's energy body ecstatically, in the original sense, meaning not in the same location, in the same space as the physical body? Sometimes I've described how I might feel my energy body joyfully turning cartwheels as if it might be ten yards away. I'm still very aware of the physical sensations and where the physical body is, but it's as if I have two body awarenesses at once—flying or dancing or whatever it is. Will this work if one deliberately imagines the energy body outside, deliberately dancing or deliberately doing these ecstatic somersaults?

Which is easiest? Whenever I talk about the body outside, I don't think one ever loses touch with the sense of what's, conventionally speaking, where the material body is. But you can experiment and see. Is it easier this way or that way? Or both? Or only one?

I mentioned at some point in this series that when we talk about any kind of body awareness, any kind of mindfulness of body—whether it's energy body awareness as we've been discussing, or just mindfulness of the body or awareness of the body—usually wrapped up in what we're calling mindfulness of the body, awareness of the body, are three aspects or dimensions. One is the physical sense of the body. What I really mean by that is the kinesthetic sense. What's the felt sense of this space? What's the felt sense of the body? We can call that kinesthetic.

As a second aspect, we'll also have some kind of image of the body—some kind of mental representation. It may be imaginal, but it may not be.

Just sort of seeing or imagining my body in space—even if my eyes are shut—how it's positioned, what posture it's in, all of that. And as a third aspect, it has an idea of what body is. There's some kind of logos operating there.

Now usually we don't give this much attention; we're not even that conscious of it. As I said, a lot of logos, a lot of concepts and ideas are subliminal, really. They're below the radar of our consciousness and they're unquestioned a lot of the time. But there's always, with any moment of bodily awareness, these three aspects: a felt sense, a kinesthetic sense, some kind of image, and some kind of idea.

The body is... for instance, my idea might be that the body is made up of meaningless matter in some kind of very impressive arrangement that allows all this material matter to function together as a sort of very complex unit. But it's essentially flatly conceived material matter—even if we look at it in terms of systems theory, if some of you know that, which gives it or generates a sort of higher level organistic unity, organic unity. It's still flat from our perspectives in terms of what we're talking about.

But there are always these three aspects with any bodily awareness. An important point I want to make is that one of them is the idea of the body—the ideas about body and matter, the concepts that are operating which we may not be aware of at the time. And that's included any time we... as one of those three aspects, whenever we pay attention to the body, whenever we're aware of the body, even when it's not a deliberate mindfulness thing.

So, just to recap something—again, I'm recapping quite a lot in this talk, but that's important. Why so much emphasis on the energy body? Sometimes I know people have asked me, and even though I know that I've said it before, even though I've told them, it's very easy to forget.

So one reason is just that the practice of the energy body in the way that we're talking about it gives so much help to practice. We can use it as a resource through the cultivating of samādhi, the harmonization, the alignment, the opening that we might feel, just dwelling in that. And really feeling this body, this physical space that I inhabit is, a lot of the time for me, a resource, a source of nourishment, a source of well-being that's immensely useful.

But it can be a resource—this energy body awareness and energy body practice—in other ways, helpful in the deepening and also the navigation of other practices. So, for example, mettā. How do I know what's helpful right now in the mettā as I subtly weave my mettā practice and respond to what's going on? The energy body is telling me. Similarly with samādhi or compassion or emptiness practices and imaginal practice. Remember, that's one of the indicators that we're on the right track with an image, even if the mind is telling us, "Well, I don't know, this is kind of crazy." Also very helpful with emotional awareness practices, the cultivation of positive emotions and also the working with difficult emotions. So all of that is just very practical help.

But implicit in what I've said so far tonight is another aspect of working with the energy body: that again, over time, experience with the energy body and with that kind of attunement and sensing the body that way will begin to re-enchant the body. And through the body, the self. The body is always primary, at least connected with the self, whatever one's conception of the self might be.

So involved in energy practice over time, one of the things it starts to do is re-enchant the body. Through that sense, which as I said, can make a felt... that felt sense makes a deep impression. And we get the sense through energy body awareness, through paying attention in certain ways, we begin to get the sense or the impression of the body not as essentially just flat matter, just a product of its genes, just a bunch of complex molecules kind of swarming around in interaction with each other.

Yes, one can, as I said, in the spirit of plurality, in the generosity of plurality, entertain that conception and go along with it. So, you know, I take my medicine. That says enough. But not just that.

Over time, having paid attention in a different way and been impacted by these experiences and just the repeated sense of... well, a different sense of the body. So we can sense the body, not just as flat matter, but also somehow resonant, somehow having a spectrum of subtleties of vibration going into what we might call the more ethereal, as well as the more dense, somehow connected with light even, somehow—more importantly—connected and integrated with the cosmos, and not only in material ways.

We get the sense, through the sensitivity to the energy body, we get the sense of this body, this energy body—meaning this body, meaning just this one of the dimensions, or the range of dimensions of this body—is somehow integrated into the cosmos and connected with the cosmos, but not only in material ways. And that sense of deeper and more beautiful and richer weaving in becomes more prominent. It's a sense, it's an impression, and it begins to be an idea.

So over this whole range—light to ethereal to dense, whatever—this paying attention that way opens up the sense of the body. And as the body through this starts to become more imaginatively perceived, as I said earlier, then it can also start... it's as if body and the matter of the body and the organism of the body starts to have its own soul.

We can be in erotic relationship with this body, this body as beloved other. And in being in soul that way, there's the intersubjectivity and the autonomy, and it starts to have, we start to sense that the body has its own intelligence, its own perception. Again, by that I don't just mean, "Wow, isn't it clever the way the body transports nerve signals from the brain to the end of the fingers, or transports... interchanges oxygen and carbon dioxide in alveoli in the lungs." Yes, that's pretty smart, but we're talking about a kind of its own subjectivities, its own dimensions and kinds of knowing. That starts to open up.

So in all this, as practicing the energy body, as the body becomes imaginal, partly supported through energy body awareness, the idea of body opens up. The idea of bodies opens up. So experience influences idea. But as we've pointed out a lot, idea, conception, logos, influences experience and opens it or shapes it or directs it or limits it, colors it, closes off certain avenues. And the concept, logos, idea of the body and materiality certainly affects our range of experience and perception of body.

So I shared that little anecdote about being on retreat in the woods for ten days in complete solitude, really practicing a very fruitful but very narrow Theravadan avenue of practice, going deep into the jhanas—very lovely and very fruitful, as I said. But also implicit in that Theravadan logos was a Theravadan fantasy in the background. I didn't have the words for it at the time.

All that, implicit in that Theravadan logos and fantasy, is only a partial interest in the body, only an interest in opening up certain perceptions of the body, and only for the sake of letting go of attachment to it. So the body as foul and full of unclean substances and parts, the body as a corpse—potential corpse, future corpse—the body as just the four elements, a kind of deconstructing to nothing but the four elements.

This whole conceptual framework of narrowly conceived Theravadan Buddhism frames and has an idea of the body a certain way, directing the attention in a certain way to the body. And indeed, that shaped my experience of it, my perception of it when I caught sight of myself in my naked body in the mirror in the woods there.

We can have, of course, all kinds of ideas. So the mass-produced and mass-proliferated relationship to the body that's pushed in a lot of popular culture these days—where it's a kind of obsession but also a kind of worry about one's appearance. It's got to look this way or that way, and there's very easily judgment, self-judgment, other judgment coming into that, and all the problems that brings. What's the conception of body? And again, it's set in a wider cosmological conception, as is the Theravadan one—conception of body and attention to body.

This conception and attention to body in popular culture in our society is also set in a wider cosmological context. Ideas again are connected—they nestle in each other, they feed each other back and forth, they support each other.

Another conception of body could be, as some of you might know, in tantric dharma and the practices they have there with their channels and drops and inner winds—it's a very different conception of body, or the kind of alchemy of those tantric practices, or a shamanic conception of body in some cultures, or indeed any indigenous culture. It's a very different, wider cosmological conceptual frame, and different conception of body and materiality. And that will affect the experience.

We could give so many examples, but there's an experience shaped by the way of looking—part of the way of looking is conception, whether we're aware of it or not. Again, I'm just saying in other words what I've said before, but there's really this possibility, seeing all this, to open up the sense of the body and therefore the idea of the body. "The body is like this. It's like this. This is the reality." But is it? Or is it only that? Are there other ways of experiencing and other ways of thinking?

So back to hermeneutics—the interpretation of matter, the interpretation of body as part of the interpretation of existence. Remember, hermeneutics originally meant the interpretation of sacred texts. But as philosophers went deeper into all this, they realized, well, actually, we're talking about everything. So ideas are connected. We actually interpret our cosmos all the time. All the time. And hermeneutics, to me, is a really interesting subject. What happens in that interpretation? What is possible in that interpretation? What am I not aware of in the hermeneutics of my existence?

One of the people who explored this was Heidegger, the German philosopher, who wrote in his famous text Being and Time: "An interpretation is never a presuppositionless apprehending of something presented to us." If, when one is engaged in a particular kind of interpretation, one would like to appeal to what is "just there," what is "standing there," then one finds that what stands there in the first instance is nothing other than the seemingly obvious, undiscussed assumption of the person who does the interpreting.

He's just saying in different words what I've been exploring for quite a while.

But we see our seemingly obvious, undiscussed assumptions. We perceive—that's what we, so to speak, interject into our perceptions, or let's say that's part of the fabrication of our perceptions.

So the hermeneutical circle—I talked about that once, I think, though I can't remember on what retreat—the hermeneutical circle is never purely philological. Let's skip a bit and say it's not simply a movement between the parts and the whole of a text or what is presented in existence before us as an object. So we figure out what this means in relation to a whole because we figure out the whole, and there's a kind of mutual fitting together of the whole—or an attempt at mutually fitting together the whole and the parts and what they mean.

The hermeneutical circle is the problem of: I can't interpret the parts unless I have an overall idea of what the whole means. But I can't interpret the whole until I've interpreted the parts. Whether that's a text or parts of existence or whatever.

But Heidegger is saying here, it's actually more than that. It's more than a kind of scientific jigsaw. It's what he calls an ontological movement between the text or the object and our situation as interpreters of it. And this was all elaborated by another philosopher called Gadamer, Hans-Georg Gadamer, which again I find really interesting and really important.

We bring ideas to objects. We can't help but do that. But in experiencing and in opening up our experience, the objects that we have brought ideas to, the perceptions that we have brought ideas to, the sense of things that we have brought ideas to—they open up our ideas, give us our ideas back, generate ideas back. It's not really that dualistic, but we throw something in and something is thrown back at us.

Can we see body as in the realm of hermeneutics like everything else—as an object for interpretation, an aspect of existence that, like a sacred text, is open to interpretation? And like we've talked about in the hermeneutics and the midrashic condition and all that, it's open, it's flexible, it's multiply interpretable—if it matters, if it matters to you, if it matters to the interpreter, if it matters to the one who is sensing.

Body as sacred text. What might that mean? Body as amenable to this kind of infinite richness of sensing and interpretation and dialogue.

I got an email from someone I'd like to share with you. It's a report about her practice and it's really rich. Partly why I'd like to share it is because of what we're talking about right now, but there's so much in it—so much in terms of describing really skillful, responsive practice. I'll highlight some of that.

So she wrote—she was on retreat and this is a kind of report post a fairly long retreat. "I was sitting doing the releasing clinging practice." Okay, you've heard me talk about that again and again. Noticing clinging, releasing it, noticing clinging, releasing it. I think I call it the Dukkha method too. And it's a very lovely practice that opens up the unfabricating and understanding of emptiness and brings with it real softness and loveliness and healing.

"So I was sitting doing the releasing clinging practice and sat for the forty-five minutes without moving and felt very still and peaceful and comfortable. So I continued to sit. And when most of the people left the hall, I had this kinesthetic sense of a field of energy, a kind of net or of soft web-like material that covered me and the hall, and all the people in the hall."

So already we're in the realm of energetic energy body, and experience, and image of materiality, if you like, on the edge of all that.

"I could feel it," she continues, "but I knew it was so light that it was only because I was very sensitive that I could feel it." She's aware of the mind state, and there's this real sensitivity there. "I could feel it glistening," she says. "It was gossamer, very delicate, but very potent, sublime and powerful. It felt really special. I was a bit taken aback by it, but then I felt a very faint kinesthetic sense that I had a nun's habit on."

And then she has pasted in a delightful picture of a nun. I've no idea what order that is or anything, but it's a very pretty, far-out-looking nun's hat. And it's just something like that with the picture, which really surprised her and amused her because of the funny hat. I'm not even going to try and describe the hat, but it was rather beautiful, she says.

"Along with the feeling of being a nun was this complete devotion to you." She's writing this to me, and she's explained that I am—she has many, many images, lots of rich images. Some of the images that she has, some of the imaginal images that she has are people that she knows, like we've explained as a possibility. So I'm one of those people. And in relation to me, she has quite a few different kinds of images, very different.

"And so there was this feeling of being a nun and this complete devotion to you, the image of you." She's very aware of image as image. There's not this kind of reification or concretization or grasping or clinging there. It's an image and it's just something that's possible in that it possibly gives rise to the soulfulness and the soul-making with the awareness of the imaginal way and all that. She's made very clear and she's very aware of it.

"This is the image of you as Buddha. And she says, I'm sure you remember, I have several images of you, and one is of you as Buddha."

This image is wrapped up in your Dharma. So when I say I'm devoted to you, she says, it is to you and all that you are for me in this way. You represent practice, soul-making, and so forth. She's explaining that. I know obviously that you are more than that. She's not reducing me to this. She knows that I have a human side and all that, of course. She's not identifying me with this Buddha image, thankfully. I know obviously that you are more than that, and I have several images of you, she repeats. But this one is very prominent at the moment.

She continues: So it felt like you were there in the hall, sitting at the front by the statues, but you weren't a visual image at all. Again, all this has so much possible teaching in it—not a visual image here. What kind of image? It was like an impression of you, like the space had your imprint or something, your essence was there. It was really ethereal, but at the same time very powerful, strong and tangible. It didn't make sense at all, but it did make sense.

Can you hear how much is here just in the words that she's using to describe this experience? How many elements of what she describes are things we've touched on in the teaching? It doesn't have to be visual. There's going to be some doubt sometimes. It kind of makes sense and it kind of doesn't—all of that.

My devotion was coming out in a strong feeling of energy leaving my body and going to you, and it was delightful and energizing. I really enjoyed giving my full devoted energy to you. It was as if there was a space left after giving all my energy that was very quickly filled with a sublime warm love, an unconditional love, and then the sense was of devotion and compassion. It felt sacred and very special and divine. I was divine.

Again, there's this inclusion, this spreading of the soul-making dynamic, of the sensing with soul to include self and other. Importantly, as I said, for the balance and the health here, it's not just that she's seeing me as divine and not herself. As things evolve, there's the "I was divine, you were divine." And it felt as if our divines were in communion, our divinities were in communion.

Now she's describing something that took place over several days. Then she went for an interview with a teacher—in this case, Kirsten—and she said: Then I explained the bit about the nun to Kirsten. And Kirsten asked lots of questions. And in my explaining, it came out that I felt my hands had some sort of healing power.

So again, sometimes talking with other people, sometimes in the temenos around images, it can draw out the power of the image, ignite it further, help it to become fully alive, and actually give birth to or create/discover other dimensions or aspects of the image. So partly she also expressed her appreciation of the skillful way that Kirsten was asking, and particularly when she was trying to explain something and making a gesture with her hand and Kirsten pointed out the gesturing. So what does that gesture mean?

She says: It came out that I felt my hands had some sort of healing effect. Like if I cupped my hands around someone's face, like you might imagine a nun doing to a small child, it would make them feel better. That in the touching, there would be some tangible love transmitted.

Then again—this is over some little time on retreat—then I had a wave of several, or several waves of hindrances: restlessness and aversion. Then I read the bit in your book, and to my great surprise, they went away easily, the hindrances. But then came a huge wave of grief for a relative that had died recently, and my mom, who had also died a few years ago, and the life I've wasted. It felt as if the grief was right behind the hindrances, as if they were connected.

And this is my first question: Do you think they were linked? Do the hindrances often mask something else? And yes, they do. Sometimes, indeed, they mask deeper emotions that we're not quite in touch with yet—we're holding back a little bit. Sometimes the hindrances are masking a deeper emotion that's calling for a different kind of attention, connection to and opening with and healing.

And so then this grief came. And then in the sitting: I very softly wiped away the flood of tears with my hands. And my hands became the nun's hands. And I cupped my face. So she's actually doing this in the sitting. She's moving her body out of the still meditation posture and cupping her face with her physical hands, but they're the nun's hands.

I cupped my face with the healing that comes out of them. I cupped my face, and then this crack appeared. It was like there was a sliver of space that allowed the love to come in—the love from her hands, the love to come in so that there was the grief and the love existing together. The love for lost ones, including myself. And I could hold this deep loss and the love together. It was really special and wonderful.

So again, there's so much here about dukkha and soul-making. We've talked about how healing images can be. In this case, it's a kind of level of grief that the image, and particularly the bodily images here, and the ideas of the body that are implicit in all this—this was what allowed a kind of level of healing to come in and start a level of healing, or perhaps, who knows where it will go.

And then she said, "I've had trouble making my mum an image, as it's difficult to bring her to mind without being overwhelmed with grief." Because her mum died, as I said, a few years ago. But sometime after this, she spontaneously came as an image and helped me when I was feeling doubt, giving me encouragement.

So again, this person, like many of you listening, is someone who has doubts. And doubts, as many people do, doubts about their practice and themselves, and all kinds of doubts. So I'm partly pointing that out—say, if you're listening to this and think, "Well, that sounds amazing, I'm sure she's like this or like that." This is someone who has doubts as well.

So the image of her mum as well was kind of enabled through the healing that came out through the other image that involved devotion and also the different sense of energy and different sense of body. And then the image of her mum was sort of brought alive and able to kind of communicate with her.

Then she says, "Later I did your practice of Eros and the Brahmaviharas with a difficult person and I chose my mum as the beloved." Again, I don't need to repeat it, but I'll say again, Eros doesn't mean necessarily sexual. So there's an erotic connection because her mum is image, is imaginal. And with the imaginal wrapped up in that is Eros. So her mum is the beloved as image, and then she's having this difficulty with someone, and there's aversion, and all kinds of things—fear and judgment, whatever.

And so the erotic beloved imaginal other, in this case her mom, came and she used that in a Brahmavihara meditation which helped to open and support the metta and compassion to this person that she was struggling with. So one image has brought another—the image of her mom—to life. It's enabled it to come through where it wasn't so able before and it's given it life and potency. And she said, "And that broke the spell of the ill will that I hadn't been able to shift. It shifted like magic," she said.

So, as I said, there's a lot there in terms of just so many aspects of working this kind of way—in terms of the willingness to experiment, the flexibility, the responsiveness, the care, the sensitivity of attention, all kinds of things. Very, very rich and beautiful report.

But implicit with the images that she describes and the sensing with soul that she describes are ideas. Ideas about bodies, hands that heal—her hands, her physical hands touching, that can heal on different levels. Ideas about energy and this kind of net of energy that's kind of touching and connecting everyone in the whole.

Ideas also about the locus of personhood. So one of the things about the body is that we tend, very understandably, to consider it that that's where someone is, and that's kind of where their consciousness is, and sometimes we say it's in their brain, or whatever, if we're getting quite narrowly material. But in that image that she had of me, it was not a visual image. It wasn't that I was there. It was like a presence was there.

And it was somewhere near the front of the hall. But it was there. Where is the personhood? She knows that I wasn't there. But it was like I was there. Where is a person? Where is a consciousness?

There are other ways to open this up. One of them is through the sixth jhana. If you spend a lot of time with that, the whole notion of where consciousness is and whose it is gets really opened up in terms of the potential ways of perceiving and conceiving of that. But also through sensing with soul, imaginal practice. Body as locus of personhood. Or locus of personhood not necessarily being limited to a physical material location.

There's also ideas here about communication. Communication that can take place between me and her and between her mum and her. So again, regular experiences of sensing with soul—it wouldn't happen if it was just one, one or two, but regular—it starts to open up the sense of the body, if we're staying with body right now, and matter, and then the conception. It gets pushed on, it gets questioned, it gets expanded.

And it gets made plural.

Again, pointing out that wherever there's image, there's idea involved. So the ideation, or the concept, is an element of the sensing of the soul, because it's part of the eros-psyche-logos structure of soul-making. Ideas are wrapped up in images. They go with images. That's something I want to stress again.

So what is it to approach or see the body as hermeneutically and with the spirit of, in the poise of disciple, if you like? Someone to whom the interpretation of this text matters. Body is sacred text and it matters. I'm not just approaching it with cold, so-called objectivity of science. Body and world are sacred texts.

We've talked about texts a little bit last night, with the potential richness of meanings—again, plurality of meanings—and playing with words, and playing with etymologies, and playing with sounds, and text as sacred sound, and the numerology and all of that. We talked on the previous retreat, I think it was the Re-enchanting the Cosmos retreat, about giving attention to the mudra, hand posture, and general body posture, and movement of the body—to enact movements of the body and postures of the body, and to sense those movements and postures of the body with soul. Sensing the holiness there in the multidimensional aspect of that.

Body and world are sacred texts. And in the spirit of participation, the interpreter's participation is part of the text. It's participation. So moving the body and reading it this way, sensing it with soul, is part of creating, discovering what the body is, what the body can be.

I think it was the same retreat where we talked very briefly about language and we had a guided meditation with the Om Mani Padme Hum mantra, actually starting to perceive those syllables of the mantra as if they were infusing the fabric of the cosmos—a jewel-lined world of these radiant, mystical syllables of the holy mantra that is the fabric of the world at one level. Primordial sound, divine and cosmic powers in the sound.

Could we not just practice chanting that way, with everything that came out of that—if you remember that guided meditation, the meditation moved beyond sound to just an all-embracing perception of things. But could we actually practice listening this way? Listening, and what are we listening to? I'm listening right now, I'm listening to the words, I'm trying to understand what you're saying. But could we listen to speech and perhaps hear and understand, and also listen to the sound?

What is communicated? Is it just information? One person tells the other, "The salt's over there," or something very complicated, or "I feel good, I feel bad," or "Yesterday I did this," or "My story is this." What is communicated? There are so many different levels, so many different dimensions of what's communicated through speech, potentially, what's heard through speech.

Can I practice, perhaps practice with another, practice with another consciously, deliberately, or practice with whoever one is listening to, practice hearing the meaning and the divine music? The mantra? As I said in Tantra, hear all sounds as divine speech, as mantra. Hear all sounds as mantra. It's a Tantric instruction. Can you actually practice listening that way? Whether it's to your friend, whether it's to someone else. Mantra, divine speech, incantation. Hearing the music in things. Hearing the prayer in things. All sound is prayer.

I touched on this again on a past retreat—I think it was, again, the Re-enchanting the Cosmos retreat. What does prayer mean? Because that's another instance where we can have an idea of prayer and it's quite narrow: I'm asking for something from some kind of bigger power or higher power, and I hope that they give it to me. Prayer can mean that, but it has a real range of possibility. It's a word that, once that word starts getting involved in the soul-making dynamic, really opens up. Prayer becomes something limitless in its possibilities. Prayer as blessing. Every prayer is a blessing.

And so, if this is what I'm hearing in speech, but maybe also in any sound—the wind, the birds, even right now the sound, maybe you can't hear it on the recording, the sound of the electrical hum from the heater beside me in this freezing house. Divine music, divine speech, incantation, spell, music, prayer, blessing.

What is blessing? What does that mean? If it's the divine blessing all creation, that includes me. That includes everything around me. That includes this room, this space. That includes you. These sounds now are the sounds of the divine blessing all creation. It's the prayer of the divine.

But all creation is not other than the divine. So the divine is in some ways blessing itself. And even blessing is blessing. Blessing is blessing. When there's a sense in the soul, when there's that kind of opening and attunement, you can hear this in everything. You can hear this way as a practice.

So there are ideas too of language and sound. We can open those up. What is being communicated? What is language? What are these sounds that I'm hearing? What are they? What's going on there?

I learned recently about something called Yoik. I think that's how you say it. Anyone know what that is? It belongs to the Sami peoples. The Sami peoples are indigenous to Lapland, northern Finland, Norway, parts of Russia—those very northern peoples. And they sing Yoik.

But in singing a joik song, it's not that they... so they might sing a joik song, and if there are lyrics or whatever, it's the story of a wolf or it's about a wolf. But when you understand, when you ask what they mean by it or what's going on there, it's not that they sing about this or that—about an animal or a person or a place or the land. It's rather that they conceive it—their idea with Yoik is that they sing the land. They don't sing about the land. They sing the land.

Remember that image I was sharing—the bird song was singing and weaving my energy body, my body in some kind of very healing way. The birds were singing me. And so the Yoik sings the land. It invokes—or rather than evokes, if you like—it invokes the land. They sing the land. With their song, they weave its being.

So there, when they have that kind of space in their logos, then entering into that and singing that way and having that ideation, there's a deep sense and concept there and framework there of participation. They're singing. They sing the land. They sing the animals. They sing being. They sing things into being. They weave into being—participation of their own creativity, if you like, or their own voice in manifestation, in cosmopoiesis.

So there's a kind of intimacy there supported by that and involved in that. It must be more than just, say, another idea, which is a recognition of material equality.

It's earth element, I'm earth element, and earth element is perceived flatly, or it's atoms and I'm atoms. There's an intimacy there that's got a whole other richness to it.

And then the land, or whatever they're singing there, that land and the animals, must surely appear in certain ways to them. Again, dependent. The perception is going to be dependent on the way of looking, and on the ideas in the way of looking. Actually, even in their very conception, it's already conceived of as not simply and objectively pre-existing. The land pre-exists, and then we may or may not sing this song or whatever. It's already implicit that somehow I'm participating in this land, but the participation is at a whole other level than just "I farm the land" or "I breathe the air."

And surely such a view and such a practice makes the kind of perspectives and intentions that would lead to, say, strip mining or any kind of disconnectively extractivist orientation impossible.

Apparently this Yoik, the oral traditions of the Sami people say, was learned from or given by the fairies and the elves of the Arctic lands, who gave Yoik to the Sami people. So it's a very, very old musical tradition, probably one of the oldest living musical traditions in Europe. When the Christians came there, they condemned it as sinful, prohibited it, perhaps because it had some kind of association with shamans and pre-Christian mythology and rituals. Also because Yoiking was said to resemble magic spells.

And you can see that it has some of that quality of magic, of spells, of incantation, invocation. So in creating and discovering sacred sound there, nature is made sacred in a whole different way. And there is magic there. So wrapped up in that, there are ideas of earth, of song, of sound, and again of communication. Ideas of communication.

Some of you will have heard of the three bodies of the Buddha. It's a very common Mahayana teaching: the Dharmakaya, the Sambhogakaya, and the Nirmanakaya. I'm not going to go too much into that now. I've touched on some of it just a little bit in the past, I think.

That word, nirmana, of the last one, nirmanakaya, means actually a magical creation. Sometimes it's given a very idealist slant, non-materialist slant. So a magical creation is something that has no material basis. So this is one of the bodies of the Buddha. In Mahayana teaching, it's like the Buddha is really the primordial Buddha who is manifesting a body that we perceive as physical at some point in history and manifesting that—it actually is not material, it's a kind of magical emanation. Some Mahayana teachers would explain it that way.

But the word nirmana means forming or making or creating or creation or building or a composition like a musical composition or something like a work, like a work of art. And also a transformation. So the nirmanakaya can mean the body of transformations, or the body of magical transformation.

When we translate, when I have touched on these three bodies of the Buddha, of the primordial Buddha—Dharmakaya, Sambhogakaya, Nirmanakaya—they can be seen as, especially the Dharmakaya and Sambhogakaya, pervasive. In a way, they're non-spatial. They're not really anywhere in space, but they pervade everything and all space.

So the Sambhogakaya is, one way I translate it, the mundus imaginalis. It's that whole body in the sense of collection. We talked about kaya, remember, in the talk on what is awakening at the beginning of this. What does kaya mean? It can mean physical body. It can also mean just a collection. And so the Sambhogakaya is the world, really, the collection of things, the mundus imaginalis, and with the energy body and all that. And the Dharmakaya, again, has a lot of different meanings, but is something, in some sense, kind of pervasive. It's, in some sense, everything is the manifestation of Dharmakaya.

Nirmanakaya is often conceived more in a certain locus of personhood, a historical Buddha. But we can also hear it or interpret it as equally pervasive, like the other two kayas. So that nirmanakaya, and if we translate kaya more pervasively as the other two kayas, then it becomes this world of material appearances. And that can be the nirmanakaya, and the parallel I'm making is the world, this world of matter as the world of magical transformation, the world of magical creation. The world of magical transformation.

I talked about Amitabha the other day and how he represented in the five Buddha families—he represents or is connected with the aggregate of perception, the third aggregate. There's another Buddha, Vairochana, in the five families of Buddhas in the Mahayana. And Vairochana is another kind of primordial Buddha. And he represents the bodily perception, the aggregate of the body of rupa. But in a way, it's the purified aggregate of bodily form. So when we're talking about in the primordial Buddha sense, it's this level of the aggregate that goes with it. It's another dimension, put it that way.

And in some ways it's the idea or the principle of spatial extension, or of space as the precondition of all bodily existence. So what does that mean? It means this space that we're in can be sensed into, conceived—again we're kind of injecting an idea—that this space is somehow a manifestation of a primordial Buddha, of the primordial Buddha. The space where bodies exist and seem to move, where matter exists, is the body, if you like, or the essence. Its essence is Vairochana, the primordial Buddha, Vairochana.

Sacred text. The body and the world are sacred texts. What is a sacred text? The Pali Canon suttas and the Mahayana suttas all begin—and some tantras as well, Mahayana tantras—begin in Pali: "Thus have I heard." In Sanskrit: "Thus have I heard."

So what is it again? What is it to hear a sacred text? "Thus have I heard." Can I hear that "thus" that I've heard? Can I hear that poetically? We read it as a kind of formulaic introduction to suttas in Buddhism. "Thus have I heard." "Thus am I hearing." "I."

It might be that someone, let's say, in a state of consciousness—we could say, or let's say this—what qualities need to be present in the soul for me to, let's say this as a poetic phrase, to hear sacred texts? What needs to be there to hear in this way, that we hear sacred texts? And "hear" actually might be more than just the auditory sense, to interpret sacred texts. We already said mattering. Something about purity, I think, as well.

So someone in a certain state of consciousness—one could say purified, but we can ask, what does that mean?—they may hear teachings imaginatively, or see an image, or behold a story, or a gathering of angels, or bodhisattvas, as are described in Mahayana texts. All of that. But these teachings may also be—one hears them in the wind, and they may be non-verbal. So in the sensing with soul, it's as if the wind can be, at times, the wind or the birds are teachings. Their sound is sacred text, is scripture.

But again, it might not be that what's translatable there is in the form of information, like when you read a sutta—the Buddha said so-and-so, and this happened and that happened. The teaching can be non-verbal. It's not a matter of bits of information being communicated. But something about purity needs to be there to allow us to trust this as teaching.

What does purity mean? One possibility is that one is purified by insight into emptiness. Actually, it's interesting. When one's insight into emptiness is very deep, there is at that time a feeling of purity in the energy body. It's one of the things it does. One may purify or feel oneself pure, or another pure, in a moment where there's this seeing all appearances as divine, in a kind of mimicry of a Buddha's ultimate gnosis, a Buddha's jñana. But knowing that the subject and object there—the appearances that are divine and the consciousness that senses that way and perceives that way—neither have inherent existence. And they're non-dual, they're connected. And one can, if you like, mimic that Buddha's jñana gnosis.

Or, again, those elements that move the imagination more into the realm, in the direction of the fully imaginal, authentically imaginal. This also is purifying, partly because it brings in this imaginal Middle Way and the non-clinging, and the craving goes to eros, etc. And it's not so much about myself. There's that what we call the fullness of intention. All this renders the soul at that time, in different ways, renders it what we might call pure. Pure to hear in a certain way and to trust a certain teaching that one might receive on the wind, through the land, through the birds, whatever it is.

Sometimes when we hear "purify the mind or the heart and then you perceive something," and then the purity allows you to perceive what is true, that purity allows you to attain to the truth.

If you remember what we talked about with Foucault pointing out that that's what changed with the advent of modernity, is that we no longer have that notion about truth, that it takes the purification of the subject. But it might be also that purity could be itself a purification, mean a purification or involve a purification from all attachment to any notion of truth. So that one is free to play with perception and with perspectives and ideas and ways of looking in this kind of pluralistic understanding we've been talking about.

And in a way, why shouldn't the teachings that are the sacred text heard, the sacred text heard in this way, in that sort of state, be trusted and given, if you like, authority as much as another text? They become iconic for us, and it's part of their imaginal nature.

As I said, hearing a sacred text, a one maya shurtam, involves sensing the soul sometimes through the synesthesia that I talked about. So there's a fusion of different senses or interconnection of different senses. And sometimes I feel like I'm hearing through my eyes, so to speak.

I'm aware of the dangers in all this, of course. This person says they heard this teaching, and they translate it into some kind of information that they then want to persuade others of the truth about, and then they claim a power position in a hierarchy because of that, and there's all kinds of abuses of power. We are the ones who have access to the truth, etc. But if the whole hermeneutics of this kind of thing remains open, like the Midrashic approach to the Old Testament and the other sacred scriptures, or like reading Tantra, sometimes it's quite open, then we're in a different situation.

So all these practices that I've touched on, and all of this sensing the soul, involves the sense of the middle way, this imagined middle way between real and not real, neither real nor not real, and or a sense of the deep emptiness of it all. Sometimes that kind of ontology shifts a little bit, opens a little bit more to a sense of the plural nature of things, the plurality of truths through participation.

But it's as if, as I said at the beginning of this part of the talk, the sense of what is real, the conception of what is real and what is true gets opened. It's impacted through sensing the soul. But in some way or other, it's either this middle way, neither real nor not real, and or the sense of the plural nature of truth, truths, of realities.

There's one more thing I'd like to touch on before finishing, is that there's this plurality or middle way understanding that's infused in all these possibilities and experiences and practices I'm talking about, but also infused in all these approaches and possibilities is eros. And love. And grace. As three, for example, three elements of aspects of the imaginal that we touched on that will be there with all these experiences. But also one that perhaps I haven't mentioned so much: praise.

And the attitude of praise also, one of its elements, is humility. I will have an organic, natural, spontaneous humility in relation to what I'm praising. We talked about humility before. But in all this hearing sacred texts or singing the world, the earth, the animals into being, singing the animals, in all this listening to the divine speech, the divine mantra in sound—all of this praise is infused in it. It's infused with praise.

And praise is healing. Praise is healing. So again, this is not abstract. We're not talking about ideas that are abstract. There's something that really touches the soul here.

You know the word paean—it's not that commonly used in English. P-A-E-A-N. Paean means a song of praise. It's a song or an ode of praise. And it's originally a song of praise to Apollo, because paean was another name, an epithet of Apollo. And Apollo was a healing god, among other things. So paean is a poem or a song of praise.

And it's related to another word, peony. P-O-E-N-Y. Which is actually, some of you will know this, a plant with beautiful crimson flowers. And the word peony, the English word peony, is from French by Latin, apparently, pionia, P-O-E-N-I-A, which means healing, because the plant was thought to have healing powers. So Paeon, Apollo, was the physician of the gods.

So a paean, a praise, what we utter in praise—and utter might be through our speech, but it might be through our gesture or our being—is healing. It's a kind of healing. Certainly healing through the praise, we talked about the tikkun olam, the healing of the world through my perception, through my action, through my articulations. And praise is also a healing of the praiser, the one who praises. Praising heals the one who praises.

So again, ideas that we're talking about infused in all this, and they're getting stretched in all this, we're not talking about them abstractly or as abstractions. They bring ways of looking, and those ways of looking involve our soul, they move our soul, they open our soul. They open our hearts, they involve our hearts, they demand our hearts.

And in opening up the sensing of soul, they are soul-making. Anything but abstract.

When the soul senses soulfulness in things, when it recognizes and resonates with the sacred dimension of existence, something profound occurs. This recognition itself becomes an act of creation—soul-making in its most fundamental sense. We are not merely observing soulfulness from a distance; we are participating in its very creation through our perception, our attention, our capacity to see and be moved by the sacred that permeates all existence.

This is why these teachings, these ways of looking, can never remain merely intellectual exercises or abstract philosophical concepts. They demand our full participation—heart, soul, and being. They ask us to risk being touched, to allow ourselves to be moved, to open to dimensions of experience that transform not just our understanding but our very way of being in the world.

Through praise, through the recognition of beauty, through allowing ourselves to be moved by the sacred wherever we encounter it, we participate in the ongoing creation of meaning itself. We become co-creators in the great work of soul-making that is always happening, always inviting our participation, always offering us the possibility of deeper seeing and more profound engagement with the mystery of existence itself.

This is the gift and the responsibility of human consciousness—to be the place where the world comes to know its own soulfulness, where the sacred recognizes itself through our eyes, our hearts, our capacity for wonder and praise.

CHAPTER 135

Between Ikon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 6 - Amitābha Buddha)

Rob Burbea · 1h23

> In this profound exploration of Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna imagery, Rob Burbea examines how traditional Buddhist concepts can open new possibilities for soul-making meditation. He investigates the etymology of Amitābha Buddha - traditionally 'limitless light' - revealing alternative meanings like 'limitless appearances' that connect directly with imaginal perception and the mundus imaginalis.
>
> Burbea discusses Amitābha's consort Pāṇḍarā (Rāgarati), the embodiment of passion and lust, and explores how their erotic union represents the balance between imaginal perception and discriminating wisdom. He outlines three levels of deity practice: supplication, harmonizing with qualities, and union with the deity. The talk weaves together Kabbalistic gematria, Christian mysticism (Maximus the Confessor), and Buddhist pure land concepts to demonstrate how ideas can become seeds for sensing with soul.
>
> Drawing connections between the Western Paradise, Garden of Eden, and dharmadhātu, Burbea shows how devotional yearning opens perception to sacred dimensionality. He emphasizes the importance of poetic listening and flexible practice, allowing traditional forms to serve contemporary soul-making rather than rigid visualization. The teaching culminates in understanding how this very world can be perceived as the pure land through appropriate ways of looking, supported by both emptiness understanding and devotional attitude.

So we're looking and discussing the effect of ideas on the possibilities of sensing the soul, the impact there, the place really of ideas and concepts in soul-making meditation. Unfolding, wanting to unfold, open up and discuss several practice possibilities as we go.

And so I want to begin to look at, just a little bit, at a few ideas and images and practice possibilities from the Mahayana tradition or the Vajrayana traditions as well in Buddhism.

But just to say, just as a general point, as well as elaborating on and hopefully suggesting and making available by opening up and looking at these different practices and ideas and images as we discuss them, as well as the ones that we dwell on a little bit. As I'm talking, and this applies to the past talks as well, there's actually, depending on how you listen, there are actually many possibilities, many practice possibilities implicit or available to be drawn out from ideas that I may just briefly mention or just touch on or just as an aside.

So just from the last part of this talk, for example, I quoted the Eastern Orthodox teacher, Maximus the Confessor, and he wrote or said, "God, the divine Logos, wishes to affect the mystery of his incarnation always and in all things." The divine wishes to affect—meaning with an E, affect—God, beginning. So the divine wishes to manifest, to bring into being the mystery, to make apparent the mystery of his incarnation, always and in all things. Actually, to affect means to make, not just to make appear, but to actually make. See, back to that Hegelian notion, or similarities to the Hegelian notion of God needing something to manifest and needing perhaps our participation.

But the point I want to make right now, the main point in regards to this is one could take that sentence from Maximus the Confessor and if there's any hearing it, so listening with a receptive ear and heart and soul, so if there's anything that resonates in that phrase. And I don't even know what he means. But something just touches. I can sense it touch. I can listen with a more poetic hearing. Perhaps reflect a little bit. Let it land in the soul. And the soul can hold it for a while in its womb. And it can just stay there, maybe just for a little while.

And out of that idea or the ideas that are encapsulated in that one sentence from Maximus the Confessor, for example, may, with a little reflection, with a little poetic hearing, actually generate then the possibility of all kinds of shifts in ways of looking that we can then actually practice and experience and implement and see what happens. And that might happen very spontaneously, organically, without much effort on our part, or it might be that, as I said, we have to reflect a little bit, let it just stay in the soul womb, so to speak, but one has to listen poetically for this to be able to translate, to be implemented, so that it delivers or opens up for us some possibility or other, or maybe many possibilities from that one sentence of sensing with soul.

So there is the possibility here that's very rich in terms of different possibilities that we can hear, that we can open to hearing in a certain way, and they offer or suggest possibilities, or the soul converts it, in a way, to possibilities of sensing the soul.

And again, we can combine ideas so that we hear that sentence from Maximus: "The divine wishes to affect, to manifest the mystery of his incarnation always and in all things." And we may combine that with other ideas that we have digested or beginning to digest in the larger logos of what we're talking about. So for instance, as I mentioned, perhaps it needs our participation, this effecting or manifesting or making, bringing into being of this mystery of the Incarnation always and in all things—perhaps it involves our participation. So we're emphasizing this participation. Participation of what? Of my mind, of my poetic hearing, of my listening, of my heart, of my sensing.

Perhaps I hear that and in order to liberate the potential there for sensing the soul I actually have to combine it with some understanding of emptiness that I have. And so perhaps the divine is empty or the incarnation is empty or whatever. So there can be a very creative combining of ideas to generate this kind of potentially infinite range of possibilities for sensing the soul.

But we have to hear poetically. Words can be stretched from their kind of narrow, rigid meanings. So something like incarnation, depending on your background, you might hear that in such a sort of literalist manner. And maybe that works for some people, but we can really expand a lot of the words in that sentence as an example if we allow ourselves to enter into the poetic sensibilities. Or as I said, using the phrase from a talk, I think it was "The Path of the Imaginal," the midrashic condition, meaning the condition of this open, pliable soul listening and soul reading and soul fertility that's open to multiple, possibly infinite interpretations—the midrashic condition of one possible sentence.

So as I'm talking, or as I have done, you can go back and—perhaps this has already happened to you—listening and one phrase or one sentence jumps out, or even go back and listen for those odds and ends that are interspersed in what we're talking about and perhaps pause with one. And what is it to enter into that logos, that idea that's expressed in some idea that's just briefly talked about? What is it for that logos, that seed to enter into the womb of your soul? Takes a certain listening, takes perhaps a little pausing, takes a little, as I said, turning the soil in the soul, the soil of the soul and a little bit of working and receptivity.

Or as another example, I mentioned, oh, perhaps we can say there are different ways of ideas we can have about perception, different ways of conceptions we can have about perception, and that we can conceive of it as a gift and a grace from soul, from the divine, from a divine, and we can conceive of it instead as work or as opportunity. And again, here are three conceptions, for example—not at all that they are, that's an exhaustive list—but here are three conceptions, three ideas, and what would it be, again, to let them enter the womb of the soul as seeds? These ideas, these logoi, these conceptions are seeds, and they're sort of mulled over, or turned, planted in the soil, and that soil is turned, and then they can generate ways of looking, or suggest ways of looking and sensings with soul.

Or some etymology or other, I might just throw out, oh, by the way, in Latin that means that, or in Greek this means this, or Sanskrit, or whatever it is. You know, partly the reason I'm doing that...

In fact, the only reason I'm doing that is really to suggest things poetically, to open up possibilities by these seeds of logos, these seeds of ideas.

So one can, as you're listening, if you want—or if you're listening a second or third or however many times—you can pause, extract something and linger with it.

Okay, as I said, really what I want to do—that's just a sort of note, a general point—but what I'd like to do is look at some Mahayana ideas, images, practices, and Vajrayana ideas, images, and practices.

If I start with the Buddha Amitabha, he was the Buddha of the Western Paradise, of the Western Pure Land. In Mahayana, globally, this is a very popular Buddha. There's a lot of orientation towards this Buddha and his Buddha field, his Pure Land, in all kinds of ways, in different Buddhist cultures still today. Some people will pray—it's quite common. There's a prayer to Amitabha, a prayer to be reborn in the next life or in some future life in his pure land. And there's devotional practices and all that.

So I'm interested in how we might open up that idea, that image, and what that might suggest to us for possibilities of practice linked in with this sensing the soul.

Actually, let's start with some etymology here. Amitabha. Amita means—amita in Sanskrit—is to measure. The "a" before means it's a negation, so unmeasured or measureless or boundless or infinite. So infinite what? Abha, which is from the verb abha, bhati, which means to shine or blaze towards, to irradiate, to illumine, or to appear or become visible or apparent.

So usually, the translation we get for Amitabha is limitless light. Amitabha, limitless light, or something like that. Or limitless radiance. But it can also mean, because abha is to appear, to become visible or apparent, it might also mean limitless appearance. It can also mean—abha, that verb—to look like, to resemble.

Abha as a noun also can mean splendor or light or flash or color, again, or appearance or beauty or a reflected image or an outline, a likeness or a resemblance. Again, so usual translation of Amitabha is limitless light, the Buddha named limitless light. And that's very lovely, and that can open up its own direction, absolutely. But it tends to suggest, for instance, a kind of infinite oneness, some kind of infinite oneness, which is wonderful, and we've been through all that.

But if we take a slightly different route with the etymology, a different possibility offered by the etymology there, then we might get something like infinite appearance or limitless appearance, limitless resemblance or appearances or images. The Buddha of infinite appearances. What does that sound like to you? Doesn't that suggest the Buddha of the world of soul-making, of sensing the soul, of the infinite possibility that's generated in the eros-psyche-logos dynamic and that potential open-endedness there? And the generation of sensing more dimensions, more aspects, generating, creating, discovering more images. Amitabha in the pure land, in this land. He goes with his cosmos, if you like, his land, the pure land of Amitabha, the land, the mundus imaginalis.

So we can potentially open up a slightly different meaning for Amitabha and that Buddha and that pure land.

Amitabha is also used interchangeably—he has another name, so to speak—Amitayus, which translates... Amita is the same, limitless, measureless, or boundless, or infinite. And then ayu is the word for life. But ayu can also mean a living being or a person. So it could be limitless persons, something like that, or limitless living forms, which again might suggest—it's a little less strong, but it might suggest something of this infinite possibility of images to be created, discovered.

So there's a possibility there. What does it mean then to meditate on Amitabha? What does it mean to pray to Amitabha and to pray to be reborn in that pure land?

Before I get to that, maybe you can already guess a possibility there, or your soul suggests possibilities, but these primordial Buddhas in the Mahayana have consorts. So they have a male and female—generally it's portrayed as a male and female counterpart—but they're actually not really separate buddhas. The female consort or counterpart is said to be the prajna of the Buddha. Prajna—some of you will know, panya in Pali is the word for wisdom. So this female, it's really the female aspect. It's the same essence as the Buddha, and it's called the prajna of the Buddha.

And so Amitabha's prajna, Amitabha's female consort—and they're depicted in yab-yum, in erotic sexual embrace, in sexual intercourse. They're actually depicted as one Buddha, depicted as two in union.

So you could say self-other-world is right there—some erotic union and a world that it generates, a pure land that regenerates.

Amitabha's prajna, Amitabha's consort, other half, so to speak, is same in essence and is Pandara, Pandaravasini actually, which means literally "white-robed"—one who is white-robed. So she wears a white robe but she's actually red in color, as is Amitabha. And in being red, she is the embodiment of the fire element and also the embodiment of passion or lust. So this Buddha's consort is the embodiment of passion and lust and the fire element. She is also called Ragarati, which literally means passion and lust. And she holds a lotus in her hands.

Now some Vajrayana texts say when the passion or lust that are defilements is transmuted, it becomes the wisdom of discriminating awareness. We could actually keep—and some Vajrayana traditions as well keep both. Keep the passion and the lust, but transmute it through the erotic imaginal, so that it's not reified, it's not concretized. It becomes imaginal. It becomes full of dimension, full of beauty, full of divinity, shot through with the imaginal middle way—neither real nor not real. We can keep the passion and the lust transmuted that way through its imaginal transmutation, transfiguration, transubstantiation maybe a better word, and we can have the gifts that it gives, which is the wisdom of discriminating awareness, or distinguishing wisdom, sometimes it's called.

So Amitabha goes with the aggregate of perception, and that perception in its—let's say its enlightened form, its primordially enlightened form—is the gateway, or is transubstantiated in its primordially enlightened form to intuitive vision. Again, what does that mean, intuitive vision? It might mean, or we could interpret it as meaning—we could take that one direction of the etymology. Intuitive vision may be imaginal perception. The transformation of the aggregate of perception into imaginal perception, into intuitive vision, imaginal perception.

And the distinguishing wisdom there—to distinguish means to keep separate, to keep things separate. So again, here, it's not a kind of wisdom that dissolves everything into oneness. It's an intuitive vision, an imaginal perception that retains discriminating awareness, distinguishing wisdom. There are all kinds of other possibilities that we could have—tracks through the etymology that open up different directions. I just want to open up this one now because of the obvious connection it has with the work that we've been talking about with sensing the soul.

But distinguishing means perception does not melt into less fabrication, a state of less fabrication, some oneness or other. That's fine for some other Buddha. This Buddha, Amitabha, opening up the distinguishing wisdom and the imaginal perception, the intuitive perception—this limitless appearances of his name.

And so again, here, remember the corollary that we established: Eros needs twoness. It doesn't collapse into oneness. Even when it knows oneness, it doesn't end there or collapse there. It needs twoness and it also creates and discovers twonesses. The world of imaginal perception, the world of sensing the soul, for the most part needs twonesses.

So this transubstantiation of the perception into distinguishing wisdom goes with the eros that is the appropriate kind of—one of the appropriate affects or kinds of desire—in the mundus imaginalis, in the pure land of limitless appearances.

Let me throw something in here that I think I've actually touched on in another retreat, and I can't remember which one. But when we talk about these Vajrayana deities, or primordial Buddhas, when we talk about tantric deity yoga, or even in repeating a mantra that's connected with a tantric deity, like Amitabha or whoever, we can delineate—and I think it's really important to delineate—various, if you like, stances, relationships, attitudes, poises, which we could conceive, which we could inhabit at any time. We could conceive of them hierarchically, but we also don't have to.

But we could say hierarchically: One is, let's say, a mantra or a prayer or something. It's an invocation that is a kind of supplication and an opening to the other, to this deity, and a surrendering to what is bigger than me, bigger than you and more powerful. There's the humility there and a heartfelt opening. But it's me and the deity, with the beauty of the humility, the supplication, the opening, the surrender.

A second level, if you like, is more of a kind of harmonizing of the consciousness and the psyche and the soul and the whole being and the energy body—harmonizing with the qualities of that deity that is invoked by the mantra or focused on in the meditation. So the mantra or the prayer—and if it's a visualization or whatever—it's just a sense, invoking these qualities and involving those qualities. So for example, Avalokiteshvara's compassion or Christ's mercy or Yamantaka's fearless power to destroy what needs to be destroyed. And in meditating upon them, in reciting the mantra, in prayer, in just soul resonance with them, there's a kind of harmonizing of our being with the qualities, if you like, of the deity's being.

And that cultivates something in our being.

A third level we might talk about is a kind of union with, or fusion with, a becoming. One's self becomes the deity. The energy body becomes the body of the deity. There's a kind of fusing or unity so that we actually experience our body as divine. We sense the world then—if one opens one's eyes or even listens—we sense the world and others with the senses of that deity, through their eyes, through their ears, with their vision, with their kind of knowing, their kind of sensing. And their feeling for things, their erotic relationship with things, their love relationship with things, their compassionate metta relationship with beings and the world.

In that way, there's a kind of cosmic transubstantiation—a transforming transubstantiation of the cosmos. So there's a kind of fullness there in that union. It's more than simply imagining you're the deity. We actually enter into the deity's experience of body, of matter, of world.

So we could conceive of these hierarchically as three levels: a definite division in the first one between self and deity, but with an attitude of supplication, surrender, humility; a kind of harmonizing energetically and psychically as a second level; and a third level of union with a becoming, and the transubstantiation of the world that's involved there.

But I would like to retain the openness to all three. Yes, you could say the third one is more complete or advanced, if you want to use that word. But actually there's beauty in that first one, in the two-ness, in the separateness. Just as Buddha taught eight jhanas, but didn't then say, once you've learned all eight, just practice the eighth. He kept all eight open. They're all valuable, even though you could talk about a kind of hierarchy there. So I would really like to keep all of those open when we talk about these kinds of practices, these soul-making practices.

When we come back to Amitabha specifically, it's traditional, very common in the Mahayana world, to pray to be reborn in the western paradise, in Amitabha's pure land. But now, when we've opened up the etymology and the idea of what Amitabha could be by looking at those different connections, all kinds of possibilities open up.

We could conceive this prayer to be reborn in Amitabha's pure land as a focusing and harnessing of the aspiration and intention to enter now into the mundus imaginalis. So one's praying, one's really opening in humility and intention and orientation and eros and devotion, one's asking and orienting and intending to enter now into the mundus imaginalis, into the world that's sensed with soul, which means to perceive imaginally, to sense this world or another world as sacred, beautiful, multidimensional and profound, meaningful, divine, empty—meaning neither real nor not real.

That could be a sense of another world that's not this world, or it could be this world perceived now, sensed now with soul. In praying for that, to enter into Amitabha's pure land here and now—not in a future life, but here and now—in praying for that, one is, in the act of prayer, in the stance and the poise and the attitude of prayer, acknowledging the necessity of grace, of humility, and that the soul and the divine are greater than my ego, my will, my skill, my mastery.

So that prayer has, or the attitude of prayer, the gesture of prayer, the soul movement of prayer, this idea of grace, attitude of humility, attitude of soul and divinity being much bigger than self, not completely available to my technical mastery and my will, also bigger than my current experience and conception of them. All of this includes ideas of grace, humility, receptivity.

Some of you may have been aware that people pray to be reborn in Amitabha's pure land, but we can open up other possibilities for what that means in practice, for our practice, in very beautiful, very potentially fertile ways.

While we're on the subject of tantric deities or primordial Buddhas and meditating or praying with them, I want to say something that may be a reminder, but it's an important one. Oftentimes, the way this is taught, or at least what many people pick up from the teachings about meditating on Vajrayana deities or primordial Buddhas or bodhisattvas, is a kind of emphasis and necessity of capturing at one time in the meditation all the details of the image that is prescribed or described.

So Amitabha needs to be this color, and he's wearing this, and he's holding this in his hand, this in his other hand, and his feet are positioned this way, and he's got his hair like this, or he's got so many arms, and there's this in one hand, and this in another hand. There's a lot of detail in some of these icons, and sometimes a practitioner gets the idea that I've somehow got to develop the skill of holding all that together in the meditation, which alone becomes a kind of feat of visualization and memory.

But I want to say that in practicing this, as with all things, we need to make it work for us at any time. And make it work means make it soulful—that you can feel the energy body opening, harmonizing, coming into alignment. You can feel the soul resonances. You can feel those qualities, the aspects of the imaginal start to ignite, start to open up. That's what it means for a meditation to work.

What it takes for a meditation to work—any meditation at any time—varies. It's not simply a checklist or formula that works identically every time. So again, we need to be sensitive and responsive. What actually gives me a sense of soulfulness and soul fecundity right now? What opens something authentic for me in this practice?

Often it's the case that including all the prescribed or described details of a deity, icon, or mandala isn't necessary—not at one time in meditation, or even at all in a single session. It's far more important to support the possibilities of experiencing resonating soul-making in the energy body, in the emotions—devotion to some degree, perhaps, or some kind of shade or color. Sometimes this is very subtle.

We're not necessarily looking for fireworks. Devotion, for example—eros, as another example—can be extremely subtle. This doesn't mean things aren't working. We need to be attuned, alert, receptive to, and open to a range of subtlety and intensity in sensing what's actually effective.

So it's more important to support the possibility of experiencing soul-making resonances—energy body openings, emotional connections, meaningfulness, and all that. This might mean really slowing down. If you're familiar with these kinds of visualizations and meditations in Vajrayana practices, it can be worth dwelling with perhaps one aspect, or two aspects or facets of this deity or mandala—perhaps even the relationship between those aspects. This is really, really helpful and necessary to build that foundation. It's not necessarily the case that including more aspects at one time makes the practice better.

For example, Amitabha is often positioned in a mandala opposite the Buddha Akshobhya—literally meaning "indestructible" or "immutable." When you become somewhat familiar with each one individually, you can meditate on their relationship or interplay, exploring the resonances and effects of contemplating that dynamic.

If we interpret Amitabha as the Buddha who opens the world of limitless appearances—the mundus imaginalis—what does it mean to place this in relationship with Akshobhya, the Buddha of the immutable? What is immutable? The unfabricated, perhaps, is immutable, being beyond time. Emptiness is immutable, unchangeable. What is it to place that world of imaginal perception opposite or balanced by the wisdom that knows the immutable, the wisdom that knows the unfabricated, the wisdom that knows thorough, deep, radical emptiness?

You can include these two aspects and meditate on their balance, connection, or interplay. But if you're opening to two, it should feel doable—returning to what I said before. Again, it should feel soulful, fertile for the soul, for the heart, and all the ways we can recognize that: in the moment, alive, resonant, workable, approachable.

You might work first with one aspect and build it up over time. It's not necessarily true that doing more is better. As always: what actually works right now? What is helpful in this moment? That's always the essential question in meditation.

As another example, you could meditate on the erotic embrace—the sexual intercourse, the yabhyam—of Amitabha and Pandara, the goddess of passion and lust, in union with this Buddha of the imaginal realms, this Buddha of limitless images. There are countless possibilities, especially if you've been introduced to these kinds of practices, mandalas, and contemplations.

One reason for this approach is sometimes to bring more balance. As I mentioned, Akshobhya—this Buddha of the immutable, something like the diamond, the vajra—is also immutable, indestructible. It is positioned opposite Amitabha, balancing it in the mandala. Mandalas are often quite balanced structures, frequently organized as crosses with something in the center—very geometrically balanced.

What is it to balance the emptiness with the imaginal? The knowing of emptiness with the perceiving of the imaginal? The knowing of emptiness with the sensing of soul? You place these elements in counterpoint, in relationship and balance.

Excuse me.

Or perhaps one does the same thing with the emptiness and the deity of passion and lust, Ragarati. And what does that mean? Emptiness and the erotic icon.

I should also add that all this is very amenable to flexibility, to finding ways that work for you right now. So it might be that you feel, "Well, I've done a little bit of emptiness, but I hear some things that you say, or another teacher says, and I think I'm not there yet, at that level." It doesn't matter.

Take the realization of emptiness that's infusing Akshobhya in this example—the Buddha of the immutable, the indestructible. Whatever realization of emptiness makes sense to you. So it might be something like the unfabricated. It might be more something like a big awareness. And that's what you've opened to so far in a way that makes a difference for you. You're equating emptiness and vast awareness. And you might have heard me say, "Well, that's not really the final deal there." No problem. Just be flexible.

Take that level of understanding that you have digested and absorbed, and that's what's embodied by Akshobhya in that example, to balance the imaginal, the mundus imaginalis, the sensing of soul. Or it could be a really deep understanding of emptiness, the dharmakaya as the non-dual Buddha's gnosis, which includes appearances. Some of you have heard me talk about that.

Sometimes this might be that we just vaguely sort of... it's just a Buddha who understands emptiness, and we're aware that this Akshobhya... we're aware that we don't quite understand emptiness, but this guy does. And it's a vague concept or image, really, of this Buddha that embodies and is the consciousness that thoroughly knows all emptiness.

It can be sometimes, in doing that—even when we don't quite know what it means and our conception's a little bit vague—that somehow, magically, or by some kind of magic invocation, we actually experience a deeper understanding of emptiness than we knew we had, or that we were conscious of, or had realized consciously until now.

What's going on there? If you stay around the Dharma long enough, as a teacher I know there are all kinds of instances of this, where people experience something not in a linear way that's way beyond where they think they are. I touched on this when I was talking about maps and trajectories in the talk on awakening.

So in this instance, let's say we're just talking about meditating on Akshobhya, balancing or opposite or in soul dialogue with Amitabha, the Buddha of the imaginal perception, the deity of the imaginal perception. And we just... emptiness, I don't even know what that means. And it works some kind of magic. What is that?

Does your intuitive wisdom already know something? Is it the power of images? Is it the collective unconscious of Jung? Is it the power of poetry? I'm just mentioning that as a possibility, again, in this whole realm of the place of ideas in sensing the soul. Sometimes the idea is vague, and the conception is vague, and sometimes we get—it delivers something beyond where we are. Or we can plug in something that we already know, and that's really, really great. It doesn't have to be the final deal or whatever.

The Zen master Hakuin wrote "Song of Zen." It's a very beautiful, splendid text, not very long, and the last three lines read something like: "Nirvana is right here before our eyes. This very place is the lotus land, this very body, the Buddha." Nirvana is right here before our eyes. This very place is the pure land, this very body, the Buddha.

The text up to that point, in Hakuin's "Song of Zen," is a lot about emptiness. And it's not very long, so I'll just allude to it. But emptiness is one of the ways that make possible that kind of way of looking that he's talking about—this very place, the pure land; this very body, the Buddha.

Sometimes when we talk about the pure land—as I mentioned, the pure land of Amitabha, the pure land of limitless appearance, and the eros implicit in that with his consort Ragarati—sometimes we have a sense of a world beyond this one, as an imaginal perception or event happening in that world. But there's also the possibility, as I alluded to, of that pure land being here—this world, transubstantiated. And that's what Hakuin is alluding to in those last three lines there.

One of the things that makes that possible is a thorough knowledge of emptiness, a thorough understanding of emptiness. This makes possible ways of looking that see the way that he is describing—see the here and now in that way—becoming something akin to the mundus imaginalis, this world sensed with soul.

But also, if we think about what gives rise to this perception, this possibility, this range of possibilities—these ways of looking, of seeing, of sensing the world in this way—there's also the possibility that devotion gives rise to it. Or devotion has its place in sanctifying a relationship with this world that takes care to sanctify the things of this world and the relationships of this world, through prayer, through blessing, through ritual, through whatever it is. And generally speaking, through sensing with soul, this kind of sensing is open, that Hakuin is alluding to—this pure land of the Buddha.

I mentioned earlier, when I was talking briefly about that passage of God speaking, calling Abraham, how we can hear or read what's in certain texts—for instance, the Old Testament or the New Testament or whatever. We can hear them timelessly, eternally, understand them as giving an eternal and timeless teaching about soul, about spirit, about divinity, about humanity. Not so much as a literal text about the history of a certain people or nation, avoiding the problems that come out of interpreting scripture in such a literalized, concretized way.

There was a Jewish mystic, a Kabbalist, in the 12th century, called Abraham Abulafia—very influential, somewhat controversial. He interprets a passage in the Old Testament, a passage from Deuteronomy, and I want to share his understanding of it because it relates directly to this idea of the transmutation or transubstantiation of the perception of the world so that it becomes the pure land of the Buddha.

It's a passage where God talks about the holy land. God says to the people: keep my commandments so that you will long endure on the land that God swore to your fathers that He would give them and their offspring, a land flowing with milk and honey.

Abulafia says this actually refers to the supernal land which is exalted over all exalted lands. "Supernal" means the higher, the transcendent. So he's saying this refers to the holy land not as a geographical earthly place, but as an imaginal perception. The supernal land is potentially this land where I am now, sensed with soul.

Abulafia makes the point that there's a whole other level here that needs attention, that needs opening up, beyond the concrete material level. He points out that in the passage he's referring to, there's the word "today." And when it says "today" in the Old Testament, he says today means eternally. Today means now, which means timelessly, which means always. So this whole thing is to be interpreted out of time. This is not a historical report of some event in history—certainly not only that.

Another passage that Abulafia quotes is from the Old Testament: "You who cleave to the Lord your God are all alive today." You who are in intimate relationship with God are all alive today. And again, the "today" gives the sense of eternality, of timelessness.

So he writes: "From here we gather that one who does not cleave to God does not live in eternity." That doesn't mean live forever in heaven. It means live with the sense of the eternal—have that timeless perception. When you're out of relationship with the divine, today is the always present. "For this reason the verse adds the word today. So too in all instances where the Torah refers to the constancy of something, it uses the word today, or heaven and earth, or sun and moon, or another of the constant forms of the world."

Again, he's pointing to a whole other way of reading and listening and interpreting scripture, in this case the Old Testament. Let me read that whole passage, and if you listen to it this way—again, not as a literal history with all kinds of nationalistic implications, and not just as metaphor. We're talking about something larger than what we commonly mean by metaphor.

If you hear it, and you have experienced the kind of cosmopoiesis or sensing with soul and the kinds of things we're talking about in different ways, you can hear it with the ear of that experience, those experiences and that knowledge and how that's touched your soul. It's possible to hear this as much more than a metaphor—more than just saying, you know, if you keep the commandments, then you'll feel good and things will seem nice. Can we hear it in a different way, in line with the level of what we're talking about?

So God says, in this passage from Deuteronomy: "Keep or observe all the commandments"—all the mitzvot, all the rules of the law that sanctify every element of existence, the different blessings or prescribed behavior or attitudes. Keep all that. Observe all that. All those practices, basically, that help to sanctify the elements of your existence. "Observe all those that I'm giving you today, so that you may live long in the land that God swore to your fathers that he would give them and their offspring."

A land flowing with milk and honey. Can you hear this poetically? Can you hear it speaking of this? What happens when we sanctify this world and all the things of this world? Then the world, the land opens up. A land flowing with milk and honey - not like the land of Egypt from which you have come, the land of bondage, of slavery, of limitation, of burden and imposition. Heaviness. But a land of mountains and valleys that drinks rain from heaven. A land your God cares for.

Can you hear all this translated into the terms that we've been talking about? A land your God cares for. The eyes of your God are continually on it from the beginning of the year to its end.

So if you faithfully obey the commandments, these rites and rituals and laws and practices of sanctification, if you faithfully obey the commandments I am giving you today, to love your God and to serve him with all your heart and with all your soul. Then I will send rain on your land in its season, both autumn and spring rains, so that you may gather in your grains, new wine and oil. I will provide grass in the fields for your cattle, and you will eat and be satisfied.

Can you hear that with the richness of the depth and dimensionality that we've been talking about in these teachings? It's certainly way more than literalistic, concretized, and then therefore nationalistic, and much more than what we typically call metaphor. Can you hear it that way and hear the sense of the world opening up that way in that beauty, in that dimensionality, in that holiness, and in this text, in the poetry of the text, the richness of it.

This kind of thing is common in different traditions. Henri Corbin quotes from the fifth imam of the Shiites, of the Islamic Shiites. This imam lived in the first and second centuries after Muhammad. He said: "The sacred book, the Quran, is alive. It will never die. Its verses will be fulfilled among the people of the future as they have been fulfilled among those of the past."

Corbin's point about this is that the Quran, the Old Testament, the New Testament - they're not to be interpreted historically, certainly not only historically. Usually people come and they trap, they make the significance of the sacred book, Corbin says, captive to the date of its material composition, stifling any potential for a significance that goes beyond the past.

What he wants to open up is that rather than these kind of historical interpretations, there is the idea of the presence of what he calls spiritual universes that symbolize with each other by means of a comparable architecture and in relation to which what we call history is a history that is a mimesis, a mimicking, an echoing, a mirroring.

What's he saying here? He's saying that this world that everyone takes for granted - the conventional perception of a historical material world and written history - has parallel universes. We've touched on this before in previous retreats, of levels of worlds that echo, mirror, in some ways kind of interpenetrate this world. So that this moment right now, and this event right now, whatever it is, is both echoing and echoed by a similar event in a world at another level. They symbolize with each other by means of a comparable architecture, a mimesis, as Corbin says.

This is a matter of perception. It's a matter of sensing with soul, as we said.

If we come back to Mahayana teachings, there's this notion, actually in all the yanas of Buddhism, called dharmadhātu. Some of you may have come across this word. It is a word that's inherently ambiguous. We can identify quite a number of interpretations, but you could divide the interpretations loosely among the different yānas - the Hīnayāna, the Mahāyāna, and the Vajrayāna.

Taking the word dhātu, which itself has a number of different meanings, it can mean āyatana, and āyatana means something like sphere or dimension or world region. So the dharma dimension or something like that.

In the first turning of the wheel, what the dharmadhātu might refer to when it's used might be the unfabricated. If you remember that āyatana, that dimension should be known, monks, where there is no sight, smell, sound, taste, touch, and thought, and mental imagery. Remember that quote - the Buddha's pointing to that unfabricated, that dimension, that āyatana, that dhātu needs to be known, must be known, should be known. So in the Theravada teaching, it might have that level of meaning or interpretation, this dharmadhātu.

In the Mahāyāna teaching, the word is used more often than in the Theravada. It has a range of meaning, but it seems to take on more of the meaning that dharmadhātu is the emptiness of inherent existence, or is the emptiness of the inherent existence of things, of dharmas. That's one of the most common meanings in the Mahāyāna. It's not then totally transcendent of appearances and perceptions as the interpretation of dharmadhātu as unfabricated, where there's no perception, no appearance. Here we retain appearances, but it's the...

Here are the appearances that are empty. The Dharmadhātu is the world of emptiness and appearance fused together.

In the Vajrayāna, in the third turning of the wheel, one of the meanings that Dharmadhātu can sometimes carry is the Buddha realms—the pure lands. It might be something somewhat akin to the mundus imaginalis, the world of divine appearances, or the sambhogakāya, the bodies of the Buddha.

D.T. Suzuki, a Zen master, describes the Dharmadhātu in his commentary on the Gandavyūha Sutra. "The Buddha of the Gandavyūha lives in a spirit world which has its own rules," he says. "There's no time continuity there in that world. And the Buddha in the Gandavyūha thus knows no time continuity. The past and the future are both rolled up in the present moment of illumination.

"As with time, so with space. Space in the Gandavyūha is not an extension divided by mountains and forests. You have here, rather, an infinite mutual fusion or penetration of all things, each with its own individuality, yet with something universal in it. To illustrate the state of existence, the Gandavyūha makes everything transparent and luminous, for luminosity is the only possible earthly representation that conveys the idea of universal interpenetration.

"There are rivers, flowers, trees in the land of purity, hard to describe. And the clouds themselves are luminous bodies, inconceivable and inexpressible in number, hanging all over the Jetavana, which is Jeta's grove, of the Gandavyūha. This universe of luminosity, this scene of interpenetration, is known as the Dharmadhātu in contrast to the Lokadhātu, the world of this usual world.

"The Dharmadhātu is a real existence and not separated from the conventional world, the Lokadhātu, but is not the same as the latter when we do not come up to the spiritual level where the bodhisattvas are living."

So the point is: when we come up to the spiritual level where the bodhisattvas are living—you could say when we practice emptiness, when that opens the doorway to sensing the soul, or when we just sense with soul, even if our emptiness meditation is not fully realized—then this world is perceived as the same as the Dharmadhātu. Dharmadhātu is right here, but it's become perceived, transubstantiated. Do you understand? The Dharmadhātu in the sense, in the interpretation given to it in the Third Turning, in the Vajrayāna.

So it's the state of the soul that allows this kind of perception.

Henri Corbin writes again: "Inasmuch as the place of a spiritual being is his internal state, the garden or paradise"—and now we have a different metaphor of the Garden of Eden or the paradise as this Dharmadhātu, as this holy land—"is therefore the celestial man himself, is therefore the soul himself, his internal state. The trees of the garden are all his possible perceptions of love and intelligence, of the good and the true."

So the availability of sensing ourselves in that paradise, in the Holy Land, in the Garden of Eden, comes from the state of the soul. As William Blake says, "As a man is, so he sees"—in the moment, I would add.

But again, then the question is: what enables us to open up these perceptions, this sensing the soul, this sensing of the pure land, the lotus land, the garden of Eden, the paradise, the holy land?

I go back to Abraham Abulafia again. And he has what I think is a wonderful passage, which is going to take a little bit of explaining. So he's interpreting a passage from scripture, and there is the word in Hebrew, v'hakosef, and that word means "the one who yearns for," "the one who yearns."

Now I have to explain something called gematria. So gematria is a Hebrew word, and it means the manipulation of the possible numerical values of letters. Hebrew is a language where the letters of the alphabet, the twenty-two letters of the alphabet, also are given numerical equivalents. So if we had it in English, we'd say A is 1, B is 2, C is 3, D is 4, and so on—E is 5, like that, and then you get hundreds.

So what you have then is a sacred text becomes interpretable in so many different ways by virtue of the meditation on its individual letters and the words. And some of that is through the numerical equivalence. So you can, for instance, add up the numerical equivalence—so if we had, like I just went A, B, C, D, E, if I took "bad," B, A, D, what would that be? It would be 2 plus A, 1, plus D, 4, which is 7. And then maybe I had another word that also makes up seven. And there would be some kind of connection or equivalent or interchangeability or use of interpretation of those two words in relationship to each other. And then there are all kinds of other numerical manipulations that you can do.

So the whole thing becomes really quite a creative interpretive endeavor. I'll give an example in a moment.

Now, we could hear that and just say, "Well, that's just nonsense, and it's silly, and it's kind of crazy." But what if we're actually using that to enter into an ideation, a concept, a logos, where that's available to us, and the ideas that that spawns and the connections it makes of ideas again become ways of looking for the sake of soul-making, for the sake of the sense of holiness, for the sake of opening up different understandings of divinity, of existence?

So let me give this example from Abulafia.

He's talking about this word, hachoshek - "the one who yearns." When you take away the letters and reconstruct them, parsing the word, you discover three smaller words that each add up to 26, 65, and 86. Twenty-six is numerically the same as the word for Yahweh, or God, which also adds up to 26. Sixty-five equals Adonai, another word for God. And 86 corresponds to Elohim, the third main word for the divine in the Old Testament.

Somehow in this single word that means literally "the one who yearns," you discover the three names of God. Is it pointing to something - a clue for practice - that in the very yearning lies the opening of the gates? And even at three levels, three dimensions of the divine. The one who yearns has the key to the doors. In the yearning itself, in the movement of devotion, comes the opening of perception.

When you add up the numerical equivalence of these three names of God - 26, 65, and 86 for Yahweh, Adonai, and Elohim - you get 177. This number equals shalosh seudot in Hebrew: shalosh meaning three, seudot meaning meals - three meals. Actually, this is 1,176, but 1 plus 176 equals 177.

Now this can sound completely crazy. Already, ascribing or making connections through language and its numerical equivalents can sound bonkers. Add these twists of numerology, and it seems even more bizarre. But the point is, it can open up meditations. What is a meal? Some kind of nourishment, something we receive or prepare, something we digest - somehow connected to three levels of God.

If we hear this just abstractly as some clever number manipulation, putting two seemingly unrelated concepts together, it will sound bizarre and make no impact. But returning to what I said at the beginning of this talk: if we linger, if we let this work poetically, if we place these concepts or images in relationship to each other in our meditation - just as we did with Amitabha and Akshobhya - then what happens? Some kind of alchemy or fertility or connection or opening becomes available to the soul.

So this slightly more complicated transformation: 1,176 can be construed as 1 and 176, which returns us to 177 - back to the three names of God. Or it can go further. This 177 can become Shalosh Ma'alot - three levels, three qualities. Shalosh again meaning three, ma'alot meaning levels. So three meals - whatever meals mean poetically to you - three levels of the divine, all connected with or opened by the one who yearns.

This can also be equated numerically to the word tzillah - silence. The connection comes through the numerical equivalent of 87, and 8 plus 7 equals 15, which equals 1 plus 1 plus 7 plus 6, taking those individual numbers from earlier.

There's one more: the Garden of Eden, Gan Eden, also totals 177. So one of Abulafia's students, Rabbi Baruch Togarmi, declares: "The incantation of the language is the secret of the Garden of Eden."

And finally, yomam valaila - day and night - which also equals 177. What might this mean poetically? Day and night.

So you have this extraordinary connection: one who yearns, three words for God, three levels of God, three meals, three worlds, silence - mystical silence - Garden of Eden, day and night. A Kabbalist practicing this tradition would juggle, manipulate, play with the holy letters of scripture, taking things apart, putting them together, connecting words with other words, then meditate on that connection, on the idea-connection or image-connection that opened there.

The three names for divinity in the Old Testament hold the secret of the stages of the spiritual ladder and are called by the general name of Gan Eden, the Garden of Eden. For by means of their grasp, one enters the Garden of Eden while alive.

Does this make sense? It's going to sound completely bonkers if you don't hear it with that poetic sensibility, with that openness to the soul possibilities, with that letting these kinds of things be—the seeds of these kinds of ideas planted in the soil. So as I said, we can hear it that way, or we can hear it as what one is doing is using ideas creatively, or letting ideas, letting the soul suggest ideas that can be converted to ways of looking. The one who yearns somehow connects with the Garden of Eden, opens the Garden of Eden.

This brings us back to that point I mentioned the other day—hermeneutics, interpretation. This is what this involves: interpreting scripture through these kinds of arcane numerical reconfigurations and then meditating on the ideas that suggests. And I said the other day that interpretation in this sense—the interpretation of text, of holy text, and the interpretation of existence—needs to matter. Otherwise it would just be silly. It would just sound silly. But when it matters, when the soul is on fire with it, when the soul cares and is passionate, something comes alive and possibilities open. Doors open, gates open.

But also in this particular gematria, you hear "one who yearns." The one who yearns. It's not just an intellectual exercise. By that very word, the one who yearns, by the meaning of it, the heart is involved—the yearning. So the very gematria doesn't lose track of the heart. The heart needs to yearn, it needs to be open, it needs to have that attitude of humility that we talked about.

Yearning has that eros and that devotion in it. And it has, if you remember, we were talking about the different kinds of desire and discriminating, discerning between them. And devotional yearning has a sense of dimensionality of what it yearns for, the object that it yearns for, the other that it yearns for. There's a sense of the dimensional-ity, the unfathomability, and the soft and elastic edges of that object. So all this is implied in that word, "the one who yearns." And the fact that it matters and matters to the soul—it includes the heart and soul and it matters to the heart and soul.

And that allows a fertilization. It's like water on these clumps of soil that are numbers and ancient words in a strange language or whatever. The heart, the moisture, the waters of the heart are like pouring water on the soil, and then we turn the soil. One turns the soil by means of these manipulations or letting these ideas come into contact with each other, and all manner of imaginal perception opens, all manner of sensing the soul, all manner of soul openings. So many possibilities there.

What is it that Hakuin said again? "Nirvana is right here before our eyes. This very place is the pure land, the lotus land. This very body, the Buddha."

CHAPTER 136

Elements of the Imaginal (1 - 2)

Rob Burbea · 36 min

> In this foundational talk from the 'Tending the Holy Fire' retreat, Rob Burbea begins mapping the territory of imaginal experience by introducing 28 elements that distinguish authentic imaginal encounters from ordinary imagination or papañca (mental proliferation). Drawing on the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta's death contemplations and mettā practice as examples of skillful imagination, he establishes a spectrum from contracted fantasy through mindful imagination to the genuinely imaginal.
>
> Burbea presents these elements as a 'lattice' or constellation of interconnected aspects that must be present for an experience to be truly imaginal. Rather than rigid categories, he emphasizes these as practical keys for opening into imaginal dimensions - aspects like energy body awareness, love, eros, beauty, trust, soul-making, dimensionality moving into divinity, beyondness, and reverence. He explores how practitioners can notice these elements already present in their experience or deliberately activate them as doorways into deeper imaginal engagement.
>
> The talk focuses particularly on the first two elements: the lattice itself (recognizing the multi-aspected nature of imaginal experience) and energy body awareness. He explains how opening energy body awareness can transform craving into eros, supporting the emergence of erotic-imaginal relationship. This systematic approach offers both conceptual clarity for understanding soul-making dharma and practical tools for cultivating authentic imaginal experience in meditation and daily life.

One of the things we'd like to do on this retreat is trace or unwind a certain thread—outlining, touching, or pointing to what we might call aspects of the imaginal.

There is imagination, and there is what we're calling the imaginal. We want to highlight and point out: What are the aspects of the imaginal? What is the imaginal? What does it involve? Over the days, this will form probably the main thread of the teaching of this retreat. I'll explain why we're even doing this a little later.

For those of you who've been quite into this work and listening to the recordings from the last few years, a lot of this may be quite familiar. Some of the vocabulary might have changed. Other aspects might be less familiar, or you may not have quite noticed them in your practice. Some will be familiar, but it's a slightly different angle—as I said this morning, a slightly different way of opening things up.

We have this word imagination in English. All human beings know that when we get into what Buddhists call papañca, it usually involves imagination. I'm caught up in some kind of fantasy in the fixated sense, in the small sense. I'm contracted around it. I'm dragged wherever it's taking me. That is a use of the imagination that we can say is not very helpful, not very skillful, and certainly not what we're going to call imaginal. But that exists in the spectrum of what is possible for the human imagination.

Then we can get into the realm of mindful imagination. For example, in the Satipatthana Sutta, in the Buddha's discourse on mindfulness, there's a whole long section on death contemplation in the section on mindfulness of the body. Some of that uses the imagination. Imagine your body decomposed. If you can't actually get to your local charnel ground, actually imagine it—imagine rotting corpses, your body become a corpse in various stages of decomposition, being eaten by vultures and so on. So it's actually a mindful use of the imagination, for the sake of renunciation, for the sake of letting go, on the path to that kind of liberation.

Or when we practice metta, or compassion, or mudita—here's this being, and I'm imagining them. Maybe I don't have a clear visual sense, but I sense in my imagination somehow their particular being, and I wish them happiness, peace, etc. These are skillful uses and mindful uses of the imagination.

With all that, as we talked about in the Q&A today, I might actually employ a real embodiment. I really have the mindfulness of the body and the image of the other, and it's a skillful, embodied, mindful use of the imagination. It may or may not be imaginal, but it's helpful. We can have healing images of all manner—again, mindful, embodied probably, not necessarily imaginal. They may be imaginal, they may not be imaginal.

Towards the end of this spectrum, somewhere along that line, we say there is the realm of the imaginal. These kinds of images, or this experience of images, is what we're calling imaginal.

Some of you know this word imaginal is actually not that old in the English language, but it's getting quite popular in different circles. You may have come across different authors or people speaking about it. What I want to say is that the way we are using that word imaginal—it's not to say our way is the right way or the only way or the true way. There are similarities, overlaps, and differences between the way we are using that word imaginal, unfolding these kinds of teachings, and what you might have read in Hillman or Jung or Corbin. Overlaps, but some real differences.

We want to outline and highlight different aspects or elements of the imaginal. We can talk about when these elements are there—we could say something like, "This experience now is authentically imaginal," or "This is now the genuine imaginal," but very, very lightly with that.

We could run through a list, and in fact that's what we're going to do. I'll go through it very quickly tonight and begin to touch on the first couple of elements. As we go through the week, we're going to go through this list, highlighting these aspects or elements of what's involved in imaginal experience.

Before I even do that, I want to ask us all to consider and open up our attitude and our relationship with lists like these and teachings like these. They can get, sometimes, for some people at different times, very dry or dogmatic or very rigid or very tight or very right or wrong. I'm really not a big fan of that. But there's something about highlighting distinctions that actually will serve the soul-making and serve the practice.

The list is not even exhaustive. It's not complete—that's it now, full stop, that's the testament of the soul-making gospel, it's finished. It's not even an exhaustive list, but what we're trying to do is open up the attention in a way that can open up and deepen and make more full the practice. So not dogma, not to be held too rigidly or too tightly, and not exhaustive.

As I proceed through this list, I want to emphasize that I'll be moving quickly through all twenty-eight elements. Some will be familiar to you, while others may seem completely foreign at first. Think of this as seed-planting—I'm simply scattering concepts that we'll cultivate and explore more deeply throughout the week.

So, aspects of the imaginal—twenty-eight elements, at least. Remember, this isn't exhaustive. One crucial point we'll return to repeatedly is the relationship between different elements. Some overlap and naturally imply each other, while others create a kind of tension, pulling in seemingly opposite directions. There's a dialectical relationship at play here, which we'll unpack as we progress.

[Brief interruption about lighting]

Alright, twenty-eight elements for now.

The first is the very fact of the lattice itself. I use this word deliberately—these elements form what we might call a constellation or lattice of interconnected aspects. Picture a three-dimensional structure from high school chemistry—those molecular models with balls connected by rods, or think of scaffolding, or even a chandelier. It's a network where elements connect and support each other in complex ways.

This is crucial to understand: when we speak of the imaginal, we don't simply mean that image—whether it's a scene from Lord of the Rings or the figure of Dumbledore. Dumbledore isn't necessarily imaginal unless these elements are present. To the degree that these elements manifest in my relationship with Dumbledore, to that degree the experience becomes imaginal for me in that moment.

The lattice itself—this first element—points to something involving both the object of perception and the subject perceiving, and most importantly, the relationship between them. This might be the most abstract concept on our list, but it forms the foundation.

The second element is the energy body, which we've already discussed extensively. When the imaginal emerges...

For something to be imaginal, there has to be energy body awareness present.

The third aspect is love and being loved. An imaginal image loves me, loves you, and I love it. We're going to go into more detail on all of these.

Fourth: eros.

Fifth: beauty. Imaginal images are beautiful. The scope of that beauty might be much broader than a narrow conception, but there's a sense of beauty there.

The sixth is trust. There's a relationship of trust with an imaginal image. Some of these nodes are not obvious at first, and this is the point—to highlight them, to draw our attention to them.

The seventh is that it's soul-making. An imaginal image actually brings a sense of soulfulness. It opens up the sense of soulfulness. It is soul-making. The eros-psyche-logos dynamic, the dynamic of soul-making, gets galvanized and moved into action. So an image that doesn't do that, for me, right now, is not imaginal.

The eighth is a sense of dimensionality. There's more to it than just the flat surface, the flatland materiality of things. That dimensionality moves into divinity. So we could call that two different aspects or nodes of the lattice, or just one: dimensionality shading into divinity. Something that feels sacred and divine about imaginal images.

Related to that, the ninth is a beyondness, an unfathomability. There's a sense of something more. This image has something more, some mystery beyond that I can't quite capture or put into words or get my head around—and actually that's unfathomably deep, that beyondness. It's right there in and through the image, but it's got a beyondness to it.

The tenth: an imaginal image has soft and elastic edges. Its boundaries are indefinite. Even if in my mind's eye, if it's a visual image, I can see every little micro hair and it's sharply delineated visually, it's got soft and elastic edges. We'll come back to what that means. The boundaries are indefinite.

Eleventh: eternality. Timelessness. Again, some of you may have noticed some of this and some not. An imaginal image has a dimension to it that feels eternal, timeless.

Twelfth: there's a sense in the relationship with an imaginal image of reverence. The heart, the soul has a reverent relationship with the imaginal.

Thirteenth: there's a sense of grace. Something is given to me, something is visiting me in this image, through this image. This image is a gift from the divine.

Fourteenth: humility. This is a subjective note that the heart, the soul feels humble—we'll explain what that means—humble in relation to this beauty, this image.

Fifteenth: not reduced.

The image, I'm not reducing it to "this is" or "this means this." This is a representation of this aspect of my mind or soul or my history. This represents something in my history—when this happened, or that wounding, or this quality of compassion, or this power. It's not reducible. It cannot be reduced to "it means X or Y." It's more than that. Or rather, it doesn't only mean X or Y. It can have those individual meanings, but it's always more. Not ultimately reducible.

Number sixteen: autonomy. The image is not simply part of me. I'm not sensing it or conceiving it as just some element of myself—a sub-personality or some aspect of my psyche. It's its own being, in the same way that Joel here is his own being. He has his autonomy. There's a sense that the being has its own autonomy and in a way can act independently. But I also have my autonomy. So the autonomy is double—of self and other, of self and image.

Related to that is seventeen: there's twoness. I realize I'm going very quickly. I'm just casting out seeds right now. There's this sense of twoness that we've worked so much with. There's the image and there's me. There's twoness. It doesn't dissolve into oneness.

There's a quality of theatre—number eighteen. This is somewhere between real and not real, the imaginal middle way. It has that quality to it.

Nineteen: we recognize that we both create this image and discover this image, or somewhere in between creation and discovery. That's part of the gestalt of the whole constellation of the relationship.

Twenty: what we're going to call the concertina. We'll explain what that means. There are other images waiting in the wings of the theatre. This isn't the only image.

Number twenty-one: there's slightly less fabrication. There's this fluidity that we touched on in the Q&A. A little less clinging, so things become less fabricated, more fluid, more malleable.

Number twenty-two: an imaginal experience is not a non-conceptual experience. Logos is involved. Concept is involved. An imaginal experience is not a non-conceptual experience. Concept is involved. We also touched on the energy body in the Q&A. We'll go through all of this again. I'm aware how fast I'm going. We're going to go through each point. I'm just sprinkling some seeds right now.

Twenty-three: what I want to call fullness of intentions. I'm not trying to get something from this image. I'm not primarily trying to get something for this image. I'm certainly not trying to win the lottery or even trying to empower myself, for instance, or my psychological process. I've got a fullness of intention. I'm in it for something bigger. My intention is for God, for the divine, for the soul. Not just for me, not primarily for me, so that I can be better at this, so that I can develop this or that. Fullness of intention.

Twenty-four is a sense of duty. Where there's soul-making, there's a sense of duty. Somehow it comes into my life with a sense of asking me something. It's a subtle one. We have to be careful with that.

Twenty-five is meaningfulness. So an image is pregnant with meanings, plural. I cannot reduce it to just several meanings. It has a kind of infinite cloud of meaningfulness, which I might not even be able to isolate. It means this or that.

Twenty-six, and I'm not really going to explain this right now, is there's an infinite echoing, an infinite mirroring between the imaginal image and my life. They mirror each other like two mirrors facing each other and just mirroring each other endlessly in a subtle way.

Twenty-seven is an aspect of what's involved in the imaginal: our values. Aesthetic values—that's in the beauty—but also moral values. So things like goodness, kindness, nobility, courage, even cunning, these kinds of things. An image, if you like, embodies values. It's not reducible to values, but values are involved.

And lastly, a sense of deep participation. That's twenty-eight.

That's a lot, and you might be feeling like, "Oh my goodness me." But these are things to notice, and we're going to go through them, and a lot of them are already there in your experience. It's a matter of kind of naming and getting familiar with them. So, just rattle that through to plant seeds.

What we want to say, because we really don't want to be rigid with this: there's a spectrum here. All these aspects, from papañca on one side, and then all these aspects, and so on. At what point is the cut-off point to what we're calling imaginal? We could put it anywhere. Am I going to get upset about where it is? There's a direction that we can open up further as more of these aspects get involved, rather than someone saying, "That is or that isn't imaginal." Do you understand? We don't want to get self-judging or quibble too much about it.

Is this making vague sense? Yeah, good, good.

So we're talking about a spectrum, not an on-off switch or black and white or something I've failed, I haven't—you know, it's a movement, it's an opening, it's a direction.

Why are we even talking about this? One reason is just for the sake of clarity and for the sake of clarity in terms of what we mean when we use that word "imaginal," which is, as I said, different than what other people might mean in some respects, but also clarity in terms of understanding the whole kind of conceptual framework of what we're creating and discovering here with this soul-making dharma. That the more I get clear about all this stuff, the more it will help me get clear about the whole vision and the whole of what's involved and the whole concept of what's involved in this kind of path. So that's one reason: for the sake of clarity and understanding and the conceptual framework.

The second reason has to do with actual practice and the art of practice. Becoming familiar with these aspects, they begin to function as kind of keys. So this particular key of any one of these nodes, when I activate it, when I turn that key, it opens the door into the imaginal realm. Or if we take the lattice or the network image, igniting one node can then ignite the whole lattice so that one moves more towards the fully imaginal, the authentically imaginal, the genuinely imaginal.

So, for example, I could pick any element there, and let's say that aspect of timelessness. I'm with an image. It doesn't quite feel imaginal and deep and that whole kind of richness there. And then I begin to pay attention to the quality of time in and around that image. And I notice, "Oh, it does have this kind of strangely timeless dimension, hard to put it into words." We'll talk about it. And noticing that illuminates that particular node, that particular element, that particular dot in the lattice, and it's like it ignites, it comes on fire, and then that might ignite the whole thing.

Does that make sense?

So, one mode for practice is just to notice, just to notice these elements. You're not so much making them happen as notice what's already there, that at first the consciousness doesn't quite realize. I don't quite pick up on these elements.

As I look a little closer, I see—oh yes, oh yes—and then I dwell with that and resonate with that element. Something comes alive, ignites in the whole lattice.

You can also wiggle or jiggle one of the nodes, deliberately activate it. For example, the energy body: making that more open, pervading the awareness there activates that node, and that might help us move more into the imaginal.

Or you can deliberately start with something accessible to you. Perhaps you're simply sitting, feeling your life and being in the moment, and you sense a vague reverence. You don't even know exactly what you feel reverent toward, or perhaps there's a sense of humility in relation to who knows what. Some sense is there, or it's accessible to you. You can find your way into a sense of humility or that vague reverence. So you deliberately activate that node, deliberately ignite that, open that—and this can open the door to the larger network of the imaginal.

It might be the middle way sense that was one of the nodes I outlined, this quality of between-ness. If you're familiar with emptiness practices and you practice some kind of emptiness meditation where there's a sense of all things being empty, well, that's close enough to the imaginal middle way, and then it becomes much easier for the imaginal to get ignited and opened up. Or the energy body, or time, as we discussed.

So that's the general concept. As I said, we'll go through and cover this again. I'm hoping and trusting that even if it sounds a bit overwhelming and dense right now, you'll actually get the hang of it and it will be quite helpful in practice and understanding.

Let me touch on the first two elements briefly: the lattice and the energy body.

The first aspect of the imaginal is the very fact that it has different aspects, that it has different elements. The lattice itself is an aspect of the imaginal—realizing that, sensing that, knowing that. The network, the fact of its multi-aspected constitution. This imaginal is a multi-aspected phenomenon.

What this means is that image is in the eye of the beholder. We say beauty is in the eye of the beholder. Beauty and the imaginal have a lot in common—a great deal in common. The more you understand imaginal, the more you understand beauty, and vice versa.

So we say beauty is in the eye of the beholder, and image is in the eye of the beholder. This network of relationships—the nodes and the lattice—needs to be there. It's dependent on that for something to be imaginal. Some of those elements are just here, like energy body awareness or humility. They're part of the subject, nodes that belong to the subject as opposed to the object. Something like the dimensionality of the image or the divinity of the image is part of the object, the imaginal object. My humility in that moment is part of the subject.

So Lord of the Rings, Harry Potter—all that mythic material with kings and warriors and queens and wizards and dragons—is not inherently imaginal. It might be when that relationship, when the nodes of the lattice come alive. Or something mundane, like the hair on my arm—it's not usually imaginal, but it can be if that aliveness comes into the relationship.

It's not inherently just in the image. It's dependent on that aliveness and fullness of relationship as well.

That's the first element. The second one we've touched on already—energy body awareness. This is part of the imaginal constellation. When there's craving in relation to something, even in relation to an image, the energy body contracts and I tend to lose energy body awareness and its largeness. Craving contracts.

When I open up the energy body in relation to someone or something or an image, it helps to transform, to transubstantiate the craving into eros. When I open up energy body awareness, craving opens into eros.

And then I have an erotic relationship with this image, with this other, with this thing. And the eros opens up the imaginal. So that if I can come into full energy body, can I be in relationship to this thing, to this person, to this image, to this tree, to whatever it is? Can I be in relationship with my whole energy body? Can I see it with my whole energy body? Can I see with my body?

The more I do that, the more I'm activating, igniting this particular node of the energy body, and the more chance there is of the whole relationship becoming erotic-imaginal.

We touched on this in the Q&A, so in a way we're opening up the sense of what energy body can mean. It's the felt sense here of texture or vibration in this space, but it also involves image—the image of body—and also the concept of body. So that's all involved in the energy body.

The concept of body that's involved in the energy body is not limited to our usual ones. You see this body: Am I attractive? Am I not attractive according to whatever is the current human fashion in my culture? I've got a concept of body that way that's not going to support soul-making. Or a purely, flatly materialistic view—just a bunch of molecules that are hanging together for a while in some kind of way that they produce organic life. That's a concept that's not going to support soul-making.

So the concept that's active with energy body encompasses, includes, but is broader than our usual concepts of body and matter.

And lastly—and we've said this many times—energy body has a huge range in terms of that felt sense. It can be dense and dark, like the roots of a tree, like the roots of an oak tree. It's dense and dark, or like stone, or like sand, or like liquid, or water, or like air. The texture can feel that way, or like light, or like space. The range is huge, absolutely huge. All that is the playground of energy body.

That's the general concept and the sprinkling of the seeds of the twenty-eight aspects and the first two, just briefly. Does it make sense?

So this will be one of the main threads. We'll just go through and touch on a few nodes each day and just kind of illuminate them so they can serve to germinate in your practice.

"I have a question."

"Would you like me to lift your name?"

"I think so, if that's okay, Simon. I think there's just been quite a lot of talking today, so that'd be good."

"Let's have a little quiet time."

CHAPTER 137

Body and Soul (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 32 min

> In this Q&A session from the "Tending the Holy Fire" retreat, Rob Burbea addresses student questions about the relationship between energy body awareness, jhāna practice, and soul-making. The discussion begins with exploring how different organs and areas of the body can have their own forms of consciousness and intelligence, emphasizing that the energy body is an infinitely expandable concept that becomes more complex as it becomes "in-souled."
>
> Burbea explains how clinging and resistance shape our fabrication of experience, while relaxation of clinging creates more fluidity and opens possibilities for imaginal perception. Students share diverse experiences of energetic fields - from intense sensations around the head and spine to subtle awareness extending beyond physical boundaries. The teacher clarifies that all these experiences fall within the vast scope of energy body practice.
>
> The conversation explores the relationship between jhāna (meditative absorption) and soul-making, explaining how the first four rūpa jhānas involve the body becoming fields of rapture, happiness, peace, and stillness respectively. Burbea outlines multiple purposes for energy body work: cultivating samādhi and well-being, developing emotional sensitivity and care, navigation in various practices, and as a foundation for imaginal soul-making when body images become soul-nourishing.

We may have a Q&A session each day, depending on how it unfolds. The timing might remain at this pre-tea period or it may shift. These sessions are entirely optional, so I encourage you to check in with yourself each day around this time. What would feel most helpful? Sometimes you have a question to ask. Sometimes simply listening to someone else's question or witnessing an interaction can be profoundly beneficial. And sometimes you may prefer to turn toward innerness and silence.

These sessions are being recorded, as people have found them quite valuable to revisit later. However, if you prefer that your question not be recorded, please let me know and I'll pause the recording. The choice is yours.

This is truly an opportunity to ask anything you wish—whether about the practical nuts and bolts of practice or broader understandings, anything arising within the full spectrum of what we're calling soul-making practice and all the various practices it encompasses.

Question from Anna: I was wondering about consciousness in relation to other people, but specifically about multiple consciousnesses within the body—like different organs having their own distinct consciousnesses.

Rob: Absolutely, yes. Let me emphasize something crucial here: virtually any concept we engage with—and the energy body is indeed a concept—is infinitely stretchable. These concepts have no fixed boundaries; they can diversify endlessly, gaining dimensionality, opening up, and revealing new aspects.

We might begin with a fairly narrow and simple sense of what the energy body is. But as we practice more deeply, as this bodily sensitivity becomes in-souled—meaning it becomes enchanted for us—this awareness of the body gets woven into the soul-making dynamic. It then begins complexifying, becoming more intricate, more profound, more multi-faceted. And exactly what you're describing represents one such possibility.

It could very well be that you sense a particular organ possessing its own kind of intelligence, its own sensitivity and receptivity, its own distinctive ways of knowing. This is entirely within the realm of possibility.

What I want to stress—and I'll touch on this more tonight—is that the concept and experience of the energy body is inherently growable. This kind of awareness can absolutely come alive in the ways you're describing. If it feels helpful in the moment, if it feels beautiful, if it feels opening, then you're on the right track. Something genuine is happening—something good and soul-making. You can recognize this by the beauty, the sense of sacredness, the sensitivity, the harmonization that accompanies such experiences.

The possibilities are truly endless. When we speak of the energy body, we're working with a deliberately open and expansive concept. I might say, "This field," and I'm attending to the feeling within this field—but it's simultaneously an idea.

We always carry some conception of the body. One model might be scientific materialism: "My body is a collection of organic, carbon-based molecules arranged in synergistic combination." Another might be: "My body is a field of light with its own intelligence." Still another: "My body is diversified into multiple individual intelligences." These are all concepts of the body, each offering different possibilities for experience and understanding.

And senses of the body, and images of the body. So all that is wrapped up in the possibilities of what energy body can be.

Does this make sense? Any more with that?

"Because you then get resistance in a certain area of the body. And I guess the nature of awareness and of energy and how that locks into things become resistant and how that creates experience, and how when you kind of give some space to it you get that opening out and sort of healing."

That's a really good insight. Let's just repeat it for everyone. Anna's saying that it's interesting, paying attention to the experience of body as a human being and the range of experiences involved there. And what we notice, as Anna points out, is when there's resistance. In Dharma language, resistance is a form of clinging. It's "I don't want" or "I contract around" or "I want" or something like that.

There's the contraction of clinging, and that's wrapped up in the fabrication of experience. That clinging, that aversion, that resistance, that grasping—whatever it is that I don't like, I wish it was better, it's not good enough, whatever it is—all that's just varieties of clinging, and that will shape the experience that I have of anything in that moment: of body, of self, of other, of world, all of it.

So clinging is involved in, as you say, the fabrication of our experience, the fabrication of our perception. In the moments that I relax clinging—as you say, I just create a bit of space around it, I ease something with it, I bring a bit of love in. Love is the opposite of clinging, a bit of softness. All these ways of relaxing clinging in the moment—it's like the experience that then we're in relationship with, whether it's an experience of my body, my health, my self, whatever it is, it becomes less solidified, less rigidified as an experience, less painful, actually.

And in that relaxing of clinging, we say in technical language, it's fabricated less. The experience is fabricated less. It becomes more liquid and more amenable then to imaginal perception, to seeing it this way or that way. There are more possibilities. Clinging contracts the possibilities. "This thing, it's real, it is what it is, and I'm stuck with it," versus what happens when there's—and there's so many different ways of clinging, and there's so many different ways of relaxing clinging. There's a whole art.

When I do that, things become more fluid, more liquid, and more open to possibility, to magic in the perception. Does that make sense? So that's a really important insight.

Good. Also about the energy body. So, I suppose my question is, I suppose I've got two different energetic things going on, that I think are probably both, you could call them energy body. They feel quite different from each other.

The strongest sense that I have is around the head, and it also goes down my back a little bit, sort of down to the waist. And that field, when I'm practicing regularly, it's there quite a lot of the time when I'm not practicing as well. I can feel it now. And it's pleasant and if I tune into it, it sort of goes out more as well and goes more down my back a bit.

And then the other field of energy that I feel is, it's a bit like, if I experience my toes I can experience my toes as a visual picture, and I can see in my imagination, I suppose, see my toes wiggling, and connect that with my body as it were. Or I can feel the felt sense, what I think is the felt sense, which is almost like going into the inside of my toes. And when I do that, I can't really find toes as such. I can just sort of find this kind of toe-ness. And then beyond, so that's another sort of sense of energy, I suppose. There's an energeticness around that.

And then there's a sense that, so if I feel into that now, it doesn't stop there. The energy doesn't stop at the sense of toe-ness. It's as though it slightly keeps going underneath me a bit, not very far, but a little bit. But it's a very different feeling to this strong, quite strong energetic feeling around my head and my back.

And I just wonder, why? Is one not the energy body and one is? Why are there two fields? And I kind of feel like what I should be doing, as it were, is to strengthen one around my head and bring that more around my body.

And bless you, I forgot your name."

"Rowan."

"Rowan, that's right, yes."

So Rowan is reporting two seemingly distinct experiences and wondering what their relationship to each other is, whether one's the energy body or they're both energy body, and what to do with each of them. One is an experience that's over and all around the head and then down the spine, and it's quite pleasant. The other is actually different experiences of the toes and around the toes. Some of those experiences...

"Everywhere in the body."

Oh, everywhere in the body. Okay. Well, I can sort of tune into it. I can feel it in my hands.

Okay, so an experience of body parts, where sometimes the form of the body parts is retained in the imagination, and sometimes that kind of dissolves into just a vague sense there, and sometimes it extends beyond the body, beyond the confines of the physical, the outlines of the physical body, but it's not as pleasant or as intense as the first experience.

"It's neutral."

It's kind of neutral, okay, yeah. And it's much less strong.

"Yeah. The thing around my head is very strong."

Okay, yeah. So, I would say it's all energy body, okay? Energy body, I sort of... If I could press rewind, I might have chosen a different word. Because it's really a kind of... It's such a huge scope, you know?

What we're talking about with energy body is a whole range of experiences that we can have of this space. And that might mean it retains the contours of my physical body. It might mean a very subtle experience. It might mean a really intense experience energetically. It might be very pleasant. It might be very ethereal or very dense, like dense as stone, you know. All of that is energy body. It's just the range of what's available.

So what we're interested in, in the broad reach of, let's say, soul-making practice, what we're interested in is opening it all up for investigation, just opening it all up for experience, just expanding the range of experience and familiarity and what we're comfortable with and what can kind of get ensouled.

If you had a different question, for instance, "I'm interested in energy body, but right now I'm interested in that kind of direction of energy body that's about developing the samadhi, developing that well-being and moving into jhana and all that stuff," which I know that you've explored a little bit. Then I would say, okay, of these two experiences, I would lean more into the exploration of the first, because it's more pleasant and more vivid.

And your job then, if you're in your gear of, "Right now I'm just into developing this well-being in the energy body. I'm not so much in the emotions, I'm not so much in the image of the body as soul manifestation. I'm going for the jhana thing, the yumminess and the nourishment there." Then what you want to do without grasping at it is to let what's pleasant be where your attention goes. And in time, and with a little kind of gentle kind of tending, let's say, that kind of pleasantness will begin taking over the whole body. It will spread, as I think it already is a little bit. And you can encourage that with the awareness in different ways, and we can talk about it if you want.

But you would focus on that one just because it's more pleasant if you wanted to go and really develop the sort of samadhi side of things with the energy body, the samadhi direction of the energy body. But it's actually all of that whole range is energy body.

So in terms of the actual image that's involved, it can be, yeah, it keeps the contours. There are countless images that we can have in any moment of the body. Some of them will be imaginal, and some would just be like, I shut my eyes and I kind of see my body sitting here, and it's not imaginal. Sometimes it dissolves in light, and you say there's no image. Sometimes there's just space there. All of that is energy body. It's all in the range of the playground.

Does that answer it?

"Yeah, that answers it."

Yeah, okay, good, thanks. Is that Sandy?

"Yeah."

That opened up the question I had about the empty body, though you've answered that to a certain extent. The way I'm understanding the energy body, based on my experience, is that it does take the dhyana experience in that way or more. But then, with soul making, where do those seeds emerge and grow?

"Emerge, yes," I clarify. "Okay, so just to make sure I understand this correctly, Sandy. Sandy's asking—so far her experience of the energy body is very much related to dhyana or jhana, Sanskrit or Pali respectively, which refers to absorption, meditative absorption, that the Buddha talked about. We discussed this a little with Rowan about that kind of..."

I see it really as a spectrum or a trajectory—this movement into more and more well-being. This field here, this space here, becomes increasingly a field of well-being in those moments when we're entering samadhi. There's a range of experiences we can have here. The Buddha demarcated eight jhanas, but there's actually a really wide range if you look more closely.

So the question is: how does all of that relate to the soul, the soul-making, and the soul enchantment of the experience of the body? It's an important question.

Let's take the jhana piece first. Jhana means absorption—Sandy was using the Sanskrit dhyana—or something like that. The Buddha talks about eight jhanas, and the first four are called rupa jhanas, where rupa means body. One way of understanding what the Buddha's getting at there is in this kind of... One way of seeing it is he's really interested in: can you make this space here a field of nourishment, a field of deep yumminess? Not all the time, but having access to that in your life. You can basically train that—train it so that there is nice, deep, yummy nourishment in the body.

It doesn't mean I never experience anything difficult. It certainly doesn't mean that I'm not in touch with my emotions—I'll come back to that. But at times, one has the capacity to dip into different wells of well-being and bathe in them and be completely saturated and fed by them.

The first four rupa jhanas are, you could say, different experiences of this space. In the first jhana, the body has become—instead of the usual "I'm sitting here and I feel my sensations and I have the usual image of my body"—the experience of the body has become piti, has become rapture, the kind of pleasure associated with that. The experience of the body is suffused and saturated, as the Buddha says—it's become a field of that kind of physical pleasure.

In the second jhana, you could say the body has become happiness. If you stop someone on the street and say, "What does it mean for your body to become happiness?" they'll think of chocolate or something like that. But we can actually experience the texture of the body where this space becomes joy, and one is drinking that joy, drinking of one's body.

In the third jhana, the dominant texture of the rupa, of the energy body, is peacefulness—a really exquisite peacefulness. In the fourth, stillness. In the fifth jhana, this space here just becomes space—the bliss of empty space, really refined.

So one way of understanding the connection between samadhi and energy body is basically we can use energy body awareness to cultivate well-being. That well-being has a certain continuum or spectrum to it, and the jhanas demarcate certain places on that spectrum. Does that make sense?

There are many reasons to incorporate energy body awareness. Another is emotional awareness and emotional sensitivity and emotional care for ourselves. The emotions play out in the body, and we can develop a real sensitivity to the nuance of our emotional life and ways of caring for them—all here.

It's all here. So that's a really, really good skill to take care of oneself. And I would say that's part of soul-making practice.

So you've got kind of two directions here. They overlap, actually, because joy is certainly an emotion. The joy of the samadhi is an emotion. But what about heartache? What about sadness? What about longing? What about anger? What about brokenness of heart? We really want to develop the art of being with, noticing, caring, with all of that, including the really unremarkable sets of emotions. I want to be sensitive to how that feels also.

Then you've got a reason to be with the energy body that has just to do with navigating practice - for example, emptiness practices or different practices. As I mentioned with Anna, when you're on the right track in any practice, whether it's an emptiness practice or a metta practice, the energy body tells you. Here I am doing metta: may you be well, may you be happy, may you be peaceful. And I'm sensitive to the energy body and I notice this time around - when I say "may you be peaceful," I feel that peace here. Okay, let me slow down with that word "peaceful" and say it again and ride that wave, catch that current in my sail, let it feel the energy body, resonate with it. So the energy body sensitivity is working to help me sail in different practices.

There's all that, all those different aspects, and then when it comes to soul-making, we've got also a navigational sense. When an image is potentially soul-making for us, the energy body is one of the things that tells us. There will be an alignment, a harmonization, or something. I'm giving you more than you asked for in the question, but I think it's important. It's part of the navigation.

Then we get a whole other level, which I don't think I've really talked about so much, and it's what we mentioned with Anna. When we say energy body, what we've mostly been emphasizing so far is the aspect of the felt sense. What does this space feel like? But there is also at any time an image of the body. That image can be not imaginal. I just shut my eyes and I can see the configuration of my body right now. But sometimes what happens with the image of body is it becomes imaginal, becomes a soul-making image. And as I said with Anna, there's an endless possibility there.

This morning, I can't remember at what point - it was maybe after Catherine did her instructions - I was just sitting with you, we were sitting together, and I actually had the sense of your beauty, all of you, and the beauty of souls here. A vague image arose. In other words, it was more the sense of a rosebush woven around a trellis and reaching out with lots of budding roses on it. And my body became that rosebush. It was also you. Or that rosebush became my body.

At that point, I've got a choice. I can go into the image of that, or I can... That image itself, just the initial arising of that image, had a certain perfume and opened the energy body a certain way. So I can lean more into the image, with some energy body awareness, or I can take the perfume and the way that's opened up the energy body and just lean into that as a more energetic sense. Or I can walk that middle line between and have the best of both worlds. It's not that there's a better or worse; there are just different ways you can sail. But there's a sense of the body had become flowering roses, beautiful pink flowering roses, and it was really gorgeous. So there was an image of body and the energetic body sense, felt sense.

There's felt sense, there's image of body, and that can become imaginal soul-making, and then there's also the concept of the body. What is a body? What is matter? We go to high school and you get taught: matter is this, and it's made of atoms, and it functions like this, and it doesn't mean a damn thing, and it's random. That's just the typical scientific materialist view. And then there are all kinds of other views. Matter is love. Matter embodies itself, forms itself as angels.

Here, this very moment, this body exists within a constellation of possibilities. We hold concepts of matter and embodiment that may be more or less soul-making. Does this make sense?

When soul-making unfolds, all three dimensions participate simultaneously. I need not engineer this process so deliberately. Rather, this becomes something to notice: there is usually a subtle concept that nourishes, supports, and stimulates the soul-making. There is usually some image involved of the body, and there is the felt sense. As these elements—particularly the image and concept—begin opening more fully and supporting the soul-making, this is how that aspect of the practice develops. Does that make sense?

This overview speaks in general terms, though naturally the art lies in all the nuanced details. Is that sufficient for now?

So what exactly is soul-making? For the most part, when soul-making occurs, when soulfulness arises, it involves image. That image typically dominates the experience—it is the primary element. Sometimes, however, it can be secondary.

Consider this example: you might be deeply in love with the Buddha's path, devoted to practice, cherishing the Sangha and all that this encompasses. You may never have encountered imaginal practice or soul-making teachings. Yet I would suggest this can still be soul-making. Your love of practice, your devotion to Buddha-dharma, and that sense of tradition—these carry profound meaning.

We rarely recognize this because we lack the language, both in Buddhist culture and in the wider culture. When you love something in this way, when you engage with such devotion to practice, there exists—whether realized or not—a subtle fantasy operating, a delicate image of the whole: the tradition, the Buddha, the lineage, the teachings, the Sangha, yourself upon the path, the beauty of that journey, even its struggles. This functions as a kind of background cloud of fantasy, in the most beautiful sense, feeding inspiration.

Most often when we speak of soul-making, we refer to something truly imaginal that captures our attention, something we recognize consciously as image. Yet there exists another dimension of soul-making that operates as this background cloud of fantasy. We might stretch the term in other directions as well.

For instance, when consciousness, when the soul opens to something it discovers anew—you mentioned the jhanas—when you traverse that process for the first time with its sense of wonder, moving through the second jhana with real discovery unfolding. That opening into new realms carries beauty and meaningfulness.

This doesn't primarily involve image—in fact, it represents the opposite. Imagery grows quiet in the jhanas, usually. Yet this can still be soul-making because of the opening itself. Ideas expand, the sense of things deepens, the sense of existence and selfhood and consciousness transforms. That opening, that discovery, that beauty and meaningfulness—all of this belongs to the package of soul-making. But primarily, no image exists at that point because the jhanas involve the quieting of images.

Does that make sense?

Let us have a bit of quiet time.

CHAPTER 138

Trusting in Soulmaking (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 34 min

> In this Q&A session from the "Tending the Holy Fire" retreat, Rob Burbea addresses practitioners' questions about the soulmaking path and its relationship to traditional Buddhist practice. The discussion explores how different aspects of being—samādhi, emotional awareness, desire, emptiness, and the imaginal—work together as mutually supporting dimensions of soulmaking dharma.
>
> Burbea addresses practical questions about accessing the energy body through movement, sound, and kinesthetic awareness, explaining how concepts can function as "sparks" that ignite soulmaking perception. He discusses the importance of two-ness in imaginal perception, distinguishing it from experiences of mystical union, and explores how eros maintains creative tension even within recognition of oneness.
>
> The conversation touches on the relationship between soulmaking and traditional Buddhist teachings, particularly emptiness practice, while acknowledging the challenge of articulating these teachings with clarity. Burbea emphasizes trusting one's innate compass for soulmaking—"soul loves soulmaking"—while gradually developing conceptual understanding. The discussion reveals how precision and open-ended flexibility must coexist in both practice and teaching, maintaining the fertile ambiguity necessary for continued soul-nourishment.

Just to say again, you probably all have realized, the way we're conceiving of what we're calling soulmaking and the path of soulmaking dharma or practice, is really quite wide. Do you get the sense how it can actually involve the whole of our beings, more even than the dimensions and aspects of our being we're aware of at the moment? It can grow and it can move in different directions. And these different aspects and parts of the path kind of support each other.

So the well-being, the samadhi—it's an important part. The working with difficult emotions, the being able to tend to, notice, to be aware of, to care for what's happening emotionally. This is a really important part of soulmaking, of the whole frame. And desire and being able to open up desire in different ways, being able to let go of desire, emptiness, imaginal, etc.

So in terms of Q&As, please consider all that fair game. All of that's part of the package. Any aspect of that that you're working with or wondering about, or you have a question about—whether it's a difficulty or a loveliness or a curiosity or the conceptual framework. It's really open.

As I said yesterday, we are recording for the benefit of everyone, hopefully, and other beings elsewhere. But if you don't feel comfortable with your question being recorded, just say so and I'll press pause. That's completely fine.

Andrea: This is more of a surprise. It goes to Catherine as well, because you both said it in different ways yesterday, but it was the concept turning into percept. I think it was Catherine who said it that way. When we did the sound together this morning, it was a combination of all the sound that we were making in the room and then the suggestion from Catherine with what I felt was kinesthetic language. That was huge in unlocking the energy body, and then later in the exercise with moving the way your soul wanted to move.

So I guess my wondering is about different ways in to the energy body, particularly with—you know, I would have said I'm purely kinesthetic, but obviously the language makes a huge difference to getting in. Other times when I've just tried to work with the energy body and just bring the attention there, it's just not happening. But it was so easy and so effortless. There's other modes, so the question is: can you give more suggestions, or is it just kind of play around?

So if I understand the question, Andrea's reporting that in both—I don't know what to call it—when we sounded together yesterday, which I also found really beautiful, there was a way that the sense of the energy body just really opened with the sounding and through the verbal suggestions that Catherine was making and the kind of language in there. And then also when we did the moving to the urgings and the promptings of soul, the connection there, whatever was said, also stimulated a kind of opening and awareness and connection with the energy body that can sometimes not be so available when we're just sitting down thinking, "Right, okay, energy body, let's open it up," and working with it more technically.

Energy body is part of all this business. And all this business—meaning the opening of soulmaking, including the opening of the sense of the energy body and that liquidity and the dimensionality of the very sense of the body—all of that opening can be ignited. It's really like, if we use the analogy of fire, it can be sparked actually by anything.

There's a way that we could say that all this business of soulmaking is a kind of grace. We're given it. We receive something. We receive a spark into the soul and something ignites. So that spark could be a line of poetry. It could be a certain way of languaging that connects certain elements of our being or aspects of our being that we don't usually connect. For instance, movement or resonance, a sound and energy body. It could be an idea, as you say, a concept. A concept functions as we could say a spark into the soul or a seed in the soul. When there's soulmaking, when there's imaginal perception, when there's sensing with soul, all this is going on. Body is involved.

There's a felt sense of the energy body that is different or expanded—not just spatially, but in terms of dimensionality and richness—than our usual way in our culture of feeling our bodies. There's concept involved. There's some sense of poetics involved, poetry. All this comes together.

So it's a bit like... we're open, receptive, sensitive, and sparks are given to us from teachers, from language, from reading, from listening, from poetry, from music, from life, from all of it. And the whole thing just gathers more—I don't want to push the image too much—but readiness to ignite. So that means you can then take something into practice.

A line of poetry, a word, a connection between two dimensions of being, like sound and energy, for instance, and just take that as a seed and you drop that seed into the soul. You cast that spark into the soul. Does that make sense?

There's always a range with all practice. When we talk about emptiness practice or samadhi, there's always a range between active and playful and deliberate and receptive. And for me, that whole range should be available. Whatever practice I'm doing—metta, emptiness, samadhi, jhana—there's always this range. I would like everyone to feel really comfortable with that whole range. I'm not just stuck, always just waiting and hoping, or thinking whatever happens is fine. That's a really good mode, that extreme of sensitivity. But also there's the capacity to play, to engage in the art, to know things to try, and to respond to what's going on.

Like an artist—when you talk to someone who's really into their art, there's that range. Where did this come from, that music? Where did that come from, that poetry? I don't know. It was a gift. There's a receptivity. But there's also this working of the elements.

Someone was thinking about categorizing people as more kinesthetic or visual, placing them in categories for what sparks work for some that might not work for others. I think it might be that people are more kinesthetic or more whatever it is. But again, if we're talking about soul-making, what happens as the thing gets going is that it starts to reach out and involve every aspect of our being, and actually even create and discover more aspects.

Someone who, for instance, hasn't been very kinesthetic or hasn't felt the way soul can move in the body—after a while of soul-making, they don't need to force that. It might be that they go in via the concept, but they're working with the energy body. At some point these sparks will connect, this spreading of—it's a good image—the tentacles of soul-making will start involving all these different dimensions and aspects of the being so that they start to come alive even when they haven't been alive before.

But we don't need to force that. We can just go where there's soul-making. You invite it into this field, soul-making, and you just are there in the ways that we're talking about and work with it—it will spread. It will spread into other perceptions, will open other aspects and dimensions of sensitivity of the being. And you'll still have people who are more like this or more like that, and that's fine, but there's this kind of multi-dimensional, multi-aspected reaching out and evolving and growing.

Hannah asked about twoness, particularly about how she finds her way into images very sensorially, and it's easier when moving. Because of that, it feels like she embodies the image, and it feels soulful, but there's not so much twoness there.

That's a really good question. A lot of the time the way that images come alive or the way of entering and engaging with images is through the kinesthetic sense, through the body and sometimes through movement. And the image becomes soulful, but you feel like you're embodying the image, you're becoming that image in a sense, perhaps. So then the question is, where's the twoness there?

One thing I could say is if you just let that happen, let that embodiment happen, let yourself become that and just feel that out more and more. And one possibility is what happens is that you then, others or the rest of the world becomes consonant with that image. In other words, let's say I become a dancing deity and I'm some kind of dancing deity and I'm really embodying that and I'm in that...

And then the world around me, in what we call cosmopoiesis, becomes an other to that deity in some other way, or other beings. And that deity, as I am, is in relationship with other. But that might emerge in time as you just let yourself embody the image more. So that's one possibility.

Another possibility might be—you know, it's strange. If you think about, or if you consider the ways we're aware of body, it relates to all the aggregates: body, aspects of mind, feelings and vedanā and perception. I can feel like they're me, or I'm looking—so I'm looking at my hand, and there's a kind of two-ness now between my sense of me and my hand. But at other times, there's a sense of I am my hand.

So even when you're embodying something like that, it can move between a sort of vantage point of being inside and being identified with and a vantage point of some objectivity or two-ness. And that's just normal to perception, even in terms of our own bodies and minds. You say, "strange thought I had"—it's like it's something else, other. From another perspective, it's not other at all. It's me. Who else am I apart from all this stuff? And I feel that I'm that.

So what happens is—and that's just the basic way identification works—it moves between two-ness and identification. So if you just hang out more in the experience, there'll probably be a couple of ways that you'll start to notice two-ness, different ways. Does that...

"I wonder if it's important to emphasize the two-ness at all? Like, try and encourage it?"

Hannah's asking, so I'm just repeating so that people can hear. Is it important to emphasize the two-ness?

Two-ness is one of the nodes, one of the elements that we're going to go through. And what I would say, more than that—or rather slightly differently—is these nodes are things we can notice. So I would put it there. It's less pushy at first. As I said, the more you hang out in these experiences as they open up, with all your sensitivity and all your enjoyment and all your curiosity, it's almost like your eyes get used to the dark and you start to notice, "Oh, there is two-ness here. I hadn't noticed that." And that noticing ignites it.

So I don't need to do anything so much as just notice when it comes. Some of it might be quite subtle. Two-ness can be really extreme, or really alienated from something, or it's much more subtle, the sense of two-ness. But the noticing it brings that sense of two-ness alive, and that helps the whole thing become, as I explained last night, more fully imaginal.

What we might say is, I would make a distinction between experiences of oneness—like melting into union with something, which is really important as a mystical direction or spiritual direction. It's important in the whole soul-making business. But when we talk about imaginal perception, sensing with soul, there's more this two-ness. So oneness is great, but if you find yourself—after all these years of practice, and this may not be the case with you—after all these years of practice, having a tendency to melt and find, or melt into different kinds of oneness: a oneness of light, or a oneness of love, or a oneness of awareness, or whatever it is, a oneness of materiality—it can be lots of things. Then it would be more, let's find the two-ness, let's retain the two-ness.

I could stop there, but when there's eros in relation, when there's—in this case, your embodiment, that movement—and if it is like a deity moving through, or a goddess, or whatever it is, then the body can become your beloved other. So then there's an erotic relationship between... This body, as it's felt right now in whatever is happening, becomes the erotic imaginal other, becomes the beloved other. And eros retains a sense of two-ness, even when it knows oneness. I know this is one. I know we are one. Some part of my mind knows that. But it preserves the erotic tension of two-ness and actually creates even more bifurcations and things—but I'll just throw that out as a seed. How does all this sound?

I was thinking today about something else entirely, about emptiness. There's a phrase—I don't know who said it originally in the Dzogchen traditions—"Trust your experience but keep refining your view." And to me there's so much wisdom in that. When we talk about, okay, what is natural, what's not, is this right, is there enough of this or that in these nodes that we're elaborating, it's to say things can unfold more, richer, more soul-making. But we have to trust our experience and go with that. So in terms of what's unfolding, you can really just—if it feels soul-making, you're on the right track.

I don't know where else. I'm not aware of other traditions exploring this territory, certainly not in the way we're talking about. There's, of course, as you mention, Indo-Tibetan sadhanas and vajrayana practices that employ the imagination with the concept of emptiness and all that. There are overlaps there, for sure, but I would say it's a little different. There are definitely overlaps, though.

The curious thing here—and this might frustrate or confuse some people, while others might find it liberating—is that if I just answer personally, I feel like I can conceive of it in different ways. I can conceive of what we're doing and map it in different ways, mapping its relationship to different Buddhist traditions. And for me, that flexibility of conception is also part of the soul-making process. It arises out of soul-making. And actually, it's also part of emptiness, in some ways construed.

One of the things it's saying is that things are not tightly definable. They're not findable. They're not rigid like that. Our concepts don't reflect some kind of ultimate truth. So when we say emptiness is form, form is emptiness—mostly in my teaching I tend to avoid the Heart Sutra because I think it can be interpreted in so many different ways, which is great.

So if I turn and ask you a question: what do you feel you need right now with this? Because different people will need different kinds of working answers or working hypotheses about this relationship between Buddha Dharma and soul-making at different points, depending on their personality and history. So if I give it back to you for a second, what would you say you need right now?

"I think for me the question is whether there's something I can say that other people understand."

Sure. If I, at the risk of being irritating, push the question one stage further and say, why? What's going on? And what's going on for you perhaps emotionally with that?

There's no right or wrong answer here. It's just that what goes on for me in my relationships to the concept—or the concepts that we're unfolding and exploring, actually creating and discovering—the whole meaning set of concepts, but also the affect and love and reliance and community of Buddha... that's quite a lot involved.

Well, I think that's a big question, but maybe you have an answer right now. There's heart and soul and idea, and there's quite a lot involved. Do you see what I'm getting at?

"I started thinking, but then you just went on and on."

Sorry. Okay. The short question was: why?

Yeah, okay, so your turn.

I think because—gosh, I don't know whether I've got it or not—it's not just going to peter out completely. One thing is I find it very uncomfortable sitting with uncertainty, which I'm kind of recognizing, but actually that's fine. I can come into a sort of familiar relationship with that, and that's okay.

But I think in terms of communicating to other people, there's this funny tension. Some people need clarity and need to know that there's a way to go or something to do, and other people are maybe happy with the uncertainty. And I think I'm struggling sometimes—I just think I sound incredible to people who want clarity. I think it's easy for people to get lost because, like you said, there's no single answer. It can just go any which way. It's so vast.

And so you gave two parts of an answer, and the first one was saying about being comfortable with not knowing. Not knowing what?

I think not having the comfort of "oh, this is definitely the right way to go." For yourself.

Yeah, yeah. It is around clarity, actually. I think the question is just around clarity, around how difficult it is to have clarity in this area, whether for myself or for other people.

Yeah, okay, very good. Should we just take a couple minutes? I feel this is really important.

So let's start with what you said last—the business about clarity. For yourself, I would say something brought you here. Something brought you, as you said, after years of Buddhadharma, to end up in the imaginal. Why? How? You don't need to answer that now, but if I might offer an answer: the soul loves soul-making.

Soul loves soul-making. Actually, you could say that's a core concept, and everything follows from that. Soul loves soul-making—all the conceptual framework will come out of that. Soul loves soul-making, and you have a compass for soul-making. All of us do. We can feel when something is soul-making. You're going on and on—what the hell are you talking about? I'm not quite clear.

Don't worry so much about the clarity just yet. Or rather, I would say you can trust navigation even when things are a little bit foggy. The compass says go that way. I can't see more than ten yards ahead, but the compass is saying go that way. So that's the inner sense of soul-making. And you feel it in the energy body, you feel it in the heart, you feel it in ways that you couldn't even actually describe. That's where all these aspects come in.

So I would say soul loves soul-making. You have an instinctual, visceral, mental, emotional, soulful sense of what soul-making feels like. And you can trust that as a barometer.

I do think clarity is important, but it will come. The other thing I want to say about all this—it's complex. We're building or discovering or uncovering or whatever you want to say, a kind of complex structure of subtle and sophisticated ideas that all support each other. So that journey to clarity and precision and understanding how it all works together will be gradual for everyone—everyone, okay? Even the brightest person, it's going to take time. So that's okay.

I think the conceptual aspect is part of soul-making. The soul loves concepts as well—concepts that feed soul. It likes the intellect. It wants to include that as one of the aspects of being that can ignite it. So that's important too. But let it feed the soul, and let it come gradually, and ask questions. At this point, there's actually loads of material available, and there's another forty hours or something about to come out.

Just warning you. So you know, it's a lot. It's sophisticated. But you have a compass anyway.

The other thing about clarity I want to address—and this will come in our explorations of the aspects—is that there's something, as I said, kind of contradictory about the whole endeavor. Precision is beautiful and fertile. I understand the concepts. It's clear. And yet the very concepts we're using also have these shady boundaries of unclarity to them. Why? Because that's part of their fertility. Without that, they won't be soul-making.

If I start putting something in a rigid, tight box—"I feel, phew, I understand it"—poof, goes the soul-making after a little while. So there's this strange tension between clarity and precision on one hand, and open-ended, fuzzy-edged, elastic understanding on the other. I'll talk about this again.

Later in this retreat, we may bring up this question that several people have raised: "Oh, I want to teach this material." And so we may discuss amongst ourselves where we all are with that. What feels right or ready? What's a good idea? And what's maybe, "Hey, let's just wait a little bit."

I'm not sure how else to answer this question about speaking to others and teaching, because if it's not clear for you, it may just confuse other people. Or you might find that you can make little poetic suggestions which open things up for people without explaining a whole structure. Does that make sense? You can actually introduce... there are all kinds of possibilities. You're just throwing out poetic sparks, like that, until you're ready to say, "Now I'm clear how it all fits together." How does that sound?

These are actually big and important questions. Again, they're multi-aspected questions that involve the whole being, all of this. Is that okay for now?

Okay, let's have a minute of silence together.

CHAPTER 139

To Sense with Soul

Rob Burbea · 12 min

> In this dharma talk, Rob Burbea addresses a common misunderstanding about imaginal perception and introduces the concept of 'sensing with soul' as an alternative framework. He clarifies that imaginal perception is not merely about interior visions or fantasy images, but encompasses a way of perceiving the ordinary world—people, trees, roses—through all six senses (including mind as the sixth sense in Buddhist understanding) with added dimensionality, richness, and soulfulness.
>
> Burbea explains that sensing with soul means perceiving the same conventional forms that everyone would agree upon, but filled out with imaginal dimensions—seeing a friend as an angel, sensing a tree's love, experiencing the world as transubstantiated through the alchemy of perception. He addresses potential concerns about using the term 'soul' within Buddhist framework, explaining that soul can be understood either as shorthand for soulfulness (a texture of experience) or as an empty entity—the organ or instrument that perceives soulfully.
>
> The talk emphasizes that soul-making practice involves fabricating soulfulness while simultaneously building one's capacity to sense soulfully. This teaching offers practitioners an accessible way to understand how contemplative practice can transform ordinary perception into something rich with meaning, beauty, and sacred dimension, while remaining grounded in direct sensory experience of the world.

Tomorrow we will resume this elaboration of the aspects of the imaginable—what we're calling the aspects of the imaginable, these aspects or elements of what makes an experience imaginable, the constituents of that constellation. We'll resume that tomorrow. We just really got going, but we'll pick that up tomorrow.

I just want, for now, a very short sort of interruption to that, also for the purposes of clarifying or fleshing something out, hopefully in a helpful way.

Briefly, this word "imaginal"—several people told me they just don't like the word. They don't relate to it, or it's a funny word. It also can tend, because of the word "imagination" in English and how we think of that—really how we conceive of imagination in our culture and its place in our whole implicit philosophy—the word "imaginal" tends to suggest something that's happening inside me or inside you, so-called intra-psychic. That's a word I really don't like, "intra-psychic." It implies that the psyche is somewhere in here.

But the word "imaginal" can suggest to people something, so I'm sitting with my eyes shut and a pink dragon comes. And that pink dragon, that imagination figure or imaginal figure, has very little to do—it's not something anyone else can perceive, it has very little to do with the world of the senses. Or perhaps there's some kind of relationship, but it's not of the world of the senses.

So the word "imaginal" can suggest that to people, but that's not what we mean. Or rather, it includes that kind of thing, the so-called intra-psychic images that come up. It includes that, but it also includes, another word I don't like, "extra-psychic." In other words, it includes—we can say, I perceive an imaginal pink dragon, I perceive you guys imaginally. I perceive these roses imaginally. These are things of the world, objects or beings of the world, sensed with the senses that everyone would agree on their form. They are white roses, whitish roses. They agree on the shape, etc. I can perceive them in a conventional way that everyone in our culture would agree on. We all see the same thing.

The conventional perception is just to see, you know, they're pleasant looking, very nice, they smell nice, etc. They're a biological organism, so that's about it. Conventional perception.

I want to introduce another term for the sake of having done with this misunderstanding of assuming—that sometimes happens to some people—of assuming that "imaginal" refers to something purely interior. So the phrase I want to introduce is "sensing with soul." Sensing with soul. I'm not introducing anything different, I'm just introducing a new vocabulary, or a possible new vocabulary. We don't want to replace, we just add. So some people, and I want to use them almost interchangeably, say "imaginal" or "imaginable perceiving" or "sensing with soul." Pretty much the same thing.

For some people, the word "imaginal" will imply this more interior arising of an image. The sensing with soul, to me, the words, because we tend to think of senses as meeting the world, opens up or suggests a different direction. But really, they're interchangeable, pretty much.

So, the things, the objects, the beings, the world itself—the things, the objects, the beings of the world, and the world itself—when they, in any moment, to my perception, to my senses, to my knowing them through the senses, when they start to come alive with those aspects of the imaginable that we're going through.

When I sense a person, or a group of people, or my body, or the tree, or the sky, or my friend, and I see my friend—I see her, him, them, as angel. Same form. They look the same. Everyone would agree it looks the same. But there's the added imaginal dimensions. It's filled out. Do you understand?

Or this tree. Everyone would agree on the shape of the tree. Somehow I feel, I sense this tree's love for me. And most people think that's bonkers. Trees can't do that. But when the sensing with soul preserves the form and adds the dimensionality and the richness and the multi-aspectness and all the beauty and the eros and the love and all these nodes that we're talking about.

So it's a transubstantiation of the world in the alchemy of perception, sensing with soul. So that implies sensing.

We have at least five senses, right? Sight, smell, taste, touch, and hearing—plus the mind. In Buddha Dharma, the mind is a sixth sense. The mind that thinks, the thinking as a sense, or the perceiving of thought, the sensing of thought as another sense, and the sensing of image, an intra-psychic image. So it spans all that—imagining, thinking, smelling, seeing, tasting, touching, and hearing.

Generally speaking, when we sense with soul, we encounter the same shapes, colors, or forms as conventional, socially agreed-upon perception, but it has that filled-outness. It has the same shapes, colors, or forms as conventional perception, yet it possesses that quality of being filled out.

Catherine, you may not have caught it—it slipped out a couple of times, I think, in the opening talk or something—but we wanted to introduce "sensing with soul" as an idea. For some people, it will be more helpful. They'll think, "Oh yes, that's what we're doing." It's not just this. We actually don't mind what words you use. This is really all for the sake of understanding.

When you say "imaginal," people ask, "What do you mean by imaginal?" Of course, if you say "sensing the soul," that would also beg the question, "What do you mean by soul?" We could be here a long time, but I don't want to be.

So sensing the soul means all that. It means sensing in a way that soulfulness is happening. In other words, all those nodes, or some of those nodes, to some degree—that movement into that activation of those nodes is happening.

What is soul? You could say soul is just a shorthand for soulfulness, for that constellation of experience. Then soul, in that way of conceiving it, is not a thing. It's just a kind of experience—soulful experience—which means all that we're elaborating.

In English language, mostly the word "soul" has the idea of an entity: my soul, your soul, the soul does this or does that, or whatever. In Buddha Dharma, we're a little bit shy of some entities. And typically, soul would be one kind of entity in Buddha Dharma that we're really shy of—really, really shy of. Self is bad enough. But people still use the language of self, and we need to. I would say it's more than a conventional shorthand. You know, I say, "I feel sad." We need to care for the self. It's an experience we have that's a valid, important, deep dimension of our experience, or direction of our experience—the self. Same with soul. Same with divinity, or deity, or God.

We can entertain the sense of these things as entities—self, soul, divinity, deity. I know it's empty, but I can relate to it as an entity because I know it's empty. Do you understand? I don't have to be afraid of these words. I use them, actually—show me something that isn't empty. We use words and concepts all the time. It's a pen, it's a rose, it's a candle, it's a chair. Buddha Dharma, with the teachings of emptiness, says all this is empty. There's none of that stuff, really. So why all this allergy to words like soul and divine?

So we can use soul as just shorthand for soulfulness, which is just a kind of texture, flavor, richness of experience.

And we can use soul, I think, with the implication of entity, if you like, knowing it's empty. And what kind of entity is soul? Soul is the, we could say, the organ, the instrument that senses soulfully. So the whole definition, that's fine. Deep definitions do that. They go around in circles.

So where is this organ? I can't find it. And it's empty. It has no inherent existence. But I can talk about an instrument or an organ that can sense with soul, that does sense with soul.

When we talk about soul-making, we say I'm making soulfulness. I'm fabricating—in technical Dharma language, I'm fabricating a sense of soulfulness. Or there is the fabrication of soulfulness. I'm soul-making. What am I making? I'm making soulfulness. I'm also making or building that organ, that instrument. I'm building my capacity through practice to sense soulfully. Do you understand?

So soul-making. The more I sense soulfully, the more accessible it becomes to me. So I'm actually making something. I'm making my instrument. It's being made. I'm participating in the making, in the fashioning, in the forging of this organ, this instrument of perception. Wonderful thing.

Do you understand? So the main point I just want to say is this: we'll start using these words freely. Sensing the soul, freely and interchangeably. Sensing the soul, imaginatively perceiving, imaginal—it's all pretty much the same.

So far?

CHAPTER 140

A Temenos Exercise (in fours)

Rob Burbea · 1h04

> Rob Burbea guides participants through an innovative three-stage group exercise designed to cultivate what he terms 'soul relationships' through shared contemplative practice. Beginning with mettā (loving-kindness) meditation to establish connection and goodwill among group members, the exercise progresses through structured rounds of sharing immediate energy body experiences, emotional states, and finally soul-making moments or images.
>
> This temenos exercise—drawing on the Greek concept of sacred space—invites participants to explore multiple modes of expression: conventional descriptive language, poetic or imagistic expression, non-verbal sounds, and bodily movement. The practice emphasizes both authentic self-expression and deep witnessing of others, with particular attention to how sharing and receiving affect one's energy body, emotions, and perception of self and world.
>
> Burbea's guidance integrates principles from his broader teachings on soul-making dharma, encouraging participants to sense one another 'as angels' and to notice the reverberations of authentic expression in consciousness. The session concludes with the traditional Pāli blessing chant 'Sabbe sattā sukhitā hontu' (may all beings be happy), weaving together individual exploration with collective well-wishing. This exercise offers a unique approach to dharma practice that honors both personal contemplative development and the relational dimensions of spiritual awakening.

Feeling rooted in the moment, in the body. And then from that sense of contact, that sense of connection with ground, with earth, opening up the space of awareness to fill out with that bright sensitivity, that delicacy of attention to the whole of the energy body experience.

Whatever that is right now. Just noticing what's happening in the energy body experience. Whatever it is, it doesn't need to be this way or that way—dramatic or remarkable or unremarkable. Filled out with presence, pervaded by bright sensitivity and awareness.

When you feel ready, you can keep your eyes closed if you want, or you can open your eyes and look at your fellows in the group. A bit of both is fine too. Just spend a little time wishing them well, including yourself in there. You're wishing the other three well, wishing all of you well, directing metta to your companions. You may know them—some of them very well, just a little bit, or not at all. May you be well. May you be happy. May you be peaceful. May you be at ease.

Wishing them well-being, health, peace. It's really fine to make eye contact or not, to look at them and get a sense of being in loving relationships. As you keep intending loving-kindness towards members of your little group, as you keep wishing well and emanating metta towards them, recognize—if it hasn't dawned on you already, if you're not already aware of it—that at this moment, while you are giving metta, you are also the recipient of metta from your fellows in the group. You are giving and receiving.

Again, you can make eye contact or you can just look, or you could sense somehow the presence of the others. They are wishing you well, looking upon you with kindness—at least the aspiration, the intention towards unconditional acceptance and goodwill. Sense yourself both giving and receiving.

Then gently, when you're ready, let the metta go—the awareness of the metta, the intention of the metta—and just be in your experience, in your energy body experience, with a sense of the others and the togetherness there, the connection there.

This exercise has three stages. I'll explain at some point later on why we're even doing this, in case it's not obvious. So again, I have to explain a little bit of the choreography. You stay still—well, actually, you may not. What we're going to do is Catherine will ring the bell when we start, and then ring it at every minute interval for eight minutes. So there'll be eight rings of the bell, starting at zero and then at one minute, two minutes, and so on.

What you can do in that minute—you go around the circle, you can decide who starts—and all you have to do is the person whose turn it is for that minute checks inside, feels inside, and the question is: what's happening in the energy body right now, right now in this moment? So you can express that. You're sharing it with the others in your little group. You can express that very briefly in a few words. So most of your time could be spent just feeling inside and trying to connect and developing that sensitivity. And then maybe you express it in words.

Maybe at first—I don't know, actually. I'm not sure. That's part of the experience. I don't know what's happening here—and it's fine. Or maybe I look and I say something like "agitated," "fluttering," or "fizzy." Or I might look inside and look and look and get a sense and then maybe say "warm" or "soft" or "velvety." So it could be really anything.

It's not like it should be like this or like that. One's just expressing it. Or there's a contraction in the solar plexus area or the throat area. That's fine. That's what's going on in the energy body right there.

So you can express it in simple, descriptive words like that. You could have quite a lot of words or very few words, but you have a minute to do it. You can also express it, if you want, in a more soul sense or in imagistic or poetic language. "There's a spiraling of golden light. My body is a spiraling of golden light." Or "My body is an endless spiral staircase." Or whatever. So you can express it in very simple, descriptive, conventional language, or you can express it poetically, if you want.

You can express it with your voice, but not with words. How would I express what's happening in the energy body? What does the energy body sound like when given voice? It could be a grunt, a moan, a sigh, a roar. And the last option is you can express it in movement, nothing to do with your voice.

So in the eight minutes, basically what's going to happen is we're going to go around twice. Each person has a minute. Remember, some portion of that minute could just be checking inside and tuning in, seeing what's there, and then expressing it in some way. It doesn't have to be verbal, and it doesn't have to be rationally verbal if it is verbal. Do you understand?

I might just offer a few words as we're doing this to help and support. When it's your turn, the others' job is simply to witness and to notice what happens for you. A person is speaking and sharing their experience, and the others are silently witnessing—but with their energy body, with their sensitivity, with their heartfulness, and with that kind of possibility of soulfulness.

Are eyes open? Yes. You want to take in the other person with your senses. You're sensing—at least we're opening the door for the possibility of sensing with soul in every way. You may want to experiment with different ways. There are endless varieties and possibilities. We have quite limited time, but there are endless possibilities.

So the people listening or witnessing, when it's your turn, you're also asking: How does this resonate? This person has just expressed this, whatever it is, and how does my energy body resonate with that? What do I notice in my experience, in my energy body, in my emotions, in my sense of myself or sense of them, sense of the world? You understand? But you don't share that. It's just one person sharing. Is this clear?

Oh, one last thing. What is the intention? We're not trying to impress each other. We're not trying to entertain each other. We're not trying to get it right. We're not trying to make sure that we don't make a fool of ourselves. I mean, all these are very normal human intentions, at least in our culture, so that may well come up. Can I just let go of that?

This is an exercise for the possibility, towards the possibility of soul relationships. So it's very much the beginnings, the preliminaries of opening and setting the supports for that kind of thing. You might notice thoughts arising like, "I just want to say something so I don't look like an idiot." And see if you can just let that go. It's just an exercise. Can I just let that arise and pass?

I've talked for a bit, so why don't we just take another moment to settle. Again, grounding, connecting. The whole energy body changes—energy body changes, moves from moment to moment. And then just touch in again on this metta, giving and receiving metta to your fellows. You're the recipient of goodwill. So that connection through metta.

Just letting that gently go. Come back to your energy body. And is there a way of deciding amongst yourselves who's going to start?

Continue beautifying this talk (part 3/5). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

Someone will volunteer from each group to start, and then we'll proceed clockwise from there. Catherine will ring the bell to begin, and then every minute to signal transitions into the second round. Is that clear enough?

Take the full time you need within each minute. Remember, the others are witnessing—taking you in, receiving you, being sensitive to your presence. Whatever is there is perfectly fine. It's simply what exists in this moment.

Thank you. Take your time, there's no rush. And if you're witnessing, if you're hearing, engage all your senses while noticing what's happening in your energy body in the process of listening, of receiving, of sensing.

That was stage one. Stage two will happen by tomorrow morning—there are three stages total, so this is the second of three.

The choreography remains the same: rounds in two circles with one-minute intervals, just as we practiced. But this time, what you're sharing—what you're expressing in some way or another—is what's happening emotionally right now. Remember, it could be descriptive adjectives or words, a poetic phrase, movement, gesture, or non-verbal sounding.

This connects to the energy body, but it's another level—what's happening emotionally in this moment?

Again, take your time. You can express in these different ways. And the witness—at times looking directly at the person sharing, truly taking them in and observing what happens through all your senses. Sometimes you can simply keep your eyes open, sensing their presence. Other times, you can fully engage all your senses with the person who's sharing.

So again, take time to settle. We move through these stages quite fluidly now. There's the grounding, the inhabiting of posture, the releasing of rigidity. There's the whole energy body. And there's the sense of connection—kindness, well-wishing, goodwill—both giving and receiving with your fellows in the group.

Just touch into that metta feeling, that metta intention, for a few moments. Then gently let that go. We'll begin when Catherine rings the bell.

Some of it can be silent time, just feeling. It can be simple conventional language, poetic language or imagery, gesture, movement.

If it's not too much while you're speaking, sharing, expressing—consider: Who is listening? Who are these beings witnessing me, receiving my expression? Who is listening?

Can you play with the idea that these are angels listening—angels of witnessing? If it's not too overwhelming, if it's not too strong.

Now, I'm aware of time, so let's make this final stage optional. Let me describe what it involves, but perhaps not everyone feels called to be the person sharing. It might be that in every group, only two people want to participate while the rest witness. It might be that everyone feels drawn to it—in which case we'll see what we do with time.

Same format: one person speaks in descriptive words, poetic words, or through movement—body posture, gesture—or sounds, vocalizes, to express and share in whatever way feels called for something that is or has been soul-making for you. Something that has touched your soul and spoken to your soul.

So it might be you're sharing an image. It might be the very sense of what's happening right now, sitting in this little group and perceiving the others as angels. It might be anything whatsoever—the sense of what's coming through itself, something that happened before the retreat, something from earlier in the day. Something that feels like it's spoken to your soul or moves through your soul in a soul-making way. And if we're still not sure what that means, then just something that has filled you with a kind of resonance with beauty.

Does that sound okay?

There might be constriction of time, we can be flexible, but it also might be that, sorry, I'm not quite ready to do that. Not in an order. We could start with maybe two volunteers in each group, and the same thing—the others will witness and listen and take in with their senses and the possibility of sensing a soul, the other whom they're witnessing and hearing and regarding.

The person has five minutes if they want. Again, a lot of it could be quiet to share. And everyone tracks in themselves what's the experience when this person is sharing and I witness them and I sense them as soul. What happens in my energy body? What happens with my heart, my emotions? What happens with my sense of me, my sense of them, my sense of this, and my sense of all of this?

Basically, noticing what happens when I'm speaking, when I share, and when I witness. Do you understand? So it's just the same thing taken to a slightly richer or more involved level.

So let's do this. Three minutes each, and we'll do all four. We'll go round again. But this time, instead of ringing the bell after one minute, Catherine will ring it every three minutes, and that's the next person.

Let's again just root, sensing the contact, sensing your sitting, your body sitting. Sensing the connection with the earth, opening up to the whole energy body. Just noticing what's present in the energy body right now. What's present in the emotions right now. Connecting again to that intention of well-wishing, the emanating of kindness to your fellows, your group. Aware that in this moment you are the recipient of metta, of kindness. Giving and receiving. Touching into that as a foundation.

Energy body, experience, presence, sensitivity, as much as possible. And then, again, I'm thinking about three minutes. So you can voluntarily start to go in the same order.

So let's just pause now, and before we go on to the next person, just take your time. How does it feel to have shared that, to have expressed whatever it was? What effect does that have in your sense of things, of these others, of this room that we're in, of yourself? Perhaps it's even possible, it's not too much of a stretch, to actually be aware of that as one is sharing. So I'm not just explaining or recounting.

Again, if it's not too much, who is listening? Who is listening to me with so much interest, so much delight, so much celebration? What passes through the emotion, the energy body, the sense? Sensitivity is multidimensional. It's a possibility of multidimensional sensitivity. This possibility is possible. Just gently expanding into that possibility.

Just again, pausing, coming into a little bit of silence together. Noticing what moves in the being, in the energy body, in the heart. Listen to your sense. Listening or sensing —take your time. It's fine to have a lot of words; it's also fine...

So again, just taking a few moments to notice the echoes, the reverberations in the being, in the body, in the heart, in perception—in the sense of self, other, even in our world. It doesn't have to be anything in particular.

Everything is dependent arising, everything has an effect. So again, all we do here is just taking those few moments to pick up on the after-echoes or the resonances, reverberations in your being of having expressed, having shared, or having witnessed or heard what has been shared.

In this part, you may want to open your eyes, because it's about both the self and the other, and the world. You might not notice anything, or it might be something difficult that you're noticing. Whatever it is, it's completely fine. Totally fine. It doesn't have to be this way or that way. But it's interesting.

Whatever is the experience, whatever is the sense of things, come back to that foundational intention for kindness to the others in your group. Wishing them well. Wishing them ease, joy and peace. Right now you are a recipient of that, as well as a donor, a keeper.

Catherine will join us in that chant again together. Feel free to harmonize or whatever. This is Pali, and it really means "may all beings be happy." So it's a metta chant. It's a blessing, a blessing with the sound, a blessing with the voice and intention. Just for a couple of minutes. To your group, to all the beings in this room.

Sabbe sattā sukhitā hontu
Sabbe sattā sukhitā hontu
Sabbe sattā sukhitā hontu
Sabbe sattā sukhitā hontu

May all beings be happy. May all beings be well. May all beings be free.

CHAPTER 141

Transformation in Soul (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 36 min

> In this intimate Q&A session, Rob Burbea addresses profound questions about the relationship between psychological healing, Buddhist emptiness teachings, and imaginal practice. The discussion begins with exploring how different approaches to selfhood—from constructing a solid sense of self to deconstructing it through emptiness—can all serve the soul-making process. Burbea explains how imaginal practice gives dimensionality and divine rootedness to our unique manifestation, suggesting that our individual journey, including difficulties and tragedies, can be sensed as having sacred meaning.
>
> The conversation delves into how challenging emotions like anger and grief can be transformed through soul-making practice. Rather than simply transcending or eliminating difficult emotions, Burbea demonstrates how they can become gateways to archetypal energies and divine imagination. He illustrates how anger might transform into wrathful deity energy that carries both power and sacred duty, while maintaining kindness rather than cruelty.
>
> Burbea emphasizes that soul is not a fixed entity but rather a dynamic capacity for sensing the world with dimensionality, divinity, and meaning. He explains how any practice can become soulful through the quality of relationship we bring to it, though practices with rigid conceptual limits may eventually constrain soul-making. The discussion highlights the importance of maintaining flexibility and avoiding fixation on any single approach to spiritual development.

So again, please let me know if you'd rather your question or the interaction wasn't recorded. Just let me know. I'll press pause.

"I'm getting really interested in images of selves and in the interest of healing. I'm getting really interested in this interface between what I take to be my everyday self—the self that apparently needs healing because there's a lot of suffering—and the imaginal self. There's really no self, emptiness, and I was thinking that I could get around it that way with practice and healing. But now it feels like with the imaginal, it's really amazing—everything's sliding a bit and morphing, and I'm not really sure what it is that's being healed."

Let me see if I can summarize that. You're getting very interested in the interface between the senses or the images of self and healing the self and the emptiness of self, and the different pathways that are offered through that mixture. Would that be a way of rephrasing what you said?

In some Buddha Dharma, for instance, there's this teaching that the self is empty, but it has this connotation that it's kind of almost not worth bothering about—in the sense of the richness of the personality or the depth of the personality. It's just a fabrication, it's just a construct, it's just an illusion. And we're opening that out to other possibilities.

"What is being healed? What happens in your experience when you start working with imagining yourself in the interest of healing?"

So in a way, there's one pathway that says just let go of the self—it's irrelevant, just deconstruct it or see that it's empty. Then there's this psychological dictum or maxim: well, you have to have a self before you let go of it. So one builds that solid sense of self and a sense of self-identity, and then maybe you do the emptiness work. Where does the imaginal come in?

You may pick up something common in the answers I give, which is: yes, it's all good. It's all available and helpful—the different angles on things.

"It feels like sometimes that's the way to go. Sometimes, some days, that is the way. I'm really wondering what happens to the self when you start working with the deeply imaginal self."

Well, it gets given dimensionality, and it gets given a rootedness or a sense of origin in divinity, for a start. And that's huge. That's absolutely massive. That's not the typical Western sense or idea of self. We tend to be suspicious if someone has that kind of sense of themselves—that somehow they're rooted in divinity. Not just in a universal sense that we're all rooted in, we're all children of God, we're all part of the universal oneness of whatever that universal oneness is.

But in the very particular sense that you, with the uniqueness of your manifestation, the uniqueness of your personality, the uniqueness of even the difficulties that you encounter, and the story of your life, and even the tragedies that you're handed—that this is somehow given from the divine or given to us in our uniqueness. Our uniqueness, our unique journey is actually rooted in God, has its origins in the divine. Use whatever language helps you here.

I am an angel. You are angels. All of that, and the journey that I'm on, or what's handed to me in my life—this cancer that I might die of—this is somehow necessary to the divine. Now, I'm not going to reify that and cling to it, but there's a kind of...

---

view and actually a sensing with soul that I can enter into with something like this.

This is a part of the narrative of my life. It's a fact. But it's multidimensional and it has its given place, given meaning, given depth, given divinity, given a sacredness that pertains to its uniqueness, your uniqueness. Do you understand? That's healing at a whole other level, a whole other level.

And so it's like—I'll talk about me. Let's say I die from the cancer. There's a healing that happens at a whole other level whether or not I die. Do you understand?

Some of the less socially sanctioned corners and angles and protuberances and ways of our personhood might be, sometimes the healing is to soften them, to change them, to make them less dukkha, and sometimes the healing is at another level. So-and-so is still arrogant. So-and-so is still belligerent. They're always fighting for this cause and being on the edge of being obnoxious or whatever it is. What does healing look like? You sand everything down so it's all polished and kind of bland and beige? Or is it that there is an angel in that very difficulty somehow?

And then the question is an open one: how much does it need, A, transforming, so that I'm not just stuck in something that's actually not soulful? So that's always the thing—what's soulful? But also it's just not pointless dukkha. How much does it need to be transformed? How much does it need to be blessed by this other sense of it? And the healing is in that. And also how much freedom is there?

Because the other aspect of healing might be—and this may be also where it ties in with emptiness, is emptiness of self—to see that we're multiple. That's why I said you're angels, you're not just one. And so there's not so much rigidity. You see how my personality or the patterns that I manifest in my life, in relationship, in thinking, in expression, in my work, in the way I move my body—they can get very rigid. It's just like, okay, that person just always does things this way, and I realize I don't even realize that I'm stuck in it, or maybe I do realize.

So one of the things with soul, and we've kind of implied this in what we've been saying, is that there's a certain freedom in just having more range and having the flexibility. I can have the light and I can have the dark. I can have the raging God and I can have the God of infinitely soft benevolence. All as me and into me and through me, I can have, as we said today, the stillness and the movement. Do you understand? So I'm less fixated on one self being how I am and I open to the—Hillman would call it the polytheism, the multiplicity of the angels that come through me, come through you, that speak to you, that want something from you.

And so there's something that's liberating in the sense of breaking out of a rigidity and an enclosedness in recognizing the multiplicity of what's coming through me and what's being asked of me and what my soul relationships are—angels, divinities, images, etc.

Where that ties in with emptiness, again, this is a little bit related to what I said this morning, is that, again, with a certain kind of—I would say—not fully deep understanding of emptiness, then we say, oh, the self is empty, therefore it's worthless, therefore we just kind of would be better off without it somehow. And we have this image like a liberated person sort of doesn't have one, or they're kind of—so what, what is that? And is that even something that I want?

So there's a kind of just—it's always put down and put aside or it's tolerated. We tolerate, you have this personality, Keval has this personality. It's okay. It's just personality. It's just form. And we don't get too hung up about it. So it's kind of neither particularly attacked or celebrated or seen as divine, the self and the expression of the self.

If we go deeper into emptiness, like I said this morning, you see that the very fact that any self construction at all is empty means that I'm free to construct the self any old how. And if I'm strictly in a Buddha Dharma gear, I'll say the constructions of self are for the purpose of reducing dukkha. If I'm expanding that a bit more—and there are all questions here about paradigms and where they fit—but if I'm expanding that a bit more, I could say the constructions of self at any time, the images of self, can be in the service of soulfulness.

And that may overlap completely with the quieting of dukkha, the dissolving of dukkha, or it might be—it's not quite that simple.

But the very fact of the emptiness, of the thorough, complete emptiness of self, totally—any conception of self is empty—allows us to fabricate and the self to be fabricated in different ways. We see it's all play, it's all theatre, and we can be moved by theatre and play. Do you understand? Does it make sense?

And like you said, there's always this gear too. We're not emphasizing it so much on this retreat—on the last retreat, partly because we called it "Of Hermits and Lovers: The Alchemy of Desire." So we didn't want everyone blowing fuses and things. We just spent a day talking about letting go. That's a gear too. And this gear of shoring up the self and getting a really solid sense of self and where my boundaries are and who I am—going back to what I said right at the beginning—it's like, all good. All these directions are good.

Sometimes I think, as a general point, the only mistake we can make is to be stuck in one way of seeing things. One way of thinking about the self or relating to the self, for example. Whatever that is. Without that flexibility, that malleability, that fluidity, that range that is, I think, a result and an expression, an embodiment of freedom—range, flexibility in thinking, in acting, in relating, in meditating. So I'm just echoing what you said, that actually they're all good. And then the art is like, when? When is what helpful when and in what ways?

So basically, Nick's saying that even if she's in the mode or the thinking of shoring up boundaries and shoring up the self and really setting boundaries and being clear about that—something that is maybe more typical of modern psychology in the West—even that endeavor and even that way of viewing things can be, in the language we've been using, sensed with soul. So that whole idea and that whole movement and that whole endeavor and everything that's involved in that can have all the dimensionality and all the divine referencing and context and blessing and sacredness and divinity and all the other business. It's the same thing, but it's seen with, it's sensed with soul.

And there's a big difference between that and seeing it more rigidly—which can still be really, really helpful—seeing it more flatly, if you like.

Robert had his hand up before, so I'll come back. "I'd be grateful if you could explain how strong emotions other than love relate to sensing the soul."

You mean more difficult emotions? So the question is how strong emotions and more difficult emotions like anger or grief relate to sensing the soul, emotions other than love.

The first thing to say is love can also be soulless, relatively—or everything's a spectrum. So I can love something and it doesn't have that dimensionality and divinity. Love is an aspect of sensing the soul, but it's not by itself enough.

Anger, for instance. Are you saying how would you work with it, is the question? Or just how does it fit conceptually?

It relates to Nick's question a little bit. It's like whatever is coming through can be spun off into papañca, can be ignored, dismissed, ridiculed, transcended somehow, or related to in a way that opens up soul movement. So we participate in everything.

Here's the anger. We'll weave in the practice and the concept. I'm sitting. Maybe I don't even realize I'm angry at first. I just feel hot and bothered. Or maybe I feel depressed.

Actually, it's something about just like, you know. And then I say, okay, the emotional awareness is absolutely indispensable. It's like an absolute part of the foundation of the practice. So I feel into this depression, the kind of heavy cloud of it—and I'm just making this up as a possibility. I feel that heaviness, and it feels like something's pressing me down, and I'm with it, and I'm just like, man, I feel like I've been pressed down a lot in my life. And then it's like, you know what? I'm really pissed off at being pressed down. I get angry at the depression, for instance. And then I'm with something slightly different. The depression has maybe got both depression and anger. I'm just making up a possibility.

And I say, okay, that's interesting. Let me feel into the anger. Energy body—what does it need? Maybe it needs love. Maybe it needs metta. That would be one approach. Maybe I just need to kind of let that anger be in the energy body and see what it does. And so there's kindness in the approach, but I'm not trying to change it. And I'm not either just watching it as sensation.

So I've got energy body, I've got this—maybe it feels like there are these glowing embers in my belly and I can feel this and it's mixed with frustration and it's confusing, etc. I'm just with it and I'm holding it and I'm letting something emerge in the energy body, in the emotionality, in the way I'm tending to it.

And then there's a lot of energy wrapped up in anger, a lot of emotional energy and a lot of psychic energy wrapped up, and also in some depressions. It's actually a kind of energy that's just trapped and either attacking oneself or just locked. There's not all depression, but a lot of depression has a lot of energy. When I start relating to it in this way and being with it in the energy, when you're being sensitive to it and allowing it, but in a very intimate way, then the energy, the psychic energy in the emotion may liberate an image. It may generate an image.

So it was maybe just embers, and then out of the embers comes some kind of fiery, wrathful deity stomping around and roaring, and he's got a trident and a nine-bladed sword and all that. And maybe I'm a little bit scared of this. And maybe I feel like I've become that. Or maybe he's looking at me and engaging with me. Then I'm in the realm of the imaginal.

Now, with that, as one of our nodes or business, is a sense of duty. So I'm going quite quickly here. But I then would engage this figure, or either feel what it feels like to become that figure, or engage him in relationship. I'm in meditative, mindful, sensitive energy body emotional awareness to the resonance, relationship, or how does it feel to become this deity and to see the world and to feel the world and what does the body feel like and what do I feel like.

At that point, when it has become imaginal, to the degree it has become imaginal, there's something felt. The anger could still be there, but it's transformed—but not so much into love or softness or equanimity. It's become a kind of wrathful deity. It's become a creative anger. There will be a feeling of liberation.

Before—I mean, certainly in the example I just gave—I started depressed. I felt so... Then when I feel angry, I start to feel a bit bigger, but I still feel caught in the anger. So usually we have an unskillful relationship with anger. We just feel tied up in it, knotted in it. When it becomes soulful and imaginal, it doesn't feel like a problem anymore. And it's not that we just kind of give ourselves license to buy a shotgun and kill whatever, and just shoot our mouths off. Something's changed in the whole nature of what it is and what it feels like.

And maybe there's a situation. Maybe I have felt depressed because I'm in a situation or I have been a long time in a situation where the rules of engagement in the organization or the family or the relationship or whatever are actually constraining me. So I've got a situation that I'm actually angry about as well.

Now the imaginal, we have to be very sensitive and very attuned here and also careful. It might give me a duty and a perspective in relation to that situation. Do you understand?

And that might look like I say something and it has not unkindness. There's a difference between unkindness and wanting to hurt. The Buddha says non-cruelty is one of the three primary intentions in the Noble Eightfold Path. But it can be sharp and it can be cutting and it can be strong and it can be powerful and it can be angry. But it's a very different thing. And the purpose of it and the sense of it and the purpose of it and the whole experience of it is much expanded and again given dimensionality and a rooting in divinity.

Some of you know this. I wrote a letter some years ago to the Insight Meditation teachers, and it was about climate change and what we're doing, or actually what we're not doing in relation to that. There was anger in it, and it was obnoxious, or it would be easy to read it as obnoxious, and I could certainly see it that way, and I think a lot of people found it that way. And it certainly pissed people off.

Now, I could be completely off here, but I don't regret doing it. And with all whatever consequences it made. And I think I will feel that till I die. There was something right about it and right about the tone. And there was something, to my sense, kind of archetypal coming through. I'm not saying that's the only answer. It was maybe part of a beginning of something that needed lots of other energies. But it felt at the time like there was anger there, there was frustration. And there was a kind of calling that actually in this case needed to manifest.

Now, if we go back to the example that we said before, it might be that the duty involved in this image is just that. I've just opened it. I've just got a different sense of the situation. And I find that something's liberated. There's still the heat and the force and all that. But I don't feel I need to do anything. I could, but I'm not being asked to do anything or manifest or speak. And other times we do get a sense of some kind of duty that's involved. Does this make sense?

So it's not so much that anger itself would be a node as much as, again, anger, like anything else, is something that can be related to with more or less soul-making.

I'm visited by a couple of images whose beauty and divinity seems somehow dependent on anger and grief, respectively. And regardless of how long I spend with them...

Yeah. Right. And so, you know, is that not a part of life? There is tragedy in life and one can look at and conceive of tragedy in lots of different ways—as a kind of flat existentialist, "well, that's life," or given soul. So again, it's not that somehow the child miraculously comes back to life and everything's rosy and happy forever and ever. There's something in that particular image that you're describing, that there is this holy grief, there is this redemption that happens without transformation. It's a transubstantiation more than a transformation.

So I don't, you know, it may be they change, and images can sometimes change, sometimes over long periods of time, long, long periods of time. But it may just stay that, and there's something iconic for you in those images, and they've got something for you. They're teaching you something. They're part of the soul-making.

And the mind can't quite wrap it. This is really important. If the mind feels like it's figured it out, it's always got this part of the beyondness.

It's got this quality of beyondness—there's just something I get, sort of, but I don't quite grasp completely, and yet it speaks to me profoundly. It does something. You understand? So your job is opening to that, resonating with that, following that thread of sensibility and sensitivity.

Did you have your hand up, Jim? Okay, should we do that? Okay, last one.

"I have a quick question. I think I'm not the only one that's relatively new to this, but I'm beginning to feel things start to coalesce. May I ask a simple question: what is soul? I know you probably talked about this in other courses."

So Jill is saying she's a beginner and... I'd say we're all beginners, actually, and I definitely say that about myself. And the question is, what is soul?

The first thing to say, just following on from what we said to Robert and what I touched on at some point, is that there are some really deep ideas in life that we will be poorer if we put them too much in a box and get too polished, rigid, tight definitions around. So it's like the concept has to have these elastic edges that I was talking about, and it has to have some mystery, and that's where its fecundity comes from. So soul is a kind of nebulous concept at one level.

Having said that, we could say soul is actually just shorthand for a kind of experience—which is all this business that we're talking about. So that's putting it as though it's not a thing at all. It's just a way of experiencing. That's one conception.

A second conception is, without giving it inherent existence, we say the soul is some kind of entity or belonging to my being or given to me or bigger than my being. Some kind of entity that operates by seeing and sensing in these ways that we're talking about. Now that instrument or organ can get really shrunk. It can get atrophied. It can lose its blood supply so that it barely functions in our life. Or it can grow and get powerful and gain more facility and accessibility at sensing that way.

How does that sound?

"That sounds good. That sounds very good. So I'm assuming that all practices can be soulful?"

All practices can be soulful. Yes. Yes, all practices can be... because the soulfulness is in the relationship to something, okay? So anything can be soulful.

However, if there's a practice that has built-in conceptual limits—that, for example, disallow imagination, disallow any kind of... they just have a rigid conception of how things are—then they will be soulful up to a certain point for you. If they're new to you, they're all very exciting. So, for example, I trained a lot in a kind of atomistic Mahasi style—look at the moment-to-moment sensation of everything. It's moment-to-moment viññāṇa and consciousness and all this, and the body is just atoms and all that. At first, that's all very new, and it's exciting, and everything explodes into this mist of atoms, and it's all really fast, and it's thrilling.

But then when the implicit or explicit teaching is, "This is reality, that's it, anything else is delusion and nonsense," then the soul has kind of... it's been stretched up to that point. It's like all this is new. There's the expansion of soul-making there—the expansion of new vistas, new senses of things, the excitement of the eros. But then when it's been there for a while, there's no more soul-making.

So there's something dynamic in soul-making, something expansive, and if it reaches a wall, either it pushes that wall outwards so there's more territory—new discoveries, new ideas, new perceptions, new senses of things, new sense of self, new sense of the world—pushes it, usually quite slowly. Or it just blows through the damn wall, and I've talked about breaking the vessels. It just shatters things. And that can be a bit like, "Whoa." And then maybe you build new ones that are bigger. They've got more range in them.

Or the walls are stronger than the dynamic of soul-making. And the psyche and the life just stay within those walls. And then what happens? Well, it's stuck, or something gets... it just grinds to a halt. Yeah, the soul-making dynamic does... And then we feel that in our life.

But because we don't have that language in our culture, we cannot articulate what's happening—or more precisely, what's not happening. Without this context and vocabulary for soul-making, we remain unable to recognize when these dynamics have stalled or ceased altogether.

So oftentimes in our lives, we encounter what we might call wolves—those challenging forces that confront our established ways of being. Even when we're not consciously aware of it, we carry walls: walls of habit, walls of energetic patterns, walls of conception, walls of emotion that block our soul-making. This is completely normal.

The question then becomes: what does this situation need? Will these walls stretch smoothly, organically, slowly over time? Will they need to be burst through more dramatically? Or will it require some other kind of work—a deliberate examination and engagement with these walls themselves?

When we can recognize these dynamics, when we can see the interplay between the soul-making impulse and the structures that both support and constrain it, we gain a different kind of navigation system for our lives. We begin to understand when stagnation arises not from external circumstances alone, but from the way our inner walls have become too rigid, too small, or simply inappropriate for the soul's current needs.

This is the gift of developing this language, this sensitivity to the movements of soul-making. It allows us to participate more consciously in our own becoming, to recognize when we need to tend these dynamics with care, and to trust the organic intelligence that knows how to grow beyond our current limitations.

CHAPTER 142

Soulful Movement and Elements of the Imaginal (6-10)

Rob Burbea · 43 min

In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea opens new possibilities for practice by exploring movement and sound as pathways to soulful engagement, moving beyond the cultural dominance of stillness and silence in meditation retreats. He demonstrates how the energy body can move imaginally even in apparent stillness, and invites practitioners to discover what it means for movement and voice to become deeply soulful.

Continuing his detailed exploration of imaginal elements, Burbea examines trust as a crucial node that can be both noticed and deliberately cultivated - even "a grain of trust" can activate the entire imaginal field through dependent arising. He illuminates how images inherently possess dimensionality and divine qualities, with soft, elastic boundaries that allow for the expansion of soul-making dynamics. The sense of beyondness and unfathomability in imaginal perception creates allure and eros, yet remains present in and through appearances rather than transcending them.

Burbea contextualizes this work within broader Buddhist approaches, distinguishing between practices aimed at the unfabricated, mindfulness of "things as they are," and imaginal engagement. He argues that deep understanding of emptiness and fabrication ultimately legitimizes skillful, soulful fabrication, freeing practitioners to participate creatively in the discovery of being while maintaining the refined discernment essential to soul-making practice.

The possibilities of soul, the possibilities for soul, are endless. They're endless. And that endlessness is also endless in different directions. Soul opens up in different ways, can open up in different ways, in different directions, at different levels.

We discover a lot about all kinds of things, but also about soul through stillness and through silence. Sometimes, for many of us, stillness and silence can become a kind of habit. We spend a lot of retreats where there's a lot of stillness and a lot of silence. In a place like this place this week, or a Gaia House, stillness and silence are the cultural dominance. If someone were to come in this hall and see a bunch of people sitting still and silent in funny postures, they would consider it quite strange.

So we discover, we can discover a lot about soul. We will discover a lot about soul through stillness, through the depth of stillness and silence. And yet there's also a direction through movement and through non-silence, through sound.

Sometimes what happens, and many of you will have experienced this and I've talked about it before, one is sitting still and silent in meditation aware of the energy body. Maybe there's an image or something going on, and one can actually feel the energy body moving, but to an outside observer, it would look completely still. It looks like this—I'm just sitting in silent meditation—but I feel, and there's an imaginal sense and an energetic bodily sense of the body dancing or moving, or turning cartwheels, or whatever it is. So this is a really, really fertile area of meditation, to open up that way.

Or again, an image, and there's a roaring coming through the image. No one can hear anything. It's, if you like, purely in the image, if we say it that way. But because it's imaginal, it's soulful. They go together. So I don't know if some of you have had this kind of experience.

Then of course, we can actually move. And we did a little bit of that in one of the sessions. And I've talked about this in the past as well. So, what is it, if I put the question to you rather than say what it is: What is it to practice moving and practice sounding and can that be soulful? What might that mean? What might that feel like?

We might have a practice of tai chi or qigong or something—there's movement involved. Is that soulful? How can it become more insouled? So there's a direction here, a possibility.

This came up—Andrea asked in the vigilantes—we have a culture of stillness and silence. Could it be that we open up the sense of practice to include movement? And then this question, not so much a koan, but an ongoing investigative, explorative question for you: What does it mean for movement to become soulful, to become more deeply soulful, more fully soulful? What does it mean for sound, for voice, to become more soulful, more deeply soulful?

And a lot of it is about cultural dominance. Because I've said this a couple of times on retreats, and it can be strange, because everyone says, well, here, it's where we sit, and we're still. And it looks a bit, maybe the person thinks, oh, I look a bit weird if I'm the only one sort of moving. See how influenced we are by culture around us.

So I'd like to open that up again as a possibility. Movement can be very, very subtle, really subtle. The hands are moving, or some movement, and it can feel completely soulful. Or the sounding can be really subtle. What matters is the soul-making, not what the movement looks like to another person, or how much movement, or what it is. So we're just opening up a kind of possibility, a level of practice, if you like.

So we have sitting period, walking period. You could say sitting period, moving period. It might look absolutely like walking up and down in a delineated form. And again, there's so much to learn from a circumscribed walking path. You walk between two points and it's very contained and very, well, contained in lots of ways. There's a lot to learn that way. But it might be sometimes that you want to explore something different. There's stillness, sitting, and then there's movement.

And what is that with the energy body, with the imaginal, with the possibility of soulfulness? Some of you have movement practices, exercise practices, and still I put this question: what does it mean to deepen the soulfulness, to open the soulfulness in relation to yoga, tai chi, if you're following prescribed forms? It's an open question for you to find out, for us to find out.

So I want to return to the nodes, the aspects of the imaginal, and pick up where we left off. I don't know if Catherine's already addressed this—are they in the book? Somehow some of you are taking notes, and that's fine, that's actually great. We will try to put the list of these nodes, these aspects, up on the board at some point today.

Again, why are we doing all this? It's a lot. We're actually zipping through, and today I'm going to zip through. Really, it's like a high-speed bus tour. Partly it's to highlight, to draw your attention to certain features. What's the point?

Partly, we're interested in discernment. This whole movement of meditation—whatever the practice—is a movement into more and more sensitivity, more and more subtlety of awareness, more and more refined perceptions, ability to discriminate and discern this and that. All that is part of the beauty and the art of the unfolding. So putting all this out is really just to throw some seeds out. What's that? Can I notice that? Can I discern this and that? Making distinctions or recognizing distinctions in perception—this is all really important in soul-making. So it's for the sake of that kind of refinement and enriching of awareness and attention and sensitivity.

It's also, as I said when we introduced it, for the sake of clarity. There's a whole conceptual framework here, and understanding the different aspects of it will help bring that clarity of understanding. But it is not—at least I hope it doesn't become—a kind of canonized dogma. Not a soul-making catechism, "I believe in the twenty-eighth..." You know? Where it gets very rigid like that. It's more like seeds. It's like, "Oh, what's that?" And even the words we use—they're maybe words that we're very familiar with in English, but they kind of have different possibilities when we use them. They're like poetic seeds. You understand?

So can there be this kind of straddling of an attitude that's both very precise and interested in refinement of discrimination and discernment, and also loose and labile, fluid enough and flexible enough?

The third point about why we're doing this is because, as I mentioned earlier, there's a possibility in recognizing these nodes in the moment, in practice, that something is activated in the whole process. For example, Catherine talked yesterday about one of those: loving and being loved. Some images, it's very obvious—they're love images. It's palpable. It's the most obvious feature of that image. Other images—and I've described these in other talks—where that's not an obvious feature, but it's there.

What can happen is I begin to notice that feature or that element, that aspect, that node. For instance, being loved. It's like this image, whatever it is, is very stern and seems a bit forbidding or maybe a bit scary. But as I pay attention more closely, I notice there's this unusual kind of loving that this—if it's another imaginal figure—has for me. And that noticing, the very attuning of the attention to that node or that element, ignites that element of feeling loved further. And that ignition of one part of the lattice ignites—the ignition spreads, so the whole thing comes alive.

So one way this all works is via noticing. We just notice—that's why we're throwing out these things. Can you notice this? Some of them are a lot easier to notice than others; there's individual variation. But the noticing ignites or activates something, and the whole thing can become, let's say, more fully imaginal.

There's the capacity to notice what's already there that we hadn't fully noticed in the field of the imaginal. It's like there is this thing that we're calling sensing the soul or imaginal perception, and we're kind of discovering what it is. So I think, "Oh, there's that." And it was just dimly in the awareness. So making it more obvious in the moment ignites something.

That's one possibility. A second possibility, which we touched on, is to be more deliberate with the nodes. Take the energy body node, for instance. I can notice what's happening in the energy body, or I can also deliberately emphasize that node and activate it. Let's say I'm in relationship with a tree, or with another being, or with a so-called internal image. Can I bring my whole energy body into relationship with that tree, with that being, with that image? I sense it with my whole body, not just with my eyes, not just with my ears, but with my whole body. Or I just start to deliberately activate more of that energy body sense. So I'm turning up the dial, if you like, on the energy body node. And that, again, can activate the whole lattice, ignite the entire network.

The sixth element is trust. This is an example of one that could work both ways in terms of noticing or activating. Sometimes we're with an image and maybe to the mind it seems a bit untrustworthy or pathological or violent or strangely amoral or immoral even. And then we can notice sometimes that—hold on—there's something in me, so to speak, that trusts this. So we notice the trust. But trust is an element of the imagination. It's one of these elements of the imagination. Sometimes we can be more deliberate with trust.

I presume that we wouldn't be here—no one would be here—if you didn't sense that in the imaginal, even in the weird images that one might get, you'd be a little tentative about sharing them with many people. This is a strength; there's something to trust here. It sounds weird, it looks weird, it smells weird, but there's a treasure here. We sense there's a treasure here.

Now, sometimes what you can do is just deliberately—I use the phrase—just a grain of trust. It seems like a strange image. It seems like a strange experience or sense of the world that I'm having right now. Can I just sprinkle a grain of trust into the mix right there? Just a little bit of trust can be enough for the alchemy to start happening. Without that trust, everything just gets limited. It can't enrich and deepen.

All this is dependent arising. In other words, if there's not trust in this so-called subjective pole of the whole field, of the imaginal field, then everything either grinds to a halt or stops or gets limited. My lack of trust, my distrust, my suspicion, my fear, colors the image. The image is a dependent arising. The sensing of the world is a dependent arising.

Like in a nightmare—if you've ever had this experience—you've been chased by the monster, and I'm afraid of this monster chasing me. It's getting bigger and bigger as it's chasing me. If you've ever turned around to face the monster and give yourself to the monster, what happens? It transforms. Why? Because the relationship with it has transformed, because the whole thing is a dependent arising. I participate; we participate in the co-creation-discovery of what we sense, whether we're talking about intra-psychic images or sensing the soul.

So if I can just sprinkle that little bit of grain of trust, then I'm participating in the creation of this image in a way that allows it to open. I don't know about this, but I can trust just a little bit.

So let me just create a little frame. I can allow myself to play with trusting this, experiment with trusting this image or whatever I'm sensing right now for ten minutes, or twenty minutes, or five minutes. In that way, I'm not saying I have to sign up to a lifelong marriage with this weird monster or whatever it is. I can just create a time frame, and at the end of that time frame, I can step out. This can be a helpful approach.

In terms of trust, there's also trusting a particular sense that we have, a particular image. There's also trusting the whole process that we're engaged in—all this business of soul-making and the logos. There are different kinds of trust. If we can find a way in practice of just allowing or encouraging a little bit of trust, that helps the dependent origination in the process. It helps things become more fertile, to open up.

Let me move through some points very quickly—just sprinkling seeds.

The seventh aspect is that images, by definition imaginal images, elicit, open, nourish, support, and ignite soul-making. Something is not really an image unless it has that quality—unless we recognize the resonances, all the different kinds of resonances that it has in the soul. So the sense of soulfulness is a characteristic aspect of imagining.

There's another part of this which I'm just going to mention because I've talked about it so much before in previous series of talks and retreats. An image stimulates, opens, supports, grounds, and nourishes soul-making. What is soul-making? This is why I'm not going to explain so much. Just to say, soul-making involves what we've been calling the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic and the way they weave into each other and inseminate each other and open and expand and deepen and enrich and complicate each other. I'm not going to go into it right now. We can talk about it if you want another time.

Soul-making has this quality—something expands in soul-making. There's a sense with soulfulness of something stretching the psyche, actually, if you like. Stretching the sense of things, the idea of things, the perceptions of things. That stretch can happen very quickly, very suddenly, or more gradually over time. The arising of soulfulness, the supporting of soulfulness, is an aspect of the imaginal.

And soulfulness is more than heartfulness. Heartfulness is very important. Heartfulness is a part of soulfulness. But soulfulness is more than heartfulness in many ways.

I'm going to just flip the order because I'm moving through quite quickly. So I'm going to jump to what was the tenth on our list and then come back to the eighth and ninth.

The tenth was that in the imaginal, with the imaginal, the boundaries are elastic and soft. The boundaries are not definite and fixed—the boundaries of self and the boundaries of other, the boundaries of the image. This elasticity is related to what I said about the soul-making dynamic, the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic, having a tendency to expand.

So here's this image, for instance, or here's myself as image. The sense is—here's what I thought it was, it seemed like it was, but as it gets caught up in the soul-making dynamic, the sense of what that being is, and what the self is, and even what the world is, expands. The idea—there's Robert, there's Natalie—the sense of what's involved in a Robert or a Natalie, who they are, what they are, grows, gets more complex, gets richer, wider, deeper. So we could say elastic edges. Things can expand and move. This applies both to concepts and to images.

Soft edges means—just right now, try two things.

First, think of someone—actually, someone you love. Consider them, and get a sense of their being if you can.

Now, you might have a really sharp visual imagination. You might see every little hair of stubble on their chin, or whatever it is. So in that sense, the image may be very visually precise as a form—it may be very sharp-edged rather than soft-edged. But I'm talking about their beingness, their essential being.

So this person that you love—get a sense of their beingness. Does that beingness of this person, their kind of essence, does that have an edge? Does it have a sharp edge?

I mean, maybe it has some edge. There's a sense of "Well, Mark is over there and I'm over here. Mark is over there and Eamon's over there." There are edges there, and that's fine. At another level that doesn't exist, but that's fine—we're retaining a certain level of those edges.

But there's a feeling to Mark or a feeling to Eamon that there's no sharp edge to a person's being. Do you understand? You get a sense of that immediately. That's how persons are. When we put sharp edges to a person, people say, "Whoa, buddy, back off." We don't like it if people do that to us, or if we do it to ourselves—we don't feel well.

An image is the same. Whether it's a tree that I'm sensing the soul of, or a flower that I'm sensing the soul of, again, it doesn't have a sharp edge. This soft-edgedness is part of the sense of an image. Do you understand?

So that's the tenth aspect: elastic and soft edges.

Related to that—and many of these aspects overlap, while some point in different directions and are even a little contradictory to each other—is the eighth aspect: a sense of dimensionality. This is also somewhat implicit in this soft-edgedness business.

When I think of my sense of Robert, in that blurriness of his edges, first of all, I wouldn't want him to have sharp edges. I lose something of his beauty, of his mystery, of his essence if he's got sharp edges. Do you understand?

Now, in the blurriness, as it transitions into the vastness, we could say there's a kind of dimensionality. It's like sensing into Robert, sensing into this tree or this flower. When I sense it with soul, it's as if there are other dimensions that we sort of pick up on or intuit or dimly sense. Sometimes we clearly sense them.

So it's like I sense Robert and I sense him as the angel there. Now, I can see Robert, and I see his striped shirt, and I see him sitting in his form, and I know a little bit about his history in the human realm. And there's another dimension—the angelic dimension. Actually, there are multiple dimensions. Some of them will be clear to me, and some of them kind of recede into this blurriness.

I just got muddled because you were talking about Robert, and for a minute I thought you meant yourself.

Oh no, sorry, I meant him. Well, I could mean myself. So thank you for saying that, Ron. I could mean myself, so I'm also a Robert. But in this case I meant that Robert. But it doesn't matter, because whatever we sense with soul—whether it's Robert Broderick, whether it's Robert Verbeer, whether it's the rose—whatever we sense with soul will start to come alive with dimensionality. We will start to notice the dimensionality, the angelic dimensions. So whatever it is, really. Does that make sense?

Now, we could say, so we're still on this eighth one of dimensionality, and we could kind of separate it out and say, okay, now we can separate out something called divinity. Or we could just lump it together and say this dimensionality kind of shades into a sense of the divine and of sacredness.

Now, divine is either a word that means absolutely nothing to people or it's a word that we have bad history with. Or it might be a very rich word. To me it's actually an infinitely rich word. We can never exhaust what the word divinity means, what it represents, what it holds. It is itself an infinite concept, infinitely rich with possibility. Dimensionality, shading into a sense of divinity.

Sometimes that divinity is very clear. That's a very palpable sense. Sometimes we're even quite clear what we mean by divinity or the concept. But some or other concept or sense of divinity, clear or kind of vague or obscure, is an aspect of the imaginer. Is that okay?

One of the characteristics of divinity is, as I said, whatever we say about it, however clever we are at theology or philosophy or whatever, we're never going to—it's always going to be bigger. There's always going to be more. There's a kind of infinity of beyondness to divinity. And that ties in to the ninth aspect.

As I said, these are kind of implicit in each other, but with an image—it could be my self-sense, I've become, I'm just sensing into, I'm sensing myself with soul, I've become a deity, it could be the rose, it could be another person, it could be an intrapsychic image—there's a sense of beyondness. So there's a kind of—we said, "I perceive this. This is what I perceive," whatever it is, and maybe that has some dimensionality, but there's a sense of, there's more, there's more. There's more that I can kind of intuit, and that's attractive. That beyond has an allure, and that's partly what's related to the eros.

So we get this sense of there's a beyondness to an image. It's not just a form, a flat form. It's got this, again, dimensionality to it. And that beyondness is unfathomable. There's not a sense, again, "I can reach the end." So images, the imaginal, what we sense with soul has a sense of unfathomability to it.

But the dimensionality, the beyondness, the divinity, the unfathomability—with the sensing the soul, with the imaginal—it's not something that loses the appearance. I just want the unfabricated, the quieting of perception, the fading of appearances, the blurring into oneness. That's all really good and important. With imaginal perception, with sensing the soul, this sense of dimensionality, beyondness, unfathomability, divinity, is in and through as well as behind the appearances. Does that make sense?

No.

Okay, so, in a way you have to give some context, so it's good that you asked. Certain kinds of meditative practices came up a little bit with Maitri Devi's question last night, which I didn't actually pick up on last night. She said a lot of times in Buddhist teachings, a lot of what you get in Buddhist teachings... I could talk a long time about this, let's see.

It's worth saying again. I've said it before, but it's worth saying again. We could divide the thrust or the intention of the range of Buddhist teachings. We could divide it into three, okay, in terms of what gets sort of taught and what gets emphasized.

So one is, and this is the more traditional Theravadan way, is that there is basically—here we are in the world of complexity and appearances and all the tussle of that, and we practice, and we practice seeing emptiness, and we practice letting go, and we're basically letting go of appearances.

A quietening emerges—a blurring, a gentle fading of perception, a melting away. Eventually, some kind of sense of oneness begins to dawn in our awareness. There unfolds a spectrum of this fading of appearances into different kinds of oneness—love, awareness, pure being. Ultimately comes what we might call dissolution into emptiness, or dissolution into what is sometimes called the unfabricated or the unconditioned. It is simply the complete relinquishing of all appearances, a profound letting go in relationship to the world.

This movement—a transcending of the world, of appearances in the world of complexity—receives tremendous emphasis in some traditions. I think it is indeed very important, but I don't think it constitutes the whole story.

Other Buddhist traditions, especially more commonly in different cultures, emphasize what we could call simply being with things as they are, or mindfulness. Rather than attempting to go beyond or through into realms of emptiness, the focus becomes this world, this moment, this sensation. There develops a quality of just being with this, just with this, as it is. Don't add anything. Don't try to eliminate anything. Simply meet the facts of existence as barely as possible. Practice becomes about dwelling with that reality—a approach extremely common nowadays in certain cultures and streams of Buddhism.

Now there exists a third way, which we could call the imaginal—engaging with appearances, but without believing so firmly in the notion that there exists some fixed way things are. If there is no singular way things are, then I cannot simply "be with things as they are," because there is no such fixed reality. We participate in the creation of things. We participate in the very sensing of things.

This understanding opens the possibility of imaginal perception. As I mentioned, I can be present with Robert over there, and then allow an angelic perception of him to emerge—an image that we can acknowledge as fabricated perception. It is not unfabricated; I am allowed to play with these perceptions.

The appearances become important not merely as flat facts, but because of this fertility of the imaginal and because of the divinity that dwells within them. The divinity is not only beyond appearance—it is in the appearance itself. The dimensionality is in the appearance.

One way of understanding Buddha Dharma is recognizing that it is fundamentally about understanding fabrication. Fabrication means: what is being created in perception? What is being woven in the realm of our experience? How does experience actually come to be?

As I understand this more deeply and begin to release the clinging that creates experience—that fabricates experience—awareness moves increasingly toward the unfabricated. I cling less, release identification, let go of all the grasping and pushing and pulling. Things simply fade more and more.

When I realize, going deeply enough into this process, that everything is fabricated—absolutely everything, without exception: not the fabricator, not the mind, not consciousness, not time, not space, not things, not nothing—all of it fabricated. Diving deeply enough into this recognition, I see that the whole notion of fabrication itself is empty, because there is nothing that is actually fabricated, no time in which fabrication occurs, and no fabricator.

Taking this process deeper and deeper reveals that if I go only a little way into it, I think, "Okay, there is something that is fabricated. This particular thing is fabricated."

That leaves a duality between fabricated and unfabricated. But once I start going deeper, I eventually come to a point where it's all fabricated. There's not even an unfabricated, because there's no fabricated. There's no fabricated, really. Fabrication itself is empty. Therefore there's no unfabricated, really. So the whole duality of fabricated and unfabricated collapses.

Where does that leave me? I'm free then to play with different ways of looking and participate in the creation—or discovery—of being, of forms, of phenomena, including the imaginal. That understanding of emptiness at this level starts freeing things up. What it does is legitimize what we could call skillful fabrication or soulful fabrication.

This makes sense when we consider those three ways that Dharma gets taught. You have the approach that's all out for the unfabricated, for oneness, for going beyond appearances. You have this legitimization of fabrication that we're discussing. And that middle approach—the mindfulness one—when I believe "this is what things are," doesn't legitimize the imagination.

Someone who believes in the reality of bare attention and mindfulness would see imagination as exactly the wrong thing to do. It's exactly nonsense, exactly non-reality, exactly a waste of time, exactly what's going to get you into trouble. Because Dharma, in this view, is about being with something called "things as they are," or the facticity of things, or bare attention.

Once you expose the myth of that, then you realize that this mindfulness business is really good as a kind of stream. We don't want to lose it. But if I say that's the only thing, then it leaves me straitjacketed. And this whole business would be just utter delusion—we'd be spending a week in complete and utter delusion.

Delusion is a Buddhist word, though—avijjā. At a deep level, delusion means this non-realization that everything is empty. So to the degree that I'm deluded is the degree that I believe in mindfulness as more than just a tool. You can do nothing without mindfulness—it's really important, it's crucial. It's just how it gets framed and believed in and rigidified, as if it has become an ultimate truth. Even if people aren't using that language, there's this wall and absence of questioning.

So we're doing a bus tour here. I've talked longer than I intended, but this is just a quick tour through these aspects to prick up your ears and senses. You can start noticing: "Oh yes, there is this sense of dimensionality. Maybe that word doesn't quite work. Or maybe the word divinity—I thought it meant this, or I made it just mean this." You have to feel your way into these concepts, sense your way into these nodes. Let them come.

Discover them for yourselves. Do you understand?

Let us now rest in some quiet together.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 143

Elements of the Imaginal (15 - 18)

Rob Burbea · 31 min

> In this teaching from the "Tending the Holy Fire" retreat, Rob Burbea examines four crucial elements of imaginal practice. He begins with non-reducibility - the understanding that imaginal images cannot be flattened into mere psychological representations or material explanations. When we reduce an image to "only" representing empowerment, childhood experiences, or subatomic particles, we kill its soulfulness and dimensionality.
>
> Burbea then explores autonomy - how imaginal images possess their own personhood and intelligence, existing as both self and other simultaneously. This includes the practitioner's autonomy to assent to or refuse the imaginal opening. The third element, distinctness (or "twoness"), maintains erotic tension and particular differentiation even within unity, preventing collapse into undifferentiated oneness while preserving the dynamic relationship between perceiver and image.
>
> Finally, he discusses the theatrical quality of imaginal perception - existing in a middle way between real and unreal, similar to powerful theater that transforms despite being "just a play." This poetic truth carries immense liberative power while maintaining its neither-real-nor-unreal status. Burbea emphasizes how these elements work together to preserve the soul-making capacity of imaginal practice, preventing it from being reduced to conventional psychological or materialist frameworks.

Good evening. There's been quite a lot of talking today, and some of you at least may feel quite full with words and ideas and sharing and listening. So I'm going to try to walk a line between not talking too much or too long, and on the other hand talking enough to at least do a little justice to the themes I want to cover. Hopefully that will be a compromise.

I'm going to talk about four more nodes in a minute, and just a few general things before that. Given what I've just said, you'll quickly see that as we go through this list—and it's all really quick, actually, like a high-speed bus tour—some of the nodes we linger on longer. For instance, today with Eternality, Humility, Reverence and Grace, we spent time exploring those for ourselves and sharing in the exercise. Some we'll just touch on to point to them, and some get full discussion.

Before I get to the nodes, let me start with some general things. First is actually an announcement: every day from now on, the lounge will be a designated space and time from the period after the morning session in the hall—after the morning teaching—from 10:45 or 10:50 until 11:30. This is designated space for silent, free, soul-making movement. Or soul-making free movement.

What does that mean? Well, find out what it means. Create, discover what it means. The question I would put to you is the question I posed when I talked about movement the other day: what does it mean for this movement that I'm doing right now, or this stillness, or this gesture, or this posture—what is it for that to become soul-making? What does that feel like? What does it look like in this moment? What supports that to be soulful?

So it's open-ended and it's an investigation. It's free and it's silent. You can walk or stand during that period as well, but during that time every day, that will be a designated space to explore that.

Sounding is okay, actually—not talking to each other with words, but if it feels like some sounding is supportive and you feel okay with people around, whatever. Not talking, unless you're talking in tongues. So it's not talking to each other with words, but if some sounding supports the soul-making, that's fine.

The thought I had was that if you go in there, that's your practice. You're not going in there to regard or watch others. This is really about soul-making. That's the thing. Is this soul-making? It's an ongoing exploration: what is it that supports or ignites or nourishes soul-making, both generally speaking and in this moment? Intention has a lot to do with that.

Now, some general things. If it's not clear—and perhaps we didn't stress or emphasize this at the beginning of this retreat as we did on other retreats, but it's worth saying again—sensing the soul is not something that's going to be happening all the time. It's not even a possibility of a constancy of experience there.

This is partly related to one of the nodes Catherine talked about this morning: grace. Something is given to us, or from a certain perspective, something is given to us when we're sensing the soul. There's this inexplicable, unexplained gift.

And so it comes and goes. It might not be very dramatic, but in some ways we could say that just relative to conventional perception, it's something extraordinary to a certain extent. If it was all the time, it would quickly become ordinary. And A, it doesn't work that way, and B, we wouldn't want it to become ordinary. So we're not really trying to kind of hang on to some particular experience all the time. It comes and goes. Part of it is gift. That's part of the very sensibility of it. That's why we gave that grace as a note.

