So a kind of preface, but a slightly strange preface, one that serves to give a context, or at least part of a context, for what many would probably consider relatively unusual teachings in the rest of the set. I want to give part of a context tonight, and as well as context, begin also to contrast different understandings or visions or conceptual frameworks that we can have of Dharma and of this teaching of clinging and non-clinging in the Dharma.

This is the main point: to begin to contrast something, because we can take away from listening to teachings or reading teachings, or even be given through teachings, an understanding or a conceptual framework of what the Dharma is that shapes our practice and shapes our whole sense of what the Dharma is and what the project is and what awakening is and what we're moving towards and what's involved. An understanding, a conceptual framework that is certainly helpful to a degree for many people, and certainly freeing to a certain extent, again, for many people. But that also shuts doors.

This is the contrast I want to make between different understandings, different conceptual frameworks, one of which—or a group of which—I would say, helpful as it is, freeing as it is to a certain extent, also ends up shutting doors. Doors that open to a much wider and much more radical freedom and beauty and openness of being and of the sense of existence.

So part of the context: begin to contrast some different large-scale understandings and where they might lead or what they might block off. I've talked about all of this before and certainly written about much of it. I don't particularly like to repeat myself—I don't see the point if it's already out there. Generally, I would rather move on to new stuff. So a lot of this will be quite brief.

Much of it is widely available. There's probably not a Dharma teacher alive, and certainly not an insight meditation teacher, who doesn't talk about clinging at certainly one of the levels that I want to talk about. So some of it will be moving through territory quite briefly for those reasons, but I do want to draw out a couple of things, a couple of main points that I've maybe only mentioned before here and there, important as they are, again, for the sake of context and for the sake of contrast.

When we look in the Pali Canon, the collected teachings of the early teachings, the teachings of the Buddha, the historical Buddha, we find a lot of different words. Like English, we have passion, desire, craving, greed, clinging, grasping—many words. English is a very rich language. Similarly in Pali, in the language of the Buddha, we have a word like raga, which actually means to color or to dye. The coloring, like especially rouge—it's related to the word red, to make rouge. But it really means passion, excitement.

Later on, we'll emphasize this: that passion colors something. When we color things red, we become impassioned, or passion also colors things. So there's a link there. But there's this word raga, usually translated as passion or lust.

Kama can have two meanings. One is the object of sensual enjoyment—the object, so something sensually pleasing—but also sense desire. The verb kamati means to desire or to crave.

There's the word lobha, which can be translated as greed. Geda, also translated as greed.

There's a word chanda, which is an interesting word, because sometimes you can talk about chanda, for example, in Pali called hitachanda, as the effort to do good. Hitta is what's useful or suitable or beneficial or friendly. So when we talk, for example, in metta practice about well-wishing or doing good in the world, it's hitachanda. Chanda is really impulse or intention or will. It could be virtuous or it could be a vice. The motivation to accomplish—it means all that. It can also mean excitement, related to impulse there.

Sometimes people want to make a distinction: chanda is positive because it's good, good intention, or it can be good. And words like raga, kama, lobha, etc., these are negative words. They lead to suffering. They are unskillful, etc.

However, there are also plenty of instances in the Pali Canon where, for instance, Sariputta in the Samyutta Nikaya says, "Chandaraga, desire and lust, these are fetters." So chanda there is not qualified—it's just saying it's a fetter.

There are words like tanha, which usually translates as craving, and upadana, clinging, usually translated as attachment.

This is quite an interesting word because it means literally a fuel or that which supports something. So it can be grasping, holding on, clinging as something that supports. And what does it support? It supports suffering. But as we go deeper, we'll see that it supports a whole lot more than that. It supports the sense of self, supports the very sense of reality, supports perception too, supports any experience. It's fuel for experience. This is taking the whole thing to another level. We'll come back to this.

But there are all these words in Pali, and in the Pali Canon, one way or another, the Buddha says the path leads to the end of—and he uses any of these words, any of them. So in a way, they're kind of used interchangeably. We can certainly make distinctions and try and carve out distinctions there, but generally, although there are distinctions, generally they're pretty much interchangeable. And the Buddha and the teachings say they are all fetters. Kāma, tanhā, gedha, rāga, lobha—passion, lust, craving, desire, et cetera. Clinging. All fetters. Saṃyojanāni, which means fetter, something like a yoke—like an oxen or a bull that's plowing a field has a yoke to pull that on—something that imprisons.

The Buddha talks about different fetters, and in the process, in the stages of enlightenment, how different fetters are eradicated—that's really the word that he uses. So kāma-chanda, sensual desire, is eradicated at the third stage of awakening. And at full awakening, full enlightenment, arahantship, the rāga, rūpa-rāga—the passion or the lust for material existence, for material birth, for forms. If you prefer more experientially, getting away from the whole teaching of rebirth and all that, the passion, the lust for material forms. And arūpa-rāgo, the passion and lust for immaterial realms or immaterial jhānas, or if you do the whole rebirth thing, rebirth in a formless realm.

And also eradicated at arahantship is uddhacca, which is an interesting word—restlessness, agitation, excitement, flurry, imbalance, shakiness in the sense of being shaken by experience. It's the opposite of being subdued. It's also related to the word "lifting up"—to lift up, to rise high, to be risen. So that too—being able to be lifted up, being able to be excited out of balance in a flurry, not being subdued. What's the opposite of subdued in English? I don't know, but that's restlessness, sometimes usually translated with uddhacca. That's also eradicated.

As I say, we could make distinctions here. And so one of the distinctions that's quite common to make these days is between craving, tanhā, and clinging, upādāna, so that craving is the momentary impulse to have something or to get away from something. So it can work both ways—as an aversion, aversive movement, to move away from something we don't like, what's unpleasant, or to move towards: "I want that thing, I want to get it, I want to have it." This is craving, that kind of movement of the mind, that desire.

And then, if we distinguish them, clinging, upādāna, is when that becomes more obsessive, if you like, or more entrenched. So we start circling around that thing, thinking about it a lot, scheming in ways to get it, et cetera. There's a consolidation, a tightening, a reinforcing, a solidification that's happening.

So it can be helpful to distinguish them—certainly can be helpful at a certain level—but distinguishing and differentiating them won't actually solve the issues that I want to address and draw attention to tonight. It can be helpful, but those doors that I alluded to earlier that can actually be shut by thinking about practice in a certain way, thinking about practice and Dharma in a certain way, conceiving it in a certain way—they will remain shut, even if I make certain differentiations here among those Pali words.

Historically, by the way, I don't know if there's that much—if you really study the text, you see how much overlap there really is between all these words. And historically, you know, the twelve links of dependent origination—so tanhā and upādāna are two links in those twelve links of dependent origination, of the wheel of suffering, as some people call it. Those twelve links, and in fact the wheel, were actually—there's good evidence—they were taken from a Vedic creation myth that pre-existed the Buddha by a long time. That would have been a concept, that whole twelve links concept, that was already quite well known in the society. The Buddha picked it up, used those twelve links and the whole as a set, which was already there, and used it in a very different way, pointed in a very different direction.

And one would think, well, if the Vedic hymn had had eleven links, would there be certain distinctions, or would the Buddha have picked up a set with eleven links? Sometimes he talks about dependent origination with ten links. Other times he adds ones, they overlap. So the whole sort of project of getting—and I'll say more about this tomorrow—the whole project of getting too picky about fine distinctions and trying to carve out this kind of clarity is sometimes helpful, sometimes it's actually not that helpful.

Why bother? It actually doesn't open what needs opening. So there's a little caution there.

But for what I want to get at tonight, it actually does not help that much. In probably the second part of this talk, I want to go into and actually explain more in detail a very important practical reason—a reason for practice and for insight—why differentiating, for example, between craving and clinging is actually not that helpful. Sometimes, in fact, it doesn't actually make sense the deeper we go into practice.

But for now, let's respect that distinction that's there with those different words and very briefly go through some examples using the map of the links of dependent origination. I'm hoping you're familiar with this already. I'm going to go through very briefly as a way of looking at the anatomy of that whole process of clinging, craving, desire, and the way it leads to suffering.

We could pick any example, really, all kinds of things—what happens when we see a chocolate cake that looks very enticing, and the whole process that happens there inside us. We could take that as an example. Let's take craving for a cigarette for someone who's addicted to smoking.

If we start, there is delusion—avijjā in Pali—delusional ignorance. Really, in this case, one aspect of that ignorance is not really getting it, not really understanding that this is bad for me, this is not healthy, this will cause suffering in the future to my health. For friends who have family members really, really seriously ill with emphysema after years of smoking, something much earlier on knows this is bad for us, but doesn't really get it. The avijjā is too thick there, too entrenched. And so not really understanding.

And there's saṅkhāra, the second link—this kind of habit formations, if you like, or tendencies. So all the habit of moving to reach for the cigarette pack, to light up, the whole momentum that gets wired into the nervous system, into the mind, into the body.

That habit of doing that—those habits involved in that, maybe a habit when we feel a little bit uneasy, that's the impulse to reach for the cigarettes. A little socially anxious, or just after dinner to relax, or whatever it is. But these habits are part of the saṅkhāras.

And then we might take an example—if you're addicted to cigarettes, in this example, and maybe you're out somewhere and you see how the mind and senses, the mind and the consciousness and the sense doors become, if you like, honed or primed or cocked a little bit to notice, for instance, other people smoking. Maybe we're walking down a city street or sitting outside in a café at night and we see other people smoking and the craving arises so easily. The craving—just this little impulse, this little sort of contraction: "I want." Maybe it barely has a thought at first, but there's a movement, a kind of grasping movement of the being. This craving.

And then that can intensify into what we might call clinging—upādāna. So that this craving, this desire for a cigarette actually comes more to dominance in the mind and maybe the mind starts thinking, "I really need one, I really need a cigarette, I could really use a cigarette" or "It would be really nice," whatever it is. So thinking starts to get involved and it starts to become more dominant and more tenacious. The grasping is more tenacious.

And then this intensifies even more to what could be called becoming. Sometimes it's translated as becoming. So maybe we do start playing with the cigarette packet, maybe even take a cigarette out, roll it in our fingers, maybe even stick it unlit in the mouth and just sort of hang it there. "That's okay, right? Because I haven't lit it yet."

And maybe we say to ourselves, "Ah, just one, you know, I know I was going to quit, I can quit tomorrow," or whatever, and the mind starts justifying something to itself, justifying this whole mechanism of desire in its wily ways.

And eventually, this gathers enough force and momentum and dominance that we do light up—light that cigarette, take a long inhale, and then there's relief with that, relief of all this tension that was building up, both through the physical addiction in this case, but also the tension of what was involved in the mind there. There's lighting up and enjoying that cigarette.

And in a way, that process—because there's taken birth, physical birth, as the smoker self. The smoker is born at that point. But unfortunately, that relieved smoker self is a very fragile, sort of brittle self. And very soon, something flips. And maybe a little while after the cigarette, you start to feel, "I failed. I failed in my resolve." Maybe the self becomes "I'm weak. I can't do it. I don't have the willpower. I'm bad in some ways."

So there's this relieved self, the smoker self, that was enjoying a cigarette that was born. It actually dies. It fractures. It collapses. And it's actually replaced with a suffering self, if you like. You could say that. So death and...

those words—despair, lamentation, sorrow, grief. These are strong words indeed, yet from the suffering that accompanies them emerges something more. In this case, perhaps it's the view "I just can't do it. I failed again. I'm weak." The suffering doesn't end there, though. Out of that suffering, those self-views become reinforced. The belief that "I can't" takes hold, and through that very belief, paradoxically, the will—the willpower to quit smoking—is strengthened. Something continues to roll on, samsara flowing forward like a great wheel.

The habits, the sankhāras, those deep movements and programming of the mind and body's tendencies—in this case, reaching for cigarettes when we don't feel good, or when we do feel good, or in whatever circumstances—all of this becomes reinforced through the entire process. Each time through the cycle gives the whole wheel momentum. This is how these processes work, how they perpetuate themselves.

Let me offer another example, perhaps more intricate. Imagine I've been out for a night with friends at a bar, and there's a group of women there. With my male friends, a few of us go over to chat with these women, and I find myself talking with one I find attractive. During this brief conversation, she seems perhaps a little coy, but I give her my number—a card with my phone number.

Wrapped up in this simple gesture, in my impulse to act, is a whole constellation of avijjā—delusion, ignorance. It's never simple. Let's say I carry a particular pattern of believing that if a woman shows interest in me, it proves my okayness, my lovability. There's this belief that something external can prove something fundamental about the self. All kinds of delusion are woven through this—even within that single belief about what would prove my lovability, you can see countless components involved.

With that particular ball of avijjā operating, I also carry—unfortunately—a tendency to view myself as perhaps not okay, as maybe not attractive. Alongside this comes the compulsion to try to prove my attractiveness, my okayness, both to others and to myself. There's the belief that I'm not okay, the belief in what would prove otherwise, the tendency to see myself through this lens, and the drive to prove it constantly. How much of our actions, our choices, our speech, our dress, our entire way of being becomes organized around trying to prove something to the world?

Already there's dukkha present—you can see the pain inherent in this whole structure. And having given her my number and walked away, the entire interaction has loaded my consciousness. Because of the avijjā, because of the sankhāras, it has loaded and primed my consciousness, my mind, and my senses.

The next day, the following few days, I'm at work and can observe how consciousness perhaps narrows around this single point: Is she going to call? Maybe it builds, and the body keeps checking the mobile phone—any messages? Any messages? The pattern intensifies, actually impinging on my ability to concentrate on other things, like work itself.

Craving is already present, and craving is always complex. I'm craving a certain sound—that message notification from my phone—but wrapped up in that simple desire is so much more. I'm craving the ability to check, to know. There's craving operating on multiple levels simultaneously.

Perhaps I even become irritated during those stretches when I can't check—when I have to attend a meeting with the boss, present something important, or listen very carefully to what's being said. In those moments when I must be fully present elsewhere, there's irritation because I cannot check my messages.

This whole process builds, and perhaps there's an increasing frequency to the checking, obsessive thinking spiraling around this one interaction. Throughout all of this, I can notice how my mood and self-view are buffeted around by waves of excitement, anticipation, hope, anxiety, despondency. The emotional landscape becomes a turbulent sea, rising and falling moment by moment.

I don't recognize the number. Oh, maybe this is her. And I pick it up and it's someone trying to sell me health insurance or something. So there was that swelling up, anticipation, excitement, the becoming, and then the crash.

Or again, it rings, and again, it's a number I don't recognize. I pick it up, it's just someone with the wrong number. And the same thing, this rise and fall of the becoming of the self.

And then maybe a few days goes by, a week or I don't know how long, and she doesn't call. But in that week, I'm becoming increasingly despondent. She won't call. And that's reinforcing something: I am unattractive. It's true.

Let's say she doesn't call. And then that self-view gets solidified. Now I have evidence there. Usually this is not so clear as a thinking process. It's kind of jammed together like spaghetti that has melted into each other. It's not so clear - she didn't call, therefore I'm unattractive. Something's happening in the whole mind. It's getting compressed and mixed up and confused and oppressed. But basically she didn't call, and this self-view of being somehow not okay, somehow unattractive, has been solidified through this whole process.

Then a little more time goes by, a week or a couple of weeks or whatever, and that whole painful self-view that has become so jammed and dense and heavy and painful - actually just over time, being involved in other stuff, having other things demand my attention, preoccupations, distractions, whatever - it gets a little less solid, a little more broken up, a little less intense. There is the breakup or the death, if you like, of that self-view to a certain extent. In this case, it's a negative self-view that's dying.

But still, so there's some relief, but still, what the Buddha called the āsavas, the outflows, the effluent - actually it's related to the word for sewage - the effluent, the outflows from all that. If I don't question all this business about self-view and how I'm trying to prove something to myself and to the world, if I don't question all that, the avijjā, the ignorance, and the saṅkhāras, the tendencies to try and prove, to believe certain things. Without questioning, then through that process, that whole cycle goes through its whole painful contractions and life and death and dissolution and relative disappearance or abeyance for a time.

But without the questioning of my belief that I need to somehow - that there's one way to address this sense of unattractiveness or not-okayness, that's by proving it - without questioning all that, I'm just reinforcing. The whole pattern gets reinforced. So it rose up, it got solid, it dissolved over time, but because there was no questioning, the whole thing just got reinforced. The seeds have gotten bigger. So the next time it comes back, it's perhaps even a little bit stronger. And this will happen until something other, until I have another way of relating, understanding, prying loose this whole process.

Pain. Craving and clinging and all that process, bringing suffering, bringing dukkha.

Now sometimes what we crave is actually what the Buddha called vibhava-taṇhā, a craving for a kind of non-being, for a kind of extinction. Sometimes we have that just when we want to go to bed at night because we're tired and just want to turn everything off - I've had enough of the day. But sometimes in really strong instances, for instance someone wanting to just get completely plastered drunk, there's something seeking a kind of oblivion and a kind of dissolution of the self in that wish that we seek - obliteration, oblivion, a kind of extinction, the vibhava-taṇhā.

Sometimes what's happening in the object that we seem to be craving - maybe it's the chocolate cake or whatever - is that there's actually a painful emotion underneath. Maybe we feel lonely. Maybe we feel unloved. And it's painful to be with that. Something in the chocolate cake and in that whole putting it in the mouth and chewing it in a primal way - there is pleasure involved in that, absolutely. But at another level of the craving, we're seeking to obliterate or cover over or numb out the painful emotion underlying it. This is quite common with food.

So it's complex, all this. There are different forces operating, if you like, different intentions operating.

What's also interesting is that if we pay attention to this, actually craving itself is uncomfortable. There's a kind of pressure that builds with craving. I want that thing - like with the cigarette example, or it could be chocolate cake, whatever it is.

And that craving itself is dukkha. It feels uncomfortable. So what we end up actually wanting by the time we have access to the cigarette or the cake or whatever it is, is actually seeking both the pleasure of the object and the relief of the pressure—the bursting of that uncomfortable bubble of craving pressure. We're seeking a kind of obliteration of the uncomfortable tension that craving itself creates.

So all this can be involved in what's going on for us with cravings and clinging, and that whole process.

Now, we could have gone through this much more slowly. We could certainly devote a whole talk to one example like this, taking apart the pieces and mapping them onto those twelve links. If you want more detail with more distinctions, this kind of material isn't hard to find these days. One place is in the book I wrote, Seeing That Frees—chapter ten, I think, is devoted to going into this in quite a lot of detail. Or Payutto, a Thai monk, wrote a book called Dependent Origination. You can find it easily, and it's not difficult to understand. It's just, as I said, a kind of anatomy.

Several times over the years with different groups, I've done teaching sessions where we literally lay out these twelve links on the floor, and then we go through different scenarios—how suffering gets built up and tied together and contracted in difficult situations, either real ones or hypothetical ones. It's almost always interesting to me how much people enjoy doing that.

You have this map and you're together looking at, if you like, the tragedy but also the comedy of the human mind in this process of tying itself up in knots. People really seem to enjoy this kind of dissecting of the anatomy or physiology—the process of suffering and clinging in this way. And partly it's because something in the human mind seems to like chopping things up and mapping them out and feeling like, "Oh, there's this word that the Buddha used, and there's this in my experience, and I can map them together." We seem to recognize something of a truth here, and so we have the feeling: "I've understood something. I recognize a component of the process and I understand it."

So people often enjoy that feeling. But I'm often not at all convinced that this seeming recognition and so-called understanding actually makes much difference. Is it really helpful? What we really need here are practices to be able to actually pick up these concepts—if those are the concepts we're using—and really practice with them.

So if we're using this idea of the twelve links of dependent origination, where exactly can I come in during that process? What are the points of entry? There are various points where I can actually come in and contemplate in a different way in the moment, or pay attention, bringing mindfulness to bear on a certain link or feature in ways that actually make a difference—that relieve suffering, that disband to a certain extent some suffering.

Without that, we get this really unfortunate illusion of understanding something because it looks like we're being clear since we've got something that appears concrete and mapped onto concepts that are in the teachings, that the Buddha used, that otherwise might have remained more abstract. So we think, "Great, I've understood something." There's this clarity of carving up and mapping and corresponding concepts. What we really need is to be at the front line, so to speak, where the action is, with ways of practicing that are powerful, specific, and helpful.

So the Buddha said a lot about all this, and in different ways. He pointed out we can cling—there are lists of what we can cling to or crave. For instance, to sense pleasures is an obvious one. We cling to the pleasures available in the senses. We cling, he said, also to our views and opinions. We cling to our customs and habits, wherever they come from—personal or more social or cultural or religious or secular. And we also cling to self-views, the different views of the self, beliefs about the self.

So all that's there. Sometimes people dissect this anatomy and present it as a teaching or try to approach the teachings that way. And sometimes, with all this there and the Buddha making all these distinctions, what we take as the message is this teaching: just let go of everything. Just let go of everything.

Even as I say it now, you can recognize it simultaneously feels like a hugely tall order. And at the same time, it's so attractive as a teaching. It's so simple: just let go of everything. Something in us loves simplicity. Something in us is seduced by simplicity and simple teachings and simple solutions.

Even if we acknowledge that that's very challenging, it's a very simple message: Just let go of everything. Just go with the flow. Be with the flow. Just be in the moment. Be in the present. But don't even cling to that idea. Just be in the present. Very simple.

The attraction of what I've called "simplism" in other teachings, in other talks I've given, leads us to say: in this "just let go of everything" approach, liberation has nothing to do per se with an experience or any particular experience. So you get the instruction: don't try to repeat experiences. Even if they're wonderful, insightful experiences and openings and mystical experiences—don't try to repeat them. That's just clinging. Just let go of everything. Let go of everything.

Liberation is a relationship of non-clinging with experience. That's what liberation is. Liberation is non-clinging. So it's not an experience—it's a relationship. Very enticing and attractive, the simplicity of that teaching.

People are different. They may take some of those divisions that the Buddha talked about and take them as areas of investigation. But basically, the teaching is: let go of everything. Just let go of everything.

Of course, some people are completely over-simplistic, almost not even going into any tools of how we might actually let go of everything. But generally speaking, we offer tools, and tools are offered.

The first one would be: Well, for a start, how do I notice craving? Do I even recognize the experience of craving? Because how can I let go if I don't recognize it? So that's an important aspect here, an important question: How do I notice craving? How do I notice that movement of desire or clinging, whatever we want to call it?

One obvious way is my thoughts tell me. So I have to be aware of my thoughts. My thoughts tell me when they keep returning to the same object. When I hear the mind say "I want," or even more, "I need"—craving. "I need that chocolate cake" or whatever it is. So my thoughts tell me in different ways. They reveal the presence of clinging by the way they circle around some object or start to obsess around something.

But perhaps more than that, we can recognize that craving itself, as I mentioned earlier, is already dukkha. It's not just that it leads to dukkha—so this smoking will cause suffering, etc. The experience of craving itself, the force of craving itself, is already uncomfortable. It's already a dis-ease. There is dukkha there.

So this presence of dukkha, my mindfulness revealing a feeling of dukkha—just slight dis-ease, uneasiness, imbalance, if you like—all that reveals: "Aha, there's some craving. What is it that I'm craving?"

This happens at a much more subtle level than would be revealed in our thoughts, because craving can be quite active and quite present even when there's no thought in the mind. When there's no thought, there can still be craving.

This is what I want to go into, probably in the next talk: when we use these words "craving" and "clinging," we're really talking about a huge range, from very, very gross and obvious to extremely subtle. At some point, thought no longer needs to be there for the more subtle aspects or subtle manifestations of craving.

But when there is craving, there is noticeable—almost all the time—a tension that is noticeable.

In the body, maybe in the musculature, maybe even more subtle than that when it gets really quite subtle, in the sort of felt space of what I call the energy body or the subtle body, a tension, a contraction comes in. And even more subtle than that, in what we might call the mind space. Again, it's not about thoughts. It's about there's a certain cramping in the otherwise more natural spaciousness and openness of the mind.

So this is what tells me that craving is present—this tension, contraction, which will be felt as some degree of dis-ease in the body or mind space. That's different than deliberately narrowing the attention, like right now I can deliberately focus my attention on the tip of my index finger and the sensations right there in the middle. So I'm deliberately narrowing. That's fine. That's a mode of mind, if you like. But with craving, there's a tension contraction that comes into the body and the mind space that we can feel and that we can get increasingly sensitive to noticing.

Now, one teaching would be when you notice craving, just let go of the craving. Just let go of whatever it is you're craving. Let go of that. Again, sounds simple, and it might work sometimes. It's just let go of wanting the chocolate cake. You know, just let go. And if I'm attached to views, so-and-so said this, but I think that's wrong. It's like, just let go of it.

So that's one kind of instruction—just notice it and let it go. Let's run through a few of the maybe more common tools that are in the service of this just-let-go-of-everything sort of teaching.

One is notice it and let go of whatever the object that you're craving is or whatever you're clinging to, which sometimes works and, as you will all know, sometimes does not work.

Second would be to use some skillful reflection. So here's this thing, maybe it's that chocolate cake. I notice there's this craving towards it, whatever. And just to reflect, for example, on the common teaching on the impermanence of sense pleasures. So I'm going to eat that slice of chocolate cake or three slices of chocolate cake, and then an hour later, either I'm going to have a tummy ache if I've eaten too much, or it will just be gone. Where did it go? Where is that pleasure now? How much lasting fulfillment can it really give me?

This is a very common teaching—just reflect on the impermanence of sense pleasures, of what we're clinging to. And if it's clinging to views and opinions, it's actually reflecting, well, how many times in the past have I changed my view? Sometimes to a diametrically opposed one. And oftentimes I have views and opinions about things that I actually don't really know, if I'm really honest. I don't know what the truth is there. And I'm so attached to my view and my opinion. And just to reflect, I don't really know. Or my view might change.

Or to reflect, here's this clinging. Here's maybe this obsession about something or again, whatever, the chocolate cake or whatever. Is this clinging or this obsession or this thing that my mind keeps chewing over, is this really taking me where I want to go? So I could go down this road of thinking about this, obsessing about it, worrying about it, fretting about it, etc. What will I have at the end of that? Will I have what I really want? Will I have peace? Will I have fulfillment?

I'm going through this very quickly, and we will touch on these in the instructions, but you can find all this in plenty of other places, so I'm just running through it to set a context for the other material that I want to touch on. This is very common. I and probably every teacher, every Dharma teacher has given these kind of teachings.

But that would be the second—skillful reflection.

The third possible tool is to become acquainted with, through mindfulness, what we call papañca—proliferation, exaggeration, hype, storytelling that goes on, that the mind gets into when it gets really crazy about something. So I didn't really elaborate, but for example, in the example where I gave the woman my number and then the whole story building and hype around it. Or maybe it's something that we want and...

or that's really terrible if it happens. And there's a whole identity view and story and history and hyping up of the self and the issue involved. And we can see this happening. This is another thing on retreats – how happy people are to hear stories, funny stories of papanca. It's a relief. We realize, oh, you know, I'm not the only one to be crazy that way. But just hearing these stories, or just recognizing them intellectually, isn't going to cut it at a very deep level.

At any rate, we begin to recognize, our mindfulness begins to get more familiar with these times and states of mind when the mind has just got into a complete spin. And we could say, using language a certain way, that when it's in this state of proliferation and storm building – building a storm in a teacup – we are fabricating. The mind is fabricating.

Instead of being with the basic experience of something – here is this contraction in my chest – and instead of just being with the sensations, I'm bringing in a whole story of my patterns of closed-heartedness and that has to do with my mother and her mother and all this stuff, and something that's at one level just some sensations that will pass has become this whole heavy story that it's absolutely terrible, I must get rid of this, et cetera, et cetera.

Afterwards, when it dissolves a little bit, we begin to see, oh, we're fabricating something. There was this punctual state, and this whole web weaving of complication and elaboration and proliferation around self and around issue and all of that. There's fabrication.

In contrast to that, when we're simply mindful, we can be – there's the sensation in the chest, yeah, it's contraction, it's unpleasant – and we can be with that sensation in what we sometimes call bare attention. That state of mindfulness and of bare attention is a state of no papanca and no fabrication. We're just with the thing as it is.

Through repeated mindfulness practice, we actually get more of a taste for this, more of a taste of living without papanca, not caught up in the maelstrom in that teacup, not entangled in the cobwebs and the imprisonment, really, of all this intricate, thick, over-elaborated storytelling.

So a degree of clinging and craving is released when we let go of that papanca and we're with things more in the way of what we could call simple mindfulness or bare attention, or we could say being with things as they are, simply. This simple mindfulness practice in contrast to papanca – and seeing that, or seeming to see that we're not fabricating when we're mindful – that's a skillful tool too.

Another one, a little bit more precise, if you like – let's take a negative example. For example, the craving to be rid of something, what we call aversion. So here, maybe I'm sitting on a retreat or something, and my back hurts, or my knees hurt. There's the unpleasant vedana, the unpleasant sensations. And there's a craving to be rid of them. There's a rejection. There's a pushing away.

Again, maybe my mind is saying, "Oh, come on, ring the bell. When's this sitting over?" And spinning all kinds of stories about, again, I have this pain because I'm such a contracted human being, et cetera, et cetera. Other people don't have it, whatever it is.

But maybe even without thought – as I said, there's no thought. There's just this pain and this energetic push, rejection of that experience, a kind of tensing of the being, of the body and of the mind to get rid of, to hold it at arm's length, to push it away. And this again, we can feel, we can notice.

One skillful strategy is actually just to come to train the attention and just see – can I hold it right at that point in the body where the unpleasant vedana are just coming up like a fountain? Moment after moment, there's that unpleasantness, unpleasant sensation, unpleasant sensation, unpleasant sensation in my back or in my knee or whatever it is. Looking at it that way, and kind of intent, but with some relaxation as well, in a kind of balanced way, just honing, training, focusing the attention just as much as I can at that fountain, if you like, of moment-to-moment unpleasant vedana.

Then I'll notice the craving go with that. So there's the unpleasant vedana, there's this rejection. And they kind of go together. But what I can see is this arising and unpleasant sensation, and then this kind of impulse of rejection, this energetic push away.

Of course, I can see this with pleasant sensations as well. Sometimes it's really interesting eating and watching this movement. Here's this delicious food that's been maybe, again, on retreat cooked for me, or cooked it for myself at home, whatever it is, and I'm eating, and I'm really paying attention to the arising of the pleasant sensations in the mouth. The food is in my mouth. And then I can still notice, curiously, how something in the being, in the mind, is kind of grasping.

It's like this movement of grasping, movement towards, to hold, to grasp, to hold onto, to encompass those pleasant sensations. So I see the pleasantness, and I see this impulsive, energetic movement to grasp. The food is already in my mouth, and the pleasantness is already there, and there's still this grasping. So I can see it either way.

And I begin to, or I stay steady at the vedanā, and then what happens is that—and again, this is separating notions of craving from clinging—I see the craving, the impulse arise, but it doesn't build up so much. So I can just stay, for example, with this pain in the body, this moment-to-moment arising of pain, and just watch these little bursts of impulse, of craving, of rejection, of pushing away, arise. But they don't—they just sort of arise and they subside. They arise and they subside. And this consolidation and building of that and solidification and entrenchment of that into what might be called clinging, it doesn't arise because I'm just staying closer to the vedanā and the craving. So that would be a fourth approach.

A fifth is again relating back to what I touched on earlier—to actually develop an ability where I'm paying more attention to the actual experience of craving and noticing that pressure that is involved in craving. So back to the cigarette example or the chocolate cake example, whatever it is. Here the mind has the image of the cigarette, and then there's this—I can feel this pressure build of the craving, or maybe it's clinging. I can feel that pressure build in the body, maybe even more than the mind. And instead of seeking to obliterate and release and sort of pop that uncomfortable bubble of pressure by having the cigarette, I'm actually learning to just give that some space. Just let that pressure kind of build, ebb, and swell. And then I'll notice, oh, it reaches a certain point and it just subsides again. And maybe it does that again. But what's happening there is I'm staying with it and giving it space. That's key. And I'm learning to tolerate it. I'm developing my capacity to tolerate that uncomfortable pressure so that I don't just have to give into it.

And in time, what happens is instead of getting reinforced, that force of craving, instead of being reinforced because I keep giving into it, because I can't tolerate that pressure, I tolerate the pressure, it flows. It releases. It subsides. And over time, the very force of the craving, when it comes back next time, is a little less, a little less. So I'm learning the skill of tolerating. I'm also eroding that particular craving and maybe the pattern of craving in general. So that would be a fifth option.

And a sixth is more general, touching on what we discussed, elaborating a little bit more what we said before—actually just paying attention to impermanence in general. Really being aware, anicca. Everything is impermanent. Everything is impermanent. So this is so much the thrust of so much insight meditation. Just see that everything is impermanent. Just notice. How can you not but notice? If you're mindful, you'll see that things are impermanent. And we start to notice it more and more. And if we notice that things are impermanent, we let go. We see there's no point chasing things that will just be impermanent. There's no point clinging to things that are going to dissolve anyway.

So, at least that's the theory. And there's a certain amount of truth in that. When we see impermanence, we let go. So the noticing of impermanence, the attention to impermanence, generally speaking, brings letting go. And maybe, and that would be a sixth possibility, maybe with that sixth possibility, we have times where we, eventually through practice, there are times where we see, wow, there really is just this process of impermanent things. Where is the personality here? The personality is a process that's constructed. The self is just a process of momentary phenomena, momentary factors of mind, momentary moments of perception or consciousness or impulse. There is just this process of impermanent events or impermanent things.

And I am like that, the self is like that, everything is... that's all there is. And again, generally speaking, when we see that, a degree of fundamental avijjā, fundamental delusion about reality, if you like, is cut away. And there's generally speaking less clinging, because there's... if you like, a less solidified... We don't believe so much in such a solidified sense of self. And sometimes that's what happens, and that does work.

But you can already... Here, I'm not... I apologize. I'm not selling this very well. I perhaps could have done a better job of selling it. But in a way, that's my whole point. That's my whole point.

So all this, what I've said so far, and what I've laid out in terms of teachings and approaches to letting go of clinging and desire and craving and all that, in these ways and these approaches — it's not that it's wrong. It's not wrong. It's all good. It's not that the understanding is wrong, per se, but it is limited. That's my main point. It's limited in both depth and breadth.

If we only respond to desire, and only view desire, for example, with the lens "what can this really give me? Because everything's impermanent, might as well let go." Or if we only try to live with mindfulness, with so-called bare attention, staying at the so-called bare experience, or staying at the vedanā even, if we believe that mindfulness and so-called bare attention is really a state of non-papañca, non-proliferation, and really a state of complete non-fabrication. If this kind of more or less sums up my Dharma practice and what I'm trying to do and how I conceive of the Dharma, then I will have missed, and I will continue to miss the possibility of really deep insight.

There's something there, as I said, the beginning shuts off certain doors, in this case, the doors of depth, the doors to a much more radical depth. It also, living that way, viewing that way, those ways, is simply not always going to be helpful. There will be situations, there will be instances, there will be streams or threads in my life where it's very helpful, but there will be plenty where it just is not helpful. I just need some intelligence and some reflection to expose that fact. Plenty of threads in my life where it's completely not helpful to live with, to approach it with bare attention, to approach the dropping of desire because "what can this really give me?" to believe I'm being with reality through mindfulness. All of that, there's a kind of, if I try and do that, if even with the sort of feeling of breadth and all-encompassingness, or especially if I have that feeling of all-encompassing, it's going to be, there's something a bit, I don't know, silly in it.

Because as well, as well as just simply discerning what are helpful and unhelpful desires in different situations, and very basic, we haven't even talked about that. But as well as that, so much more is possible. So much more is possible.

So how do we think of the Dharma? Is the Dharma, was the Buddha just saying, let go, let go, don't cling and live peacefully. Let go and live peacefully. Is that what the Dharma is? Is that all the Dharma can be? Let go and live peacefully. Whose Buddha is that?

Or is it, and this is what I want to go into in a bit more detail, is it, first of all, that through practice, through picking up this idea of clinging to craving, et cetera, and exploring it experientially with a certain, what I'm going to call practical intelligence, facility in practice. And I start to learn something about letting go of clinging through practice at deeper, what I call deeper and deeper levels.

And something happens in that process — the whole world of experience opens up, dissolves, opens up to a completely different level, if you like. A mystical opening, mystical openings, plural. You can see the whole world unbound. We open to the unfabricated. If we follow this thread of clinging in certain ways, or letting go of clinging, we follow that. Subtler and subtler, deeper and deeper, we begin to, we can know what is unfabricated. Radical, different sense of existence, and we understand the emptiness of all things. Something very, very deep, very profound here.

So if we, again going back to what we said before, if we, even contemplating impermanence more and more rapidly in the meditation, mindfulness gets very intense...

It's true that sometimes we're really intensely focusing on rapid impermanence very finely, and something can happen that can kind of pop that whole experience. Suddenly the walls are shattered, and the walls of the world are shattered, and we are opened to the unfabricated. No subject, no object, no thing, no experience in any kind of conventional sense. No space, no time. Not just no past and future, no present. Something utterly, utterly transcendent and different.

But I'm not quite sure how that happened. I was just contemplating impermanence and then something popped. And it might be that indeed, a certain freedom comes out of that exposure to the unfabricated, that knowing of that. But I come back to the ordinary world of experience, of ordinary appearances, and perhaps it's not really clear to me what the relationship is of that world of appearances to that world of non-appearance, of the unfabricated.

Somehow I need to be contemplating this whole teaching about clinging and practicing with the teachings about clinging in ways that let me understand something about the relationship between appearances and what we might call non-appearance or the unfabricated. The relationship of this world of time, where it seems obvious that everything is impermanent, and the world of the timeless. Not the world of permanence, but not the world of impermanence—the world of timelessness. What's the relationship there?

And might not a fuller freedom, a deeper freedom, a more beautiful freedom, and a greater sense of beauty come when I really understand through approaching the teachings about clinging practically in meditation, in certain ways, in ways that let me understand this relationship of appearances to non-experiences? The relationship of the experience of non-appearance, the experience of the unfabricated, of the timeless, to the world of appearances, experience, conventional experiences, and time.

So if I'm too simplistic and I have the goal of just living without clinging—that's what liberation is—and I'm not picking up this teaching of clinging in a way that's actually going to unlock something much more profound, reveal something about existence much more profound, much more radical, there's a danger there. I need to pick it up in a way that will help me do that.

So it can be limited if I take the teachings in a way that will limit them. It's limited in depth. It's also limited in breadth, and that's the second thing that I want to go into. Again, just having the idea of letting go of desire, letting go of craving, and so forth. Even when we differentiate wholesome and unwholesome desires, even then, what I would like to go into is there will be something in that way of approaching things, something in that attempt, something in that conception of the Dharma—of what practice is and where it's leading—that will not allow an adequate view of self, of others, of things, of the world, and also of desire itself.

In other ways, not just to do with this depth of knowing the unfabricated, depth of knowing the emptiness of things, but in other ways it will not be adequate. That's what I want to go into on this retreat.

So there's a possibility that the way we're thinking about these teachings about non-clinging, the way that we're conceiving of it is, if you like, over-simplistic, and it will limit both the depth that we're able to open to—and that's our whole sense of existence —and also, if you like, a kind of breadth in terms of how we then view the things of this world in other ways, which I'll go into that have to do with beauty and sacredness. So this is what I hope to elaborate.

CHAPTER 52

The Way of Non-Clinging (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h14

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea offers a revolutionary perspective on the Buddha's teaching about clinging (upādāna) and craving (taṇhā). Rather than simply trying to live without clinging, Burbea introduces the concept of 'ways of looking' - how our manner of perceiving, relating, and conceiving actually fabricates our entire experience of self, objects, and world.
> Drawing on practices of releasing subtle contractions in meditation, Burbea demonstrates how different degrees of clinging correspond to different levels of fabrication. He shows how even basic mindfulness, awareness of impermanence, and states like 'big mind' are still fabricated experiences on a spectrum. The talk explores how understanding dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda) as a practical tool rather than ultimate reality opens up the possibility of engaging with emptiness (suññatā) while still having appearances.
> Burbea addresses the apparent paradox that clinging is necessary for any perception or experience, yet can be understood as empty and illusory. This understanding transforms practice from attempting impossible non-clinging to artfully working with fabrication itself - opening vast possibilities for mystical experience and a radically different relationship with existence itself.

Okay, so how might we think about this teaching about clinging and dukkha? How might we conceive of it and this aim of non-clinging? How might we conceive of that and approach it in practice in ways that do open up the full depth of what is possible and do not constrain the breadth of beauty and possibility for us? What are the possibilities of conceiving and approaching in practice this area, this theme of the teaching?

There are a few ways into this we could go, but let me try and say something briefly about it. One possibility is to take up this theme, not to actually wait until we're in the grip of some obsessive contraction of clinging around something or other and then try and let go of that. Important as that is to address those kinds of states of mind and states of being when they arise and how we can find some relief, how we can see in a different way. But actually to take up this theme of clinging and craving as a theme and to run with it, even when it seems like there's not much craving going on.

So, for example, in sitting or walking meditation, standing meditation, whatever, we can actually—as I mentioned in the last talk, in the first part of this talk—begin to get familiar and more and more sensitivity to the experience of craving and clinging. This experience of something contracting in the mind and the body. Even when there's no thought there, something's contracting towards a sensation, towards an idea, towards an image, away from. So it could be grasping at something or pushing something away, grasping or aversion. And this subtle feeling we get more and more familiar with.

We notice this is dukkha. This is dukkha. This contraction itself feels unpleasant. As I said, it might be much subtler than even noticeable in the musculature. We're talking about just the sense of the subtle body, the energy body, the sense of the space of the mind. Feeling it, feeling its dukkha. We're talking about subtle dukkha now. Feeling that subtle dukkha and relaxing the subtle body, relaxing the energy, relaxing that tension that's come in with that grasping of clinging craving. Releasing it.

This is actually working directly with the energy of that contraction and releasing the contraction. Now you could, as I said in the first part, think about the object, you could contemplate its impermanence, etc. Or you can work directly with the actual energetics of clinging, of craving. So that's an alternative way.

If you start doing this and you start actually getting quite skilled—there's an art in this—and you start to develop a sensitivity, as I said, it gets more subtle. Because when I let go of, when I release a certain amount of craving, calmness comes into the being, the body, the mind. There's an openness, there's a calmness. And that calmness, like when the water is calm in a pond or a lake or something, I can actually pick up even more subtle levels of craving. So then I can feel that very subtle and release those, and even more calm.

So the very calmness that's made possible through the release, again and again, of finding some craving, releasing it, finding some craving and releasing it, the calmness that can open up through that actually allows me to go deeper and more subtle into the process. This is actually a very enjoyable process. Most people who work that way in practice find it's a very lovely way to practice. Very lovely. All kinds of beauty and softening and ease come in.

And I start to notice something. First thing is, oh yes, when I let go of the craving, the dukkha releases. So we could say the dukkha is being fabricated by the craving. So I really get, I feel viscerally in my felt experience again and again, I just see craving, dukkha, craving, dukkha. And I feel it, I feel its tension, and I feel the ease, the relief of the dukkha right there. And dukkha here means something really quite broad in its range, really from quite gross to really quite subtle.

But as I develop this practice and work with it and enjoy it and develop my sensitivity and the art of it, I also start to realize that the sense of self is also fabricated with and by the craving. In other words, the more craving, the more solid the center self, the more contracted, the more separate from others or from the world.

So this sense of self, I start to see it, like the dukkha, move up and down on a spectrum of fabrication. Sometimes it's so solid, so dense, so separate. And when I let go of craving, when I let go at the deeper end of this spectrum, the whole sense of self gets much lighter, much more transparent, much more melted, much less well-defined. Its edges more melt into a kind of oneness, etc., or begin to dissolve in different ways.

And then correspondingly, there's a mutual dependence the other way. The stronger the sense of self, the more that tends to build craving—unless we come in and work with it this other way by releasing. But the sense of self, the experience of dukkha and the experience of self are dependent on craving. More craving, more self, if you like.

Less craving, less self gets fabricated. Very interesting.

It doesn't stop there either. Because again, as I develop this practice and I enjoy it and I get into it and feel the yumminess of it, I start to see not just dukkha, not just the sense of myself in the moment, but also the sense of the very objects that I'm paying attention to and the sense of the very world that I feel myself to be in. That too gets correspondingly more solid, more separate, more of an issue, more prominent in consciousness to the degree that I am craving. More craving, more solid and more dense and more real, if you like, the world becomes—more oppressive. Let go of craving, let go at a deeper level, start to see these dependencies, start to see objects too begin to fade out. They begin to melt, they begin to blur. The very perception of objects, the very perception of the world is also dependent on craving to a certain extent.

Now some people find this practice really works and can take it very, very deep. Other people reach a sort of limit and they have to slightly change the practice or move to something else. But basically, one way of understanding what's happening there is that we are at any moment in time always inevitably engaging what I would call a way of looking. That's a shorthand phrase. What it really means is a way of looking, a way of perceiving, a way of relating, and a way of conceiving.

I use this word "conceiving" not just to mean thinking about. Even when I'm not thinking, I'm still conceiving. I'm still vaguely feeling there's a me and an it—there's a self, a subject, and an object, and it's happening in time, even if it's just this present moment. Nothing else going on but the consciousness and the object and a present moment. That's still conception. I've got the tripod there: subject, object, time—still conception. So I use this word "conceiving" to mean something much, much deeper and more pervasive and more subtle than thinking, but it also includes thinking.

So "way of looking" wraps up all together, in any moment, the way of relating, the way of perceiving, seeing, sensing, and the way of conceiving. All that together—just for shorthand, I'm calling it a way of looking. And in any moment, there's always a way of looking. There's always a way of looking.

Now that way of looking might have a lot of clinging in it, or it might have less clinging, or it might have really a little clinging. It might have really, really, really only the subtlest clinging. But always, at some moment, I'm somewhere—the mind, the being, is somewhere on that spectrum of how much clinging and what kinds of clinging are going on in the way of looking.

And I start to see, I start to make connections here. Dependent on the way of looking, including how much and what kind of clinging is going on, dependent on that is my experience—experience of dukkha certainly, experience of self as well, and experience of the object that I'm paying attention to, the objects and the world around me. Also the experience of time, all kinds of things. More clinging, more fabrication of dukkha, of self, of objects, of world. Less clinging, less fabrication.

So there is, as I said, a spectrum of subtlety. It gets extremely subtle, and as we all know, can be very, very gross—the level of clinging and the solidity that comes into all these experiences of dukkha, of self, of other, of world.

When you start to explore this way, apart from the loveliness of this practice—so uncovering more subtle levels of dukkha is actually contrary to what it might sound at first. You might think, oh, that's horrific, this sort of excavation of more and more dukkha, more and more clinging, suffering. No, because I'm feeling dukkha, I'm releasing it, I'm finding ways of releasing it—actually it feels very beautiful. There's great beauty, great, as I said, yumminess, really, in this practice. Really, really lovely way of practicing.

As I start to do this, the whole distinction between words like "clinging" and "craving" also starts to melt. It's okay, it's valid at a certain level, but actually it's not really getting to the really juicy stuff. It's not really opening things out in a very deep way to hang on to, to cling, in effect, to a distinction between craving and clinging, for instance.

When I start to see—if I'm just picking this one way of practicing as a way in, I could pick another one—when I start to see the dependent arising and the fabrication of my entire experience—but let's just say, for now, just of self, but also of objects, as I said—the dependent arising, the arising dependent on the way of looking, dependent on the mind, and dependent, essentially, on the clinging. The fabrication—if we say the same thing in other words—the fabrication of the sense of self, the fabrication of the appearances of things and of objects and of time and of world and all of that, dependent on clinging. And I start to understand: what does it mean to say that the self is empty? What does it mean to say that appearances appear, but they are empty? They're dependent arisings.

They're fabrications. They're illusory. They do not exist. This self-sense that seems so real, this object-sense that seems so real—this thing before me, this thing in my mind, this emotion, whatever it is—seems so real. Yet it's a dependent arising. It's a fabricated illusion. It is not a thing in itself without the mind clinging at it or to it.

I start to understand, probably beginning to see it more easily with the self, though it can happen in different ways. And then maybe that leads to another kind of practice. Perhaps I see a certain amount of the fabrication of the self, the dependent arising emptiness of the self through this developed art of letting go of clinging and craving. I start to develop a conviction: yes, this self is an illusion.

So when it feels like I'm looking at something and I say, "Oh, that's me, it's me, I am this mind," or "I am this consciousness," or "That is my body," or "This is my emotion," or whatever, I start to see, "Oh, that's kind of an illusion"—because I've seen this whole self is a construction, a concoction, a fabrication. It's a sankhāra, in the Buddha's words.

Then maybe I can move to another kind of practice, which is: let me just dwell in my sitting meditation, in my walking meditation, in my standing meditation, and whatever arises, I'm regarding it as anattā. Attā means self in Pali; anattā means not-self. This is not-self. This is not me. This is not mine.

So this becomes a way of looking. Some people can move straight into that practice. Other people need to do another practice that enables it a little bit. At some point I could, if I want, change practices and move into that. It's another way of looking. I'm regarding whatever comes up as anattā—whatever comes up is not self, is not me, not mine.

Now, this isn't a big, laborious thinking process. It's a way of looking. It's immediate. It's something that's permeating my very perceiving. It's a conception, for sure, but it's also a cutting or replacing of the usual unconscious conception, which is: this is me, this is mine. We don't often think that. We have a sense. I look at my hand—it's my hand. It's not yours. It's mine. Memory comes up as mine. I don't even have to think this, but that conception is operating naturally.

So we're just letting that more usual conception go away and replacing it with another conception: not me, not mine. That becomes the way of looking. And again, this can be extremely powerful. It's a beautiful, beautiful practice to develop as an art, and there's lots to it. Like any practice, it has lots of subtleties and nuts and bolts, and we need to learn how to navigate it.

We can really develop it very, very beautifully. What will happen? Something similar to what we described in that practice of releasing craving. The world of appearances, the sense of self, the world of objects—even as I pay attention to them—they fade. Not because they're impermanent, but because I'm releasing the clinging. I'm releasing the clinging and I see: oh, they fade.

They don't necessarily move to this fast momentary impermanence—I'll come back to that in a second—the sense of rapid impermanence. They fade in the sense that they blur. They dissolve. They fade into white light or into blackness or whatever. They disappear.

So, for instance, paying attention again to the pain in my back or in my knees or whatever, and I'm just saying anattā, anattā, and maybe even the consciousness that knows this vedanā, this unpleasant vedanā—it's also anattā, anattā.

I develop that skill. It takes time. Really an art to develop here, and in stages usually. I've talked about it elsewhere, I'm going very quickly now.

It's not that then I see this rapid impermanence of vedanā. No, I actually see that that unpleasant vedanā will—I'm not trying to push it away with this anattā way of looking, but it's almost like it doesn't matter. I've let go of the clinging of believing it's me or mine, and the vedanā itself first goes towards, actually it might go towards pleasant, funnily enough, but eventually it goes towards neutrality.

What was unpleasant either loses its unpleasantness more and more, and may go through a stage of being actually pleasant, and eventually, if I keep doing it, even on the pleasant made, it becomes neutral. And then eventually, even those neutral sensations disappear. There's no sensation there in the knee anymore. I'm staring right at it. It's not that I'm not paying attention, I'm certainly not distracted. It's faded. It's unfabricated.

And I start to see, again, the construction of my experience and my perception and what appears to me. This practice can go really deeply in terms of how much it can deconstruct or unfabricate the world of appearances.

Then, again, based on that practice, maybe I really start to have a conviction because I see it again and again. I start to see whatever appears—whether I take it as me or mine or whatever, it is empty. Not just that it is not me and it is not mine, but it is in itself empty. It's an illusory appearance, to borrow the Buddha's terminology. It's a fabrication. It's a concoction. It's a construction. Construction dependent on the way of looking.

If I look in a certain way, the world appears and it appears very solid. If I look in other ways, it appears, but it appears much less solid. And if I look in certain ways, certain ways of looking, if I pay attention in certain ways of looking, it does not appear. This thing that was troubling me, this thing that I loved, this thing that was neutral, fades.

This undermines, when I see this again and again, it begins to undermine—make the connections—it begins to undermine my belief in the reality of things, the reality of experiences at any level, and we're talking atomic components of experience, very rapid, the reality of anything at all. I cannot believe that they have an independent reality, independent of the way of looking. That belief that they do have an independent reality is the most fundamental level of avijjā, of delusion.

So in the tradition, especially picked up in the Mahayana tradition, clinging—this word clinging—has a much broader range of meaning than just the kind of gross obsession, hanging on to something for grim life. Just the belief that something has a reality independent of the way of looking, independent of the mind, if you like. Just that belief. And again, we don't walk around thinking about this. This is how we tend to see, how we tend to view, how we tend to experience. It's the default way of looking at a very deep level. That belief, that avijjā, is clinging.

So that clinging starts to, or rather avijjā, this basic level of delusion, of ignorance, is a form of clinging. Avijjā is grouped together with other forms of clinging.

Then I can start to actually employ another way of looking when this conviction goes through these developments, these arts, these practices, when this understanding, when I have conviction in my heart, that something in me knows—I've seen them fade, dependently on the way of looking, and I've seen how clinging and self-view constructs the fabrication, fabricates objects, constructs the appearances of seemingly solid, separate things.

When I've seen that enough, something in my heart is convinced, and I can adopt, deliberately, play with, entertain a way of looking in practice, in whatever posture in practice, that just sees things and the way of looking says empty, empty, empty—meaning I know, I don't have to have this shorthand whole thinking thing, but again, it's very fluid, very direct, very light way of looking. I know you're empty, I've seen, I know you're empty because I know that you fade when the way of looking has less avijjā in it, when there's less clinging to self-view, when I see you as not-self, or whatever it is.

So I can start to look at things and just see them as empty, empty, empty. And what happens then? An even deeper level of fading.

This applies to everything without question. The barest sense of subject, just a sense of consciousness, a momentary consciousness, or a vast, eternal-seeming awareness. Empty. Fabrication. Much less fabricated than our normal sense of consciousness or awareness, but still a fabrication. Empty.

The present moment, however brief or eternal it seems, is fabrication—empty. Whatever object appears, however vague, however light, however spacious, however transparent seeming, is empty fabrication.

And there's an even deeper fading because the avijjā is being withdrawn, being undermined in that moment.

You can go into this whole process, taking up the teaching of clinging and going deeper with your understanding of what's involved in this term clinging and how to actually work with it to not cling in the moment. You actually start to see that even attention...

To have any experience, I need to somehow pay attention to that experience. Even if it's a very open attention—I'm attending to the totality of vast awareness—there's attention there. And the mind is actually, in a subtle way, clinging. Attention works through a kind of clinging. I shut this out, so I have this experience. The mind grasps like a pair of calipers; it grasps at the object that we are paying attention to.

So even attention is a form of clinging.

These distinctions—we go back to the twelve links of dependent origination, distinguishing between craving and clinging and saṅkhāra—as we go deeper into the whole thing, the very delineations that we had started off with and that are useful at a certain level begin to blur. We see how clinging, craving, saṅkhāra, avijjā, attention—these notions overlap. They're all different forms of clinging, if you like.

Even in the examples I gave earlier, for instance, the example of fretting over hoping that this woman calls me—you can see that there's the self-view that perhaps I'm not attractive or I'm not okay somehow, and the belief that it would prove that I am okay and attractive if she called me. You can see that that avijjā is already a clinging. I'm clinging to that belief, and the sense of self there is already a kind of clinging. My trying, my tendency to view things that way, my trying to prove it—that movement to prove it is also a kind of craving, a clinging.

So even at that level, but certainly as you go deeper into this whole question in practice—you practice in these beautiful ways, very delicate, very subtle, but enormously opening in terms of the freedom and what they open in the sense of existence—you start to see that this word clinging has a huge range of subtlety. It covers a lot of ground. And as I said, all kinds of distinctions start to blur and overlap.

But essentially, I learn how to play with releasing clinging in the moment—clinging in this very broad sense at different ranges of subtlety—through playing with different ways of looking. And that develops, and I see that as I do this and let go of clinging very, very deeply, the world of appearances—self, other, world, time—is fabricated less and less.

There's a spectrum here of clinging, of self-sense, of dukkha, of sense of objects, of solidity of time. All of that is one spectrum of fabrication. And if I develop the art of this, eventually—language is difficult—eventually there can be a complete unfabricating. Nothing is fabricated at all. No subject, no object, no time—past, future or present—no space. Something that language cannot approach, except by negatives.

Through that seeing of dependent fabrication, dependent fading, dependent unfabricating, and the totality of that in an experience of the unfabricated, I understand something. All things, all experiences, all phenomena are empty. Empty meaning they do not exist independent of the mind, independent of the way of looking.

So I start with very rudimentary and simple concepts of ways of looking. There are different ways of looking at things, and they involve different kinds of clinging to different degrees, and I can see a certain amount of fabrication. And included in that idea of ways of looking is really the way of relating, the way of conceiving, the way of sensing and perceiving and framing—all kinds of things. All that's wrapped up in the way of looking.

These concepts—ways of looking and fabrication—are very simple concepts. Even a beginner in meditation, actually even someone who doesn't meditate, can see this. Every human being knows what papañca is. If you talk about papañca, every human being will recognize that. Every human being. Even someone who's not gone within ten miles of a meditation cushion knows the experience of papañca and knows the experience of coming out of papañca into a more normal state of consciousness.

Right there is a segment of this spectrum of fabrication. Papañca being much more fabricated—the self so dense, so tight, the dukkha being fabricated more intensely, and the sense of issue or object or whatever it is we're obsessing about also more intense, more real, more dense. A more normal state of consciousness—still the sense of self, very real, but less oppressive, less dense, less separate, less contracted, and similarly with the issue.

Even a beginner who's just exposed to mindfulness, maybe even on their first retreat or first course in mindfulness, gets a taste of states that involve even less fabrication than the normal state. Just a sense of even this self being less solid, less fabricated in different ways.

So even more ease than what they'd known through a normal state of consciousness.

Here we have a little spectrum: Papancha at one extreme end, the normal state of consciousness—everyday walking around consciousness—and then a state of mindfulness when it's "going quite well." Right there are three points on a spectrum, and the level of mindfulness is, of those three, the least fabricated.

This isn't rocket science. What's possible, though, is to really extend that spectrum and see how all our experience fits onto it. In a way, the whole Dharma fits onto that. The whole Dharma is saying something about this spectrum of fabrication and its relationship with clinging, and what that says about the world of appearances and their apparent reality.

So what we're really doing is taking these concepts of ways of looking and fabrication, and through practice—through experiential playing with ways of looking—we're contemplating the dependence of appearances on the mind, on the way of looking, and on clinging.

Let me return to an example: if I'm contemplating impermanence and rapid impermanence in an intense, perhaps Mahasi-style or Goenka-style practice, that's a way of looking. I'm looking at impermanence and I get into a kind of groove of seeing beginnings and endings of things. It's a way of looking that tends to fabricate what it sees in a particular manner.

I start to see process. I start to see more beginnings and endings. Appearances begin to become more fragmented, and I start to say, "Oh, now I'm seeing the atomic reality of things."

But am I? Is it the reality? Is it the ultimate reality? Or is it just a way of looking that, because I look in a certain way, conditions and fabricates what appears to me? Yes, it's less fabricated than other ways of looking, or it fabricates less than other ways of looking. But is it the end of fabrication? No. And certainly a state of mindfulness is not the end of fabrication.

As I said before, it's like: "Now there's no Papancha, there's no obsessing, I'm just with the simple experience of the pain in my chest or whatever it is, and therefore I'm not fabricating, because there's no Papancha." No. Keep open this question: what's the limit of fabrication?

This seems real. Everyone seems to talk as if these things are real—bare sensations, or if I'm in a certain culture, the atomic process of mind moments and experiences. Is that the ultimate reality? Or is that just a certain level of less fabrication?

So I keep this framework of ways of looking and fabrication, and I just see. Don't arrest that investigation. Keep playing. Is there a way that whatever I had taken to be the baseline of non-fabrication is actually still fabricated, and I can learn to unfabricate that too?

Whether it's a vast awareness, whether it's these momentary arisings and passings away of some impersonal process, whether it's just the so-called bare attention to experiences—none of that is the end of fabrication. All of those perceptions are still fabricated and we can go deeper than that.

Now, if through contemplating rapid impermanence in meditation, there is this pop that I described, or a kind of explosion, and one finds oneself suddenly—one doesn't find oneself when there's an explosion into the unfabricated, the unconditioned—then again, why is that happening?

It happened because there was enough of a release of clinging in the contemplation of rapid impermanence. The mind saw that impermanence and just let go. And it's the letting go of the clinging that unfabricates, because clinging fabricates. So letting go of clinging unfabricates. It's not the seeing of impermanence that reveals reality—it's seeing the impermanence that causes the mind to let go of the clinging, clinging in this very subtle way.

Sometimes this doesn't happen. A person is just seeing impermanence again and again, seeing impermanence again and again. But sometimes it can release the clinging at such a deep level that there is non-fabrication and there's an opening to the unfabricated.

But still I need to understand that. If I'm not seeing it in terms of ways of looking, fabrication, and clinging, I don't quite understand—as I said at the end of the first part—what is the relationship between this amazing unfabricated and this world of dukkha and appearances.

I need to understand something there.

So this way of approaching what I've just described—this way of approaching the understanding, the conception, conceiving of what the path is, the aim of non-clinging, and approaching it in practice—it has the potential of really opening up something very radical, very radically inexperienced, in terms of this spectrum into depths and depths of lessening fabrication and unfabricating. All kinds of beautiful mystical experiences are possible there, and an experience of the unfabricated as well. Both in terms of experience, a radicality, and also in terms of understanding.

You might hear this, and hopefully it at least makes a little bit of sense, but without practice it's going to be like: "This is strange. I don't know what he's talking about." It sounds either baffling or very far-fetched, or it's not the kind of thing I'm used to hearing. If I don't practice, I won't see this. If I don't practice in certain ways that allow this and make this understanding possible, I won't see this, I won't understand. And hearing about it certainly won't have much impact.

Sometimes, as I said, even practicing in certain ways doesn't have the impact because I'm not conceiving of it properly. Even if there's this opening or that opening, this experience or that falling away, it doesn't have the right impact or the impact that it could have in terms of freedom and opening up the sense of existence because I'm not conceiving it. I'm not framing it in a way that's actually helping it to do that. Maybe I'm limiting—as I said—my idea of "this is fabricated and this is not fabricated," and I put a bottom limit to my exploration. Maybe I'm just not conceiving in terms of reality rather than in terms of ways of looking, and that's creating a wall that I can't go beyond. Or I'm not conceiving in terms of fabrication in a full enough way, or even at all.

This teaching—the Buddha's central teaching, the Four Noble Truths—says there is dukkha and it arises from clinging, from craving, as its cause, and there's the release of that, and there are ways to move towards releasing it. The shorthand version is just: craving causes dukkha, clinging causes dukkha, and there's the possibility of releasing it. And the teaching of dependent origination is a sort of more detailed explanation of that.

There's actually an analogy for that. Perhaps we find ourselves—we don't know how we got there—we wake up and we are somehow, we realize, locked inside some kind of dark, semi-dark, I don't know, a big castle or something. There are just all these corridors and stairwells and doors, some of them open and some of them locked, and we don't know where we are. How on earth do we get out?

Then we're given a map, maybe a map and one of those adjustable wrenches—you know, you can make it larger or smaller depending on the bolt that you're trying to undo. Looking at the map, I try and decipher what's going on. I start to see, oh, I'm not even on the right floor. The doors to get out are on the ground floor, and I'm stuck on the third floor. So how do I even get down to the ground floor? Some doors are open, other doors on the way to the ground floor I need to unscrew with my adjustable wrench, et cetera, et cetera. Eventually, through all these things, I find my way out. I find one of the doors and I can unscrew that and it actually leads to the fresh air, the daylight, the freedom of the outside—a completely different experience.

So the Buddha's teaching of dependent origination is, if you like, a map—the map of the inside of that castle. I can locate myself and then I can start moving in these ways. And the teachings about clinging are like that adjustable wrench, so I can actually undo the imprisonment.

That's not such a good analogy. It's a little too gothic, and there are lots of reasons why it's not such a good analogy. For a start, it turns out that the whole castle and imprisonment is a bit of an illusion. Anyway, the point is that the teaching of clinging is a tool, and with skill we unlock something that has to do more with understanding—understanding the dependent arising of appearances, the fabrication of the appearances of self, other, world, time, space, etc., the emptiness of these things.

Maybe it wasn't such a good analogy. Never mind. But the fact is that the teaching of clinging as a tool is a key.

The teaching "don't try to repeat experiences" can be skillful at times because we can cling and get too constricted trying to repeat experiences. But actually, in a way, we need to see this many times. We need to see this dependent fabrication and dependent fading many, many times because there's such a deep level of delusion entrenched there for us to believe in the reality of things. Of course this "I." Of course this object in front of me. Of course this feeling, this sensation, or whatever it is. Of course time.

Of course, these are real things. They exist independently of the mind.

We need to see many, many times this fading, very specifically through the release of cravings. So it's not that we're grasping at experiences so much, it's that we want to repeat certain experiences, including the difficult ones. We don't need to repeat them intentionally, because we have them anyway. But we want to see our experience going up and down on this spectrum of fabrication dependent on clinging. I see that many, many times, until it becomes something in my heart that knows the emptiness of all things.

So if I don't understand in this sense, then the teaching "just let go of everything" won't be very deeply liberating. Just let go of everything. I can hear that, and probably many people do hear that, in a way that presumes a certain level of realism—the independent reality of what we're not clinging to. So just let go of this or that. I believe in this and that, and somehow I'm letting go of it. Or there's some level of reality that remains. I can see that there's some construction, some fabrication, but there's some level of reality—maybe that atomistic reductionism. There's just this process of events, of consciousness and perception and vedanā and all that. And I believe that level of reality remains.

And then you get teachings which conflate impermanence and emptiness. So in that way of limited understanding, just to say that the self is empty means it's nothing but impermanent moments, or to say that of anything. But emptiness is saying something much deeper than impermanence, much more radical.

Or again, we might say, "Oh, just let go of anything. Just being and just receiving." When I'm doing that, I'm not engaging a way of looking. I'm just receiving purely. I'm just being. I'm not trying. I'm not doing any way of looking. Oftentimes people hear about this way of looking—"Oh, that's interesting"—and then sometimes I just want to rest and not do, and not have a way of looking. There's always a way of looking.

So if we don't understand this teaching deeply enough, some level of realism—which is basically delusion, avijjā—remains. And then we believe in things like the atomistic reductionism perception, or we believe that I can do something called "just being," and that that's not doing, or that I can just receive, or whatever. I can somehow have a mode of being that has no way of looking.

So somehow I have to pick up this teaching of non-clinging, of letting go, of what it means to let go of everything. I have to approach it in a certain way. I'm not trying to live without clinging. I'm trying to use the teaching of clinging and dependent arising and fabrication and ways of looking—all of which are intimately linked with each other. And that functions as this adjustable wrench, this map, this tool, key, if you like, to unlock something.

Now actually, I can't live without clinging, because when I start—this is curious now, and again, without the experience of this, and without understanding a certain way, this is going to sound bizarre—but I can't live without clinging, because clinging is a part of perceiving, experiencing anything. As I said, it's part of attention. And when I really let go of clinging very deeply, in that moment, appearances do not appear. There is no perception. If I really just let go of everything, the world does not appear. Self, world, time do not appear.

So this is interesting. And this actually—I don't know if people, it seems to me most people are not aware of this—but this actually caused a huge conundrum in the history of Buddhism. How does an arahant, and how does a Buddha, fully enlightened, therefore supposedly no avijjā, no cravings, how do they perceive anything? Perception is part of the fourth link of dependent arising, what's called nāma-rūpa. And if there's no avijjā, and there's no craving, then actually perception does not arise. As I said, you can experience that in meditation and know it for a fact in meditation.

So someone says, "Well, the arahant or a Buddha has a residual amount of kind of karmic momentum that enables them to have appearances, etc. But at their death, their final nirvana, that is dissolved and so they're not reborn again. The world of perception is not reborn for them. There's total unbinding of the world of perception."

When it came to the Mahāyāna, historically, a few hundred years after the Buddha's death, this was then, even that explanation was a problem.

Because for a number of reasons, when it came to the question of a Buddha's compassionate return—if a Buddha was devoted to appearing again and again, being reborn to serve suffering beings out of compassion—how could they possibly have appearances? You understand the dilemma? They have no avijja, they have no craving. Yet avijja and craving, clinging, are needed for the fabrication of appearances.

From a certain perspective, this paradox became the basis for a whole complex elaboration of Mahayana philosophy. I don't think it's that simple, because the Mahayana had many profound insights beyond merely trying to solve the problem of how a Buddha could return. In the Theravada understanding, once a Buddha is gone, they're gone—they don't get reborn. Arahants don't get reborn.

In Mahayana teaching, there's a doctrine that only a Buddha—not even an Arahant—can contemplate the full emptiness of things and have appearances at the same time. As I explained in the practices, for someone who's not a Buddha, which includes an

Arahant, when they lean heavily into attending to something—whatever it is, a sensation, a perception—if in their very attending to that object they're using a way of looking that also knows thoroughly the emptiness of that object, then that object fades.

Either everything fades when they fully contemplate emptiness, or they have to shift into a mode where they're not leaning so much on that insight of emptiness. This residual avijja, this kind of default avijja, reasserts itself so that they can have appearances. If you're listening, this may sound abstract, but it's quite remarkable. If you know this level of practice and understand it a certain way, you see this is true. I cannot have a full leaning on the insight of emptiness at the same time as I have the appearance of an object. It will fade to the degree that I lean on, that I allow the fullness of that knowing of its emptiness into the way of looking.

Only a Buddha, the teaching says, is able to see both—to fully know the emptiness and have the appearance of things simultaneously. This might seem like a strange, abstruse, abstract Mahayana teaching, but there are reasons for it.

One way of conceiving Vajrayana practice, tantric practice, is that it's a kind of—and I use this word in a positive sense—faking of a Buddha mind. We allow our insight of the emptiness of whatever we're perceiving to pervade the way of looking, but in a lighter way, so that the object becomes relatively transparent. I know its emptiness, but I'm not leaning on that insight into emptiness so much that it actually fades.

It's playing with walking a tightrope—keeping appearances around while seeing them, knowing them as empty. If I lean too much on that insight of emptiness while looking at an object, not going away from the object but knowing its emptiness, that object will fade. Tantric practice involves much more than this—and we'll return to this—but one aspect is this faking of the Buddha mind that can fully know emptiness and have appearances simultaneously.

The point is: we cannot live without clinging because clinging is part of perception. Clinging is necessary for perception. Very subtle levels of clinging are necessary for perception.

On top of that, clinging is empty too. Clinging has no inherent existence. This is something really emphasized by all the great Mahayana teachers—Nagarjuna, Chandrakirti, you name it. They say there's no grasper to be found, no self grasping. There is no object of grasping to be found. Neither is grasping to be found. All these are empty. All these are void. All these are illusory. There are countless statements to these facts, countless instances of these declarations. No grasper. No grasped, no grasping. No clinger, no clung to, no clinging. They are empty. They are illusory.

When you put all this together, you start to have a different understanding of the whole thing. It opens up different possibilities and certainly a different level of understanding. Don't cling to non-clinging. It's empty and wrapped up in perception. Don't cling to the idea of non-clinging.

This is strange now. There is space for clinging. Because I know it's empty, because I know it's part of perception, part of the magic of appearances, there's space for clinging. Clinging is given permission, if you like.

So achieving the end of craving doesn't mean that I'm living in some way without craving. What would that mean if craving is part of perception? It doesn't mean that. It means seen and understood is this relationship between craving, clinging, fabrication, and the lessening of craving, and the lessening of fabrication, and the dissolution of craving temporarily, and the opening into the unfabricated.

And all this implies, as I said, the emptiness of everything—the self, of the mind, of consciousness, awareness, whatever word you want to use for it, of objects, of world, of space, of time, of clinging. Everything. Empty. Fabricated. Illusory.

I can go even beyond that level of understanding. Something happens in approaching it this way, in seeing it this way, in understanding something that opens up the sense of existence—mystical opening of the whole sense of existence, radically different sense. I'm no longer being in this world that seems pretty real and attempting to try and live without clinging. Free to crave, free to play with different degrees of craving in my ways of looking, free to fabricate more or less.

There's skill here, art actually—free to engage the art of fabrication, to let it go completely quiet, to fabricate in different ways, to different degrees. This becomes part of the practice because I understand something. So I can fabricate a little, I can fabricate a lot, I can go into the unfabricated.

So then, what we might call simple mindfulness or bare attention and the experience of the vividness of things and the simplicity of things. And sometimes what people call the suchness of things, when they just feel like, "I'm just so present, everything's so bright, it just is what it is."

Incidentally, that word suchness actually means completely the opposite of that in the tradition. It means the emptiness of things, that they are not what they appear to be. They are exactly not what they appear to be. Just this, just that, exactly as it is. Suchness means emptiness, means their lack of inherent existence, means that they are not anything in particular. They are fabricated. They are illusory. They are not like this or like that. Strange reversal of meaning that's happened historically, especially in the West. There are different reasons for that, but we won't go into that now.

But that level of, that state of mind and that level of experience of what we call mindfulness or bare attention, the vividness that comes with that and the beauty that comes with that—that's just a certain level of less fabrication than normal. If I'm hanging out in what some people call big mind or vast awareness or whatever, that too is one degree of less fabrication, but it's still fabricated in a certain direction, this beautiful vastness, big mind, everything just arising out of that vastness, disappearing back into it, lovely mystical state. It's one degree of less fabrication—it's a certain direction of fabrication.

Or if I'm seeing this rapid impermanence, this atomistic process arising, passing, arising, passing, again, it's just one degree, it's a certain degree of less fabrication and in a certain direction, fabricating according to the way of looking, just like the vast awareness. And I can go much deeper states of much less fabrication, much deeper unfabricating than either of those—either the vast awareness or this atomistic process, much deeper.

But even through really deep unfabrication—some of you might have heard of the formless jhanas. These are available experiences. The realm of nothingness, the realm of neither perception nor non-perception, the seventh and the eighth jhanas, these deep states of unfabricating, of less fabrication. And even beyond that. As I said, to the unfabricated. The unconditioned. The unborn. The deathless.

And what happens, as I said, is then I can fabricate all these different directions and many more, actually infinite possibilities of fabrication, many, many more than that, in different directions and different degrees and the whole art of fabrication, if you like. And that spectrum opens up for me and the directions of artful fabrication open up as practice, as play, all to do with ways of looking and fabrication.

So living without clinging is not the point of the Dharma. But understanding, seeing the dependent origination, the dependent fading, the fabrication, the dependent fabrication dependent on clinging, and through that seeing the emptiness of things—these are interchangeable meanings, the emptiness of all things. This is the point of the Dharma, and it opens so much up.

Actually, even this teaching of dependent origination, all those links, we start to understand in a way that that very teaching starts to melt itself. Those links, they melt, they overlap, they blur, they fade. We see they're not real things either. And again, the Mahāyāna made this very clear: All twelve links of dependent origination are illusions.

They're fabricated, they're empty, they're not real. Again, choose your terminology—you can find many instances of this absolutely insisted upon. The teaching of dependent origination, the twelve links, is not a reality. This is a tool. This is a key that then dissolves itself, melts itself—that whole chain—in experience as we open to the Unfabricated, but also in understanding, because we understand these are not real things. We're not talking about separate things. We're not talking about elements, real elements or components of a real process here.

There's an incredible skillfulness of the Buddha in finding concepts that we can pick up and use as ways of looking. And if we approach it in that spirit, we begin to see that the very ways of looking lead to other ways of looking. The whole thing dissolves itself and opens up a freedom of experience, but also a freedom of understanding. It comes with understanding.

So we can hear teachings and assume that what we're hearing—or conclude from what we're hearing or reading, or in some instances we're actually taught—that the Dharma is, the point is, the aim is: try to be in the world without craving or without clinging. Be kind, but because everything's impermanent, try to be in the world without craving, without clinging, and you will suffer less. There's obviously some truth to that.

But what if we understand the Dharma and approach these teachings of dependent origination, dependent fading, fabrication, ways of looking, Four Noble Truths, clinging—all of that—as keys that unlock, that unbind the apparent nature of reality and reveal everything as empty, reveal the world as empty, as magical illusions? And that's the point of Dharma. And what that then allows for us becomes the point and the aim of the Dharma.

Because then, as I said, we can shape perception. We can fabricate in different ways. This self is empty. I know that thoroughly. There's no self-view at all—not process, not atoms, not big awareness, not nothing. Any self-view is empty, is fabrication. I can therefore shape this empty self in different ways. I can fabricate different kinds of selves, fabricate different kinds of appearances of the world, of others, all kinds of things, of time, through the art of practice. And there's a huge range there.

The selves that I know are illusory, that I know are fabrications, that I fabricate deliberately and skillfully as art—they don't have to be constrained to look a certain way. I don't always have to look calm, especially as I'm a meditation teacher, or because I'm a Buddhist. I don't always have to look unexcited. That's a certain fabrication of self. If I know it's illusory, well, there's a lot more room to play with. There's a lot more dressing up, a lot more garments to try on, to have fun in the magic clothes shop changing room.

This is really important to me, and it makes a huge difference in what we even consider the Dharma to be or where we're going. Actually, I'll just throw in one more thing to point out: most letting go and most non-clinging actually involves clinging to another object. And there's no problem with this—it's just that almost inevitably, this is how we don't cling. People say "just let go, just let go," as if we do that independently of clinging to something else.

Someone who's been addicted to alcohol or drugs—talk to someone who's been through that and come out the other end. They didn't just let go. There was a process there where they actually clung, and sometimes for dear life, they clung to something that was more wholesome. Maybe they clung to a certain ethical principle—the fifth precept or whatever—through the support of the Sangha. They clung to their sila. Maybe to fellowship, a twelve-step fellowship. Maybe even they took on the identity: "I am—my name is X, and I am an addict, I am an alcoholic." And that clinging to a certain identity was absolutely necessary in letting go of the addictions.

In Buddhism and all kinds of approaches—whether secularly conceived or religiously conceived—and in all kinds of other religions, actually a person is able to let go because effectively they're clinging to a faith, some faith in something or other, again, whether that's a secularly conceived faith or a religiously conceived faith.

Actually, the clinging to the faith and the vision of the faith and what that faith holds out enables them to let go of this or that.

So there are examples from practice that I described earlier in this talk. In this anatta way of looking, that incredible depth and beauty of letting go is allowed because effectively or realistically I'm clinging to the view, the way of looking of anatta. I'm clinging to this way of looking, seeing everything that comes up while staying in that groove of deliberately—very subtly, but deliberately—lightly seeing things as not-self. So I'm effectively clinging to an insight in order to let go at a much deeper level.

Or even when I say I'm in a state of letting go or resting in awareness—some people use that phrase—or "I'm just receiving, I'm just open to things"—that's still a way of looking, as I emphasized before. It's not that there's no way of looking. There's certainly a way of looking there, replete with all kinds of subtle conceptuality and a certain relationship with things, a certain mode, replete with doing. Please don't think that that state—it's a relatively less doing—still involves doing. But I'm effectively clinging to that doing, and that conception, and that way of looking, in order that it enables a letting go.

I think it was one of my teacher's teachers, Ajahn Dhammadaro, a Thai forest monk in Thailand who died quite young. I think it was him that used this analogy: the Dharma and practice are like a ladder. When you're climbing a ladder, for your feet to let go of the bottom rung, first you need to put your feet on the bottom rung. Then to let go of the bottom rung, actually, your hands grip another rung, or your one foot grips or finds a basis in the next rung. Your hands probably, unless you're trying to do it with your hands, something's gripping something higher or more subtle. And in this way, we go.

If we take the addiction example, clinging to sila is a more refined clinging than clinging to alcohol. Clinging to anatta is much more refined than clinging to self-view—"this is me, this is mine"—in its even unconscious way. And then even clinging to the view of anatta, even clinging to the view of emptiness.

So there's a way where the process of non-clinging develops through clinging to something else. We don't just let go. Again, we're so attracted by the simplicity, the seeming simplicity of that statement. But like with a ladder, eventually you reach the last rung and you can let go. You can let go of the ladder, or the Buddha's analogy of the raft crossing the stream. You can let go of the ladder, the raft. But it happens progressively at more and more subtle levels.

If I don't have ways of looking and ways of clinging to more subtle things, this idea of "just let go of everything" really is pretty silly and will just end up either with complete frustration or blindness to what I'm clinging to, or just this kind of resignation: "Oh well, what are you going to do? Maybe the real masters somewhere living in caves can do something, but basically the rest of us just have to put up with our delusion and our clinging. We try and let go of the grosser clingings and we laugh at ourselves."

But much more is possible.

So it doesn't make sense, as I said, to live without craving or clinging, because it's involved in the fabrication of perception. It's involved in experiencing anything. But as I said at the beginning of the last talk, there's a second problem. There's a second problem with this ideal of living without clinging, in addition to what I've said in this talk.

Would we even really, deep down, want to? It's not to do with delusion, but is it what the depths of the heart and the being really want? What would it even look like, really?

This is what I want to explore a little bit.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 53

The Way of Non-Clinging (Part 3)

> In this third part of his exploration of non-clinging, Rob Burbea addresses fundamental questions about whether we actually want to live without clinging and what such a life would entail. He examines how simplistic interpretations of letting go fail to address our deeper passions - engagement, art, romantic love, sexuality, and other soul movements that matter deeply to us. Burbea introduces three distinct levels of desire: basic sense cravings, the subtle fabrication of perception explored through clinging, and what he calls the "movement of eros" - desires that open, deepen, and create soulfulness and sacredness. He critiques reductive psychological frameworks like "discrepancy-based processing" that lack poetry and fail to nourish the soul's deeper needs. Drawing on his understanding of dependent origination and emptiness, Burbea argues that certain erotic movements shouldn't be abandoned but rather understood as essential to soul-making. He acknowledges that different practitioners may need different approaches - some requiring more traditional letting-go practice, others called to explore eros more fully, and some needing to work with both simultaneously.

In the last part of this talk, we unpacked and outlined a different way of thinking about clinging and this teaching of non-clinging—actually investigating the experience of clinging, that movement of clinging, and times of more clinging, less clinging, even less clinging. Becoming skillful, moving up and down on that spectrum, and opening up through doing that, we first explore what that word clinging means, seeing that it too is a spectrum of clinging from very, very gross to very, very subtle.

We use this as an entry point and a tool, a key for investigation into the fabrication of perception, the fabrication of appearances, the dependent arising of appearances, and the investigation of seeming reality—questioning that reality through the mechanism of playing with ways of looking, of fabrication, centered on the concept of clinging. In this way we open up very deeply, momentously, the actual sense of existence, as opposed to trying to live without clinging, somehow live a life that's free of clinging, craving, and so forth.

Through this we also saw that actually, in a way, it doesn't make sense to live without clinging, to try and live without clinging and craving, because clinging and craving are actually elements, if you like, necessary for the fabrication of perception, for any appearances to appear for us to live in the world, experience a world. So in that sense too, it doesn't quite make sense.

But as I said, there's a second problem with this ideal of living without clinging. The second problem, and in some ways for some people, would be very obvious. Maybe it's hard for them to articulate it, and certainly hard for them to square it and reconcile it with a more usual dharma understanding. But the problem is obvious. For other people, interestingly, the problem and the difficulty here is not obvious at all, and that's interesting. I'll come back to it actually throughout this retreat.

But the second problem is, as I said: would we even want to live a life without clinging, without craving? And what would that look like? Do we actually thought out or explored what that would mean, what it would look like? What would such a goal—living without clinging, craving (I'm just going to use the word clinging for shorthand)—what would such a goal imply and entail for the different domains or areas of our existence, areas and directions of our existence that we really care deeply about?

So what would it entail, that kind of goal, and imply, for instance, for our engagement politically, environmentally? The world is crying out for this, but what if I have this ideal of no attachment, no craving, no clinging, very even keel—what might it imply for areas such as engagement, or even our own personhood and the range of styles of, if you like, persona or expression in the world? What does this rather simplistic and constrained ideal of living without clinging imply for these areas?

What would it imply and entail for art and our relationship with art making? I've talked about all of these in other talks, so I'm not going to dwell very long on this, but for instance: is it even possible to create a large form—say a long piece of music or a novel or a film or a painting that takes a long time—without craving, clinging, attachment, desire? Or the training, the long, dedicated training it takes to develop that kind of mastery and spontaneity, if you like, of the Zen calligraphist or the Zen sword fighter or the jazz artist.

What would this goal of living without attachment, without clinging, without craving mean for the way we love our families, family members, friends, deep friendships, romantic love? What on earth would it mean for the realm of romantic love, for our sexuality, even for food, for the kind of care and attention to detail and loveliness that some people bring when they prepare food, cook food, share it with others, offer it to others?

So, if we have this idea of living without clinging, how then are these areas, these domains and directions of our being and our existence, our life—how are they then related to and viewed? What is implied about them? Certainly if I have too simplistic an idea of just drop clinging, just let go of everything, that kind of thing—what then is implied about all that?

But also if I kind of piece together and fit together a collection of other dharma concepts and differentiate between attachment, clinging, craving, metta and the brahmaviharas, this word hitachanda—this sort of well-wishing but also desire for decreasing suffering, we could say, in ourselves and hopefully in the world. If we differentiate also what the Buddha outlined: clinging to sense pleasures, clinging to views, clinging to customs and habits, clinging to self-view—we bring that collection of concepts to bear on all these themes and areas and directions of our life, engagement, potential engagement, our personhood and the range of styles of personhood, art, family love, friend love, romantic love, sexual love, sexuality, sexual expression, food, all that.

How is it viewed if it's either viewed very simplistically or through this collection of more traditional dharma concepts? How would those areas be viewed? All those domains, our endeavors, our efforts, our clingings and attachments within those areas.

Some would say, "Yeah, all that's delusion. All of it's delusion. Deluded to be engaged and get riled up about these things. Personhood is complete delusion." And certainly anything that doesn't look like the picture of calmness, of unruffledness. "Art—waste of time, really, unless it communicates something about the end of suffering. Family, alright, granted it's important biologically and we owe our parents and that sort of thing, but basically it's an attachment, it's delusion. Romantic love—off the scale as a delusion. Sexuality—just defilement. Food too." And some people would basically hold that—they would answer yes, it's delusion.

Some would say in response that with those other dharma concepts I outlined—attachment, metta, clinging, craving, chanda, hitachanda to the end of suffering, etc., the different kinds of clinging that Buddha outlined—maybe throw in John Bowlby and those kind of people talking about healthy attachment of the infant and mother, the necessity of the evolutionary programming of that kind of healthy attachment—they would say, "Yes, that's adequate. There's nothing missing in that. We can explain our relationships with all these areas if we are engaged, if we have different personalities, if we are engaged in art and family love and all that stuff. It can be explained with all those concepts. And some of it will be delusion and others can be fit into those concepts. It's adequate as a net of concepts."

And others will be screaming.

Something in the being will be screaming, "No, no, it's not adequate. No, something is missing. Something is missing."

I'm going to come back to this and say more about the difference of opinions and views on this—why some people hold the simplistic view as adequate, why some people feel that net of, I don't know, six or seven dharma concepts will be adequate, and for others, no. This is quite interesting to me: why for some people, it's very clear that it's inadequate, and for others, it's clearly adequate. We'll come back to that.

But of those areas that I talked about or named—engagement, personhood, art, love with family, friends, romantic love, sexuality, food, etc.—what of those areas and what of those directions is allowed there? What is allowed to be involved? What is given place, like given genuine place as part of the path, as we're conceiving the path?

And not just in the sense of, "Oh yes, be mindful of everything, so the path includes everything." So if you're doing art, you're just mindful of you doing your art, etc. Mindful of the body, mindful of—I don't know, if you're painting—how does that feel, etc. Mindful of the movements of getting too tight, clinging to desire in that process. But even if you say it's included because mindfulness should touch everything, there's still a constraint on the kinds, directions, and—yes, the kinds and directions of desire.

And also there's a constrainment of the idea of what's allowed in terms of desire, and also a fantasy, an image of what awakening looks like, what kind of desires and involvements an awakened person has, and therefore what we're moving towards. So it's constrained conceptually and by image, by fantasy.

This is a kind of side point right now about fantasy, but as you'll see if you stick the course—and you might have heard me say this before—fantasy is anything but a side issue when it comes to this whole area. So I'm just going to mention this now, and we'll come back to it in a much more integrated way in the rest of the course.

But notice: when such areas as engagement or art are considered part of the Buddhist path or Dharma path—for instance, in some forms of Zen, some arts are part of the whole form, they're part of the practice. Or in some traditions, often Mahayana traditions, engagement is seen and considered as part of the path. For example, in the Thich Nhat Hanh Sangha and other sanghas—when they are considered part of the path, although these areas are often articulated or explained, or try to be articulated and explained, as having to do with decreasing suffering or freedom or liberation, actually, there is fantasy and mythos and whole sensibility wrapped up in their involvement.

In other words, there's a whole mythos around the Zen arts. There's a whole mythos of the bodhisattva and the engaged bodhisattva who's willing to get riled and get dirty and on the street, on the avenue, etc. There's that fantasy and mythos wrapped up. I think Allen Ginsberg said—was it Chogyam Trungpa? I can't remember—sitting, cross-legged, meditating on the railroad track in front of the approaching train that was carrying a nuclear warhead, I think, to its silo. I don't know, was it Colorado or somewhere back in the days of the Cold War? "This is my practice. This is what a bodhisattva does."

There's wrapped up in that, actually more than one fantasy, but it's somehow connected and made a dharma fantasy, a dharma fantasy of what an awakening person does, what they engage in, what they look like, how they feel, what they do. So we'll talk more about this. Fantasies are actually also involved in the fantasy or the idea of "let go of everything"—that seemingly simple, pithy teaching. Actually, usually there's not just a conceptual structure behind that, but there's also, underpinning it, a whole image and fantasy.

It could be several. Maybe it's the image of "let go of everything," and we hold that as an ideal, but it's also a kind of iconic image for us somewhere. Maybe it's the hermit, simple man, simple woman living close to nature, wandering in the mountains and the breeze of the air. And they're being light and fluid because they're letting go—light and fluid as the breeze, as the mountain stream that they sit beside. There's a beautiful fantasy wrapped up in that whole image, maybe other fantasies.

As I've said plenty of times in other talks, the way I'm using that word "fantasy," fantasies are not a problem. Actually, they are necessary. There is the necessity of fantasy, the inevitability of fantasy when we care deeply, when we love, when we're attracted. The problem is when the fantasy is unconscious or regarded as a problem. So conscious fantasies are very much part of our lives—well, unconscious and conscious, but we can make them conscious and we can recognize, as I said, the necessity of that and the place of that for the psyche. We're going to talk much more about this.

But sometimes the fantasies that we have that come out of our Dharma background and Dharma set of fantasies or ideas are actually inadequate. So the idea and the fantasy of metta, for example, being what is adequate for romantic love. When we care about and are involved in or seek romantic love, as so many practitioners do, of course, who are not monastics, and actually even some who are monastics, when that is present, and if we try and think of it as, "What's happening here? Why is this desire justifiable? Well, it's metta."

Or, well, it's kalyanamitta, it's spiritual friendship. This partnership is basically based in metta and spiritual friendship, and that's what my romantic love relationship, my marriage, is.

I mean, certainly I would hope—we would hope, I think we would all hope—that metta is a basis, or at least a component of romantic love and spiritual friendship, which is beautiful. But is that all of it? Does that actually suffice? Does that truly, adequately, psychologically represent what's happening? And am I then going to say, oh, it's metta and kalyanamitta, spiritual friendship, and just clinging, basically? Does that suffice as an explanation?

Can I have a conceptual frame? Can I open to a conceptual framework and a fantasy that actually allows romantic love to become part of the path—and not just in those kind of simplistic terms? The concepts, if I try and stretch too small a set of concepts over the range of things that we deeply care about, the whole structure will snap. It is not adequate. It cannot support it. It cannot nourish those areas that we really care about, if we really care about them.

So we can make all kinds of distinctions between desires of different kinds, and all kinds of divisions. For instance, just those that are what the Buddha would call wholesome, kusala—ones that lead either in the moment or eventually to less suffering—or unwholesome ones, which lead to more suffering. That's one distinction. But actually there are all kinds of distinctions: clinging, craving, as we said.

But what if we made another distinction, based on what I want to get at, and actually say there are three directions or levels or distinctions between desires, clingings, cravings, whatever?

So the first we could call the desire for that piece of chocolate cake. I don't need it nutritionally, but I want it. That's one level of desire. Desire for sense pleasures in that context. But actually, what we're talking about is not only desires here and cravings, but levels of craving, and also levels of investigation of craving. So it's important to investigate and have some facility with letting go of that desire for that cookie, that chocolate cake, whatever it is, that cup of tea when I don't really need it. This is important. That's one level and direction of desire, and it's one level and direction of investigation.

But then there's what we outlined in part two of this long preface talk: the whole use of the idea of, and the movement of, whether we call it clinging or craving or whatever it is, desire—that whole movement and exploring the subtlety of that, and how that unravels for us the nature of appearances, the fabrication of perception, and what that tells us about reality. So we're talking about really, really subtle levels of clinging, and a much broader range of what clinging means. As I said, avijja is clinging. It's belief in the reality of something existing independently from the way of looking. It's a clinging. I need to refine my practice until I can actually play with the spectrum, actually move that clinging of delusion up and down on a spectrum and see what happens. So that would be a second level, direction of what we might call clinging, for shorthand, and the investigation.

And then there's a third level or direction, what we might call the movement of eros. For instance, our soul passions—so obvious when it's the bigger ones: falling in love, or my passion for my art, or whatever it is. My passion for expression, my passion for engagement. So they can be huge, but this movement, what I'm going to call the movement of eros—without, unfortunately in this talk, explaining too much what I mean, which makes it a little bit difficult—there are other movements that are not just about sense pleasure and relief, not just about unpacking this notion of clinging so that it tells me something about the whole nature of seeming reality. The movement of eros and of soul passion can be huge, marked, deep, or really quite subtle.

So then the question becomes: what is required of each of these directions or levels of investigation? What is the purpose in relation to all three? Each of them has a different purpose. The purpose of my investigation relative to that extra slice of chocolate cake or whatever it is has one purpose, has a range of purpose. It's quite limited where it can take me also, as we've been saying. The purpose of my investigation of that whole concept—from the most gross to the most subtle—of clinging and its relationship with fabrication of perception and apparent reality and world, that has a different purpose. And what is the purpose of my investigation of what we might call the movements of eros, of those things that I'm passionate about? Whether it's engagement or art or expression in life or love, different kinds, whatever it is. What is the purpose? And what is the range of possibility of each, of what can be opened up and revealed and given to us through each investigation?

Because I can look at my desires for chocolate or, when I'm in walking meditation on retreat and the mind says "tea"—and then it says "tea" again—I can feel that pull as a desire, a sense of longing. I don't need that tea. I can look at that until the cows come home. I can spend a lifetime examining that level of desire. But it won't be enough to open up that radical understanding of emptiness I was speaking about in the last part of the talk. Nowhere near. Nowhere near.

Useful? Of course it's useful. Of course it's useful. But it won't open up that emptiness. It won't tell me anything about this deeper movement of passion, the passions that I have. It's simply the wrong kind and level of desire. There's an investigation specific to that. It's important to have some freedom, otherwise I'm just yanked around—just because the mind says tea, I have to go and have a cup of tea. Of course that's important.

But neither that chocolate cake investigation nor tea investigation, nor the deep investigation into dependent origination and emptiness that I explained, will be enough for understanding and opening out and giving nourishment and life and structure and vision and opening doors in the realm and the direction of the soul passions or the subtle movements of eros. And conversely, the investigation of my soul passions and my desire and relation to them—that kind of eros, whether it's really strong or much more subtle—it will actually tell me something about dependent origination and emptiness, something, but not enough for the full depth of that.

So each has its own door, direction, avenue—all important, but not the same. We can't just lump them all together.

Noticing ease when I let go of something the mind is grasping onto or wanting, when I relax craving, is only the start. It's only the start. And as we said before, that letting go and the ease that comes from releasing something the mind is wanting, grasping—that is not liberation. Or rather, that would be a very limited view of what liberation is, if it's just a state of ease because the mind is not grasping onto the things of the world. And it's not, as we said, a way to live.

We question all this. Is it in fact really ease? Is that all that we really want? Is ease all that we really want? And if we're wanting something else, other than this relief from dukkha, are we just going to say that something else is delusion?

From another angle: is sense pleasure or happiness all we seek from our desires? Is that really what we're after—sense pleasures and happiness? Or some kind of shoring up of the self, because the self is fragile? Or is it ease or metta? Does this suffice to categorize our desires and what we're actually seeking from all our desires?

Certainly sometimes we're seeking sense pleasure. We'll talk about this. Certainly sometimes I'm trying to get happy. Certainly sometimes I want metta. Sometimes I want ease. But what else?

It's relatively easy to see that sense pleasures are not going to fulfill me. There's something missing in the way I'm thinking about all this. We can hear this teaching—let go, let go, just let go—hear it a million times. And then decades later, it's still something. It's still not somehow taken root or worked. Why?

We can say, "Well, it's a deep habit, isn't it? It's a deep habit." And yes, that's true. But is it also because it's not enough in terms of our understanding of desire—of the range of desires, the kinds and directions of desires, and the levels of desire?

The framework is not enough for us. We're trying to put it all in one basket or several very narrowly related baskets, and actually it's insufficient. You ask, "Why am I not able to live without clinging? I've heard this teaching a million times."

So what about the directions, the domains of our life where letting go does not take us to where we deeply want to go? Letting go simply does not take us to where we deeply want to go. And not just within practice—because even within practice, just letting go all the time doesn't necessarily take me where I want to go. Probably it doesn't. We need many approaches in practice, of which letting go is just one. But in the whole of my life...

What about those directions, those domains where letting go is not what takes me to what I most deeply want? I'm not talking here about the kinds of things we do which we can acknowledge and accept as basically driven by craving. Having that extra slice of chocolate cake, overeating just a little because someone put something really tasty in front of me, or flying to France or Switzerland every winter—or in the States, Colorado—to go skiing. If I'm honest, I don't really need that. I can see that I sort of justify it to myself because I work hard, so I deserve a rest. But basically, if I'm truly honest, I can see craving has trumped ethics in terms of carbon output and contribution to global warming and others' suffering in the world. If I'm really honest, I can see it's just a movement of craving.

I'm not really talking about all that. I'm talking about our deeper loves, our deep passions, our longings, the movement of our passion there—as well as more subtle movements of eros, though I'll have to explain this in other talks.

In these areas, is it ease that we're seeking? Is that what we want—just ease or sense pleasure? It might be ease I'm seeking, especially if I'm really struggling. When there's a lot of dukkha, a lot of struggle, it can seem like that's basically it. But to varying degrees—and this is something we'll return to—human beings want more than ease and peace. We want more than ease and peace, certainly more than the kind of ease and peace that's merely stress reduction or coping with painful sensations. Even we want more than the ease and peace of the most profound and comprehensive kind.

Look, see, even within the Dharma—isn't it more than ease you want? Isn't it more than that you're looking for? Yes, there's ease. There's the cessation of suffering that we're after. And what? And what? If you love the Dharma, it's not just that. It's not just that.

And then if it's something outside the Dharma, how do I integrate these two aspects and directions that I care passionately about? There's Dharma, and there's whatever else it is—art or something. How do I integrate that? Or romantic love, or this person I'm in love with, or sexuality.

If what the Dharma means to me is just stress reduction and some techniques for stress reduction, then this whole question is not an issue. I thank you very much—you give me some techniques from the Dharma that I use to calm down and let go of this and that and have a bit more ease. Then the rest of my life I just... I can have plenty of passions and whatnot.

But if we really love the Dharma... How do we reconcile this? How do we reconcile "just let go of everything, drop desires, don't cling, achieve the end of craving" with the other movements of what we could call soul, our other loves and passions? How do we reconcile it? How does it fit together?

In the world of mindfulness-based cognitive therapy, and spilling over from there into the Dharma, some people speak of discrepancy-based processing. This essentially means when the mind operates in a mode where it notices the difference between where it wants to be and where it actually is—between what it desires and how reality presents itself.

For example, there's a sensation of thirst, creating a discrepancy. I don't want this sensation of thirst; it would be good to drink. There's a gap between the idea of quenching thirst and the reality that, at this moment, there is no water. Therefore I go to the tap or the well. This discrepancy-based processing, this perception of differences, directs the organism to meet its need by noticing differences and trying to minimize that gap.

This discrepancy-based processing stands in contrast to what they call "mindfulness"—in this particular way of teaching about it, mindfulness means simply being with things as they are, accepting, paying attention to, opening to, without wanting to change, without being so interested in that discrepancy between how I would like things to be and what is.

These two operate like different gears: the gear of discrepancy-based processing and the gear of mindfulness. What seems missing is the recognition that you can be mindful of a discrepancy itself, of the desire, of the movement. But let's leave that aside.

There's this idea of mindfulness as something opposite to, or complementary to, discrepancy-based processing. And it's acknowledged that discrepancy-based processing is okay at times—why? Because it's useful, functional, instrumental. If I need a toilet built, I must first recognize there's a discrepancy between what is and what should be for hygiene purposes. Or there's hunger, and we notice the discrepancy between that and feeling satiated and nourished, which leads us to cook. Framing it biologically in evolutionary terms, as many would do: recognizing there's no food, therefore we need to forage or hunt.

So it's useful, this discrepancy-based processing—regarded as okay at times, as long as we don't get too tight, too excited, too agitated. But otherwise, this "mode of mind"—a concept somewhat related to what I'm calling ways of looking, though probably nowhere near as broad in range, diversity, depth, or subtlety—should revert to a more mindful stance, a kind of neutral gear that avoids the suffering inherent in discrepancy-based processing.

But is something missing here? Are we missing something if we conceive this way? Is this kind of psychology adequate? How do you feel when you hear this? Apart from the illusion of non-doing and the realism hidden there, as I touched on in earlier talks, can you hear that the language is straight out of artificial intelligence systems—the language of machines, robots, humans as very complex robots?

How much soulfulness does this kind of conceiving have? How much soulfulness does it support, nourish, allow? Where's the poetry? Does it have any poetry? And do we really want a psychology without poetry? What are the consequences of seeing ourselves this way? What are the consequences of a psychology without poetry?

Because if I regard desires merely as discrepancy-based processing—it's funny—"I want to kiss you" becomes "my discrepancy-based processing." It has nothing enriching to say about my wanting to kiss you. It doesn't open that up, doesn't nourish it, doesn't bring water to it, doesn't fan the fire, doesn't bring out the beauty or reveal the dimensions there.

What does it say about this music that wells up in me, wanting expression? So much that I'm willing to sit through all the toil and frustration, the revising, to write a symphony? What does it say about the gaze of Eros, the gaze filled with and imbued with Eros? Nothing. Nothing to address. It addresses nothing of real beauty or value or poetry or the dimensions of our existence.

Sometimes we can be oversimplistic as human beings, especially regarding spirituality. What can happen is that a person can, for decades, abide in and with an overly simplistic view in relation to craving and desire.

And okay, they might acknowledge, as I said, that some desires are wholesome because they bring a reduction, or they lead to even eventually a reduction of suffering for self and other. But other desires or movements just have no place. How could I possibly justify an abstract art painting? It has nothing to do with releasing suffering.

And then what can sometimes happen if a person actually clings, indirectly—that seems like not clinging, but clings—to an overly simplistic view of living without clinging, and a simplistic view and concept in relationship to clinging and desire, is that we get to a place after some years of Dharma practice where we're, you know, with craving and desire, we accept that it's there, and we kind of laugh at it. And we practice letting go sometimes, and sometimes on retreat we let go of a lot, etc. But basically we kind of fall back into a sort of, ah, well, the self or the mind is pretty wily, isn't it, in terms of getting its desires and what it wants, and it's a deeply ingrained habit.

Well, there's a kind of cognitive dissonance that doesn't quite add up, it doesn't quite fit together—this teaching of letting go of craving and then our passions and what we really care about, my love for this man, this woman or whatever it is, doesn't quite add up in relation to the eros in our lives.

So there's, with all of this, there can come a kind of a status quo that just stays, a sort of stagnation of exploration in relationship to desire. What's happened there? Why? Why?

Again, so is it that whether it's the concept of discrepancy-based processing, that kind of language and that kind of way of thinking or framing things or delineating things or other ways, what do they serve and is there something they don't serve that's necessary for us? And language I've been using recently, does it serve soul-making? Does this idea of discrepancy-based processing serve soul-making? Does it satisfy the psyche, the soul, the depths in me? And again, sorry, I'm not going to explain that term now. It's coming, or it will. In past talks it's been explained, but just to say this.

We use these words, eros. Do we need another term? And I'll explain more fully in the next few talks what I mean by that, what we mean by eros. I don't just mean sexuality, although it includes sexuality. I don't just mean it in the way that Freud, I certainly don't mean it in the way that Freud was meaning it as just a seeking of sense pleasure. I don't simply equate eros and love, and I don't simply equate eros with life force, it's just life force.

So very briefly, and this will beg more explanation if you haven't listened to other talks and teachings. But I hope to unfold it in the course of this retreat. Eros—a desire, a movement of the psyche, of the being, that opens, deepens, leads to soulfulness, sacredness, soul-making, sense of sacredness, opens that out. A desire, a movement of the psyche of the being that opens out, deepens, enriches, complicates also our sense of sacredness. A desire, a movement of the psyche that opens the being, unlike craving.

Eros always has something to do with depth and with expansion and with perceiving of dimensionality and also with beauty. Eros always has something to do with beauty. And I don't mean by beauty just pleasing, what is pleasing to the senses in terms of its sensual arrangement. We'll talk more about this later. The eros always has something to do, is wrapped up, wrapped up in the movement of eros, in these desires, these movements that bring, that open and deepen and expand the sense of soulfulness and sacredness. There's depth, dimensionality, beauty, meaningfulness.

And again, I'm not just talking about necessarily like huge passions, although I'm including that, but also very subtle. It's a subtle movement of eros. Subtle movements of eros.

So we're talking here about relationships with desire, craving, clinging, eros, whatever words you want to use, understanding, understanding and relating to this whole aspect, area, these forces in our lives. I'm certainly not saying that every erotic desire, a desire of eros, the movement of eros, needs to be physically acted upon, needs to be made materially manifest. So you know that if you've listened to some other talks.

But the question is, what does this movement of psyche need? What does it need? Where does it lead? Or rather, are there ways of conceiving, conceptual frameworks, relationships and investigations that open otherwise closed doors for us? And doors that are deeply important to us, that it's deeply important to us to move through because of what they open to, because of where they take us. This is really what we want to go into.

How can we think about the whole domain and the different kinds of desire, craving, clinging? How can we conceive of all that? What relationships and what kinds of investigations can we bring to bear that open this up for us and don't actually keep certain doors shut that are deeply important to us?

Because, and I've said this in other talks earlier, in the last few years some conceptual understanding of dharma, some ways we're thinking about dharma—even if we don't think we're intellectual: be kind, be present and be with what is, let go because everything's impermanent, everything's in flow, relax and try to live without clinging and this will bring ease, this will decrease or even end your suffering if you can do that—a view like that, for a lot of people it's actually fairly common, a view like that, a conceptual framework like that, whether it's articulated intellectually, verbally or not, it will, as helpful as it will be to limited extents, it will also constrain our vision and our experience. Constrain our vision and our experience of self, other, world.

of desire and eros itself, of the whole cosmos, inner and outer, will also constrain the kinds of freedom, the kinds of creativity, the kinds of beauty that are available to us.

I said elsewhere, I think, we can have conceptual frameworks that actually end up constraining our sense of existence, our hermeneutics—the way we're actually interpreting our life, our being, this world, what comes to us in the senses. And when our conceptual framework is limited, when it isn't questioned, when it isn't open, when it isn't adequate enough or rich enough, there's the constriction in the view, the constriction in the interpretation of what we call the hermeneutics of existence. And therefore, out of that, because of dependent arising, our experiences will also be constrained.

And not just constrained because certain sufferings won't happen—constrained in all kinds of ways. We limit our experience through the ideas that we're hanging on to, even when we think we're not intellectual and we don't have to think about all this stuff.

So what I'm asking is: can we question the conceptual frameworks that we have? Can we perhaps add to the conceptual framework that is operating for us? Can we find out what it is for a start? Question it. Add to it. Extend it. Deepen and widen it. Refine it, perhaps.

Then it becomes interesting: what should the order of practice, of the development of practice, be regarding the more traditional teachings about craving and letting go? And if we're going to open up this concept of eros, which I will do very fully in this retreat, what order? Should I do one first and then the other, or how does it work? How should it work?

Some people will need more practice, do need more practice with just the simple idea of letting go of craving. We talked about it in part one—gross craving, slightly more subtle craving in their life—so that they are less chained to pleasant and unpleasant, no longer being led or dragged around by the craving that comes towards or away from pleasant or unpleasant vedanā sensation.

And some people listening, you've already done a lot of that, and yet you feel no particular need, no calling, no stirring in the soul to explore, open up to other kinds of desire, or dimensions of desire, or this thing called eros. And that's fine. Or rather, maybe it's fine.

And some of you listening have already done a lot of what we could call the most prevalent or even classical teachings about taṇhā, craving, and vedanā, etc., and clinging. And yet, you now feel, you're now at a place where you feel there is more. And there's a calling—the soul is called, if you like. There is a deep calling to explore desire more fully, more richly, more carefully, more subtly and sensitively. Not just in the direction of emptiness, but in the direction of what we're calling eros.

And yet others—there's another group—people who feel called, something hears this and says, "Yes, yes." But there is not yet much discernment, much proficiency, much freedom in relation to the classical teachings of pleasant sensation and desire and hanging on to views and opinions and all of that. And yet, they can't postpone the soul calling to include an exploration of eros fully, richly, deeply on the path. I can't postpone it. I've not yet got all that more straightforward stuff figured out, but I can't postpone it either.

Is that just the pull of delusion? The impatience of delusion? Not necessarily. Some who actually don't do things in the order that a neat way of framing things might prefer—so be it. And if that's you, then somehow you'll have to figure it out on the way. You'll have to learn how to discern and differentiate between these different movements and kinds of desire and letting go and dropping something. And that might be more messy. You're doing that at the same time as you're investigating and allowing eros and fire and passion. And it might not look so neat. And sometimes things are not so neat.

It's the same with imaginal practice and papañca. Some need to explore the teachings about letting go of papañca and complication and fantasy and simplify, simplify the mind, simplify the attention. And this teaching, illusory as it is, but of bare attention, because it would be helpful. It's helpful for them. They need that. And some are drawn before they can explore what we mean by, in a way, good fantasy or imaginal practice. And some have explored all that, and they feel ready for something new, this other dimension of imaginal practice.

And, again, there's some who can't wait.

They need to include and learn as they go along through different ways of looking, different practices, trial and error, with the help of teachers, to discern between these different movements. What's papañca? What's imaginal practice? It's absolutely possible to make these distinctions, but parallel tracks are running concurrently.

Just to conclude this long preface: Yes, it's important to learn to let go of cravings, of desires, of clingings in life. That's really important. But so much more is possible than that.

It's possible to take up this notion of clinging and actually explore the whole range of subtlety of what that means—to play with it, learn to modulate it, and see what happens to the dependent fabrication of perception of self, other, world, time. Through this exploration, dependent arising reveals itself—deep insight into how self, other, and world arise dependently. This isn't just about the cigarette craving or asking for someone's phone number. We're talking about something much deeper: the whole fabrication of our very sense of any reality at all, any experience at all.

This leads to deep understanding of emptiness, a beautiful opening of being into states of less and less fabrication, eventually reaching the unfabricated. What this gives us is a radical and extraordinary understanding of the emptiness of all things.

So there's that possibility, as we've outlined, and there's also this possibility of something we'll be calling eros—a movement that brings soul-making. We're going to unpack these terms if you're not familiar with them. This is something important for the soul, something we don't completely let go of. It's already operating. We want to understand it, explore it, develop conceptual frameworks and dharmic understanding that allow us to open to it, to give it its place and receive the richness it brings.

As I said, eros is already there. I'm not just meaning chanda—this intentionality or desire for reducing suffering, for what is wholesome. That might be one manifestation of eros, but I'm not just talking about that. The psyche needs to bring attention to bear so that it recognizes this movement, recognizes eros, delineates it, and perhaps develops ways of conceiving and thinking that actually support the eros. This becomes supportive to the totality, the integrated totality of what we conceive as practice.

Because this investigation and movement of eros also—just like the deep exploration of fabrication through playing with the spectrum of clinging—opens up our sense of the world radically, widely, beautifully. It opens up the whole sense of existence. But in a different way than the fabrication exploration.

But you decide what you want. You decide. Some people, for various reasons, don't want much depth or much soul-making, much soulfulness. We'll actually explore these different reasons as part of the retreat, because what's happening there is quite interesting. Some people—and this needs to be respected—that's not what they want. They want techniques of what we could call self-help, really. They want some ease, some reduction in dukkha, and that's great. That's important.

Others, though, are drawn to this opening of the sense of existence—these radical and remarkable openings that are possible in one's whole sense of existence, not just of self, but of the entirety of one's sense of existence. The deep understanding of emptiness. The deep and wide and eventually all-pervasive movement of eros and soul-making. These, for others, are the most important things—what they care most deeply and most passionately about.

But it's not for me to tell another person what to want. I don't think it's for anyone to do that. So as I said, you decide what you want. But still, we can investigate this whole question of desire and eros, make delineations and distinctions, and see where that leads. Then decide whether we want to go where it leads or not. We can still investigate. It's always up to us where we want to go.

This is what we want to explore on this retreat—a little bit of an introduction to what we want to really fill out and expand in the course.

Dilemmas and Delineations: How Did We Get Here?! (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h17

> In this opening talk of his groundbreaking series on eros and desire, Rob Burbea establishes the framework for understanding eros as distinct from conventional Buddhist concepts of craving (taṇhā) and clinging (upādāna). Drawing from his background in insight meditation and the early Buddhist texts, Burbea contextualizes this exploration within the Buddha's own teachings on the four bases of power (iddhipāda), where desire features as essential for awakening and jhāna practice.
> Burbea shares a poignant email from a practitioner struggling to reconcile romantic love with dharma teachings, highlighting the gap in traditional Buddhist approaches to eros and sexuality. He argues that eros—encompassing but extending far beyond sexuality—is already present in our lives as connections with nature, the divine, oneself, and the spiritual path itself. Unlike craving which leads to dukkha, eros opens "regions of soul" and connects to what he terms "soul-making"—the deepening of sacredness, meaning, and beauty.
> This teaching integrates with Burbea's broader work on imaginal practice and dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda), offering a non-realist foundation that allows flexibility between different ways of looking while maintaining the traditional insights into emptiness (śūnyatā) and unfabrication. The talk establishes why new delineations are necessary: to investigate overlooked aspects of experience that conventional dharma psychology may dismiss or inadequately address.

This is really a retreat, a course exploring the themes of eros and desire and the alchemy of desire. I want to take a little time now for the next few talks to begin to delineate what we mean when we use this word eros.

To begin to do that, as you'll quickly see, the way we're using that word is actually woven in with a whole web, a whole dynamic web of other words that we're using—specifically, quite specifically, related ideas, related notions, related experiences. So we'll have to gradually unfold all this, unpack it, or to reverse the analogy, gradually build a framework, an architecture that will help us, our vehicle.

In the course of elaborating on what we gradually mean by eros and what it involves and what it implies, where it goes, in the course of delineating, the question comes up: why delineate? We touched on that briefly already, but there's actually more to say.

Why make this extra delineation of something called eros? Because we have a lot of words—we have desire, craving, clinging, attachment, love—so why make this extra delineation? I want to say a bit more about that, and I also want to weave into all this some reflections on making delineations and definitions in general, some general reflections on that, because actually it is very relevant to the whole project that we're doing and where it can go.

Unless you teach in some way or other, in some subject or art or whatever it is, it may not be obvious to you, but it's obvious to me that teaching is always, always contextual. So in talking about eros now, there is a double context at least. One is the context of how did we get here, what is it that led up to these kinds of delineations and making the delineations and the justifications and the explanations that we're about to go into slowly, gradually. That comes out of a whole trajectory, a whole progression of exploration and insight that, in a way, one thing led to the other, one thing unfolded another. So there's the context of where we're coming from.

In a way, and I'll go into this later, I'm coming from a background in insight meditation, but a certain way of understanding and approaching what insight meditation is and what the Dharma is and how to think of that. But there's also the context of who one is talking to, who one is teaching, and the context in which one teaches.

So teaching about eros and desire and shining a different light on them in a Buddhist context and in an insight meditation context is teaching in a certain context. It's not necessarily the easiest, most straightforward context to raise these issues and hope to bring some fresh illumination or fresh turning of the earth. There are other contexts—for instance, in psychotherapeutic context or philosophical context—where, in a way, it would be much more straightforward. There would still be distinctions and things to make, but in some ways, the context that we're in makes it more challenging. But also, we're lent certain advantages, I think, by our practice and by our understanding that other disciplines and directions don't have.

About the context, I remember an international meeting of insight meditation teachers in 2009, I think it was. It actually took place at Gaia House. So it happens every three or four years, and it rotates between three, maybe four centers—IMS and Spirit Rock and maybe Beatenberg—around the world. And that year, it was at Gaia House. Maybe eighty Insight Meditation teachers, I can't remember. Very senior ones, all the way down to very new teachers, and from all over the world. Well, actually, mostly Europe and America.

Part of that gathering—we had three or four days together, I think—included different discussion groups that were offered. So periodically we would break and certain themes would be offered. Then the people interested in this theme would go and make a little group and discuss it for a while. And people interested in another theme would go and make their little group and discuss it.

One day, one of the themes that was offered was eros. So there are a couple of things that are interesting to me about what happened. One is that it was by far the biggest discussion group. There was enormous interest in that topic, so much so that the subgroup of the large group that were interested in eros and elected to go into that group had to be divided into three to make the discussions manageable, interesting, and worthwhile. So I was in a group that had at least ten people in it, and there were maybe two others like that. That was the first thing. Look how much interest there was in this topic among Buddhist practitioners, Buddhist teachers, insight meditation teachers, already in 2009. And partly because so little is said about it in our traditions. That was the first thing that was interesting.

The second thing that was interesting to me was this: we gathered in our group of ten teachers, and a few of us said, "Well, hold on, before we get into this, can we actually just say or agree what we mean by eros?" And immediately it became very apparent that there was no common understanding. We had come to this group with quite a large range of what people thought eros meant or what it meant to them. No one was particularly attached to "it means this" or anything like that, but there was really not a clarity or a common shared meaning.

So I remember one teacher just seemed to equate it with desire in general. And if I understood her correctly, she was saying that her approach to this was, again, not very conventional Dharma, but it was more like, let the students have their desires. So if you want that chocolate cake, have the chocolate cake. If you want this or that, have it. And in having it and feeling it and exploring it and going into that experience, over time—this was the theory—their desires would mature.

And so instead of being caught up with superficial and unhelpful desires, there would be this maturation through actually going into the desire, living it, experiencing, tasting, following the thread of desire. And there would be this maturation until they would get clear and centered on their deepest heart's desires. So starting with the Mars bars and eating them and whatever, eventually there would be this funneling down, a natural maturation process that would help. Now, that's probably not a fair summary of what she was saying—I might have misunderstood—but anyway, she seemed to equate eros and desire.

And another teacher made the distinction, saying, "This is all very well," and he was saying, "Eros, what I'm more interested in is Thanatos." Thanatos, for some of you will know, is another Greek word—Eros is a Greek word—and in Freudian psychoanalytic theory, Eros is sometimes equated with the life instinct, the instinct to want to live, and contrasted with Thanatos, the drive towards death, the death instinct, which Freud introduced later into his psychoanalytic theory.

And this teacher was saying, interestingly, he came to the group to hold the other pole, if you like: "I'm interested in Thanatos, in the death instinct." And I don't think he meant death per se, more as in the unfabricating we were talking about, the movement away towards a kind of dissolution, nibbana in the traditional sense.

Related, but very different to that, another teacher—there were quite a few senior teachers in this group, by the way—said that the Buddha's primary interest, or he was trying to persuade people that the Buddha's primary interest was in addressing Mara, the sort of primordial, if you like, archetypal villain in the Pali canon. Mara actually means death. And so the Buddha was interested in Amara, which is also a word that's in the Pali Canon less commonly, but it's there. Amara, which this teacher was saying, is in contrast to Mara—because it's a negation—is not death, therefore it means life. So what the Buddha is really teaching is life: live, be in your life.

And this elevation of this concept of life—I actually pointed this out to him—becomes a kind of substitute for an idea of God or divine, which this teacher was very much against. But there was this equation of eros with life as opposed to death, and the Buddha was very interested in life and the sort of praise of life, if you like.

And it turned out that the person who even suggested the topic in general at first, when it came to her turn, was actually quite unclear and sort of said she didn't know. But we just tried to elicit from her a little bit, and it turned out that what she really meant was that when she was teaching, she found that she kind of got into a mode where there was very little humor and very little joke-telling, and more than that, there was kind of not the juiciness of humor. So that's what she meant.

There's this huge range, and I don't think we came even to a conclusion about what we were talking about, which is oftentimes the problem with these kinds of groups. But that was another thing that was interesting to me: there was no clarity even about what is meant.

So why am I going into this a little bit? Partly because it's a topic that people are interested in, and maybe especially people who have been practicing a long time. Why? Because they recognize the lacuna there, the gap, presumably, in the teachings around this subject. And secondly, we can't really go into it until we kind of start to say, what are we talking about here? Or can we decide what we're talking about and see where that leads us?

So eros, as we are using it on this retreat, and as I would want to conceive of it, certainly has a relationship with desire, with the notion of desire. The notion of eros and the notion of desire are clearly related, but let us say—and we can come back to this—that eros is a kind of desire. Specific—it's still very wide what it can mean—but it's a specific kind of desire. So a subset of desires are erotic desires, if you like.

And desire, if it's not already clear to you or clear from the first few talks that we gave, desire is very interesting and not simple. And desire in the Dharma is also not simple. So I don't think we really went into this in the first three talks, but the Buddha lists—in these great lists that he comes up with, the factors of awakening and this and that—there's a list called the four bases of power or success or accomplishment. And desire is one of those.

So it's listed, and the Buddha talks about it a lot. If you want samadhi, if you want to develop the jhanas, if you want to develop the brahmaviharas, if you want awakening, desire is a basis for that. And he lists it and points to it: this is necessary, it's important to develop this, it's important to give some intention to this, it's important to be skillful with one's desire.

He does not say just let go, do not cling, don't drop your desires. Anyone flicking through the Pali Canon—the collection of the original Buddha's teachings—will notice how often words like striving and exertion appear. I've forgotten the exact Pali words, but he uses the language of striving, of ardent desire, really frequently.

If you take the example of his life, the Buddha is a paradigm, a paramount example of someone really dedicated, really desiring, with what most people nowadays in our culture would regard as an extreme passion for realization. He taught the middle way—actually different kinds of middle way—but his middle way in terms of passion for awakening was not really what most people these days would consider a middle way. It was quite extreme in terms of his dedication, his devotion, his passion, his hunger and desire for realization, for awakening.

As I said, all this—what we're talking about on this retreat and the teachings about eros and desire—has a context. There's also the context of themes in the teachings that have interested me very much over the years and that I have tried to share with others as well. I've talked in the past about passion and desire on the path, wise relationship to practice, and wise effort—looking at the micro-movement of effort and desire in samatha practice and jhana practice.

I might try something on this retreat that could be a little annoying, but hopefully is more helpful than annoying: mentioning other places where you can find more about certain strands or elements of teaching that are involved in what we're talking about. I'm going to mention but maybe not fill out everything, so that if you want more, you have a place to look.

So I've talked about this before—the passion for the path, the passion on the path, the passion for awakening, the desire to unfold certain experiences and insights and how that comes into samadhi practice and metta practice and all that. On this retreat, I want to go into that, but also specifically ask: Why is it that some people have a great passion and choose a path, or a version of Buddhadharma, that allows a great passion for realization, for deep experiences, deep insight, deep openings of consciousness? Why do some people have that passion and choose a version among the different versions on the spiritual supermarket shelf—even within insight meditation—that allows their passion to flourish, and even allows the pain that can come with that passion?

There's a pain the Buddha talked about—I can't remember his word for it, but let's say the pain of the contemplative. In a sutta somewhere in the Pali Canon about equanimity, he speaks of the meditator, the contemplative, who hears about other people awakening, who wants awakening but is not there yet. He doesn't say, "Just relax, let go, don't desire, drop it, too much passion." He doesn't say that. He says, "Yeah, that's how it is. Until you realize, what you need to do is keep going. Until you realize, then your passion will be quenched."

So it's often quite a different message than what we're getting or the interpretation we're putting on the teachings. Why is it that some have this passion and some choose a version that allows that passion even when it's painful, and some don't? Some don't seem either to have that passion or move away, choosing a version where it just bypasses, or tranquilizes, or deflates that passion.

Some choose a path or a version of the Dharma where actually not a lot of passion is needed. The vision, the notion or idea or fantasy of awakening involved is not that remarkable. It's almost something for your spare time. It's not really a big deal. It's quite a small vision of awakening.

Some people don't seem to have an interest or a desire. There's not much libido toward awakening in general. They don't talk about it. They don't listen to talks that mention it. When it's talked about, they'll just lose interest. They'll actually say—I've heard many people say to me—"I'm just not interested in awakening."

So that's interesting to me. Why? What's going on there? What's going on either in relation to those notions, or in relation to the self, or in relation to desire—to the very notion of desire?

Some have, on the contrary, a very high bar for what awakening means. When I place myself in a more traditional interpretation of Dharma, I would say where I set the bar for what awakening means is really quite high in relationship to where others set it—in terms of what stream entry is and all that, if you know those terms.

Some people—and again, I would include myself—at the edge of Dharma would even conceive of an endlessly expanding notion of awakening. Not quite receding, but endlessly expanding. In talks like "In Praise of Restlessness" and "Questioning Awakening," I've explored this: the desire is always there. The flame of desire never goes out because there's always more.

There's always a greater expansion. There's always more depth and diversity and range to what awakening is and can be. There's always new horizons of awakening opening up.

So why? Why all these differences in people? Is it just differences of personality? Soul differences, if you like? Is it conditioning? Whether that's in terms of personality or education or what people have been exposed to—the kinds of teachings or culture or family environment. Is it early childhood wounding, for example, in how one expressed one's passion and one's love and one's desire? The nakedness that the infant has often comes out quite uninhibited in infancy. Is it that there was a wounding there—something in school or with the family or whatever—that caused one to block and inhibit one's desire, one's libido, one's passion?

All of this we're going to talk about more. To me, these are fascinating questions. There's psychology involved in all of this. Why some people are like that? Why others different? Why people go for this kind of path or that kind of path, or that kind of notion of awakening? So I want to include it over the course of this retreat. We'll return to that periodically.

In the past, a few years ago, I gave a couple of talks called "The Beauty of Desire," parts one and two. In the second part, I introduced something that I discovered in practice where there's a certain way of practicing with desire—even if it's a desire not for awakening, for something else—where it might at first be uncomfortable and bring dukkha, but there's a way of practicing that doesn't dissolve it, that respects it, opens it up more.

Practicing in that way, actually respecting the desire and empowering it without necessarily acting on it—I'm talking about meditation here—practicing this way leads to an experience where the desire does not bring dukkha. Quite the opposite. It brings a kind of fulfillment and opening of the being. So that the whole way we tend to think about desire, even if it's a good thing, inherently brings some degree of suffering because there's tension. Not so simple. Not so simple.

We'll be revisiting and actually elaborating more on that material as part of this retreat, as part of what we call the alchemy of desire. In the first three talks, hopefully it was clear that the whole idea of trying to live a life of non-clinging, trying to live without craving and clinging, just let go of everything—that simplistically understood approach has several problems, which I'm not going to repeat now. That too is part of the context.

And also, what we're talking about on this retreat is very much in the context of the exploration, the elaboration and the expansion of what I've been calling imaginal practice—related to tantric practice, but different. I have talked already a fair amount about eros in the context of imaginal practice, in one set of talks called "An Ecology of Love," in three or four parts. I talked about this dynamic, which we're really going to elaborate on extensively in this retreat, because it's so central—such a powerful conceptual framework that opens up all kinds of things and gives a basis to all kinds of avenues: what I'm calling the soul-making dynamic, or the eros-psyche-logos dynamic. I will explain more about that on this retreat and bring everything back to that quite a bit. But it's already been explored, so again, that's part of the context through imaginal practice.

On this retreat, in a way, it's similar material to what I've explored before in imaginal practice, but now I want to expand that piece about eros, elaborate more regarding eros and its place and its potential, both in what we've been calling imaginal practice and also in the path and for the path as a whole—what that might mean for the path and what kind of paths that opens up.

So that's a little bit of the context, but there's more, because we could say: why bother? Why introduce this other word, eros, when we have lots of words, as we elaborated in part one of the first talk? Why bother? That's a really good question. Do we really need another concept here?

Let me read you something. Someone I didn't know sent me an email sometime in 2015, a little while before I got ill. This arrived at my inbox from Gaia House out of the blue, from a man who lives in the Yukon in Canada—in the Arctic Circle, I think. I'll read you the entire email because there's so much insight here, and he captures so many of the themes that we're going to touch on. He highlights the necessity and in a way answers this question of why bother. So listen quite carefully, because it's very well articulated, very beautifully written, with tremendous insight packed into what he's saying in all kinds of ways.

"Dear Rob, my name is..."

You don't need to know his name. And we've never met. By the way, I asked his permission to use this email in teaching, and he was really fine with that. I'll say this now, and I hope you can remember this because I won't say it every time: when I use examples from other people in the past, if you have heard me do that, or in this retreat or in the future, generally speaking, almost without exception, I've asked the person involved if I could, and they have said yes.

So: "My name is X, and we've never met. I have recently been reading your book and listening to some of your talks, as recommended by my current teacher, Y. Interesting stuff. I found myself being challenged and derailed by some of your approaches to the Dharma, often in a quite uncomfortable manner. This made me realize how easily I tend to align my whole perspective with certain specific sets of ideas and points of view without daring to shake it up. But you woke up the rebel in me, the iconoclast, and I'm grateful for this."

But here's really what I want to focus on. He continues:

"I'm quite new to the Buddhist path, having only been formally practicing for about three years now, but I dive straight into it. I've spent most of the last year as a monk, both in Myanmar and France, before disrobing with the idea of closing my worldly life and ordaining again this upcoming fall. I was quite committed to the idea until I fell in love with a girl who came out of nowhere and disheveled my whole world. Classic story, apparently.

"Now, obviously, from the monk's perspective, this is the worst thing I could have done, but somehow I can't really buy into that. Not just because romance is so sweet and compelling, but mostly because of my intuition that there is something deeper running underneath lust and love, something wider than her and me, something so beautifully alive that maybe it shouldn't be renounced so quickly.

"It's that same intuition that flared up every time I have fallen in love – the feeling that I'm playing a game that is beyond us, that the torrent in my chest is just running through me, unaffected by matter or time, untamed by anybody, that I'm just here as a temporary vehicle for a desire that has never begun nor ceased stretching out towards the Beloved. So my specific love stories become just some personified renditions of a myth, essentially unspoken and inexhaustible."

There's so much beauty in what he writes, and so relevant to the themes that we're going to be unraveling, unpacking, elaborating on. But he continues, and this is why I wanted to write you:

"Because I have never heard anyone else attempting to reconcile romantic love with the Dharma, and I would like to explore this possibility in order to avoid fragmenting my life into discrete arenas. I can't honestly bring myself to set up desire and freedom against each other as mutually exclusive principles, however much this seems to be insisted upon in the Dharma, and this has been a huge difficulty in my recent attempts to engage fully with practice.

"I would like to start imagining an experience of desire or lust that would exceed the lack and the compulsion to fill it in, that would be unconditioned by pain without having to impose an artificial stance of dispassion and sacrifice a dynamic force of the human heart for a peace maybe too sterile."

And he continues:

"Unfortunately, I feel ill-equipped for such an undertaking. My heart just dramatically bouncing from an inclination towards disenchantment tranquility to one of stormy passion and unreasonable attachments, constantly throwing myself off balance, completely invested into one configuration or the other. I don't really know where to start. As of now, I have recently let myself be overwhelmed by a crazy and beautiful romance" – I find this really moving, all of it – "overwhelmed by crazy and beautiful romance to the point of neediness and jealousy. And I want to open this up, to let it breathe, to bring some freedom within the tension of desire itself.

"So I'd like to ask you if you would have any advice, any lead into how I could directly practice with this explosive heart of mine... Thank you kindly and please accept my best regards."

So, beautiful, beautiful email. And I was struck by this, of course, and moved. A bit busy as I was at the time, I was moved to write back and suggest we arrange a time to speak. And we spoke just for about an hour. That was actually all we had the chance to do before I got ill, quite out of the blue as well, and I had to cut down on most of my teaching.

He said, while we were talking, that before falling in love this time, he thought he'd left all that behind him and was now travelling a different path. And what was the image of that path? He mentioned the hermit in solitude in the peace of the woods or the mountains. And I asked him, "Is it peace you're after?" And he said, "Freedom from ruts and from the fear of engaging."

There's a lot here. We talked about imaginal sensibility, imaginal practice, what this meant about self-view, the possible plurality within self-view, the possibility of regarding desire as not just restlessness, as we touched on in the first talks. We really touched on the possibilities of imaginal practice and also on working with the energy of desire, as I was talking about in some of the Beauty of Desire talks. But we only could speak for an hour, and it's such a huge subject that all I could do was kind of give a few pointers, really, and suggest that we have some more contact at some point.

There was another piece to this man's situation. The woman he was involved with—and this was part of the problem that initially instigated his reaching out—was wanting the relationship to be an open one. She wanted them both to be able to have intimate connections with other people, and while she was clear about this desire, he felt very unsure and deeply ambivalent.

I pointed out to him that although this question of an open relationship was certainly worth exploring and pondering, whether it ended up being open or not, and even whether the relationship continued or ended, wasn't actually the most deeply relevant thing. The more fundamental, universal questions he was grappling with—these wouldn't disappear regardless of what form the relationship took or whether it continued at all.

So when we ask, "Why bother? Why bother with all this?" that email articulates really well one of the reasons. The contact we had wasn't enough to truly allow those kinds of questions and the wrestling he described to be opened up and supported. Hence this retreat, hence these teachings, and hence the attempt we're making here.

In the Theravada tradition he was coming from, sexual images and energies that arise in meditation are usually regarded essentially as kilesa—defilement or distraction. There's sometimes a slightly more charitable and open, softer view that says notice them, allow them, but certainly don't encourage them. So there's this spirit of openness—notice, allow—but not encouragement. Sexual and erotic images and energies are not regarded as having any real positive place on the path, except in the very general context that anything has a place insofar as we're attempting, within a certain framing of what dharma is, to be open to all things.

Still, underneath that openness lies a subtext: it's better if these things don't arise. It's easier. Basically, just let go of them. There might be a kind of view of equality—they're just like anything else to be open to, to be let go of—but essentially they're treated like everything else: don't cling, don't get involved, don't create anything there.

Insight meditation has many strengths, including how much emphasis it places on the feet. How many times have you heard this on retreat? Walking meditation, feet on the ground, standing meditation, groundedness. "Can you feel your sitting bones on the cushion?" Really important. And insight meditation also emphasizes—and this is one of its beauties—the heart: openness of heart, the capacities of heart, the cultivation and centrality of heart.

More and more in insight meditation circles, there's an emphasis on what we could call the head—slowly, a few strands within insight meditation are really emphasizing study of texts and intellectual understanding.

So we have feet, heart, and head. But other bits might be missing. Can it involve our hips? Feet, heart, head, hips. Again, there's a kind of lacuna there, certainly around sexuality and erotics.

I really want to emphasize that when we use the word eros, it includes sexuality in the way we're meaning it. We include sexual attraction, sexual energy, and so forth. But it's actually much, much more than that. We're talking about something much more fundamental, something that can be both very intense and very subtle. Sexual energy and attraction can be subtle too, but we're pointing to something even more basic and often more refined than that.

But again, not to over-labor the point: why introduce this concept of eros? Why distinguish something called eros from craving or greed or desire in general? Well, it's there already. Eros, as we're meaning that term, is already functioning every day in our lives. It's already part of our experience, as we'll explore.

Making this distinction draws out something that otherwise might not be so clear to us—and that lack of clarity might shut doors if we don't distinguish it. Making any kind of distinction amplifies something. By distinguishing this from that, A from B, both A and B get amplified, or one of them gets magnified. It's like putting something under a magnifying glass—it becomes clearer.

Setting something apart allows us to investigate it, to take it as a theme of investigation. If I don't delineate it in the first place, I can't take it as a theme of investigation.

The delineation is the beginning of opening something up—like a tear in fabric that reveals what lies beneath, or getting your foot in the door so you can begin to pry it open. Setting it apart allows us to investigate, to become interested in it. And then we can see how it works. What is this thing? How does it work? And where does it lead—this thing that we're going to call eros?

Because, and this is one of our central contentions, eros will lead to different experiences, to different ends than craving leads to. It leads to ends and experiences other than the ones craving leads to. It opens up, if you like, regions of soul, to use a certain language.

Eros is very connected with soulfulness, with what we're going to call soul-making, which I'll explain more what we mean by that. But for now, let's just say the widening and deepening of a sense of sacredness—the widening and deepening and diversification of our sense of sacredness. But this word "soul-making" has much to do with meaningfulness and resonance and depth and dimensionality and beauty and all kinds of things. Eros is connected with a sense of divinity and with what we've been calling in past retreats cosmopoiesis—the very sense we have, the vision, the perception of the world, the cosmos we live in, the cosmos about us, our very sense of existence.

We're going to go into these terms—divinity, cosmopoiesis, soul-making—later in much more detail, because they're very woven into this whole theme of eros.

So that's one reason. Eros is in our life already. We already experience it. We just need to draw it out and investigate it and see where it leads, because it does lead somewhere other than where what we might call craving leads to.

A second reason why I make this delineation is to hopefully establish, or at least highlight, the potential of opening to a recognition of the sacredness of eros itself. The sacredness of eros itself. Again, this is something we're going to come back to a lot. We can see that. And it's very different to see that eros is sacred rather than as a defilement. And that includes also the sacredness, or at least the potential sacredness, of sexuality.

Sacredness never resides in this or that object or thing. We sacralize. We make something sacred through our relationship with it. So there's the possibility of sacralizing sexuality, rather than just viewing eros or sexuality as a defilement, or as leading inevitably to defilement.

And all this, as I said, is not really so adequately addressed in the Dharma at present, for the most part. We talk about sexuality and desire, but we talk a lot about desire in a negative way, mostly. And we talk about sexuality, but very little, except in terms of ethical prohibitions—for example, the precepts. Or we admit it's an aspect of life, predominantly lay life, but still there for monastics. But there isn't really this exploration, this inquiry. It's not really opened up as part of the path.

As we mentioned already at least once, most people have a desire for romantic love, or most people are involved in relationships or in marriages perhaps, and a finer discrimination is needed there. This is not metta. I cannot reduce a romantic love relationship or a marriage to metta. There's something more involved, or that needs to be involved, and part of that more is what we're going to call eros.

And if I'm interested in that—if I'm really interested in really bringing a fullness of investigation, and if I'm really interested in romantic love and romantic partnerships being really integrally part of the practice—then this brings all kinds of inquiries. For example, in a long-term relationship, what keeps the eros alive? What stifles it, what kills it, what erodes it, what just allows it to fritter away, and what keeps the eros alive in a long-term relationship?

So there's that second reason: the re-sacralizing of sexuality and love, but also of eros, and making it more part of the path—integrally, fully, richly.

But really with all this, a third reason why I make this discrimination of something called eros is related to what I said before. I'm interested in creating or opening an area or a direction of investigation. I certainly don't want to just assert something like the sacredness of eros—to tell you eros is sacred and then leave it at that.

Some people will agree, some people will disagree. It's pointless. What I'm much more interested in is a domain and a dimension for really a much freer, more open and penetrating inquiry—dharma inquiry.

Always in dharma inquiry, always there's something really fundamental to see. There's a principle that how we view something—always we see that how we view something affects the perception of that something. The ideas that I have, the preconceptions, the conceptions, the relationship with the something that I'm investigating, the area of inquiry, affects my perception of that something. And affects the experiences, the related experiences that unfold, that can unfold, or that will unfold.

So all that's just to do with dependent arising. The view, the way of looking, affects, it shapes the perception. Fabrication. We've talked about that as part of what we talked about before. Now part of that, so we really have to see this dependent arising. How I view something affects my perception of that thing. So that must be part of the way that I'm inquiring.

And a part of that, a part of the investigation, is perhaps this question: well, what happens? How does it affect this whole thing called eros if I view it as sacred, even if I just try and view it, even just a little, just entertain the idea that it might be sacred? So that's a subset of a subset of the investigation. What happens if? We're not asserting anything here. It's all really in the spirit of investigation.

And I'll say it one more time. We mean by eros something including, but much more than sexuality, much more than sexual attraction or energy or sexual interactions between people. You can have—there exists, there arises for us an erotic connection or erotic connections, plural, with the earth, with a tree or a piece of land, with the stars, with the cosmos, erotic connection with the divine, erotic connection, relationship with the senses, an erotic sensibility, an erotic connection with materiality. Certainly with another human being, but not only humans, with other living beings. Certainly also not just with others, but we can have, and hopefully we do have, and we're going to elaborate on this, an erotic connection with oneself—an erotic connection with oneself, erotic connections, plural, with oneself and aspects of oneself, faces of oneself, or the self's faces, or self-faces, whatever.

There can and hopefully is an erotic view, an erotic connection with the path and with the idea or the vision, the fantasy, the notion, the concept of awakening. Certainly, always there's an erotic connection with imaginal figures, even when it seems like there isn't. And there's even the possibility of erotic connection with ideas and concepts.

So eros pervades very broadly. We mean much more than sexuality here. Eros can also be, or can seem to be, primarily erotic. At different times, it can seem to be something primarily energetic, or primarily physical, embodied, if you like, or primarily imaginal, or primarily intellectual. Can at different times be or seem to be primarily all those things? Actually, I would say it always involves all of these aspects. Eros always involves energy, what we're going to call the energy body and the energetics. It involves some kind of embodiment, some kind of embodiment, or relationship with body and views of the body and sense of the body. It always involves the imaginal and it always involves ideation, intellect, concept, what we're going to call logos—always involves all that.

So it's already something multidimensional, and we're going to go into this more. And as I said, whenever there is a sense of soulfulness, that kind of richness, resonance, depth, dimensionality, beauty, meaningfulness, in our existence, in the being, whenever there is soul-making, sacredness in our existence, eros is involved. Eros is involved whenever there's soul-making.

Now, I think it's fair to say, I think it's obvious, maybe important to say as well, that different people at different times will find these investigations that we're going into around eros and soul-making more or less interesting. So this, to me, is interesting in itself. It seems to me, it does seem to me, that people differ in the flavours or the characters, if you like, of the ways eros or libido, if we say life force, expresses in their lives. They differ in the flavours, the characters, the ways eros expresses in their lives.

The fire, if you like, if eros is a kind of fire. The fire of eros looks and burns differently. People's soul fire burns and looks differently, one to another. There's quite a range there. The flaming passion, and also at different times, the flaming passion, the very steady, quiet, small, but unquenchable flame, or the raging fire, whatever, you know, leaping from one thing to another, the flames. It looks and burns differently.

But people also differ, it seems to me, in the amount, strength, and depth of Eros—of the libido or life force that flows through them in their lives. Some people are characterized by one quality, others by another. There's a range here. And it's also true, as we've touched on before, that for all kinds of interesting reasons, Eros and libido can be and often are blocked in our lives in different ways. They may be inhibited at certain times or in certain situations, along certain lines of expression while remaining free in others. Sometimes there's a more chronic and pervasive blocking or inhibition of Eros and libido. It's not necessarily that a person's character or style is simply fixed—something may be blocked, inhibited, crushed, or otherwise constrained.

Despite all these varying differences between different people at different times, I would say that Eros is a necessary and integral aspect of what we're going to be calling soul-making. Therefore, an inquiry into Eros is important for anyone interested in or devoted to soul-making. It's simply part of what one needs to consider and explore—to open up, go into, allow, understand, support, and nourish.

So on this retreat, the intention of these teachings is really to open doors. I've mentioned that it's possible certain doors are actually shut or even locked in the way we're conceiving not just of Dharma, but of life, existence, who we are, what the world is, what existence is. The aim of these teachings is to open doors and to sketch—at least begin to sketch—a path for those who would move through these doors into new territory, for those who would like to travel in certain directions.

We're offering a map, at least the beginnings of a map, a frame of reference, and lighting certain beacons for navigation for those who already find themselves in uncharted territory around Eros and desire. They're already there and need some kind of orientation—ways of thinking and practicing, practical tools, the practical subtleties of practical differentiations, navigation, and steering that all practices need.

Some people, as we mentioned, already see that the more usual or narrow interpretations of Dharma may not be enough to open up this territory. Some already sense, as in that beautiful email I read earlier, a holiness in desire—the holiness of desire in life or in certain areas of desire, and also in imaginal practices. This is very common. But they sense that holiness while recognizing it's tricky, complex, and rich. Help is needed—a conceptual framework, tools, distinctions, practice instructions both on the cushion and in life, in relationships.

Again, returning to context: these teachings sit within a larger framework of wanting to open a path that integrates many elements we've explored over recent years—imaginal practice, soul-making, cosmopoiesis, the re-enchantment of the cosmos, the poetry of perception, experiences and senses of sacredness and divinity, Eros. We've touched on all this before, and I'm probably going to attempt a brief glossary of these terms in the next talk, which will hopefully be helpful.

This retreat takes a slightly different angle, approaching from Eros and expanding more on what that means. But all of this, as you can hopefully see, integrates with and sits alongside our usual, more typical Dharma teachings about craving, letting go of craving, and how craving leads to dukkha. It complements those teachings and also the much more radical teachings about investigating clinging—the whole spectrum of what that word means, with all the subtleties and beauties of working with that in practice.

This includes letting go of clinging, moving up and down the spectrum of clinging, seeing what it does to the fabrication of perception of self, other, world, time, and so forth. It involves going deeply in practice and understanding into the realization and insight of dependent origination at a very deep level—not the more common level—and unfolding the experience of the unfabricated and the emptiness of all things.

This opens existence and provides radical freedom, a radical opening of the sense of existence. That understanding of emptiness provides what we could call a non-realist basis for all these other explorations we're engaging in. To the degree that we've taken to heart and understood the teaching of emptiness—how deeply it's penetrated heart and understanding—to that degree we can practice a flexibility of ways of looking and of conceptual frameworks.

We can entertain different ideas and conceptual frameworks without having to believe in the reality of any of it—without needing to think that any of these ways of looking reveal how the world actually is, how I actually am, what the nature of things actually is, or that this idea or conceptual framework represents the truth of things. There's a real facility and flexibility in moving between ways of looking—a really broad range—and all kinds of conceptual frameworks.

So these teachings are woven into and integrate with the usual Dharma teachings about craving and letting go, releasing dukkha, and the much deeper teachings about dependent arising and emptiness. This forms a non-realist basis that partly allows us to open up teachings of imaginal practice and, if you like, tantric teachings—though I make a distinction there. Tantra is based on that understanding of emptiness, absolutely, or at least it's supposed to be, as I've mentioned before.

All of this is integrated together. As I've mentioned, there are other possibilities through imaginal practice and through understanding Eros of having what I call fuller, more adequate concepts and perceptions of self, other, world, and existence—ways of relating, seeing, and experiencing that are more soulful, more conducive to soul-making, that widen and diversify our sense of sacredness and open our senses of beauty, sacredness, and divinity.

I hope you can see in all of this—if not right now, then at some point—that this isn't really eclecticism. I'm not interested in simply drawing different things together and tossing them in a pot for the sake of being interesting or out of restlessness in some superficial way. I hope you can see at some point how integrated all these teachings are.

And if you like, how necessary, how inevitable many of these teachings are, because as I said, one way of understanding the Dharma unfolds a certain depth and a certain possibility, and that just keeps unfolding in a very necessary way. So necessary to what's gone before, but also necessary to our existence and to our practice for the future.

More typical Dharma psychology might focus on teachings like the links of dependent origination, which we've touched upon. One of the immense strengths of the Buddha's teaching is that he gives us a set of concepts, and in a way they become ways of looking. That's what these concepts are—they become ways of looking. But they serve to simplify. Dharma concepts serve to simplify because they fabricate less. When I use a certain set of concepts, there's less papañca, less of this complexifying and nonsense-making entanglement.

At a deeper level too, they simplify in the sense that Dharma concepts become ways of looking that move towards less and less fabrication, and less fabrication is a state of simplicity. So the teaching says: don't think about this, don't think about that, think in this way, look in this way, adopt these ways of looking. There's a disentangling, a certain amount of simplifying—both of the ways of looking by constraining them to certain concepts, but also then in what is seen. There's a simplifying in the perception of things, and that simplifying just goes deeper and deeper.

Not just the simplicity of the is-ness, the so-called suchness of things and the vividness of that, but the simplicity of our life, and then the simplicity of perception beyond the thing-ness of things as we go deeper and deeper into unfabricating, and eventually into something that is in effect so simple that even "is" or "is not" doesn't apply to it—the unfabricated.

Again, if I use the language of the soul, the psyche wants and needs, obviously, a kind of disentangling. And it certainly wants that journey into perceiving less fabrication. But there are, so to speak, other dimensions or strata of the soul—we could use that language—of the psyche, that want something else. Rather than just simplicity, simplicity, simplicity—unfabricating, unfabricating, unfabricating to the unfabricated—rather than just the simplifying of that direction, powerful though Dharma practice and Dharma concepts are, other distinctions and delineations become necessary.

What is the difference between papañca and fantasy or image in the way we're using it? The difference between daydreaming and fantasy and image? What's the difference between soul-making and the kind of simplicity of freedom that I've just talked about? What's the difference between eros and craving, or desire and eros? What's the difference between eros and love, or the brahmaviharas?

Something—and I'm going to make this contention, something I'm really going to come back to a lot on this retreat—something in us, something in the soul wants to know, wants to experience not just oneness, not just transcendence or the unfabricated, the transcendence of the unfabricated, nor just "life as it is," as if there really even is a life as it is, as if such a thing exists, as if such a thing is possible to behold. We don't just want oneness, transcendence, or that freshness of bare attention. Certainly we want more even than all that—certainly more than bare attention, I hope—but also more than a dissolution in oneness, and also more than the transcendence of the unfabricated.

We need a kind of more elaborate, you could say, or slightly more sophisticated psychology. We need a Dharma psychology that both recognizes that which is already present, but which needs to be, as I said, drawn out, amplified a little more, made recognized. So the fact, for example, that eros is more than metta. It's not the same as craving. It's not even just wholesome desire or chanda or desire that leads to less suffering. We need to recognize something that's already present in our life that hasn't been drawn attention to yet, highlighted, drawn out, investigated.

And we need a slightly more elaborate Dharma psychology because of the different kinds of sacredness and the different realms of experience which a slightly more involved psychology that involves concepts like eros can open up for us—without which either these realms don't open up, these directions don't open up, or they just get dismissed.

Dilemmas and Delineations: How Did We Get Here?! (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 42 min

> In this second part of his exploration into the nature of eros, Rob Burbea provides a working definition while acknowledging the hermeneutic circle inherent in understanding any concept within a larger framework. He defines eros as a particular kind of desire—one that seeks more contact, connection, touching, knowing, and intimacy with its object, whether outer or inner. This definition deliberately preserves otherness rather than seeking dissolution into oneness, distinguishing it from classical Platonic definitions that emphasize union.
> Burbea carefully differentiates eros from sexuality, Freud's pleasure principle, or mere life force, while explaining how to recognize erotic experience through qualities like attraction, tension, juiciness, dynamism, and arousal of interest. He introduces the distinction between delight (the fullness of soul-making) and bliss (pleasurable energy body experiences), noting that eros typically involves delight and may include bliss. Throughout, he emphasizes that this phenomenological approach to defining eros serves specific purposes within an integrated vision of practice that includes imaginal work and soul-making, preparing the foundation for deeper explorations of how eros relates to spiritual development and the sacred.

Why Eros? Why make this delineation?

Because it's part of our life already. This should become more and more evident: Eros is involved in our relationship with the path and with awakening. To different degrees, Eros is involved in our relationship with the path and awakening, and the notion of awakening, and therefore Eros needs to be investigated there. Because it's part of my path, because it's involved in my relationship with it.

It's certainly part of imaginal practice. And as I said, Eros involves and leads to soul-making and widening of the senses of sacredness beyond just the is-ness of things, and even beyond the transcendence that's possible for us, for consciousness—transcendence in oneness or the unfabricated. Opening up sacredness wider than a kind of universal sacredness. We talked about this on other retreats and we'll go into this on this retreat. So there's a kind of universal sacredness and then there's particular sacredness, theophanies, that preserve particularities.

There's also the making of the link between sexuality and sacredness—that sexuality and Eros are not just defilements. We want a path that has more than nothing to say, or very little to say, about sexuality and about romantic love, that recognizes more is involved than certainly just procreation, and also than mere matter.

Before I venture a first definition or delineation of Eros, I want to say a few things generally about this definition but also about making definitions and delineations in general.

Firstly, and it's implicit in what I've been saying already, people use the word "Eros," if they use it at all in psychological or other contexts, in many different ways. Over the millennia, it's been used to mean many different things, so there's a range in how people use it. It's important to be aware of that. We are certainly not saying we have the right definition and everyone else is wrong. That would be absolutely ridiculous. It's really not about right or wrong. It's more, for me, about what does this way of defining Eros lead to?

Different ways of defining Eros unfold in different directions. The way we're defining Eros sits within a certain conceptual framework of other things that I've mentioned and a whole set of teachings. So what does that whole set move towards? How does this notion of Eros sit within that framework? How is it supported by that other set and how does it support that other whole conceptual framework? Really not about right or wrong or arguing with what people say, but it's important to recognize this is just one among many possible ways.

The way I'm going to define it in a minute is one among many possible ways. The way we're going to define it over this retreat is one among many possible ways. But it's also a delineation that's based on a phenomenological approach, meaning just the observation of experience and what's actually happening in experience. But that observation is already informed and based on certain directions in practice to do with understandings of emptiness and also imaginal practice and notions of soul-making. Phenomenological observation is always informed by a conceptual framework and adds to that. But the definition we're using is based on what is really observed in experience in that territory.

So not about right or wrong—that's the first thing—but what's it serving, and how can we define it in a way that serves our purposes.

The second thing is a more general point about definitions and delineations that has to do with something philosophers call the hermeneutic circle. Hermeneutics is a word that basically means interpretation. It emerged as a word in terms of the study of sacred texts and scriptures: what does it actually mean, this text? How should we interpret when the Buddha said this, or in some tantric text it says that, or actually the Bible or whatever?

It has to do with parts and wholes. If I'm looking at a text or if I have this concept of Eros, it's one part within a much larger whole. This word that I want to interpret in the text, or the text itself, is part of a much larger group. The word is part of a much larger group of words that make up the text, and the text itself is part of a much larger, probably, group of texts, or stream of tradition, or historical context, or whatever. I can't fully understand the part unless I understand the whole.

In this case, we can't actually take Eros on its own and understand it without understanding the other parts of a bigger whole—what we're calling this integrated vision of practice, integrated conceptual framework or architecture of practice that involves imaginal practice and soul-making. I can't really take Eros separate from those and hope to understand it.

But similarly, the conundrum of the hermeneutic circle is I can't understand the whole until I understand the particular parts. I certainly won't understand the whole text unless I understand the individual words within it, and I won't even understand this text unless I have a bigger understanding of tradition and the group of texts that it involves.

This applies actually to everything. It even applies to our understanding of mindfulness. To understand, or to move closer to an understanding of what the Buddha meant by mindfulness, we actually need to understand the whole of the path and the whole of his Dharma, because mindfulness is situated within that Dharma. Its meaning and its directions and what it draws on and the assumptions—all of that has a place, a context. I can't really understand mindfulness until I've understood the whole of the Dharma and what the Buddha was shaped by and opened with that. Similarly, I can't really understand the whole of the Dharma unless I understand the individual elements of it.

But it's the same here in relation to Eros. Eros is, as I said, tied in with a whole other web of concepts. To take it out on its own and try to define it is actually not strictly speaking possible. It's still helpful, and that's what I'm going to do as a starting point, but it's woven together with other notions, ideas, concepts, and experiences.

Everything that I've mentioned so far—all these words that I've sometimes thrown out without fully explaining—will be elaborated over the course of the retreat. Because of this hermeneutic circle, because of this contextualization and the place that something like Eros occupies within a larger framework of ideas and experiences, we're going to have to move back and forth between small vision and big vision, tying things together. We're going to elaborate what Eros means over quite a long time, and I ask for your patience with that. This approach is necessary and will give us a much richer, deeper, fuller understanding that's actually much more helpful.

The third consideration about definition in relation to Eros specifically is that Eros classically is a god, a divinity. Divinities are, by their nature, not fully fathomable, not fully capturable in concept. They have some kind of infinitude to them, and so they're not fully definable. That doesn't mean we shouldn't venture certain concepts—and I'll explain much more later why we can't avoid conceptuality, and actually why conceptuality is necessary and part of the erotic movement itself. What's crucial is expanding conceptuality, not limited or fixed or stuck conceptuality. That's where the challenge lies.

It's not that we simply say, "Oh, it's divine, it's infinite, it's undefined," and then shrug and forget about it. Then we don't amplify that quality. It doesn't come alive to us as an area of interest. But we can use concepts while never hoping to completely capture it. In some traditions, actually, Eros is a semi-divinity—a demigod existing between the divine and the not-divine. This may allow us to approach it, or at least part of it, through some conception.

We'll return to all this business about conceptuality. But having acknowledged these caveats and qualifications and complications about definitions, let's start with a really simple definition—just to get us started. Bearing in mind that we can't capture it completely, bearing in mind that it involves many other concepts, and that it's not simply right or wrong, let's begin with a relatively simple definition.

I say that Eros is a desire—a kind of desire, a wanting. But wanting what? It wants more contact. It wants more contact, more connection with what we could call its object, or whatever erotic object we're talking about. We're going to use that language frequently. "Erotic object" means what Eros is in relationship to, or the beloved, if you prefer more poetic language.

So Eros wants more contact and connection with the erotic object. Now, because these words—"contact" and especially "connection"—have become so commonly used that they've almost lost their power, I'm going to elaborate this a little.

It wants more contact and connection. It wants to touch the erotic object more. I'm using these words quite broadly. What does it mean to touch? Does touch just mean skin touching something? Certainly it means that, but it means much more. What does it mean to touch? Consider the fullness of that word and how we can touch things—with what dimensions of our being and our psyche can touch things. It wants to touch more of the erotic object.

It wants to know more. It wants to know the object more. It wants to know the beloved more. And again, that word know—think of the fullness of what that word means. "I want to know you." I'm really using these words quite broadly here.

It wants to experience more of the beloved, more of the erotic object. So it seeks intimacy. Eros is a wanting to penetrate the erotic object more, to open more to the beloved, to open to more of the erotic object, to penetrate more of the erotic object, and to be penetrated more. These words—penetrate, open—are also words with sexual connotations, and that's deliberate. But we're not limiting ourselves to that.

Using these words broadly, eros is the wanting of more contact, more connection, more touch, more knowing, more experience of—to experience more of, to have more intimacy, more penetration, more opening to the erotic object or beloved.

Now that erotic object could be anything. Anything. Outer, so-called outer or inner. Anything. The erotic object can be anything.

Notice also in this simple definition the emphasis on that word more. I don't know the classical myth well, but Eros always goes along with another god called Pothos. P-O-T-H-O-S is another Greek word, and Pothos is the infinite desire, or the desire for the infinite. It's always the more. This is the more. Pothos has something—it always wants to move on to something else. When it's got something, it wants more, more, more.

I'm going to say that pothos is a part of eros. When we talk about eros, it implies and involves and has as an intrinsic element pothos, and that's the more. It wants more touching, more knowing of, more experience of, more penetration, more opening to.

You might be thinking, "That's not a very interesting definition." It's quite a humble definition in a way, really starting quite simple. In some senses, it's quite broad. In others, it's quite narrow. You might think it's a bit disappointing, or maybe not a big deal.

But my contention, and what I hope you'll at some point be convinced by, is actually the beauty of this way of defining it. You will begin to see slowly, hopefully more and more, the power of it as a way of thinking about eros. It has all kinds of implications and consequences that emerge from it, that are wrapped up—not so obviously, but intrinsically—and create the beauty and the fullness, the richness, and the multi-directionality of what eros actually is and what it does.

Again, notice that eros is not the same as sexuality or sexual attraction or sexual energy. It includes that in our definition. That's certainly part of it. Sexuality is one dimension of that, one manifestation of it at a certain level and in a certain direction.

We're also not equating it with Freud's pleasure principle—the seeking of pleasure and pleasant sensations, which would be akin to one of the Buddha's lists of what craving or clinging involves. Pleasure is certainly involved, and I'm going to come back to this in eros. But that's not actually what eros is after.

Nor are we equating it with what Freud would call the life instinct versus the death instinct, or even the life force—just the sort of life energy. Nor love.

The way we're using the word eros, we're not equating it with all of these. There is a relationship between the way we're using the word eros and each of those, but they're not equal. In some instances, eros is the bigger concept—for instance, in relation to sexuality.

In other instances of these other definitions, eros would be the smaller concept.

I would say eros is a part, or an element of life force—or better, a certain direction or manifestation of life force. We as beings have a certain amount of life force at any time, or just in our existence, and eros would be one directionality and one manifestation of the way that life force expresses itself.

Eros, as I said, is one kind of desire. Craving would be another kind of desire. Craving for sense pleasures would be yet another kind of desire.

But notice something else. In some traditions and ancient traditions that continue to this very day—I think it came either from the Platonic teachings or from the Neoplatonic tradition—there was a mystic and sage and philosopher with the wonderful name of Dionysus the Areopagite. Actually, this person I'm talking about had the even more wonderful name of Pseudo-Dionysus the Areopagite, because it seems, for very complex reasons, he was pretending to be the other person, Dionysus the Areopagite, who had lived a few hundred years before.

Anyway, this Dionysus the Areopagite, among other teachers, defines eros as really that force that moves towards unification, towards union, towards melting in oneness. We are not defining it that way. This is important. This is quite common in some psychologies and some spiritual teachings, but we're not defining it that way.

There is a relationship between this movement towards unification, though it's actually more complex. Go back to our definition: eros is this desire, this wanting for more contact, more connection, more touch, more touching, more knowing, more experiencing, more intimacy, more penetrating and opening to the beloved or the erotic object.

So there's a relationship with the movement towards unifying, but—and we're going to elaborate this, both of us will elaborate this much more—eros will always want more. It will always want more, which means more of this connecting, touching, opening to, which means that either it will resurrect a twoness, it will resurrect the beloved object after an experience of oneness or union, or it creates or discovers more of the other, other othernesses, other things to reach towards in the object. It complexifies this. We're going to explain this much more.

Or it simply does not go towards union. It does not move towards dissolution, towards union, towards melting, towards a collapsing of the twoness into oneness. So either it does, but then it will re-instigate, re-create or discover—this is something we'll come back to—create or discover other othernesses, or recreate a kind of more of the beloved other to move towards. Or it will simply resist somehow that collapse to oneness. It will preserve the twoness—the self, if you like, and the erotic other, the erotic object, the beloved other. Much more about that later, but this is a really important point.

So how do we recognize eros? How do we recognize the presence of eros in our experience, in our life, in our meditations, in our relationships?

I remember teaching many years ago and giving some instructions on mind states, emphasizing the awareness of developing sensitivity to how the mind state was reflected in and affected the body and the experiences in the body, and also just the general texture of the mind space. My two co-teachers commented afterwards and said that they thought some people just would never be able to do that, or couldn't do that, and that a much better way of going about it was to say that you recognize the mind state through the thoughts—the kind of thoughts you have tell you what mind state you're in. So if you have angry thoughts, you know that you're angry.

All I can say for now, and actually for the way that I would conceive of this whole set of teachings and the Dharma in general, is that we need, as practitioners, to develop our sensitivity and the subtlety of our awareness to be able to notice mind states—if we're calling eros a mind state or a state of being—to develop the sensitivity to that without relying on the clues and cues of thoughts. Seeing how the energy body is affected, developing the sensitivity to that, to the textures of mind and the space of mind, the subtle mental movements that are there even when there is no thought, or that exist underneath or alongside thought.

In a way, I stand by that in the sense that I can't really see how the kinds of things we're talking about and the capacity to work with them in practice would even be remotely possible without those kinds of sensitivities. We're talking about developing practice in a way that demands quite a lot, and one of the basic things it demands is a sensitivity to the energy body and a more subtle sensitivity in general to the mind.

But this ties into a point I've said before and repeat again: when we talk about eros, like everything, we're talking about a spectrum. It can be incredibly intense and in a way quite gross and obvious, or really, really quite subtle. And somehow we want—if we're going to explore it and investigate it and include it as part of our reach of what the Dharma means and our practice means and our path means—then we're going to have to be sensitive and recognize its presence and be able to work with it across that whole realm of subtlety and intensity.

That means we can handle and work with and not get bowled over by really intense eros. We'll come back to that whole question about balance. And also that we can recognize and work with it when it's really very subtle, and that it's still recognizable, sensible and fruitful.

Also, you'll notice, kind of implicit in the definition and part of recognizing eros, is that eros involves attraction.

There is attraction in eros. Once more, more X, Y, Z, as we said. So attraction is implicitly part of the force of attraction that one can recognize in oneself and feel and actually explore. It's attracted to what, as I said.

But included in that, or because of that, or with that attraction, eros has this felt tension in it. So eros usually involves some degree of tension, often because of the more, you see, because of the more. It always wants more, or because, and as well, because as I mentioned, the attraction towards the erotic object is not dissolved. Or if it's dissolved, it's only temporarily dissolved in union.

There's an element in eros, if you like, that preserves the otherness and therefore the tension of the two and the tension of the attraction. The attraction doesn't lead to oneness as a final resting - certainly either at all or as a final resting place in which that oneness, there's no more tension of the desire. So always, to say it again, there's the preservation of otherness or the creation of more otherness, so to speak - more of this object, more dimensions of this object and therefore more otherness, or the discovery, if you like, of more to the object and more otherness, more to move into with this attraction, with the directionality of the desire.

So you can already see it's simple, but it's already quite complex. And we're going to go into this thing about two-ness and one-ness and preserving otherness and all that. We're going to go into that more, as I said.

But recognizing eros - again, eros often has a certain, what we might call, juiciness to it. Now, that's quite interesting, too. The word libido, which some people use interchangeably with eros... The word libido is related to the word lips and the moisture of lips, the drippings of pleasure. I'm taking this etymology both from James Hillman and also from Onions, who wrote a book about the history of Western thought and certain concepts and traces them through history.

Libido is related to the meaning of drippings of pleasure, juices, libation - our word libation - drink, the excitations of lust, the pouring of liquid, as in libation, as I said, to... deliquarius, to make liquid, to make something a liquid or to melt. It's also related to the Latin word litus, which is moistness or fatness or fruitfulness. That's very key to our definition of eros - fruitfulness and gladness.

And also related to the German lieben, which is love, as well as to the word liber in Latin, which means free. And the god... Liber was a fertility god, a procreative figure. It's also related to something you may have heard me say in other talks about the necessity to make all things liquid. Alchemical maxims - don't proceed until all things have been made liquid. In other words, not reified.

So eros, in its connection with the word libido, all this is wrapped up. Actually, we will be using the word libido when we even use it as meaning more something like psychic energy in general, the energy of the psyche. But anyway, it's related. And juiciness seems to be a part of the erotic experience, a part of the experience of eros.

Part of the reason for juiciness is that, and this is something we're going to have to explain in more detail later, is that eros always invokes, stimulates or involves or is involved with the imaginal and soul-making. Eros always invokes, is involved with or involves and stimulates the imaginal and the soul-making. I'll explain more about this later. And that process of soul-making is in itself rich. And so eros brings more richness. This whole process of soul-making is a rich process and a juicy process.

So attraction, tension, juiciness, the imaginal - I'll come back to that - or image is part of eros or involved with eros as part of how we recognize it.

All this implies a kind of dynamism. So there's the dynamism of the attraction towards the object. That's also recognizable as a feature of eros. There's this dynamism of attraction towards the erotic beloved. But there's also the dynamism of what I just referred to, and I'll elaborate much more as the retreat goes on - this dynamism of the stimulation of the soul-making process, which is a dynamic process. It involves movement, expansion, complication, enrichment, widening, deepening of image, of what we might call psyche, and also of conceptuality. So there's a dynamism involved in eros that has to do with that dynamic. It's not always obvious at first. It's the dynamism of the attraction to the object that's more obvious. But actually what it turns out is the object that we're attracted to is more the complex of image, idea, eros itself. That becomes the object - much more about this later.

But there, as I said, if we're recognizing eros, there's attraction, juiciness, tension, dynamism, arousal. Arousal is also a part of the erotic experience. Now, we don't necessarily mean sexual arousal, although of course that's a part of it, can be, or perhaps even measurable or observable psychophysical arousal that a person might measure with electrodes or something or other.

But this arousal involved with Eros is truly an arousal of interest. We speak of the spark as well—there's an arousal of Eros, of interest. We become deeply interested in this beloved, where something engages us, compelling in the best sense of the word. It's captivating, again, in the best sense of the word. The interest is aroused.

And also the energy body is aroused, by which I mean the energy body is energized. It will feel energized, it will feel open, and it will probably feel aligned. I've talked about this in past retreats when discussing how the energy body works in imaginal practice. But it's also a feature of when there is Eros—the energy body is also aroused.

This arousal can be very intense, very, very intense, or really quite subtle, and it may be relatively unagitated. There's often quite a peaceful feeling with it. Not always, but often.

There's also an aspect—which I think I will leave until later when we more fully explain what I mean by this soul-making dynamic, Eros psyche logos—but I'll just mention it now: autoeroticism. What becomes for us an erotic object also involves ourselves and involves our Eros. So the Eros itself becomes erotically beautiful to us, our own Eros, and ourselves also. This we call autoeroticism. I'll return to that hopefully in the next talk.

Now, let's introduce another slight delineation here in relation to some of what we just said. I'm going to make a distinction between two words: delight and bliss. Again, no claim whatsoever that this is a correct dictionary definition or the right definition. But let's use the term delight and say that Eros usually is accompanied by or involves delight.

Delight is involved with erotic experience, by which I mean a sense of fullness, of richness, of aliveness, of interest, as we just said. The delight of soul-making—of this enriching process, this expanding process that soul-making is. We can say, axiomatically, the soul loves soul-making. It's almost a circular definition of the soul. What's the soul? The soul is what loves soul-making. It loves this dynamic, this process of soul-making, of Eros, psyche, logos, and the mutual fertilization, expansion, deepening, enriching, widening.

So soul-making, I wonder, is intrinsically delightful. And Eros, because it goes with all that, almost always has a sense of delight with it. You could say that's part of juiciness, but let's say that's specific to the soul-making quality.

Now, Eros may involve bliss, and again, I'm just creating a definition here for our purposes, defining bliss as an experience of the energy body—of great pleasantness in the energy body, of rapture or joy in the energy body, and that kind of openness. Sometimes, again, very intense, sometimes much more subtle.

But that energy body experience of bliss, I would say, accompanies any lightening or unfabricating, to whatever degree, of the self sense—up to a certain point at least. When you get really deep unfabricating, I'm not sure you can really use the word bliss at all, when you get into the deeper jhānas.

So you can have bliss without Eros, or without delight, or without soul-making. For example—and I'll come back to this too—the bliss of the first jhāna or the third jhāna may or may not be soul-making. In itself, in some ways, it's not, for reasons I'll explain. It's just bliss without Eros and without soul-making delight, the delight of soul-making. And of course, sometimes you can have delight in soul-making without bliss quite often, without that sort of strong feeling in the energy body.

But basically, Eros usually involves delight or is accompanied by delight, and it may involve bliss.

So recognizing Eros—let me run through these again. There's a big spectrum of intensity and subtlety. It involves attraction, that's implicit in it. It includes some kind of felt tension, juiciness certainly, richness of experience, dynamism of different kinds, arousal of interest and of the energy body, autoeroticism which I'll return to, delight usually accompanies it, and it may involve bliss—this pleasantness, these rapturous or joyful, peaceful, beautiful feelings in the experience of the energy body.

These are some of the elements for recognizing Eros in a very simple way, with some caveats. We're going to see what that does and expand and enrich the very definition or delineation of Eros, really filling it out over the retreat. We'll put it in relationship to other concepts. But these are some of the elements of recognizing the experience.

Already you see in some of what we're talking about, it's hard to go too far without bringing in other elements or parts of this web or architecture of ideas and experiences and delineations that we're going to try to unfold as part of this wider, integrated, more far-reaching conceptual framework or path. So that's what we're going to begin to do—start to draw it together and draw in some of these ideas and involve them in each other.

Dilemmas and Delineations: How did we get here?! (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 1h19

> In this detailed exposition, Rob Burbea addresses how his teachings on eros and desire relate to broader Buddhist understanding by providing a comprehensive glossary of 20 fundamental terms. He begins by acknowledging that his work represents a significant departure from conventional Insight Meditation approaches, explaining how his phenomenological method—focusing purely on what appears in experience without metaphysical assumptions—naturally led to concepts like soul, divinity, and eros.
> Burbea methodically defines each term, from foundational concepts like 'phenomenological approach' and 'ways of looking' to more advanced ideas like 'cosmopoiesis' and the 'Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic.' He explains how fabrication and emptiness relate to imaginal practice, distinguishing between eros (soul-making desire) and craving (contractive desire). Key concepts include the energy body as a mode of attention, soul-making as activities that generate soulfulness, and theophany as particular appearances of the divine.
> This talk serves as both exploration and reference guide, helping practitioners understand how these teachings evolved naturally from simple mindfulness practice while maintaining compatibility with emptiness teachings. Burbea emphasizes that these concepts refer to experiential realities available to anyone who doesn't a priori rule them out, while acknowledging their empty nature—just as we use concepts like 'self' while understanding their lack of inherent existence.

So, as we've already said, what we mean by eros—the way we are using that term—is actually woven in and related to and indissolubly bound up with and connected to a whole range of other terms that we're using with specific meanings to form a kind of larger conceptual framework. There's a whole web of relationships and implied meanings there. So we can't really unpack what we mean by eros without beginning to include more of those terms and say a little bit about those other notions and a little bit about what the relationships are. But this whole edifice, this whole architecture, this conceptual framework will unfold gradually. There's quite a lot to it, in a way. So I want to begin doing that now.

Just before I do, I'm aware that I'm referring to what is now really quite a large body of work. When we think about all the material on emptiness and dependent arising and imaginal practice and re-enchantment and all that, it's actually quite a large body of work together with this piece on eros. So if someone who is coming from the Insight Meditation tradition or something like that were to just pick a talk at random and listen to that talk, they would probably be baffled, puzzled, probably even maybe shocked, perhaps even outraged. What is this? What is he talking about? What are they talking about? How on earth did we get here? These words—soul, eros, divinity, even the word God, cosmopoiesis, whatever that means—what on earth is he talking about? How did he get there? This is really pretty far out. And is this Buddhism?

Now, I've touched on that last question before. It may be, in some respects, quite an interesting question. In other respects, it might not be interesting at all. What's more interesting about it to me is why is a person asking such a question, and what assumptions and fantasies are operating for them, and what—in our language—what soul styles can we approach this material with in its relationship to, let's say, more conventional interpretations of Dharma. And I've talked about that before; I'm not going to repeat it here.

But just to say that I would say this body of material needs listening to, studying, practicing with—all that material around emptiness, but certainly around the imaginal material—in series. In other words, it adds up. And in that way, only then can a person see and understand what is meant in these teachings. But we'll also hopefully understand, if a person does that—listens, studies, ponders and practices in series—that there is what I would say an almost inevitable or natural evolution of this material. It evolved, if you like, naturally. The doors were presented one after another. The consequences, the avenues were traveled in a kind of logical or inevitable order. One insight, one opening led to another, and so on.

All based on what we might call the phenomenological approach, which is how I would base my approach to Dharma—very, very simple, starting with very, very simple practices, including ideas of mindfulness, but not based on the usual assumptions. This is what makes a phenomenological practice: not based on the usual assumptions, but based on just what do I have as a human being? I have experience. I have what appears to me. Phenomena means appearance. And just basing it on: this is experience, and what can I discover about experience?

And introducing into that very quickly, one discovers, oh, well, I can look at it this way, and I can look at it that way. I can relate to it this way, that way. So the ideas of ways of looking and fabrication eventually come out of that, because I see some ways of looking fabricate differently than others. So all this unfolds—very, very simple practice, just not based on the usual assumptions. Just suspending them, opening them, relating to what actually is here. Experience is here. Appearance is here. Without other assumptions.

And all this leads to other concepts and other ways of framing what's happening. And out of that comes a freedom and certain conceptual frames, or the availability to look in different ways and to conceive in different ways. If one doesn't understand all that...

If we press a little, if we investigate a little more deeply, we discover that these terms —self, matter, life—are actually quite mysterious. The more we examine them, the more elusive they become. What exactly do we mean when we say "I"? What precisely constitutes matter when we look closely enough to discover it's mostly empty space, energy patterns, quantum fluctuations? What is this thing we call life that seems to animate biological systems?

The same mysterious quality applies to words like soul, divinity, or God. They point toward something in experience, something we can sense or feel, but when we try to pin them down conceptually, they reveal the same kind of fundamental mystery that we find in our most basic, seemingly solid concepts.

So there's a kind of strange inconsistency, if you like, or perhaps an unexamined bias in readily accepting and using words like self and matter and life, while simultaneously dismissing words like soul or divinity as somehow less real or more speculative. In terms of their ultimate nature, in terms of what they actually refer to when we look deeply, they're all equally mysterious, all equally empty, and yet all pointing toward dimensions of experience that are undeniably present.

The question becomes: are we willing to open our practice and our investigation to include the full range of what might be available to experience? Or do we limit ourselves based on the current cultural assumptions about what's acceptable to acknowledge or explore?

This doesn't mean we have to believe anything in particular about these words or concepts. It simply means we remain open to what might reveal itself in experience when we don't foreclose possibilities from the outset. Just as we've learned to hold our sense of self lightly—recognizing its conventional reality while understanding its ultimate emptiness—we can learn to hold these other dimensions of experience in a similar way.

The practice, then, becomes one of radical openness while maintaining the discriminating wisdom that comes from understanding emptiness. We neither grasp at these experiences as ultimately real nor dismiss them as mere fantasy. We allow them to arise and inform our understanding while recognizing their fluid, constructed, and ultimately mysterious nature.

But yes, but what do you mean by that? And if you kept pushing this question, probing with this inquiry, without a doubt it would pretty quickly reveal just how vague the notions of self are—but also the notions of life, and even matter. How full of assumptions they are, how often not well thought out, full, as I said, of assumptions and presumptions that don't actually really bear much scrutiny, much probing. And these can be pretty quickly revealed to be without secure foundations.

Even matter—I mean, you just have to know, well, maybe a fair amount about modern physics, and it's like, matter, this most obvious thing, at a certain point becomes: what are we actually talking about here? And when we talk about it, what are we assuming and presuming, and what is the basis for assuming that? Can we be absolutely secure in those assumptions? Or we find out that it's resting on a set of assumptions, or the definition itself—of self, of matter, of whatever it is—is full of contradictions.

All this applies equally to notions of divinity and soul. They're vague notions. They rest on other assumptions. Any assumptions—you push them deep enough and you're going to come to something you just have to assume without knowing it's an absolute truth. In other words, it has no secure foundations. And a lot of notions actually end up being kind of circular in their definition, as you'll see when we talk about soul.

In fact, that's probably true about everything. There's a kind of assumptionality and vagueness and kind of incoherence or circularity, self-contradictoriness about everything—anything you might name or point to or use as a concept or experience.

Okay, so all that as a kind of precursor. And I'm also aware, of course, that as I said, there's a lot of material here. There's a lot of material on this retreat. There's a lot when you add it to the other retreats and the whole thing about emptiness and imaginal—it's really quite a lot. And it's hard, you know, I appreciate it. It's hard to kind of keep it all in mind, especially hard if you're not practicing with this material in a really exploratory way. And also, a lot of these ideas are not necessarily always so simple or easy to understand, so I fully appreciate that.

And by now, what's happened is that someone very often says, "What do you mean when you say X or when you say Y or when you say cosmopoiesis or this?" And I know that that person has heard me explain it or unfold it at maybe even some length in other talks in the past. And yet still they're asking. So this is very, very normal, very understandable.

So partly what I want to do now in exploring this web is also to hopefully have it function as a bit—somewhere between a kind of exploration of the whole web of ideas and a glossary, a kind of, if you like, glossary of terms. Which is a pretty, I think, strange thing to try and do in a talk, in a recorded talk format, rather than a book where you can just flip to that page and quickly look it up. But I'm hoping it will be helpful. I'm hoping you just know this is the glossary talk and I can just go there and find it and it's about this time in or whatever. But it is pretty strange. So I hope it's helpful. I hope it's not too dry. Hopefully it will serve.

So I made a list of twenty terms. It's also strange because each of these terms... I'm going to be pretty brief. That's the whole point, trying to be quite brief. But each of these terms refer to a wide range of experience and things that I've talked about at much more length. So it's not always easy to kind of sum them up very succinctly. So somewhere between a very brief glossary and a sort of looking at the relationships and filling it out a little bit.

Alright? So, twenty terms.

Number one is... Actually, we just used it a minute or two ago. Phenomenological approach. The phenomenological approach.

So, phenomena in Greek means appearance—that which appears. Now, in my life, what I have is appearances. The assumption that this or that is underneath appearances, or it's really matter, or perceptions come from the brain—this is all assumptions. What I have is appearances, phenomena.

I use the words appearances, experiences, and perceptions interchangeably. So what I have is appearances, what I have is perceptions, what I have is experiences. That's what I have as a human being.

In the phenomenological approach, I don't add the assumption that everything comes from the neurophysiology of the brain and that's what gives rise to perceptions. Nor do I approach from a metaphysical perspective that first there is God or beingness or some foundational reality. It's simply that there are appearances. Let's just relate to appearances and see what we can discover.

This is what makes the phenomenological approach so powerful for me—it's a very potent gateway into understanding emptiness and also the imaginal.

One of the proto-phenomenologists, William James, a psychologist and philosopher, held that anything arising in experience was worthy of phenomenological investigation. This includes images, apparent psychic phenomena—whatever appears. Basically, whatever appears to me, I can relate to as a phenomenon and investigate it. I can explore the relationships that function around that thing, whether it's an image, a worldly perception, or something from the different senses. Even an idea is appearance.

All of this is worthy of investigation. Of course there are differences between these domains of appearance, but still—they're all appearance.

What I believe is that if we go deeply enough and radically enough with this phenomenological approach, it can actually open what we might call metaphysical philosophy. We'll return to that later.

The second fundamental concept is ways of looking. This isn't just looking with the eyes, but ways of sensing, ways of knowing, ways of perceiving. It refers to the perspective being employed now and includes the relationship with whatever object I'm perceiving—internal, external, whatever it might be.

Am I grasping at it? Am I pushing it away? Am I seeing it as self or not-self? These are all different ways of looking. Wrapped up in every way of looking is the conceptual framework—the whole collection of conditioning factors in the perceiving that creates the way of looking.

There's always a way of looking. Most of the time, unless you're deeply engaged in this kind of practice, the way of looking remains unconscious. We're not aware of everything involved in our way of looking. Most human beings have very little range or flexibility in their ways of looking—they can only shift them slightly on a gross level.

I see insight meditation practice as the cultivation of a whole range of ways of looking, really developing flexibility and breadth of ways of looking in practice, in ways that have powerful effects.

Related to this is the third concept: fabrication. As we experiment with ways of looking through the phenomenological approach, we begin to see that perceptions, appearances, and experiences are fabricated more or less depending on the way of looking.

Some ways of looking fabricate more perception—a more solid sense of self that feels more separate and contracted. They also create objects that appear more separate, solid, real, and often oppressive. This extends to our whole sense of the world and other phenomena like time and space.

There's a spectrum of fabrication. Different ways of looking fabricate more or less, ranging from extremely gross, solid, and oppressive fabrications to much less fabricated perceptions, down to not fabricating at all. What's fabricated includes dukkha—dis-ease and suffering—but also the sense of self, the sense of object, the sense of world, the sense of time. All of it.

The fourth concept is emptiness. These ideas of ways of looking and fabrication emerging from the phenomenological approach offer a very powerful way of understanding emptiness.

Emptiness means that nothing exists in what's called inherent existence—in a way that's independent of the way of looking, independent of the mind observing it. It's the way of looking that makes something appear as a thing, that makes it seem like a separate, independently existing entity.

Without the way of looking, without being fabricated by the way of looking, there is no appearance of that thing.

You can also approach emptiness analytically and discover that the whole notion of things that seem so real, so solid, so independently existent is actually incoherent. Things are unfindable. That's another gateway into understanding emptiness.

Everything is empty, without question.

So even, not just all selves and all things, but... And that means any notion of self. So even the self as process, not a real thing. It's just arising as a way of looking. It's a relative degree of fabrication. But awareness is empty too. Actually, even the notion of fabrication is empty too. In other words, it's not really real. It's a kind of construct that we see.

Actually, there's a way of going deeper and deeper into the whole teaching of fabrication as a practice. You find out that fabrication too is kind of incoherent. It cannot be a reality.

Dependent origination, similarly it's empty. All those twelve links, or thirteen, or ten, or whatever system you're using, all of them are lacking inherent existence. They don't refer to real units of existence, or units of being, or realities, or entities, or whatever.

The unfabricated actually also turns out to be empty, and the whole distinction then between what's unfabricated and fabricated also illusory. Emptiness as well is also empty. So empty is a very radical, pervasive concept. Everything without question is empty.

What we end up with then, we start with this notion of ways of looking, and we end up with this really radical, thorough insight that in the end, there are only ways of looking. The ways of looking are empty too, but all we have is a range of ways of looking which we can expand, and that's not realities, that's ways of looking. And those ways of looking also don't inherently exist. But all we have, all we come to, the freedom that we come to is there are just ways of looking.

Something very beautiful, very radical, very profound in that insight. And extremely far-reaching.

So, in traditional Dharma approach, we, as I said... the idea of ways of looking, we channel that into the direction of which are the ways of looking that bring more suffering or lock suffering into place, and which are the ways of looking that ease suffering. So the whole concept of ways of looking in the narrow Dharma sense is tied up very much with the Four Noble Truths, with what leads to suffering and what leads to the ease of suffering.

But in exploring ways of looking, we also see that there's other directions that don't have, at least don't obviously have much to do with suffering and the end of suffering that can open up. So a way of looking can open up, for example, soul-making more or less. Or cosmopoiesis, more or less. And they are related to freedom and ending suffering, reducing suffering, but sometimes not in a very obvious way.

Okay, so that's the fourth: emptiness.

The fifth: the words imaginal and image. So when I use the word image, I mean an imaginal image, which means definitely not just imaginary—i.e., just completely fictitious. It also doesn't have to be, as we think, image has to be something visual. It doesn't. It can involve any of the senses and quite unusual ways of knowing and ways of perceiving things. But it also refers to more than just the use of the imagination.

So just using the imagination does not mean imaginal. Nor even if an image comes and it has a kind of mythic character—I don't know, dragons and... You know, even Jesus or, whatever, or some classic archetypal figure or something—it may not be imaginal.

An image is an image for me, or imaginally functioning for me, is an imaginal for me, if for me, at that time, it has a kind of unfathomability to it, a depth to it, just, for example, in the way that a person does. So we would never... Hopefully. We would never say, this person, my friend X, she means this to me. Or she is this. It's like, I mean, we might say that, but we always know that that never captures her entirely. There's something I can't get to the bottom of her. Why? Because she's a person. She's a person. There's something unfathomable there.

I can't reduce her. If I do start reducing her, what's going to happen to my relationship with her? She's probably not going to stick around much. But similarly with imaginal figures, I can't capture them. They have this unfathomability. There's something beyond the reach of my grasp, that I can keep uncovering meanings and truths and dimensions to them, but I can't reduce them.

So I can't, or rather I'm not reducing them for them to be imaginal. I can't say this image is just a result of some random neurochemical reactions in my brain, or neurophysiological pathways being fired, or whatever. Nor can I reduce it in the way of saying this image is coming because it represents this from my childhood or this factor of my mind or something. So imaginal means not reduced. There's a sense of irreducibility to them.

It might encompass all of that or acknowledge all of that is involved—the neurophysiology of course is involved. It might have some bearing, we'll talk about this later, what's the relationship with my personal history and this image, but not reducing the image to the personal history, not seeing it as merely a result of the personal history.

So what is imaginal to me? An imaginal figure has a kind of otherness and a kind of autonomy—just like a person. It's like they're not part of me, I don't completely control them. So you can hear implicit in that: for something to be an image, it requires me to have a certain way of looking at it. Because if I start to see it as "no, no, no, this is just random neurochemistry or whatever. This dream that happened was just my brain randomly firing at night. That's what brains do"—then I have a way of looking there that's not imaginal and the image is resolved or reduced or I lose interest in it or whatever. It's no longer imaginal.

So in the meaning of the word image, it's not just an object—it includes the way of looking at that object. And we are kind of granting it a certain autonomy.

With that, because there's this unfathomability and they're not reducible, in time we sense a kind of—let's call it divinity—to the image. It's part of the dimensionality. So I keep finding more dimensions in this image, in the unfathomability of it. And all of this is meaningful. So that's part of what an image is—always meaningful in some way. It doesn't mean it means X or it means Y. It's meaningful as a much fuller, less tightly circumscribed term. And always with the imaginal is some kind of sense of beauty and some kind of sense of sacredness.

They may not at all be—they may be quite surprising senses of beauty. There's a breadth and a diversity to the kinds of beauties that can open up, and the kinds of sense of beauty and the sense of sacredness that can open up through imaginal practice. And oftentimes it's quite surprising that that's a feature of image and imaginal practice—beauty and sacredness.

Now, the imaginal and images—and I'll also use the word fantasies almost interchangeably with images, but maybe when it has a bit more of a narrative feel to it, I'll use the word fantasies—we don't just mean intra-psychic. These also relate to how we perceive the world. So images, fantasies come in, they pervade, they mix with, they saturate our perception of everything—of self, of other, of world, of being, of path. They operate in our life.

Some people say, "I don't get any images," meaning they don't get any intra-psychic images, sort of like "I shut my eyes and nothing comes." But images are in our life, and I would say where there is love, where we love deeply, where something's really alive for us, where something's really important to us, where something's really meaningful to us—there, image and fantasy are operating in our life in relation to and around that thing, whatever that thing is, if it's dharma or practice or a lover or... It can be absolutely anything. Where there is love, meaningfulness, importance, aliveness, there is image and fantasy.

Now, I'm going to throw in one more thing here in imaginal practice, which is that it involves also what I call seeing the image as an image, knowing it's an image. In other words, we're not taking this literally. If I have an image of having sex with someone, it doesn't mean I have to have sex with someone or I'm going to have sex. It doesn't mean that at all. I don't have to take it literally. But actually any image—it might have an outflow into life. But often that outflow is almost always not literal. It's always subtly refracted or modulated in life, in the way that it's expressed.

Seeing image as image doesn't mean if I have this image that I'm picking up something, some kind of ESP either, or whatever. Although, of course, there's that possibility too. But I'm not going to go into that distinction on this course. It also means, seeing image as image, that the ideas and the concepts that are perhaps wrapped up with the image are not taken as truth claims. I'm not saying this is the reality or this is true about whatever.

Image and Imaginal

The sixth term, very related, is soul-making, which we've used already. What is soul-making? It's anything—any activity or way of looking or way of being—that gives rise to a sense of soulfulness. We could use it in the way of meaning it's soulfulness-making. It's making the experience of soulfulness. And again, it could be anything, anything in relationship with anything at all. The way of being with it, the way of looking at it, the thing that I do with it or in relationship to it gives rise to a sense of soulfulness.

This is very related to the definitions of imaginal, but when there is soulfulness, there is a sense of importance, of deep importance. This thing is important to me. Strange as it might seem to someone else, this is important to me. It has a deep importance. It has a beauty to it. There's love involved, and often very different kinds of love—a very large range in the kind of expressions of love that are involved in soulfulness. There's meaningfulness. There are resonances.

Soul-making is recognized through its resonances in the heart, in the emotionality, its resonances in terms of image. An image has resonance with other images, and an image itself is resonant—with the energy body, which I'll come to in a little bit, and with ideas. Soul-making also gives a sense of dimensionality. It involves image and fantasy and also idea. I'm going to call this whole complex logos.

So soul-making means soulfulness-making in the sense that it creates that kind of gestalt, those kinds of experiences that refer to a sense of soulfulness. But soul-making can also mean making soul, making something called soul. So not just soulfulness as an adjective to describe a set of experiences, but also making something called soul.

The seventh term is indeed that word soul. Here, again, I can use it in two ways. I can use soul not in the sense of referring to an entity, but referring to a way of looking. Soul is just a way of looking that gives rise to soulfulness, that gives rise to soul-making. When I say soul, I'm just referring to it as a way of looking.

But I can also refer to soul as if it were an entity, or talk about it as an entity—an empty entity. Go back to what we said earlier about self. We talk about self as if it's an entity, but it's not. It's empty. Yet we still use the concept and we feel it as an entity at times. Similarly, we can talk about soul as if it was an entity.

What kind of entity? Well, it's that entity, that aspect of citta, if you like, that facet of citta or of being—it's that which sees or senses in a soul-making way. That's the entity of soul. It's that which sees in a soul-making way, and I meant all that before—with image, with fantasy, with meaningfulness, with depth, with dimensionality, and beauty and all that. That's soul.

So soul-making increases soul. It makes soul in the sense that it reinforces, it strengthens, it widens and deepens that entity or that capacity or that tendency to see in a soul-making way, to see in a way that gives rise to soulfulness, to see imaginatively and with meaningfulness and resonance and depth and beauty. Soul-making builds soul, it makes soul.

The eighth term is the energy body. Here I really mean—it can sound like we're talking about some thing, some kind of new age idea or esoteric sort of idea—but really I'm referring to a kind of mode of attending to the experience of body, a way of looking again if we go back to the phenomenological approach. Energy body really refers to that.

A way of attending to this space—actually a little bit bigger than what appears to be my physical body—and the feeling of that, the sense of that, yes, the image of it, but also the palpable sense of that field of vibration, texture, energy.

It's really important to stress here that there is a real spectrum, a wide spectrum in that experience, so that we can experience a very, very refined field of energy—very insubstantial, ethereal—and that's lovely and actually very important. Sometimes even that goes and there's just a sense of space, which is really at the absolute edge of what we might call energy body experience. But at the other end, there's also just the sense of something really dense and earthy and solid and very substantial—we can feel the energy body that way too.

So the energy body refers to that whole spectrum. It means more than just what many people are familiar with from, say, mindfulness practice or more conventional kinds of insight meditation practice—just this what can seem at times like a pulsing or flickering energy field of sensations or field of hot or cold or pressure. Yes, that's a certain kind of mode of attention or experience of the energy body, but it actually is much broader than that. There are ways of paying attention and experiencing energy body that are not like either that or the regular solidity we feel. There's really a whole range there.

That's energy body. That's the eighth.

The ninth is eros, which we've already defined in a small way, and we're going to expand it and make a bigger definition as we go along. So it's the desire—eros is a kind of desire. It's the wanting more contact, more connection, more touching, more experience of, or to experience more of, to know more or to know more of, to penetrate more or to penetrate more of, or to open more and to open to more of, to have more intimacy with some object, some erotic object, either in everyday perception or imaginally, intrapsychically.

Note that this is multidimensional, multifaceted. We're not just talking about a mental faculty here, some kind of vitakka-vicāra thing where you're just probing the object. I'll come back to that relationship. First of all, it's not just mental. It involves all the senses and it's embodied, which doesn't mean that it needs to manifest in actions.

But more importantly—and this is where the definition starts to get bigger—it involves and it pulls in and stimulates the imaginal and the ideational. So actually, when we talk about eros, we're talking about something that moves towards, that includes the imaginal and the ideational in certain ways, in ways that expand them and move towards soul-making.

So you can see that eros is the ninth term, and you can see eros is one kind of desire, if we use that word desire as the tenth term. And desire, we can maybe use it in a way that's more neutral or as a broader term, perhaps similar to the Pali word chanda. So desire would then include eros as a subset in the way that we've just described. When it does that, when the desire is of that kind, it's eros. But it would also include—desire would include craving and clinging and these kinds of words we've used before, which I'll come to in a minute. But the tenth is just desire as a kind of broad term of which there are different kinds. It's kind of a neutral term.

So that word craving is the eleventh term. And craving—we'll come back to this more—I'm going to say craving is a kind of desire that does not lead to soul-making. Actually it leads to a kind of contraction. Soul-making is an opening movement, and craving brings contraction. As I said, you can actually feel that in the being, in the body, in the energy body, and in the mind, and in lots of other ways, which we'll go into. Craving brings dukkha, in the way that we might use it to distinguish eros and craving, different kinds of desire. But craving is the eleventh term.

And maybe if I use the term clinging as the twelfth term, what I'm really referring to is that whole spectrum that I talked about in the first few talks, where you're really talking about something that can be very, very gross—gripping, "don't leave me," "I need you," that kind of clinging—to something really, really subtle. I'm talking about actually avijjā, just the belief that, the unconscious assumption that this thing, whatever this thing is—this emotion, this fingernail, this foot, this thing—is me or mine, unconsciously, without even thinking about it. Or even the avijjā that this thing, whatever this thing is, this moment of vedanā, or this lamp in front of me, has inherent existence. That's a very subtle level. That avijjā is a very subtle level of clinging. It's wrapped up in attention because the mind needs to cling in a very subtle way to actually perceive anything. But clinging, we might use it to refer to that whole spectrum in that broader sense.

That's the twelfth term, clinging.

The thirteenth term—I have to apologize here. I've used it already: libido, and I've already used it inconsistently, so apologies. In a way, it's because it's not, for me, well, at least not yet, that important a term. So apologies, and just to note, I have been inconsistent.

Sometimes I might use it in a way that's almost equivalent to the way I'm using eros, and I think that's the way James Hillman likes to use it. And so sometimes I might use it that way. I'm also thinking about using it to mean more something like libido as the embodied, directed, intentional flow of life force into any area or domain. So that might be a stream of creativity or work or relationship or building something or whatever. It might be a stream, it might be a trickle, it might be a torrent. In a way, it refers to psychic energy and the way that can be employed in different ways. I think that's equivalent to how Jung used the term, but I also read something recently where he sort of said that and then said something else, but he didn't really explain the alternative, and I couldn't find anything else. So I'm not sure how he uses it.

But it is a term that people use. For Freud I think it was just the pleasure principle in a way, or the instinct that came out of the id, that sort of pool of animalistic instincts, if you like, and the force often guided by pleasure principle and maybe other things. And that's the libido.

Sometimes Freud referred to it that way. For other people, it literally means sexual urge or desire. And there's also—some of you will know, and I'm going to return to this—a psychoanalyst who was very active in the 1950s and 60s, a Scotsman called Fairbairn, who used libido in a way that sounds at first similar to how we're using eros: a desire to connect. So people use it in very different ways.

It sounds similar, but actually I'm going to point out some differences later on in the retreat. So libido—people use it in very different ways. Sorry, I've already been sloppy and inconsistent there. All I can say is maybe the sloppiness and fluidity in the way I'm using it just reflects its etymology, which I already mentioned: libido, libation, liquid. This is the etymology—it's liquidy, so I'm quite fluid in my definitions. That's a pretty lame excuse. But I don't think we'll be using it much anyway. Anyway, apologies. That's the thirteenth term.

The fourteenth term is psyche. One meaning of psyche in the way that I use it is simply the totality of the citta—the psyche. In other words, the mind, but not reduced to the thinking mind—just the whole totality of citta. But another kind of inflection of the meaning refers especially to soul. So using it equivalently with soul in the way that I defined soul earlier in this talk as the organ of imaginal perception. So psyche as the organ of imaginal perception.

But there's a second way that I use it sometimes, and I really mean by psyche the totality of imaginal perceptions. Jung actually says psyche is image. So I'm using it sometimes as the totality of the citta, more often as equivalent with soul—the organ of imaginal perception—but quite a few times I will use it as the totality of imaginal perceptions, almost interchangeably with image.

Logos. So there's another Greek word—your eros, psyche, logos. Logos I'm using to refer to a concept or an idea or a whole conceptual framework. In other words, what we're elaborating here is a kind of conceptual framework. But any concept or any idea or any conceptual framework is a logos.

For example, when I say the autonomy of the imaginal figure—as if they have a degree of being independent of me—that's a concept, it's an idea, it's a logos that's operating in imaginal practice, even at the same time as we know it's a dependent arising, which is another logos. So you have mixtures of concepts operating at any time.

If I reduce the imaginal figure to, let's say, the product of random neuronal firings or conditioned neuronal firings, or it's expressing something from my childhood, or it's expressing an aspect of my personality—any kind of reduction of the imaginal figure involves a logos in operation. Any idea of causality—that this is a result of that in the past, for instance—is also a logos, a concept operating.

Another alternative would be what's called telos—there's another Greek word. I'm learning a lot of Greek in this retreat. Telos, which refers to almost like causality from the future. I've talked about this, I think, on the last retreat. That's a different logos, a different concept operating where something, so to speak, from the future beckons us and shapes the present. Very different idea, very different logos.

If we talk about the divinity of eros, which is something we'll come back to, that's a logos. Neuroscience as a whole is a whole conceptual framework, is a whole logos. The idea that consciousness arises from matter as an epiphenomenon of matter, of neurology—that's a logos. Actually, evolution itself is a whole conceptual framework, is a logos.

What I want to say is that there's always a conception, there's always a logos operating in the mind—always, always, always—except during experience of the unfabricated, when there's a collapse of conceptuality. By conceptuality and logos I don't just include thought structures and thoughts, but it goes way deeper than that. There's conceptuality operating even when there's no thought whatsoever.

Oftentimes the concepts operating are just assumed, not really checked out, and oftentimes they're operating—most of the time they're operating—without us really being conscious of what they are. But when I talk about logos, because it's wrapped up in perception, I'm not talking about something abstract. We live different ideas; different concepts shape how we live. They inform how we live, but more fundamentally they shape our way of looking. They're part of, they're included in the way we look at everything, and therefore what we perceive, what appears to us. So they have massive influence. I'm not talking about something abstract here. So the fifteenth is logos.

The sixteenth is what I'm going to call the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic, or the soul-making dynamic—these are interchangeable terms. I'm going to devote quite a lot of time to that on this retreat, but what it really means is that the more, the wanting more that we talked about with eros—more connection, more opening, opening to more of the erotic object, penetrating more, to know more, to experience more—

This wanting more, that push or wish to open more to the erotic object, starts bringing in, inseminating, influencing, expanding the psyche in relation to that object. In other words, the imaginal perception of that object. So more dimensionality is created and discovered in that object.

In my erotic connection with my lover, I start to see in her, I start to see in him, I start to see more, more dimensions. They're not just this person I can put in a box around. They're even more than just a human being, or rather the notion of humanity starts to expand and have other dimensions. And with that expansion of the psyche, they become richer, more complicated, deeper, wider. There's an expansion of psyche, of image, and also of logos. In other words, my whole idea of who they are, my idea then of what a human being is and what soul is, that gets expanded as well.

This is really, really important. When it gets expanded, they are then more yummy to me, more interesting, more attractive. It increases the eros there. And so there's a kind of self-feeding, self-generating, ongoing fertilization of Eros, mutual fertilization of Eros, Psyche, Logos, mutual widening, deepening, enriching, complicating, adding dimensionality that goes on. We can say much, much more about that.

When I refer to the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic, we'll also use the term soul-making dynamic for the same thing. That's that process, and we have a lot to say about that. It's very, very fundamental, I would say, in understanding this and a very central concept.

That's number 16, the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic.

Number 17 is this term cosmopoiesis. This is something I would say that we start to notice in imaginal practice. As we go into imaginal practice, we start to see that it begins to spill over. Even when I'm practicing with my eyes shut, I open my eyes after I've been working deeply with mindfulness and sensitivity with this imaginal figure. I open my eyes and there's a kind of spilling over to the perception of the world, to the world of perception. Something of the image, and something particularly of the divinity of the image, starts to pervade my sense of the cosmos that I feel myself to be part of. So this is something we notice.

It's also an instance of that whole Eros-Psyche-Logos expanding dynamic I was just referring to. It starts to expand beyond just the object but also to other objects and to the world. There are infinite possibilities for cosmopoiesis.

More typical ones involve a kind of universal cosmopoiesis. So for example, meditating a lot on metta, and eventually at some point a meditator will have the experience: the world is love. The cosmos is shot through with love. Now, you explain that to someone on the high street and they'll say, "What are you talking about?" It's a perception of the cosmos. It's a mystical perception, but it's characterized by universality. All things in the world are of the same substance. The substance is love.

It could be awareness. So if you practice a lot with vastness of awareness and other related practices, you get a similar thing. The cosmopoiesis there is also universal. Everything is awareness. Everything is the play of awareness.

But then there's also, rarer in our circles and more interesting for that very reason, particular cosmopoiesis. So this particular erotic, imaginal figure that I'm working with sensitively and mindfully in practice—then I get up and walk around and look at the world around me and I notice that the particularity of that figure that I was opening to and discovering and sensitive to in the practice comes to characterize the cosmopoiesis. So the whole world becomes this particular manifestation of, or flavored with, this particular imaginal figure and its characteristics, its particularities.

So cosmopoiesis—note that word poiesis in contrast to logos, or in contrast to logic. Cosmology is a word that people know. Cosmology means the study, the science of the universe. So we go and we hear about Big Bangs and all that stuff, which I love. It's absolutely fascinating to me.

The difference between cosmology and cosmopoiesis is the absence of a truth claim that goes with the cosmopoiesis. So we're recognizing that this is a creation of the way of looking. Or a better word is participation. We're participating in something.

The way of looking, the citta, the soul, is participating in the cosmos. So there's a participatory aspect of a kind of cosmopoiesis of the reality creating. And also cosmopoiesis, we're talking about poetic truths, if you like, here, which is something I've talked about before, which is different than the usual notion of scientific truth.

Now this also I've talked about before, there's a whole exploration into the philosophy of science and what's true and what's a model, and all that. And also to point out that when I use the words, so it's contrasting poiesis and logos, but actually when I use the word logos, in the way we're using it, we're not making a truth claim—other than that everything is empty, and even that actually we let go of at some point. Logos is just a concept that we can pick up, or a conceptual frame we can pick up without insisting or even believing it as true. But cosmopoiesis is the seventeenth one.

The eighteenth term is theophany. Theophany literally means an appearance of the divine. I think I gave a set of talks—no, it was the last five talks of the retreat, the path of the imaginal, that had the title something like Insight, Theophany, Cosmic Vision, Sacred Universe, something like that. So dealt with it a lot there. And in a way, the whole of the re-enchanting the cosmos retreat had to do with cosmopoiesis and theophany.

But theophany would refer to maybe when a particular thing or object becomes a particular face of the divine, or becomes a face of the divine. Again, that can be universal, but more I'm interested in the particular. So this—it really could be anything. This tree, or this person, or this body, or whatever, becomes a particular face of the divine. Or this imaginal figure is a particular theophany. It's a face of God, if you like. It's a face of the divine. That's the eighteenth term, theophany.

The nineteenth term is divinity. And again, this is something that we notice. I'm using it very broadly, so I'm actually not defining, but if you like, it refers to a kind of unfathomability, mystery, otherness, including of transcendence—all of that. But actually the notions are really quite wide of what that might involve. But it's something I'd rather leave to your experience and just say, notice with images as you work with them when they become really alive that they have this kind of numinous quality. It's something we notice constantly rather than we define it. So you'll notice in imaginal practice that more and more, with an image, when you get used to it, it has this kind of quality of divinity. So it's part of its otherness.

But just to say a little bit about that also—that word, you know, standard insight meditation will bring experiences of divinity of certain kinds. The whole range, actually various experiences of divinity, mystical experiences, I would say would be inevitable for meditators, meditating with dedication and consistently with insight meditation techniques and approaches. The question is, so for example, that big awareness thing, everything is awareness. It really feels, or everything is love. It really feels like there is a divinity to that love. This is—the cosmos is shot through with a divine love. This awareness has somehow the sense that people often talk, they never have before, they start talking in theistic terms of love almost surprising to themselves when those kinds of very common experiences happen.

And I would say certain kinds of practices, I can put people in a room, get them to do these practices, and it's just a matter of time until these very standard experiences of divinity open up and people almost inevitably start using that language.

And so the question is, if these experiences open up, even in standard insight meditation, what is the attitude to these experiences? What's the relationship to them? How are we interpreting them? How are we conceptualizing them? So a person might be told or might hear or might think, well, all experiences are impermanent. Don't think about them. Don't get attached to them. Don't try and repeat them. We touched on this earlier. That's useful sometimes. Sometimes that's useful, that letting go when it's too tight, the kind of gripping, the attachment.

But mostly it's not that helpful as a kind of attitude or a way of relating to these kind of experiences. It's not quite intelligent enough. It won't open things out in a way that is that beneficial. Insight meditation, standard insight meditation techniques, conceptions, approaches, the conceptions underlying insight meditation, will lead, with a certain amount of dedication and good practice, to experiences that the Buddha did not ignore. He did not say in relation to, oh, just don't try and repeat them, they're just—let's not go there, don't get attached.

He gave them names, he taught the monks to repeat them. These were not experiences he simply brushed off. As the Buddha Dharma evolved after the Buddha's passing into different streams of tradition—the Mahayana, the Vajrayana—there emerged an even greater exploration and range of experience opening up from people's meditative practice, along with more careful, comprehensive categorization of those experiences involving different senses of divinity.

When we say divinity, I'm leaving it quite broad, speaking of a whole range of experiences. Some may be universal and impersonal in character, while others may be very particular. Some relate to particularities in theophanies, and some will be personal—a personal god, an imaginal figure as a personal god, not an impersonal deity. We'll return to this.

That brings us to the nineteenth: divinity.

The last one I'll mention is Buddha nature. In the Buddhist tradition, this term has a wide range of usage and arguments. Some traditions employ it quite narrowly—it simply refers to your capacity to become fully enlightened, to become a Buddha, usually over many lifetimes. This is possible by virtue of the fact that the mind, the factors of the mind, and the contents of the mind are impermanent. Although there's ignorance right now, ignorance is impermanent. With the right training, you could change it. It's not fixed. Similarly with craving and the rest of what gets in the way, or rather whose absence qualifies enlightenment.

In some meanings of Buddha nature, it refers simply to that—your unavoidable possibility. No matter what you think of yourself or where you actually are in terms of your spiritual development, there is always and undestroyably the possibility of becoming a Buddha.

Sometimes in more popular usage nowadays, it refers to your innate goodness. If you think you're a mean person and see lots of not-so-nice qualities in yourself, it's a way of saying that what's in you at your core is something bright, luminous, and good—inherently good, inherently loving.

When I use the term, I probably use it as an alternative to the word God or divinity, which I'm using in a much broader way. Often the words God or divinity really rub people the wrong way, especially some Buddhists. So you can use Buddha nature instead, but in a different way than just that possibility. I'm actually talking about something that's divine.

Again, it has a range of meanings. Perhaps the most full-on meaning comes from the Shentong tradition in the Tibetan tradition, though it's actually a tradition that goes back to Mahayana Indian Buddhism. In that tradition, Buddha nature is interchangeable with words like Dharmakaya and even the word emptiness, which is used differently when they use it in that tradition from the way I'm using it.

So Buddha nature, Dharmakaya, emptiness, the absolute, and other words—quite a few words used interchangeably—mean something like the cosmic awareness that is inherently in me and in you and in everything that knows the emptiness of all things. It is not separate as a separating subject dividing subject and objects—in that sense it is non-dual. It refers to the knowing, which is also empty; this knowing awareness is empty in itself, but the knowing and the appearances and their emptiness are all known in a non-dual way.

In other words, it includes the whole cosmos as this field of empty awareness, knowing all things and also the emptiness of all things. Everything is Buddha nature. Everything has Buddha nature. Everything is Buddha nature. Everything is Dharmakaya in that logos, in that experience.

Even stranger to some Buddhists—this will sound strange—is that this Dharmakaya or this Buddha nature can act. This cosmic Buddha nature can act in the world and manifest different appearances or different qualities for an individual or in an individual, dependent on what that individual needs for their well-being and their deeper journey. There's a kind of intelligence, something akin to the world soul—a divine intelligence or divine activity that's operating in and through and as Buddha nature, as well as that awareness and its inseparability from emptiness, from appearances.

So there are twenty terms in this glossary.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 57

Dilemmas and Delineations: How did we get here?! (Part 4)

Rob Burbea · 37 min

In this fourth part of his exploration, Rob Burbea addresses the challenges of presenting unfamiliar spiritual concepts within established Dharma frameworks. He examines how Western culture readily accepts neuroscience and psychotherapy additions to Buddhist teachings while resisting more foreign ideas like eros and soul-making.

Burbea argues that fantasy and imaginal perception are already integral to Dharma practice, whether recognized or not. He critiques overly simplistic psychological models that reduce human motivation to mere vedanā (feeling-tone) responses or self-shoring mechanisms, advocating for a richer understanding that includes erotic and imaginal dimensions.

The talk explores the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, showing how erotic engagement deepens imaginal perception and conceptual understanding in a mutually enriching cycle. Unlike craving, which solidifies perception, eros liberates and expands our experience of the erotic object. Burbea discusses practical implications for samādhi practice and the brahmavihāras, demonstrating how seemingly sexual or erotic imaginal encounters can lead to profound meditative states and compassionate opening. He emphasizes the ehipassiko nature of these teachings - they must be explored experientially rather than simply believed.

Now I'm aware that these are, or many of these at least, quite unfamiliar ideas for many people—perhaps even many Dharma practitioners and people in the culture more broadly. So I want to say something about that.

It's a lot easier to teach Dharma, or rather, there's no objection, which makes it easier, when we teach Dharma or present something as Dharma in cases where we mix in all kinds of assumptions or frames of reference or conceptual bases or conceptual biases—as long as they're well established in Western modernist culture and assumed to be true by that culture. So when you mix those kinds of ideas and assumptions in and package it all as "Dharma"—for instance, neuroscience or some of the ideas from modern psychotherapy—and you introduce them and they become absorbed or blended into "Dharma," that's a lot easier. Rarely does anyone's eyebrows get raised or anyone have a problem with that.

When one tries to introduce or open up more unfamiliar ideas, ideas that are not popular or populist in the culture, that's more difficult. And more than that, actually, when one adds something, so to speak, foreign or new to what we might call Dharma, when it's foreign and new, that addition is much more conspicuous as an addition than when there are ideas that people are familiar with from their culture. It's still happening. It's still an addition. There is still an addition, even when it's not obvious—when we add ideas about neuroscience or modern psychotherapy ideas or whatever. It's still happening nevertheless. Something is being added. It's just not so obvious.

Add to that this other idea that the ideas we are using are not truth claims—they don't refer to realities—and that is very difficult sometimes for people to get their heads around as well, because we're used to saying, used to hearing, "it's like this" or "it's like that," or thinking that Dharma concepts refer to realities. Certainly when we think about neuroscience or modern psychotherapy ideas, almost always, almost without exception, there's the assumption and the message that these are realities.

So it's quite difficult sometimes to hear something or to try and present something as "these ideas don't have truth claims in the way that we usually operate with truth claims and truth assumptions." So unfamiliar, and I'm aware of that, and certainly aware of the difficulties in trying to present all this.

But still, I insist—absolutely insist—that in our Dharma, in your Dharma, in your practice, and in your life, fantasy and image is already involved. It's already involved in Dharma, in practice, and life. I absolutely insist on that. And I also insist that this is not a bad thing. Not at all a bad thing. It's inevitable. And it's important, and it may well, I would say, be necessary—certainly necessary to galvanize in relation to practice and Dharma and to be inspired in life and to have meaningfulness. All that's necessary. So it's not a bad thing.

We need to recognize both the general fact that it's operating and also the particular ways that it's operating for us—that fantasy and image operate for us and the kinds and directions in which fantasy and image operate and mix in with our life and impel our life. So we need a double level recognition: general and a more individual, particular way.

And out of that, we need to expand a psychology that can talk about that and include all that, recognize it and be sensitive to it and be wise in relationship to it, instead of just not admitting it, not seeing it, or trying to cut it because it's papañca. So we need to include, then, in this psychology, in this conceptual framework, we need to include ideas such as soul-making or eros that are not yet articulated in what we call Dharma. To me that seems a necessity, something that is called for.

When we look at our life and the movements of our life with a psychology that's too simplistic, it doesn't serve us, doesn't serve the totality of our beings. "Well, that's just vedanā leading. So when you talk about eros or that kind of thing, that's just vedanā leading. You're just chasing the pleasant or running away from the unpleasant. Well, that's just papañca leading." When we talk about the imaginal fantasy, or "that's just"—you know, what motivates us is either this movement governed by vedanā towards pleasant and unpleasant, or trying to... Some people teach that basically we get attached to things like views because we're trying to shore up this self that somehow deep down we know is not real. Therefore, we attach, we cling to this and that to try and shore up my views, my habits, and all that.

But that kind of psychology—this self-shoring up, or the vedanā leading, or "that's what's going on," or "it's just matter"—I've touched on this before. This is, in a way, it's not sophisticated enough. It's a little bit poor as a psychology. I mean, valuable as it is—we've talked about this—we need something richer, deeper, wider: a psychology that can accommodate and delineate between the kinds of things that we're talking about.

So from our perspective, the movement to seek to increase pleasure or decrease unpleasant sensations, when that is the prime intention of a movement of body or mind and when that's the prime driver—to maximize or increase pleasant sensations and decrease unpleasant ones—when that's the prime driver and there isn't this richness of what we call imaginal perception, then that is axiomatically, in the way that we're talking about, that won't be soul-making. That's not creating soulfulness. It will not do that. It's not eros. It's what we might call craving, as I said.

But to think too much that way, or to really regard as if that's the thing that mostly moves us as human beings—it's really, really poor psychology. But it's interesting.

This kind of need to expand and enrich our psychology extends beyond dharma circles into the wider culture. I had an oncologist until recently who prescribed the standard course of chemotherapy for my condition, though I think he believed it wouldn't work given my disease and its stage. He saw no point in trying more chemotherapy, considering it potentially dangerous—a risk he wasn't prepared to take, believing it might do more harm than good.

In trying to persuade me to give up wanting to experiment with longer and more intensive chemotherapy, he would often say something like, "It's about quality of life. Come off the chemo and enjoy the rest of your life with better quality." I often had the feeling that he and I understood very different things about what constituted a good quality of life.

He would frequently mention going on holiday as part of his package of what quality of life meant—what I could do if I was off chemo. This probably partly reflected that as an NHS oncologist, he was grossly overworked and overstretched, desperately needing a break and craving a holiday himself.

But he never said, "Quality of life—so you can go on pilgrimage." A medieval peasant in Christendom, or a Tibetan Buddhist even nowadays, or a Muslim today—if told they probably had only months to live, one response to the doctor might be, "Then I'll take time off medication so I can make a pilgrimage." A very different mindset.

What's the difference? Typically—and this isn't black and white—one desires or seeks a reduction in stress, an increase in pleasure, perhaps seeking novel or exciting experiences. Whereas pilgrimage, in contrast to holiday, is a movement of soul-making, an actual embodiment of eros, something we do with our bodies that is an erotic movement bringing soul-making.

Different cultures, ancient and contemporary, religious and secular, tend to assume a universality of wants—that people want this or that, that everyone or most people want certain things. In the modern secular West, the choice of what we seek is actually wider, perhaps wider than at any point in human history. This characterizes modernism, secularity particularly, and consumerism. The choice is wider, and individuality has a certain acknowledgment in modern secular Western culture. The individual's choice is respected to some extent in what's important to them. But still, there's usually a presumption that most people will conform to conventional expectations—that you'll want a holiday as opposed to something like a pilgrimage.

With all this talk about eros and exploration of eros, I want to emphasize something you've heard regarding dharma before. Don't believe these teachings. The Buddha said they are ehipassiko—to be seen, to come and see. For one to come and see for oneself through practice. Find out—it's not a matter of belief.

For many people, this is the attraction of dharma over other religions. But what often happens for practitioners is we see something a few times—for example, that craving leads to suffering—and something generalizes quite quickly because it's a message we hear repeatedly. We actually stop questioning. We stop the breadth and depth and radicality of our questioning. We stop looking further. In a way, we program our perception and only see this.

I've sometimes asked an audience, "Are you sure that desire leads to suffering?" People nod, "Yeah, absolutely, I'm sure because I've checked it out." But it doesn't always lead to suffering, as I showed in the Beauty of Desire talks. There can be this belief that we're finding out for ourselves, not believing anything, but actually something gets stuck and we stop the ehipassiko. We stop the movement to come find out, to look further, to keep exploring.

What I want to say with all this—I really want to ask for and encourage open-mindedness, exploration, practice, that kind of boldness and experimentation and play and willingness to investigate, to question.

Eros, despite all these definitions and however unfamiliar it might sound, is already in imaginal practice. It already is, I would say, an element mixed in with any imaginal practice. I've said before to people, "Notice the love with the imaginal figures." This is really important. Imaginal figures always involve love. Sometimes it's not obvious at all. Sometimes it can look like the opposite. But there is love there—many different kinds of love, many flavors, characters, expressions of love. This is to be noticed in imaginal practice. And it's both ways. The love flows both ways.

We'll return to this. But wrapped up with the love, related to the love—not the same as, but related—is a kind of eros. It's not the same as sex, and there might be sexuality in the imaginal practice, but there's eros.

When we talk with images and in relation to imaginal figures about opening to them, about feeling that you are somehow in service to this imaginal figure, or that you surrender to this yidam, or deity, or imaginal figure, these words—opening to, service, surrender—they either lead to eros, they deepen the eros, or they already imply that eros is there in the relationship. And actually, I would say eros is inherent in imaginal relationships. A relationship with imaginal figures involves eros.

So I'm talking about something to notice, to see there. And eros is not craving. We've said that. We mean different things by that, and we'll expand on that. But also in relation to more conventional Dharma teachings, it's the case that with a little experimentation, you will discover that eros can lead at times, or it can be steered to lead, definitely, to samadhi, to quite deep states of samadhi.

And a lot of people find this really surprising, because they consider eros, sexuality, that kind of thing, as distraction, as defilement. We've talked about this, but I've lost count of how many examples I could give—and I've talked about it on other retreats—where some kind of often very unexpected or guided erotic interaction with an imaginal figure in the imaginal practice brings about samadhi, and the person is surprised by that consequence. That samadhi comes out of this actually sexual—oftentimes it's very sexual, not even just erotic, it's actually really sexual—and very different kinds of sexuality. Some very soft and loving, and others very sort of darker versions or stronger versions, if you like. It may or may not even be your usual gender or sexual orientation that you're used to identifying with. Many possibilities, but samadhi can often come out of this. I'll return to these examples, but here's something that's a very standard Dharma concept coming out of something that looks like it doesn't have anything to do with it.

Similarly, the Brahmaviharas—and hopefully there'll be time on this retreat to talk about the link and the relationship between eros and the Brahmaviharas. I think I gave at least one example in that series of talks on Ecology of Love, where actually quite a dark, lusty, and quite strange—or by most people's standards, strange—kind of sexual image actually deepened and opened the flow of compassion, the second Brahmavihara, very, very potently. So maybe we'll return to that later, the relationship between eros and the Brahmaviharas.

Continuing our delineations here with standard dharma—eros, we've already said, is much more than sexuality and sexual energy and attraction. We're not equating them. But it may be the case that exploring eros and the imaginal in practice, in meditation, may bring with it or lead to an opening up of a level and a breadth of questioning regarding sexuality in general—one's own sexuality and one's attitudes. It may well just open up that whole field and also the experience of sexual energies too. We will return to that later.

So just making a few more little delineations. I think I've said this before: I'm not equating eros with love. Love is one of those poor words nowadays. It's come to have to mean so much, this poor word, to do so much work, to span so much territory. We still use it—it's a lovely word—but oftentimes there are problems with just how much it has come to mean or include. There's too much for one word.

So oftentimes two people are using that same word in relation to each other and saying it to each other, and they actually mean quite different things. What they're referring to entails different experiences for them, different perceptions of the other, different feelings, different sense of obligations that come out of it. "I love you. Therefore I'm obliged..." What guarantees are different. The commitments are different.

But if we say, for now, if we use the word love to just mean something like care—care for someone's well-being on every level—then it's clear, if we just look at some distinctions now between different terms, it's clear, of course, that we can have sex, even pleasurable sex, enjoyable sex, without love and without eros. So hopefully there's some respect at least. But sex is possible and for a lot of people maybe it's common without love or without eros.

It's also possible that you can have sex with love, with care, but without eros. In other words, there's sexual arousal, sexual pleasure, etc., and care for this person, maybe sometimes even a lifetime of care in partnership.

But actually, this person—maybe never was, or is no longer—there's no longer soul-making in the sex. There's no longer the aliveness of the erotic and the imaginal in bed. So then there's sex with love, but without eros.

And of course, you can have love, care, without sex or eros. You can care deeply for someone with metta, wish them well, care deeply about their well-being, but this other to whom I give my metta is not alive for me as a soul-making image. They don't constitute that for my psyche.

And if it's not clear by now, hopefully it is: we can have eros and an erotic connection with someone with or without sex or sexual contact.

So all those permutations. But I would say it's not possible to have eros without love. This is quite interesting. It's not possible to have eros without love, because eros leads, brings, stimulates, opens a perception of—more and more so, in fact, as it goes on—a perception of the beauty and the divinity of the object, of the erotic object. This grows. Eros opens a perception of beauty and divinity, and we can't help but love what appears to us deeply beautiful and divine. So I would say it's actually not possible to have eros in the way that we're talking about it without love.

Implicit in all that we've just said is that eros is actually always involved with and involves the imaginal and psyche in the way I used that word before. Where there's eros, the imaginal is instigated, invoked, inflamed, deepened, widened, brought alive. Psyche is expanded, enriched, deepened, complicated.

And vice versa: where there is the imaginal, where that's operating, where something is an image, eros is already inherently wrapped up in that, in the relationship with that image. And also logos. There's an ideation, some kind of idea that's wrapped up with an erotic perception of someone or something. Conceptuality, logos, supports—to whatever extent it can—that eros.

I mentioned this eros-psyche-logos dynamic as one of the things on our list. I'm going to talk much more about this, but what it means is that the eros wanting more deepens and creates, discovers more to the image, gives more imaginal dimensions, imaginal complexity, imaginal facets and faces to this beloved other. And in that, the idea, the logos also of this other expands.

And that eros-psyche-logos, that soul-making dynamic then comes back because the object then is more beautiful, more deep, more rich, more juicy, more enticing, more complex. It offers me more, it offers more for the psyche to move into, to expand, but also for the eros to find attractive and to want more of. So there's this way that it potentially infinitely just expands.

There's this mutual insemination, mutual fertilization, growth, expansion, deepening, widening, complexifying, complicating, enriching of eros, psyche, logos. They all help each other. They're all involved with and involve each other. And that's the eros-psyche-logos dynamic.

The fact of that as a fact of our soul, of the way the soul works, implies several things. One is that eros is liberating in different ways. Let's unpack that just a little bit now.

When there is craving or clinging or greed or aversion, we can see in our phenomenological approach that when there's clinging towards something or pushing away or grasping, aversion, it tends to solidify the perception of that object that we're clinging to. There's a solidification of that object, and also a kind of stagnation—a stagnation of the perception. We only see it this one way, or rather the perception gets more solid, more one-way, often in a negative way, or a particular flatly enticing way.

We know all that from dependent origination and the study of that in practice through ways of looking. And the reverse is also true: when a certain perception is solidified, it tends to stimulate the clinging. These two go together—solidification, stagnation of perception, and clinging.

Even when we see something as impermanent or flowing, there can still be a kind of stagnation of the perception, a kind of one-dimensionality and a certain unidirectionality of the perception. The perception stagnates in a certain way.

The solidification and stagnation of perception are the exact opposites of what happens with this eros-psyche-logos dynamic, or they're an arresting of that dynamic—of the way that opens out the perception, the imaginal perception, the sense of, the knowing of, the intimacy with, and the idea of the object, the erotic object.

There's an infinite potential for this mutual insemination, fertilization, expansion, enriching, deepening, to create, discover more of the beauty, more of the dimensionality, more faces of, more dimensions of this beloved, this erotic object. It's the opposite of stagnating or solidifying the perceptions.

There's much more to say about that kind of infinite potential—infinitely increasing or expanding or complexifying or complicating or enriching the object. It certainly doesn't happen as a smooth process. It happens in stages, and often with hiccups and obstacles that need to be addressed or negotiated or made aware of.

But what this means is that eros, in its capacity to open perception and see image as image, is very different than grasping, aversion, clinging, craving. It has the opposite effect. It doesn't solidify, it doesn't stagnate. Actually, it liberates the object. Its effect is to liberate the perception in a certain sense.

Last thing for now. So you've... I can't remember now if I've said it, but it may be dawning on you that—I did say it, didn't I?—that there's a small definition of eros, as we said. Eros is this wanting more contact, connection, intimacy, experience, knowing, penetration, opening to the erotic other, to the imaginal erotic object, to something. And that's what we call the small definition.

There's also, because of the way that psyche and logos and image and the imaginal and soul-making and that whole soul-making dynamic—the eros, psyche, logos dynamic—are actually implicated or naturally tend to evolve, eros will start to evolve and expand unless it's inhibited. We can also talk about eros and imply all that, really imply that whole dynamic, that whole constellation. So that in the small definition, we're really talking about eros as one element of that eros-psyche-logos, that soul-making dynamic.

Or sometimes when I use the word eros, I'll actually be using it in a way that implies that whole erotic imaginal constellation, implying that whole dynamic, that whole expansion of that dynamic, everything that's involved in the erotic, imaginal aliveness, activation, that process, the way it constellates self, other, world, et cetera, which we'll come back to.

So this is just one of those things—again, I probably apologize in advance—I predict that I'll be going back and forth between these two meanings, a more small meaning, and saying something like, when eros gets blocked, it becomes craving, or something like that. Or when the logos doesn't expand enough, then there are problems. But it should probably be pretty clear in context.

Another implication there is that eros in itself, so to speak, the small definition, is neither inherently, intrinsically positive or negative, good or bad. It's just this wanting more contact, more opening, more penetration, more intimacy, more experience, more knowing of all that with the erotic object. So in itself, it's neither here nor there.

Of course, there is no "in itself." We can't extricate it as something that doesn't stimulate this whole movement of eros-psyche-logos, this whole dynamic, interwoven dynamic, or as something that is trying to stimulate that dynamic but is blocked in different ways. So there really is no "in itself."

Whether eros is for the soul, is soul-making, is enriching, is beautiful, is opening and opening up the sense of existence or not—and therefore desirable or not—is really dependent on what happens in relationship to that whole dynamic or how that whole dynamic is able to unfold. We'll talk a lot about this. So "in itself," if there isn't "in itself," eros is neither actually good or bad, positive or negative. It's just this thing. But oftentimes we'll be talking in a bigger definition, bigger implication.

When realism comes in and I really don't see this image as an image, I really take it as literal or a truth or this idea that's wrapped up in the imaginal and the erotic object, and I take that logos as really being true, then problems come in and eros becomes craving. And there's realism. Eros leads to craving, related to what I said before about solidification, et cetera. We'll come back to this.

But there are other kinds of problems that can come in. There can be a cramping or a blocking or a limiting in different ways, either of the eros, of the libido, if you like, or of the psyche, of the imaginal function, or of the logos. So when any of these elements is cramped, blocked, limited, then it gives rise to problems in the relationship with the other, with the erotic object. And we're going to look at this in much more detail as we go on.

Okay. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 58

Dilemmas and Delineations: How did we get here?! (Part 5)

Rob Burbea · 1h02

> In this profound exploration of spiritual methodology, Rob Burbea examines the inherent tensions in creating precise conceptual frameworks for understanding Eros and soul-making. Drawing on Emerson's wisdom that "all things have two handles," he investigates when analytical precision serves the soul-making process and when it becomes counterproductive. Burbea traces how the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic naturally expands and complexifies our understanding, making complete definition impossible while simultaneously calling for deeper inquiry. He addresses the creative tension between poetic and analytical approaches to dharma, warning against both oversimplification and mere pedantry. The talk delves into how delineations can simultaneously liberate and create new forms of self-judgment, examining parallels with Foucault's analysis of sexuality and identity. Burbea emphasizes that some fabrication serves soul-making while other forms lead to suffering, requiring skillful discernment in our practice. He concludes by framing this entire conceptual framework as an open, creative project rather than a closed system, inviting practitioners to contribute to an evolving understanding of dharma. This sophisticated meta-analysis of spiritual methodology offers both theoretical depth and practical guidance for navigating the complexities of advanced contemplative practice.

Ralph Waldo Emerson wrote a lot of things that were sort of addressed to himself, kind of advice to himself, notes to self. And one of the things he wrote was, "All things have two handles. Beware of the wrong one." I think he was paraphrasing or even quoting the Greek philosopher Epictetus.

You can see how that applies to a lot of what we've been talking about so far. It's relevant to desire, how we pick it up, by what handle, by what direction. It applies to eros, to this whole notion of clinging—as we explained, are we picking it up as a key, or are we picking it up as just something to reject at one level? It certainly applies to imagination and images in the conventional sense. Two handles. Certainly also to emptiness, and the Mahayana tradition makes this very clear. To grasp at emptiness in the wrong way is like grasping at a snake by the tail, the wrong end, while its head is just going to come and bite you. With regard to emptiness, I think it was Nagarjuna who wrote that.

All things have two handles. And also delineations. So how we relate to the very process of generating and making delineations, either in perception or in conception or both. So it applies to all this.

Now, what that little aphorism is saying—I think it's not just saying you can pick things up but don't cling to them or don't identify with them. Certainly that's part of it, how we pick something up. Maybe it would be more accurate to say all things have many handles. So there are many ways this admonition to care how, from what direction, in what way we pick something up applies to all the things that we've been talking about so far.

With desire and with eros, it's true at a certain level to say it's fire and one is playing with fire to play with these things, desire and eros. It's true and there's heat there. But where would human beings be if certain experimentation with fire did not take place at some point? Yes, that asks for a lot. In other words, we need to take care and need to have certain things in place, qualities, abilities in place. We talked about this before. But in a way, we could say we're playing with fire to a certain extent.

That doesn't always mean that the fire is raging. It's not always that it's super intense—the eros is very intense, the desire is very intense, the fire is very intense. First of all, it won't always be that way for anyone. And secondly, intense is neither better nor worse. So from one sort of standard perspective, an intense desire, too simplistically, is a bad thing. From another perspective, again too simplistic, it's a good thing—it's better for it to be more intense, more fire.

But what this investigation into, this exploration of this whole subject, asks for is a lot of sensitivity, the development of our sensitivity. I've touched on this in earlier teachings. It asks for a lot of subtlety in our attention, and subtlety of discernment—a very keen, well-developed, sharp mindfulness, if you like, a very sensitive mindfulness, sometimes a very soft, delicate mindfulness.

It asks for a certain adventurousness of spirit, we could say, to go down this avenue and see what happens and explore. It asks for a certain boldness, a certain freedom—we could say freedom to question, boldness to question, to question boldly. And to experiment, to dare to experiment and find out. How will I find out? I have to experiment.

If those things are in place, or we can bring them with us, or we can develop them as we go, then this exploration, I would say, can open up for us radical possibilities, radical openings, radical shifts in our understanding, our sense—as I said before—our sense of self, of other, of soul, of imagination, of world, of cosmos, of existence. Real revolutions are possible here for us. So the potential with an exploration of eros is huge, huge and profound, wide and profound.

And we're talking about something that, if you like, is a formidable force. It doesn't always mean it's intense. So sometimes Cupid—the name, as you probably know, is the Latin, the Roman name for the god Eros. And some artistic or statuesque depictions of Cupid are of this little podgy, cherubic baby angel with soft, rolling, pinkish, smooth flesh. And so maybe he's slightly mischievous with his bow and arrow and who he's going to shoot.

kind of do the matchmaking thing, and that's kind of all—you know, a little bit cutesy. Compare that, for example, with Plato's description, actually the words he put into the mouth of Diotima, who's a kind of mysterious seeress and philosopher. Her characterization of Eros—I got this from a philosopher called George Steiner, who was a literary critic.

Diotima characterizes Eros as a hermeneutical daemon. What does that mean? Hermeneutics is interpretation, so his business is the interpretation of all things. And all things—Eros has something to do with the way we see them and how we open up and see them as messages, as angels. Daemon is, you could say, another word for a demigod or an angel or something like that—something given more than a purely personal or purely reductive existence and significance.

So Eros is a hermeneutical daemon who shuttles back and forth between gods and humanity, between being and nothingness, between what is real and what is less real, between wisdom and ignorance. And this Eros looks just like Socrates, which is to say shoeless, ugly, impoverished, cunning in pursuit of the beautiful and the good, a lover of wisdom and a master of jugglery, witchcraft and artful speech.

I hope it's evident to you just how powerful and well-captured that description is, how much it points to the kind of accuracy in what it brings and involves there. A hermeneutical daemon shuttling back and forth between the divine and the human, between what is real and what is less real, between wisdom and ignorance. Shoeless himself, ugly, always poor—he himself has nothing. Do you get this, even in terms of what we've described so far about Eros? Eros itself has nothing. Cunning in pursuit of the beautiful and the good. A lover of wisdom, of insight, and a master of jugglery, witchcraft and artful speech.

So his mastery, his realm, his art, is the realm of art. It's not the realm of realist truth in the way that we tend to think about it. There's a lot in there, very beautiful, and certainly not a little cutesy description. We're really talking about something bigger than us because divine.

Now, we said already that we could give a kind of small start of a definition of what Eros is, but we also said that when we talk about this Eros-psyche-logos dynamic—or rather what Eros instigates, inflames, invokes, elicits, and puts in motion—because of its wanting more, in terms of the ways it expands, enriches, deepens, widens, complexifies, gives dimension to the images that it beholds of its erotic object, its erotic object as image, as imaginal dimensions, and the ideas, the logoi, the concepts of that erotic object. Because of all that, the definition that we gave earlier—this wanting more contact, connection, intimacy, knowing, to know more, wanting more penetration, to penetrate more, to experience more—all that provisional definition is exactly that: just provisional.

So we can almost make a kind of axiomatic statement, a fundamental statement that because Eros is not separate from this whole Eros-psyche-logos dynamic and what that does in its expansion, we can never totally understand Eros. There will always be something of it, something of Eros, beyond our grasp, beyond the grasp of our understanding. And therefore also maybe something of it to which we are always subject, because it's more than we can kind of get a full handle on, get our hands around. There may be something of Eros to which we're always subject. We never feel like we got it under our thumb. It's always in some sense bigger than us, bigger than our minds, bigger than our capacities in some sense.

Now this, of course, goes back to that whole origin of the idea of Eros as a divinity, which is something Jung restated, which implies the impossibility of a full definition or capturing it conceptually. But also we can see, if we think about the implications of this whole idea that Eros opens up and inseminates and fertilizes psyche and logos, which then further inflame and inseminate the Eros, we can see that Eros kind of has this tendency, because of the apotheosis, to keep expanding everything, or shattering boundaries, or stretching boundaries.

Whether that's an imaginal figure, or a lover, the way I see him or her, whatever it is, whether it's a piece of art or a piece of music or an artist or whatever it is that's my imaginal, perceptual object—Eros will tend to expand, will want to, will naturally expand, open, deepen, complexify everything. Object and everything it's in relation to.

But also, because Eros itself is tied up in the larger definition with the Eros-psyche-logos dynamic, it means that Eros itself also gets expanded. And this happens in two ways.

It happens, as I said, because when the imaginal object becomes even richer, even deeper in its dimensions, even more wonderful—like a jewel revealing more and more sparkling facets and unknown wonders and mysteries, and becomes more rich, more deep, more wide—then there is more Eros. There is more Eros, more to penetrate. The Eros desires to penetrate what it's now discovering and desires to open to what it's now discovering of the erotic, imaginal other. I see more there. He, she is more. I want to open to, I want to penetrate that. Eros wants to.

So the Eros itself swells. There's a tumescence, there's an increase, there's an empowerment. The degree of the fire, if you like, grows—the amount, the range of the Eros. But in a second way, too. Because in all this, the image and the idea, the psyche and the logos of the Eros—in other words, what is the image that is present of the very Eros that's involved in this whole movement? So certainly there's an image of the other, and the imaginal other, and that's getting richer and wider. But then this spreads—we're going to go into this in more detail and all its implications—it spreads to self-reflect in this kind of auto-eroticism. I'll say more about that in talks to come.

So that the very way that Eros is regarded, the very image of Eros and the very idea, the logos of the Eros in the Eros-psyche-logos dynamic—not just of the object, but also the Eros—those boundaries too start to stretch or start to shatter and then have to reform in a wider, deeper, more spacious and generous and multi-dimensional way. So whatever ideas and images are involved with the Eros, the psyche and the logos of the Eros, so to speak, those too are expanded.

You understand?

So eros—whatever our notion, whatever our image or fantasy of eros is—that too keeps growing, gaining new dimensions, simply by virtue of what eros does and is through the whole eros-psyche-logos dynamic.

The eros itself starts to take on new dimensions, revealing other facets, other resonances, other breaths that it encompasses. We discover depths in eros itself that we hadn't known before.

Now this doesn't mean—this does not imply—that because we can never totally understand it, because of all I've just said, we can never totally understand eros, that we shouldn't explore it. It doesn't imply that we should ask, "Well, there's no point exploring it or trying to create ideas and concepts that address it, that support our exploration." It doesn't imply that we should stop trying to go further, to go deeper, to go wider into the breadth of eros.

Actually, to me, it should inspire a greater inquiry and exploration. Wherever we are in our understanding of eros, or wherever we are in building a conceptual framework of eros and adding to it, wherever we are in that process—there's more. There's more to discover. There's more to add. There's more to find out. There are beauties and wonders and depths and dimensions to be revealed.

So it should inspire us. Rather than feeling frustrated because "I don't really get this yet" or "I haven't sussed it out, I haven't encapsulated it, I haven't figured it out"—it should inspire.

And even as I alluded to before, it could hopefully give us a sense of okayness, and perhaps even rightness, in those times when we feel driven or dragged by eros and the eros seems bigger than us—bigger than what we can figure out, or encapsulate in concepts, or even in an image. We recognize that not only is this okay, there may even be a profound rightness in that.

I don't know—maybe you've been listening to the talks so far and, I can say this for myself, leaning into trying to be more precise and analytical about delineating between different concepts and qualities that we recognize when eros is present, how we distinguish it from this and that. And maybe some of you are listening and perhaps starting to feel a little uneasy at times, feeling as if we're being too precise and too analytical.

I have felt that at times, just in the material we've covered so far on this retreat. I'm not sure. When does the precision and analysis that we're bringing to bear actually overstep its soul-making function? When has it gone beyond its function of supporting soul-making? Because what we're interested in is soul-making—that's what we're interested in. When has the way we're delineating things with precision and making analyses of how things relate and processes work—when does that overstep its soul-making function?

It's not an easy question.

So on the one hand, you have this notion that eros is divine, and because of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic—this stimulating, inflaming, expanding, inseminating, fertilizing tendency of eros that it gives to eros, psyche, and logos, and more as we'll explain in later talks—because of the divinity and because of that eros-psyche-logos dynamic, there's always going to be something mysterious retained about it, something unfathomable, some sense of "more"—more that I haven't quite discovered, more to it, more dimensions to it.

So on the one hand, all of that—this unfathomability, if you like. And at the same time, on the other hand, a certain amount of delineating, of defining, of highlighting features actually serves the movement of eros and the soul-making process.

Right here, in relation to delineations and definitions, we have a dilemma. We have actually several dilemmas, but that's one of them.

There is, on the one hand, in approaching soul-making and approaching things like eros, oftentimes what's more helpful—and I've talked about this before and leaned that way at different times in teachings and writings—is leaning more towards the poetic and the mythical sensibilities. A poetic understanding, poetic depiction, poetic presentation or unfolding that calls on the poetics of our understanding. A more mythical sensibility in exploring and receiving and digesting.

When to emphasize that? How much to emphasize that relative to a more analytical approach? I don't know. So far in this retreat it seems to me we've been leaning more towards the analytical. In the past, and in other work I'm doing right now, more the other way.

So there's a kind of dilemma here—a balance. Different people, different times, same person. But that's something to bear in mind about all this, about making delineations.

Actually, I want to say something general—make some general observations about making delineations in general. And I want to add to that and also say some general things about saying general things, if you follow me. Something about general observations about making delineations, and general things about saying general things.

Now, I'm aware some of you might be thinking, "What? This is really abstract now." And I don't know if you're listening and whether this just sounds really not relevant or pretty vague, or just abstract. Maybe in time, hopefully, it will come to seem more relevant why I'm saying these things now—generally about making delineations and about different levels of insight. I hope that it does make sense at some point and seem actually quite both very relevant and quite important.

It's interesting, just in terms of insights that can sound more abstract or that are more general—that apply more generally, or that operate at a higher meta-level, if you like. They can sound kind of vague, so much so that we barely hear them, or they make very little impression. For many people, it's like they don't really recognize the value when they hear or read something at that level, or they sort of get it, but they don't really get the way sometimes these meta-level insights can have, because of their generality, this really pervasive power.

They're general, but they generate an enormous amount of other insights. They link things together. They make certain ways of proceeding possible, open certain whole avenues—not just a little nook or crack here, but whole avenues. They generate a lot through their generality, their pervasiveness, their all-pervading applicability and their implications.

So oftentimes, you know, I'm a teacher or something, and a person, many people remember a story that I told or a certain image recounted. It strikes, it stays in the memory, it makes an impression immediately. And this is very, I think, probably normal for the ways that we tend to understand, the ways that most people tend to understand as human beings, take in information written or listening. Or when the advice seems very, the insight seems very, very specific, when it's obviously relevant to a situation that I find myself in immediately.

But actually, there often is much greater power, as I said, and much more far-reaching sort of embrace and influence and implication in these other more general, in a sort of more general meta level of insight, oftentimes. So it seems also that it's quite rare, I think, it's quite rare, it's a rare person who actually kind of has an ability to recognize a sort of relative hierarchy of significance of ideas or insights.

Sometimes it's almost the opposite. It's as if the more significant ones and the ones that are kind of really radical—radical is from the word radix, meaning root—they really go to the root of things in their generality, in their power, in their implications. People have a hard time sort of recognizing what's a more radical, far-reaching, pervasive sort of meta-level insight and something that's much smaller just because it seems immediately tangible, immediately obvious, immediately applicable to something that's right in front of me now in a very obvious way.

So that's just, you know, the way most people's minds work, but in a way there's an encouragement there to try and reflect on this material, especially when it might seem a bit like conceptual or that kind of level, in a way that starts to build something for you that's really helpful and will be really powerful. As I said, radical and far-reaching in its implications.

Because one of the things I wanted to say about delineations, making delineations, is that, again, certainly not all, but a lot of people appreciate clarity when they're reading something or hearing teachings or whatever. And it can seem very easily that something has been made clear to us if we are presented with, if we read or if we hear kind of neat, well-delineated distinctions between things, between concepts, between qualities or factors of mind. And so sometimes people say to me, oh, you're really clear and da-da-da, you know, etc.

So that is something that I do definitely try and do sometimes. So I'm not, I'm certainly not wanting to throw that out. This is where the dilemma is coming. I'm not wanting to throw that out and I'm certainly not advocating a kind of general sloppiness or inattention and certainly not confusion. It's often not that helpful.

But I would say that or just kind of point out that I think we should start to feel a little bit suspicious if the neat distinctions that we have made ourselves or that we are being presented with by a teacher or by a piece of writing or whatever it is—the neat distinctions are, we should feel suspicious, our suspicions should be aroused if those neat distinctions seem to be being regarded by anyone, whoever is presenting them or ourselves listening or whatever, as real. It should be suspicious if these distinctions are presented as delineating real things, as accurately and simply reflecting the reality of things.

If we sense that a person is or we ourselves are kind of slipping into that very common assumption and position, then I think our suspicion should be aroused. Or we suspect that someone or we ourselves are clinging to them, these distinctions or these things that are delineated through distinctions and definitions, clinging as if they're being clung, if we suspect they're being clung to as real things. Remember that's a form of avijjā, that's ignorance at the deepest level, if they're clung to as real or as reflecting simply, accurately the reality of things, we should be suspicious.

The Buddha Dharma, especially in the Mahāyāna, this is made really, really clear. Those links, we said this before, those links of dependent origination, they are not real. All Dharma concepts are just ways of looking. They're just ways of dividing things and they don't reflect reality. They're ways of looking, ways of delineating in the service of something.

So that I would say, along with the Buddha, you know, why did he say after his enlightenment, it's hard to understand this dependent origination I've discovered. Hard to understand, subtle, profound, only the wise can see it, etc. Very famous quote. I'm not sure whether I want to even try teaching this. There's a whole structure of concepts that he's not saying this is reality. He's saying, look this way and you'll understand something about reality.

And eventually, I think I've said this already on this retreat, the very insight that's generated by the structure of the delineations of dependent origination, those links, etc., if we approach it the right way, melts those very delineations and distinctions, melts the very links, so that the whole thing, it's like a snake eating its own tail, swallowing its own tail, the whole thing dissolves.

So this is... The question is how to move. I don't just shrug and say, oh yeah, no concepts. If I just shrug and say, oh, all concepts are false, I'm just left with my default concepts. I haven't gone anywhere. All I've done is probably reinforced a little bit of laziness and sloppiness. How do I actually get from delineations, through those delineations, into a much more profound realization, much more profound freedoms, and actually even beyond those delineations.

So that's definitely there in Dharma teachings. The question is exactly how can I approach these teachings in ways that do that. And that's where I go back to the idea of ways of looking at fabrication, etc.

For me, that's a very powerful way of approaching these teachings. But this insight about the suspicion of neat distinctions is there in Western philosophy as well. Even back to Plato, he used to make fun of certain characters who were so fond of making these distinctions very clear and neat, and they get ridiculed a little bit in his dialogues. And Hegel as well—another one who gets a lot of stick—but actually, partly his extraordinary insight was that any belief in clear concepts as if they reflect reality just doesn't stand scrutiny. As you look at it and bring more investigation to bear, you see it involves its opposite, it doesn't hold, the boundaries fracture.

We can see this in our own practice. Just as mindfulness gets keener, more subtle, sharper, more sensitive, as our investigation gets deeper, more directed, more cunning if you like, and as our insight grows, we will witness this too in our very own experience.

So just for example, at first, the vedanā—the pleasant, unpleasant, or what some people call neutral, neither pleasant nor unpleasant—the three categories of vedanā, and the distinction between vedanā and craving. Here is this pleasant feeling, and then there's the craving to get more of it, or to move towards it, or to hang on to it. Or here's this unpleasant feeling, and the craving to push it away, to get rid of it, to reduce it. And it seems like the vedanā and the craving are two different things. It's very important to delineate these as two different things and actually see in our experience: yes, here are two different things. I can see A and I can see B, and I then see their relationship.

As I go deeper in insight, that very distinction starts to blur. We start to see it's a kind of illusory distinction. No vedanā, no craving. No craving, no vedanā. Craving and vedanā are inseparable, as are craving and clinging—we touched on that before—as are avijjā and saṅkhāra at a very deep level. As are, in fact, all the five aggregates, or certainly the mental aggregates.

It's like perception and consciousness—they are not two separate things. They're divided up in terms of the aggregates, the third and the fifth aggregate, but they are not separate. Perception and vedanā are not separate. Perception, vedanā, and consciousness are not separate. Saṅkhāras—they're all... the aggregates are not referring to separate or separable things. They're not real distinct entities. The delineations are made to serve a certain purpose, but they are not reflective of reality. And we can see that in any domain, and certainly with dharma concepts.

So that's another dilemma regarding making delineations in terms of clarity and the illusions of clarity or the seduction of what seems like clarity.

And there's another potential dilemma, another potential pitfall or danger in making delineations. As I mentioned earlier, when we delineate something—like eros from desire or craving or whatever it is—in doing that we amplify something. We amplify something, a thing, through a distinction, distinguishing it from other things. So we're delineating a theme or an area or a quality or whatever. In a way, we're creating it. In a way, we're discovering it and we're creating it. We'll come back to this create-discover amalgam or duality later. But in a way, we're actually creating something for our experience and reflection.

And then we've got this thing called eros. And then in relation to that area of experience or that theme of eros, it's possible that it becomes an area where we then pass judgment on ourselves. So here I've created this thing—we've created this thing, whatever it is. We create something called samādhi, and then lo and behold, we start measuring where we are in relation to our samādhi, or our insight, or liberation, or eros, or whatever it is.

In a way—I think, I'm not sure if he actually said this—but in a way it comes out of some of the insights of Michel Foucault, in regard to sexuality, in fact. He pointed out in his sort of history of the whole sense and idea of sexuality that you can trace it back and see how much more defined and complex and solidified and prominent it is as a concept now, related to which the sense of self then relates itself or attaches itself.

In other words, over the past several hundred years, two things have grown, and they've grown together. One is the sense of sexuality, or sexuality as a theme of human psychology, of human behavior, of human being. And with that—not just dependent on that, but with that also—the whole idea of individuality, self, and identity, which, as I mentioned before, is a lot more different now in the kinds of interiority and the prominence of individuality than it was several hundred years ago in Europe.

So sexuality becomes this thing, this area where my identity and the measurement of my identity is so often wrapped up, oftentimes in not a very simple way and also quite a painful way because of judgmentalism and actually a lot of ignorance and not knowing. My identity is wrapped up with sexuality. Sexuality is wrapped up with my identity and individuality and what's my sexual expression.

So there exists tremendous potential and beauty emerging from this connection between identity and sexuality, yet there also lies a certain danger. When we bring forth Eros—or create Eros, if you prefer—as a central theme, amplifying its significance in our lives, we inevitably generate countless questions in our exploration. Questions like the one I mentioned: How do we keep Eros alive in a long-term relationship, which differs fundamentally from metta?

However, we must proceed with great care in this territory, because as I've indicated, we risk creating yet another arena in which to judge ourselves harshly. "I've failed. I'm an erotic failure." Or "My relationship has failed in terms of its Eros. I should be this way or that way. It should manifest differently. There's something fundamentally wrong with me. Is there something wrong with me? I bet everyone else is..." You can see how this pattern unfolds.

You can observe this same dynamic with samadhi. Most people today—and this has become more pronounced recently due to the cultural emphasis on attention, workplace performance, and productivity—are intensely focused on developing their cognitive functioning through various apps and methodologies. Generally speaking, unless someone has been genuinely exposed to teachings, retreats, or environments where people seriously discuss mindfulness, presence, freedom from distraction, steadiness, vitakka and vicara—unless they've encountered such contexts—people begin measuring their samadhi attainments. What was previously never given a second thought, what wouldn't have become a source of pain or preoccupation in their lives, suddenly transforms into this significant thing by which they evaluate themselves.

The situation with Eros mirrors this precisely. The distinction opens a beautiful avenue of exploration, yet unfortunately can become another metric for self-measurement. Here lies our dilemma—a genuine double-edged sword.

Yet creating and discovering different themes, dimensions, and areas of our being and the being of the other—this constitutes part of what the Eros-psyche-logos dynamic accomplishes. We'll return to this crucial point. This dynamic creates and discovers ever more dimensions, ever more subtle openings into new territories—like getting your foot in the door, which then opens onto an entire avenue of possibility. Distinctions emerge, delineations form, various forms of otherness manifest. All of this unfolds naturally.

So indeed, it remains a double-edged sword: beauty and soul-making on one side, dilemma upon dilemma on the other.

Sometimes people observe that pointing out differences between various teachings and delineating concepts creates dualities—creates otherness or multiple forms of otherness. This observation holds truth. Sometimes such differentiation even generates further complications.

More accurately stated: this is true, but it's not invariably problematic. The mere creation of duality, differentiation, or otherness doesn't necessarily constitute something harmful that leads to dukkha. Again, we must be careful not to oversimplify here.

Consider even the various schisms among psychoanalytic schools or psychotherapeutic traditions. One could certainly say, "Oh, that's terrible—look at all the difficulties, interpersonal conflicts, and complications that emerged." On the other hand, examine the richness that resulted. Observe the creativity that emerges from schism. The creation of distinctions doesn't simply and inevitably lead to dukkha.

Even in Dharma practice, you can observe this principle at work. Returning to the concept of ways of looking, we can delineate between different ways of looking—really subtly different ways of looking. You delineate between two particular ways of looking, whatever they might be. One fabricates more dukkha and more perception; the other fabricates less. This recognition brings insight and greater freedom, yet it emerges precisely through delineation. So delineation itself, duality itself, doesn't constitute a problem here. Rather, it can prove profoundly helpful, profoundly fruitful.

When I make a delineation that subsequently brings ease, freedom, and less fabrication, this creates the possibility of making even more refined delineations—even subtler distinctions between concepts, degrees of clinging, and so forth. This can lead to fabricating even less dukkha, fabricating even less perception, opening levels of insight that become available through this very process.

We've explained this principle before. The path doesn't simply involve finding a way of being or looking that feels reasonably pleasant and relaxed, where suffering appears minimal, and then just settling back to surf in and out of that state without much intensity or effort. That approach is fine as far as it goes, but it remains fundamentally limited.

The creation, if you like, or the creation-slash-discovery of dualities, polarities, otherernesses, is intrinsic to the erotic process, the process of eros psychologus, intrinsic to the soul-making dynamic. We're going to explain more about this later because it's quite important.

Wrapped up in that is also complexity. As I said, when the eros psychologus dynamic gets going, the imaginal object, the erotically charged other, the erotic beloved, becomes complexified, complicated in a good way. As I said, they're like a jewel. You suddenly see, oh, look at that. It's got even finer facets, and the way it reflects light in the different ways of the different facets—its beauty is increased through its complication, its depth, that there's more to discover there.

So complexity also, not always, but generally speaking on the whole, is generated, created and discovered through the soul-making process. Again, I caution against this sort of addiction to simplicity, this simplistic addiction to simplicity, what I call simplism.

So the question is: when to be simple and when not to be simple? Or actually, more accurately, in this situation, what will a simple perspective give me and what will a not-so-simple perspective give me? Where will it take me if I look in a way that simplifies, and if I look in a way that actually seems like it's not so simple?

On the other hand, sometimes we as human beings make, or we're actually listening to teachings or reading something and someone is offering something to us—some distinction—and it actually doesn't serve anything at all. So what's the point of that distinction? Doesn't free you in any way, doesn't bring any more freeing insight, doesn't open soul-making. It's just a kind of pedantry.

So again, there's a kind of insight in really delineating what delineations are actually worth making, or what are the particular results of making certain delineations. Which ones are just—what's the point of making them? They really don't serve. They may sound clever, but it's just pedantry.

This is what I mean by a meta level of insight. Actually learning how to look, how to create distinctions, when to pull back, what kind of distinctions, where each of them will take me. Daring to find out and toss out the ones that are not helpful and pursue the ones where—even though they seem quite tricky—I can sense there's richness here. There's treasure to be discovered of different kinds.

For our purpose now in this retreat, primarily it's: which distinctions bring soul-making? When does a certain delineation increase, serve, support, and nourish the soul-making?

For example, as we said, just the distinction between eros and greed is, to my mind—and I hope you will see—a distinction that helps soul-making. Don't just tip it out, eros, because it's kind of desire, and desire, I've heard, is a bad thing. Trying to live without it, live without clinging, and so forth. We talked about that.

But even the distinction, say, between joy and happiness—I would define them slightly differently sometimes to actually open up a difference there. Joy, I would say, is a kind of happiness that's richer and deeper, if you like, in different ways. I'll go into that another time.

Someone told me—this is secondhand, so I'm not sure if it's true—but I've heard that in Tibetan, in the Tibetan language, there are only two words for emotions: happy and sad. I'm still not sure whether I quite believe it, but apparently there are just two words. Unlike English, which has a very rich emotional vocabulary—two words for emotions, so you're either happy or you're sad. I'm guessing there's a word for equanimity, because that's a Buddhist word, but anyway. Happy and sad.

Someone was telling me that they knew a Tibetan who then moved to the West and learned English, and they were reporting after some years experiencing emotions after they learned English that they never knew they had before. Is it that the language is highlighting something that was there anyway? Or is it that the language is actually creating new emotions? The very delineation creates something—or both? I'd say it's both myself.

This is interesting in its relevance to soul-making and to fabrication.

We can very easily believe that, or be taught that, words are thoughts, and thoughts bring discriminations, and discriminations have to do with papañca. They create papañca. So don't get entangled in words. Don't get caught up, because they feed thoughts, which feed discrimination, which feeds papañca.

So there's a way that's true in the original meaning of... Well, actually, there's a way that's sometimes true if papañca and fabrication are equated. That delineations create fabrication, sometimes actually.

But it's also, as I said, that the word—say the different words for different emotions, subtle shades of emotion, kinds of emotion—actually the words serve to create delineations in our sensitivity and refinements of our sensitivity. And this actually stimulates fabrication, a diversity of fabrication. In the way that psychoanalysts use the term consciousness, this then stimulates consciousness. We are then conscious of some arena more because we've been given a delineation that opens it up. And some of that increase in consciousness can be soul-making. So the fabrication there—some of it can be in the service of soul-making.

New doors, new experiences, new understandings can be opened through making verbal delineations. So again, the simplistic spiritual teaching about getting away from words and not thinking or not getting attached—it's appropriate sometimes. And like so many things, sometimes the very opposite is true. There'll be more soul-making, more of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic will be stimulated through the delineations of words, through the magic of words. Sometimes there's that possibility.

So regarding delineations, fabrication and soul-making, what can we say? Well, some delineations actually decrease fabrication. They lead to, they support certain ways of looking which will actually fabricate way less than we could have without that delineation. Some delineations will actually increase fabrication and actually create problems or create subtleties of awareness or whatever.

The soul-making could be in the greater fabrication, as we'll point out more and more on the retreat. Sometimes more fabrication means more soul-making, or skillful fabrication, as we could call soul-making. And sometimes there's an element of the soul, we could say, or dimension of the soul, that the decrease of fabrication, the movement towards the unfabricated, and that spectrum there, is also soul-making in a different way.

So the relationship there—there are all the different permutations and possibilities in terms of making delineations, increase or decrease of fabrication, and serving or not serving soul-making. It's not that simple. And it invites our investigation and our careful attention and our intelligence.

Why am I saying all this? You might be wondering. Well, because it will guide our work, or a lot of this will guide our work, certain material that we're exploring together in this course, certainly your practice, especially as it develops. Some of this will really guide that work and your thinking—your thinking about these things and thinking about practice and how you approach practice.

I'm saying some of it also really as a kind of justification for what's being presented here and for this whole structure and integrated path and the introduction of new concepts, etc., that seem kind of unusual or really counter to what we might have heard before. So it's partly, yeah, I admit, it's a kind of feeling it might be important for some people to have that justification and to have it make sense.

But there's another reason I'm saying all this, and in a way I'm saying it for the future. What we're presenting here and what we're going into here and what we're kind of elaborating and building, if you like, and playing with—playing with building in terms of concepts and practices and refinements of attention and all that—it's not a closed system. It might be integrated, and maybe it seems that way, but my hope is it's really not a closed system.

My hope is, or the invitation, really, is that as time goes on in the future or very soon or whenever, that you, or some of you, will feel like you want to or are called upon to add, to build, to what we're talking about here and what we're sharing together here and exploring and experimenting with and presenting.

So I'm saying this for the service of opening an avenue that no one owns, that other people can add to and build tributaries and other avenues that connect up or make more lanes in the highway or whatever the analogy would be, or a building that then is added to and given a whole extension or whatever it is. I'm saying it for the sake of creativity.

Because there's a whole other way, and I'm going to come back to this—there's a whole other dimension of practice which has to do with the creativity of one's practice, or the creativity of even making one's own practice, making one's own path, making one's own dharma, creating, discovering one's own dharma. The eros, and the soul-making of the creativity of Dharma, or Dharma as creativity.

It's open. You understand what I'm saying? I know that sounds maybe like a big deal, and not everyone will feel called to that or attracted to it, but I'm saying this for the sake of an open, shared, creative project so that if the time comes and you or indirectly someone wants to make further delineations, wants to make further definitions, wants to add to something, wants to question something, pull something apart, give it another level...

that all these generalities that I've shared about definitions and delineations and the dilemmas involved now apply to doing exactly that.

The erotics of an open, endless, creative path—an open, endless conception. And what does it mean to be wise and creative and insightful and playful and artistic? I'm not sure if those are the right words, but how do we cultivate these qualities in our relationship to practice itself?

This is something we'll return to when we explore the relationship with the path in general, and its other dimensions. But hopefully this makes some sense, and perhaps it will make the sense that it needs to in the places where it needs to.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 59

Eros Unfettered (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h36

> In this opening talk of his groundbreaking series, Rob Burbea introduces the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic as a fundamental movement of soul-making. He explores how eros - understood not merely as sexual desire but as the deep yearning for contact, intimacy, and knowing - operates within imaginal practice and spiritual life. Drawing on Greek mythology's erotes (Eros, Pothos, and Himeros), Burbea explains how this erotic movement penetrates and fertilizes the imaginal realm, creating an endless dynamic of mutual enrichment between desire, image, and understanding.
> The talk addresses common concerns about sexual imagery arising in meditation, legitimizing the full spectrum of erotic experience as potentially sacred. Through detailed examples from his own practice - ranging from subtle hand-holding to intense ritual imagery - Burbea demonstrates how trusting the intelligence and specificity of imaginal figures allows for profound soul-making. He emphasizes that these images are 'sufficient unto themselves' rather than requiring escalation or concretization.
> This teaching offers a radical reframing of desire as potentially spiritual, showing how the eros-psyche-logos dynamic can transform not only our relationship to imaginal figures but our entire perception of self, other, and world through what he terms cosmopoiesis - the making of sacred worlds.

Let's begin to explore and unfold this movement of Eros, the movement of soul-making—what I've been calling the soul-making dynamic, or the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic. We'll examine what it involves, what it brings into being and opens up, and also some of the ways that this whole organic movement can be hindered, blocked, impeded, weakened, or stopped.

I'll speak in theoretical terms but hopefully flesh things out with examples. There's really a double intention here over the next few talks: opening up the possibilities of Eros for ourselves—the possible manifestations of Eros in practice, in life, in our existence, in the way we relate to existence and to image—while also looking at what the possibilities of Eros open for us. What comes forth for us, what becomes available to us because of the movement and different manifestations of Eros?

In a way, through this exploration, we're circling around things and ideas and teachings we've already touched on. There's the hermeneutic circle again—we touch on something, then something else, then come back to revisit the first thing, round and round. Much like a seamstress sewing stitches or knitting a scarf will come back over the same area to add another thread, another color, or entwine threads together. A tapestry gets woven by working over the same material back and forth, adding something each time—more intricacy, more density, more complication, more solidity, more color.

It's interesting that some people who work with imaginal practice wonder: "I'm exploring all this imaginal material, I'm on retreat, perhaps devoting a month to these practices, and it occurs to me that there's a lot of Eros here—often very sexual, explicitly sexual imagery. Why all this Eros? Why all this sexuality, both non-sexual and sexual Eros, in imaginal practice? Is that right? Is it okay?"

This is a good and interesting question. To begin a response: one reason is that we love Eros. We love that fire, and we love its juiciness—using a more watery metaphor. Something in us loves that, and the more Eros flowing through us, the more we love it. Eros has this quality of loving itself—it has its own erotic connection with itself.

Another thing is that in imaginal practices, as we've set them up, the teachers and teachings allow it. We allow that Eros. The logos—the conceptual framework we've established, the explanations—sanctifies and legitimizes Eros. The examples we share in teaching also open something up, normalize it, legitimize it, give it place and space within the teachings.

Through examples, we also communicate the range of images—the breadth of possible archetypes and imaginal figures and characters that come, that operate, that demand attention, that make other demands, that ask for reverence and devotion. This range is deliberately broad, so we're not locked in—and certainly not unconsciously locked in—to just a narrow range of traditional Buddhist images: chastity, equanimity, even temperament, evenness of mind, calmness, sobriety, the fantasy of the hermit. The range of images and archetypes is broad, giving permission for those that don't fit into the more official but often unconscious canon of fantasy communicated in traditional teachings among some streams of Buddhism.

So Eros is sanctioned by the teachings, teachers, and examples. It's legitimized, given place.

Another important reason is that psyche and the imaginal involves beauty. The imaginal involves beauty—perhaps in a very wide range of what that word means. But generally speaking, beauty is a component, an element of the imaginal, of images when they're alive as imaginal images to us. Where there's beauty, there's attraction. And attraction opens the possibility of Eros.

In a way, Eros is intrinsic to the imaginal. So of course it's going to arise. You do imaginal practice—Eros is intrinsic to it.

Of course it's going to come up. Eros is intrinsic to psyche, I would say, to some degree or other. And the more you allow the imaginal, the more you actually allow eros.

If an imaginal figure is felt by us or regarded by us as other—as an otherness to us—it's not being reduced to a faculty of my mind or an aspect of my consciousness or even an aspect of my psyche. It's not being reduced to a result of my personal history. Then that otherness, that personhood, allows eros between me and the image, or even between two different images, even two different intra-psychic images. Eros is allowed because of the otherness there. Eros is an attraction between othernesses, we could say.

When in that otherness we feel or regard images, or when we play with the perspective that images have a claim on us—they have a claim, a deep, far-reaching, profound, soul-resonant claim on the psyche, the way a lover does, the way a lover has a claim on us, or a nuptial claim of a spouse—that claim on us is also erotic. It doesn't necessarily mean it's sexual, but it's erotic, in the way a lover's claim is erotic, and it gives rise to or involves eros.

Always, I think I've said this as well, where there's the imaginal and imaginal figures, it's not always apparent at first, but there's always some kind of love. It might be a very—again, a kind of love, a flavor, an expression of love that doesn't fit into the usual range and the usual picture of what the mind has of what love looks like. It can be, for instance, quite stern or strong or involve seemingly even violent elements, but there is some kind of love there with imaginal figures both ways—we love them and they love us. And there's a desire for contact. In a way, this imaginal figure is an angelus, is an angel, a messenger. It wants to make contact with us, and we want contact. We desire intercourse, if you like, in the broader sense of that word—intercourse. Again, not just sexual. And that desire for contact is, according to this very basic, what I'm calling the small definition, the loose definition of eros—that's the desire for contact, to open to, to relate with. That is eros.

As we sense more into an image—again, it might not be at first obvious, but we sense more into an image—what makes it an imaginal image is this quality or dimension that we begin to notice with imaginal images: their unfathomability, their inexhaustibility. They are not reducible to this or that explanation. We don't ever figure them out, or if we do, they die. They can have this sense of endlessness, bottomlessness almost to them. Because of that unfathomability and inexhaustibility, there is, so to speak, always more for eros—the erotic movement towards that image or in relation to that image. There's always more for the eros to open to, always more for it to penetrate, always more for the eros to know.

These words—penetrate, open, receive, know—are all words with sexual connotations, as I said before. But there's no limit to the penetration because of the imaginal figure's unfathomability. That imaginal figure might be an actual person—alive, a flesh and blood person in our life, or that we know about, or a historical person. We've been through all this before. Our perception of them is imbued with beautiful imaginal dimensions and fantasy in the good sense of the word, and there's no bottom to that, so they are in a way infinitely penetrable. We can open to them endlessly.

Sometimes, again I've explained this before, sometimes wrapped up in images, or an image bears this message, this angelus, this communication of somehow a telos, an end, a point, an end towards which the soul is moving. There is the eros of that magnetic attraction of the soul towards this telos, towards this end, something that the being, the soul is beckoned towards, called towards. What Corbin, Henri Corbin calls "the angel out ahead," or we could say the divine root of something that we're called to.

But that angel out ahead—we never reach it. It's not that we reach it in some kind of union and finish with that. There's an infinite movement towards that. It keeps moving further and further. We move towards it and it takes a step back and beckons us further and further, if you like, on the path of soul making, on the path of deeper, wider divinity. So there's something about who we are becoming, our telos. In some images, they are redolent with that. They communicate that. They shine with that and beckon us in that way. That telos implies or needs eros, that erotic movement.

We could say all this in relation to this question: why all this eros? Why all this sexual imagery even more in the imaginal practice when a person devotes themselves to this kind of practice for a time? Of course someone might say, "No, no, no. You let people daydream and what do you get? You get the defilements running amok, the defilements running away with themselves, increased." That might be someone's knee-jerk assumption.

But as I hope you can really see when you explore these practices in the careful ways that we're talking about, that's absolutely not the case. We'll revisit the doubts that may arise there, but you can see that's not the case.

There are all these answers that we could give, but we can tie all that together. We can weave it together through this, I think, more elegant explanation of what we've been calling the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic or the soul-making dynamic, if that's too technical sounding for you. The explanation, the exploration of how the fire of eros spreads, how it catches alight and sparks fire wider and wider so that it spreads. How the tree, if you like, of soul grows—the organic movement of the growth of this tree, or the way the web of soul-making is woven.

These are different, maybe more poetic languagings of what we mean by the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic or the soul-making dynamic. I've talked about this in other talks, I think in that set of talks "The Sacred Universe: Insight, Theophany, Cosmopoiesis," and in more detail in the series "An Ecology of Love."

So there's this rich range of what Eros wants with respect to the beloved other.

Now, when we have this Eros arising, when there's this erotic connection, contact, intimacy, touching, penetrating, opening, receiving—when there's this erotic relationship with a beloved other, what happens? What are the conditions that are created?

Well, one of the things that happens is that both self and other, both the lover and the beloved, both become more imaginal. They take on more imaginal dimensions. They become pregnant with more soulfulness, if you like. They become ensouled in deeper ways, or differently ensouled.

So this is part of what we mean when we say—and I think I touched on this in some of the talks already—that the imaginal is not fantasy. Fantasy tends to be quite two-dimensional. The figures in fantasy, including oneself in fantasy, tend to be quite two-dimensional, relatively flat. The imaginal, by contrast, involves this pregnancy, this soulfulness, this multi-dimensionality. There are depths there. There are mysteries there. There are resonances and echoes and connections that reverberate through different levels and dimensions of being.

So in the soul-making dynamic, in the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic, when Eros is operating—when there's this erotic connection with a beloved other—both self and other become more imaginal, more pregnant with soulfulness, more multi-dimensional, more mysterious, more beautiful.

Now, what does Psyche refer to in all this? Psyche, we can say, refers to this very process of ensouling, of becoming more soulful, of taking on these imaginal dimensions. It's the very movement, the very organic process whereby beings—whether it's oneself or the other—take on more depth, more mystery, more beauty, more resonance.

And Logos—what's Logos doing in all this? Well, Logos has several functions. One is that it provides a kind of conceptual framework that makes sense of what's happening, that gives it meaning, that allows us to understand and articulate the process. But Logos is more than just concepts. It's also the very meaningfulness that gets woven into the experience, the significance that permeates it.

When something becomes ensouled, when it takes on these imaginal dimensions through Eros, it becomes meaningful in deeper ways. It becomes significant. It carries weight and resonance and connection to larger patterns of meaning. So Logos is both the framework that helps us understand the process, and it's also the very meaningfulness that gets created in the process.

And here's the beautiful thing: these three—Eros, Psyche, and Logos—they're not separate. They work together. They support each other. They amplify each other. The more erotic connection there is, the more ensouling happens. The more ensouling happens, the more meaningful it all becomes. And the more meaningful it becomes, the more it feeds the Eros, the more it sustains and deepens the erotic connection.

So if it's possible to hear these words with more of their full range. Eros wants all that, but classically in Greek mythology, Eros is always accompanied by two other gods: Pothos and Himeros. Together they form a trinity, an erotic trinity called the Erotes—a little band of three.

I think it's Plato who explains that Pothos has to do with what is not so much present, but what is absent. It's the yearning, the longing for what is absent—and in our case, particularly for what is not yet here. We'll return to this. Himeros, again according to Plato, derives from the Greek word related to stream and rushing—the way a stream rushes. There's a stream of soul, part of this soul movement.

This Pothos and Himeros accompany Eros. What does this mean? Pothos is always wanting more. It accompanies Eros, so Eros is always accompanied by this wanting more—wanting what's not yet here. It wants something further, wider, beyond what has already been reached or met or encountered or known or achieved. Because of this Pothos that always accompanies Eros, there's an endlessly dynamic quality to Eros. Eros is endlessly dynamic in its thrusting, its penetration, its opening, its embracing movement. With Himeros and Pothos, Eros is movement—endlessly dynamic movement. You always want more.

As I've said, Eros is a kind of desire—actually a whole group of desires that are erotic. But it's a particular kind of desire that always relates to or involves the imaginal. Eros is a desire to know, to experience the other, the object, the image, more deeply, more widely, more sensitively, more finely and subtly, as well as more grossly—the more obvious kinds of intimacy and knowing, as well as developing increasing subtlety in that knowing, meeting, touching, connecting, penetrating, opening to, receiving of the image, of the object, whatever it is. And to know it and experience it more completely and more fully.

There is this movement to keep thrusting, to keep opening. In this movement—a movement into the imaginal—Eros penetrates the imaginal and inseminates it, or opens to it and is inseminated itself by the imaginal, by Psyche. It fertilizes the imaginal, the soil of the imaginal territory. There's an increase in what we're calling Psyche, or an increase in the image. There's a swelling, a tumescence, a growing of something. Not like daydreaming where images get carried away, one thing leading to another, but an increase in the sense of richness of the imaginal object.

It gains in imaginal richness, in complexity—the way a piece of paper or fold of cloth gains dimensionality when you crunch it up with all these folds. There's an increase of dimensionality, of aspects or folds, the faces of the beloved other, the particularities. We discover more particularities, more richness, more complexity, a widening of who they are, what this thing is—the beloved object or other, the imaginal object. They become wider and deeper. They contain more dimensions.

With that, the logos is also pushed forward. If I'm regarding a person in my life in whatever relationship we have, and they become alive for me in this erotic, imaginal way...

The beloved becomes a theophany, a divine manifestation. Through the very particulars of their being, their expression, their actions, I witness how they embody a face of God—not separate from God, intimately connected to the manifestation of Buddha nature and divinity in exquisitely particular ways. This goes far beyond the general recognition that "everything is love" or "everything is awareness, therefore Buddha nature." Rather, through their unique particularities, through their irreducible personhood, through this exact way they appear to me anew, the divine reveals itself.

Because I perceive and sense all this, the psyche undergoes transformation. My conception expands—not merely of who this person is, but of what any human being fundamentally is. The logos of human existence stretches to encompass the understanding that a person is not simply a biological mechanism, however complex and marvelous that may be, but simultaneously and intricately a theophany. The very ideas of what constitutes theophany, the relationship between divine and human and soul—all this expands as well.

Through this thrusting and opening of Eros, both image and psyche expand, and the logos grows in relation to this beloved and potentially to others as well. As they become more sumptuous, more complex, more rich with facets—more refractions of light from the different surfaces of the jewel they reveal themselves to be—this very richness entices and elicits an increase in Eros itself.

Thus the whole dynamic unfolds: Eros inseminates psyche and logos, while the larger, fuller, more complex and beautiful psyche and logos inflame Eros further. You witness this inflating, self-fertilizing, mutually fertilizing movement—not a snowball effect, for that strikes me as an inadequate metaphor—but rather this feeding of each element by the others, the whole becoming increasingly fecund, expanding, widening, deepening.

We could say I discover more in my beloved—more dimensions, more faces, more theophanies. Simultaneously, we must acknowledge that I am creating this. The psyche creates it. This process of creating and discovering reveals more of the beloved other, and this expanding, mutually fertilizing dynamic of widening, deepening, enriching, and complicating does not happen instantaneously.

It unfolds over time, inevitably in stages, not smoothly in the sense of continuous flow. Something opens, we become captivated by that opening, we explore and expand at that level, we dwell with that beauty, and then potentially the movement grows again. There are natural stages to this unfolding.

The movement can also be unsmooth in that it may be blocked or diverted—something we will return to later. But when unimpeded, notice this crucial point: there is never any complete knowing, complete penetrating, complete opening to the beloved. We never fully know, penetrate, or open to receive the beloved other—whether person, inanimate object, aspect of nature, or intrapsychic image. No finality is possible to our knowing.

This creating and discovering is potentially infinite, driven by pothos—always more, always more, always more—or by himeros, the flowing, the onward flowing.

But it is not only the object that becomes amplified, extended, widened, deepened, complicated, made sacred, discovered, created. Because subject and object are always mutually dependent horizons—they always go together—not only the object but the subject, the self as well, is subject to this same process. Caught up in the same web, involved together, turning with the same movement.

Not only does the object receive dimensionality or have its dimensionality revealed, not only are its beauties and complexities given or discovered—we ourselves undergo the same transformation. The imaginal sense of self expands in precisely the same way. Everything I have described in relation to the object applies equally to the sense of self, the imaginal sense of self in those moments of unfolding.

This is not always obvious to people and sometimes gets missed, with significant consequences. But again, subject and object always go together.

And another aspect that weaves together with all of this is the world—the larger perception that encompasses not just the object and the self, not just self and other, but the entire cosmos of our experience. All of this unfolds naturally through the dependent arising of perception. Self, other, and world are always co-fabricated together.

Depending on the eros present—its nature and quality—and how it fabricates imaginally, a particular self-other-world constellation emerges. They become co-constellated, inseparable. We could say self-other-world-in-eros, all arising together as one dynamic whole.

We will return to this understanding, but what's crucial to recognize is that all of these dimensions—psyche, logos, and eros—are expanded, deepened, widened, and enriched together. Self, other, world, and eros itself all undergo this simultaneous transformation. Through this process, unfolding in stages, they too eventually are felt and seen to have more dimensions, eventually revealing their divinity.

This is where our understanding of cosmopoiesis emerges. You work with an image and it spills out into the perception of the world. Why does this happen? Because the object and the eros with the object naturally draw in self and world, weaving them into that imaginal co-constellation. This is inevitable because they form part of that fourfold co-constellation we've been exploring.

Now, we could speak of eros, psyche, and logos as separate things, and we could define eros in that smaller sense we discussed earlier. Yet as I've mentioned before, eros truly implies and involves the whole eros-psyche-logos dynamic—the entire soul-making process. While we can speak of eros, psyche, and logos as distinct, there's another way to understand their relationship: eros, image, and concept—or idea—are actually aspects of psyche. They are aspects of soul-making, not truly separate phenomena.

We will revisit this understanding, but it's important to recognize that image and idea are not really separate. Image actually always involves ideas—plural. They interpenetrate completely.

This brings us to a fascinating question: what does eros desire? What does it want to touch, to know, to penetrate and open to exactly? What is the nature of this other, whether it's a purely intrapsychic image, an actual person, an object in nature, an animal, or anything else that draws our erotic attention?

The object that eros desires is, in fact, image and idea. It is psyche and logos. Eros wants psyche and logos. This offers another way of understanding what's actually occurring in these moments of soul-making.

The object is constituted by—its very nature is—psyche and logos. It is image and idea. Even when I'm speaking of a flesh-and-blood person, when I'm in a certain relationship to them that allows and gives permission for this way of seeing, the object—my beloved other—is image and idea wrapped up with flesh-and-blood reality.

Someone might protest: "But what about the real object as it is? What about the object as it really exists?" And at this point, you know what the response must be. The response to that question—"What about the real object, the object as it really is?"—is laughter.

Always there is concept, there is logos involved in any perception. I have emphasized this countless times. If there truly were no conception involved in perception, there would be no perception at all—there would be fading. Why? Because concept is part of avijjā, part of the very mechanism that allows perception to arise.

So this notion of "the object as it is" reveals the fundamental problem with realism. I won't elaborate this entire teaching again, but it relates directly to our understanding of emptiness and the absence of inherent existence in all phenomena.

Another way of expressing all of this might be to say that what eros ultimately wants is more psyche. Eros desires psyche, endlessly longing for psyche. There is the beautiful myth that some of you will know—the myth of the love between Eros and Psyche, their eternal dance of desire and soul.

Eventually they get incorporated into the pantheon of gods. But we could say in all this, from a theoretical perspective, what is Eros wanting? We could phrase it a few different ways, and one way of saying it is this: because the object is psyche and logos, and because logos—idea—is wrapped up with image anyway, and the object is image and idea, that's really psyche. Eros wants soul. It wants image. It wants cosmopoiesis. It wants the ideas and concepts and images that are fecund and beautiful. Eros wants psyche—it wants more and more psyche.

Another way of saying all this is that the soul loves soul-making. The soul has an erotic desire for soul-making. The soul desires soul-making. So there are different ways of explaining all this, but in a way, they're just different ways of saying the same thing.

Let's look at that dynamic with a few examples and talk a bit more about it. We'll explore it both in imaginal practice and in life, with different kinds of erotic objects, beloved others.

Starting with purely intra-psychic imaginal practice, we can see that eros is sometimes explicitly sexual—obviously sexual—and sometimes not. Let's begin with sexual eros, partly because what I want to do in these talks is to open up the sexual, open up that doorway of the sexual and legitimize it, sanction it.

Again, we've said before that the sexual is not equivalent with the erotic. It's one face of the erotic. When we say erotic, we don't mean sexual, as has become common parlance. Sexual images and sexual action in life are just one way of knowing, experiencing, contacting, connecting, opening, penetrating. It's just one way—one strand or thread of the erotic movement.

But at the same time, while we've established this distinction, it's not interchangeable with another way. In other words, we cannot simply replace sexual knowing with another kind of knowing. You can do that if you want, but don't assume they're interchangeable strands of eros.

Let's linger with this for a while. Sex and sexual images cannot be reduced—we cannot assume that they are, for instance, just expressing love, or that this particular sexual image is just expressing a voice wanting union, melting together into oneness, or certainly that it's just a desire for pleasant sensations. Sex and sexual images can involve these things as primary elements, but what drives sexuality and generates sexual images is much more involved than that.

I'd be cautious of narrowing it down this way. In spiritual circles, these kinds of ideas about sexuality are very common: it's an expression of love, or it's wanting oneness and union, or it's just seeking pleasure. But remember something from previous courses about the specificity of images. Images are very, very specific. When we reduce them, they lose their specificity. This image, with all its particular nuances and details and the very particular ways it was felt and sensed, cannot be replaced just by an idea like "it was wanting union" or "it's a movement towards oneness."

The specificity of images is something really important. So yes, the sexual is one way of knowing, but it's also that the image wants this way. The image shows this particular way—this specific way of penetrating, of opening, of intercourse in the larger sense. This expression of eros is being shown in the image. This is what the image wants.

There's a principle here that I've touched on in previous retreats about trusting the intelligence of the soul, the intelligence of the dynamism of the soul. Sometimes that's hard to generate, but just playing with a little bit of trust nourishes the process. It's very specific.

The images are specific. They're not just reducible, interchangeable, or equivalent to one kind of eros with another. If we extend that point, you also see that implied in this idea is the exact specificity of the sexual image—because we're talking about sexual images, starting with that.

What you'll notice, I think, inevitably, if you really do these practices and you're truly open to this, exploring them in the ways we're discussing—with mindfulness, with sensitivity, with awareness of the energy body, with noticing the soul resonances, and all that we've described in what we consider imaginal practice—you will find that often, maybe not all the time, but often the erotic images that might arise, whatever they are, and become what you're meditating with, are what I like to say sufficient unto themselves.

There might be a particular activity, sexual activity, interaction or communication or relationship going on. This is true for all images, whether they're sexual or not. But it's sufficient unto itself. There's some particular activity embodied, manifested in the image itself that is, if you like, intrinsic to the image. That means it doesn't follow the usual way that images—like one thing leads to the next, as they say, for life, and also with images—progress. One thing happens, then one thing leads to the next, and so on. There's a kind of sufficiency unto itself that's part of what the image wants. It's intelligent.

So it's not that you're working in meditation and something erotic arises, something sexual, and then there's this kind of progression or escalation to, say, genital intercourse or orgasm or whatever. It doesn't have that kind of escalation necessarily at all.

In fact, quite rarely. There's something about just lingering. It just wants to be just that, whatever that is. Of course, that might be genital intercourse, but it doesn't have this escalatory sort of propulsion to it.

Nor certainly does it imply at all or propel one to concretize that action in any way in the world. We've been through all this in regard to imaginal practice, but remember that in relation to sexual images as well.

So yes, the pothos and the himeros, the always wanting more and the stream, the onward rushing stream, will give rise to, as I said, impregnating the imaginal, impregnating psyche and fertilizing the images. But that fertilization is a deepening, an enriching, a giving dimension to and a discovering dimension in the image. It's not in the same way that unmindful daydreaming just leads one thing onto another, or fantasy in the way it's usually meant—being lost in sexual fantasy or whatever in the poor meaning of the term. It's not that kind of wanting more and rushing on.

So we go back to things from other retreats that you've listened to. There are narrative images where the whole thing seems to progress in time in this narrative way. This happened at this time. There's either an aimlessness to it or a kind of purposive narrative. This thing happens and then it's great because this next thing was able to happen and this next thing—whoopee! That's usually, not always, but that's usually a telltale sign that the ego has gotten involved and it's spinning a narrative thread, usually towards some kind of triumphant thing or towards collecting something or something like that, or towards doom.

This is in contrast—narrative images are in contrast to what we call the imaginal or iconic images, where there's a quality that we can notice of eternality or timelessness to them. They're more characterized by that. Same with the sexual imaginal, the erotic imaginal. They don't move in time towards some great whoopee necessarily.

Again, it's something to do with the integrity, if you like, and the intelligence of the image, that they don't actually escalate necessarily, and often they don't escalate in that more common way.

They also, again, with this idea of the integrity and intelligence specificity of an image, you'll notice as you play with these kinds of practices more and more, and with the energy body, that images have their own specific register or wavelength of appearance or energy. I can't remember if I've said this on other retreats. I think I have. I'm almost certain I have.

In other words, one could have a sexual image or eros that one's working with in meditation, and it could be very, very ethereal. The forms, the bodies involved are just sort of light bodies, maybe of different colors, or it's all very insubstantial. The resonances with the energy body and the visual, or rather the tangible perception of the image, is towards the insubstantial end of energy bodies. Or it can be very substantial—just feels and looks really solid and earthy and fleshy and very substantial.

That whole range is available. You'll notice, again, that you can play with it because you can actually learn to modulate the register of an image. But it seems to me that, again, images have a certain kind of integrity and intelligence in their specificity. So if it wants to be really fleshy and solid, that's what it somehow wants to be.

And to not immediately want to make it ethereal, or the other way around. This is not always simple as a subject - it depends on the person. But we're saying something about trusting the specificity of images.

Related to this, there's also a huge range in the sexual imaginal, the erotic imaginal - in the sexual dimension of intensity and carnality, of lust and wildness. There's no better or worse with these ranges. Something that seems really lusty and carnal, really intense in its sexuality, really wild, is not better or worse or less spiritual than something that's very gentle and ethereal, where what it expresses of sexuality is quite subtle. No better or worse - it's really about discerning the intelligence of this image. Can I play with the idea of trusting that, assuming there is an intelligence there and going with it, seeing that in the specificity the image offers?

Just to give you a sense of the range here: I had an image some years ago of a couple - I didn't quite know who they were. They were simply on a path in a forest, and all that was happening was they were holding hands. It was a relatively brief image, but there was something in the holding hands. There was Eros there in the hands. The bodies weren't particularly insubstantial - they were just fleshy bodies - but there was something very subtle in what was passing between them, in the erotic movement through the hand-holding. Very subtle, certainly not X-rated, but this was an erotic imaginal image. There was something about tenderness that was actually really palpable - the love, the softness, the tenderness that passed between them through the hand-holding. One could almost neglect it as an image, but I want to give you a sense of the range and this sense of really trusting the intelligence and specificity of the image.

Notice that in this case, it wasn't even that I was involved. I was witnessing another couple.

Another erotic image that came to me was like a celestial wedding. Again, there was a couple there, and again I was witnessing something. This couple was dancing with each other in an almost formulaic ritual way. There were columns with garlands around them, and they were dancing in and out of the columns, touching hands and holding hands. The whole thing had this very light quality - something really delicate and beautiful and celebratory. I was witnessing this union, almost at another level, a celestial union. The whole thing felt very light, very luminous, though it wasn't particularly insubstantial. They were flesh and blood bodies, this bridal couple, not bodies of light.

Actually, something similar I remember - maybe I'll tell this one in more detail, partly because of what these examples might offer for your practice.

I sat down to meditate one day a couple of years ago, and there was actually a lot of distraction - distracting images. I'd seen a movie the night before, and I was noticing how when you see a movie, the images stay in the mind and dominate for a while, for a day or two even, especially if you don't see many movies. So it was taking time to start, to filter it out. Does this have an imaginal sense to it, or has the mind just been impressed upon by something?

Now, it could be that an image from a movie becomes imaginal for me. Certainly that happens many times, or an image from a character in a book becomes imaginal. So it's not that a priori an image from a movie is not to be followed. But there was a sense of feeling the waters, fishing around - what's genuinely imaginal here, has that quality that I might tune into?

After some time for the mind to settle, an image appeared that I'd had before, quite common for me: a young man, relatively young, alone in a prison cell.

And there's a sort of spiraling stone staircase descending into a dark cellar, and that's his prison cell. I can see that I'm traveling down that staircase to where he is in his prison cell, and there's a tiger that appears beside me, and beside that young man. So I'm somehow moving in and out of identifying with him. At this point, I'm just finding my way into the image.

The tiger, too, was a very common image for me at that time. This tiger has a very powerful, very calm and silent energy—an immense power. So I descend into the cellar, and I notice that actually the top of the stairs admits light. This is interesting. I look up, and I think it's actually open. So this is doubly interesting—the prison is somehow actually optional.

As I go into the cellar, I see that it's peopled. There are various characters there. It's not just this young man. There's a sort of wizard character there—again, a character that I'd encountered before with certain characteristics we don't need to go into here. And there's also a beautiful lady in white, again a character with other characteristics we don't need to go into here.

Interestingly—and again, I'm still describing how I'm getting into the image—I'm still not sure what to focus on here. I focus on her for a while, and her appearance keeps changing as I focus on her, mixing with images from the films that I saw. Then doubt arises. I'm not sure—is this right? What's happening?

I'm describing all this just to paint a picture of what actually happens, as we're going to talk about practice, of course, and doubt and all that. What I did at that point was go a little deeper into the sense of samādhi in the energy body. Remember, all this is connected with that. The mind can't really settle here on what to connect with as an image. Let's just go deeper into the samādhi sense and feel the subtle body, the energy body.

In doing that, sometimes what can happen with the energy body—maybe it happens with some people more than others—is that the energy body sort of begins to float free of the physical body. This is not anything at all to do with being disconnected from the body. There's still this real sense of being really intimate with the feeling in the body. But it's as if the subtle body floats free and sort of flies free of the body. You can feel it flying, and oftentimes for me it wants to turn cartwheels or somersaults. There's a kind of exuberant joy in it.

I can really feel that very palpably in the energy field of the body, and I also see it—it's kind of blue and a kind of white-yellow light. It feels really good and joy arises with that. So sometimes for some people it's related to a possibility that arises with a certain amount of samādhi. This feels good and joy arises with it.

Then it's almost like I'm seeing this subtle-bodied angel, if you like, but I'm no longer really identifying so much. There's definitely not 100 percent identification with this subtle-bodied angel. And this subtle-bodied angel and the beautiful woman who was there—she now also has a more subtle body of light—so what happened, as I went into the energy body with more samādhi and followed this energy body movement, it started to change the image. There's that dependent arising, mutual dependent arising of energy body, mind state, and image, and we're acknowledging all that.

But this subtle-bodied angel and the beautiful woman with the body of light, they start to dance. Dance is really the best I can do as a word for what they're doing. They're somehow floating and interacting with each other in such a movement of delight. There's so much delight and mutual sympathy and resonance in the way their movements reflect and respond to each other and work together. It's very hard to describe in words, but they were full of delight and the whole scene was full of delight and it delighted me and there was a lot of joy in this.

Also I want to mention that as this was happening, there was a lot of—the thinking mind started flashing lots of insights very, very quickly and intuitively. It wasn't like pondering something, just lots of very quick flashes of intuitive insight around cosmopoiesis and other stuff.

This is quite a few years ago, and I still remember developing this material as insights were occurring to me. Notice also that the thinking mind can be drawn into this process in a really creative way, becoming part of the whole experience.

Now I'm witnessing this erotic interaction, this intercourse in the widest possible sense. But it's really not raunchy or sexual at all—it's very ethereal for a start. What they're really doing is just moving in this way together, dancing if you call it that, in these bodies of light. It truly feels like a vision of another realm where these two, this couple, are somehow eternally in this erotic dance together. Somehow I'm given a vision or an opening into this other realm, and that's exactly what it feels like.

When this had been going on for quite a while in the meditation, I felt like I was losing touch with that world—it was fading a bit. So I went back to this subtle body sense of feeling like the subtle body was flying, the actual feeling of that, turning cartwheels and floating, really feeling how that feels. And again, that feeling in the energy body was very powerful, very lovely and enjoyable, and helped me to access that kind of realm or world again, the vision of that.

So yes, imagining the subtle body floating and flying through the air of the room—because then I could also transport it from that cellar to the room I was actually in, the room at Gaia House. Imagining the subtle body while feeling it, so image and energy body interacting there, allowed that whole sense to come back, that whole image to open up again of the couple.

Just tracing that again as an example—very insubstantial, if we go back to this range of what's possible. Sexual, yes, but in a very gentle way, and certainly not obviously genital or anything like that.

Many times, sitting in meditation, it's as if a deva or a dakini or an angel comes and kisses me on the heart. This has a really healing, soothing effect—very beautiful, very delicate, very loving, but so specific in the qualities of this angel and the way the kiss is given and the effect, its ripple through the energy body. Some of them are characterized by tenderness or by humor or by mischievous playfulness and a sort of seductive quality. But so many possibilities in the specificity—the range is huge.

Or you might get an image of what you know from the Tibetan word yab-yum: the icons of Buddhas in erotic union and sexual union with their consort. Different Buddhas with their specific consorts in erotic union, right at the center of a mandala or a thangka. This would be quite a common image to arise in meditation.

Again, who is it? Who is it who's involved? What are the characteristics of that yab-yum, of that penetration, of that opening? It may well involve melting. There is bliss in that melting. It may be characterized by tremendous tenderness that goes with the melting, and tenderness melts together. It may be that it starts substantial, becomes insubstantial, just melts into light. What started as two figures just becomes a melting into some color of light, and the figures and their independence and their forms are dissolved in that light.

So all kinds of possibilities here. There may be images and imaginal senses involving different kinds of penetration—sexual penetration, actually all kinds of erotic penetration, because it can even be penetration through the gaze, and this is something we'll come back to. What is it to feel penetrated by the gaze of an imaginal figure? What is it to feel their gaze penetrating you in erotic union that's through the gaze?

But there can be all kinds of penetration, all different ways, and they don't at all need to correspond to or be constrained by any kind of anatomical, biological accuracy. You or an imaginal figure might, for instance, have five penises—there's a statue of Hermes that I saw somewhere that indeed had five penises. You can penetrate or feel penetrated in more than one place at the same time, something that's obviously not biologically possible: maybe in the middle of your head, or in the middle of the imaginal figure's head, or through the front of the throat. It can feel or seem in different ways that the whole body is being penetrated. Again, it doesn't make biological anatomical sense.

There can certainly be gender reversal. So I'm used to thinking of myself as a man or a woman, or I define myself in some way, but there's no constraint or stasis necessarily in terms of gender identities in the imaginal realm. Even with gender, there's not necessarily a clear visual sense that corresponds to gender. There might be, or there might not be.

Penetration, as I said, might have to do more with energy penetrating. It might be very carnal, very physical and conforming to human anatomy. It might certainly be homoerotic. The range is enormous, and it could be a penetration of being, of beingness itself—what's that?

The imaginal is not, as I said, constrained to any kind of gender identity that we're used to. It could be hermaphroditic. Sexual orientations that we're usually identified with, if we are identified with them, hold no sway in the imaginal realm. There's some other intelligence operating that just breaks that open, doesn't feel limited, is not limited by that.

So there are all these possibilities. Let me describe another one. Some of these images, actually this one in particular, has a slightly different context, so there are bits I'll leave out and bits that have connotations that won't be clear from what I'm saying. But I think for our purposes right now, it serves.

In meditation, I see myself or feel myself on a large raft. There's a whole cast of other characters on this raft with me—a large wooden flat raft that's on the sea, drifting. Some of the characters are familiar from other images I'd worked with in the past, that had come and visited me, and some completely new, unrecognized from before. Some of them are very clear, and some are just vague presences. I couldn't even quite get a sense of them or a picture of them.

Not only that, but at first the number of figures—there are clearly quite a few of them, but exactly how many seemed to be changeable. It seemed more or less, and not even necessarily a finite number, potentially. The individuals themselves could change. They hadn't settled down completely.

Then it seemed like suddenly the raft was like a theatre stage. It was being lit up, so it was on the ocean, this big flat wooden raft, being lit up—this theatre that now felt like a theatre stage—being lit up by intense flashes of lightning, very dramatic lightning coming from the heavens, as if from God or something. So this stage, this theatre stage, was illuminated by the lightning, this periodic lightning, whereas the water around it was not. The water around it was black, dark.

Suddenly with all that, tremendous energy shoots through the image, and it begins. On this raft, on this theatre stage at sea, illuminated by the lightning, a rite begins. There's a woman there. She's mostly naked, a dark woman, mostly naked, but her body is daubed in splashes and strokes of black paint or tar or something. She has amulets around her upper arms, and she's full of vital energy and force. She's exuding this vital energy and force.

A rite begins between her and me, watched by the other characters, as if they form a circle watching this rite. What happens in the rite, unlike some rites, is not formulaic. It's more improvised. It's part dance and part sex, basically, and part different acts of union. There's a lot of energy involved. The energy is quite, if you like, dark and powerful, but I don't mean by "dark" evil. We've been through this in the re-enchanting retreat and other events, possibly other retreats. Dark, in my language, is not evil at all, as most people tend to think in terms of certain archetypes.

She's a dark goddess. It's very, very beautiful. But she's not someone like Kali, who's a sort of overwhelming, primordial, destructive force of nature. She's very powerful, and she's a dark goddess, but it's not that kind of completely, just decimatingly destructive force that I think goes with the goddess Kali, although I'm not quite sure of that iconography.

Now, in this rite, part of what we do, this dark goddess and I—I don't know if you ever did this, maybe it's a weird thing. When I was a kid, my brother and I had two friends who lived just up the street. We must have been seven, I'm guessing. I don't know where we got the idea from—maybe it was from a TV show or something—but we cut our arms just a little bit so that they bled a little bit, and then we pressed the two bleeding arms together, me and my friend, so that we would be blood brothers. I don't know if you've heard of this. I honestly can't remember where we got it from; it must have been some TV thing or something. What that was, really, for us back then when we were kids, was symbolic of our friendship and our commitment. I really loved these guys, and we were buddies and we were always out on the street playing or riding to the park. It was symbolic of our deep commitment to each other as friends.

So that's part of what happens in this rite with this dark goddess on the raft—we cut our arms and we press the bleeding parts together to become blood friends, if you like, or related. It's a symbol of our deep commitment to each other and commitment to something. I'm not even quite sure in the image what.

This image was something I returned to a few times. I was experimenting at the time with the whole notion of pacing with images—when to return, when to deliberately return to a certain element of it, when to just move on to another image. I think I hope I talked about that in past retreats. When I return to it at some stage later, even the next day or later that day, I can't remember, we do this rite again, and her blood is actually black. She has black blood. And I receive this black blood of hers into my veins.

Then I went out for some walking meditation. I was on retreat at the time.

I went out for some walking meditation, and this infusion of her black blood into my body filled my whole being with tremendous energy. But more than that—as I was walking, it felt like that same energy, that same black blood essence was suffusing into my body from nature itself during the walking meditation. She was somehow a nature goddess, and I could actually feel this surge of energy, this black blood current from nature, permeating my whole body, my whole energy body.

Engaging with this image in my walking meditation very mindfully—walking up and down, stopping and standing, being present with this unfoldment—that infusion into the energy body actually transformed my imaginal sense of my body and the earth as well. My energy body became a dancing god, like a very thick-set, heavy, muscular form, quite different from the body I have in this life. And this god in my energy body was dancing a really energetic, powerful dance, something like the haka—you know, the dance the All Blacks rugby team performs to intimidate their opposing team. Something like that was moving through my energy body and imagination while the physical body remained still in walking meditation. We've talked about these kinds of possibilities in imaginal practice before.

At other times, returning to this thread of blood mixing, the image took on much gentler qualities in terms of what it opened up. The mixing of blood became this merging of beings in profound, beautiful love and a kind of softly ecstatic union. So the very same thread of the image felt completely different at different times, giving rise to different trajectories within the larger imaginal constellation.

But also at other times—this is all within the same constellation of images on the raft in this rite—the erotic rite between the dark goddess and myself involved dismembering each other. Ripping or chopping each other's limbs, all the limbs, severing them from the other. She would do that to me, I would do that to her. Anatomically, physically, it doesn't make sense, but chopping all the limbs of the other, cutting their body into pieces, laying these out on the raft—these limbs and body pieces—and then smearing one's own body with the parts and dismembered limbs of the other. So that one's own body becomes daubed in the blood, and then feasting, devouring the limbs and flesh of the other.

Why am I sharing all this? To give you a sense of the range. Clearly, that image wasn't insubstantial at all—it was very substantial, very carnal, very intense. For many people, this just sounds weird or pathological or whatever. But actually, there was tremendous meaning that emerged from that image—a tremendous amount, in fact—infused with holiness, infused with beauty. Is it the standard picture of holiness and beauty? No, it's not. Am I ever going to dismember anyone? Of course not. But what I want to convey through these examples is to open up the sense of the possible manifestations of sexually erotic imaginal imagery.

So we return to this question: What does the image want? Can I trust the integrity and intelligence of images? Or if I can even grant them a little bit of trust—trusting their integrity and intelligence—what does that open up? What does that allow? What does that allow to unfold? What does that set in motion through my trust?

When I grant that trust, and the image has this iconic, timeless or eternal aspect and quality to it, that trust allows the soul-making. This is part of what enables the soul-making. We're interested here in opening and allowing the eros so that the eros can open and allow the soul-making and cosmopoiesis and eros-psyche-logos dynamic—everything we're exploring.

Notice that this granting of trust, this idea of the integrity and intelligence of the image, is a view. It's a way of looking. It's a concept. It's a logos. It's a conceptual framework. We're completely acknowledging that. It's part of the dependent arising, part of our intelligence that we bring to bear, that we play with, knowing it's just an idea and that it will have an effect. Sometimes this is quite a subtle point and difficult for people to grasp.

But what happens in contrast is this: if I reduce an image—if I dismiss it as merely arising because I was clearly traumatized in my past, or as just an expression of my personal history, or if I dismiss it as uninteresting, or explain it away as loneliness when I see a couple holding hands—if I reduce the image in these ways...

If I reduce or dismiss the image, what happens? Then I have a certain way of looking, a certain view, a certain concept—logos operating. What happens to the whole process? It just folds, usually. So again, there's dependent arising here. We're going to come back to this.

What happens if I feel guilty—some kind of guilt from my upbringing or from other kinds of teachings I've received in different cultures—and I feel guilty about having a sexual image arise? That's actually interesting, the effect of guilt. Again, the guilt becomes a view, a lens, a way of looking, a part of the way of looking, and there's a concept built into that: this is something I should be guilty of, that I should feel guilty of, that is bad. There's a conceptual framework informing it, shaping a way of looking in the view, and that affects what happens.

Well, guilt's an interesting one, because it could inhibit the movement, the soul-making movement, certainly inhibit the image, so we just shut it off or bring the mind back to the tip of the nose or whatever it is that we're doing, or different so-called spiritual practices, or bring it back to so-called reality or whatever. Or the guilt can—and I think I've talked about this before—guilt can, shame and guilt can also propel something more. They have their place in the mechanism of what propels addiction. Often it's the shame and the seeing of something as bad that somehow creates an energy that's intolerable that propels the whole process. And I just repeat the addiction because of the shame, because the intolerability of something is part of the whole cycle.

I've talked about that before, so I'm not going to dwell on it here, but the question is: if I feel guilty, it's the opposite of trusting the intelligence of the image. What effect does that have on what can or does unfold?

And then there's the whole question too—and we'll come back to this as well—of if there's a lot of energy, a lot of sexual energy or arousal, or sometimes just a lot of agitation anyway, or stress, and then sometimes sexual fantasy or actual orgasm is something the being is just seeking out as a way of seeking to discharge energy. So we'll come back to that, but if that's what's propelling the whole movement, then it will go down a certain line and escalate—one thing leads to another in that way.

So there are many different things that can come into how we're viewing the image at any time, in terms of ideas, subtle ideas—sometimes we're not even conscious of them—or intentions or whatever views, ways of looking. And this all has an impact.

So that's enough for now, but I want to really start to go into this Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic, when we can relate to the image in certain ways that allow that, and how it spills over, as I've mentioned, into the self-image, the images of self that are operating, as well as images of other and world, in cosmopoiesis, and other aspects of this organic movement of soul-making.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 60

Eros Unfettered (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h21

> In this profound exploration of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, Rob Burbea examines how authentic eros naturally expands beyond its initial object to transform our entire experiential constellation. When the soul-making process is allowed to flow unimpeded, it simultaneously deepens our perception of the beloved other, reveals the imaginal dimensions of the self, and opens new ways of experiencing the world through cosmopoiesis—the birthing of sacred cosmos.
> Burbea distinguishes between narrow desire arising from a solidified sense of self (which constitutes clinging) and imaginal eros that emerges from and nourishes our multidimensional, divine nature. Through detailed examples from meditation practice, he demonstrates how erotic images can catalyze profound shifts in perception, revealing the world as inherently erotic and sacred. The teaching explores how eros functions as what Jung called "cosmogonic love"—a force that literally generates new ways of experiencing reality.
> The talk addresses advanced practitioners working with imaginal meditation while remaining accessible to those exploring the intersection of contemplative practice and the sacred dimensions of desire. Burbea shows how authentic eros opens infinite possibilities for experiencing divinity, moving us beyond both secular and religious dogma into an ever-expanding field of soul-making exploration.

I know this represents a substantial amount of material with considerable detail. Let me restate the larger trajectory we are following—specifically, the portion of the trajectory we are currently exploring.

We are investigating and opening up the possible manifestations of Eros and its relationship with the imaginal—the full breadth of what this means and can mean, and the ways it can arise. Additionally, we are examining what Eros, when it is truly open, will open for us and reveal to us. This connects with our exploration of what we are calling the soul-making dynamic, the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic.

I will offer various examples as we progress through this exploration. Some of these are purely intrapsychic, arising perhaps in formal meditation practice. Others relate to our perceptions in the world—of the world, of others, of self, of objects. Some are sexual, some non-sexual, yet all are erotic. In discussing the sexual dimension, part of our objective is to open up the possible manifestations of Eros, to legitimize and widen what can be taken and used validly and powerfully as part of our practice.

We have said that when this soul-making dynamic is allowed—when Eros, Psyche, and Logos are permitted to inseminate each other, to grow, expand, deepen, enrich, and complicate each other—then not only is the erotic object, the beloved other, amplified, extended, deepened, and widened in this way, but the self is transformed as well. This occurs because, as we have established, subject and object, self and other, are always dependently arising together.

Where there is an object, there is a subject. If I am focusing on an image or an imaginal perception of another in my life, there is both the sense of them as other, as beloved other, and also the sense of self. Often we miss this, or we do not allow the sense of the self the same soul-making dynamic, the same movement and expansion and deepening of Eros-Psyche-Logos in relation to the self as we do in relation to the other. We will return to this in terms of diagnostics and things that can go wrong.

We have also established that what dependently arises is not merely this polarity of self and other, subject and object, but rather a fourfold meeting, a fourfold co-constellation of self, other, world in general, and Eros. A particular kind of Eros gives rise to a particular perception of other, of self, and of world at large. These four—self, other, world, and Eros—co-constellate. They are mutually dependent, almost like facets of the same whole structure or constellation, or what we might call a soul-making constellation.

This means that we begin to perceive ourselves imaginally. We begin to see and feel and sense our self as image, perceiving the imaginal dimensions of our self. Moving through our life, we feel that self gradually acquiring more and more dimensions. We are not merely the flatly existing human being that secular modernism would tell us we are. Despite all our interiority—perhaps even the interiority of an unconscious with its repressed contents—there is a sense of being, perhaps, if you like, manifesting many faces, having within us many imaginal figures, being many imaginal figures.

Through imaginal practice and through the erotics of the imaginal, a dimensionality opens up not just of other, but also of self.

For example, one might have an image that one is practicing with, and perhaps this image involves being in a certain relationship with a particular divine figure—this imaginal figure, maybe a tantric deity, maybe some other kind of god or goddess. Perhaps in the image one is being held by them or resting in their lap, somehow receiving as a human being their divine love or being held by that particular divinity.

Right there in the image, you have a constellation of human and divine. The self feels human and as human receives succor or encouragement or nourishment or love, somehow infused imaginally through that divine other, that imaginal figure of divinity. This is actually a very important stage—that human-divine polarity, with self as human and imaginal other as divine.

But I would say that if you remain present with the image long enough, if you open up the awareness, you begin to recognize that the self is also image here in this image. There is imaginal self. Because dimensionality is always part of an image in the way we are using this term, the dimensionality of the self in this image—of being in the lap of the god or goddess—begins to open up, begins to expand. Dimensionality moves toward divinity, so that eventually what happens is you have two divinities present together, the self and the divine other.

This represents another stage, and rather than saying it is better or worse, it is simply different. It is, I would say, the inevitable movement if we allow the soul-making dynamic to move in every direction—toward the self in the image as well as toward the other, the object on which we are usually focusing. This is not a matter of making anything happen, but rather of noticing and simply being with and allowing something that is a natural, organic movement of the soul, of this Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic.

There are all kinds of examples here. In the example I gave in the previous talk of the raft and the infusion of black blood from the goddess, I then went outside and felt the power and energy in my body from this black blood she had given me. I became myself a divinity, sensing myself imaginally as a divinity—as this dancing, stomping, powerful, thick-set, muscular god, somehow also in deep connection with nature, receiving that infusion of the blood, that strange divine nectar from nature.

So there's this spreading of the soul-making, spreading of the imaginal, spreading of the erotic, and spreading also in this sense of the locus of divinity, if you like, in the faces of divinity.

The same is true in regard to all this. When we're actually dealing with an actual person who has become for us a theophany—whatever our actual relationship is with them, whether they're a teacher or a guru or a lover or whatever it is—when actually we have an imaginal perception of a person, we are also imagining ourself in relationship to them. And even if this person isn't yet a divinity for us in that sense, there's not that theophany there, we want to see what the image of self is and what it can be.

So we include the self image, the image of self, in the constellation, in the imaginal erotic constellation, and we include that and we let it fill out. Eventually, ourselves... Ourself becomes a theophany, or plural theophanies. We are perhaps many theophanies.

And we get the sense, slowly, as I said, of the self as well as the other, as well as the beloved other, as well as the object—it could be an inanimate object—being infinite. That we are infinite. And I don't mean here, in this kind of practice, only... I don't only mean we are infinite in the sense that our essence is infinite awareness or infinite love or some of those more universal openings to a universal essence of oneness. So that you can perceive infinite awareness or infinite love being the fabric of the universe, and we are the same thing in essence, so that therefore I'm infinite. I don't just mean that.

I mean also in the infinite possibilities of the possible faces, if you like, who can come through us—what I used to call the vertical spectrum of the imaginal, but I might drop that word "vertical" because it has too many loaded connotations. There's a spectrum of imaginal faces that can manifest, if you like, through another, I can perceive, and through the self, so through myself and through another, and we can get this sense of all that being there as a sort of spectrum of dimensionality that they are, that we are. There's infinite possibilities there in the perceptions of, in this case, of one's own soul, in its particularities. It's not in its universality of just being awareness or love or something like that, but in its particularities, in my personhood, in my particular manifestations.

This also—so we said self, other, world, and eros. They get constellated together. So all this applies, this movement of the soul-making dynamic to involve and include the sense of the world and the sense of eros itself, if the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic is allowed, if it's not hindered, if it's not blocked or refused or dismissed where it wants to go. If the soul-making dynamic is allowed to spread naturally, organically, it will start giving dimensionality, giving beauty, depth, all the imaginal richness and eventually even divinity—self, other, world and eros itself.

So when, a few talks ago, I used that term "autoeroticism," and then I said, "Oh, actually, we'll come back to that as a facet of eros," as something to recognize as an aspect of eros, that there was an autoeroticism that was, if you like, part of eros. What I really meant there was that what distinguishes an experience of eros from just an experience of, let's say, metta or metta with imagination—you know, when we imagine the person that we're giving metta to being happy or whatever—what distinguishes eros from that, and this is something we'll come back to in regards to the distinction between eros and metta, is that one of the things is that eros has this autoeroticism as an aspect to it, meaning that the self is also regarded erotically, is given dimensionality, is attractive in that erotic way that we've been talking about, and not just the self, but also the self's eros.

So whatever image of erotic connection is involved in the imaginal perception of the constellation of self and other, whatever eros that the self is seen imagining to be participating in that connection—whether it's penetration or opening or being penetrated or whatever it is—that eros is also kind of regarded erotically, if you like. In other words, that too has dimensions, has beauty. The eros itself becomes an erotic object. Our own eros becomes an erotic object for us.

So, not just the other, also the self and the images of the self, that comes alive. There's eros towards the self because the self is given dimensionality, even imaginal dimensionality, and also the eros that the self feels also becomes an erotic object. It's given imaginal dimensionality. There's this attraction towards—almost like wanting to taste it, to connect with it, to open to the very eros more. It has beauty, it has dimensionality, it has divinity. So autoeroticism—this soul-making dynamic is spreading in these different directions to, in a way, touch everything.

So in regard to this and the self and the sense of the self or the image of the self that's operating at any time, we can say that a desire is not eros when it arises from and when it is serving the kind of narrow, habitual, and solidified self that's perhaps seeking pleasant sensations or seeking a sense of solidity to solidify itself or seeking to aggrandize itself. That kind of desire is more what we call clinging and craving or greed.

That sense of self, when it's narrow, habitual, solidified self, seeking pleasure, seeking solidity, seeking aggrandizement, self-aggrandizement—that self is sensed as unitary. This is the self, it's the real self, there's one of them, and it's also kind of one-dimensional. It lacks this imaginal dimensionality, this multiplicity of beings, this sense of shading into divinity, of emanating from divinity and all that. It's unitary, one-dimensional. It's also reified. There's a sense of, "I believe in this self." It's not even an intellectual concept. I believe in the reality of this self.

All of that in opposition to an imaginal sense of self that's not unitary, that has this spectrum of the imaginal, it's not one-dimensional because of that very spectrum, and it, as I said, shades into divinity or emanates from divinity or expresses or is a theophany, and it's seen, it's an image, seeing image as image, so it's not reified.

So desire that comes out of this narrow, habitual, solidified self is not eros.

Imaginal desire can be eros, is eros.

The same principle applies to our sense of the other—when that other, the erotic object, is not seen as image, is not recognized to be imaginal, when we're not seeing image as image. When the object is reified, when we really believe in this "real thing," that too gives rise to a desire that becomes greed or craving.

Already, just as an aside, you can hear me moving back and forth between the narrower definition of eros—simply this wanting of connection—and the larger definition, which implies the imaginal, implies seeing image as image. So just keep your ears attuned to that movement.

Now, oftentimes, simply because of what we've been taught and heard so much, we view desire that arises in a particular way. There's desire—perhaps sexual desire, perhaps erotic desire—and yet we automatically view it as if it's a defilement or something bad, and assume it's something the self is doing. Especially if you've heard enough standard Dharma teachings without sufficient differentiation in them, or interpreted them without enough nuance, then desire becomes a movement of the self. It comes from the self. It's the self that desires. If I somehow had no self, I wouldn't desire. Desire comes from the self and desire reinforces the self. We very often automatically assume this.

Perhaps we can slow down a little and have a look, sense into this desire and let it amplify, let it fill out imaginal space with mindfulness, with sensitivity to the resonances, with the energy body and all that. Because sometimes what happens, if we have this larger perspective on what a human being is, is that the desire arises from the imaginal figure—from, if you like, the divinity, from the deity. Whose is this desire? Is it just this narrow, flat, unitary self desiring? Or is it actually, as William Blake said, a divine influx?

Where is it coming from? Whose is it? Maybe this desire is from Dionysus, or some other imaginal figure that's more personal, less archetypal. But then what happens? This desire arises. I automatically assume something about it—it's from the self, it's a defilement. And maybe that assumption locks into place a certain view which, as always, shapes the perception, shapes what unfolds. Maybe that desire actually becomes craving or greed or clinging in the narrow sense through the very view itself.

Do you understand? This can only be explored by experimenting. We can only explore this by experimenting—what happens if I grant something another possibility? If I enter into another way of looking, what happens? I'm not saying it's easy, and it does, maybe not for everyone, but probably for most people, take considerable practice. It requires certain meditative skills and capacities and arts to be developed. But if I experiment, what do I see? What do I uncover? What gets opened up?

So this is the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, this weave of soul-making, the way the tree of soul grows in different directions organically, the way fire leaps and catches as it spreads, the way it ignites and sparks other things that it takes hold of.

And one of these directions is the world itself—self, other, world. We've been calling this cosmopoiesis, and we've touched on it in other talks and retreats. I could give many, countless examples here. The possibilities, again, are infinite.

So again, I might give some examples that emerge specifically from a kind of sexual eros that's working in the imaginal—just to open up that possibility where we can sometimes be a little shy, a little doubtful. And of course, I'm aware of how, as I said earlier, if someone were to simply pick up a talk at this point and listen, they might wonder how on earth we arrived here. But I really hope you can see how it fits very organically—we're gradually opening certain doors and underpinning them with understandings and meditative skills that make them truly fruitful and beautiful and important.

Sometimes, in an imaginal constellation like what I referred to before, we perceive a kind of imbalance. We feel very human while the other, the imaginal other, is not human but divine, and there's an imbalance there. In a way, we might feel somehow lesser. This pulls on all kinds of psychological structures, and we'll touch on this. But in a way, sometimes it's just one way of looking at it.

It's just the eros-psyche-logos dynamic has not yet opened up enough. It wants to move in every direction—towards the self as well as towards the other—but it simply hasn't flowed as fully in one direction before flowing equally in the other. Or perhaps it's not being allowed to flow there. We'll return to this.

Sometimes we perceive this same imbalance in an actual relationship in our lives, human to human. Again, there's some kind of perceiving of the other with all their imaginal depth and beauty, perhaps even divinity, and we somehow feel less than, or at a certain stage we feel wanting in some way. This is relatively common.

Perhaps we feel we are in love with this person, or with this imagined figure, or with this person imaginatively imbued. We can feel that they love us, but they're not in love with us. There's a dimension missing—the dimensions are not equal. Or sometimes we experience that very normal human desire to see and hear from the other that we are desired deeply, and that includes sexually. We want to know that we are desired sexually.

Let me give an example. This dynamic was at play in my own practice, and I said, "Okay, so there's this imbalance right now." Just giving myself—actually helped by the imaginal figure—the permission to feel and allow this wanting. I want her. In this case there was the male-female in the image, along biological gender lines, and I want her. I want to see and hear that she wants me, that she wants to let me in. That means let me in heart and soul and physically as well. That she wants to open her body to me erotically, sexually.

The first thing was simply being encouraged by the imaginal figure that it's really okay to feel that and to allow that feeling. That encouragement and allowing myself to do that actually liberated a wealth of images. The whole territory became very fecund imaginally, with many images arising quite quickly.

Interestingly, I was traveling to teach somewhere when all this was happening. I was sitting on the train during quite a long journey, working with these images—on the train, going to the station, and so on and off in that way.

There was a liberation of all these images from the allowing, from feeling into that slightly uncomfortable feeling but actually permitting it. Liberation of images, and then at some point, tremendous energy infused my whole body, the energy body. The image was of roaring, like a lion roars, and bellowing fire, like a dragon bellows fire. There was enormous energy and power in this. Bellowing fire—and in fact, I became flame. I became a being of flames. A great deal of energy and power was felt.

But still, regarding the original imaginal sense of the situation, despite all this energy and power, I realized I still needed to be granted admission. She still needed to let me in, still needed to say to me, "I want you inside me, I want to let you in." This power was not the kind that would force that. In any situation, you cannot force someone to want you that way, to want to let you in heart and soul and body.

So there was this fascinating mixture: tremendous power that I felt, roaring and bellowing fire with enormous energy in the body, at the same time as recognizing that no matter how powerful that felt, there was also this dependency. I was still, in the image, dependent on her—on this imaginal figure—communicating to me, granting me admission.

There was this double constellation existing: the power along with the tremendous sense of dependency at the same time, these almost opposites coalescing, mixing, co-constellating.

And as I tuned in to the imaginal figure, there was the sense, the recognition, that she did grant me admission, she did want me that way, in those ways.

All this was happening simultaneously—the power, the recognition of dependency, and as I tuned into her image more, the recognition that she did grant me that and she did want me.

What happened then was a cosmopoiesis, in the sense that the flame that I was, I found myself in a world of flames. This was an extremely powerful perception, very subtle. And this was happening on the train, so I was still aware of who was sitting next to me and opposite me, what was outside the window. But at the same time, there was this level of perception—subtle but very powerful—of a world of flames.

This was not a hell realm at all, not the hell realms of burning. It felt very wondrous, very beautiful.

Each thing, in a way, was a flame. A kind of essence of each thing was a flame, and fire, flame, is eros. So each thing was felt to be expressing its own eros, as flame, as fire. And sensing into that, each thing, each being, and the world as a whole—its eros, its desire, was that it wanted me to love it. The eros that I was sensing into there was each thing, each being, and the world as a whole desired, wanted me to love it.

The world, this world of flames, or the world that I now saw—as it was the same world—was erotic in essence. Including the sexual, but not necessarily just the sexual at all. Each thing, each being, and the world as a whole wanted me to love it. And in a way, recognizing that as human beings, this is this kind of altered mystical perception. We can feel that call, not just from the beings, the animate beings of the world, but from the so-called inanimate nature and the things of the world.

And so in myself, I felt the desire to respond to this wanting in things, this wanting that things were expressing. And I felt that very physically. I felt it in my tongue, actually, predominantly in my tongue, in my mouth, in my genitals, in my hands—my whole body was involved in a sense. And as I gave very sensitive, delicate attention to this, opening and working with it over time, I also felt that the eros I was feeling was the eros of the divine.

In other words, this was the gods, if you like, or Buddha nature's desire to penetrate—because I felt it as a kind of wanting to penetrate all things. This is very, again, sexual there. So the movement there was more, quote, masculine, as opposed to the movement of opening and receiving, which could have been both or either. So this is different. The divine's desire to penetrate all things, to sexually penetrate all things.

What does this mean? It's an imaginal perception. It's not the same as the divine desire pervading all things with its essence, its oneness of beingness or love or awareness. There's something much more particular there. All the wanting here—the wanting that belonged to things, their wanting to be loved, and the wanting that was coming through me to respond to that, to penetrate—all was seen or evolved through the imaginal process to have divine dimensions.

I'm reminded of somewhere Thomas Aquinas, St. Thomas Aquinas wrote, "All beauty yearns to be seen." All beauty yearns to be seen. And I don't know enough about him or what he meant by that, but here's a sense of opening to a mystical or imaginal perception, very particular, where each thing, each being and the world wants its beauty to be seen, to be celebrated, to be loved, to have that erotic connection and in a way for that to penetrate it. So very particular kinds of cosmopoiesis opening there.

Okay, so another example. Sometimes we might be with a pure, so-called intrapsychic image, or actually someone we are in a certain relationship to. And as I said before, eros gives rise to, actually supports and nourishes and increases the way we love people, in the ways that we love the beloved other. An increase also it supports—an increase of the ways and the depths and the breaths in which we appreciate, in which we sense and see and feel their beauties, plural, and their divinity. So eros opens all this because of all of what we've been talking about, the eros-psyche-logos dynamic.

So that in relation to this, let's say, person in one's life where we have this kind of relationship, the eros there, if it's allowed, can actually start to... I love your body. But it's actually what... That also begins to have a fullness. I love your bones. I love your blood. I love your veins. I love your kidneys. It's got this whole other visceral dimension. And eventually... I love all your matter. I love all the matter that is you, so to speak. And so the eros is, if you like, moving there to the realm of matter.

And it can do this in all kinds of ways. So what can happen there, the way the soulmaking infuses and spills over into the perception of matter—there's so many possibilities. But in this case, it could then be that one feels that eros, opens up that relationship with the matter of the beloved other. And then that spreads into the world again. I'm just talking about cosmopoiesis here.

But the perception of that matter is not matter as a quantum physicist would conceive it. It's not even divine as a sort of emanation of light—it's matter just as commonly experienced, as we tend to think of this sort of stuff that we don't really think much about or ponder. We just bump into it and assume what every modernist assumes. That's our experience of it. So a love for all matter that way. And again, this kind of thing, if it opens up, you might check...

It's often easier for this cosmopoiesis, this love of matter, to spread to other living matter—things in nature, animals and trees and grass and whatever. But I remember experiencing this and actually having some bones in front of where I was meditating. And you could see how it spread—not quite so easily as it did to living matter, but it spread almost as easily to the bones, because they were once living, they were organic. And then a little more difficult to spread, but still possible, to plastic things that were around.

So it spreads to all matter, but not in a way that's linked with or dependent on them providing me with pleasant vedanā. It might be easier with that at first, but it doesn't have to be linked with that at all, or even being conventionally beautiful. Because the whole thing started—we don't usually think of veins and livers as beautiful in that sense. But there was this loving love for all matter, independent of whether it was conventionally beautiful or whether it was providing me with pleasant vedanā.

At other times, this love and appreciation for the body of another, or just the cosmopoiesis that comes in—sorry, the sense of the imaginal other—might spread to a cosmopoiesis that's much more ethereal in its dimensions. So many possibilities here, but for example, one might perceive the world around one—the trees, the grass, whatever it is, the buildings—and have the perception that it's as if light or lights are shining through and into this world of matter, or that this matter and this world is somehow a reflection or a refraction of the light of higher levels, of other worlds, if you like, but in a way that doesn't really diminish this world as somehow less than or inferior or not valuable—this world and these appearances of everyday—but rather giving them beauty, giving them other dimensions of sacredness through the light that comes through them, comes to them and through them. So all kinds of possibilities.

And again, one might be working with an erotic image of a beloved other, and one might have this sort of wider sense of sexual eros pervading the image, constellating the image, and maybe we have, like we've alluded to already, the whole body is penetrated. And independent of whether you're biologically male or female, whatever, the whole body can be penetrated by the imaginal other or penetrate the imaginal other.

The whole body, the whole being is somehow entered, or one can be devoured by the deity or by the god. So all one's flesh and bones, imaginal flesh and bones, is devoured, or one devours this imaginal figure—all these possibilities and permutations.

And again, they can give rise, if we dwell in the meditation with these kind of things and work with them, as I said, sensitively and with the mindfulness there, then they can spread sometimes into a cosmopoiesis. And it might be, for instance, the cosmos is mystically devouring me, it's eating me. And this might sound to someone like, "Oh, that's terrible," but actually can feel really wonderful, and the sense of participating in some kind of mystical dimension of the being, or process of the cosmos.

We can say, you know, this physical body will dissolve eventually and have to, in Buddhist language, give my aggregates back to the universe. This is something different. There's a kind of imaginal, mystical perception that the cosmos is eternally eating me, mystically eating me, and I'm participating in something there at some mystical level of being. Or as I said, the cosmopoiesis might be that I somehow am devouring the cosmos.

What does this mean? Because again, in some ways I do devour at least part of the cosmos—organically and in ideas. So that's all true. It's giving this other dimension, expanding those kinds of ideas into other, more mystical, more hard to articulate dimensions. And it might be that it moves back and forth between being devoured and devouring the cosmos, being devoured by the cosmos and devouring the cosmos—maybe even back and forth very quickly, maybe even in some completely illogical way, simultaneously, the two are happening. The cosmos is devouring me, and I am devouring the cosmos. Of course, again, at a material level, we can see there's a certain truth in that.

There are so many possibilities here. So I just want to really—partly what I'm wanting to do is just open up the sense of just how much is possible.

One more: I was in meditation and an imaginal figure—beautiful—she came and kissed my heart and my torso gently, and just feeling the resonances of that. In this case, actually, it did progress to more sexual imagery. But again, there it stayed at a very specific sexual image, and really receiving from her in the image and dwelling with that and feeling it and receiving, through that sexual interaction and the sexual love there, so much tenderness. What this imaginal figure was imbuing—her sexual love with so much tenderness—and she wanted, it seemed as I fell into it, she wanted out of love, out of pure love, to give me pleasure.

When working with that in the meditation, this is what I tuned into—her love and this wanting to give me pleasure. This becomes a kind of wavelength or dimension of the image, very specific and subtle, the tuning there. And I needed, again, to feel the whole energy body and open to the pleasure there. So this is—well, actually it's not that hard to do, but it takes the kind of skills that we've been talking about developing. But it's very specific, very subtle tuning, whole energy body involved, and the ability to open to that.

And out of that—and you probably are not surprised at this point—samādhi came. So I had this possibility, kind of fork in the road there. You can go just into some kind of jhāna there, or the samādhi, and leave the image behind, or stay with the image and enjoy the pleasure of the samādhi mixed, or let it spread a little bit. And it was the third one that I chose, because what happened was there was a sense of just dipping into the samādhi a bit, and then the sense of a heavenly realm opening up.

Actually, rather, this world that I was in, the room that I was in, became a heavenly realm infused with divine eros. The sense was that the world was transubstantiated—transformed into a heavenly realm infused with divine eros.

Even as I say it now, part of the mind wonders: what does that mean? Even then, part of the mind asked this question. In some ways, it was a vague sense. In other ways, it was extremely precise and very subtle. But it was a sense. It was palpable—an imaginal perception of this world, this room, and the surroundings outside.

In this cosmopoiesis, eros was woven into the cosmos. The cosmos was felt, seen to be a garden of eros, a garden of delight. And with all that, of course, eros was right. There was something fundamentally, profoundly right about eros. It has its rightful, beautiful, divine place in the scheme of things—in the cosmos, actually permeating the cosmos. In that imaginal perception that opened up, eros is divine.

All this brought tremendous delight and a sense of beauty, inner and outer, and much joy. The sense was of profound gift—that all of this was gift. The eros was gift, and the cosmos was gift. The whole cosmos was experienced in such a beautiful way as gift, as erotic gift.

You can see how that cosmopoiesis mirrors, or rather has its seeds in, the initial image. Because I had grown accustomed to some of this before and was playing with it, I experimented as I opened my eyes and moved around with the equality of perception—testing whether it applied just as easily to plastic or the sound of a plane overhead, to things unpleasant or man-made, not necessarily aesthetically pleasing artifacts or functional things, as it did to the beautiful trees and sky.

There's quite a bit more to this. What I noticed was that at a certain stage of this cosmopoetic perception opening, there was a stage where I felt that it was the divine purpose of the cosmos to express eros to me—to love me and give me delight. I was, if you like, a graced recipient of divine eros.

At the very same time, I knew it wasn't just me. It applied to everyone else. It was simply a matter of people opening to that perception. I was not in any way singled out or had any sense of being special or different than other people. But there was this sense—and again, it doesn't make rational sense, and it wasn't meant to. This was image as image, seeing image as image, holding it, holding these perceptions so that we know image as image. We're not reifying them, not clunking down on them as some sort of truth. Yet we're still holding them so that they can have tremendous power. It's neither dismissing nor grabbing at and reifying.

That was just a stage, because eventually it moved to a more general sense of the cosmos being infused with and expressing eros. So the cosmos is erotic. And with all this, there was a sense of dimensionality to the cosmos.

Later, I think it was the same day—I was on retreat at the time—I sat down to meditate. There was again tremendous power and expansion, the energy body really expanding and feeling very imbued with energy and power. Following that, letting it constellate an image of the self, of the energy body, it felt like I had become a wrathful deity—if you know those Tibetan images of Yamantaka and many others. A wrathful deity or a divine beast, a bestial deity.

There was roaring and waves of energy passing through the imaginal body. I wasn't actually roaring—no one would have heard anything. But this was the imaginal sense, and it felt very palpable and strong in the physical body. It felt very, very good, what was going on there with the energy body and the imaginal body.

Then, coming back to the imaginal figure I was working with earlier, this divine beast, wrathful deity, with a subtle gesture in the image, claimed her. It made clear, through a certain gesture of the body, its erotic claim on her: "You are mine."

There was desire there—my desire, my sexual and erotic desire. But it also seemed, again, like tuning in and noticing what's happening with the image...

What else is in the image?

So there was a desire, yes, but also the sense that this claiming, this my claiming of this, of her, of this imaginal figure, was, so to speak, already happening. So it's a desire and an act to do something, and it expresses desire, but this claiming... and this desire is already happening.

It's not so much what I or this divine beast wants, but more that it's already flowing from me, from this imaginal self. The divine beast is flowing to her eternally, or rather timelessly, or as Henri Corbin used to say, in hierophantic time, in sacred time. There's a time that doesn't progress. It's almost like discrete, timeless moments or images. So it's already flowing, this movement of claiming.

As I fell into and got the sense of what was actually pregnant in this image, then a dimension of the image reveals itself, which is this hierophantic dimension we've touched on before. The desire there was to give her pleasure. So again, the desire then mirrors her wanting to give me pleasure before, and now it's me desiring to give her pleasure. And I could see that the imaginal figure, she enjoys being claimed. She enjoys me gesturing in a way of communicating: you are mine.

So again, all this could sound like it's ego or this or that. Far, far from it. There's something so light and so beautiful and sacred flowing through it. It feels very good in the body. And again, the body becomes flames that come and go, that moved back and forth, and again I went outside.

And again, the cosmos experienced as erotic. I'm in a heavenly realm where the cosmos is by nature, in its essence, at one dimension, erotic. It's an erotic cosmos. But in this case, I was not so much the recipient. So in the cosmopoetic perception of self and the world or the cosmos, I was not so much the recipient. Rather, it was my role—the role of this imaginal self or the imaginal role of self—my role and my ability to let Eros flow through me, to flow from me to others, to create beauty in that way and to give delight and to give pleasure through that.

And again, not that that was unique to me. It was clear to me that's everyone's role and ability. But what's unique is the ways in which each of us do that. So again, you can see how the imaginal self interfaces or spills over, shades over into the lived, actually physically manifested self. Because I could say that about my life, and I'm sure everyone could say that about their life. But the perception of that gets a whole other dimensionality and beauty to it through the imaginal dimension of that opening up. It gets this profundity, breadth, richness, complication, sacredness to it.

I think later, still the same day or the next day, I can't remember, but the same couple in the imaginal meditation and really focusing then on our love—not so much her giving me pleasure out of love or me desiring to give her pleasure or claim her out of love, but our love, the two of us in a kind of mutual dance of love, of eros, of delight, if you like. And when I looked around me then, the cosmos after that is again infused with Eros. And our dance, our loving is, if you like, mirroring or echoing or infused with the divine cosmic Eros.

And this is something that can happen between two people, two actual people in their relationship, if they allow the soul-making dynamic to expand the sense of what's happening in actual relationship. But you can see in this little three-part imaginal practice I've just described: when the focus was more on her, on the imaginal figure's actions and qualities, then I felt the self to be the recipient of that in the cosmic perception, reflecting the actual imaginal perception in the narrower image. And when I lost the cosmopoetic perception, I could regain it by focusing on that aspect of the original image—of her wanting to communicate love to me through the sexual, through the erotic. Focusing on that in the image brought back the cosmopoiesis, that particular cosmopoiesis of receiving cosmic love, divine love.

In the second little part there, the focus was on myself and the power and the energy and the divine beast, giving her pleasure again with the eros and the love. And then the cosmopoiesis led to a sense of that in its cosmic place, of myself as a channel, if you like, for the divine's giving or outpouring through me—that's what characterized the cosmopoiesis. And again, if I lost it, I could focus back on that initial image and the cosmopoiesis comes back.

And in the last part, when it's more mutual, it's like the us, the our—our back and forth and flow of love together. Then again, the cosmopoiesis there was reflecting that kind of balance, that kind of equality, if you like.

So we can begin to see the potential here of what it can open up in perception if we allow eros to have and inseminate fully the whole dynamic structure of the eros-psyche-logos and that whole movement, the whole soul-making movement.

And partly, again, I'm using these particular examples, sexual examples. Some of them, you know—I'm aware, devouring and all this—it sounds quite dark and claiming, and some people would be cautious for different reasons around that. But I really want to say, first of all, as I said in the other talk, there's a whole range here, and a lot of the even sexual erotic is not dark at all. It's very, very light and gentle or whatever. So there's a whole range.

But yes, not just of so-called darkness, but also of what might be more straightforward or normal or anatomically plausible, ranging all the way to really quite far-out imagery and experiences. So the entire range is open to us. Within that, we learn to trust if something seems darker or stranger.

What's happening here is not disrespectful to the imaginal figure, or even if the imaginal figure is actually another person with whom you have that kind of relationship. It's not disrespectful. It's not lacking in love. You can notice this. You can feel it. Is it really disrespectful? Don't buy the first thing the mind tells you. Is it really lacking in love? Is it really an objectification of that other person?

To me, objectification means I've somehow shrunk this person down to not see the totality of their being. But have a look if this comes up. Dare to have a look. Is it that? Is it lacking in respect, in love? Is it an objectification? No. You'll see that most often this involves a totality. Respect and love are there. Neither is it out of control, nor does it increase defilement. You can feel in all of this, even in what seems very dark, there's a kind of sacredness and holiness that are palpable.

So again, as I said, the whole movement with eros is that it opens up the range of sacrednesses that we can feel and know about, experience for ourselves firsthand, woven into the cosmos, woven into our being and that of others, in ways that make a difference to our life—a profound difference.

Just to recap a little: the soul-making dynamic, the expansion, fertilization, insemination, deepening, enriching, and widening of eros, psyche, and logos—this mutual movement—needs to flow, or will flow if unimpeded, in all these different directions. It will flow not just toward the beloved other, the object, the imaginal erotic object, but also back toward the self and the imaginal self, amplifying that. And also toward the sense of eros itself.

We have this phrase, "falling in love." Why are we falling in love? Or rather, what does it mean? I wonder where that expression came from. There's something uncontrollable about falling. It may be—I don't know, but one way of looking at it—that what's happening in the expansion of the sense of the other and the expansion of the sense of the self and of eros itself, even of the world, is that the soul-making dynamic moves in all these directions and expands them all, but it doesn't have a limit. The infinite pothos will just keep expanding this potentially.

Maybe falling in love is what we're feeling—a kind of open-ended movement where we're not even sure who we are anymore because we're being opened into a kind of space that keeps opening. The other too. Perhaps our sense of love itself, of eros, is also open. It doesn't seem to be landing anywhere, and it's not stopping anywhere, because the soul-making, the erotic dynamic just keeps opening. That feeling has this bottomless, limitless quality to it. Maybe—I don't know—maybe that's part of what happens when we say "I'm falling in love with you."

But there's another dimension here, which may or may not happen. Actually, all of this may or may not happen in actual life, as we come back to what blocks this kind of infinite and comprehensive, potentially infinite, potentially comprehensive movement of the soul-making dynamic.

Here, as I've said several times now, it's possible that the sense of eros itself is seen and felt erotically and given imaginal dimensions, so that eventually we feel something like a divinity of eros, or divine eros that infuses the cosmos. My eros, this eros that I feel in me, coming from me, is divine. Or it mirrors the divine eros, or it comes from the divinity—the Buddha nature, God, whatever you want to call it, the archetypes. All this can be there.

As I said, recapping: there's an infinity of possibilities. If the soul-making dynamic is not hindered or blocked in any of its potential directions, movements, and unfoldings, then there are infinite possibilities with respect to the self—the sense of the self, the image of the self, the conception of the self—with respect to the other, the beloved other, of course, with respect to the world, and with respect to eros itself.

That fourfold co-constellated aspect: self, other, world, eros. Each of them has infinite possibilities if the soul-making dynamic is allowed its natural expansion, deepening, movement, fertilization. The image and the idea of each of these—self, other, world, and eros—the image and idea, the psyche and the logos of each of these and all of these, is expanded. My eros is mirroring the divine eros.

That's both an image, it's an imaginal sense, and it's an idea, a logos. So you can see how in regard to each of these, if eros gets going, if the erotic movement gets going, psyche and logos, they touch everything. And everything involved in that constellation - self, other, world, eros - but also the notion of psyche itself, the notion of what the soul is and what an image is, gets also expanded, enriched, deepened, amplified. And even the image and the idea of ideas. In other words, the psyche and the logos of logos.

So, for example, we can feel, we can sense, as this whole soul-making movement happens, that our mind is, through image and through idea, through images and through ideas, participating in the divine mind, the divine logos, if you like. So again, this is an image, but it's also an idea, isn't it? Or that what comes to us through image or through ideas, through creative ideas, through concepts, is a manifestation of the world soul, of the soul-making process of the cosmos.

So these are both images and ideas, but they're not abstract ideas. Again, we're entertaining them, we're feeling them, we're plugging into them, if you like, in ways that really galvanize and catalyze and have a tremendous effect on the being, on the perception, on the ways of looking, on the energy body, on the soulfulness.

So when we talk about logos, we don't mean, as I said earlier, something abstract. We mean an idea that finds its way into the way of looking, that is imbuing the way of looking. And because the whole being is involved - the body, the soul, the perception, the intellect - these ideas are not abstract. But the very idea of ideas, the very, if you like, psyche and logos of logos, the image and idea of image and idea and soul and mind starts to also get amplified, enriched, deepened, given dimensionality.

So the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, the soul-making dynamic, will also expand, complicate, deepen, widen the definitions we have of eros, of psyche or soul, and also of logos, of mind.

And in all this, in describing cosmopoiesis, we might start with eros in relation to an imaginal figure, but if we work with it, if we allow it, actually it brings an erotic relationship with nature. So again, the eros spreads, so the imaginal spreads to nature in the cosmopoiesis. But there's also wrapped up in that, because all these things are interconnected - where there's eros there's psyche, where there's image there's eros, where there's image there's eros.

And we start to feel, when we have - as that erotic relationship with nature starts to get supported and opened and nourished and ignited - then the eros and the love and reverence that are part of that in relation to nature and the things of nature, animals and trees and all that, quite a lot begins to open up in terms of our perceptions of nature.

So we might - we tend to have in our modernist cultures maybe that only human beings have intelligence, some animals have a very limited intelligence, but it stops at animals. But maybe through this erotic relationship with nature, we begin to perceive, in the cosmopoiesis, we begin to perceive other kinds of, let's call it intelligence, other kinds of knowing. What is the intelligence of a tree? And I don't just mean the biochemical intelligence of the way it works and photosynthesis and all that, how clever, or the intelligence of evolution. What's the intelligence of a tree? What's the communication of a tree or stones?

So something happens in the erotic movement beginning to infuse our relationship with nature. Something happens. We perceive other kinds of intelligence. I'm not going to say much about that right now.

Also open up for us in that other ways of knowing. Also in terms of intelligence opening up. So our whole being is involved in what intelligence means. My ovaries know. There's an intelligence in my ovaries. Or in the image, the tongue is connecting with maybe certain body parts of an image of another or something, and there's certain communication through the tongue, a certain information, if you like, that's being transmitted and received by the tongue.

The whole body is involved in the imaginal process and in the erotic process. More and more so. We'll come back to this. Sometimes we'll say your three centers need to be involved: your belly, your heart, and your head. And we'll come back to that. But in a way, your belly means your body and certainly your sexual organs and that whole sexual dimension of your body and the energy. And your heart center, meaning your emotionality and your affect and your love and whatever other emotions are going there, and also your head.

We talked about logos and the importance of that. Sometimes the shorthand is: all your three centers need to be involved. But actually it's the whole being. Every dimension of our being, every dimension of the mind, every dimension of the soul, of the heart, and of the body opens up in ways that we might not expect, just because that's what the soul-making dynamic does. That's what the psyche-logos dynamic does as it expands and fertilizes more and more.

In a nutshell, eros, as I said, supports, opens, ignites, spreads, deepens, widens our sense - senses, plural - of sacredness in all domains, in all kinds of areas, in all perceptions, and in all kinds of particularities that we wouldn't even have maybe noticed before. And the kinds of sacredness are, if you like, also co-constellated. So the kind of sense of divinity is co-constellated with that other four-part co-constellation: self, other, world, eros.

It's also co-constellated with self—with the sense of self, of other, of world, of eros. Even the sense of no divinity, of a flat universe, is still a kind of constellation. When we have that sense of no divinity, there's a certain kind of sense of self that emerges—because only a certain amount is allowed—a certain kind of perception and idea of the other, a certain kind of perception and idea of the world, and a certain kind of perception and idea of any eros or desire that might arise.

So these five are actually co-constellated together.

Let me finish with something that will seed what we'll explore further. Jung wrote in his memoirs: "We are in the deepest sense the victims and instruments of cosmogonic love." Cosmogon—he said in another place, "Eros is a cosmogonos." That's a fancy Greek word. Cosmogonos means something that generates—gonos, to generate, like gonad. It's something that gives rise to the cosmos.

You find these myths where Eros or something like it gives rise to the cosmos. But we can see this in the phenomenology of our actual experience: eros opens up, it gives birth to the world, it gives birth to the sense of the self—or different senses of self, other, world, and eros—and to cosmopoiesis, and also to divinity. So eros opens, brings with it, or rather puts into motion, a cosmos-birthing process. Actually, the birthing of many cosmoses, if you like, because there's this infinity there.

Seeing our eros as divine—as I said, as gods, as divinities, as the Buddha-nature's eros manifesting through us—is a certain view of divinity, and of eros. And you can see how the self and the world is constellated according to that. All of this co-constellates within the soul-making dynamics.

What this means is that the kinds of divinity we are able to open to as perceptions, as actual experiences, are also infinite. Because that five-point co-constellation—self, other, world, eros, divinity—is infinite in its potential, since the eros-psyche-logos dynamic is infinite in its potential.

So the kinds of divinity are endless. The kinds of experiences of divinity, of perceptions, of senses of divinity are actually endless. I'm just throwing this out now—we're going to return to it, though it might seem vague. The perceptions and the conceptions of divinity are absolutely, potentially infinite and varied.

And that takes us out of the whole realm of dogma—either secular dogma or religious dogma. The whole field, including the exploration of what divinity might mean, becomes infinite in its potential. It's an infinitely large and expanding playground for us, for soul-making.

We'll come back to that. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 61

Eros Unfettered (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 59 min

> In this third part of his series on eros and soul-making, Rob Burbea examines what's necessary for the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic to unfold freely. He explores how certain ways of looking can either support or stifle soul-making - from reductive materialism that flattens experience to one dimension, to spiritual frameworks that allow infinite depth and mystery in the beloved other.
> Burbea demonstrates how logos (conceptual frameworks) must remain flexible to fuel the soul-making process. When ideas become too rigid or limited - whether through psychological reductionism, materialist views, or fixed images of relationship and sexuality - they block eros from its natural movement toward 'more.' He examines how this dynamic plays out in intimate relationships, spiritual practice, and even difficulties like pornography addiction, showing how limited dimensionality constrains eros to horizontal seeking rather than vertical depth.
> The talk emphasizes that concepts naturally limit and define, but problems arise when these limits become inflexible walls that prevent the ongoing expansion of soul-making. Through practical examples, Burbea shows how even personal difficulties can become imaginal and re-enchanted when held within conceptual frameworks that allow for mystery, dimensionality, and divine necessity.

Let's look a little more at various aspects of what's involved in the movement of soul-making - what's necessary for the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic to unfold and have its range and process. And correspondingly, how that movement and expansion and deepening and widening can be stifled or blocked or diverted, how the movement of Eros can be diverted.

Again, why so much? Why are we circling around this, weaving in and out of this whole business about the soul-making dynamic and the idea of Eros-Psyche-Logos being stimulated by Eros? We're circling because the ideas are unfamiliar - they're new ideas. They are not in circulation in the culture, certainly not in Dharma culture, nor in the wider culture either. Ideas that are new, that are unfamiliar, that are not in circulation, need repeating. For us, we need to chew on them, to digest them, to incorporate them, to assimilate them, to be able to use them, to actually have them be powerful.

So they need that circling, they need the circulation of our reflection in our lives. Not just abstract intellectual reflection - there's a level of that - but actually reflection in our lives, so we actually use them, implement them, bring them to bear on our experience in life, in relationship, on the meditation cushion, in relationship with everything, with nature, with whatever we love.

I believe, and I hope at least, that trying to forge a conceptual framework that is supportive is actually really in the service of opening up what the path can be, opening up new territories - beautiful territories, important territories. All that is served by having a powerful conceptual framework as part of the process.

When we talked about the small, loose definition, beginning provisional definition of Eros, we said it was a desire to connect, to touch, to contact more. We can very easily assume that there's a limit implicit in touching. Once you've touched, you've touched. You can touch for longer, but once you've touched, you've touched. Once you've touched a whole body or a whole object, you've touched it. Once you've connected, you've connected. Once you contact, you've contacted. So we can easily assume that there's a limit implicit in that.

But actually, what we're saying now is that it's open-ended. So the words touch, connect, contact, certainly words like penetrate, is open and there's no limit to that penetration necessarily at all. Or open or receive the beloved other. Open to and receive the beloved other. There's no limit to the opening and to the receiving or know them - or want to know them more, know this more, this beloved object, this beloved other. There's no limit to the penetration, the depth of penetration, the scope and depth of opening and receiving and knowing.

Using those words, but not implying a limit, because we're saying that in the process of Eros stimulating and igniting the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic - the mutual expansion, mutual fertilization - the sense of self, the imaginal self and the imaginal other grow. They expand, they get deeper, they get richer, more complicated, potentially at least. Because both the subject who opens and receives and the object or the other, the beloved other, the erotic object that is penetrated or opened to - both the subject and the self and the other grow potentially - there's potentially no limit to how much penetration or this process of penetration, of opening, receiving, knowing, touching, connecting, contacting.

If we approach it from the other angle, we could say that Eros, from what we've said so far, stimulates Psyche and Logos, the imaginal and the idea, or the concepts involved in the sense of the other, of the beloved other, and also self and all that. Looking at it from the other angle, just as important and valid, we could say that Psyche and Logos, image and idea, need to allow Eros' further penetration and opening. They need to allow that "more" aspect of Eros.

Whatever image we have of this erotic object or the other, whatever idea, that image and idea need to allow more penetration, more opening. They need to allow that movement of Eros. Wherever it's at in that process, it needs to have something that allows more. If it doesn't need it right now, sooner or later it will need it.

What this implies, to state it again, is that the way of looking at images and the way of looking at perceptions is significant, because either it supports Psyche and Logos to allow that further penetration, further opening that Eros wants, or it doesn't.

Actually, to state again, the way we are using the word "image" already includes a way of looking at it that sees it as imaginal. So that is supportive to a certain extent or to a certain level. But still that might need to grow.

If we step back a little and just look at this whole notion of ways of looking in relation to soul-making, we can see that certain ways of looking not just limit soul-making, but actually dampen it. They put out the fire of soul-making, cause that stream to dry up. In a more watery image, they dissipate the imaginal or dismiss it or reduce it. They put out the fire of Eros. Certain ways of looking will do that.

Among those ways of looking that kill soul-making, some of them reduce clinging and some of them actually increase clinging. But we can differentiate three broad directions or kinds of ways of looking, or views. There is what we might call a group of views that are realist or flatly humanistic. Their view of something that arises might be, for example, that this is a result of or this is representing something that happened in my childhood, representing a faculty of my mind, a component - reducing it in those ways, or even more, this is just a result of random neuronal firings.

So there's a way that the human being is reduced to a sort of flat, modernist, humanist version of what a human being is. And that will not support soul-making. That kind of view, in the realist, flatly humanist perspective, will not support soul-making.

A second group of ways of looking consists of approaches that actually fabricate less, that lead to less fabrication than the usual state of consciousness. This could be just a little less fabrication. What we usually call mindfulness in the traditional sense of the word is, relatively speaking, a degree, a modicum of less fabrication than usual—or bare attention, or what have you. And then there are other ways of looking which actually fabricate much less than the usual state of consciousness, much less than bare attention or mindfulness. We've touched on those before. They can take you into jhanas or deep states of oneness and eventually even the transcending of all perception and all conventional experience, knowing and opening to the unfabricated, to non-fabrication. So there's a group of ways of looking that actually decrease fabrication—the second group.

And the third group we could call ways of looking that are soul-making—the soul-making perspectives—where there isn't this reduction going on. We are not reducing the image or the imaginal perception of something. Neither are we dissolving it by fabricating perception less. So we're not blurring out into a kind of oneness of white light or deep unfabrication or something like that, nor are we just reducing this thing in some kind of psychological explanation or biological explanation or whatever it is.

So three groups of ways of looking. Actually—and we'll return to this because it's not that simple—the relation to this process of unfabrication, our relationship to it and our conceptual framework of what's happening as we engage ways of looking that fabricate less, can actually become soul-making through the relationship with that and through the ideas we have of it. We will return to that, but just to say it's not so simple, the divisions between these three ways of looking. But broadly speaking, we can delineate three.

When there is—or when there has come about in one way or another—in the perception of an other, a sense that there is more there. There is more depth here. There is a sense of unfathomability to this object, to this image, to this person that I'm seeing soulfully. There's a sense of more to move into, of mystery here—into which, a mystery of the other, a depth of mystery of the other and the perception of the other, into which the eros might expand, might penetrate, might open, or to which it might open. Then that sense of more, that sense of other dimensions, even if we don't see them clearly, that sense actually stimulates eros. It's working the other way around. The psyche, the logos, the sense, the perception stimulates the eros and inflames the eros.

And what happens there—and again, if you really enter into imaginal practice, whether it's with, so to speak, purely intrapsychic images or, again, with someone or something in nature or some person in your life that actually is alive to you as image in this soul-making, soulful, beautiful way—then we get the sense that that other, that object, if you like, contains a multiplicity of images. Some of them will be clearly perceived, maybe right now or maybe we know them from before through our history, through working with this object, this person, this image. And some are kind of intuited. You can feel them there. You can sense the presence of other images within this figure, within this person, within your perception of them. But they're not yet known. They remain sort of presences intuited, but vaguely intuited, but not known.

And with that, there's a sense of this inexhaustible mystery that can arise—that the depth of soul in this person that I'm beholding, the depth of soul I'm beholding in this person, or in this thing, or in nature. Nature in soul. Nature has this inexhaustible unfathomability, levels of mystery to it. And always then, sometimes the intuition, the intimation, is that always the unknown is greater than the known. There's always more to discover because we've learned about this infinity, the potential limitlessness of this process.

And so we can actually palpably feel or palpably perceive a sense that the dimensions and the faces that are not yet known to me, not yet clearly perceived to me, will always, so to speak, outnumber the ones that are known, that have been beautiful and soul-making to me so far. That sense of inexhaustible mystery stimulates the eros, is itself soul-making.

So we can say that eros requires an image, but it also maybe requires, if you like, a region of what is as yet unknown. This sense of territory it can move into, of a landscape of soul, a world of soul, into which our souls can move, so to speak, as we penetrate the other, or to which we can open, needs the image, but also the sense of the mystery, the as-yet-unknown, in the image, with the image. And we could even say that the eros generates this very perception, stimulates the image and stimulates the sense of something more, some territory beyond—this pothos generating a beyond, if you like, that it can then enter, the soul territory, penetrate, open to.

Now, this infinity, this inexhaustible mystery, it might be of a kind of universal nature, as we've touched on before. Very common ones: a universal love, and the infinity of that, or the universality of awareness, or even the unfabricated. You actually get the sense of that shining through everything, if you like, everything embodying that in a mysterious way. But the inexhaustibility that we're talking about here predominantly, or in addition to those kinds of inexhaustibility that are universal—so this universal awareness shining through is the same in everything, or the universal love is pervasive, the same in everything—

So when we speak of the inexhaustable mystery that eros perceives in the beloved, there can be different kinds of infinities operating. One type might be of a universal nature—universal love and its infinite depth, the universality of awareness, or even the unfabricated nature of things shining through everything, each thing mysteriously embodying these qualities. Yet with these universal infinities, there's a sameness: this person I'm beholding expresses universal awareness or love in the same essential way as everything else. That's the essence permeating all things.

But in addition to this kind of perception of mystery and infinity, there's a different kind of inexhaustibility that emerges through what we've been calling the vertical spectrum of the imaginal. Here we discover dimensions inherent within the beloved other—an infinite fecundity, an endless proliferation of theophanies manifesting through the particulars of that soul, that object we're perceiving. This is the infinite fecundity of soul, of divine manifestation, expressing itself through the specific details and qualities of the beloved.

Another way of understanding this interconnected process is that eros generates this very sense of infinite depth and mystery, then falls in love with what it has generated and moves into it, filling it completely. Eros carries within itself this tendency, this inclination, this creative impetus that fertilizes and stimulates the fecundity of both soul and mind. Eros is cosmogonos—world-creating—giving birth to ever more perception, more dimensions of seeing, greater richnesses, complexities, depths and breadths of experience.

In this expansion of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, there is truly a birthing of cosmoses. Through this soul-making process, eros simultaneously creates, fabricates, and discovers more psyche, more image. There's an increase in the range of images perceived within the beloved object, and more generally an expansion of the perceived facets and dimensions of things—especially of what we love. More mystery emerges, along with a deeper sense of dimensionality and inexhaustible depth.

Now let us explore the logos aspect more carefully—how it must grow and stretch to support this dynamic, how it can become limited, and when it either nurtures or inhibits the eros-psyche-logos process through its own constraints or rigidity.

When we speak of logos or conception, we're not always referring to something conscious or involving actual deliberate thought. Logos often operates at what we might call an unconscious level—we remain unaware of the views and conceptions that are actually governing our perception. These operate subliminally, usually based on assumptions we've unwittingly absorbed from our surrounding culture or subcultures.

Logos encompasses a broad spectrum. Sometimes it involves elaborate, consciously worked-out conceptual frameworks, but much of the time it operates far more subtly, woven into the very fabric of perception. We rarely become conscious of these operating assumptions, and even more rarely have we actually arrived at them through our own careful investigation. More often, we've simply absorbed them through cultural indoctrination.

When logos—our conception or understanding of something—becomes too narrow or fixed, it constrains the entire dynamic in various ways. Consider, for instance, a rigidly held materialist or physicalist worldview that insists things are essentially just matter. In this view, consciousness emerges from genetic and neural processes shaped by cultural conditioning affecting neuronal activity, while matter remains simply matter—trees and inanimate objects are nothing more than their material composition.

Such a view, when held too tightly and inflexibly, actually prevents the imaginal level from blossoming. It blocks the fertile emergence of multiple dimensions of perception. Even when something deeper wants to arise in our experience, it gets immediately dismissed because the rigid logos insists, "That's not reality. This thing is just X." This dismissal often occurs barely consciously—the logos simply declares everything to be purely material, so any sense of other dimensions gets aborted before it can even reach birth.

When eros arises within such a constrained logos—and remember that eros always seeks more—that "more" becomes severely limited. Since the logos permits only one dimension of reality (the material), the more that eros naturally seeks is forced to operate solely within that single material dimension. Eros must look for its "more," must find its expansion, only in physical terms.

Where else can it go? It becomes constrained to seek fulfillment through physical acts. In sexuality, it must focus on physical acts alone. Or perhaps it seeks satisfaction through acquisition—buying things, accumulating material objects, obtaining more of this or that physical, tangible commodity. The pothos within eros, that yearning movement toward "more," can only move horizontally within this single permitted dimension.

But what happens then in relationship—whether with a lover, spouse, or any cherished object—when eros can only move into the physical realm? When we can only engage with what we love through whatever physical interactions that one dimension allows, and those possibilities become exhausted? When the physical acts and material engagements have been fully explored and no longer provide the nourishment that eros requires?

What can eros do then? Eros needs fuel to sustain its flame. Without that fuel, the flame of eros simply dies out.

In many ways, one of the possibilities, and sometimes it can happen almost pervasively in a person's life. You can see something was alive in childhood and through the teenage years and adolescence—the flame of eros there, perhaps in all kinds of ways, questioning and aliveness and stretching things. And then maybe in the twenties, or maybe in the thirties, or maybe even the forties or fifties, something... it's just lost fuel. It's not being fed something. Sometimes it's in the logos, in the limitation of ideation that does not give enough fuel for the eros. And the flame is extinguished.

Or maybe, as I said, it's forced out. For instance, I'm in this relationship or marriage and I'm only seeing it one-dimensionally. Or the dimensions are very limited, let's put it that way, in terms of who is this person, how rich, how deep are they potentially to me? Maybe they're not just material, but maybe they have a certain interiority that we grant them—people and their psychological complexity in the typical modernist view. But the dimensions are limited.

And then what happens? If there's eros once more, where does it go? It has to maybe go to other partners. I have to find someone else because I can only go at one dimension. I can't go deeper into this beloved. There is no deeper. I disallow it. The logos disallows it. So I go looking elsewhere.

Or maybe there's some other area in my life where I go and take up this or that something. And maybe that's an area where the logos actually allows a certain expansion. So maybe it's rich. Or maybe it just goes again into acquiring material things. So there was this thing and I was enamored with it, but because that thing, whatever it is—a possession, a house even—can only really be one-dimensional, then I need to acquire something else. I need to acquire material things or status or something. The eros can only move on one-dimensional, very limited dimensions. There's no vertical depth, other dimensions for it to expand into.

I wonder about something—just thinking about this, I wonder about something like pornography or pornography addiction. And I don't know, I've actually never been into pornography, but I wonder whether, again, part of what sometimes happens there is that the person engaging in that is caught in a limited dimensionality, just seeing matter in a very flat way. Or perhaps there's a split between where other dimensions are alive in their life—there's a sort of spirituality—but there's a split between spirituality and sexuality, so that in relation to sexuality, it's not spiritual. It doesn't have the possibility of feeling, sensing, perceiving, knowing, conceiving other dimensions within sexuality. So there's a split.

And I wouldn't want to speculate, but again, one wonders about abuse within the church and the clergy where people have spiritual teachings that do divorce the sexual from the spiritual in ways that don't allow a dimensionality in relation to sexuality. Or the person just has a materialistic view in the first place, a one-dimensional view.

So all this—pornography feels soulless. Why? Well, it is. In our language, it is. It's exactly that. It feels soulless because it is soulless, meaning there's no possibility there for the imaginal. There's lots of possibility for the imaginary, but no possibility for the imaginal, for the sense of dimensionality, of depth, of mystery, in the body, in the beauty, in the sexuality. There is really an objectification in the sense of narrowing down this or that object or other to just one dimension. There is an absence of soul, a poverty of psyche, a poverty of image.

And when that's the case, then we get what we might call greed. It's got nowhere to move, no depth in which to move. Again, I don't know, and part of this is just kind of wandering out loud, but it may be that someone who's into pornography... there isn't an absence of metta there. I'm thinking of actually two people, students who shared with me what they would term pornography addiction, and both of them had quite a degree of kindness and metta. So it's not an absence of metta, but something is blocked in the eros, psyche, logos dynamics—blocked from its natural inclination to expand, blocked by some kind of logos that either just sees one-dimensionally or doesn't allow dimensionality to infuse the sense of sexuality and physicality.

So we could say, in other words, that with something like pornography, maybe there's no psyche or logos beyond a one-dimensionality with respect to the other, certainly with respect to self and world, and with respect to the eros itself. So that fourfold—self, other, world, eros—that fourfold confluence or co-constellation, the psyche and logos with respect to each and all of them is limited to being one-dimensional and reified. "It is this. This is the truth. I am like this. Sexuality is like this"—whatever.

So in our language, if that small definition of eros, that initial impetus, is there—if it's moving in a person, if they have a lot of libido and life force, and there is that eros—the logos and the psyche won't allow the eros-psyche-logos to expand. And it goes, perhaps, if it's there, it will go just into some kind of greed or pleasure-seeking. It has to stay at that one level. Limited.

Now actually, we could say any prioritizing of one dimension or level of being, existence, perception—any shrinking of that vertical spectrum of the imaginal, whether it's to a so-called purely material level in the way that modernism conceives of it or senses it, or whether it's even some other kind of elevated, ethereal, almost disembodied level—any prioritizing or shrinking down to one dimension or level of that vertical spectrum of the imaginal, and a belief with that, "This or that level is what's really real," any of that will limit soul-making.

It's the openness of the sense of multidimensionality that encourages, supports, stimulates soul-making. And conversely, soul-making opens up that sense of multidimensionality. As always, there's a mutual dependence there.

I think as we're talking—and I think I might have said this before—we can get the sense that eros, psyche, logos, we can talk of them as if they're three almost separate things that come into interaction and mutual insemination. Or we can just as well say they're facets—three facets of one dynamic, of one process, three facets of soul-making.

And this soul-making, in these three facets, can be open and creative, or any of those three—the eros, the psyche, the logos—could be constricted somehow. And then when any of them is constricted, it can hinder or block the whole movement of the soul-making. So the whole process, the whole dynamism gets stuck. The whole dynamic gets stuck at some point, at some stage—rigidified, ossified, blocked, cramped.

So there are so many possibilities here. But for instance, what happens, again, in relationship with a beloved—any kind of beloved—if the logos, the idea, the conception of what a human being is generally, and in which case what this person is, is limited?

Either psychologically, it's limited in the way that a lot of modern psychotherapy might consider a person. Certainly they're complex. Certainly they're a result of past conditioning and family influences and cultural influences and all that. So it's a view. And we acknowledge and we feel nowadays, with modernism, a certain interiority to what a human being is—that a human being has that perhaps in many cases they didn't have, that sense, at other times in history.

But still, with all that, even with that kind of interiority, even with that kind of psychology—Freud's psychology or anything that came out of that, a lot of modern psychotherapy—there's still often, not always, but often there's a kind of limit to the logos of what a human being is. And that can function as a limit. It limits the soul-making movement, the soul-making growth and expansion.

Or it might be just the idea of this particular individual: I have a limited, fixed idea of who or how they are. Or my idea, my logos, my conceptual framework that's operating of relationship. Or of eros—what eros is. Or of sex and sexuality and that movement. I have a limited idea.

Even whatever it is. It might be "Sex is..." Actually, one of these students who considered himself to have a pornography addiction said to me, "You know, sex is just biological instinct. It's just biological instinct." It's a certain limited logos of what sex is.

But even ones that sound like they're more generous and richer and more heartful —"Sex is the expression of love," or "The sexual impulse is a spiritual impulse towards union"—all of them may have some validity. But when it's limited in that way, that too can function as a limited logos. And that will limit the soul-making possible.

Or in relation to sex, "This is how it should be"—some idea of how sex should be, which would include then a clinging to an idea or an image, a self-image of the psyche there, of my sexuality: how I am, how I am sexually, my sexual identity. And that may have got narrowed down or rigidified in all kinds of ways—along character or performance or all kinds of stuff. But there, the logos or the image, the psyche, in regard to my sexuality has become rigid or limited or both. And then again, the eros actually is hindered. The eros in its wish to expand actually gets hindered, blocked.

So you can see how many—maybe perhaps almost infinite ways—the eros-psyche-logos dynamic can get blocked and limited.

Perhaps we could say that it's infinite. Whether it's basically either from the eros being hindered, or the psyche, or the logos, or some combination of those, the permutations individually are infinite, perhaps.

We could also, for instance, cling to the image of another—a certain image we have of another. We neglect to see, we fail to see that this image that I have of this other is dependent on my way of looking. We believe and we act and we assume that the way we're seeing them, the image we have of them, is independent of the way of looking that one is employing at any time. There's a reification of that image.

Or, again, of marriage. Marriage is this. We have a certain image of what marriage is, or a certain logos of what marriage is. And all this can prevent, in different ways, stifle and limit the expansion, the deepening, the widening, the fertilizing of the soul-making.

Now, of course, in an actual relationship with another, soul-making in a relationship —or for the relationship to be a fertile field for soul-making, for the continuing fire of the eros in that relationship between the two there, or in a community, or whatever—it needs a basis in actuality. So it needs, of course, a basis in taking care of our communication. Really making sure the communication is skillful and supportive and helpful and caring. It needs a basis in kindness, in love. We need to voice love, express love, express appreciation. Without that kind of basis, the soul-making dynamic will founder. It won't have enough basis. Generally speaking. Again, it will be limited without that basis at another level, if you like.

But sometimes other things happen in relationship or are blocked in relationship. Sometimes the eros of one partner has a depth to it and a fire to it that is not matched by the other, has an aliveness to it and a range to it that is not matched by the other partner. The spark and the fullness of the eros either is just inherently not matched—they're just different personalities—or, in one of the partners, the eros is blocked. So it's actually there, somehow, but for different reasons—it can be very complex—and the eros is actually blocked. So one partner, their eros is flowing, and the flame is burning, and very alive, and the other, it's just not, and there's a mismatch.

Sometimes what happens is the logos and the psyche, the ideation, the concepts and the images that perhaps were shared—the ideas about life, about relationship, about being—the ideas and images that were shared no longer overlapped. Perhaps there isn't enough overlap to start with, and so there's not enough fuel for the mutual eros to burn. It can't really go anywhere with that. So the eros, again, gets limited, gets stifled, doesn't have the opportunity to grow.

Or, you know, again, for all kinds of reasons, something in him, something in her, in the relationship. Again, I don't have to make it as if it's objectively existing or not existing in them, but something in him or her, in this relational constellation, in this perception, in this dependent co-arising of the relationship, something in him or her doesn't allow the deepening of the psyche, the deepening of the imaginal dimension in relationship to him or her. They can no longer—there's a limit to how my sense of their soul doesn't open into more mystery, more dimensionality, more depth. And it's complex. The psychology here is complex in relation to all this, in relation to why that happens. So that there's a limitation on this eros-psyche-logos dynamic.

Let's make it clear. When we talk about logos, when we talk about ideas or concepts, by nature, their nature is to limit. They define and delineate. That's the nature of ideas. That in itself is not a problem. We touched on this a little bit obliquely in an earlier talk. But that's the nature of logoi, of concepts, of ideas—they limit, they delimit, and they define, and they delineate. No problem. That's just how they function.

The problem, from a soul-making perspective, is when the limit of a logos is reached with respect to the sense of the other, with respect to the idea of the other, of self, of world, of humans in general, of the soul, of psyche, of eros itself, of divinity—with respect to any of that—when a certain logos that's in place, when the limit of that is reached, and it doesn't allow the ongoing expansion or deepening of the soul-making dynamic, and when the limit is inflexible. So it reaches just like hitting a wall, and the wall will not shatter because it's just entrenched, whatever this idea is, and it won't stretch, so that it won't stretch or shatter to allow more territory for the play of this dynamic of eros-psyche-logos, playing together, this soul-making fecundity and fertilization. There's just something wants to expand, but the limit is reached.

So it's not the fact that ideas, logoi, concepts are limited and limiting by their nature. That's not the problem, because that's always the case.

That's how they work, as I said. Really what's at stake here, what the issue is, is where is the soul's process right now in relation to the limits of the concepts and ideas, the logoi that are in place? Where is my soul-making process at—that intermingling of image and eros and ideation—in relation to the limits that are in place of the logos?

What is the expanse that's created by my conceptual structure? Do I still have more room? Does the soul, if you like, in the soul-making process still have more room within the limits, the playground created by a certain conceptual structure, a conceptual framework, a certain logos? Or have I already filled it? Has the soul already explored that whole territory, that whole playground and needs to expand? It wants more and the more cannot be provided by the limits of that playground.

So that's really the question at any moment in time. Not so much even what the logos is, or how it relates to someone else's logos, or anything like that. It's really a question of relative pacing, if you like, of expansion between the different elements of the soul-making process. If the image wants to expand and the eros wants to expand, but the logos is limiting it, that's a problem—if it wants to expand beyond what the logos can allow.

With all this, I hope you're getting the sense that when we talk about logos or concept or idea, we're not talking about something abstract. In a way, that's kind of irrelevant. Abstract—the word actually means to remove: ab, from; tract, to take from, to remove. So we're not talking about something removed from life, removed from perception and experience and embodiment and living. And again, we're talking about something that's always operating.

Certainly a concept, an idea, a logos can be abstract. But in terms of practice, when we talk about ways of looking in meditation—whether it's to do with emptiness, dependent arising, or whether it's to do with soul-making—we need to actually practice entertaining different concepts, different conceptual structures, different logoi, in ways that actually flow into, actually inform, actually shape a way of looking so that they can be soul-making.

We're not talking about just thinking something intellectually in a way that doesn't come into the way of looking, in a way that actually affects one's life. Sometimes—and this is a really important point—sometimes people don't get the connection here. Why are you talking so much about ideas? And actually find it hard to bring an idea to bear on the actual sensing and seeing and embodiment and life and perception.

We can't just assume that they do connect, because it might just be that we're entertaining this idea abstractly, just listening: "Oh, that's very interesting, fascinating." But it's not actually—we need a way to bring an idea into the world, to the world that we live, in the way that we live it, to the perception. Ideas are there anyway, as I said. What we're interested in is this flexibility of concepts and ways of looking and plugging them in, moving between them, again, in ways that make a difference.

So when we talk—really what I mean by all this is not so much the abstract logoi, but the logoi, the logos, the concepts that are actually lived, that are alive. If they're unconscious, can I make them conscious? And if they're stuck, can I bring in new ones and fresh ones and develop that flexibility? We're talking about the concepts that are lived, that are alive, that are embodied, and that actually involve and affect the heart and the experience and the perception.

Even more than that, I would add: playing with different ideas and conceptual frameworks and actually entertaining them in this way that I'm talking about—in the perception, in the experience—and more than that, creating them, forging them, as we're doing now. This process, both the flexibility of entertaining them, but also building new ones, that is soul-making. That process of engaging with the creativity of conceptuality, of idea, of mind, is itself part of soul-making, stimulates soul-making, supports the inflaming of the eros and the increase of the psyche.

You can see how much idea comes into our lives. For instance, faith is a certain ideation, we could say. And there are many different kinds here. But for example, in relation to some personal difficulty that's arisen in my life or that I might be going through, or some pattern I have in the personality that's difficult or something that befalls my body or me—and the idea, the logos, that it is somehow necessary to soul. It's an idea. And that it somehow has divine roots, that it mirrors something divine. These are ideas.

But if I can plug them in, just play with that a little bit, they make the experience rich. They make the personal difficulty—they give it depth and dimensionality. They make it feel necessary. They make it imaginal and eventually divine. So logos affects perception, affects the image, the lived image we have of what we deal with, ourselves and the things that befall us and make us up.

Then something interesting, because we talk a lot in the Dharma of relating to this pain or that pain or this difficulty or that difficulty with metta. Metta to myself who has to go through this, has to bear this. Metta even to the phenomenon of the pain.

I have spoken about relating to pain and difficulty with metta on different retreats—metta to ourselves as we bear these challenges, even metta to the phenomenon of pain itself. But there exists another possibility: not just metta, but eros in relationship to difficulty. The possibility that our sense of difficulty becomes enriched, given dimensions, rather than simply fading away. While holding difficulties in kindness and finding ways of looking that allow them to fade are entirely valid approaches, there is also this potential for eros in relationship to our own personal difficulties and the challenging events of our existence.

We explored Amor Fati during the re-enchanting retreat—the poetry of perception, the love of one's fate—and examined what allows this to become a lived, heartfelt, soulfelt experience.

In relation to anything at all, a view that reduces it—say psychologically—won't lead to soul-making, or will lead to very limited soul-making and very limited expansion of the sense of sacredness in life. Psychological reductionism and other forms of reductionism may still prove very helpful in addressing this or that difficulty, but they won't lead to soul-making. The reductionism inherent in such logos won't support the expansion, the growth, the organic and potentially limitless development that soul-making offers.

Unless our very psychological difficulties, obstacles, personal challenges, and the difficult events that befall us are seen as images—unless they become imaginal. The psychology itself and the difficulty itself must become images, or the logos through which we perceive them must allow them to become images. Then they become re-enchanted.

Catherine's talk was entitled "Re-Enchanting Dukkha." The very dukkha itself needs this transformation. The logos through which I perceive difficulty must somehow either avoid psychological reduction entirely, or if I do consider it psychologically, that whole psychology must reveal its other levels—mirroring, necessity of soul, divine purpose.

What happens in my childhood, what unfolds in my life, the journey into which I am guided or constrained by life's circumstances—this too receives other imaginal dimensions. A difficulty might indeed result from psychological patterns, but the whole constellation gains another imaginal dimension. The dukkha is re-enchanted.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 62

Eros Unfettered (Part 4)

Rob Burbea · 37 min

> In this fourth installment of his profound series on eros and desire in spiritual practice, Rob Burbea examines how erotic energy functions as a hermeneutic force that opens infinite dimensions of meaning and soul-making. Drawing on Platonic philosophy and Kabbalistic teachings, he explores how eros acts as what Plato called a 'hermeneutic daemon' - a divine interpreter that reveals multiple layers of meaning in whatever it encounters.
> Burbea discusses the crucial difference between horizontal seeking (constantly moving to new experiences) and vertical deepening (discovering infinite depth in present experience). He shares personal examples including a powerful dream vision of a wooden door opening to a sacred forest, demonstrating how imaginal practice can transform our relationship with nature and existence itself. The talk addresses practical concerns about teacher-student relationships, examining how fantasies and images of spiritual teachers can either support or limit soul-making processes.
> A key theme is the alchemical function of containment - how not acting on erotic impulses can create a sacred vessel (temenos) that intensifies the soul-making process. Rather than suppressing desire, this containment channels erotic energy into imaginal dimensions, opening new depths of meaning and connection. Burbea concludes with William James' insight about the 'fantastic and unnecessary character' of human wants, suggesting that our extravagant desires, when properly understood, serve as guides to dimensions of existence beyond our current comprehension.

So you can see in so many different ways the possibilities of supporting or blocking the erotic movement, the movement of soul-making, the process and dynamic of soul-making. And this, as I say, we could say this is what the soul wants.

What do we love about being in love? We love the love, certainly. But maybe more, maybe more than that, we love the sense of soul-making when we're in love. To echo something we said the other day, we love the sense of the infinite potential, the infinite creation and discovery, creativity and discovering with respect to the beloved other, in and with respect to them, in and with respect to the self, to the world, to the eros, to divinity.

Eros, if it's allowed to stimulate and open this soul-making dynamic, the Eros Psyche Logos dynamic, the bigger meaning of Eros, Eros opens. It opens things up. And that opening is what is soul-making. And we love that.

Part of that opening is this: it opens up the very sense of existence, the very way we see and sense and conceive of existence. Eros, if you remember from Plato's depiction, was a hermeneutic daemon, meaning he's some kind of demigod that has to do with interpretation, with hermeneutics, interpretation of everything. So whatever Eros comes into contact with, whatever it flows towards, wherever there's erotic connection, there's a fertility and an opening up of the hermeneutics there—the interpretation of this facet, this thread, this aspect of existence, the self, the other, the world there, the eros itself.

So eros, if you like, opens for us the gates into the garden of infinite interpretations—a phrase I used on the re-enchanting retreat: the garden of infinite interpretation. Eros is what takes us in there.

I like to draw on some Kabbalistic teaching. Most Kabbalists, both with respect to sacred scripture and also in relation to the world—so both with scripture and any aspect of existence—held almost axiomatically that it's potentially subject to an infinite variety of perspectives and interpretations. Not just sacred scripture, but the world and others and all that. So it's very similar to what we're saying here.

Some of these teachings about multiple interpretation in Kabbalah I got from this writer that I enjoy, Sanford Drobb. He describes one Kabbalist, Moses Chaim Luzzato, Rabbi Moses Chaim Luzzato, who lived in Padua, Italy in the early 18th century. He's talking about comparing the multiplicity of meanings in and of the Torah, basically the Old Testament, comparing that to the many nuances of the flames from a hot coal. So the flame from a hot coal flickers and has different colors in it at different times. Suddenly it goes green or blue and moves, shapes, and grows, and diminishes. All those multiple flickering nuances are somewhat similar to the multiplicity of meanings of the basic text. It's not taken one-dimensionally or in a kind of narrow literalistic sense at all.

So this Rabbi Moses Chaim Luzzato said of the Torah, whose words and letters are like coals: whoever is preoccupied and busy with it—in other words, whoever has that erotic connection with it, that arousal of interest that we talked about, that connection there—whoever is preoccupied and busy with it inflames the coals. And from each and every letter, a great flame emerges, replete with many nuances, which are the information encoded in this letter. This is the reason why the Torah as a whole is infinite. Even one of its letters is also infinite. But it is necessary to inflame it, and then it will be inflamed. And so too the intellect of the human being.

So again, we get the image that I was using before—and I think it might even be a classic one—of Eros as a flame. When there's that erotic connection, just as he was describing there without the language of eros, we could say something similar happens to whatever there is this erotic connection with. And eros, as a flame, needs something to burn. It needs the fuel of what? Of the beloved other as psyche and logos. The psyche and the logos are the fuel. And actually then the flame too, if we follow the analogy, it sort of mixes because the psyche and the logos are what is then perceived of the thing. And that becomes the flame that we behold if you translate it back to his image. But again, that really reflects the fact that eros, psyche, logos are not separate.

Again, Luzzato wrote: we enlarge our soul which was previously contracted, in order to be capable of receiving the wisdom of God. We enlarge our soul, which was previously contracted, in order to be capable of receiving the wisdom of God—or if you prefer, the jnana, the gnosis of Buddha nature, the jnana of Buddha nature. This is what soul-making is.

And somehow that floating, cartwheeling movement of the subtle body allowed the whole imaginal object to come alive again. The door became present, luminous with that same numinous quality from the dream. The organ music returned, flooding through from whatever sacred space lay beyond that threshold.

As I dwelt with this image in meditation, something extraordinary began to unfold. The door wasn't just a door anymore. It became a portal, an opening between dimensions. The carved abstract shapes in the wood weren't merely decorative—they were alive with meaning, pregnant with significance I could feel but couldn't fully articulate. Each curve, each line seemed to pulse with divine intelligence.

The music grew more magnificent, not louder but deeper, as if the very foundations of existence were singing. And in that imaginal space, I began to understand something about thresholds, about the places where the sacred breaks through into ordinary reality. This wasn't just a beautiful door—it was the Door, the eternal opening between the visible and invisible worlds.

What had begun as a simple dream image was now revealing layers upon layers of meaning. The mockery of the young men in the dream began to make sense too—they represented that part of consciousness that dismisses the imaginal, that reduces mystery to mere fantasy. But here, in the actual engagement with the image, the door was teaching me about the nature of sacred space, about how the divine presents itself at liminal moments, at thresholds.

This is what I mean about the vertical dimension opening up. I didn't need to travel anywhere to find more beauty, more depth, more meaning. Right here, in this imaginal door, was an inexhaustible source of wonder. Each time I returned to it in meditation, new aspects revealed themselves. The grain of the wood spoke of time and growth. The stone arch whispered of permanence and strength. The music carried me into realms of feeling I had no words for.

And then something even more remarkable happened. Having been touched by this imaginal door, when I walked outside and looked at actual doors—the front door of the retreat center, an old garden gate, even just the doorway between rooms—they too began to shimmer with that same quality. The imaginal dimension had opened up my perception so that ordinary doors became thresholds to the sacred.

This is the cosmopoiesis I spoke of—how engaging with images in the imaginal realm actually transforms our perception of the physical world. The eros that had been awakened by that dream door, that longing for the sacred, for beauty, for depth, didn't get satisfied and then fade away. Instead, it kept revealing more and more dimensions, both in the inner realm of imagination and in the outer world of form.

The door became a teacher, showing me how the divine hides in plain sight, how every threshold we cross might be an opening to mystery if we have eyes to see. And this seeing, this enlarged perception, was exactly what that earlier quote was pointing to—enlarging our soul, which was previously contracted, in order to be capable of receiving the wisdom of God.

And then that helped, that numinosity and beauty and connection with this image of the door and the sense of sacredness and praise. It helped it all to arise, became really almost just as vital and just as beautiful, just as moving. And really not separate from me. There was something very beautifully connected there.

Then I floated—you know, there was still this energy body sense—so I floated in the image. And I, rather than make the door open, I sort of let it open. And inside was a kind of rainforest, a bright orb of light like the sun. But there didn't seem to be any walls there or borders. It was just this forest and bright light and such a sense of beauty and reverence. And looking up, somehow at the same time looking up, there were stars there, and more music. I could—I was aware in the image—I could sort of travel into this landscape and go on a bit of a journey, but I decided not to, for that reason I pointed out about the difference between narrative images moving through a lot of space, a sort of shamanic journey, versus a kind of image that's sufficient to itself, so the depth there remains a little bit pregnant, not yet fully explored.

I'm mentioning this partly because at one level it sounds like, well, nothing much happened, or it's certainly not sexually erotic. So in one level it sounds like not that big a deal, as a dream and as an image. But it was, first, tremendously touching for me, and second, there is Eros there, right? There's this sense of attraction, beauty, dimensionality, divinity. And in that attraction, in the way that it stirs the soul, there are all the elements of soul-making there.

The reason I'm mentioning it now as well is because as I moved through the day—and I think I was even working that day—I periodically just recalled the vision, the image, during the day at different times and noticed the cosmopoiesis that came from it. So it was a vision of nature in this case, not of some sexual thing, but a vision of nature and a whole relationship with nature, with this rainforest and the beauty there and the door opening into something that actually spilled over into a real sacredness of cosmopoiesis in relation to whatever was around me that was redolent of that image, characteristic of that image.

So again, coming out of the eros and the imaginal—in this case originating not even with actual physical nature—there's a sense of the relationship with nature being opened, transformed, deepened, so that there isn't a need to necessarily go here or there, see this or that place necessarily. Because the more the eros can go, it can get infinitely satisfied in the infinite depth that can open up there. It doesn't need—let's say it's not constrained to the horizontal. It's right here. I don't need to go elsewhere on this same flat horizontal level. It's infinite right here—infinite in depth, infinite in possibility.

So we can see this in all kinds of ways. Also, again, non-sexual, with respect to someone who's not a lover, but an actual person or a thing in our life or something. For example, the fantasy of a teacher. And again, I'm using fantasy in a good sense, in a creative, soul-making sense. There is fantasy and image. When the teacher-student relationship—even when they don't know each other, they've never met in person—when that is potent and deep and fertile, when there is eros there, and there's a fantasy of the teacher, or fantasies and images of that teacher, in the best sense, in the imaginal sense.

But then what can happen is, again, if we're talking about how this process gets blocked or limited—either, for example, my soul-making process of the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic, in its expansion, reaches, if you like, the limit of what the teacher is presenting. So the image—the way they are, or the way they behave, or act, or comport themselves, or dress or speak or whatever it is—can no longer meet the expansion that's happening in my soul-making process of the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic. And we need more. We need a larger, wider... someone that can give us that or hold that, if you like, in their being. Or a deeper, wider logos than this teacher is presenting and communicating or teaching. You understand? Something in your soul-making, my soul-making logos, soul-making movement, in relation to this fantasy of this teacher—it reaches the limit of what they can hold, or what their presentation of themselves can hold, and of their teachings can hold. And the soul needs something more.

And then the eros goes out of that relationship, and oftentimes the power of the teaching goes out of that relationship. The soul-making goes out of that relationship. Or what can happen is my fantasy or image of them, or of what awakening is, changes. So I'm talking about spiritual teachers now. For some reason my fantasy just changes of them, my image of them, or my whole fantasy image or logos of what awakening is. And again, it shifts. The eros can no longer flow there for what the soul-making needs. So there's a diminishing of the eros, or the eros means that I move elsewhere for something that can support that psyche and logos.

I can't remember—I think I've shared in other talks in the past, I don't remember—but I lived as a musician for quite some years in the US, and twice during those years at different times, there were periods where the whole soul-making relationship with music and with making music and writing music and playing music just kind of collapsed. It collapsed to a kind of one-dimensionality, so everything that music was—so full, so expressive, so resonant of other dimensions of existence and meaningfulness—at different times, once for a very short period, once for a little longer, it just kind of collapsed to just like, "Yeah, why all this fuss about sounds in certain relationships?"

Continue beautifying this talk (part 4/5). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

It lost its magic, if you like. It lost its image. Those words—magic and image—I'm not sure, but they may well be related. It lost all its imaginal dimensions, its meaningfulness, its soul resonances. And the erotic relationship with making music, with improvising or writing music, was just gone.

It came back. There were certain things that actually helped break that collapse, and certain things that allowed a new level of fantasy to return.

Actually, if we go back to the whole fantasy of a teacher thing, in some traditions—for instance, some of the Tibetan lineages—the instruction is to regard your lama as the Buddha. It's hard to say how many people actually take that literally, like they really are the Buddha. There's something there that they are the reincarnation of a Buddha, or something very close to a Buddha. It might be taken very literally, or not. I don't know, and there's probably a real variety in how literally people take this "your lama, your guru, is the Buddha" teaching.

For me, it's exactly this kind of literalism or realism—whether it's religious in the narrow sense or whether it's secular—it's the realism that's a little silly. So what we're trying to open up here is something, a kind of middle way, that's not a realism, not a shrinking literalism and kind of concretization that would strike me as really a bit silly. But it's also not a kind of dismissal and a refusal to admit other dimensions—something about the nature of perception and ways of looking and soul-making and eros that dismisses all that and just goes to a kind of realism of another level, shrinking to that one dimension.

Something, if you like, in between, which isn't some sort of happy compromise. It's something that's at a different level of understanding, of concept, of engagement, of wisdom, I would say.

So there's the difference between an idol and actually believing this thing or this person is really divine in a kind of very concretized, limited and reified way, and then it somehow encapsulates the totality or it is the totality of what divinity is. There's a difference between an idol and an icon. And here I'm borrowing from Henri Corbin and also Jean-Luc Marion, a postmodern French philosophic theologian.

An icon admits of this open-endedness, admits of dimensions of unfathomability, dimensions of divinity that will always exceed whatever is in front of us, always bigger than the actual perception. But somehow this thing, or this beloved other, or this object, or whatever it is, functions as a kind of portal to that infinity of infinities, to that dimensionality and divinity. But it's without naive realism, and it's without limitation as well.

So you can get icons and idols in relation to images, of course, but you can also get them in relation to ideas. So an idea can become, or a conceptual framework or a logos can become an idol. It becomes, again, limited, and we say, "This is the truth, this is real, this is true." Or it can become something that's held in a different way—not reified, not taken with a truth claim, and not limited. It becomes more potentially open, expansive, expanding. We'll return to this in relation to ideation.

But in a nutshell, it's not inflation that's the problem—if you know this word from Jungian psychology. This expansion of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, this expansion of the imaginal and the ideation—that's not what Jung actually meant by inflation. It's not the expansion per se that's the problem; it's the reification and the identification that's the problem. Reification and identification are the problems, not this expansion, not the inflation. Because where there's reification and identification, there is not the imaginal. It's not image as we're using it.

Now, last thing. Sometimes, and in some relationships—most of the time, perhaps all the time—it's not acting on the eros that actually stimulates. It's the containment of the eros, preventing it from spilling out in certain ways into actuality, that actually allows the increase of the psyche, the growth, the expansion of soul-making, of image, of logos. It's the not acting.

So what happens by creating a space that is free of manifest action is we create a kind of alchemical vessel, a crucible. The heat of eros accumulates in that space where there isn't the possibility to act on the eros in the most immediate or obvious or one-dimensional way. And this crucible and the vessel and the heat—the fire of eros heating that vessel—heats and stimulates and galvanizes, catalyzes the soul-making process. There's alchemy here.

We cannot, or we refuse to get our more—the more that eros wants—on the horizontal material level in this relationship with whoever it is. And therefore the more is, if you like, forced or funneled to other dimensions, to open other dimensions, to discover, to create other dimensions. Because it can't, it's kept out of this area, of this dimension. So it must find the pressure to create, to find more and find it at other levels and create those and discover and open those other imaginal dimensions.

So for example, non-consummation sexually in a relationship, or on the physical plane of manifesting—being friends and hanging out or whatever it is.

Rather than seeing these boundaries—the kinds that often exist and are sometimes stringently reinforced between psychotherapists and clients, or teachers and students—through the conventional psychological lens that views them as opportunities to re-experience the Oedipal triangle and the frustration of not being able to possess the mother (as projected onto the therapist or teacher), we might consider a different understanding. The typical interpretation suggests that by reliving that Oedipal trauma or pain, we can find healthier ways to navigate, confront, and accommodate these dynamics. But this remains largely a psychological reductionist view of what's actually happening.

What if instead we understand these boundaries and their necessity as creating a kind of alchemical vessel? They forge the conditions where an alchemy of soul-making becomes possible through the very containment of eros—through this sacred space, this temenos, as the Greeks called it.

Through non-acting at that level, sometimes in certain relationships, a temenos is created for soul-making. This isn't about letting go and diminishing our desires, releasing craving from our lives, renouncing eros, or trying to abandon sexual desire. That's not the purpose in our understanding, in this way we're exploring now. It's for the sake of soul-making itself. This space, this boundary, this temenos, exists for soul-making.

The erotic tension is preserved, the fire contained, so it heats up more rather than dispersing. The erotic tension remains alive because the two doesn't collapse into a one through union. This boundary, this containment—I'm not referring here to the preservation of sexual energy found in certain ancient and modern sexual yogas, where the man doesn't ejaculate so that energy is contained and rechanneled to open bliss or activate energy centers, allowing consciousness to melt into oneness. That's all valid and beneficial, but it's not what I mean by this kind of temenos.

This containment serves a different purpose: the fertilization of the imaginal, the increase and support of soul-making, the very vessel of soul-making. The imaginal is involved here in a unique way.

Let me conclude with a quote from William James, the psychologist and philosopher. I'm uncertain of its exact source or the full scope of his intended meaning, but perhaps you can hear it now through the lens of everything we've explored. He wrote about "the fantastic and unnecessary character of a man's wants"—keeping his gendered language for the moment. He observed:

"Even when the gratification of the wants seems farthest off, the uneasiness they occasion is still the best guide of his life and will lead him to issues entirely beyond his present powers of reckoning. Prune down his extravagance, sober him, and you undo him."

Prune down his extravagance, sober him, and you undo him.

There's something profound in what he calls "the fantastic and unnecessary character" of eros. It does give rise to a kind of uneasiness, an unsettledness. Why? Because it's inherently dynamic, because it grows things. When we allow it to expand in the way it naturally, organically wants to, it becomes the best guide of our lives, leading us to issues entirely beyond our present powers of reckoning. It opens insights, expands our sense of existence—all of this unfolds naturally.

Prune down his extravagance, sober him, and you undo him.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 63

Eros Unfettered (Part 5 - Otherness and the Art of Disappearing)

Rob Burbea · 1h12

> In this profound exploration of eros and soul-making, Rob Burbea distinguishes his understanding of eros from the Neoplatonic tradition, arguing that eros preserves and creates two-ness rather than driving toward unification. He examines how the soul-making dynamic of eros-psyche-logos increases otherness while simultaneously opening possibilities for knowing various forms of oneness through jhāna and mystical experience.
> Burbea addresses the desire for oneness that many meditators experience, suggesting it's actually a desire to know oneness rather than permanently dissolve into it. He explores how eros maintains erotic tension while allowing temporary dissolution into unity states, and discusses the emergence of a "third" - whether the "we" of relationship, creative projects, or children - that arises from erotic connection without collapsing into merger.
> The talk delves into epistemological questions about participatory reality, drawing from quantum physics and modern philosophy to suggest we both create and discover sacredness. Burbea contrasts "the art of disappearing" (dissolution practices like jhāna) with the eros-driven path that maintains otherness while opening infinite dimensions of exploration. He concludes by envisioning how eros might transform Dharma understanding from disenchantment toward re-enchantment, potentially creating an "endless Dharma" through deeper emptiness realization, Mahāyāna cosmology, engaged practice, or soul-making itself.

Let's pick up a couple of threads we've already touched on and take them a little further, elaborate them more, and weave them together more regarding this whole soul-making dynamic.

One of the things we said quite early on was that the way we are defining Eros—and really these definitions are not about who's right and who's wrong—is not the way some people have defined it historically and some people still do. Coming from the Neoplatonic tradition, we are not defining it as, or saying that it is, a drive or force toward unification, toward union.

Rather, in contrast to that, we have been saying that eros, in the way we're using that word—eros as we define it—preserves and creates or discovers two-ness. So it's not an inclination, a movement toward oneness, melting, or unification. Rather, if we pay attention to this thing, this aspect of our experience, of our phenomenological movement that we can observe that we're calling eros, we can see that eros preserves and creates or discovers two-ness.

Why? Because Eros is in the service of and is part of the soul-making movement, the soul-making dynamic, the dynamic of Eros-Psyche-Logos. And soul-making, as we've also said and explained, as we can observe in our experience, brings an increase of otherness, an increase of the other. The other swells, it gets extended, expanded in breadth, in depth, in dimensionality, and starts to become more complicated and reveal more facets, more manifold facets. Distinctions are made in the erotic movement or through the erotic soul-making movement. Distinctions are made of perception and of conception, psyche and logos, within the other or of others.

So we can see then how, and understand how, Eros does indeed preserve and create and discover two-ness and otherness. It's the two-ness meaning the two of self and other.

But we might wonder then, well, what about the desire for oneness? What about this desire that we have, or many human beings have, for oneness? So that avenue of oneness, of dissolving, of merging into unions of different kinds, I want to say that's important. And I think for many people interested in meditation, that is an important pull, call in the soul. But at the same time, the avenue of two-ness is important. So both these avenues—of oneness and of two-ness, if we have this erotic avenue preserving the two-ness—they're both important. I want to say we can have both. We can have both. We can know both.

But let's go into this a little more, because if we actually examine personally the desire for oneness, and sometimes even a longing for oneness, what actually is it? I would say on inspection, it's actually a desire to know oneness of some kind—a oneness of love or of beingness or awareness or whatever it is, or a desire to know the unfabricated, which is another kind of oneness we could say. It's a desire to know. It's not so much a desire to become one with that oneness, or the unfabricated, or to dissolve into a permanent union.

So it's a desire to know something, not to dissolve permanently into some union. This is interesting. In the classic Pali canon texts, as well as other spiritual contemplative traditions from religious traditions from around that time and before and afterward, the kind of ultimate goal of the path could be construed as exactly that—some kind of permanent dissolution or union, ending of the rebirth of a separate existence, and either permanent union with Brahman or whatever, or dissolution into the unfabricated, something like that.

So classically it's there stated as a goal as a permanent—this is the ending of all rebirths, permanently dissolved and unified, or however exactly one would phrase it, something like that. But I would wonder, is that desire there because it's taught to be the goal, or because it's really desired, or because it's actually a movement of aversion, of subtle aversion—something we'll come back to later on the retreat—vibhava-tanha, desire, lust for non-existence, for erasing everything, turning existence and the world and self off, turning it all off, turning experience off.

In actual meditation, actual practice, an actual spiritual practice, what is possible is all kinds of dissolution to relative degrees, all kinds of unions, unifications, all kinds of experiences of melting into oneness, whether it's different levels of jhanas or of the eight jhanas, or different experiences of the brahma-viharas dissolving into love. All kinds are possible, and even what's called an experience of the cessation of perception in an experience of the unfabricated. These are all available as temporary meditative experiences.

One learns how to do that, develops that art or skill at whatever level of jhana or in whatever direction, or to the unfabricated, whatever, and dips into that dissolution temporarily. And then, hopefully—and sometimes it's a gradual process—one then emerges from that and knows a level of essential unity, an essential oneness with whatever it is—infinite love, or infinite consciousness, or something like that, or even somehow the unfabricated. So one moves in a world experiencing two-ness, but actually knowing oneness.

So one can meditatively, with practice, practicing the right way, finding out how, developing that art, one can dissolve in different ways, to different degrees, into different kinds of oneness, and emerge. And emerging, hopefully, in time, and with some reflective insight, we know something. We know an essential oneness, you could say, something like that.

But knowing implies already some kind of duality or polarity at least of knower and known. Knowing is already implies or is already a state of some degree of two-ness, knower and known. There is the knower and there's what is known. There's the consciousness that knows and there's that which is known. Some degree—to different ways, different kinds and to different degrees.

So what does the spiritual seeker want in wanting oneness, in longing for oneness? She wants to know that she is one, essentially, with God, with universal love, universal awareness, universal beingness, with the Dharmakaya, whatever, at different levels of understanding and perception, actually, of oneness. But she wants to know that, essentially, she is one. And that's different than a desire to dissolve and have that union as a sort of permanent thing.

And similarly, you know, in tantra—we talked about this on the last retreat, the re-enchanting the cosmos retreat—about becoming the deity, becoming the imaginal figure as a kind of option in imaginal practice and also as a kind of direction or instruction in tantric practice. But that becoming the deity, becoming the imaginal figure, is never, first of all, total. It's never a complete union dissolving all sense of distinction.

And secondly, it's only temporary. Realistically, it's only temporary.

This is important—to actually scrutinize a little bit this desire for oneness and what's actually happening in the spiritual and meditative openings, perceptual openings of experiences of oneness and union, dissolution and merging, whether in meditation or in life with a lover, or in the flow of doing a sport.

We'll return to this desire later in the retreat, this desire for oneness, for transcendence, for the unfabricated. There's quite a lot involved in that, and we'll explore the place of that desire on our path. But for now, let's say that eros will retain and engender, or works to both retain and actually engender two-ness. And it will move towards doing that even at the same time as it knows oneness, or onenesses—because there are many varieties and many levels of oneness.

So the general overall movement of soul-making and the thrust that comes from eros will work essentially to retain and engender two-ness, but also unfold oneness. And eventually those experiences become quite possible—the perception of a sense of two-ness, of erotically charged two-ness and otherness at the same time as one knows and can sense a oneness, or many onenesses at different levels, different varieties.

And again, eventually it's quite possible to modulate the emphasis in the way of looking or in the meditation or in the experience that one's involved with—to actually modulate it towards the melting, towards the unfabricating, as we touched on, or towards retaining the two-ness. What am I drawing out of perception? How am I inclining the unfolding of the experience? This is all very possible with the development of the art of meditation.

But eros keeps an erotic tension in the relationship, whether it's with a person or something in nature or an intrapsychic image or whatever. The erotic tension is maintained. And that erotic tension is not just the wanting to act or "I really want to kiss you" or whatever it is. It's not just wanting sexual consummation either, or the tension of the build-up of, say, sexual energy in the body, or just psychic energy, desire, or—as we talked about—the tension of craving. It's not just the tension of energy accumulating in the body or the psychic vessel. That's not the only facet of the erotic tension, and that might not even be a big aspect of it at all. And the erotic tension can be subtle.

So it's not just wanting to act. It's not just wanting sexual consummation. It's not just the tension of energy. It's not just the tension of desiring union. Erotic tension that is intrinsic to the soul-making erotic movement is this desire for the other—desire to know and experience, touch the other that we're talking about.

There is always more. There's always more of that desire. So there's a tension because there's always more. It's inherent in the pothos of the eros that goes with the eros. And also because the object is always becoming more through the insemination, impregnation that eros gives to the whole eros-psyche-logos dynamic process, soul-making process. The object always becomes more. There's always more to desire, more to know, more to experience. It doesn't collapse into oneness.

So there's an erotic tension just because there's always this desire for more and there's always the two.

Eros creates otherness, or we could say it creates othernesses because it creates also different aspects or whole ranges of othernesses within one object even. It creates and discovers otherness. We could say eros needs otherness. The erotically charged object is an other for eros.

And wrapped up in that, and in the experience—again, just phenomenologically observing the whole experience of eros, of soul-making—there's a fascination with the other. There's the sense, the perception of the beauty of the other. The other is, as we've been saying, an image, a fantasy, so they need to be imaginally alive. The other is an image and a fantasy, and image and fantasy are needed as part of the eros, as we've been saying—and this kind of space, if you like, of mystery or "not yet," or "unknown yet," the space in which the whole process, the whole thrust and opening of eros can happen to discover or create more of the object.

So both the image, replete with its different facets and its beauty and the fascination with that, and also the fascination, the attraction of the space of mystery, the not-as-yet, in which we can discover and create more of the object—all this is part of the experience of eros and soul-making eros.

Some relation to the opening to levels of oneness in meditation and mystical experience: what that means then, what we've just said, is that on the way to, or aspiring to, or practicing towards, in the process of learning to open to or discovering a level of oneness, eros is there. There's fascination. I want to know cosmic consciousness, let's say. I want to open to it and discover it. There's fascination, there's the beauty perhaps of hearing about it or sensing it vaguely but not quite yet.

It exists for us as an image, replete with fantasy, beckoning from this space of mystery—depth we don't quite grasp, unknown potential waiting to unfold. All these aspects are present, making that oneness, whatever level we're contemplating, whatever we might call the unfabricated, into an erotic object for the soul.

But eros requires polarity, and it constellates an erotic tension. Something particularly fascinating emerges in the experience of eros—more easily observed sometimes in sustained relationships with another person where there's beauty and soul-making, though it applies equally to imaginal figures and objects. Even with something as seemingly unified as cosmic oneness, a sense of twoness and otherness can exist within the larger field of eros, within the soul-making dynamic itself.

This twoness and otherness, this erotic tension and polarity, can be experienced alongside—or perhaps within—a third element. There emerges what we might call the "us" or the "we." Consider: there's the self and the other, with eros flowing between them, each alive as image and erotic object. When the soul-making process grows rich enough, it constellates this third—often the very relationship itself.

So there's you and me, and then there's us—almost as if a third soul gets constellated, discovered, or created. What is the soul of this "we"? It's the soul of us that emerges from the eros-psyche-logos dynamic as it expands, enriches, finds, creates, discovers, reveals ever more. This "we," this "us," doesn't represent a merging into union but rather an integrated constellation of the two—a different kind of oneness composed of twoness, if you will.

When souls come together in relationship, I don't lose the sense of me, nor do you disappear. Both remain vibrantly alive as erotic objects—myself included, which we'll explore further. Yet simultaneously, a third seems to be born: we. You and I create a kind of larger soul together, but it's not a collapse into union. It's a birth.

This birth of the soul of us, of we, could indeed be regarded as a literal birth. Or perhaps the actual birth of a child emerges from this eros and soul-making, this child becoming another facet of the dynamic. The third might manifest as a creative project both parties can love and invest in. From the eros between two, some kind of third is born or emerges—whether the third of "us," an actual child, or a collaborative creation. This becomes a new erotic object, a further channel for eros and soul-making.

All these facets coexist simultaneously as different dimensions of the whole soul-making process. They emerge as one recognizes them, as the entire movement deepens, widens, expands, and refines. Because of this comprehensive nature—the soul-making dynamic's tendency to flow in every possible direction, to fill everything out and impregnate all with meaning—eros will also lead to recognizing essential oneness with the other, all kinds of different oneness.

The very erotic movement, when allowed to unfold fully, will eventually lead us to recognize various forms of oneness. It opens mystical experiences. But in the actual lived experience of eros with another person or imaginal figure, this oneness isn't what's predominantly emphasized. In fact, knowledge or sense of oneness isn't necessary to eros at all. Eros, in fertilizing the soul-making dynamic of eros-psyche-logos, will naturally uncover and reveal oneness as part of its unfolding—but this isn't the dominant aspect, nor what's emphasized when eros is in the foreground.

Eros needs the perception of otherness to remain. It doesn't want to dissolve otherness because otherness is what entices. The scope, size, range, depth, complexity, multifacetedness, and multidimensionality of perceiving the other—this is equivalent to the image, the psyche in the eros-psyche-logos dynamic. This otherness must remain and be continually built.

In igniting and stoking the soul fires of eros, psyche, and logos, eros creates or discovers the other and otherness—but otherness it desires to contact, to know, to experience. Eros creates more attractive others that stimulate more eros. This is crucial: rather than creating others from whom we feel alienated or toward whom we feel aversion, eros generates attractive otherness that draws us deeper into relationship and discovery.

The implications of what we're exploring here are vast and far-reaching.

And we'll return to these threads. We'll pick them up later, as I mentioned.

But what it implies is that what some people call the art of disappearing—Ajahn Brahm, I think, has a book called The Art of Disappearing—the art of disappearing into jhana, or getting rid of the self, or erasing the self, or experiences of "no self," or emptiness, or that kind of thing, or other kinds of art of disappearing—valuable as they are and important as they are as experiences, temporary experiences on the path in the unfolding of insight and beauty and mystical awarenesses and opening of perception—the art of disappearing is not Eros. Eros is not the art of disappearing. They're different, if you like. You can't reduce one to the other. Eros is not the movement of disappearing. It's certainly not disappearing finally.

All these aspects that we've been talking about, all these pieces—the recognition of the oneness, the knowing of the oneness, the sense of the twoness being retained, the sense even of a third, of something being born from the erotic connection of the two, even the mutual emptiness of self and other object, imaginal object—all of that is actually implicit in the concept of participation. Participation. This is something I've touched on very briefly before, but to me it's a very powerful idea in all kinds of ways. But more even than an idea or a concept, it's actually a sense that is opened for us if the Eros is allowed to do its thing and stimulate the soul-making.

There isn't a hindering, a blocking, a cramping, a constriction, a refusal, a dismissal from any side of the Eros-Psyche-Logos tripod. So we begin to have a sense of participation—participating in the we, participating eventually in the universe, but at much more than just a material level. I participate in the universe by breathing in and out, or I participate by eating and urinating and defecating, whatever. I participate culturally to whatever extent I do. I participate in the community that I'm in, the communities that I'm in. I participate in society by voting, by writing letters, politically, socially, etc. All that's important participation. There's a way that one can see the beauty of all that.

But there are depths of profundity and comprehensiveness to this concept and sense of participation that Eros will unfold. It's not just an idea. We could start with the idea of it, but Eros will unfold, for instance, what eventually we feel like we are participating—my mind, which means my thoughts, my creativity, my insights, my playing with certain ideas. My mind is participating in the mind of God, if you like, or the mind of the Buddha nature. My individual mind, all the micro-movements of my mind, participating in the soul, if you like, of the divine nature, the Eros of the divine, or in the soul of the other, or in the world soul.

As I said, as the Eros is allowed to expand and fertilize the perception, fertilize the psyche, fertilize the ideation, we get a sense of other dimensions to the different aspects of our being and a sense that we are participating in those other dimensions. They're not separate from us. It's not that we're just one. It's not that it's just two either. And there's a sense of a third. This participation is creating a third. Something is being born of my participation in the divine. Something is being born by the divine, if you like, using me and my particular personhood, my particular—all my particularities.

So as I asked, I think it was in the last talk or the one before: whose Eros is this? Whose psyche is this? Whose imaginal perception is this? Whose idea is this? Whose conceptual framework? These begin to be questions that come to the fore. They emerge out of the very soul-making process. And so we can have a sense, a deepening sense of mystical participation.

As I said, participation—it's a big word. And I think anyone with a little reflection would, as I say, it becomes obvious that we participate in all kinds of ways, but there's depth to that and levels of what that can mean to us and the beauty of what it can mean, the beauty of the sense of it. Because in participation, the idea or the sense of participation, as I said, it's got a kind of oneness in it, implicit in it, but it also retains the twoness and it keeps the threeness, or the birth of the third, if you like.

And in it, my particulars, your particulars, the particular of whatever erotic object I am connected to, opening to, engaged with, the particulars are sacralized in that participation, and as particulars, they are sacralized. In other words, my particular bones or this thought or whatever—it's not just sacralized because its essence is said to be equal with the essence of everything else and being universal, whatever, play of awareness or universal love or something.

Particulars—my particulars, your particulars, the particulars of the erotic beloved—are sacralized as particulars in this sense of participation. You understand? Because the participation needs the particulars. Part-icipation. The part is... it's not just all the same. It cannot be replaced. My uniqueness, your uniqueness. And that uniqueness is itself unfolding. And that's part of the participation.

Can you get a sense? It's a different kind of mysticism, if you like. It doesn't replace the oneness and the knowing of universal essence, but it's a different sense and a different concept.

When we say things like that—and in fact wrapped up in everything, literally, but also wrapped up in all imaginal practice, and all this talk about eros and re-enchantment—indeed wrapped up in anything that we might want to take as a subject in our existence is the question of epistemology: How do we know what's true or what's real? How do we know anything? What can we rely on? Epistemology is the philosophy of knowing, of knowledge, if you like.

Actually, forgive me—I'm using that word epistemology right now in a way that includes the implicit questions of ontology wrapped up in it. So really, one word to embrace all that. Ontology is the branch of philosophy that deals with questions of reality, of what is real, of the reality status of things. How real is this or that, if we could say, or what kind of reality does this or that have? So as I said, just for shorthand, I'm using that word epistemology to embrace all that—that whole nexus and flow of questioning, all that investigation into ways of knowing and their validity and their domains and the whole question of reality.

This is wrapped up, as I said, in what we've just been talking about—the sense of sacredness and the whole notion of the viability, the validity of imaginal perception when we're talking about eros. It's wrapped up in insight into anything—into emptiness, even into impermanence. It's wrapped up in just our existence, even if we don't think and we're not philosophers at all. So this is important.

We're saying these things about sacredness, and what are we saying about that in terms of its philosophical ground, the epistemology?

Well, first of all, as practitioners, I'm interested in opening up the field of our explorations—I don't know why else you would be here. But as practitioners interested in opening up the field of explorations, interested in opening up regions of soul and of soul-making, we recognize and we admit openly that we grant an image its sacredness, its divine dimensions, its autonomy. Remember I was talking about how an imaginal image has a certain autonomy.

But we acknowledge that this is something that we grant the image. We grant it through the way of looking, through the concept operating in the moment, the logos operating in the moment. Through the way of looking, we grant it sacredness, divine dimensions, autonomy. Without that, it cannot have these things for us.

And it's the same with eros. If you like, we can decide to see it as divine, as autonomous in the way that we're talking about—that it's not my eros, it's eros coming through me, pushing through me from the divine, from a divine figure or divine level. It's autonomous in that sense. So we can decide to adopt that way of looking, that conceptual framework as part of our way of looking, and see what happens when we do that. I mentioned this much earlier on the retreat. See what happens when we adopt a certain ideation, a certain logos, and have that actually be in the way of looking.

But it's also true—and if you're experimenting with this stuff in practice, you will get this sense—it's also that we discover sacredness. We discover the divine dimensions, the dimensionality, the autonomy of images and of eros, when we don't contract around or cling to some conceptual framework or way of looking that simply refuses to admit sacredness, divinity, autonomy.

So if, in other words, if we're open and we're not clinging to a certain rigid idea, then we will actually have the experience of getting a sense of noticing sacredness, autonomy, divinity, dimensionality actually revealed in the experience.

So what is it then? Is it that we give it that? We grant it that? That it's just coming from us? Or is it that we discover it? Are both true? Do we create and discover? Is there some kind of amalgam, I think I used the word at one point?

Now, this question in regard to sacredness of the imaginal and of eros—the epistemology there is a very similar question to the epistemology in relation to anything. So this is related to much broader epistemological questions regarding all experience.

All experience.

I would say that in the field of imaginal practice and the exploration of eros—and I mean the wider field of imaginal practice, not just the way that comes into our awareness intra-psychically, but the way it comes into our perception of the world, of self, of other—we can and we should see it both ways.

Both that we acknowledge the dependent arising, if you like. We grant an image, a sense of sacredness, a sense of divinity, a sense of autonomy—a characteristic of autonomy. But we also discover it. Can I move between those two perceptions, those two ways of looking, these ideas? Can I even somehow adopt both at the same time? Yes, I can.

If we can do that, have that kind of flexibility, this will be the most useful for practice. I think it's much more mature than plumping for one or the other. It will be useful in the sense that it will liberate our perception. It will liberate perceptions, experiences. For us, it will open and fertilize that whole soul-making dynamic, the eros-psyche-logos. It will galvanize the soul, galvanize soul-making, if we can hold this epistemological question quite skillfully.

This, to me, is a really interesting area. Historically—and I think I've mentioned this on other retreats—probably within religious traditions and perhaps most philosophical traditions until maybe very recently within the history of humanity, there have been streams which have wanted to give a kind of independent reality to the world of the imaginal or to what we might call sacred knowledge.

You get that in Sufism, you get it in many of the Buddhist traditions. In a way, you even get it in the Buddha of the Pali Canon. There was a group in England called the Cambridge Platonists, active in the seventeenth century—Thomas More and John Smith, among others—who resurrected Platonism with variations, wanting to give, or in fact giving, a place for the possibility of knowing in a way similar to how we know things through the senses. The possibility of knowing immediately—not by rational deduction—having sacred knowledge, knowing the mundus imaginalis, which is Latin for the world of the imaginal.

They were actually creating a third kind of knowing. There's rationality and abstract knowledge, and there's what was regarded as concrete knowledge—knowledge that's sensual through the senses of external things. But there was a third category that the Cambridge Platonists called spiritual sensation. It wasn't to do with thought and rational deduction. It wasn't to do with the kind of sensation where I touch this chair or this table—concrete and externally conceived. It was another dimension which had its own kind of immediate sensation, spiritual sensation.

So they gave, if you like, independent reality to the mundus imaginalis, or to certain things we can know as sacred. And there's a way of knowing that—just a third way of knowing. We say that it's true if I deduce something logically from rational deduction, and if my logic is correct, then I conclude something is true. It's true if I can touch it and see it and everyone agrees with me. And there's a third kind: it's true if I open and use my faculty of spiritual sensation. But all these things exist independently—they just need the right tools to uncover them, discover them.

A lot of these traditions, for instance the Sufi tradition, speak of this way of knowing, this spiritual sensation, this knowing directly of the mundus imaginalis, as available to one who has purified their heart. That word "heart" in Sufism, in mystical Islam, refers to the organ of imaginal knowing—not so much the seat of emotion, but the organ of imaginal knowing. One who has purified their heart knows what's independently existing as a reality in that way.

This still goes on—people asserting this is real, this kind of knowledge, sacred knowledge, or this knowing of what appears in the imaginal. It's an alternative to Cartesian dualism of just mind or matter, and to philosophical positivism, where if you can't measure it or see it with your senses, it doesn't exist. So that's one option. It's been very popular, and it still is popular with different people and different traditions.

But there's an alternative. The alternative is to recognize that reality, so-called, or perception is participatory. Our sense of reality or reality itself is participatory. Our experience is participatory. In other words, we fabricate experience. We are involved in the fabrication of experience, the fabrication of the sense of reality and the fabrication of what we then deem real.

This is not going to the extreme of a slightly New Age "it's all just mind-made, you create your own reality" sort of version. But neither is it the other extreme of just assuming that things we perceive exist as they seem to, independent of our way of looking.

That notion of independent, objective reality has been thoroughly dismantled, if you like, by modern Western philosophy, whether of the continental variety or the analytical Anglo-American tradition. From multiple directions—philosophy of science and countless other approaches—this basic assumption has been systematically deconstruc-

ted. The fundamental notion that we're generally taught and feel as intuition—that things exist objectively independent of our way of looking—is simply no longer viable. This was also a core axiom and goal of the scientific method: the idea that we can know how things exist objectively, independent of mind, independent of our biases and perspectives.

Both in philosophy of science and in broader Western philosophy, the naivety of that kind of objective realism has been left in tatters. It's not really sustainable anymore.

And yet, even among those who've encountered these ideas, there remains an often tacit attempt to build Dharma—the whole conceptual structure of Dharma—on some kind of realist foundation. Whether through religious realism, as I alluded to earlier, or secular modernist realism based on materialist assumptions, or an existentialist version that simply accepts "this is reality as it seems, and this is what we must deal with." Sometimes a third option emerges, quite popular among Buddhists who aspire not to argue or enter conflict, simply declaring that anything goes—people believe different things and it's all fine, let's just not argue.

But in all of this, I see a kind of naivety, an inadequacy of philosophical engagement with epistemological issues.

What's more compelling to me is recognizing that perception, experience, so-called reality is participatory. It's always participatory. We've explored this in other talks through quantum physics and developments in modern philosophy, postmodernism, and various other fields.

Modern philosophy often expresses this insight to a certain level, but frequently doesn't develop it further. Those who have read about it and say "yes, yes, I understand" face the crucial question: what do you actually do with this insight into emptiness, into the emptiness of the inherent existence of things? How do you work with the recognition that our way of looking contributes to so-called reality, that reality is participatory in this profound sense?

Modern philosophers seem remarkably ill-equipped to engage this insight because they lack meditative training. Their actual ways of looking remain extremely limited in scope. They don't possess the range to experientially engage different ways of looking and actually open up different cosmoses. Or they glimpse that emptiness, recognize how reality is constructed, acknowledge it intellectually, but then revert to the same kind of realism that modernism indoctrinates us with—there's a real world, it's material, objective knowledge is the way we know things. Nothing fundamentally shifts or gets challenged. There's a reversion.

This pattern fascinates me. Often it's unstated, of course, because intellectually one knows that's not the correct position. But practically speaking, implicitly and conceptually, when weaving new versions of Dharma, it's still operating there.

I find this reversion compelling—why it happens, why there's this backing down or inability to follow through on that level of insight and open things up. I think there are practical reasons related to meditative skill, and perhaps psychological reasons connected to soul-making that I'll return to later in the retreat.

I believe it was physicist John Archibald Wheeler who coined the term "participatory universe"—a great twentieth-century physicist who worked with Niels Bohr and taught Richard Feynman and Roger Penrose, among others. A wonderful thinker who recognized that knowing is participatory, knowledge is participatory, reality is participatory. There is not this independent existence separate from our way of looking.

We participate also in the concepts we create. Conceptual frameworks themselves are participatory. One philosophical approach to this insight into emptiness is through this notion of participation.

But as I mentioned, this is also something that eros, if we allow it—if we allow it to unfold, to stimulate soul-making—will reveal to us. At some point we develop this sense, this deepening sense of participation in all its mystical levels, openings, and dimensions. We'll experience both the felt sense of it and the logos of it. The concept will emerge as an important logos, a viable one that we can engage as a flexible option.

And what does all that bring then? This sense of participation, this idea of deep, profound participation - what does that itself bring when we open it up as an idea, when we participate in the idea of participation, when we actually have that sense?

Well, one of the things that's implicit in it comes again from Plato's depiction of Eros as a hermeneutical daemon - a demigod, an imaginal figure, if you like, whose realm is the realm of hermeneutics, of interpretation, of ways of seeing, ways of knowing, ways of understanding, ways of perceiving. And this is in regard to everything - the whole sense and every aspect of existence. How are we seeing it? How are we sensing it? What is it to us? What it becomes depends on our hermeneutics, and our hermeneutics is stimulated by eros. So again, it's participation. The idea of participation opens up the hermeneutics, and the hermeneutics - the recognition of hermeneutics - opens up the participation, the recognition of participation in the creation/discovery of reality.

What might all this mean with regard to the Dharma? If eros is regarded with respect, if we don't just pigeonhole it as a fetter or defilement, eros will open things up, as we've been explaining. And in relation to the Dharma, as something we love, as a domain we love, eros will open it up. As the soul-making dynamic infuses the Dharma, relates to the Dharma, eros opens it up. You can see this personally, I think, and you can also see it historically.

In the Pali Canon, the Buddha said: "Seeing impermanence, one becomes disenchanted. Disenchanted, one becomes dispassionate. Dispassionate, one is liberated." You can see the wisdom there, the process he's alluding to of renouncing clinging and letting clinging go, and then the liberation that comes from that.

But with this exploration - this further exploration sometimes based on insight and deeper insight into emptiness rather than just impermanence, and also this exploration that opens up through eros and the soul-making dynamic - one could also say now, modeling on his statement and phraseology, something almost opposite regarding disenchantment and dispassion. One could say, or one could see the validity of saying, or the possibility of saying and recognizing: "Seeing the emptiness and eternality of images" - seeing the imaginal, in other words, seeing that image is image but it has this timelessness - "seeing the emptiness and eternality of images, the world is re-enchanted. The world and the self, enchanted and empty, one is free to become impassioned. Impassioned, infinite things open infinitely."

In other words, if we allow the passion, the eros, if we allow the soul-making of the imaginal, the world is re-enchanted. And in that, infinite things open infinitely - this soul-making movement, the way that this opens things up, everything, infinite things, and opens them infinitely, potentially infinitely.

You can also turn this phrase around so that the passion, the eros, leads to enchantment and the sense of timelessness that comes with images, the eternality. All these aspects - enchantment, eternality, eros - they are mutually dependent.

Some of you will be familiar with some Vajrayana teachings, and you can see the connection there or recognize in what I just said something akin to a Vajrayana opening of tantric perspectives, tantric understandings, tantric project if you like.

Something then happens in the whole sense of what we're seeing the Dharma is, where it leads, what the possibilities are. Dharma becomes bigger and becomes endless in a certain way. Eros will extend, will widen, deepen the image, the psyche, and the idea - the logos - of dharma, just like it will with anything it comes into contact with. And the pothos in the eros will create this endlessness to it.

So something, if we allow soul-making really fully, maybe something in us eventually recognizes that we, the soul, need an endless Dharma, a Dharma that is endless. And what does that mean? If awakening - if we're not chained to the mooring of regarding awakening, final awakening as an ending of rebirth - what does an endless Dharma mean beyond just the reduction of my personal suffering or stress or neurosis in a rather narrow modernist version of dharma?

This reduction of personal suffering or stress, this narrowing of dharma to merely addressing neurosis in a rather modernist framework—that's what awakening becomes. But that's not endless. It's not big enough, perhaps.

How might the dharma be endless? We'll return to this question, but four possibilities occur to me.

The first is through a much deeper understanding of emptiness. Now that in itself is not endless—one perhaps reaches the point where everything is understood to be empty, absolutely everything, at a very thorough, deep level. This is certainly much further than merely aspiring to reduce personal suffering, stress, or neurosis psychologically. Yet still not endless.

However, if one sees fabrication—returning to some of the original insights we explored—and then sees further that fabrication itself is empty too, then the whole duality between fabricated and unfabricated collapses. The entire ground of everything is taken away. The whole distinction between fabricated and unfabricated, sacred and profane—all of that opens up as magical.

What opens up are ways of looking. As I said, we end up with nothing but ways of looking. The range of ways of looking expands infinitely. The validity of different ways of looking and their practical possibility opens. Everything becomes magical—all part of the magical, sacred fabrication in which we can participate. There's an endlessness of exploring different ways of looking, an endlessness in the beauty of that exploration.

This might be one way that dharma could be endless.

Another way lies in the Mahayana vision of what a Buddha is—what an awakened, enlightened being truly embodies. If you know some of these texts, what it involves to be enlightened in the Mahayana sense, progressing through the ten or eleven bhumis to full Buddhahood, represents something so far beyond anything realistically possible. As a Sanskrit teacher I once had, Peter Gang, said: "The Mahayana Buddha makes the God of the Old Testament look like a schoolboy in short trousers." It's so grand and far-reaching, it's effectively infinite—that level of potential we're discussing.

There's a kind of fantasy of rebirth through eons upon eons of time, a vast cosmology. This entire fantasy—and I use that term in a positive sense—contains a kind of endlessness because realistically, no one will declare, "I am a Buddha now." One remains always within that larger cosmological, imaginal fantasy and the beauty of that direction. There's an endlessness there.

There's also endlessness in the more popular understanding of the bodhisattva—one who devotes life and energy to serving others, to easing suffering. In socially or environmentally engaged Buddhism, there's a kind of endlessness. There will never be an end to social problems, environmental problems to address. Endlessness exists in that dedication.

This represents a third possibility of endlessness.

The fourth relates to soul-making. If soul-making is recognized as a fundamental dimension of what practice is and what dharma can be, then that too creates an endless dharma, because soul-making is endless. Why? Because of exactly what we've been exploring—the eros-psyche-logos dynamic and the way pothos pushes it to create more and more, discover more and more, open more and more, potentially infinitely. There's an endlessness in the integration, the incorporation of soul-making organically into the scope of what dharma is.

These four possibilities are not necessarily separate at all. You can see their interconnection. We'll revisit this question again.

But if the eros is strong, deep, then I wonder whether this recognition needs to happen at some point—a sense of a path or territory that is endless, one that can accommodate soul-making.

CHAPTER 64

Wisdom, Art, Balance (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h06

Drawing on alchemical maxims about vessel strength and fire mastery, Rob Burbea explores the wisdom, art, and balance needed for safe and skillful exploration of eros and soul-making. He examines the archetypal figure of Dionysus as representing the complex nature of erotic awakening - both dismembering and remembering, civilized and wild. The talk addresses prerequisites for eros practice including embodied ethics, emotional awareness, and trust in desire as potentially sacred. Burbea discusses the relationship between deep equanimity states and the capacity to hold eros without being overwhelmed, using the image of flame within darkness. He explores the tension between duty to imaginal figures and spiritual freedom, suggesting that devotional commitment paradoxically brings liberation from attachment to smaller concerns. The discussion includes practical considerations about preliminaries for tantric practice, drawing parallels with Vajrayāna requirements of samādhi, emptiness understanding, faith, and devotion. Throughout, he emphasizes that all spiritual paths have specific dangers, challenging assumptions about the safety of mindfulness compared to imaginal practice.

There are two maxims or aphorisms from the alchemical traditions that I would like to share, as they are relevant and important for any practice—for all meditative and spiritual practices, for the practice of psychotherapy and the path of healing, and for many other dimensions of practice.

The first is: "The strength of the vessel must be proportionate to the tension in the material." The vessel is the alchemical vessel that holds the material being worked on, and its strength must be proportionate to the energy in the material.

The second maxim is: "She who masters the fire, masters the work"—or "One who masters the fire, masters the work."

These are two gems of wisdom, quite general and broad-ranging in their applicability. If we are going to open and explore this territory of eros, of desire, of soul-making—especially of eros—with integrity, thoroughness, comprehensiveness, depth, and intelligence, then that opening and exploration demands that we take care of many different aspects and dimensions. It demands that we bring wisdom, art, and skill to the whole process.

I want to explore what these two alchemical maxims might mean for us and our explorations.

We have already discussed how the notion of a vessel for the soul-making enterprise is sometimes provided by the boundaries that are in place in certain relationships. These boundaries create what we call a temenos—a sacred space, a vessel that holds and heats the material, the soul material. The eros functions as fire, and there is a vessel created by certain boundaries in many different ways.

Meditation is also a boundary. In meditation, one is not acting out images or other phenomena. We have opened up the possibility that the body moves and reflects or refracts what is happening imaginatively, energetically, and erotically, but sometimes the body is still as well. Generally speaking, there is no acting out, no concretization or implementation in manifest actuality of the image. So meditation—the meditation posture, the meditation session—also functions as a kind of vessel, a temenos.

The whole question of what makes a vessel strong, what contributes to the strength of a vessel, is complex. There are many factors to consider. Even if you think in terms of physical vessels, some are strong yet brittle, or strong up to a certain point before they shatter.

Another kind of strength comes from elasticity. The strength of a vessel—its ability not to burst and thus to contain the material, the work, and the fire—comes in part from its elasticity, its capacity to stretch, to be fluid, to morph and take on different shapes when needed.

Why is this relevant to our work? Precisely because of the nature of what we have explained regarding the eros-psyche-logos dynamic and its natural inclination toward expansion—expansion of image, of psyche, of eros, widening and deepening. You can see that this will need a vessel that is elastic. Just in terms of this analogy, there is much implied about elasticity. This question of the strength of the vessel is a complex issue.

The word "fire" in the other alchemical aphorism can mean many different things in different practices, as can "vessel." A vessel might be a relationship—a psychotherapeutic relationship or teacher-student relationship—that becomes a vessel. There are many possibilities for what the vessel actually is. The vessel can be the body or the psyche itself.

Fire could refer to many different things. In any practice, fire is connected with effort and intensity—the intentness and intensity that we bring to bear on the work, whether that is meditation practice, traditional insight meditation, noting arising and passing, concentration, metta, or any other practice. These questions of effort and intensity are part of fire.

But of course, as we have said on this retreat, eros is fire. Eros is flame, desire, fire, longing. All this is fire. So this second alchemical maxim comes very much into this work.

But it is not simple. Even the question of mastery is complex. Do we ever really completely master the fire that is given to us and the eros that comes through us? Or is it always going to be eventually bigger than us? Even if it is always going to be bigger than us—because of its divinity, because of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, because it will keep expanding and opening up other dimensions and meanings and resonances and power—does that mean we should abandon any attempts at mastery, at developing our ability and capacity and skill and art?

It is complex.

All this is complex. Fire burns. We've said this before. Fire burns, so it demands care. And yet without fire, as human beings, just evolutionarily and biologically, we're very limited in what we can do without fire. He or she who masters the fire, masters the work.

In relation to the vessels analogy, I've talked in the past on certain retreats about this teaching from Lurianic Kabbalah, from the Kabbalah of Isaac Luria, about the shattering of the vessels. It's not just saying things are impermanent—it's saying that organically woven into psychological development, cosmological development, conceptual development, development of relationship, the vessels that we form at different points in our soul's development or just the movement of the soul might need not just to stretch, but to shatter.

The vessel that we've taken care to build up, that provides the terminals, the support of the structure, containment, orientation—it shatters. Sometimes very unexpectedly, sometimes violently, sometimes it just sort of melts. But this is, I would say, an inevitable part of living life deeply as a human being, and also as cultures. That shattering may be more or less sudden or violent, but it's part of what happens if there is eros. You could say it's part of what happens when the eros ignites that whole eros-psyche-logos dynamic. Because then it expands, and at some point we might have to shatter something because the wall won't budge otherwise—it's not elastic, it won't expand.

So yes, there's building, developing the strength of the vessel or vessels and their elasticity, and mastering the fire. But even these concepts are not so simple.

Just a reminder: all practices, there is no such thing as a practice or a path without dangers—dangers that may be more specific to this path or that path. Not necessarily more or less dangerous, just that the dangers are specific to each path. So oftentimes people, especially when they're first hearing about imaginal practice, will say, "Oh, that's dangerous. That sounds dangerous." And it's just what we've been indoctrinated by. Is it really any more dangerous than, let's say, simple mindfulness practice? Or are the dangers just different?

If you've been reading the newspapers in the last year or so, you'll be aware of articles appearing about mindfulness and eight-week courses teaching mindfulness, and how there have been occasions where it seems the mindfulness itself has caused some kind of mental destabilization or emergence of repressed trauma. Taking simple mindfulness practice as an example, in the way that it's taught in a very secular context these days, I've had people say to me, "I've been practicing mindfulness and I got a lot from it, but at the same time I feel neutered." A woman said to me, "I feel neutered." Powerful words. What does it mean to feel neutered? Something has been cut off, amputated from her being. In this case, it has a whole erotic connection, doesn't it, to be neutered?

Another friend, a close friend, said to me that practicing and living in an insight meditation center for some years—this was many years ago—something in her soul was dying, was being killed. She didn't quite know what was going on at the time, couldn't quite articulate it or get clear about it until some years later. So yes, a lot of learning, a lot of development, a lot of lovely things, and something being killed that's not so obvious at the time. The neutering is not so obvious to a lot of people, unlike a kind of freaking out or whatever. And there are much more subtle dangers with mindfulness that have to do with soul-making and with realism—the kind of realism that's entrenched or implicitly communicated as a foundation in mindfulness teachings, mostly.

All paths have their dangers. This is something that's just part of wisdom—to be aware of that fact, and aware of the particular dangers we need to look out for on whichever path we're taking. I think it's foolish and naive to think there's such a thing as a path without danger, or that the path I'm on doesn't have dangers while pointing to other paths and saying they're dangerous.

I want to talk about bringing wisdom, developing balance and the art of balance, and bringing equanimity to bear on this whole exploration of eros and soul-making. At the same time, I may need to contradict myself or balance that with this: when we're exploring eros and opening that door, we're opening the door potentially to a wider range of what we might call archetypes than we may have been used to, especially if we think of the Dharma in quite a narrow way.

The classical god Dionysus has a lot to do with eros. Eros is an erotic god, as are many others from different traditions. Hermes is an erotic god. Aphrodite, of course, from that tradition.

But also in the Buddhist tradition, if you look at the Tantric deities, many of them are erotic deities in different ways. Listen to this from James Hillman about Dionysus, and bear in mind what this archetypal elaboration of this god says about the path—about how what the path can be is quite different from how we usually conceive it in a more narrow sense, and what it might involve if we really open up this exploration of Eros.

Dionysus in the myths is dismembered into countless pieces—this happens in different ways, either at his birth or at different points—and then he's remembered. So we have dismembering and remembering Dionysus. He's put back together as a kind of resurrection. Hillman says he's a figure of many guises and pursuits. He is called the divided, but also the undivided—or both together: the divided undivided. He's called the loosener, the lord of souls, the lord of wild beasts.

His realm was outside the conventional constraints of the city. His dances took place on hillsides near woodlands. In the city, he ruled the theatre, both comic and tragic. Can you see how this relates to everything we're talking about? Coming apart, being dismembered, implicates a myth quite different from those we usually associate with strength of character. This is not Hercules we're talking about. This is not ego willpower. This is not Artemis, the ruler of animal nature. It's not Hera, the queen of the household and the upholder of family values.

Instead, Dionysus is the lord of souls, the divided god who was pulled to pieces. He's a strange figure—he was even named the Stranger. He's an intoxicating life force who came on the scene, appearing from outside the usual civilization together with a dancing group of satyrs and raving devotees. And he was also declared to be Hades. There's some strange identity of Dionysus, this intoxicating life force, with Hades, the invisible god of the souls in the underworld—the invisible god of the souls in the underworld. All this woven together. Can you hear the resonances and mirrorings of what we've said so far on this retreat?

Hillman goes on in relation to erotic arousal and desire coming into our life and disrupting things, potentially disrupting things in all kinds of ways. He's not just talking about sexual arousal—again, he's talking about that force, that movement of Eros, and its capacity to stretch our vessels through the soul-making dynamic, and sometimes shatter them. He says: "Realize you are not solely to blame for the conflict brought on by arousal. The source lies deeper than human nature. It is archetypal—a conflict among the gods." The call of Dionysus tends to upset the normal course of civilization, whose wise overseer Athena, another classical goddess, did not permit his goat in her terrain. The goat is this disruptive animal.

Dionysus, lord of women, called to both genders and all ages to join his rituals. This is not something just for men or just for women or just for young people. Women left their household duties to follow him into the hills for release and raving. Two old-timers with grey hair in Euripides' play The Bacchae go off to dance with Dionysus all night and all day.

How do you hear that? How are you hearing that? Is there already for you a certain identity construct? Perhaps you're already quite identified with that archetypal figure of Dionysus and that kind of actualization of behavior. Or perhaps you're identified with the opposite—the picture of calm and cool equanimity and stillness. Where is your tendency of identification, clinging, attachment?

And do you hear this in terms of a necessity of concretization? Oh, I'd better go find the nearest rave and dance all night long. Or if something needs manifestation—we've talked about this before in terms of imaginal practice—is it just a very obvious, very narrow interpretation? Oh, it means actually dancing. Is that what this means? Does raving and dancing in the hills with raving devotees mean actually dancing? It might. It might be concretized that way. But not necessarily. The question is: does it? And how?

How does it move? And what does it call for?

We've explored this territory before on previous retreats. But is my interpretation of this mythological figure, this archetypal figure and divinity—am I putting it into too narrow a box in my interpretation, my translation? What's my tendency here anyway, in relation to all this?

So I'm interested—we're interested—in opening up this territory, opening up a myth. A myth should open, and these teachings should open, rather than just justify what we already kind of believe and are entrenched in. Partly these teachings are to kind of legitimize and realize a place for something we might have been judging in ourselves—we'll actually see that in a different light. But not only to justify—to open as well.

So let's go into this a little bit. What might be involved in creating good vessels—right vessels, if we can use that word—and supporting, let's call it mastery? But that really means the ability with all this: a facility, an art, the capacity and skill of navigation and discernment with all this. What might be involved in creating and forging right vessels and developing mastery?

Those two are not actually separate—just to make that clear from the start. The navigation, the capacity and skill in responding to what's actually happening in one's practice, in one's life, with Eros, with the imaginal, with soul-making, in real time, in the moment—our abilities to bring different factors to bear and all that—this navigation, this richness and complexity of responding and the skill and art and ability in all kinds of different ways, that actually creates the vessel in the moment. So it's not like you have a pre-packaged vessel and then you add a bit of mastery. That actually is making a vessel in real time, in the moment, as things are moving and developing. So they're not really separate.

But let's think about all this. Let's go into this, unfold it a little bit, unpack it. Right vessel. So what might that mean?

You may be aware of this, but in Vajrayana teachings, in tantric practice—at least in Buddhism, in Tibetan Buddhism and other Buddhist traditions—they are almost always only presented after certain preliminary practices which are regarded as necessary. So there's a whole range of preliminaries, and I wonder if we can think about that too: What might be a preliminary for me? What needs to be in place? What do I need to take care of and establish if I'm going to do this kind of practice, exploring Eros?

So in the Vajrayana, the preliminaries would include ethics. Actually, I don't know that tradition from the inside, so to speak, so I'm just getting this from the outside, so I'm hoping and assuming this is the case. It includes ethics—a grounding, an establishment in ethics, as something we'll come back to.

It includes other practices. So, for example, the development of samadhi is probably a preliminary or prerequisite to doing Vajrayana practices, tantric practices. It should be—this I know is actually not always the case, unfortunately—but tantric practice, Vajrayana practice is predicated, is based on an understanding of emptiness and some facility with emptiness practice. We'll return to this. I've said it before. We'll return to this. And I would state all this for our path as well.

Tantric practice also, if you talk to someone, if you read, you get the sense that it's very much based on faith. There's some kind of faith operating here, which may not be a so-called naive, realist faith, as sometimes it gets portrayed or dismissed or labeled.

There's an understanding of emptiness. Tara is empty. Whoever it is, this tantric deity is empty. Oftentimes people don't understand this and they're still practicing Tantra, or they think they understand it. But technically, somehow the faith that's involved is also imbued with an understanding of emptiness. But faith is another of the preliminaries.

And also devotion, tied in with faith, obviously. But that devotion needs to be embodied. So you see again in the Vajrayana practice how either mantra recitation or the prostrations—think of people doing hundreds of thousands of prostrations. How much work and time and commitment and effort is involved in that? There's an embodiment of devotion there. Yes, literally an embodiment of devotion.

So all these form the preliminaries, as does a conceptual framework. Some conceptual framework is provided for understanding...

imaginal practice, and tantric practice. And also—sometimes it's not so obvious from the outside—but sangha is implied as well. There's the support of other people who are exploring this together, teachers and co-adventurers, that one can talk to, one can feel nourished by, one can be in the presence of. That kind of support functions there as well.

So all these—ethics, other practices, samadhi, emptiness, faith, devotion that's embodied, conceptual framework, sangha—this is all part of the preliminaries that are deemed necessary in Tantra and Vajrayana practice. We'd do well, I think you would do well, to reflect on some of this: what does it mean for you? What does it mean for us, exploring this, opening up the range of what practice is and the directions and dimensions of what practice can be and can involve? What might each of these mean—sangha and devotion and emptiness, understanding and ethics and all that?

But preliminaries—it's a question. I'll come back to it. Because part of that question, inherent in the very concept of preliminaries, is this: pre, prerequisite, preliminary—does that imply a certain ordering of my development in practice? An ordering of the development of what? An ordering of what practices I'm developing?

In other words, do I need to—as I mentioned in a previous talk—develop my capacity to really say no to that cookie or that second slice of dessert when I don't really need it, and really feel secure in that, before I attempt any of this stuff? Do I need to feel that I'm not just pulled around by the vedanā or by the promise that someone might love me or make me feel okay about myself, before I open up this exploration of Eros?

Some people do that first, and then get interested in this other stuff. Some people do that and never get interested in this other stuff. Some people need to do that first—need to feel that kind of establishment and security and development before they can open this. And others, as I said in a previous talk on this retreat, others can't wait. There's something in the depth and aliveness of the eros that moves through them in this life—they can't wait, or things are happening, and the investigations and the development into more traditional kinds of letting go, and this exploration of eros, need to go on somehow in parallel. We touched on this before.

But I would say both letting go—both in a sort of more superficial sense of the cookie and the chocolate cake and all that, and in the deeper sense that we talked about in terms of really letting go of subtle clinging, really opening up this whole range of insights into dependent arising and emptiness—both all that and a sort of conscious and mindful exploration and development of art with regard to Eros, both of these I would regard, for me more and more, as elements or parts of what I would conceive to be a full path, a full practice.

If we're just going to say, "Eros, you're talking about desire, or that's just clinging, and that just leads to suffering. Just put it down. Don't engage with Eros. It's fire. Don't go near it"—well, most of us listening to this are probably lay people. We're not celibate renunciates, for a start. Actually, if you've lived for a while in monasteries, there's still a question of how renunciate are a lot of monastics. They may not be having sex, but there are a lot of other opportunities for sense pleasures and indulgences.

But anyway, both lay people and celibate renunciates—whether they're monastic or lay celibate renunciates—eros is there already. That's partly what I'm trying to say on this retreat. It's already there as an element of our being, as an element of our soul, as a force in our lives and in our practice. Even just eros with regard to the path—which we'll come back to talking about what that means—even just with regard to a narrow range of images and fantasies that are alive for us. Maybe they're just the Buddhist ones, the sort of classical Buddhist ones, but there's eros in relation to them and to the path. Even if it's just that range, and those kinds of directions of eros that are allowed, eros is there already. It's alive in our lives, and it needs addressing, it needs understanding, it needs exploring.

But if we, as lay people, are just going to believe something incredibly simplistic and dismissive—that Eros is basically craving and it brings suffering—then really what we're believing, what we're buying into, is this: if we buy into that, we're also buying into the idea that, okay, we're deciding to live as lay people, so we're effectively deliberately engaging in what leads to suffering. Which somehow indirectly implies that we're either a bit stupid, or our practice is essentially a waste of time. We may get a little benefit, but really what we're doing is opting for some version of the path that is not a full version. It's not the real deal.

Now, of course, some people believe exactly that, and either decide to be monastics or just hope that in a future life they'll be born able to be a monastic. Some people actually believe that. But really, is it true? Is that true?

Is it just true that Eros inevitably leads to suffering? Is it that simple? Therefore we should just leave it—put it down, turn away, or settle for some kind of half-hearted attempt at the path? Is that really true? Are we just settling for second best?

Or do we need—as forms the whole basis of this retreat—other concepts and conceptual frameworks here, so that we can really include Eros and include the exploration of it, as well as other ways of working with the parallel factor of letting go? Both at the more superficial everyday level and at the level of really deep exploration—do we need other ideas and practices that can actually allow us to include and explore both?

There's this whole question about ordering and priorities. But I would say an exploration of eros in the wide sense—and again, I've said this before, but just to reiterate—if we return to those first two alchemical maxims and say that Eros is fire and the vessel needs to be strong so it can contain this fire without bursting or melting, it can sound like we're dealing with something really intense and dangerous.

But don't get carried away with those particular images of fire or alchemical vessels heating up and perhaps cracking. Yes, there's that possibility that we're sometimes dealing with something really strong—something that's really stretching our being emotionally, energetically, conceptually, psychically. But also, a lot of eros, many of the experiences, are really quite subtle.

As I said before, practice needs to be able to span that whole range. Yes, the intense. Yes, the stretching. And yes, sometimes even the breaking. But also the subtle and the easily overlooked and the not particularly remarkable and the not very intense. It's not the case that one is the real deal and the other isn't. Not at all.

So don't get too taken in by some of the imagery from alchemy or other traditions. The exploration of eros in the broad sense—not just sexual, not just intense, but all of that: the intense and the not intense, the sexual and the non-sexual—requires several things.

One thing it needs, touching on what we've already mentioned, is what I would call a heartfelt, integrated, embodied rootedness and commitment to ethics. I'm choosing these words very deliberately: heartfelt, integrated, embodied, rootedness in and commitment to ethics.

Why I'm saying all that is because some people's commitment to ethics is actually coming out of fear, or it's just coming from authority—because some teacher or tradition said so, and one has never questioned it. I'm talking about something that's really heartfelt, coming from deep in the being. There's an engagement, a commitment that's integrated into one's life and embodied in one's life. There's both commitment and rootedness there.

But that involves an engagement, a living questioning. Sometimes what happens is people just follow ethics—whether Buddhist ethics or the ethics of Western societies as they stand in whatever era one lives in—simply because they're afraid of the consequences or they're told to by some authority. They've never really questioned it.

Sometimes that's okay—a person hasn't developed that capacity yet. But sometimes it actually creates a situation where the ethics are not full enough. I've spoken about this in relation to Buddhist ethics: sometimes, because they were formulated at a time before globalization, before climate change, and from the perspective more of simplifying one's consciousness and life, or ensuring a good rebirth, rather than other considerations present in other religious traditions—because of all that, Buddhist ethics sometimes needs more questioning and expanding.

Questioning ethics doesn't necessarily mean giving up this or that constraint. You might decide that something you used to hold as an ethical constraint is no longer something you believe in, no longer feels like the appropriate or right thing to do. But questioning might also operate the other way. Really engaging in a questioning of ethics—lived, beautiful, embodied, heartfelt—might cause you to actually extend your ethical commitments beyond, say, the five precepts as they're usually understood. I've spoken about all that before in other talks.

But I would say exploration of eros needs that heartfelt, integrated, embodied rootedness and commitment to ethics—including the ongoing questioning of our ethics.

A second thing it needs is skill and confidence in emotional awareness, with emotional energetics and energetics in general. This is why we put so much emphasis on the emotional energy body and stated that as a prerequisite for this course.

This means skill and confidence to notice what's going on emotionally and energetically in the body, including subtle—really subtle—manifestations of emotion and energies. Not just the obvious ones, but really subtle movements and manifestations. It means being able to notice and discern and handle energies, especially the stronger ones.

So really having some skill with the energy body—being able to open when energies are strong so there's not pressure building up, being able to allow energies to flow in different ways, and when they feel blocked, having the capacity to tolerate energies that are intense and creating a feeling of pressure.

So this, I would say, is a second demand, if you like, or necessity for the exploration of eros in practice.

And the third is some degree of what we could call trust or faith or even wisdom, actually—a little trust. As I mentioned before, this might even come as a kind of experiment. In other words, we're just experimenting with an attitude of trust temporarily in regard to eros, in regard to this sexual image or whatever it is.

What gives us even the trust to be able to experiment temporarily? Well, hopefully that's an attitude in our practice anyway, as I would teach it. That's very much a key ingredient: experimentation, playfulness with mindfulness, discerning what happens when I do this, what happens when I conceive this way, what happens when I look this way.

But knowing—developing a first-hand knowledge that the conception, the conceptual framework that I entertain at any moment and the way of looking shapes and conditions the experiences that then unfold. Simple, deep understanding of dependent arising. It can be taken deeper and deeper, as we said. But knowing that allows me to experiment even with just a little bit of trusting—trusting, for example, this idea that eros or desire at root is a treasure. There's something to be treasured there. Despite its obvious connection with suffering and dukkha, something wrapped up in eros and desire is a treasure, that it may express a deeper intelligence of soul.

So it's like searching for jewels or searching for gold. You have to clean off the dross and mine a little bit and find something—find the gem there, right in the middle of the eros or the desire. Brush off the other stuff. Again, a limited analogy.

But again, trusting perhaps a little bit that there's some kind of telos operating here, that something through desire, through eros, is pulling us towards an end that is, if you like, constellated by the soul's intelligence or wisdom, or the wisdom of the Buddha nature or whatever. That trust, a little bit of trust, experimenting with that eros may itself be holy or divine in origin, though it's easily distorted in different ways.

So those kinds of trust, which for some may sound really far out already, but they may well emerge just from what we're calling the phenomenological approach with an open-minded inquiry into our experience, into questions, imaginal practice and into soul-making and into eros.

But these things—just what we've mentioned so far: the rootedness in ethics in an integrated way, the skill and confidence in emotional awareness and energetics, and the certain amount of trust and wisdom in regard to eros—we could call this a kind of skill set. I'm going to mention more. But we could call that a skill set, and that skill set, or that language of skill set, implies that these are developable things. That relationship with ethics is developable. That skill with the emotions and the energies is developable. Even that trust is developable. So I use the language of skill set to imply, partly, that these are developable things, factors, elements.

If we talk a bit about equanimity, which is obviously a key word in Buddha Dharma—and so how does that come into all this business of when you talk about desire and passion and eros and all that? Equanimity. We may wonder, well, what about the equanimity? Or I have a lot of eros and I keep falling over or getting floored by my desire or whatever. So equanimity, what does that mean? How does it come in in relation to this path?

So equanimity implies several things. We could say it implies balance. So that means not toppling over, either forward towards this object that we're enamored with or that there's an erotic connection with, or kind of backwards in recoil, in fear—different kinds of fear that can come up in relationships when there's a lot of eros.

So equanimity implies balance. What does this whole word "balance" then mean in relationship to eros? Steadiness is implied in the sense of—maybe that's the wrong word, but not short-circuiting. Yeah, steadiness in the sense that it can last, that the eros can last, a flame that can burn steadily—that's what I mean.

So sometimes the eros, it's like a flame that just—you know, a lot of charge goes through the electrical circuit and it just blows the circuit, or it short circuits, or the whole thing just collapses, it kind of caves in on itself. So all this is very common with eros. There's a lot of eros, and there's this imbalance falling over one way, either towards or away from, or kind of blowing out or collapsing inwards or something.

But equanimity implies balance. It implies this kind of steadiness. It also implies spaciousness, meaning non-contraction. So again, what does this mean in relationship to eros? That it doesn't, for instance, contract in craving.

That it doesn't contract in realism as well. That there's no contraction emotionally or energetically—no shrinking or freezing, no contraction of view. All this is implied in equanimity.

But what does this mean, equanimity in our life and practice, in relation to eros? This is actually more interesting than what we often hear about or might first think when we consider equanimity as a word in Buddha Dharma.

Some of you will know from meditation that really deep equanimity—experiences of deep equanimity—involves letting go of pushing away experience we don't like in some way, that which is unpleasant, and letting go also of pulling toward ourselves or trying to pull ourselves toward pleasant or attractive experience. When there's really that developed in meditation, it goes deeper and deeper. It takes you into deeper and deeper non-fabrication—lessening fabrication, and eventually into the unfabricated.

So experiences of deep equanimity are experiences of much less fabrication on a spectrum of fabrication of perception. The experience of spaciousness is also connected with that. Deep equanimity often is an experience of deep spaciousness, deep unfabricating, sometimes blackness. These are all characteristic of meditative states of deep equanimity—blackness and equanimity, spaciousness. We touched on this in the last retreat.

Generally speaking, over time—not just when those states are experienced once or twice, but through repeated descent or immersion in those states, opening to them in meditation—they bring in one's life a kind of steadiness and spaciousness with respect to the things of the world. We taste something; we taste a whole different perspective and sense of things in those states, a whole different sense of existence. That brings, generally speaking, over time, with repeated immersion—in, out, in, out—this steadiness and spaciousness with respect to the things of the world, and in a way, less craving with regard to the things of the world.

The shadow side of all that is that maybe those kinds of experiences, those perspectives, can also bring disengagement. So that's interesting. Why does it sometimes bring a kind of disengagement, even sometimes a kind of anemia—more like a political or environmental disengagement, non-engagement? What does it depend on, whether it brings disengagement or whether there can be all the fruits of that deep equanimity and still an engagement, passionate engagement?

Partly—I've talked about this before, so I'm not going to labor it now—but partly it depends on the fantasies and on the conceptual frameworks that are operating there in relationship to what the path involves and what awakening looks like. Fantasies are always there; concepts are always there. Dependent on what they are shapes the ethics, if we tie into what we said before, and shapes the engagement as well—the degree of engagement and the fullness and what it looks like.

But shadow aside, potentially those experiences—again, sometimes just one-off will do something radical in one's life, but more generally it's dipping in and out, getting really used to those perspectives and those openings—potentially then, because of the spaciousness and the steadiness, it's almost like something in the being has the spaciousness and the steadiness, and then a kind of confidence that it can allow desire, eros, in regard to certain things in life, because that steadiness, that spaciousness, that perspective is absorbed.

Catherine held up this beautiful picture in the last retreat, or was it a cloth—I can't remember—with the pitch black background, and then within that, a flame in the middle of it. The flame of eros is supported, is contextualized, is allowed, and given strength by the blackness, the deep equanimity, the space around it that we can open to. And so that deep blackness characteristic of states of deep unfabrication.

Actually, a slight aside, but there's an important point and we'll come back to it. The desire for the unfabricated, the desire for the absolute as some people call it, the desire for the transcendent, even the desire for onenesses—knowing different onenesses at different stages of less fabrication in meditation—the desire for all that, I would say, is a soul desire. It's a deep desire.

The desire for equanimity in life, for balance, I would actually say is not a soul desire. It's not something we don't really have eros about equanimity. We can really want it, but we would be hard-pressed to imagine that it could function as a soul-making object for us—equanimity in itself.

But the desire for the unfabricated, or this deep black, or the states of less fabrication, the oneness and the space of all that, and the mystical knowing of that can be a deep soul desire. The desire for equanimity that comes out of here—I have a hard time conceiving that could really be a soul desire, an erotic object, a soul-making object. It's more a kind of, if you like, a medical aspiration in the sense that it's really helpful in our life to have equanimity, to have some coolness, to have some perspective. It's soothing, it's freeing, it's healing in certain ways.

So it's important. It's definitely important. Heavens, it's really important. And it's important in relation to eros because it can, over time, enable this kind of balance with eros. But in itself, it's not really an erotic object or a soul-making object, unlike the desire for the unfabricated and the unfabricated itself, or knowing different kinds of oneness.

But while we're on this subject—so this is still a side note, but actually it's quite important to everything that we're saying.

Eros implies, or rather is implicated and woven into, the very fabric of psyche and image. It implies the imaginal. And the imaginal—psyche and image—implies this notion of what we've called daemons, these imaginal figures, and a duty to the imaginal figure that can sometimes be felt. Eros kind of implies all that, whatever that imaginal figure is or whatever it imbues. And as I've mentioned, there can be eros in relationship to the imaginal figure itself.

What, though, is the relationship between freedom and duty? There's this whole movement in the path towards freedom. And for me, that's a very big word with many dimensions, many directions that may be far more than we initially conceive of or hear about. But what's the relationship between freedom and the movement towards freedom and duty?

Duty can sometimes be a lessening of freedom, a constraint of freedom. I'm not totally free because I have this duty that I need to carry out. So duty often goes with imaginal practice, as I've mentioned on another retreat. But what's the relationship between duty and freedom? Doesn't duty sometimes also mean a kind of constraint of freedom?

This is really interesting to be aware of and explore. But one thing I will say is that an imaginal duty and a kind of devotion to that—or those, plural—doesn't just curtail freedom or certain freedoms, but also brings certain freedoms at certain levels. And oftentimes it brings freedom in relation to the really big things.

For example, in relation to death, or the possibility of dying, or the possibility of an early death. Because one feels that one is devoted to, in line with, following one's calling, plugged into one's duty, carrying out one's duty as best one can in the time and circumstances allotted to one—because one feels that alignment—then there is a certain freedom in relationship to death, a certain deep okayness in relation to death and to the big things in life, the big losses, the big ups and downs.

It keeps your bearings and gives you a sense of what's important. There's that popular phrase book, "Don't Sweat the Small Stuff," with the subtitle "And It's All Small Stuff." But this imaginal dimension and the duty there is saying, don't sweat the small stuff, but it's not all small stuff. If I say it's all small stuff, I lose the soul dimension because soulmaking has everything to do with meaningfulness and importance.

Don't sweat the small stuff, but it's not all small stuff. It matters—matters deeply to our being, to our life, to what unfolds for us, to our souls, to the cosmos, to God, to the Buddha nature, to the tradition. It matters that we follow our duties, that we sense that, that we give that a certain amount of reverence and devotion.

And what does that look like? That's not a simple question either. We mentioned earlier the importance, the delicacy of the question of what an image may or may not be asking for, what needs to manifest from an image, and the kind of open-mindedness and sensitivity in the inquiry with regard to images and imaginal figures and the sense of duty. This is not necessarily at all a simple translation or concretization of the image.

Real care needs to be taken in a middle way between that kind of oversimplistic translation, concretization, and a dismissal of what the image might be asking for. So there's a middle way there, with no simple answers necessarily, no formulaic answers either.

There's that kind of middle way in regard to all this sense of duty and manifestation and importance and meaningfulness. And there's also the middle way between what matters and what is empty at the same time as mattering—seeing image as image, understanding it and relating to it in a way that allows it its potency and power for the soul, at the same time as not reifying and identifying.

In some ways it's asking a lot; in other ways it's just natural to imaginal practice, and it may not require a lot of training to do that. People just understand it, intuit it directly in the context of imaginal practice.

In relation to all this, there is clearly a complex relationship between duty and freedom. In some respects, the duty that we feel towards an image or from an image constrains freedom, maybe constrains the equanimity in some regards. But as we've just explained, on the other hand, it also brings a kind of deep freedom at certain levels, and also equanimity in relation to the big things of life and death.

Let's pause there and pick up this list in the next part in terms of the qualities, the factors that are important and necessary in mastering the fire and shaping the vessel for these practices.

CHAPTER 65

Wisdom, Art, Balance (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 44 min

> In this profound exploration of balance and wisdom in imaginal practice, Rob Burbea redefines samādhi beyond simple concentration to encompass deep well-being and nourishment that pervades the energy body. He examines how this fuller understanding of samādhi naturally creates equanimity by reducing dependence on sense pleasures and ego validation, providing a secure foundation for working with eros.
> Burbea discusses three approaches to developing balance: cultivating rootedness through hara meditation and earth connection, dwelling in spacious states of insubstantiality where everything is allowed to come and go, and working with imaginal figures of strength. He emphasizes that balance in erotic practice is dynamic rather than static—like a dancer or cyclist maintaining responsive equilibrium rather than rigid fixation.
> The talk explores how mandala meditation can develop psychological balance by working with complementary imaginal figures representing different aspects of awakening—emptiness, compassion, action, and the imaginal itself. Burbea concludes by acknowledging the apparent contradictions in his teaching approach, explaining how these reflect the complex, non-linear nature of wisdom and the sometimes necessary questioning of balance itself as an ideal. This nuanced exploration provides essential groundwork for the deeper imaginal practices that follow.

So we're taking our time exploring the factors and the elements that contribute to creating, shaping, forging a vessel that's adequate for the material and the fire of Eros, and the transformations there and the explorations there, and also what it means to master the fire in relation to this kind of work with Eros and the imaginal.

We've talked about preliminaries, and we've talked about ethics and skill and confidence with emotions and energetics and the capacity to trust a little bit or just play with a little bit of trust. We've talked about equanimity and some other things. So let's pick that up and continue the list.

We also need to talk about samadhi, and people think of that as something that brings steadiness. But oftentimes, and I've said this before on other retreats, this word samadhi gets shortchanged. It gets contracted and shrunk to quite a narrow meaning—meaning just how steady is my focus. Even when people teach the jhanas, they imagine that it's really a question of getting more and more concentrated and focused and kind of rock-like in one's concentration, as if that's the most important thing there.

But that's just one strand of what's involved. This kind of immovability of mind—the attention being less pulled by things, by distractions—and then hoping that that will just generally be good for me or make me more equanimous. That kind of immovability of mind does happen sometimes, or relative immovability to different extents, but it's primarily a meditative thing when the concentration or focus or steadiness of mind is strong.

You've heard me say before, I would define samadhi as much more than a kind of steadiness, a focus of the mind. It really involves a juiciness, a depth, a real sense of well-being permeating the energy body primarily and the mind and the filling out of the mind in that juiciness, in that well-being, in that loveliness. To whatever degree, that encompasses all the jhanas. I'm speaking loosely now, but that's really how I define samadhi.

Samadhi is also a state of less fabrication. Again, to what degree? You can go through the eight jhanas, and they're all progressively less fabrication of perception. That's a way of thinking about what's going on in the jhana. So there's a connection here—the equanimity, samadhi has to do with less fabrication.

If we acknowledge that samadhi is important in all this, I would say primarily not just because of the steadiness of focus that it brings, or that's part of samadhi, but because of the well-being.

What happens over time—talking about months and even years—when we develop samadhi, meaning developing this sense of well-being, this pool of nourishment and well-being and joy and loveliness in the energy body, in the mind, pervading the being with that? We develop this over time to whatever degree, dipping in and out frequently or a lot. That dipping in and out brings equanimity in general in our life and balance, and again, balance with respect to Eros and more generally.

Why? Because we grow in happiness. We actually feel ourselves that we have access to a deep happiness and nourishment, a deep nourishment. We feel more and more as we develop that kind of samadhi, the well-being there, that we have enough—that we are nourished enough, we have enough to drink of this water that we so need, at least at one dimension. Something I'll come back to.

But that sense of happiness that's available to us and nourishment that's available to us means that over time, as we get more secure in that, we feel like we don't need to—and we can actually see we don't need to—rely on the sense pleasures to give us nourishment. It's such a poor level of nourishment, trying to get nourished and happy somehow from sense pleasures or from what boosts the ego because someone says something nice to me about my appearance or about something I've done. Or just someone tells me I'm okay or communicates to me in some way that I'm okay.

This can all be important communication to a certain degree, but it's such a—relatively speaking—poor basis, such poor security it gives to try and get or secure a sense of well-being, of happiness, of deep okayness through those mechanisms. But when we have the samadhi available to us over time, dipping in and out, then we just become less dependent on these kinds of sense pleasures or ego boosts or being told we're okay. Because we're less dependent, we're less pulled by them, towards them or recoiling away from things or collapsing. And we're less thrown off balance.

So you can see how the samadhi has more to do with that kind of balance, giving us that kind of capacity of balance, rather than just this kind of immovable balance of a focused mind that is not pulled one way or another away from its object, the nostrils or whatever it is.

Why am I mentioning this? Why is understanding this important? In general, I would say that understanding why and how the elements and the factors of the path work is important. So samadhi is good for me. It's important to know why and how samadhi is good for this business of equanimity. If I have the wrong understanding—if I think it's just about being able to fix my mind on the tip of my nose or whatever it is, and that's somehow going to help me or generally help my life somehow—it's important to understand how and why elements or factors of the path are working.

Why? Because as I think I mentioned in an earlier talk on this course, understanding—our understanding of these kinds of things—informs our decisions in practice. So if I understand that it's more about well-being than about nailing my attention to the tip of my nose or the soles of my feet—not that that doesn't have a place, and I'll come back to that—but if I understand more that actually, that understanding itself gives me some wisdom in terms of making decisions at any moment in practice about where to lean, how to navigate, how to incline the mind, what to develop, what to let go of.

If I have an idea that practice is trying to be kind and just accept whatever arises and let things come and let things go as much as I'm able, and that's my idea of sort of Dharma practice or insight meditation, or if my idea is really trying to not be distracted and judging myself about how much I was with the breath or how much thought was there—these kinds of ideas are so prevalent. Some sound a lot more attractive than others, like the kind accepting, let everything come as much as it goes.

They sound open-minded and soft, but the ideas we have about practice—the concepts, and sometimes we don't even fully realize what we're holding as a concept—are operative in consciousness and have a huge influence on what I do in practice, what I choose, where I lean, what my intention is, what gets developed and what doesn't.

These concepts also have a tremendous influence on how I regard what arises—how I regard this thought, or this image that arises, or this energy, or this emotion. Do I simply stay open to it, let it come, let it go? Or do I resist giving in to it, returning to the breath instead? Any idea I hold shapes my response.

The understanding I have of what practice is, what I'm trying to do, how it works—this has enormous influence. Sometimes this is the less popular part of dharma talks; people prefer the stories and quotes. But there's something about understanding the structuring of practice and how it fits together that will hold you and serve you better in the long run than this or that story or quote.

How I regard what arises determines what unfolds, the experience that unfolds. The samadhi, equanimity, ethics, skill with emotions and energies, this trust—we've talked about all this. We can also develop balance and strength in our lives through certain qualities and other meditations.

For example, meditating on the hara, on the energy center in the tantian or lower belly, with its connection to the earth itself and the sense of rootedness—meditating on that sense and stationing awareness almost like the center of consciousness at that point. This can be a really useful meditation for some people, changing the inclination of mind toward more strength, solidity, balance, and rootedness.

But notice that implicit in this practice is not just being at one point or being conscious of sensations at one point, though that can be useful. What's really helpful to be woven into these kinds of meditations are images of earth connection, images of the earth itself. There's already an imaginal element here—in standing meditation, walking meditation, sitting meditation—feeling or imagining that rootedness in the energy body and feeling the earth, imagining the earth as some imaginal figure. The earth is alive as image.

What is the image of earth? I don't mean necessarily personified as human, but the image of earth as something that supports, connects, roots, gives solidity, gives blessing. Think of the Buddha on the evening of his enlightenment, touching the earth—that gesture made earth an imaginal earth. The earth was alive for him as image in that moment.

This imaginal and energetic and feeling connection, weaving these all together, can be really important for some people to dip into. For others who have done plenty of this already, doing more may not be what needs to develop. But for many people, dwelling in that energetic image and feeling and the fullness of that image, the beauty of that image, gives ballast, gives root.

On the other hand, those states of deep equanimity can also be very insubstantial. The feeling with them is of real insubstantiality of things—that's partly where the equanimity comes from. There's ethereality, and you can almost see through things. Everything becomes very, very light.

The practice of hanging out in those states—of spacious allowing, letting everything come and go, developing that deeper and deeper—practices of wide consciousness, just receiving and allowing everything to come and go, resting in awareness. People give different names to this orientation, this state of deep equanimity, of relative unfabrication. But it emphasizes the spacious quality of equanimity, which is important. It's not solid.

So yes, sometimes solidity gives balance and equanimity, and sometimes the exact opposite—an element of insubstantiality—gives us balance. Dwelling in these states of spacious insubstantiality, letting everything come and go, letting things fade, can be really helpful in the long run. But I'm talking about hours, not just one experience here and there or dipping in for a couple of minutes. I'm talking about developing the ability to hang out there for a long time, making it accessible.

So there's the imaginal connection with earth and rootedness and the belly center with its solidity. There are these more spacious states of allowing and insubstantiality—lack of solidity that still gives balance and equanimity. And there's a third element: the images of strength that are available to us—imaginal figures and images of strength, perhaps solidity, but particularly images of strength.

Now sometimes what happens is a person's imaginal practice is alive in certain directions, certain kinds of images, but not so much in others. So for example, someone might have a rich array of images of devotion—very, very beautiful images of surrender—and not notice, or ignore, or discard, or not choose to dwell in other images that arise for them that are more images of strength.

So they have an inclination or tendency or habit or pattern, an okayness or even captivation with images of surrender and softness. But images of strength—whatever they might be, and they can be many kinds—they tend to ignore, discard, not even notice sometimes, or choose not to dwell in.

Sometimes a teacher can be helpful here. This might come up in an interview. Someone might mention something and then completely ignore it—and it's exactly what they need to pay attention to. So a teacher or therapist or someone can sometimes point that out in working with someone, and that might be helpful. One could even, in some instances, I suppose, prescribe this or that kind of image for a person to develop more strength.

I'm cautious about that—not saying it's not helpful sometimes, or possible sometimes—but I would be a little cautious about it, partly because it also kind of implies that the teacher-therapist knows best, but also for other reasons.

Sometimes as well, when we talk about strength, sometimes there's a kind of general weakness of the being. It seems like there's just this tendency to collapse or kind of everything gets a little mushy and soggy and can't sustain or present. You kind of feel it in a person's being. Sometimes it's just a general sort of weakness.

And sometimes there's a kind of general suppression of libido, of life force. But here, if that's the case, again, we have to be careful because what is just natural to a person—and they shouldn't be told or forced to be different than they are. It's just natural for them to have that much libido or this much libido, whatever it is—a little, a lot—rather than pathologize them as being repressed or being overcharged or over-erotic or over-excitable or whatever.

But when there's this kind of general weakness or general libidinal suppression, if that's what's happening, it may be of course that inquiry and working in psychotherapy—and we'll talk about this—looking at the past and what may have contributed to that, may be helpful. But again, whether it helps or not will also depend on the conceptual framework operating in the psychotherapy. All psychotherapies and all teachings have a conceptual framework. And so if the conceptual framework again has got a certain image of what one should be like or what one's moving towards, or a concept of what's right and what's wrong and what's okay and what's not, that will determine a lot what actually gets released. But it may be that some work in psychotherapy actually helps with that.

It also might be—I mean, sometimes that kind of general libidinal suppression—it might be that finding where the libido flows easiest in that person's life and expresses the easiest, finding that and encouraging and supporting that may then just start to allow the libido to flow, and then it can begin, maybe, to move towards a kind of general strengthening and vitality, and perhaps opening the range of the libidinal expression, opening it wider than just that one area where it sort of trickled a little bit in the first place. It's complex. All that's complex.

So we should point out that when we talk about balance in practice or in life—but especially with regard to eros—this is really important: we're rarely talking about something that's static. We're not talking about a static state of balance. We're talking about something that's dynamic, fluid, responsive. Think more of a dancer, or a footballer dribbling the ball this way or that, running, or a cyclist even just riding your bike—you're actually in a state of dynamic responsive balance to the little micro-movements this way and that.

So these equanimity-giving qualities that we've been talking about—samatha, spacious awareness, equanimity itself, metta even, which I didn't mention—these equanimity-giving qualities, it's not necessary for them to be there all the time, to be there kind of as a constant, mixed in with or in the background to our passion or our eros or our energetic or psychic charge. So careful with this.

It's rather that we can learn to access these qualities to different depths. And eventually, I would say, we can learn to access them at will. This is what you learn if you practice the jhanas or these deeper states—not 100% of the time, but generally speaking, it's possible to just choose to enter certain states.

We can access them, these qualities, rest in them and kind of marinate in them, marinate in that deep well-being of stillness. Just sit there like you leave a slab of tofu to marinate in tamari and garlic and ginger or whatever it is. You just marinate. It soaks it up. It soaks up into the being. And marinate in them at times. At times.

And then that gives, slowly, gradually, it gives a confidence that that is developable, that access and those qualities are developable. And we trust—we gradually, eventually reach a point of trust that they will be accessible. If they're not accessible in this moment, or if I'm emphasizing something else in this moment, in the not-very-distant future, this quality of deep equanimity or this deep, dark space of non-fabrication, relative non-fabrication, or this...

lovely nourishment of samadhi, or whatever quality it is, will be available to me in the not distant future if I want it.

We develop a kind of trust and confidence because these states appear frequently enough. They're there. They will be there frequently enough in my life that I'll have that nourishment, that stillness, that sense of equanimity. It's this frequency of access to these qualities and states, combined with trust, that supports our equanimity in life and with regard to eros.

What this means is that we're not fixed in some kind of medium heat setting—not quite an ice block dead, but maintaining a certain amount of warmth and interest while never getting too excitable or too hot with eros. We're not trying to find the acceptable middle setting, the "middle way" thing. That's less how I would look at all this.

Rather, there's a range of being that's being opened up. Through that whole range, all kinds of beauty and nourishment and necessities are encountered—we meet with them, we are fed by them. So there's a range of being, of excitability if you like: arousal, being on fire, being impassioned. And there's a range of stillness and coolness and spaciousness. All of this opens up a big range. This is what I would regard as the vision of what practice can possibly open up for us.

In general, if there's eros—certainly if there's a lot of eros—some people are simply born with this as their natural character. They are born with a lot of eros and a lot of psyche. They just have a lot of eros and a lot of soul. Much comes through them. This needs certain factors or certain qualities to allow it to be fertile and helpful and soul-making, so that it doesn't get short-circuited or implode or explode or fall over in various ways.

Part of this is balance—strength of the citta. So all these factors we've been discussing, and we could add a few more. I would add solidity and firmness: the ability of the mind or attention to stay steady with something. If I'm investigating eros, if I'm working with an image and there's something quite subtle and complex happening, the ability to keep the attention steady with that is important.

And there's general mindfulness—general awareness, the ability to notice, to observe. This might be close, detailed, intimate noticing, but it's an ability to notice and observe that, even if it is close and detailed and intimate, is not entangled. This quality we call mindfulness is important.

I would also add inquiry. The factor of inquiry and investigation is really important—the questioning, bringing questions to bear in the moment on my experience. All kinds of questions at different levels, with specificity and subtlety of questioning, and the specificity of intention that needs to be involved at times in inquiry.

These three things—the firmness of mind in terms of steadiness of attention, the capacity to observe and notice what we call mindfulness, and the capacity to inquire—are all part of what's necessary for this whole investigation.

I'm aware that recently I've said things that really lean away from or de-emphasize mindfulness and equanimity. So I seem to be contradicting myself. I am, in a way, contradicting myself. I'm not really—it has to do with context.

If I said that in the past, it was really in the context of what sometimes happens: a shrinking of the path, a shrinking of what practice means to people, a shrinking of what awakening means. It gets reduced to just mindfulness, or just a vision of equanimity. I was really wanting to open that up, partly by de-emphasizing mindfulness or even critiquing it.

But also, for myself, I've spent years training in mindfulness, developing it extensively and intensively, developing mindfulness and equanimity to a really high or deep degree. Maybe in my case too—I don't know if one can say this—certain people have a more natural disposition to equanimity, and also to mindfulness. I would say that's part of my natural disposition, perhaps.

Sometimes what I'm saying is in the context both of that perhaps natural disposition and also in the context of the general scope of teachings, or how people are thinking about what practice is right now. Given that I spent a lot of time and effort and years developing that, and perhaps there's a natural disposition toward mindfulness and equanimity, it may be easier for me to let go of that emphasis or develop something that seems to be its opposite.

But it's tricky. Sometimes things need to get stirred up a bit. The question is: What do you need? Can that be an inquiry? The question is also: What leads to what? What kind of concepts, what kind of emphases, what kind of explorations, what kind of fantasies lead to what, generally speaking? What am I assuming? What are you assuming to be true just because a teacher, or lots of teachers, seem to be saying the same thing?

There's a lot of questioning involved, or necessary, for all this. If I am contradicting myself—which I admit I am, in a way—maybe a way of thinking about it is that in the very contradictions, of which there are many in what I'm saying, I'm really presenting both sides. There's this, and there's that. There's this, and the opposite is somehow true as well.

So it's really a matter of balance. The contradiction itself is reflecting a kind of meta-level balance that I'm trying to communicate in relation to all this. The responses of balance and wisdom to all this are complex questions. There's complexity to them.

I'll mention one more possibility for developing some of these qualities.

Psychological balance, if you like, is implicitly or explicitly conveyed in mandalas and developable through meditating on a mandala. Some of you already do this, some of you will be not familiar with this at all. Meditating on the mandala as a whole or on some elements of the mandala in combination—I don't mean so much as a visual pattern, but actually what the elements represent or the imaginal figures represent within certain mandalas.

For example, in one mandala, Akshobhya is a Buddha that represents wisdom into emptiness—the vajra, which means diamond, something that's indestructible, some indestructible element of being which is related to emptiness. Meditating on Akshobhya, if you like, and what that means as an imaginal figure, as an icon, one can balance that with another Buddha in the same mandala—for instance, Amitabha, who might be regarded, in some ways of seeing it, as the Buddha of the imaginal.

So right there you have this balance: there's the imaginal, but there's the knowing of the emptiness, and just putting those two in relationship to each other as images—images that are pregnant with idea as well—and putting them in some kind of counterpoint and balance. There's the imaginal, and there's also the knowing of the emptiness. There's the form of the imaginal, and there's the lack of form in the emptiness. There's the imaginal with the eros implicit in it, and there's the coolness of the knowing of emptiness and knowing of image as image. Sometimes putting those two and meditating them and perhaps placing them in your heart or along a certain axis—if these images are alive for you or can become alive—can be really powerful as a way of developing balance generally in relation to all this.

Or it could be putting those two or one of them in counterpoint, in balance, in relationship with, in opposition to, in co-constellation with another Buddha of the same mandala—Ratnasambhava, who might represent the emotions, the actual feelings of compassion or metta or whatever, or we might say more generally the emotional life.

Again, putting them in relationship and actually having them as iconic figures and letting the imaginal work, imbued with a little bit of concept as it always is anyway, imaginal work—actually let that do its work on you by bringing the energy body and the whole consciousness into that, or bringing that into the whole consciousness and the energy body, either way.

Or a fourth Buddha of that mandala, Amoghasiddhi, is the Buddha related to action in the world. So you can see how these things, just psychologically—can I balance the imaginal with the emptiness? Can I balance the emotions with the action or the emotions with the emptiness or the action with the emptiness? In activism and in engagement, how many people have come to me with that kind of question about burnout, about over-involvement, of being over-passionate, or it needs to be balanced more. This is one way of actually playing with all this.

But again, what would it be to balance Akshobhya, the emptiness, the Buddha of emptiness, the vajra being, the diamond quality, indestructible quality of the transcendent—balance that with the Buddha of action, of engagement, Amoghasiddhi? We can play with these figures, these icons, these images in meditation, place them in relationship, in counterpoint, in balance. And it will bring balance. And it's possible with other imaginal figures as well, even erotic imaginal figures. See, play, see what's possible.

One thing I would say about all this in relation to that mandala and the emptiness thing is emptiness, or the realization of emptiness here, is really at whatever depth or whatever fullness you understand it at present, or that is evoked by that image or concept. I know I put a lot of stress on saying emptiness means more than this, and it's more than that experience, and it's more than this—this is what we really mean by emptiness. But at the same time, in this kind of meditation, you might have a sense, some intuitive sense, or even a direct experience of the unfabricated, or the big mind, big awareness, cosmic consciousness, or emptiness as ground of being. These are all things where you may have heard me say that this isn't emptiness in the way that we mean it—there's more to understand, there's a deeper emptiness. But still, they can be really valuable.

So emptiness at whatever level and depth, fullness you understand it, can be really valuable to bring that in the meditation so it's alive and it's personal and it's relevant to you right now. You don't have to wait until necessarily—I mean it's better if you have a deeper understanding or it will be better when you have a deeper understanding—but you can bring in any level of what these images and ideas bring, whatever level is alive for you and that you can bring in. It will still have a lot of power here.

Or that Akshobhya might be the dharmakaya, the non-dual Buddha's gnosis that includes all appearances. In a way, it's not important. What we want is something that's relevant and that has a certain potency and power to bring into the meditation and let it do its work, let it do its alchemy.

Because it is interesting to me as a teacher how sometimes vague concepts or a certain level of understanding and images can open experiences that bring deeper understandings or open understandings that are deeper than a person knew that they even had—knew that they were even conscious of until they played with it in a certain way or until they entered it a certain way. You think, what's going on here? Is it magic? Is it a kind of invocation? Is it just intuitive wisdom that something in us knows emptiness, for example, at this deep level, knows the co-constellation and the balance and necessity of these things, and what we're really doing through the mandala is contacting and allowing to emerge that level of deep intuitive wisdom? Is it the power of the imaginal, the power of image and poetry?

It's interesting that the alchemy here is not entirely linear or expected. So what I'm really saying is trust whatever level of understanding of emptiness you have, if you're going to play with this kind of thing, and trust the imaginal to do a certain work here that's got a certain autonomy to it. It's beyond what we might have imagined in the narrow sense, what we might have expected or thought beforehand.

Okay, so we've just in this talk talked a lot about strength, balance, space, vessel, mostly as a kind of collateral, as how we develop these qualities.

qualities in our life that can then shape and inform and give us balance generally, which will affect our relationship with eros when it arises. In the next part of this series, we want to explore what balance actually means as you're doing imaginal practice, as the eros is alive with this beloved other, with this erotic object. What does mastery and balance and response mean in the moment there, in the actual practice?

What we've discussed today has been mostly around that practice—the development of what I call collateral qualities. The next talk will address what happens within the practice itself.

I want to say one more time: sometimes, for some people, there comes a time to question even the whole ideal of balance and equanimity. Or to question one's clinging to the opposite—to being passionate and up and down, to identifying as "I'm like this" or "I'm like that."

So while I'm genuinely interested in developing the skills and art of balance and equanimity with respect to eros, I also recognize there's a place for questioning these very ideals. Balance is, after all, an ideal. I'll say more about this in the next talk. But there's sometimes a place for simply questioning this whole framework: Where did it come from? Do I have to buy into it? And what does it actually look like in practice?

These questions themselves become part of the deeper inquiry, part of the very balance we seek to cultivate.

CHAPTER 66

Wisdom, Art, Balance (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 53 min

> In this third part of his exploration of wisdom, art, and balance, Rob Burbea delves deeply into what mastery means within imaginal practice, particularly when working with eros and desire. Drawing from alchemical imagery of "mastering the fire" and "forging strong vessels," he examines the fluid balance required in meditation—not a static equilibrium, but the dynamic art of moment-to-moment navigation and skillful response.
> Burbea outlines five key approaches when desire arises in practice: letting go and putting it down; focusing on vedanā and the arising/passing of craving; holding with kind mindfulness the emotions underlying desire; consciously navigating toward nourishing practices like samādhi or mettā; and opening to the deeper energy of desire itself. He emphasizes that mastery lies not in always doing the same thing, but in developing flexibility and range—like an eagle riding air currents with subtle micro-adjustments.
> The talk addresses common challenges practitioners face when working with erotic imagery, including fear of merging or dissolution, intensity of bliss or energetic charge, vulnerability from opening the heart, and deep longing. Through detailed exploration of what makes eros "hard to bear," Burbea demonstrates how staying within imaginal practice while making subtle shifts of emphasis can transform difficulty into profound opening, illustrated through a powerful example of divine generatrix imagery.

Okay, so we're talking about exploring these ideas of mastery, mastering the fire, forging strong vessels that we borrowed from the alchemical maxims, and exploring what that might mean and exploring even the extent to which that's even possible in work with eros and soul-making. But generally looking at what's involved in mastery—what might we mean by that and what might be included and necessary to develop there and practice in all that?

So most of the previous two parts of this talk we were looking really at practice as a whole and the whole of life and what was called collateral development of certain qualities—long-term development of certain qualities that will serve us well and support us well in extending our meditative explorations and widening our practice to include this work with eros and soul-making.

Now what I want to get into is what about in practice, in the moment, in the heat of practice? What might mastery mean there? Mastering the fire—what might be involved in that, what might be called for, and what does it mean to forge strong vessels, adequate vessels, and how might we do that?

So we said already that the balance we're talking about here is fluid balance. We're not talking about something static. And fluid balance, in this case, in practice, means exactly the ability, the skill, the art of navigation—gliding this way and that, responding to what's actually arising and the balance of qualities, energies, directions, and the art of skillful response in the moment, which sometimes is really quite subtle, even in terms of discerning what's happening, and then this very subtle sort of micro-adjustment, very graceful it can be.

So there's, as always, there's a range. We're talking about fluid balance. So in regard to fire, what might that mean? When do we welcome the fire, when do we stoke the fire, when do we guard it, how much, and which fire exactly, or what exactly needs the fire?

But this navigation that we talk about, this moment-to-moment skillful responding, is actually forging the vessel in the moment. Forging the vessel in the moment is not, as I said before, that we arrive with a prefabricated vessel. That's not completely how it is. We're actually always creating, shaping and forging the vessel in the moment by all kinds of things that we're doing—perspectives, emphases, etc.

So as always in practice there are options, and I want to go through, take a little time and go through different options in practice in this regard. And "options" is a key word because it implies that there's flexibility, there's a range here. The art and the wisdom is in the use of the options, is in the flexibility and in that flexibility of response and range of possibility that we can develop for ourselves in practice.

Sometimes, considering all practices, all meditative practices, sometimes I think that there's only one real mistake, if you like, and that would be always to do the same thing. So talking about any practice—always an emotion comes up or something comes up that's difficult: "I'll always be with it and that's all I ever do. If something comes up I have to go be with it." Or the opposite: "I always drop it." Something comes up: "Drop it, come back to my breath. Drop it, come back to my breath."

And doing always even just one of those two is going to really shortchange us in the long run. It's going to really limit our insights, it's going to limit our freedom, it's going to limit our capacity, it's going to limit certainly our fluidity of response, it's going to limit what we're capable of, not just in meditation, but in life.

Or sometimes people are always paying attention in a very kind of microscopic, very narrow, intense way. Great, wonderful. It's the "always" that's the problem, not the approach itself. Always paying attention with a kind of relaxed, open, spacious awareness with a wide sort of panoramic view, if you like. But always doing either one or the other of those two will limit the insight that arises. We get certain insights through a microscopic attention that perhaps are not so easily available through a wide awareness and vice versa.

So this is a general point about the importance of range in practice, flexibility, and not getting locked into one thing, not just doing one thing. And I could give countless examples, but there are two more sort of standard sets of practices.

So as you're listening to all this, you might consider for yourself, well, what's my usual tendency here? Either in regard to an emotion coming up or in regard to desire coming up and feeling that pressure, heat of desire. What's my usual tendency? Am I locked into a habit here that I always respond to in a certain way? Even if I think, "Oh, that's a skillful habit, that's a healthy habit."

So to be aware of what one's tendencies and habits are and to know this can be and probably—well, I am encouraging the opening up of the range of individual possibilities for any individual. So this is all for exploration, for development, so that we can develop this flexibility, this range, and that opens up a greater range of possibilities for us. It's all part of the art, the exploration, the development that develops our art in practice. And a lot of what I'm going to be saying hopefully is repeating or will be repeated in the instructions over this course.

So the question is, when desire is present, when I feel that movement or force of desire—in practice or in a moment when I notice it in life—then what?

So we can say, well, the first possibility—this isn't any order, by the way. So again, just listen to what your tendencies are, what you know how to do, what could be developed, etc. And I want to emphasize a certain subset of what I'm going to say.

But let's just run through some options. One option is, here's desire, here's a movement towards something, here's an impulse towards something or other. And one possibility is, let it go. Put it down. Am I confident of my ability, my abilities to do that? And certainly with the kind of small, kind of petty stuff in life, that cup of tea while I'm walking in meditation or in between the sitting—walking, do I really need it? Or I mean, I might. It might be that actually I do need that break and that space there and that easing off the sort of gas pedal of the effort. But oftentimes it's these small things or that cookie, you know, whatever.

Learning to put this stuff down, to let it go—this is really a good development, a helpful development as one of our options.

There are many possibilities here, and though I think we've talked about some of this already, I'll just briefly go through them again. Being mindful—let's say, take that cookie—and really being mindful of the arising of pleasure in the seeing, in the anticipation, in the whole sensual experience of it, moment to moment. Really paying attention to the pleasure as it arises and passes, moment to moment.

If there's enough attention, eventually—though sometimes initially giving more attention to the pleasant actually reveals more pleasantness—eventually we start to see in the whole experience: how good is this really? Relatively speaking, in terms of the kind of pleasure that a human being can experience, is it really worth it? How good is this really? But I have to pay attention to really answer that question. I have to pay close attention to the pleasure, or whatever other sensation—because it might be quite neutral—arising moment to moment.

I've talked and written about that elsewhere, and plenty of people have, so we don't really need to go into it. But another possibility there is actually, in this close attention to the arising of pleasure, having what I want, actually then asking: where does the pleasure go? Where did it go?

Oftentimes it's so brief. So we can incline then with all this—where did it go?—inclining towards seeing the impermanence, seeing the endings. Not just seeing, but really sensing, feeling the endings, the impermanence of things. Giving attention to noticing endings, really honing in on impermanence, moment to moment impermanence, the ending of this pleasure. Really feeling that, really sensing that.

So there's an inclination there, an incline towards the practice of anicca, of noticing impermanence. You really start to see this pleasure—where did it go? It dissipates so quickly.

Out of that, a related third option is: what will it give me? Really, what will it give me, this thing that I want, this cookie? If I'm genuinely hungry and that's what I have to eat, then of course it's going to give me nourishment, and it will give me some pleasure—but how much, and for how long?

So these kinds of reflections—we could say all kinds of things, but they're related. I have to pay attention enough to notice, and I have to pay attention, perhaps, to impermanence. This forms a basis for a kind of reflection that allows letting go.

So that's the first general direction or navigation in relation to desire coming up: letting it go, putting it down. We could fill that out with all kinds of other possibilities, but let's just keep it at that for now.

The second possibility—and actually related, and again, I think I mentioned this already on this retreat, and certainly elsewhere—is when there's either a pleasant sensation, pleasant vedanā that I'm enjoying, or unpleasant vedanā that I'm craving to get away from, to end, to push away. One possibility is actually to really take up a kind of close attention with the mindfulness and the intensity of mindfulness, focusing intently on the actual vedanā, moment to moment—pleasant, unpleasant, whatever it is.

And noticing within that, not just the vedanā, but noticing the sort of craving that is, if you like, coupled with the vedanā. These ebbs and flows or little impulses and waves of craving that arise with or from the vedanā, or in relation to the vedanā. And just noticing how they keep dissolving—this impulse, this craving, this little swell of craving. "I want it," or "I want more of it," or "I'm pushing it away."

It's not so much in the mind, or certainly that's a level, but in the actual energetics. I'm talking about below the level of thought here, something more fundamental than that, more hardwired even than that.

But focusing on the vedanā, noticing these swells and dissipations of craving, the dissolving of craving—doing that is really good training. Because then one finds that in the noticing of the dissolving of craving, one actually is developing the capacity not to get dragged by it. Over time, this grows so that we're less automatically and unconsciously pulled by vedanā into craving away from or towards something or other. It's a really good skill to develop, that very specific meditative focus. You can do it with any sense door.

Very related to that is a kind of slight shift in the focus to really train the mindfulness on—in a bit more spacious way, probably—the feeling of the pressure that goes with craving. With craving, "I really want this or that," and I can feel it build as a pressure. Again, not so much in the mind necessarily as in the energy body, in fact.

This pressure, because it's hard to tolerate, usually we just want to get rid of the pressure. How do I get rid of the pressure? The easiest way seems to be: eat the cookie, take it, have the cup of tea, get it over and done with—light the cigarette, whatever it is.

But with practice, actually begin to notice this pressure, and what I need to do is notice it with a more spacious mindfulness—allow it, give it space. What pressure needs often is space. That's kind of physics: you squeeze something, there's more pressure. So you want to give it space, and it's like giving a gas more space—it just takes the pressure off. It lowers the pressure.

We just allow that pressure. And again, there'll be a kind of swell, perhaps over quite a bit of time—over some minutes even—a kind of swell of pressure, maybe micro-movements within that, micro-swells within that, this swelling of pressure.

But if I can just be mindful of it in this very allowing way, giving it space, I can see that I can actually tolerate it more easily. And I learn, I develop my capacity to tolerate the pressure of craving or the heat of desire or whatever it is. That learning to tolerate gives me confidence in the long run.

And you find that this pressure and the craving just begins to ebb away. And then I'm free. And the next time it comes back, it will probably be a little less strong. Eventually an addiction can be—some addictions can be—healed just by doing that. A really good skill to have.

So either focusing on the vedanā, noticing the craving, or focusing on feeling the pressure and allowing, giving that space, tolerating it—two versions of a second possibility there.

The third possibility has more to do with holding—these are all related and they can overlap, certainly they do overlap—but holding with a kind mindfulness, or mindfulness imbued with kindness, the emotions that are wrapped up in or underneath the desire and the craving.

For example, a feeling, an emotion of a sense of lack, or even the fear of lacking, the fear of missing out, the fear of losing that's impelling me, compelling me, pushing me to cling on to something or to crave something or to fill up in a certain way with food or whatever it is. It could be actually any kind of fear—fear of boredom. Sometimes this is quite subtle and not obvious. We actually have to notice it, discern what's going on there, and then kind of hone in very delicately on this emotion and hold it, care for it.

What does that mean? Sometimes it can be an agitation. It can be all kinds of things. There's an emotion wrapped up in or underneath that's sort of firing this craving or whatever it is. And sometimes it can be very subtle, sometimes not so subtle, but that's what needs the attention, that's what needs the care.

And what does it mean to hold caringly the complex that's involved there? So one part of this is holding and caring for the self, for me, that who is feeling this complex of emotions—whatever it is, feeling of lack, feeling of emptiness in the non-dharmic sense, a feeling of fear, whatever it is, boredom, uneasiness, stress.

Holding and caring for the self there. Sometimes with mindfulness, we kind of too quickly, or at the wrong times, we skip over or through the self. It's almost like we laser beam the attention down to the sensations of the emotion, which I'm going to come to in a second, because that's actually quite important or valuable as an option. But sometimes also at the level of the self.

So this self that is feeling this difficult emotion, that's put the emotion pushing me into craving—maybe I even know it's not going to be helpful and all of that. Can I hold and care for myself there? Can I give mettā to myself or just hold myself in this kind of kind awareness? So it's the level of the self, of the being.

But a second level is, as I just alluded to, giving a kind of honing of the attention on the emotion rather than the self. So here's this emotion. And one way of doing it is kind of like a laser beam with a lot of intensity. These sensations are arising in my throat, in my chest. It may or may not be that that kind of laser beam intensity or bearing down on it is what's needed. It may be, but sometimes with some emotion, some situation, it's not what's needed. We need something much more delicate, much more caring with that.

And so what is it, again, to hold kindly, almost to cup in the hands like you would hold a little fragile bird or something like that, to hold kindly with mindfulness—bring the mindfulness, but the mindfulness has a lot of holding and kindness in it—to hold with mindfulness that emotion as it plays out in the energy body. But the emotion of it is what's—the actual emotion, the experience of the emotion, the phenomenon of the emotion is what's being held and cared for.

So again, these shade into each other. There are really blurry boundaries here, but we're talking about subtle shifts of emphasis which can make all the difference in practice. I'm not talking about theory here, not talking about neat, clever distinctions that package together very nicely. We're talking about really subtle leanings and emphasis in the moment, in the heat of practice, meeting the difficulty, meeting the beauty, whatever it is.

And these subtle distinctions—this is where when we talk about mastery, when we talk about artistry, when we talk about the beauties of practice, this is really part of it. In this kind of subtlety and the micro-leanings of attention. Think of an eagle or one of those beautiful birds of prey as they glide and ride the air waves, or a surfer riding the waves. It's really the joy, the art is in the micro-adjustments. And it just sometimes can be really effortless, really subtle, almost barely noticeable to anyone else. And you're riding the currents. What's most helpful here? What's available?

So all this applies to everything—everything we're talking about in practice generally, certainly everything on this retreat, but particularly what I'm exploring in this series of talks.

There's also the possibility of holding and caring for the emotional complex through what I call directing metta toward phenomena—metta to the phenomenon of the emotion itself. Not so much metta to myself, but actual metta with phrases directed toward the emotion. I've taught this technique elsewhere, so I won't go into the details now, but you can find it in other teachings.

What you'll discover, if you genuinely don't try to get rid of the emotion this way, is that oftentimes it fades. But this only works if you're not trying to get rid of it—which would usually be another form of aversion. Instead, you're actually loving this emotion, which means it's welcome, truly welcome. Not as some theoretical idea, but as a real embodied opening, a softening of the relationship to it—welcoming, allowing, and actually directing metta to the emotion in various ways.

Because of dependent origination, because this represents a reduction of clinging, the emotion often fades. But you can't aim for that outcome, because then it's usually just aversion trying to get rid of the emotion. Depending on which emphasis you take, sometimes the emotion fades, but other things might happen instead. An image might arise. Something might shift in the energy body. All kinds of possibilities—some kind of healing with the emotion, some change in the relationship even while the emotion remains.

So we have a third general possibility: the first is letting go, putting it down. The second is focusing on the vedanā or the pressure of craving, allowing it, giving it space, tolerating it. The third is what we could call meeting and holding—tuning in, noticing, meeting and holding, and caring for in different ways, whether for the self, the emotion, or through giving metta to the emotion.

And there's a fourth general possibility in our navigation of practice when desire or craving arises: making a conscious choice to navigate away from it. The Buddha describes this kind of skillful avoidance many times. We're not talking about fear—being afraid of the eros or intensity, some knee-jerk reaction. We're talking about a conscious, skillful response that simply leans or inclines consciousness somewhere else.

Sometimes we recognize that the craving or desire arising right now is actually arising partly or even predominantly because we're not feeling nourished—spiritually nourished, nourished in our being, in our heart, or in our energy. What would serve us better is actually concentrating on giving ourselves some nourishment, opening to nourishment.

Or perhaps we're feeling restless, and the restlessness is impelling this craving. Craving and restlessness, or aversion and restlessness, go intimately together. These hindrances are intimately connected. Or perhaps there's generally not enough space in consciousness—it's getting cramped, often because there's already some craving present. But that crampedness itself fuels the craving in unhelpful ways. There's a kind of intensification, a snowballing effect because there's insufficient space in consciousness.

Or sometimes there's simply not enough energy. We're depleted somehow, irritable, and there's craving or aversion—toward or away from something, whatever our particular pattern of vulnerability when we're tired and depleted.

So we can deliberately recognize this and incline toward some kind of nourishment. This doesn't necessarily mean getting up from the cushion and going for a walk, or taking in nature, or talking to a friend—though of course all that is possible. But within the practice itself, still sitting or walking or whatever the form, we can move into a samādhi practice, for instance, or into metta. If I'm feeling undernourished, I don't necessarily need to give myself metta—I could, but sometimes I might just as well give metta to other people and still get nourished from that. I certainly will.

Or if it's space that I need—opening out the consciousness—maybe taking the meditation outside to help with the outdoors, the sky. But sometimes just opening to listening, 360-degree listening from all distances near and far, will open the spaciousness of consciousness quite organically.

Or generally, some kind of practice that inclines toward fabricating less perception. There's a whole host of these possibilities.

I'm not going to describe them all, but, for instance, an attar practice, if you know it, or actually any kind of emptiness practice—actually the samatha, the metta, and the spaciousness are also practices of less fabrication. So there's a navigation away from the fabrication that's wrapped up in and with the desire, and instead a navigation towards practices which are less fabricating. Samatha, metta, spaciousness, emptiness practices of different kinds—these can be really, really skillful at times. To know that one has that option, to develop these options so that they are available and accessible, and to experiment with gliding between these different practices, really feeling the resource and knowing and being nourished by these different things at different times.

So that would be a fourth option.

A fifth option I'll just mention here—and we'll introduce it in the instructions—I am referring to what I actually introduced a few years ago in the talk "Beauty of Desire Part 2," I'm guessing 2011, I could be wrong. Very briefly: just here's this desire. Actually, here's some difficulty that I'm experiencing—some pain, some confusion, some anger, whatever it is, some sadness. And sometimes what can happen there is actually, I say that there's probably some desire wrapped up in this difficulty that I'm feeling. Or it might actually be that I'm conscious of a desire that it seems like I can't have, or I shouldn't let myself have, or something or other. But it might just be some other difficult emotion.

So there's probably a desire here. Can I just give myself enough of a platform of deciding to entertain some trust, deciding that maybe there's a treasure in that desire? Maybe that desire is a kind of treasure. So I'm just opening the view away from what I might have been taught or what I might believe already. Maybe there's a treasure in this desire. First step.

Second step: what am I really wanting here? So it seems to be I want this person, it seems to be, I want this to happen—but what am I really desiring? What's the deeper desire, if you like, the more, in a way, more general or abstract desire here? To find out what that is, just gently with the inquiry.

And then really, third step: open to that. Open to the current, the force of that desire in the energy body. I mean really open—really opening the sense of the body to that, what can sometimes feel like a torrent or a stream. Really, really opening to it and allowing it to flow.

So three steps there, and something quite remarkable can happen in terms of the whole state of consciousness and the freedom in relationship to the desire. It's not coming from putting the desire down. It's not coming from navigating away from it. It's not coming from just being mindful of it in the usual sense. There's a different order of something that's available here in terms of—and it really turns upside down the beliefs that we've probably become a little bit entrenched in regarding desire, perhaps over the years of practice.

But here, there's more an emphasis on the energy of the desire itself rather than the image. And also, as I said, the more generalized desire or more abstracted desire, the kind of deeper level, if you like. So it's away from the image towards more of this generality of what I'm desiring deeply, what I really want, and more towards the energy and that kind of general level rather than the image.

So there's five options. But actually this talk, and maybe the next one—we'll see how we do for time—what I mostly want to go into is staying within imaginal practice with the desire that's arising in that imaginal, with the eros, with the erotic imaginal, with the beloved other. Staying within with the image, not navigating away, not going just to the energy of the desire as I just described, not putting it down, not all of that, not just finding the emotions underneath and being mindful of them and caring for them, but actually staying within, if you like, the remit and the direction of imaginal practice, keeping the image alive and working with the eros there.

But remember, all those options I've just been through—navigating away from the desire or from the image, any of the previous ones that we've just been through—are available, as is stopping the meditation, pausing, opening your eyes. It's pretty rare that that's going to be necessary. So maybe some of you are thinking, "God, this is going to be really intense, this eros business and desire and wow and fire and all that." Yeah, maybe sometimes, but it's pretty—I would say pretty—rare that someone actually finds it's just way too much and they need to stop and open their eyes. I mean, it might be, but generally speaking, again, there's a real range here.

So all of those options that we've just been through are possible. Or what I want to really explore shortly is subtle shifts and inclinations, shifts of emphasis and adjustments of emphasis in the imaginal practice that allow us to—yes, part of the mastery—allow us to find our way, allow it to find its way, to open the paths, to open in the imaginal, in the erotic imaginal, allow the vessel to be strong in the moment, and elastic if it needs to be, or whatever. So that's really what I want to go into.

Before I do, a couple of things. One is sometimes it's valuable to be clear—in fact most of the time probably it's valuable to be clear—what I'm actually responding to. So if we're talking about the art of skillful response and subtle responses to subtle or not so subtle things or energies or qualities that are arising in the practice, it's good to be clear: what am I actually responding to?

If or when the eros that's present in an image, in an imaginal practice, feels hard to bear—if or when eros feels hard to bear sometimes—why right now does it feel hard to bear? In other words, what exactly is hard to bear about it? This can be an interesting question at times, and actually quite a helpful inquiry at times. Not that you have to always go into this inquiry, but sometimes.

Sometimes, for example, in what's happening in an erotic image in the practice, there's a sense of merging, perhaps with the beloved, or dissolving into them or together, and there can be fear in relation to that.

Fear of that merging, fear of dissolving, and that makes the whole thing hard to bear. Or it could be that actually there's a lot of bliss arising, a lot of pleasure, and if one isn't used to it or doesn't know how to work with it, that can feel hard to bear. Or, kind of related but a little bit different, just the erotic charge, the energetic charge, can feel hard to bear.

Or sometimes what's happening in the imaginal practice with the erotic object, the erotic beloved, is that there's an opening of one's being, and that opening of the heart and the whole being feels vulnerable, and that feels hard to bear. We feel unsure about that. Or perhaps it's actually gone into craving, and the craving is bringing a certain constriction, and that feels uncomfortable, hard to bear.

Or it might be a matter of trust. You know, here I feel like, "Oh, I'm not sure," and we're feeling uneasy because there isn't enough trust in place—in this practice, in the eros itself, in the kind of image that's coming up. It feels, you know, to the mind, it feels, "Oh, this is weird," or "It's too this or that," or whatever, or "Not enough this or that," or something.

Or it could be, you know, sometimes what happens is there's a really deep longing that arises in relation to certain images and fantasies. And it has this kind of bitter-sweet, but kind of a little bit hard to bear, or very hard to bear, quality to it.

So all these are... you know, there are multiple options with all of these. But I remember just not too long ago working with someone and she was working with an image. We were working with it together. And she said, "Oh, the eros is a little bit hard to bear right now." And I asked her, you know, "What exactly is hard to bear?" And I went through some of these possibilities.

And she was sort of checking in and looking. And she said, "No, what's hard to bear is the giving image." This was... okay, well, "What do you mean, the giving?" And so it was part of the image that was already unfolding for her, that she was, if you like, in.

And this was an image that was very... it was more bodily than visual. It was coming through her body and she was moving her body in a sort of expression of the image and sensing the image through her body. So we've talked about that with the different senses.

But what was needed was actually a little bit more entering into the image, inquiring into the image, and then this sense of, "Oh, it's the giving that's a problem." Okay, well, giving, and "Tell me about the giving. What is being given?" And then going into that whole image of the giving, and she felt herself to be a divine womb.

So the whole thing just went to another level, in the image, into the image, and it opens up. She was a divine womb, a sort of generatrix, and her body was turning out sacred text. So she was making this gesture with her body, kind of rolling her arms. It was puzzling to her. She was following her body, and the image was of this divine womb turning out sacred texts on her arms and with her body and these texts sort of emanated, radiated and then became the cosmos.

So there's some kind of divine goddess birthing the cosmos in hierophantic time here and birthing also the beloved other. It's quite a beautiful and profound image, but it took actually going into the question of "What's hard to bear there?"—an imaginal, it was an aspect of the image—and opening that up.

So in other words, exploring the image more can sometimes make the whole thing easier and give rise to more space. So this is the emphasis, this last one that I've just been through that I want to explore shortly.

But as I said, please remember there are options with all of these. So for instance, if there's a lot of bliss or a lot of pleasure arising with an image... oftentimes the secret here is to open the energy body, give it more space, give that bliss space to flow, to move, allow it. The emphasis is really on opening and allowing and enjoying.

If you really open, really allow and kind of surrender to it—like you surrender to a really powerful shower or waterfall—even you just really open the body to it and let yourself enjoy it, you'll find almost always that that actually takes the unpleasant edge off and the intensity off the pleasure makes it much more tolerable.

Now you could do that almost like again this kind of gently veering away from the image to just a meditation on the energy body and you're just working... you let the image go and you're just working with the bliss and the pleasure in the energy body really opening, really allowing and letting yourself enjoy, surrendering, abandoning yourself to that pleasure and you'll find that it becomes a meditation in itself on the energy body, on the pleasure, etc. It can go to samadhi and different things.

Or you might do exactly that, but keeping the image present. So you're just kind of, again, it's all about shades of emphasis. So there the image is present. I'm not letting the image go and keeping that, but I'm at the same time working with opening the energy body and allowing and enjoying and surrendering and all those things while I'm still engaged with, in relationship to the image. Lots of possibilities.

Similarly with the erotic and energy charge that we talked about before, but they're, you know, in other words, really opening the energy body, etc. But there are other options with the image.

You know, in terms of what we... just the list we went through of what might feel hard to bear just then, you know, if the opening of the being is what feels vulnerable... then again, you can go back to kind of meeting that vulnerability, feeling in with mindfulness. What does that feel like?

Caring for it with mindfulness, perhaps with some metta—maybe just the caring kind of holding with mindfulness. Maybe again, stopping, pausing. You don't need to push yourself through something that feels too much of an edge for you, that you're not ready for. If it's too vulnerable, stop, pause. It's okay. It's really okay.

But again, there are other options: keeping the image around, playing with that edge, working with the energy in relationship to the image—or rather, primarily with the image, even more than the energy or the emotion. The energy and the emotion shift from this different relationship with the image. This is what I want to explore.

The first thing I mentioned from our list of what might feel hard to bear was this fear of merging, or the imminent dissolution that might feel like a tendency toward dissolution. What's helpful here is more of this collateral investment from other practices—if you have experience with the lessening of fabrication, because that's what dissolution is: the lessening of fabrication of self and the perception of other, perception of anything.

If you're familiar with this from practices of samadhi or metta or emptiness, then that familiarity allows you to realize over time that you can really trust this dissolution. If it does go to dissolution, or if it wants to, or if you want to go to dissolution, there's really no danger there. There's no danger. Things can dissolve, merge into oneness—all kinds of different oneness and luminosity and experiences. No danger at all. You're not going to get stuck there. You're not going to lose anything permanently—at least nothing that's worth keeping.

Really, generally, one goes into these experiences and comes out. With familiarity, with time dipping in and out through other practices or even this kind of practice, you realize there's no danger. It might help you, if this is really very new to you, hearing from a teacher—me or Catherine or whoever—saying there's no danger. You can dip into that just a little bit, a little bit more, maybe a little bit more sometimes, and it becomes a beautiful option, completely trustworthy.

Sometimes what happens is there's a sense of the fear of dissolution or the fear of melting. What you can do is just know that there's fear there. At the same time, just notice it's also very nice. It's pretty delicious at that point. You can just not push away the fear, but notice the deliciousness that's around in the body, in the mind perhaps—that's there as well as the fear. Just very gently incline the mind or the attention toward the deliciousness without ignoring or pushing anything away or trying to get rid of fear. Just enjoying that pleasure—that can really, really help.

With all this, it's important to be aware that, as I've said before, often in eros there is a tension—what we're calling an erotic tension. This comes partly because of the pothos, partly because there's always this "more" there, and partly because there's a tension between this attraction toward the beloved other, the erotic object, while at the same time retaining twoness. There's like a pull in opposite directions: a pull toward the object and a pull away to retain, to keep the twoness. All of this creates what we're calling erotic tension.

Sometimes this tension is quite noticeable, and other times it's barely noticeable at all. But just know that this can be part of eros. Yes, there are all kinds of different experiences of peace that we can have in and with eros—quite particular ones, senses of peace that we'll hopefully encounter in this retreat, and kinds of equanimity or balance in and with eros.

But strictly speaking, equanimity is really about the drastic lessening, if not momentary erasure, of any pulling of the object toward oneself or pushing it away—any movement of desire that way. Because it's that lessening of the push-pull toward something, it actually moves toward a fading. I mentioned this in the last part of this talk. Equanimity and fading go together. Deep equanimity involves deep fading. A state of deep equanimity is a state of deep fading.

That's not really what's happening in a state of eros for the most part. It might go toward this melting in union, dissolving in light with the beloved other. But generally speaking, as I said, eros will stay engaged with an other, will retain the other. Whereas deep equanimity will dissolve the other, dissolve the thingness, and actually not be in engagement.

Here's something interesting I'll throw out—some of you will find it intriguing, some won't. The Pali for equanimity is upekkha, the Sanskrit is upeksha. This comes from upa and iksha. Iksha means seeing or to regard or to consider or to watch over. Upa usually means toward or near or together with. So you get this sense of watching closely something. We say equanimity and tend to think with mindfulness it's a watching closely of something.

But the word upa also actually has the implication of extinction, of killing, of diffusing something.

So, at a stretch—I mean, if we just play with words now—at a stretch, upekkhā or upekṣā could mean something like the extinction of looking. In other words, the fading of perception.

Now, I'm not claiming that is the etymology. I mean, it might actually be involved in it. Personally, I find arguments over etymology and picking over the etymology to try and find the authentic, real, one meaning that the Buddha had for these things—I find that a bit silly, to be honest. I would rather use words to open doors, to give us pathways, a kind of more suggestive hermeneutics there.

But anyway, eros is different, really, than equanimity. We can talk about kinds of equanimity and kinds of peace that can be mixed with the eros or part of the whole opening of the erotic imaginal, but actually there is a kind of tension, an erotic tension, that remains for the most part and to differing degrees when we're working with eros.

Let's look in more detail in the next part. Let's move into what I said I really wanted to talk about, which is the working with, staying with the images and working with the subtle shifts of emphasis and inclination that can happen in imaginal practice in the moment.

CHAPTER 67

Wisdom, Art, Balance (Part 4)

Rob Burbea · 1h18

> In this fourth installment of the series on wisdom, art, and balance in working with eros and the imaginal, Rob Burbea offers profound guidance on navigating desire through contemplative practice. Rather than the conventional spiritual advice to simply 'let go' of difficult desires, he presents an alternative path: entering deeply into the imaginal dimension, allowing images to reveal their multidimensionality, and discovering unexpected peace and beauty within the erotic-imaginal itself.
> Burbea emphasizes that sustainable soul-making requires balance across multiple dimensions—not just perceiving the beauty of the beloved other, but also recognizing the beauty of the self and one's own eros within the imaginal constellation. He shares detailed practitioner accounts illustrating how staying with difficult emotions and allowing images to transform can open into profound experiences of connection, healing, and even theophany. The teaching addresses common patterns of imbalance, such as seeing divinity only in the other while missing it in oneself.
> The talk offers four specific contemplative approaches: perceiving desire as 'divine influx' flowing through us; sensing that which is desired as already happening in hierophantic (sacred) time; recognizing desire, self, and other as theophanies or faces of the divine; and perceiving the entire erotic constellation as God making love to herself. These ways of looking dissolve craving and contraction while allowing eros, images, and soul-making to deepen and expand rather than fade—a fundamentally different result than standard anattā practice alone would produce.

So we're talking about the development of the art of practicing with Eros so that it is soul-making and fertile—working with the imaginal and informal practice in our life. The wisdom of that: what does wisdom mean? The art of skillful response: what does balance mean? How do we create the vessels? How do we tend to the fire and modulate the fire?

We've already said that we don't want to just alternate between practices of fire and practices of earth, so to speak—the practice of the fire of Eros and practice of the steadiness of the earth, the equanimity of the earth. We don't just want to move between these and hope that a balance comes out over time. That will help certainly; that's important. Practices that bring steadiness, equanimity, spaciousness, strength, rootedness—these are important when they're done alone and as part of the totality of the path. We've already said this.

But we're also interested—and what I really want to go into—is the question of balance and equanimity, sustainability, fertility, while engaging with the imaginal, while engaging with the erotic imaginal. What I'm talking about here applies to any imaginal perception. We're talking about the imaginal dimension, so it could be something completely intra-psychic, an intra-psychic imaginal figure that doesn't seem to bear any relation to anyone we know. It could be an actual person seen, sensed, imaginally—the imaginal perception of someone in our life, or someone that we know from history, or whatever it is.

For example, someone comes to me and says, "There's this person and I'm really attracted to them. I want to be in relationship with him, with her, with them. And it's painful because they have communicated that they don't want that. They're not interested in that." The natural inclination and the taught path there would be: let go of that. Let go, turn away, find someone else, feel your emotions.

But in fact, another possibility—and in a way a more fruitful possibility, a deeper possibility sometimes—is actually to go in. This person already exists for you as an image. Go into the imaginal dimension. Allow the image of them to be amplified, to enlarge, as it would with the eros-psyche-logos dynamic operating. Dwell with that image. Be sensitive to it. Meditate with it. Open to it.

And lo and behold, when a person does this, they often find that what happens when I allow the imaginal is that the imaginal will reveal its dimensionality to me. This person becomes much more than the one-dimensional, concrete, actual person. They become alive. With dimensions. They become, if you like, huge—or bigger at least. Multilayered. There's a richness, a depth, a beauty, vitality, multifacetedness of the image there. The image, instead of trying to get rid of it or shrink it or contain it or shrink it down to the actual—actually we're allowing it to open, and ourselves to open to it. And the whole thing opens up. The whole sense of the problem or the situation or this other person, the self in relation to it, opens up.

The problem is flatness. The problem is over-concretized one-dimensionality of perception, reification. And we actually don't see. We think we see, and that the imaginal is not seeing, but we actually do not see. We're not seeing deeply, fully, imaginally, soulfully enough. And therein, in that reification, in that not seeing, in that lack of fullness, is the problem and comes the problem. Flatness, killing, suffocating, strangling, cramping.

And then, if we can open to the image and allow the image to open, we will see very often that it then doesn't feel like it matters much what actually happens in the one-dimensional so-called reality. We've got something else there. Something else opens up and it doesn't actually matter. The image is much bigger than that—much, much bigger.

And we may ask with that: who is this? Who is this in this image? I thought it was this person that I've been trying to tell that I'm interested in them and I would like to pursue a relationship, whatever it is. But who is it? As I go into the sense of them and allow, as I said, all the sensitivity, all the resonance, all the opening, the energy body, the beauty, the soul-making—who is this person? Who is this? The imaginal layer. Can I begin to see and sense in the image of them, in the image, in the way they come imaginatively alive to the psyche? Can I see and sense the angel there, the angel that they are to me, the theophany, the divinity in the image?

So we're really talking about practice here. When that begins to open—that sense of the angel, the theophany, the divinity in the image—then, because I'm actually perceiving that and I'm sensitive, I'm open to it with the whole of my being, the energy body, the mindfulness, the sensitivity, the delicacy, the tuning, it's as if my being, my psyche, is infused, so to speak.

There's an infusion to myself of that angelic nature, of that theophany, of the divinity therein. I don't need this or that to happen. I don't even need this or that to happen in the image. There's an infusion directly. It permeates and penetrates the psyche, and I have something—I have actually much more than I thought I wanted in the first place. Much more.

This could be any kind of relationship, not necessarily romantic or sexual desire. It could be any kind of relationship—with a teacher, whatever it is. Someone might take it to a teacher, take it to a therapist, and they say, "Let go, let go." And of course, that's the standard message, isn't it? Let go. It sounds so simple. It sounds so wise. But not all the time is it wise. Let go—or actually, what does it mean to let go when there are complex situations? Again, it sounds so simplistic. What does it actually mean?

But instead of letting go, there is the possibility: actually, no, go into this image. Claim it, if you like. Let it have a claim on you. Let it have its claim on you. Enter in, open to the image. Let it open. And there will come, in relation to this person that I can't have—maybe they're dying, maybe they might die, maybe whatever the situation is, and whatever the kind of relationship we're talking about, friend, teacher, student, potential lover or not, whatever it is—the image opens, and with it comes peace, beauty, soul-making. The opposite movement of what we thought, sometimes, for us in certain spiritual traditions or other traditions of psychotherapy. We're indoctrinated without even realizing it, and the indoctrination here is simply: let go. Let go is the answer. Can we explore? Can we question? Can we check where we might be indoctrinated and see what other paths are open to us?

But I'm talking about practice here, not some vague idea. I'm actually talking about entering into practice so that we perceive certain things. There's the imaginal perception. They become very alive, very vital, very meaningful, very tangible, very real for us, these imaginal perceptions.

So in a way, what's happening here is we're allowing the eros. Another way of saying this—because eros and the image go together—is: allow the eros, allow the feeling of the desire, allow that erotic charge, and allow it to increase. Go into the image, allow the eros to increase. They're slightly different angles in on the same thing, really, but allow the eros to increase, and what will happen? The eros-psyche—because the eros is increasing, it stimulates, it ignites—it starts to expand, inseminate, fertilize the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, the soul-making dynamic, the mutual insemination, fertilization, deepening, widening, expanding, complicating, enriching of all that we've been through. It expands. That whole soul-making expands. The psyche expands. The ideation expands. And peace comes with that—and this can be a huge surprise if we're accustomed to the usual indoctrination.

Going into the image, opening to the image, opening to the eros, allowing the eros, not cutting it, not trying to stifle it or erase it or put it away—peace.

Sometimes what happens is one enters into the imaginal other, the erotic object, the beloved other, whatever that is, whether it's a human or an animal or some element of nature or an imaginal figure. And there can be a sexual penetration, or there could be just an entering into the being. Because the imaginal object, with the stimulation of the soul-making dynamic, as we said before—the image gets deeper, wider, more complex, more multi-dimensional, more multifaceted. Sometimes in allowing that to happen, it's as if we enter into the imaginal other, as if they've become to us a territory, a soul landscape. And I might enter into them through a—imaginal erotic penetration, or whatever, sexual penetration, or I might just enter into their eyes, into their soul, and their soul becomes for me a garden, becomes for me perhaps even a paradise.

So the image opens, gains dimensionality, and becomes available for us, and there's peace with that. I have something there. I have something priceless, in fact.

This is all very interesting. And it comes from going into the image, opening to the image, not stopping it, not putting it down, not turning away from it, and also the eros—allowing, opening, going into.

But there's much that's interesting here. When there is desire for us as human beings, when there is desire, I would say there's always operating, whether we're aware of it or not, conscious or unconscious, there's always operating a conception and an evaluation of that desire—a conception of the desire itself that's present, and an evaluation of it. So, for example: it's wholesome, it's unwholesome, it's part of the path, it's definitely not part of the path, it's a defilement, it's holy, it's neither this nor that, whatever. There's always some conception, some evaluation. And either that conception and evaluation of the desire allows us or supports our trusting the desire, its energy, its movement, allows us to see its beauty—or it doesn't allow that. It doesn't allow the trust. It doesn't allow the sense of beauty. So that's interesting too, and that's something we'll return to. What's the concept and the evaluation of the desire itself that's operating? We're going to come back to this a lot.

But as well as that, I wonder whether in some way or another, there's always a kind of projected anticipation or relationship with the having of the object of desire. There's always a projected relationship with the having of it. What I mean is this: desire, when we anticipate getting what we desire, or when we anticipate the consummation of a sexual desire or passion—that's quite a different experience, isn't it, than the desire where we project or anticipate not getting it? Or if it's coming from a feeling of lack, and we anticipate not being able to have this object that I desire, this one that I desire, whatever it is—how does that then shape the whole experience, colour, determine, direct the whole experience?

So those are the two obvious possibilities, but actually there are many more in terms of this projected relationship. What's my relationship with the idea or the anticipation of getting or not getting, being able to have or not being able to have? There are actually others which we'll go into—for example, realizing that I already have it in some way. We'll return to that and others.

But if we take that second possibility, the feeling of lack, or imagining, projecting that one can't have, one won't be able to have this object—sometimes one possibility is noticing that's what's happening and feeling the feelings with that, feeling the whole psychic constellation with that. Maybe it's frustration. Maybe it's some kind of feeling of inferiority.

I want to share something from someone's process that they are allowing me to share. It's a complicated scenario; I won't explain all the details. But this person, he writes—he was describing what happened with someone where there is a kind of boundary, and because of the boundary, and there was the desire, he said, "I felt a bit trapped in a mental and emotional space that somehow reminded me of a teenage feeling or sense I had as a teenager—that I couldn't reach her," this one that was desirable for him, his erotic beloved. "I couldn't reach her. She seemed really together and kind of cool and out of my class. She was out of my reach. It was as if a sheet of glass separated us. I could see her, but I was removed. I couldn't touch her." And in this, he said, "I felt inferior somehow."

This was not a very common pattern for him, but he recognized it from when he was a teenager and before. Somehow he felt inferior, not being able to have. She was somehow better than him, out of his class, out of his league. And then he would consolate into what he would do—go, as he put it, on his solitary and lonely way, kind of a tramp or an outcast, leaving alone. So there was pain and frustration.

Encouraging him to feel it, to really be with that and really feel the frustration, he said in his reporting, "Strong in my body—it was really strong in my body." But actually, with the allowing of it, it became strong eros as he was with it and felt it. And it turned very intense and beautiful.

He described—staying with the image, allowing the eros with the image, really feeling it in the body but staying with the image—and the image started to transform. He said, "Like a lion, I wanted to devour her, rip her flesh open with my teeth, tear her limbs apart." None of it angry or destructive. Don't make that mistake of assuming this is a kind of angry violence or destructive, or anything to do with rape or anything like that.

None of it angry or destructive, he writes, but deeply animal erotic. Holy, in its very particular, utterly non-ethereal way.

Reflecting on that word "devour" – it's probably not etymologically related to the word "devout," but there's something we can call, following Paul Kugler here, an archetypal psychologist, there's an archetypal resonance between clusters of words. Devour and devout. There's a holiness here. As he writes, holy in its very particular, utterly non-ethereal way.

So again, remember we were talking about the substantiality, the carnality of the image. This is a really carnal image, a substantial image. It's not light and airy, fairy and insubstantial. This one is utterly non-ethereal, he writes. It's immensely animalistic, potent, roaring, beautiful force.

In the image, he writes, "I lick her inside, her organs, her blood, tear her flesh, lick her brain – a lion, dominant, standing over its prey."

And again, prey, P-R-E-Y, and pray, P-R-A-Y. Is there some archetypal constellation in the very words here, in the poetry of the words, some connection in this case?

He continues: "Licking, gouging, feasting on her flesh and her juices and fucking her too deeply." So there's sexual and carnal, all of it. And he writes, "There's a particular kind of loving of her in all this too."

So it's, as I said, not violent. It's not just the anger of frustration. Something happened and it opened. And there's a particular – if for most people, a kind of unusual – kind of loving of her in all this. Very beautiful. It was very moving for him.

And the previous stuck sense of not being able to reach her, feeling inferior and frustrated – all that utterly dissolved and was replaced by an intense sense of connection through participating in the lived energetics of the image. So something, through really sticking with what was quite a difficult experience, constantly bringing the mindfulness, really bringing the skill and the art of practice with some help there, opened up this very kind, but very vital, very beautiful, and deeply holy image.

Now, it wouldn't have to be – the image could open up in any direction or with any kind of quality. We don't know. But there's something here: tracing the emotion, finding the difficulty, energy body, let the eros constellate, let the image fill out, and see what happens.

Now, sometimes – and I've touched on another point in relation to all this before, and you'll notice how it applies to that image I just shared – sometimes what happens with the erotic imaginal, or with eros, or with desire in our life, and also sometimes with devotion, is that there's an imbalance. A kind of constriction or block, as we've talked about in different ways, of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic. Or a better word is a block in a certain direction causing the whole thing to be out of balance. I'll explain what I mean.

With an image, with working with the erotic imaginal – again, whether it's sexual erotic or devotional erotic or whatever, that whole range of eros – what it needs to be balanced and to be unblocked, so to speak, in every direction of the expansion of the soul-making dynamic, what it needs is not just to see the beauty only of the beloved other, only of the erotic object, of the image of the other. Not just their beauty, because sometimes that's evident enough. Some people have this pattern where that's really evident, really clear. There's the beauty, there's the divinity, right there.

But also, for the sake of the balance and the sustainability and the opening of the soul-making dynamic, we also need to see the beauty of the self in that constellation. Not just the beauty of the other, the beloved other, the erotic imaginal object, but the beauty of the self, and the beauty of the self's eros, the self's passion. My eros, my passion is beautiful. Am I seeing it? Am I seeing the beauty of myself in this self-other imaginal constellation?

In that way, then, the soul-making dynamic, the eros-psyche-logos, doesn't collapse. It doesn't contract. It doesn't short-circuit or blow out. And some people, unfortunately, have almost a habit or a tendency not to see – just to see the beauty of the other, not to see the beauty of the self in that imaginal constellation, and of the self's eros and the self's passion.

But in order for the soul-making dynamic and the expansion and the eros to be sustainable, to be stable, to be fertile, in order for that to grow in the ways we were describing, and expand and mutually inseminate and deepen and widen – all that requires this kind of balance, balancing the sense of the beauty of the other with the sense of the beauty of the self and the self's eros.

So it's good to notice if there's a tendency or a habit one way or another. I suppose some people might have more sort of self-preoccupation and not see so much the beauty of the other. Someone might say, for instance, "I just see the beauty and the divinity in the other, and I don't see it in myself." And very quickly, those with certain psychological trainings might think, "Ah yes, well, trace it back to the relationship with the father, or relationship with the mother," whatever it is. Careful of the assumptions.

Perhaps that has something to do with it. Is it causal? Maybe, maybe, maybe. Just, let's have this openness of inquiry. Please, please. And then even if that is a part of it or part of the constellation there, or it is even partly causative, it still leaves open the question: What does it need? What does the soul-making need? What does, so to speak, health need here? And sometimes, again, it's allowing the image to do its thing, allowing it its fullness. So it's from exploring the image, from entering into it, from having it enter into us, from opening to it and having it open to us. Listening to the image.

So one thing is just noticing, in fact. Giving attention within the imaginal practice – so here's this beautiful, desirable, lovely, even divine other that there's so much eros and devotion towards. Can I notice, not taking the attention off the other, but widening the field of attention within the imaginal practice to the larger imaginal constellation? Can I notice and attend to the whole self-other constellation there, and notice what is the image of the self here? Can I watch it actually gain dimensionality as I include it in my awareness? Including it allows the self to take on imaginal dimensions, not be stuck in a certain narrow or concretized image, or the usual one, or whatever.

This is, if you like, the natural, organic desire or tendency of the soul-making dynamic, of the eros-psyche-logos movement. As we said, it wants to expand, deepen, widen, complicate, enrich, become multifaceted – all that. But it wants to expand and deepen and gain dimensions, if you like, in all directions. That means in the direction of the other, certainly, but also in the direction of the self and in the direction of the eros.

I'll read you something else which someone kindly gave me permission to share. This person was on retreat not too long ago. It's fairly long, but it's very instructive and very beautifully shared.

She was on retreat and settling in. Over those opening days, she noticed – I'll speak in the first person – she says, "I noticed my general experience that the citta was entering, it was like entering a deep well of sadness. The personal and global sadness that I had been carrying for some time. Here, on the retreat, it finally had no distractions under which to hide."

As she was out walking – a deep lover of nature, this woman – and she was out in the forest, "I felt some opening, even just to share this grief with the cold air and with the also silent trees." In our culture, this already would be called an imaginal perception of nature – to share this grief with the cold air and with the also silent trees. Can you hear how we consider that in our culture an imaginal perception?

"I stopped to literally hug one," so she actually hugged a tree, "and to linger there. Its depth and solidity pointed to a resource of strength that wouldn't be diminished by any offering to me." Again, the imaginal perception of the tree, the beauty of that, the resource of that.

"Gaining steadiness in movement, it's impossible to describe what a relief it was to go beyond, beyond even the prescribed trails at the property's northern edge. I was finally connecting to something wild, at least relatively so."

She had been working with a teacher on this, with Catherine, in fact. And she continues, "Yet as you" – meaning Catherine – "so helpfully observed in our meeting, the sense of belonging I had with nature was nonspecific. Loved I was by the forest, but simply as one of Gaia's countless children, all precious and regarded with universal affection."

She continues, "Returning that afternoon, properly worn out," she did some sitting meditation, "and there I was offered by my very personal benefactors all the love that was needed, and then some." So this is now imaginal meditation with certain imaginal figures from her life, some of whom were dead, but they are living in her as imaginal figures.

"In contrast to what I experienced in the forest, the love from these departed benefactors was very specific. My stepfather and my teacher, lover, friend, and my first lover – these three were there, and they each, in turn, heard and affirmed me. In all three cases, my lived experience was that they knew and loved the fullness of me, messy, complicated, wondrous me."

So the love there is very particular, not this general love that she had from the earth before. Very particular, very unique to her. The specificity, the uniqueness of herself is entering into the imaginal relationship, called into the imaginal relationship at that point with these three – what she's calling benefactors, imaginal figures.

She continues, "Over the next several days, as I was vigilant in honoring whatever sadness appeared, allowing it to fully be present and responding to whatever seemed to be needed, at this point the forms of sitting and walking seemed not just doable, but truly helpful." So she was getting more into the practice, helped by all this, by the way she was practicing with these images and being open to the pain.

So the image is not running away from the pain. It's a way of actually opening. The image is a portal to the pain. The pain is a portal to the image, and then to something much more.

The form is truly helpful, she wrote, though my walking path still had to be outdoors. I began to appreciate my heart for its insistence, its unyielding demand for my attention and rejection of the forms that would skip over its pain.

So she was really up for all this. But now, she continues, my extended walks into the forest were growing slowly and quietly in joy. It was on day seven of the retreat, and she reports something. She was getting ready to go outside for a walk, and then she says, so beautifully: "Like childhood friends at the front door, impatiently waiting on my presence to begin after-school play, the forest now seemed to be calling me—specifically me—out for a romp. Come out! Come play! Come back!" This is the forest talking to her. "OK, OK," my heart responded. "I'm lacing these snow boots as fast as I can."

She's already, by going into the image, by allowing the image, the uniqueness of herself has been called into that image that previously was more general and not unique.

And then she continues: "Following a different route but still heading north and beyond the trail boundaries, I came to a gentle micro-valley under a canopy of pines and was brought to the confluence of two small streams, a place flat and low with bright sun streaming through onto shapes and colours of such beauty. Rock, snow, dark earth, moss, water revealing and water reflecting. I stood on a squared-off stone elevated right at the stream's intersection and listened to their perfect sound, the sound of needs met. And then out of the quiet space of my mind came the sense: this place is happy. This place is happy in part because I'm here with it. We're together, enjoying this moment and one another, as each of us—rocks, waters, mosses, trees, me, creatures, bit of earth and bit of sky—brings our specific selves to this. We're friends, hanging out."

Very beautiful.

"On the way back to the retreat centre, a snowy clearing, brilliant white in the sun, called me over. A traipse through, and having reached the spot, laid out spread eagle. Through sparse branches I gazed up on the blue above..." And she continues, a very beautiful sharing.

So that's quite complex. There's a lot in that in terms of the points we're exploring. Let's draw out a few here.

First: love is there with the imaginal. In the imaginal is love. With imaginal perceptions there is love. Can we notice the love? I think I've said this before already on this retreat. It's there. Almost by definition, I would say. Love is part of the imaginal. Sometimes we don't notice it. Sometimes it's not obvious. Sometimes it's a kind of love that we're not used to—it's not a conventional sort of expression of love, so we almost miss it. But can we notice it? Can we feel into it? What is the quality of this love? What kind of love is it? Because it might not be conventional. There is love in the imaginal, with images, with imaginal perceptions. Can we notice it?

We love images. What is an image for us is something we love. And again, even that might not be obvious. But sometimes even less obvious is that the images love us. We love the images, and the images love us.

And this can open out—that's partly what happened in this yogi's story that she shared so beautifully. So how can we allow this? Not by closing down, saying, "Oh, it's not the same. I love them more than they love me," or whatever. Sometimes we can just open it, notice it, and that allows it to open. What we attend to, what we tune into, amplifies, gains life—like a flower unfolding its petals, its beauty, its radiance, through the light of our attention and our attunement and our sensitivity.

Sometimes how the whole love, in both directions, in the imaginal constellation opens out is actually by allowing yourself to feel and speak your love—even voice your love to the imaginal. But feeling your love, feeling your love of the imaginal other, the beloved other, you begin to feel again, if you open up, if you just stay noticing, stay attuned, stay sensitive, that the image loves you back. This is really, really important, really, really helpful.

And then—is it possible to dwell in that love? To open the heart, the being, the energy body, the soul, the psyche to that love? And maybe it comes through the gaze. We'll talk about this in the instructions: the gaze of the imaginal other, or lover, or figure of love, or whatever.

And there can be so much healing in this—so much healing in being loved, in feeling loved, in recognizing that one is loved. So much healing, so much beauty there, so much resource and nourishment.

And it's not always easy, sometimes, to open to or to be, if you like, under the gaze—even a gaze that's full of love, that is nothing but love, that's intense with love. It's not always easy. It's interesting. It's complex.

Sometimes that's complex for people because there's a shame, and even a fear, or certainly a discomfort at being seen deeply. And this gaze of the imaginal other—whether it's a person in a life that we're perceiving imaginally, or just an intra-psychic image—there's a shame, or fear, or discomfort at being seen. And something in a person wants to flee from that, wants to refuse it, or just can't take it in.

So sometimes there's an ambivalence. One longs to be seen so deeply—is there a longing to be seen, and to be seen deeply? And there's a fear of being seen because of the shame. And what happens with these two opposite, conflicting forces? Sometimes all kinds of contorted and painful and strange manifestations, determining the behavior, because we've got these two conflicting forces—and what we do in terms of public attention and all kinds of things there. It's complex.

Maybe one of the options—I mean this is complex, I'm not going to go so much into it now—but maybe just to say this, because it's in the line of the theme we're exploring: maybe actually one can ask, if that is the case, "Here I'm trying to open to the gaze of the imaginal other, but actually that's quite difficult too—the loving gaze, even that's difficult to open to. So what does the imaginal other do in response to my ambivalence? In response to my fear? In response to my shame? What do they say to us? This image, this imaginal figure—what do they do? What is, if you like, their wisdom and their wise and loving response in response to our ambivalence, our fear, our closing off, our refusal, our fleeing?"

In that story I shared just now from the yogi, there was a kind of inequality in the love, and that was partly what was painful for her. The image loved her, if you like—in this case, the image of the earth or the trees. They loved her, but in this general way. She was just one of countless of Gaia's children, I think is how she put it—just a sort of generic universal love, if you like, emanating from nature. It's still imaginal. But in contrast, she was in love with the earth. She was in love with particular trees and their uniqueness. So there was this kind of imbalance of the general versus the uniqueness, and also of simply loving versus being, so to speak, in love.

In that respect too, because of that imbalance, we could say, in terms of our theory, that the eros-psyche-logos dynamic was blocked, relatively speaking, in one direction—in the direction from the image to her. The eros, the imaginal, was filling out and flowing out, penetrating deeply, richly, multi-dimensionally in one direction, but it was more stifled, not completely blocked but more stifled, in the direction towards the self.

But as she, using other images and hanging out with the images—not going away from the emotion and working with it, in this case over some days (it may take longer, may take much shorter, anything's possible here)—working with it, the love of the image for her unique self opened. It was her that the forest was impatient for: "Come out and play! You! We want to play with you!"—and her beauty, her uniqueness. So the sense of self there, the uniqueness of the self, was called into the image and given—it becomes an object of very specific love.

There's a quality of balancing of the two loves there. Her love for the trees is now balanced by the trees' love for her. Not just general love both ways, but unique love for uniqueness—love for particularities, particular loves flowing now both ways, not just one way.

And with all that, eventually, the images' love, if you like, becomes eros. So the forest—we could say the forest, in this case the trees—eventually has not just love for her, but erotic love for her. In other words, the self becomes an erotic object. The self can become an erotic object for myself, in the way that I look at myself, or in the way that it feels, I sense, that the image is looking at me. I become alive. Self, this unique self, becomes alive as an erotic object, becomes an erotic beloved other even—either to myself or to the image.

And so in that, because eros and image go together, the self comes alive as an image. And because dimensionality is part of image, as we keep stressing, and dimensionality starts to shade into the divine dimensions, the self comes alive as image—and it gains dimensionality and it gains divinity eventually—maybe suddenly, maybe just gradually, there's a gradual transition. And this is coming in the image, in the imaginal practice, or even from the image.

So there are two aspects to that story I shared. There's the aspect of love and the opening of love and the opening to love. And also the inclusion of the self and the opening of that self in its imaginal dimensions. The inclusion of the self and the opening of the self. The opening to love and the opening of love. Different aspects, all mixed into one there. I could give countless examples of this kind of thing.

Again, what it means for our practice and for this question of balance and artistry and sustainability and fertility, for tending the fire and mastery of the fire and the vessel—it means that the object, and the self, and the world (and that's where the cosmopoiesis comes in, in terms of the imaginal perception of the world), all these three—object, self, and world—actually, and eros too, because we said that before, the four: object, self, world, and eros, need to be included. Included in the soul-making dynamic, included. They're part of the imaginal constellation, and we need to let the imaginal constellation open to really, really spill over and involve them and include those dimensions—the world and the self, as well as the other—in our attention, in our attunement, in our sensitivity and opening. So opening to the other, the self, and the world as images. That brings balance.

If you can imagine a soul-making dynamic, this expansion of eros, psyche, and logos, if it expands in one direction and not in the other direction, it's lopsided, it's out of balance. It wants to organically expand in all directions, if you like, equally. Again, talking about in imaginal practice, but also in relationship, because deep relationships are imaginally infused. They have imaginal dimensions. If they don't, they become problematic for us.

Now, when I say opening to the other, self, world, eros as images, it means, as always, as a reminder now: not reified and not identified with. Seeing image as image.

Sometimes I encounter someone where there is a sense—a very strong, beautiful, palpable sense—of the divinity of the other and also the self. So there's a balance there, but unfortunately, oftentimes the images, the divinity in the image, is not seen as image. Image is not seen as image. Rather, it's reified. And then, in the case of someone I'm particularly thinking of, what happens is she moves between a kind of self-elevation and a self-hatred—the two reified poles of this dynamic. Moving into the sense of divinity of the self. Okay, great, the self is included. It's not just the other. There's not just divinity outside of me. But there's a kind of elevation there. She's buying into it, or she's reifying it. And then that swings to a kind of self-hatred and shame. The images are literalized. There's a kind of bipolarism, you could say, operating there because of the reification, because image is not understood as image. It's not understood to be empty.

Sometimes a person says something like, "I'm really into emptiness practice. I'm really attracted to it, and it goes really well for me. But then I begin to see everything as empty, and this whole insubstantiality of everything—I feel like I'm flying. I feel like I'm invincible." And that goes into something that psychologists might diagnose as almost a kind of mania, a unipolar manic episode. And then people will say, "Oh, I need to go out and do some gardening and dig some earth and stomp around in my wellingtons and kick around in the soil. Definitely practice emptiness less, or practice less in general, because it's all getting out of hand. Too much emptiness."

Is that the only option? Is that what really needs to happen? Is that even the correct diagnosis of the problem—too much emptiness? Is it actually that when a person says "I see everything as empty," actually you've seen everything empty except one thing? That invincible self is the thing left out of the emptiness. The whole world is empty and everyone else is empty, and this invincible self, unfortunately, is reified, is believed in and identified with, is taken to be real, not seen as image, not seen as empty.

Actually, you could say it needs more emptiness. The emptiness, the sense of image as image, needs to be pervading equally the self as well as the world. This kind of imbalance or lack of pervasion is very, very common. And what a person might have, for example, is a whole fantasy or elevation of a fantasy or an image of, say, Passion, or a passionate person, or being a passionate person. Another might have a similar fantasy around being a more equanimous person – a standard, common image of what a good Buddhist looks like, or what an awakening person looks like. Sort of really equanimous. And sometimes there's not the seeing of image as image.

The image itself has gotten stuck, become a little bit rigid. Not only is there attachment to it, but it's actually stuck. It's prevented from expanding and having its multidimensionality in life. So often it's in allowing the image its multidimensionality that it actually loses its reification. It's in allowing the image its fullness that it loses its reification, because we see its multidimensionality and allow it to have that. Oftentimes it's precisely this that allows us to let go of the reification, the identification.

Sometimes we are shrinking, rigidifying an image, or shrinking ourselves to try and fit into some rigid image. It could be passion, it could be equanimity, like I said, but an image is bigger than an emotion. So again, it's letting the image fill out, making sure image is image, and not something rigid, concretized, literalized.

We can ask in imaginal practice – whether purely intrapsychic or in relation to someone in our life who is involved in this imaginal constellation – who is it? Who is this beloved other? Because I can reduce the image to a flat, one-dimensional person, but who is the self as well? One thing you can do is say: there's Eros, there's this imaginal thing going on, and who, actually, just gently – who am I right now? Who is the self in this image? Who is the one participating in this imaginal constellation with an other, and who is the other?

In asking that, we allow self to become image, or we notice what the image of self is, who is participating in this image. It may be the usual sense of self that we have – it's me, it's Rob, it's whoever – but it gains imaginal dimensions through being included in the imaginal practice. Or it may be that it bears very little similarity to the usual self. But who? We can ask who as a gentle way of including the self. Or just look.

With all this we're talking about, we're talking about navigation. Navigating, balancing, responding, climbing, gliding. One possibility, if we speak generally now, is that in practice, working with an image in our life or in our practice on the cushion, we can tune in with sensitivity and notice and follow what is autonomously emerging or given in and with the image. In other words, we're not doing anything. We're just tuning, noticing, and following – trusting, if you like, the soul intelligence of the image, or in the image.

At other times, or to a certain extent, we can do something slightly different, have a different kind of tack, a different relationship with the imaginal practice, where we're deliberately leaning or inclining or gently, subtly guiding the practice in all kinds of different directions if we want. So, for example, with an erotic beloved other in the imaginal, guiding it toward a kind of melting union with that other, with the beloved other, with the erotic object – dissolving perhaps in light or love or whatever it is. Essentially, it's towards less fabrication through the erotic connection, but actually allowing it to go towards this melting union.

That's one option. You can lean that way, or let it go that way if it wants to. But you can also modulate that movement, temper that movement with practice, with skill, so that it goes only a little bit of the way towards that union and towards less fabrication – only to a relative degree of insubstantiality of the perception of materiality. There's a little bit of fading, but actually the forms are retained. The particularities and the uniqueness and the shape or character of self and other, of the two beings of the image, is retained. But they become lighter and more insubstantial. You can play with this spectrum with practice – modulating that, choosing where you'll hang out on that spectrum.

You can experiment with colors – adding, or seeing what color the other wants to be, or your own body, or the interaction, or the breath. We played with that a little bit on the Poetry of Perception retreat. You can deliberately tune into giving and receiving healing, different kinds of healing, or different kinds of the brahmavihāras – mettā, or compassion, or muditā, different kinds of love. You can emphasize the sensitivity and exploration of the energy body, or the particular sense of sacredness, or the particular sense of divinity, or the particular cosmopoiesis that's spilling over, or the particular kind of love.

And something we'll come back to in the instructions as well: sometimes with an image, with the Eros there, there is a sense of duty. A duty that either one of the imaginal characters has, or the self has, and it translates in some way or another to my life – or it doesn't. There's some kind of sense of duty. And again, that could be what you incline towards and draw out through your attention, through delicately focusing on that. It's the duty.

So it's not without the energy body—the energy body is always there. It's not without an awareness of the emotions; that's always there. There's a certain fundamental inclusion of these aspects. But we're talking about the relative balancing of where you put the attention, what you draw out through the attention, what you dwell on, what you focus on.

And so with the sense of duty: Whose duty? Who is the character here, the imaginal character who feels this duty, who carries out this duty? What is the duty? And it doesn't mean necessarily figuring out what it means, like the practical steps I need to take in my life. Just staying with the more imaginal, the pregnant, the depth and the beauty of the feeling of duty. Maybe it constellates an image, or the image changes. Maybe it constellates a sense of devotion. And that's a feeling, that feeling of devotion.

Often, if we notice it, allowing the sense of devotion brings an alignment in the energy body. We're aligned with that devotion to that duty. There's a great beauty here, great depth, great power and strength without any hardness. But that alignment of the energy body is itself a state of balance—and we're talking all about balance here. It's also a state of rootedness. I'm rooted in what I'm devoted to. I'm rooted in my duty because the energy body is aligned there with it. And you can actually feel the energy body rooted in something deep. It becomes almost unshakable. Again, there's a kind of equanimity emerging from the imaginal, from the erotic-imaginal.

So all these deliberate inclinations, plus all the ones we mentioned before toward samādhi or mettā, all of that's possible—anything like that we've mentioned before is possible. You can get this sense of how great a range, and a subtly differentiated range, there is of where you can incline. Like a ship on the open water, or a boat on the open water, or a bird in the sky gliding on the air currents. There's potentially, at least, dependent on the skill, an almost infinite degree of precise directionality available—360 degrees—and also depth, up and down, and all that.

Let's point out a few more directions, dimensions, that are available here with imaginal practice—if we're allowing the image and allowing the eros. I'm going to mention four right now.

If we allow the image and enter into it, open to it, let it open, and the eros, then it's possible that we either start to discover certain dimensions of the imaginal, or, again, we can almost look for them, or incline toward deliberately resurrecting them from the experience before, or whatever.

So the first of these four I'd like to enumerate now is that we see and feel the desire—and whatever the specificity of that desire is, it might be the desire for sex or certain sexual interaction or something, a kiss or this or that, or something non-sexual, whatever. We see and feel the specific desire as what William Blake called a "divine influx." He used that word somewhere or other—a kind of idea of the emotions that we feel as divine influxes.

And what happens when we decide to see something, or we start perceiving something, as a divine influx? In this case, desire. This very specific desire. What happens if I sense it, see it, feel it, in all its specificity, as divine influx? In other words, it's not, as we would usually assume, that this desire I'm feeling is mine—not that usual perspective. But actually, that the desire, this very specific desire, is coming from or given by God, if we use that word, divinity, whatever word you want to use. It's flowing through me, or flowing through us, if it's mutual with someone else.

Again, we're talking about a conception here, but one that needs to be translated to a perception. Conceptions on their own, disembodied, abstract—not much help at all. This conception: this desire that I'm feeling right now, I'm in touch with my energy body, I'm in touch with desire, I'm in touch with the image, all of that—can I perceive it? Either I notice or I discover that it is, or I deliberately see it as a divine influx. It's coming from the divine, from a God, flowing through me. And then what happens? Again, there's an opening, because you're opening up another dimension of the imaginal.

And because there's an opening of the psyche and the logos there, there's space to tolerate. There can even be an increase of the eros with that, but there's space there, and peace.

So that's one possibility: seeing and feeling the desire as a divine influx. A second, which I alluded to briefly before, is this: can I notice that which is desired—whatever it is, this kiss, this wanting to dance with you, whatever it might be, even some very intense sexual desire, sexual or not—can I notice that which is desired may be perceivable as already happening? It's already happening. Not on the actual physical level, so to speak, but it's already happening on the imaginal level, eternally, in what Henri Corbin calls hierophantic time. Hierophantic means the appearance of the sacred. So in sacred time, we could say, which isn't a time that flows past, present, future—it's almost like images exist as icons, eternally. There's just this discrete icon and that discrete icon. They may have connections, but they're not temporal connections of cause and effect, this coming before that.

One can get a sense, when one feels deeply into an image and opens deeply to an image, that this thing, this desire—you're also an imager connected—that which I desire, the image of that which I desire, is perceivable as already happening on the imaginal level, eternally, timelessly, in hierophantic time. Again, we're talking about a conception, not something abstract, but a conception that is a seed in the perception and becomes a way of looking. Conception needs to be translated to perception. I actually perceive this as already happening, this image of this desire that I would like fulfilled.

And again the question as well: who? Who is it who is kissing this image, who is dancing, who is making love in hierophantic time? Who is it that's eternally making love in that way? And again, seeing in this way, that level of imaginal perception opens up and the problem goes out of the whole thing—the problem of desire. It may have felt quite problematic, quite intense, quite hard to tolerate, and it goes out of it. A whole other dimension is added with that, all the beauty and fullness, all the richness, all the divinity.

A third possibility, a kind of subtle variation of those two, is that the desire that I'm feeling and the self, the image of the self, and the image of the other are all theophanies. The desire, the self, and the other are all theophanies. They are all faces of the divine, or if you like, parts of one larger theophany. So it's not, as in the first one, that the desire is the deity's desire or the Buddha's desire for his consort. It's not that desire is this God's desire, but that the desire itself is divine, or is an aspect of divinity. It's a very subtle difference, but you can play with this. And again, if I can see that way, sense that way, perceive that way imaginatively, then there's space, there's beauty, and all the peace that comes with that.

The fourth, for right now, is that the whole constellation—in other words, the object desired, the image of the self desiring, and the desire itself, the whole imaginal constellation of the eros—is seen, felt, perceived as God making love to herself or himself. The whole constellation: object desired, image of the self desiring (who is this one that desires?), and the desire—all of it is God making love to her or himself.

Recall the image of those Buddha figures on thangkas or mandalas: this or that Buddha, whoever it is, or the different Buddhas in yab-yum, in erotic union, making love with their consort. The Buddha there is regarded as not just this Buddha and his consort—the Buddha is the totality of the male and the female figure. The consort and the Buddha together are the Buddha. So the whole thing, the whole constellation, is God making love to herself or himself, this or that Buddha making love to her or himself. Can I find that way in, see that way, sense that way, perceive that way?

For some of you, this is going to sound like you could never do that. Actually, this is all available with practice, maybe a lot easier than you suppose. But then the self is not as it usually is regarded—the self as the basic actor, the basic desirer. Basically it's me desiring. And the other is not, in this imaginal perception, this dimension, what it seems to conventional perception. But be careful with this, because it's not that the self and the other are just empty. It's not only that they're empty, or that they're divine in some kind of universal way, or that they're partaking of, or essentially are, universal love or universal awareness or beingness or whatever version of universal oneness. It's not that they're only empty, and it's not that they're just universally divine. Nor is it that the desire is only anattā, not-self.

If desire comes up for me and I regard it as anattā, and I keep that practice—just not me, not mine—focusing on the desire and regarding it as not me, not mine, what actually happens is the desire fades.

One has not erased the eros. One has kept it, actually taken it deeper. Nor the image, nor the other, nor the self. These things are given other dimensions.

So, looking in this way, learning to look in these ways—I'm just offering a few possibilities in practice, again—but with all of this, craving, contraction, dukkha dissolve. Soul-making, and the sense of beauty and sacredness and all that, increases. Because the eros-psyche-logos dynamic is allowed to expand and to open up new dimensions in that expansion. Beauty, soul-making, sense of divinity, sacredness—all of that.

CHAPTER 68

Wisdom, Art, Balance (Part 5)

Rob Burbea · 25 min

> In this fifth part of his series on wisdom, art, and balance, Rob Burbea delves into the subtle art of navigating attention within imaginal practice to maintain sustainability and fertility in dharma work. He addresses the crucial distinction between intensity and potency, explaining how scattered attention can create impressive but ultimately unproductive experiences, while balanced awareness generates genuine transformation and soul-making.
> Burbea explores the delicate balance between heart-centered awareness and imaginal perception, using practical examples to illustrate how practitioners can avoid getting captivated by one aspect at the expense of others. He discusses working skillfully with sexual energy as it arises in practice, showing how mindful attention to the whole energy body can transform such energy into bliss and deeper samādhi states. The talk examines the choice between moving toward union and dissolution versus maintaining erotic tension and otherness, each opening different dimensions of mystical participation and holiness.
> The teaching concludes with a framework for checking whether all three centers—belly (energy body), heart (emotion and imaginal perception), and head (conceptual logos)—are involved and connected in practice. Burbea emphasizes how conceptual frameworks serve as vessels that contain and support the soul-making process, providing orientation, trust, and stability essential for navigating the three degrees of fabrication in contemplative work.

A few more things here. We're talking about balance, sustainability, and fertility in the practice—ensuring, guarding, supporting, and encouraging these qualities through the art and artfulness of our practice.

One aspect of this worth mentioning is the navigation between or the emphasis of attention in imaginal practice, and noticing what captivates or captures the attention. What's my personal tendency or your personal tendency, if there is one? My personal pattern, your personal pattern or habit for the attention to keep getting captivated by this element or that aspect of the whole soul-making constellation or movement? This is really, really important, because again, what can happen is the attention gets captivated by something, and all the energy funnels along there, and all the growth funnels along there, and it can be just lopsided.

If you have an image of more like a sphere expanding, or let's put it in two dimensions, a circle wanting to expand in all directions and get bigger, and instead, for different reasons, it's only expanding in one direction, the whole thing tips. That's not sustainable. There's not balance there and it won't be fertile.

I was working with someone the other day who exemplified this pattern. For her, the attention might get funneled, captured, or receive undue emphasis—an imbalanced emphasis towards the heart or the energy around the heart, constellating in the heart with the eros and the love, at the expense of the imaginal. We've talked about the other imbalance where one is lost in the image without the awareness of the emotional resonances and the energy body resonance. Here was an example of the other direction, and I think it was her tendency.

So pointing it out and offering the possibility—what do you see happening here with the attention being captured by all the fire and heat and energy coming up into the heart area in the energy body? The very attention was intensifying that; the constriction of the attention was intensifying the energy there until the whole thing felt like it was getting overexcited—like some flame or a circuit when you blow a fuse. It was going to dissipate in that way or become way out of balance or just disperse.

One option is to open up the energy body awareness and have the whole body involved. We'll return to that. Or, and in this case, what I gently guided towards was not taking the attention off what was happening in the heart and in the whole energy body, but actually just redressing the balance a little bit, giving a little bit more attention to the image. It's almost like the image tended to get lost there with all the captivation of the attention in the heart area and the energy. So just giving a little bit more attention to the image, letting that become more alive and prominent, still aware of the heart and the energy body, and also taking care to balance both—in this case, not just the self, what's happening with me.

I am becoming this in the image, and there was a sort of captivation with that at the expense of the other. So there was an example that was also a little bit imbalanced in an unusual way towards the self and forgetting the other a little bit. Still aware of the heart and the energy body, taking care of the balance between self and other, but giving a little more attention to the image. Then the kind of over-intensity that was gathering in the heart and feeling too uncomfortable—like it was just going to blow—could calm a little bit.

Actually, there was less intensity but more potency. This is a really important distinction: the distinction between intensity and potency. When we work that way, instead of a fuse just being blown because it was too much intensity, or instead of it just being really intense and thinking, "Wow, that was amazing," and then actually not much happening in terms from the point of view of soul-making and shifts or openings of the psyche and of the perception of the world—actually the spreading of the intensity and the opening so that all that energy could go into other domains like the imaginal made the whole experience richer, deeper and more potent. In other words, it made a difference to the soul.

Don't—this is a general point now—confuse intensity and potency. Intensity is very attention-grabbing and looks very impressive and feels very impressive. It doesn't always translate as potency. Sometimes what is intense can be potent, and sometimes what is potent is really not that intense. There's a more general point there, but there's also this question of the relative emphasis of attention. In this case, we're talking between the heart and the energy body on one hand and the image on the other. All this has to do with balancing and leaning one way, responding to what's happening.

As we're talking about energy, let's talk about sexual energy. Of course, fantasies, images that come into the mind can bring sexual energy with them—lost in a sexual daydream, even something like that, brings sexual energy, sexual arousal. The other way around, we can feel sexual arousal and it constellates some kind of fantasy or daydream or image. When that's the case, actually, one option is to give some attention to the sexual energy.

Oftentimes what happens when we're not mindful is that we get lost in the image in a not mindful way, so it's not really imaginal then, and the sexual energy is just contracted, perhaps genitally or in some area of the body. So give some emphasis of attention to the sexual energy, but in the whole energy body. Really emphasize the whole energy body and really feel what happens if I allow that sexual energy—really allow it in the body and open to it and let it open. Oftentimes it will then spread if we allow it and open to it and open the space for it. It will spread like a gas to fill that space, fill the whole energy body. Really feel it and let yourself enjoy that energy. Let yourself enjoy the sexual energy, opening to it, feeling it, mindful of it in the body.

What can happen is the sexual energy transubstantiates or transforms into bliss. It just becomes rapturous energy or pīti. There's a close connection between sexual energy and pīti, and opening to it that way, and feeling it, and really letting yourself feel it. So we're talking about really an open, skillful mindfulness of the sexual energy in the whole energy body, and it can transform to bliss, and then you can do all kinds of different things with the bliss if you want to go into samādhi or whatever.

But let's be clear: if I'm caught up in an image, whether sexual or otherwise, that's not the imaginal. And if I'm not aware of the energy body, that's also not imaginal. It's not eros then, because it won't be stimulating the soul-making. It's just craving.

Yet even if something arises as what seems like mere fantasy or sexual craving—some agitating sexual energy—there's a possibility to work with the image, to allow it to become imaginal. An image that begins in the superficial sense can actually transform. I can enter into relationship with this image in a way that makes it imaginal, allows it to become imaginal, and then the soul-making and the psyche-logos dynamic can get involved and start to expand in relation to that image.

But imaginal practice for us includes not just the dimensionality and sensitivity with the image, but also the mindfulness of the energy body and the soul-making resonances. There's always the possibility of navigating, of responding skillfully, no matter how something starts. You might just feel this agitated sexual energy, uncomfortable, or encounter an image that seems like nothing more than a sexual daydream. The possibilities of navigating—we can really develop our skill, our art here with all this.

Let me amplify something I mentioned before and draw it out again for the sake of an important point. Sometimes the image may want to, or we can incline it toward, this movement where there's an erotic beloved, some erotic object, and there's a movement or inclination toward merging, melting together into union.

One possibility is we simply allow that to go toward union—we navigate in that direction so there is this melting together into oneness. There's, technically speaking, less fabrication at that point, less fabrication in the perception of forms, and we can dissolve into that oneness to a profound degree.

But there's an alternative. We're talking about navigation, steering, inclination—choices in imaginal practice. We can actually keep the eros in the way that it constellates and retains the twoness that we've discussed several times, keeping the images alive. In other words, the images don't just melt into light or diffuse into undifferentiated love. You're actually sustaining the erotic tension, sustaining the twoness and the otherness and the particulars of the images.

I won't say that's always best, but other doorways and dimensions are opened through retaining that erotic tension—the twoness, the otherness, and the image, and the particularity of the image. Because in that erotic constellation that doesn't dissolve into oneness, we actually experience a different kind of holiness—different kinds of holiness.

We can experience and have the perception, the imaginal perception, of participation—participation in the dimensions of divinity, of the cosmos. And that's different from oneness. Not just a oneness of essence, a melting into that, which is wonderful in its own right, but participation is something different, actually richer. There are infinite varieties and infinite depths and dimensions and facets of participation, whereas onenesses tend to be simpler and more limited.

There are dimensions and beauty to the perception—the deep, almost endlessly infinite perceptions of participation, mystical participation where this image and my participation in this image echoes something and participates through echoing or mirroring something more cosmic or divine. We'll return to this.

But for that echoing and for that participation, uniqueness is necessary. It's not just a oneness of essence, a dissolving of the particularities into one universal substance of love or awareness or light or being. Actually, my uniqueness or the uniqueness that pertains to the self and the other, and this kind of love and this kind of eros in the image—the uniquenesses in the image are necessary to participation in a way that they're not to a sense of oneness.

There's a whole different direction and dimensionality of sense of holiness. But there's always the question of balance and the possibilities here, this infinitely gradated shift of emphasis and inclination and navigation.

So an image may go toward melting, and then there's a sense of the energy body melting, and I could take that into samadhi and actually let the image go. That's possible. Or the image goes toward the melting and union, I feel that in the energy body, but I choose to modulate it. As we mentioned before, I kind of linger at some point, or stop it at some point, perhaps at the edge of where there is the imaginal form and the formless. Just lingering around that edge where things are very insubstantial. There are all kinds of possibilities here.

But there is something that we get through the retaining of the twoness—the retaining of the erotic other and the otherness and the particularities—that we don't get in more commonly described or conveyed teachings about mystical experiences and directions.

Another way of putting partly what we've just been through—another way of dividing it up—is that in everything we've talked about, we can think about or play with the shifting of the relative weight or emphasis of attention. For example, on the desire itself, on the energy of the desire, or on the inquiry into the desire: this deep questioning of what am I really wanting here?

We can put the weight of attention on the energy of the desire, or the weight of attention on the image—and this includes the image of the other, of the self, of the world, and the cosmic dimension of the eros itself—or equally between those. This opens up the sense of dimensionality and divinity. What's the relative weight with those compared with the energy body? And if it's the energy body, is it a particular center I'm working with—the heart, or the throat, or the lower belly—or the whole energy body?

And again, what's the relative emphasis on the sense of love and the kinds of love? Or the emotional difficulty that one might be feeling. It doesn't have to be at all, but any difficulty there. But it might be a sense of lack, or the desire itself is difficult, or some other emotion there.

So we can think about this kind of relative emphasis of the weights of the attention. It's all in the field, but what are we emphasizing more or less at any time in that balance there?

Another way to approach the whole question of balance, another kind of way in, a way to divide it up, is we could also ask ourselves or check, again, at any time, or just more in general: are my three centers—my belly, my heart, and my head—are all three centers involved? Here's this desire, here's this eros with the imaginal, whether it's an actual person or an intrapsychic image—are my three centers involved? Are they all open? And are they connected with each other?

So is my belly and my center of sexuality connected with my heart? Is my heart connected with my head? But really, that's fine as a way of talking, but what we're talking about there, for me, when we talk about the belly center, it's really the body, the energy body. So again, it's like saying, is my energy body involved? Is it open? Is it connected with the other dimensions of my being?

The heart has two meanings. Metaphorically, it's not just that place in the middle of your chest, although it includes that, of course. But it's also my emotion. So is my emotional awareness and sensitivity and care involved? Is it open? Are my emotions open? Are they connected, as I said, these different aspects or dimensions of our being?

Heart has a second meaning in some traditions, as I think I mentioned: as actually more equivalent to the organ of the soul's perception, the organ of imaginal perception. So in other words, is the image—have I forgotten about the image? Or is that involved, included? Is it open? Am I opening to it? Is it connecting with the energy body and all that? Is the energy body connecting with the imaginal and all that?

And then the head, for me, that really refers to the logos. Am I aware of what conceptions are operating? What's the conceptual framework that is actually in play?

This doesn't necessarily need a huge amount of cogitation and thinking and all that stuff, but there is conception operating, as I said, all the time. It's part of soul-making, it's part of imaginal practice, it's part of eros. And is that included? Is what's going on there in the mind—it's not only the brain located in the head, head center doesn't just mean the head center—but is the conceptuality included? Am I aware of it? Am I including it? Can I shape it? Can I respond with it? Is it connected? Is it open? Is it involved?

One very basic thing in relation to concept and the part that has, the conceptual framework in all this: am I clear, for instance, in relation to navigation? Am I clear about the distinction between, and am I clear in how I'm navigating between the three degrees of fabrication, if you like? Remember this from, I think it was the last retreat or the retreat before.

In other words, we can navigate towards, steer towards a lessening of fabrication into samādhi or mettā or different kinds of oneness or towards the unfabricated. Beautiful, really important steering. We can just approach things with a kind of mindfulness or bare attention, which is just a little bit less fabrication than a usual state of consciousness. That's really helpful, really skillful at times, it's part of our practice—but heaven forbid that it become the whole of the practice. But it's an option and it's helpful for some things.

Or we're engaging in the art of fabrication, if you like, the more tantric practice of skillful fabrication, soul-making fabrication. So it's three degrees: towards the unfabricated, the so-called bare attention or mindfulness—a sort of midpoint, if you like—and there's the skillful fabrication of the imaginal soul-making.

So just be clear about that and clear what we're doing at any point and where we're headed, and is it deliberate, and is that where we want to go right now?

But just to say right now, and this is what I want to pick up in the next talk, that the conceptual framework—so I was talking about belly, heart, and head, and head really for me I'm saying is conceptual framework—just to say how important that is. Actually, the conceptual framework that's operating at any time, and there will always be one, even if you don't know what it is and if it's vague or it's unclear, even if it's confused, the conceptual framework operating at any time can potentially be really, really supportive. It can be something that supports the movement of the eros and the opening of the imaginal practice and the soul-making. It contains something. And we need—if we go back to the image of the vessel—vessel is containment.

And one of the ways this whole practice is contained in a good way that allows it to be soul-making, allows the fire to heat up the material in the alchemical analogy, is that the conceptual framework contains and creates, is part of creating a vessel.

The conceptual framework works as a map to guide us. And out of all this, it allows trust because I have a conceptual framework. I have a sense of orientation, containment, support, guidance. It brings trust, balance, stability.

Yes, there is this breaking of the vessels that can happen at certain points and the stretching of the vessels and the shattering of the vessels from the Kabbalistic mythology. And that has its important place. But generally speaking, conceptual frameworks are really, really helpful.

And this is what I want to explore in the next talk, if we're still talking about navigation and vessels—this whole aspect of things. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 69

Logos in the Garden of Souls (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h01

> In this opening talk from the "Eros Unfettered" series, Rob Burbea delves into the essential relationship between conceptual frameworks (logos) and the practice of soul-making. Using organic metaphors of trees and gardens, he demonstrates how logos functions not as abstract theory but as embodied structure that supports and enables the flowering of eros and soul-making.
> Burbea addresses the mutual dependent origination between concept and experience, showing how conceptual frameworks operate even in non-discursive states and are always present when there is any fabricated experience. He outlines the extensive requirements for a robust Dharma-based conceptual framework that can account for the spectrum of fabrication, emptiness of all phenomena, ways of looking, the imaginal, embodiment, relationships, death, beauty, and divinity.
> Crucially, he acknowledges that conceptual frameworks are historically and culturally situated while maintaining their vital function in navigation and meaning-making. The talk explores how the eros-psyche-logos dynamic creates as much as it discovers, leading to the divinization of experience through dimensionality. Burbea emphasizes the need to avoid epistemicide—the killing of ways of knowing—while building frameworks that support fertility and expansion rather than reductive dogma.

So let's continue in our circling motion, our circling movement between the different elements and facets of this whole area that we're trying to open up of eros and soul-making. And continue our weave back and forth, revisiting certain of those elements and weaving them together with others back and forth like a loom.

I mentioned that I would like to say more about the whole aspect of conceptual framework and draw that in and draw that out more. So I hope it's obvious that any path that we wish to walk down—spiritual path, psycho-spiritual path, whatever—and any set of practices that form part of that path, that path and those practices need some kind of undergirding in a conceptual framework, a logos that holds them together, that puts them in relationship to each other, that makes sense of them, gives them direction.

So they go together; they are indispensable to each other. A conceptual framework is indispensable to a path. And as such it forms, in a way, a map or part of a map of where that path is trying to go. It helps in the navigation—that's what we were talking about before, navigation. What is the art of navigation with all these practices? The conceptual framework is very much a part of that at many different levels.

One level is a kind of macro level, the other level is moment-to-moment. The conceptual framework, our understanding of that, informs our moment-to-moment decisions and responses in practice. In practice, in life, we are constantly meeting, encountering a new situation, a new moment with a new experience, or this or that coming to the fore. And the question is, how should I respond? How should I navigate in relation to what is coming up, in relation to where I want to go? All of that is informed by the larger conceptual framework.

Conceptual framework or logos also makes sense. We need something to make sense, or part of us needs something to make sense of our experiences, of the whole notion of the path, of our life. Conceptual framework is part of that. It offers that, it contributes to that. Actually, there's a whole other level in which it makes sense in the different meaning of the word. It makes sense. In other words, it makes experience. We'll come back to that.

But it forms for us a vessel, if we go back to that alchemical metaphor that we were drawing on. The conceptual framework forms a vessel, forms a structure that contains —we feel contained by, supported by—so that we can trust our movement on the path. Are we going in the right direction? We trust our experiences as they unfold, or we know what to trust. So in that sense, it gives us a sense of stability, support and stability, and that's part of balance, isn't it? So we're talking about navigating and finding balance with the eros, with the imaginal. So conceptual framework, logos, is part of what grounds us. It's a head thing. We say it's a head thing, but actually it grounds us. It gives us a foundation. It gives us a kind of scaffolding.

Now, especially if we're encountering intense experiences, but even if they're not intense, if we're just feeling ourselves move into what might be new territory, or edgy territory, if it's our edge, or if it's regarded by the mainstream of society, or whatever culture we're moving into—Dharma culture, or other, larger culture—as edgy or dangerous or ridiculous, then it's really, really supportive there in all of that grounding, foundation, scaffold, support, vessel. And eros and the imaginal and soul-making for a lot of people is edgy or is regarded as edgy and all that other stuff.

So in a way, to give a sort of image, metaphor for a conceptual framework, it's kind of like a trellis in a garden—a sort of wooden scaffolding that forms a support for a certain flower, maybe roses or something, to grow, and they grow along or up and wind their way along this trellis, and then they can flower, and they can have their beauty, and their beauty can be seen, and we can receive that. And the structure, the trellis, is providing a structure that's supportive and for the sake of all the beauty that flowers there.

So oftentimes we dismiss, or we want to get away from conceptual framework. We don't realize actually how supportive it is. Actually, a better analogy, even better than the trellis, would be for the roses in a rose garden—would be a tree, perhaps a fruit tree. The tree is its own structure: the roots, the trunk, the branches. We could say that the conceptual framework is like the structure of a tree. It forms a structure.

What's perhaps better about the tree analogy is that it's not like the structure is one thing and the soul-making is another thing, as it was in the trellis analogy to the roses. Here, the structure, the conceptual structure, is a part of soul. It's an aspect of the tree. It's totally integrated with the tree. The trunk, the roots, the branches, the structure, the shape of that is the tree. It's part of the tree. It's completely embodied, incorporated.

They're not separate things.

So logos and conceptual framework is part, a dimension, an aspect of soul and soul-making and psyche. Even though we say eros, psyche, logos, remember I said they're not really separate. So that might be a useful analogy.

And then we have the fruit and the beauty and the flowers of the tree and all that a tree can offer. But the tree is—the structure of the tree is the tree.

And also in this tree analogy, it's not a fixed structure. So the structure of that tree is organic, it grows, just as our conceptual framework can, and as I've been saying, needs to grow. The logos needs to grow.

Just like a tree, it's not a fixed, limited, preset, rigid structure. It is actually organic and it grows, and that growing of the tree and of the conceptual frameworks are responsive. In other words, they respond.

If you look at the way, let's say, an apple tree grows in an orchard, you'll see how responsive it is to the light—as plants are phototropic to different degrees—it responds to the light, it responds to the other trees around it, it responds to all kinds of things. It responds also to itself when it's getting too heavy or too lopsided.

Sometimes that response is actually breaking. A branch breaks off or the tree splits in two, a crack appears. Sometimes the tree gets too big for itself, and conceptual frameworks also can break, get too big, a crack appears.

Can we include that fact, that organic fact of the way trees grow, and that organic fact about conceptuality and conceptual frameworks, can we include that in a larger scale conceptual framework?

Right there, there's this Kabbalistic idea, mythical idea of the breaking of the vessels. One kind of vessel, as I said, is a conceptual framework. And those too in our life break at times. Though that can be very difficult—I'll come back to this—I would also say, sad the person whose conceptual framework doesn't break at least once in their life. I'll come back to that.

But here we have perhaps an analogy where the structure is not separate from the fruit, from the soul-making, from what the soul is. It's not fixed. It's organic, it grows—that's part of its nature—and it grows in a responsive way with what's around it. And the breaking might be part of it.

Now I've also said, and it's one of the things that's really worth repeating: when I say concept or logos or conceptual framework or even idea, I'm not just referring to something abstract, something removed, taken away from life, away from experience, away from embodiment into some kind of disembodied intellectual separate realm of the mind. There can be that—we can have conceptual frameworks that's what we're doing with them and that's what they become for us—but mostly I'm really talking about what we live, an indispensable element of our existence that comes into our life, that we actually end up embodying, whether we know it or like it or not, comes into our experience.

Mostly, I'm not even talking about what we think. Certainly a conceptual framework we elucidate and elaborate on in words and thought, and we reflect on it and put it together with other ideas and make sure we understand all that thinking. Of course, I'm including that, but I'm also making the point that I've made before that concept, logos, as I would use that word, operates even when we are not thinking.

Even in the second jhāna and other jhānas and those kinds of experiences, there is not thinking going on, but there is conceptuality going on.

If we don't see that—if you don't see that, and I know some people are really wedded to the idea of non-conceptual awareness in different ways. For some people it means bare attention, for other people it has a Dzogchen context or whatever. But if you don't see that, then what I would unfortunately say to you is it just needs more practice. You need to practice with more subtlety of sensitivity and noticing, but particularly to practice in the direction of less fabrication. So much so that you begin to see the relationship with concepts, conceptualities, in the present moment, in the mind—how they not just shape the fabrication, therefore the experience, but actually how they contribute, how they actually fabricate anything at all.

In other words, without conception, if you really drop all conception, nothing gets fabricated, no experience gets fabricated. So where there's conception, it fabricates experience, and where there's experience, there's some conception bound up, wrapped up in that experience.

Even the barest level of conceptuality—some kind of knowing with some kind of knower and known, therefore subject and object, the barest, barest, most refined level, and some kind of sense of a present moment. That's conceptuality. Subject, object, and time is the barest level of conceptuality. And pulled almost immediately in with all that is a whole bunch of other stuff about potentiality and change, and therefore past and future, and all of that.

But even that—I don't have any label for what is appearing as object and what is known. It could be a very subtle perception, but where there is perception, experience, appearance, there is concept.

And certainly at the level of mindfulness or so-called bare attention, you just need to play with: is there a subtle concept? This is now a less subtle level of conceptuality, but is there a relatively subtle concept I'm not even conscious of?

This is what I'm mindful of. But for example, am I regarding it as something real? Am I regarding it even as something material? Whatever it is—this tree that I'm looking at, this touch of the foot on the earth—what's wrapped up in that concept of materiality? Or am I regarding it as an appearance, which is more, if you know the philosophical term, of a phenomenological bracketing there. It's appearance. That's already regarding it as appearance.

A mindfulness that regards this touch of the foot as appearance is different already than a mindfulness that unconsciously, automatically, out of habit, regards that touch as the meeting of materials—the foot and the earth.

There's always a conceptual framework, there's always a logos, there's always a way of looking when there's any experience, apart from the so-called experience of the unfabricated. It's a very different kind of thing, where there is no time, no knowing of subject or object. There's always a conceptual framework, there's always a logos, which creates a way of looking, which is part of the way of looking, which, if you like, is part of determining the experience—not just the interpretation, the hermeneutics of this experience, but the experience itself is part of fabricating.

So when I'm talking now about conceptual framework and logos or idea—and I'll probably use those words interchangeably—I'm talking about something that we want to be translatable, incorporatable into a way of looking, so that it's fruitful, so that it's fertile, so that it opens up our perception. We're talking about something that we live in our experience.

There's always, as I will come back to—I've said before in other talks and I'll come back to—there's always a metaphysics. There's always some belief about what's real, and there's always some conceptuality there. And we actually want that to come... we want to be able to employ different conceptual frames that are actually fertile, that give rise to and open up our experience, and that we can actually embody in our life.

Now, for me, I would say—and you'll have to see how much you feel the same way—if we're interested in building a conceptual framework, opening one up, discovering, creating a conceptual framework in the Dharma and in relation to Eros and soul-making, then it's going to need to be able to do quite a lot, or support quite a lot, the way I see it right now.

It's going to need to account for quite a few things, quite a few aspects of experience, and it's going to have to include and not ignore quite a few things. It's going to need to make sense of quite a few things in our experience. It's going to need to give a vital place to and a purpose to quite a few things, and also connect those things. So it needs to account for, include and not ignore, make sense of, give vital place and purpose to, and connect quite a few different elements of our experience.

One is this whole observation that we have of lessening fabrication—that whole spectrum of fabrication that we can discover in meditation. It's not random. It's not just that things disappear because they're impermanent. We actually see there's a whole spectrum, more or less fabricated, all the way down to no fabrication at all, no experience. Dependent. We need to understand the dependent origination there and what that's dependent on—conceptuality and identification and avidya, clinging. We talked about this all before. But that fact... somehow I need to account for it and include it. I can't just skip over that.

And coming out of that observable spectrum of fabrication, its relationship with, or its dependent arising—either coming out of that or some other way—the emptiness of all things, all things without question. Not the aggregates, or rather, not leaving anything not empty, not leaving the aggregates, the process, the time, the big awareness, being, materiality, atoms, electrons, subatomic particles—emptiness of all, all, all: space, time, and all of that. Somehow this to me has to be included.

If we don't, then something remains not empty and we start building a whole structure on that assumption of reality which is relatively easily disproved in one way or another. And of course that's what sometimes happens, either consciously, or the person doesn't even realize that they're assuming the reality of this or that, assuming the non-emptiness of this or that. And they're just saying, "Yes, yes, yes, emptiness, of course," but there's some basis in reality there, and everything is coming out of that as a foundation, of this real thing, whatever it is—materiality, and then you've got a neuroscience-based dharma, or atomistic process, or whatever it is.

So fabrication, the spectrum of fabrication, dependent arising, the emptiness of absolutely everything. And that also for me, the whole opening up of the idea of ways of looking, the plurality, the legitimacy of a whole manifold range of ways of looking. Not because we want to be nice guys. I don't actually think I'm a nice guy. That's not the reason. I'm not just trying to be, you know, not get into an argument with someone, so I just say everyone's way of looking is fine. That's actually not what I'm saying, and that's not the reason. It's coming out of emptiness. It's going deeply into fabrication, very deeply, and seeing the emptiness of all things, seeing what we are left with. We are left with a range, an option of ways of looking, the diversity, the flexibility of ways of looking.

And somehow in all that, I also need to account for, make sense of, and give purpose to the whole, and really structure the whole relationship of the fabricated with the unfabricated. And then where does this thing that people call mindfulness or bare attention fit into that?

So somehow my conceptual framework has to, as I said, account for and include all this. I can't just ignore that spectrum of fabrication. I can't forget that everything is empty. Yes?

So all of that, but then also, again, what the conceptual framework that to me would really be healthy and relatively robust and beauty-making and supportive needs also to account for, include, make sense of, give vital place and purpose to, and connect all of these with the other ideas.

So also, images and the imaginal—and what does that mean? Are we just going to discount the whole imaginative faculty that human beings have? The noticing of the fact that our life is full of fantasy anyway. The whole movement of soul-making. And again, are we just going to ignore it? Pretend that that's not something that is part of our existence to more or less degrees for different human beings at different times? It already exists, all this. Are we going to dismiss it? Are we going to ignore it? Or actually, are we going to construct and discover a conceptual framework that can hold all this together and give it life?

And again, part of that, of course, is eros and desire and sexuality. Again, are we just sort of chopping that stuff off or over-simplistically reducing it or dismissing it or labeling it in too reductive or not subtle enough ways?

And body—are we limiting what body is to us and can be to us? Do we just have a sort of materialist reductionist view of body, or do we see it only through the lens of the way we've been taught the four foundations of mindfulness in the first foundation? How much embodiment has been left out of, until quite recently, and even then it's only just hardly made any inroads—but how much that has been left out of Western philosophy and psychology, and what the body is and what the body can be for us, to us. Where there is soul-making, where there's this expansion of psyche-logos, the body too will be drawn into that. I'll come back to this.

So somehow our conceptual framework has to actually include body and give more place to body, more purpose to body, different accounts of body, and then of course also just the whole of the human being. And again, what is our conceptual framework saying about what a human being is? Because that too with soul-making will be expanded, broadened, deepened, given dimension. Am I just sticking it into, again, a kind of evolutionary accident emerging from the primal swamp after long enough time by the vagaries of biochemistry? Or the human being is just what secular modernism says the human being is?

And related to that, of course, relationships. What are human relationships? How does my conceptual framework allow the growth and the expansion, the widening and deepening of the sense and the concept of what my human relationships are? Or again, am I just kind of putting it into some modernist secular box or whatever it is?

Can the whole conceptual framework support opening the relationship with death? How often the conversation about death and relationship with it seems so sort of flatly polarized. After death, what will happen after death? Is there anything after death? And it revolves around rebirth or heaven or hell or this state or dissolving into oneness or whatever. What are you now? Never mind what you will be or what will happen. What is happening now?

If I see that flatly, if I'm limited in what I actually sense and see happening now, if my soul's looking and sensing of this existence now is limited—what is this? What is even this now? What is time? All of that, when that gets limited, then it just becomes "after death, after death." Will it be just extinction? Or is it extinction? No, it's not. It's a flat, polarized, kind of naive and unhelpful argument.

A friend's mother is dying. The friend said she doesn't believe in something better than what she has on earth. As if that's the only way of looking at it. What do you have on earth? How is time woven into all this? And is there a way of—some people respond to death, "Oh well, who dies? No one dies because there's no self." It's just a process that then disbands, or whatever. There was no self, so death is okay. Or you just kind of dissolve into the universal being, or the universal Brahman, or whatever it is, or dissolve into God, or whatever.

Is there, you know, all that, or someone says no, it's just—all that's rubbish, it's just a tragedy. It's just an actual tragedy. Here was this wonderful human being and now they're just gone and there's nothing but unremitting sort of loss about death.

Is there a way, are there ways of relating to death that include all those possibilities but add the whole dimension of the self? The self is not either just dismissed—"No one dies. Who dies? No one dies because there is no one, because there's no self"—just a simplistic answer. Or the self just gets dissolved back into sort of a universal, amorphous, unparticularized being.

Or is there a relationship with death, not bound by time, not bound by any idea about something lasting or what will happen later or anything like that in time after death, that actually still has a place for the self, a soul place for the self?

So all of this—our conceptual framework has to be able to open up, for me, has to be able to open up and support quite a lot more than is often the case in relation to all these aspects of our existence.

And of course, in relation to the earth and the environment, how desperately, desperately we are in need of a new relationship, a new conception, a new perception—a new cosmology, really. Something that can offer, you know, a support, real respect, real openness in regard to the earth, the environment, the cosmos, but also the senses.

Again, how are we seeing the senses? How are we conceiving of the senses? And again, some interpretations of Buddha-dharma, it's as if the senses can be these sort of basic instruments that reveal bare attention. Other versions of dharma have the senses as something you're trying to get rid of ultimately in some kind of transcendent dissolution.

But the earth, the environment, the cosmos, the senses, the beauty—beauties. Can our conceptual framework open up the possibilities for beauty, for discovering and creating beauty? How does our notion of the dharma support or inhibit that?

And our conceptual framework also needs, of course, to do all this—account for, make sense of, give place and purpose to, connect different aspects—and our dharma practices? How does all that connect? The ones that we've maybe learned and new ones that we can discover for ourselves, and how do they all fit together?

And psychology. Again, it's a sense of what's taken as truth in psychology—the psychology of a person or child development. What's the whole notion of, or rather the whole possibilities of psychology? Because that too must expand if the eros-psyche-logos dynamic expands. Psyche-logos—the logos needs to expand.

And, you know, I've said many times before, the whole sense of sacredness, and again the range of that, and this whole notion of divinity. And what might that mean? Or what can that mean? Or how can that open up and become something that's supported and fertile? And if we talk about divinity again, how does the conceptual framework relate to and conceive of divinity?

The whole relationship of, say, the spectrum of fabrication with the fact—tied in with that—that our perception can seem more or less substantial with the refinement and moving up and down of that spectrum of fabrication. And do we just associate that with "less substantial, more refined, more ethereal is somehow more divine"? Is that how we relate there? Or is there some other way that actually gives as much divinity to both ends of that spectrum? Are there other ways of conceiving that support a kind of non-hierarchicalized notion of divinity, of the range, of the spectrum of what divinity can be and how we can sense it?

So the notion of dimensionality, I've said, is related to divinity. And somehow, what's the conceptual framework in relation to the sense of dimensionality we discover in our experience as we pay attention, as we experiment? There's always more dimensionality. Maybe that's tied in with the whole sense of divinity—there's always more, the unfathomability of divinity. But in "always more," it's not necessarily that the more is closer to divinity, just because it's more and I haven't fathomed it yet.

So there's a lot here that a conceptual framework needs to kind of take account of, include, not ignore, make sense of, give place and purpose to, and kind of stitch together in a supportive framework. All that, for me, I would say. And these, for me—again, maybe you agree, maybe you don't—but these are important things. These things matter to us. Matter deeply. They make a big difference—the conceptual framework and the concepts and the beliefs about and assumptions about all this stuff, perceptions of all this stuff.

Now another aspect of all this that's for me a requirement is we need to acknowledge, as I've already pointed out, not just that concept and percept, conceptual framework and experience, are mutually dependently originated. In other words, where there's concept, there is experience, and that concept is part of fabricating that experience, shaping, determining that experience, giving rise to that experience.

And also, of course, the concepts we have are formed by experience. There's a mutual dependent origination there—to some extent. But in addition to that, not just that, but in addition to that, both idea, concept, logos, conceptual framework, and experience are situated. They are contextually conditioned.

So that history and society, ideas and logoi, conceptual frameworks and experience, perceptions, appearances—whatever you want to call those three—history, society, ideas, and experience are mutually conditioning. Sometimes they're hardly separable. In other words, ideas emerge in history and are borrowed from history. We inherit certain ideas from history. Ideas also shape history. And both of those shape our experience. And of course, experiences emerge and they become ideas and shape history that way. There's a mutual conditioning between all three.

So what that means in relationship to conceiving of a conceptual framework that's supportive to soul-making and eros and everything that we're talking about is that we can't claim—it would be silly to claim—a kind of ahistoricality. Like, we are now talking about some truth, this conceptual framework is a truth that's ahistorical, it's transcendent of all history, it's not situated in this culture, in this time, with this historical influx of ideas and all the rest of it. It's totally contextual. So we somehow need to admit that and actually give relevance and place to that, and maybe even purpose to that—which hopefully is something I'll come back to.

So for example, in the story that I related of the yogini on retreat the other day and her need for the earth and the woods to touch and address and cherish her particularities, her self, her particular self, her unique self—in other words, in the way that we're speaking about, for her what was needed there was her self, in its particularity, in its uniqueness, to be more fully included and involved in the imaginal constellation, so that there was a balance there in the expanding soul-making dynamic of psyche-logos, and also so that the self, or as part of that, the self became an erotic image, either for the self, or in this case for the object of the image reciprocally.

So her need for that, someone could say, "But surely that's just a creation, a fabrication demanded now or kind of conditioned or even forced by the rise of the modernist self, which was a self, a sense of self that didn't exist before." In other words, go back far enough in history, read whatever documents we have, get a sense—and it's like, it's hard to really believe that the sense of self that we so much take for granted now in modernity, in the time of modernity, in Western culture, is the same kind of sense of self of the people that the Buddha was talking to.

You simply do not get the same sense of complexity or difficulty in regard to certain psychological interiorities that we now have that we absolutely take for granted and we feel viscerally—this is myself and this is important. Or perhaps even in the Old Testament as well. You know, it's just, as well as the Pali Canon, it's like this modernist self is—quite a few philosophers have pointed out—it's a creation, it's a construction, it's not a so-to-speak independently existing reality.

It's not to say some sense of self will always be there, but the actual sense of self and the complex interior reality, a rise of psychological self in this kind of—that seems to exist in some kind of independent way, etc., that we feel so normally nowadays—is a creation of modernism, of Western modernism.

And were it not for that creation, this person is pointing out, then there's no need for the creation of an imaginal perception of the earth being in love with me, as felt as a modernist self. There's a double construction there.

To which I would say, yes, absolutely, there's a double construction. There's a double construction there. Soul-making, eros, psyche-logos creates as much as it discovers. So yes, fabrication, yes, construction. But that doesn't make it certainly less soul-making.

So there's a whole soul-making process here that we could actually say includes history, includes the ideas that are bequeathed to us. So the modernist self is, to a certain extent, a soul-making construction—historically emergent, culturally contingent, all of that. It's a soul-making construction, and then it demands—its logos begins to break and doesn't support enough eros, doesn't support enough soul-making—demands another construction. That whole historical movement could be regarded as soul-making. I'm going to come back to this.

But yes, acknowledging that it's a creation, a construction, a fabrication, doesn't make it less soul-making. On the contrary. It doesn't make it less divine either in the way that I would be talking about divinity, and doesn't even make it less real—because you would have to ask, compared to what? Show me something that is not fabricated. Show me something that's not fabricated. So it's fabricated, therefore it's not real—compared to what?

To stay a while with this point of the mutual conditioning of history, society, ideas, logos, conceptual framework, and experience, perception, appearance—I wonder how many of you have had this experience that I've had, and I don't think it's that uncommon. Perhaps you're with a relative or a loved one, someone who you love deeply. And perhaps they're ill, for example.

And perhaps you massaged their feet or held their feet or somehow held something of their body. Perhaps they were dying. And somehow in the holding and in the love and in the erotic love—and I don't just mean sexual love—in the erotic love there, this person's feet, this loved one's feet, became holy.

Maybe even became, somehow, in the perception there, in the imaginal perception, they gained a dimensionality or dimensionalities of holiness. Maybe they even became Jesus' feet—the body, the feet of the Christ, perhaps the crucified Christ. And wrapped up in that kind of experience, there's something sacred about this person, this person I love, their particularity, their body, something sacred, and something sacred about Christ or Jesus, and something sacred about this kind of spreading from that to all bodies, and perhaps in cosmopoiesis as well. So there's some degree of that movement happening.

Now you could say, of course, if it is, let's say, the sense of touching Jesus' feet there, how rich that is. Some people, this will not resonate with at all, but for a lot of people in our culture, and not just people who have Christian backgrounds, who were raised Christian, that image has such a richness and a poignancy and a beauty and a poetry to it.

So you could say, "Oh sure, but you're having that experience because you're just kind of recalling a cultural icon that you've been fed or conditioned from the culture, from your background, from your family, whatever." And we say, "Yeah, sure, sure, sure. That's part of what's going on." We are fed that image and it's worked its way into the collective psyche. It might actually be almost eroded now at this point in history, but still, it's there. So yeah, sure, acknowledge that.

And both now and even originally in the actual historic occurrence of Jesus' crucifixion and all that with the apostles and the twelve disciples who became the apostles—so both now, in this experience of your loved one's feet, and in the original—could it also be that both you, in this experience, and Mary or whoever it was, Joseph of Arimathea and these people, were tapping into an archetype that kind of pre-existed Jesus? An archetype of the Christ and the martyred one and everything that's wrapped up in there about death and divinity and an exceptionally soul-making, beautiful love.

So there's a tapping into an archetype, we could say that, a kind of primordial archetype in the Jungian sense. Sure, so that could be both. And it could be that in the original experience historically in the New Testament with Mary and then Paul coming with his kind of theology of the body of Christ—all that was exactly the movement of erotic love stimulating, fertilizing, opening up, widening and deepening and giving dimension and divinity to what it came into contact with as the eros-psyche-logos dynamic was stimulated and fertilized.

In other words, there's this eros to this person. Paul, I don't think, ever met Jesus, but maybe it was Mary and Paul as Jesus' person became image for Paul, and there was an erotic connection there for Mary and for the others. The erotic connection to this person of Jesus fertilized and deepened and widened the soul-making and thus the perception of the body of Jesus and other bodies related to his and the self and the cosmos and all of that.

And out of that, a theology was woven—I mean, via Paul and all that, St. Paul. And this theology somehow preserved Jesus' uniqueness, his uniqueness, and his person, and somehow connected flesh and divinity. And in some theologies, you know, spills over into a cosmology of the cosmic Christ and the whole kind of divine nature of the universe.

So in this third possibility, we're not just tapping into a kind of pre-existing primordial archetype, but the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, as it expands, is actually creating an archetype. Creating a cosmopoiesis, creating a theology. Maybe that was what was going on both historically, at the time of Jesus, and also now.

The eros-psyche-logos, it will tend to divinize. And of course, what happened back then, 2,000 years ago, was historically conditioned, the kind of logos that came out of that. You can also, of course, trace it to the Old Testament and other ideas that were around, and Greek ideas. But you can't escape cosmology, and partly because you can't escape from history and society. Cosmology that was historically around back then, and the kind of messianism and Judaism and all that—of course that informed, but there was also something else happening.

You could say that the eros-psyche-logos dynamic was doing what it does and how it will transubstantiate things. We touched on this in the last retreat. The idea that you can get away from any kind of cosmology that's in the present culture, get away from history and society—I'm going to come back to this—that is highly questionable.

Or, again, as a third example, the idea, the conceptual framework, or the logos of a cosmic or divine eros. That idea that we've touched on, it will seed, it will feed and support—again, think of that orchard image of the tree—it will seed and support the actual sense, the perception, the experience of that, of a cosmic and divine eros.

The idea supports, seeds and supports the experience—intrapsychically, through intrapsychic image, and then, inevitably, through the perception of the world, if I don't get in the way of that. And the reverse. This idea of a cosmic or divine eros that somehow I'm mirroring, or that's permeating the cosmos—all these different ideas, that image, if you like, or that mythos, will emerge from and be seeded by both historically, I would say, but certainly now in practice. You can see it also in how something opens an experience, and then a little while later you read something and discover that someone had this idea that corresponds to your experience—someone had it long ago.

Both historically and now, the idea or the mythos emerges from experience and perception opening in mystical experience and in imaginal perception, and in the cosmic eros that comes from that. The eros-psyche-logos dynamic is operating—everything is becoming, is gaining dimension, and thus divinized. The divinity comes with the dimensionality. So eventually, as I've said before, even the eros gets given dimensionality and divinized and expanded. There's a sense—there's an actual, I'm not even thinking at first, but just from letting, following the mystical and imaginal perceptions, letting, not getting in the way—eventually eros appears divine.

And then that gives me the idea: oh, this is God's eros. I'm participating in it, I'm mirroring it. This eros that I have, this love that I have, echoes, mirrors, has roots in divine eros.

So we acknowledge—or rather, any conceptual framework that I would like to be involved with, or that I could feel I could get behind, needs to acknowledge that it's not some kind of ultimate truth. It's not depicting some way things really are in some independent way, nor is it some ultimately true kind of grand theory, conceptual framework of everything that's completely ahistorical. So it needs to acknowledge all that—it's not ultimate truth, and it's not completely ahistorical.

But at the same time, it needs to recognize, as I said before, there's always a way of looking, and included in the way of looking is the conceptual framework—a logos is operating, always, when there's experience. And that way of looking, and that conceptual framework, will give rise to experience, shape, determine, and actually give rise to experience. And of course the experiences we have shape and inform the conceptual framework and the ways of looking. But it's not possible to be without a conceptual framework or a way of looking. And if you don't know that, find that out. Know that that's true. So somehow we need to recognize that—that needs to be included.

And we need, with all this, a conceptual framework that supports soul-making. Let me run through a list and then go back through them more slowly.

First, we need a conceptual framework that supports soul-making. Second, we need a logos, a conceptual framework that supports the fertility and widening of our experience and understanding. Third, related to that, we need to make sure that we're not engaging in epistemicide. I only learned that word the other day, but I was thinking along similar lines—I'll come back to this. Epistemicide: the killing, the erasure, or the dismissal of ways of knowing. That we're not forcibly reducing to some kind of dogma, that there's just one way of looking that's valid, and that way of looking reveals the true reality of things.

Often that is what happens in secular modernity—there's actually a kind of monotheism, a secular modernist monotheism in terms of ontology (what is real, what's not real), epistemology (what are the valid ways of knowing and what are the not valid ways of knowing), and cosmology (what kind of world we live in, what is the nature of the world we live in). And so shrinking that down to: there's just one way of looking—you can call it mindfulness or science or whatever you want to call it—and that reveals the reality of things. It's actually a kind of monotheism, whether it's religious or secular. It goes with modernism, actually. I'll come back to this.

Fifth, we need to somehow incorporate—this conceptual framework needs to incorporate dependent origination, ways of looking, principally the emptiness of things. And sixth, related to what I said before, is some conceptual framework that actually opens the ways of knowing, embodied ways of knowing, without a prescribed limit. Go back to what I said before—this is a variation of what I said before—but how fertile is it? Am I putting a limit? And are there ways of knowing that are not just mental, rational, disembodied?

Can the conceptual framework, as I said, include the idea that the conceptual framework breaks, and that the breaking of the vessels is in some way included in the very conceptual framework, in the larger conceptual framework? And also what I said much earlier in the retreat—that we acknowledge and live with and integrate the idea that we can never fully understand eros, either because we say it's divine and unfathomable, or because of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, expanding always the nature of eros itself, the perception, the concept of eros itself.

Somehow, all of those need to get integrated into our conceptual framework.

Thank you for listening.

Logos in the Garden of Souls (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 48 min

> In this profound exploration, Rob Burbea continues his investigation into how conceptual frameworks (logos) fundamentally shape our spiritual experience and understanding. He examines how different views of desire—from "defilement" to "divine eros"—create entirely different experiential realities, demonstrating the crucial relationship between concept and perception in dharma practice.
> Burbea addresses the complex hermeneutical relationship with Buddhist texts, particularly the Pali Canon, arguing that we always approach sacred texts through our own cultural lens and assumptions. He challenges the notion of discovering "authentic" Buddhism, instead advocating for honest dialogue with tradition that acknowledges our creative participation in meaning-making.
> A significant portion explores "epistemicide"—the killing of ways of knowing—showing how secular modernist approaches to dharma may inadvertently dismiss embodied, intuitive, and diverse cultural ways of understanding reality. Burbea questions whether stripped-down, secular presentations of Buddhist teaching might constitute a form of spiritual colonialism, arguing for the inclusion of multiple epistemologies and the recognition that all knowledge systems rest on unprovable assumptions. This teaching challenges practitioners to examine their own conceptual frameworks and consider how these either support or constrain the full flowering of spiritual experience and soul-making.

Just to pick up where we left off when we said that if we're going to forge a conceptual framework, then there are many elements of our existence that it needs to account for, include, make sense of, give vital place and purpose to, and tie together.

Very quickly, repeating what we said: we're acknowledging its historical place—it's historically conditioned, contingent. We're not devising or discovering some kind of ultimately true grand conceptual framework or theory that's completely ahistorical. We're recognizing there's always a way of looking, which includes the concept, and the way of looking and the concept shapes, determines, gives rise to experience and vice versa. It needs to support soul-making.

It needs to support a fertility and widening of experience and also of ideation. It must support a widening and an opening of other ways of knowing, not limiting that in some kind of epistemicide. It's opening embodied ways of looking without pre-prescribed limits to it. We're not shrinking down to a claim that there's just one right way of looking called whatever it is—mindfulness or science or whatever—and some kind of naive notion that there's only one way of looking and it reveals one reality. Even if we don't use the word truth, we're not shrinking down to any kind of monotheism in that way.

We're incorporating dependent origination, the idea of ways of looking and the whole fact of emptiness of things. We're even including the idea that logoi break, conceptual frameworks break, shatter, melt, need to expand. And that we can never fully understand something like eros because of that.

So all that's quite a lot, and we even said more about other aspects of our existence that need to be included. But if we just pick out for now, to pick up our thread again: we need a conceptual framework that supports soul-making.

If we pick these up individually, we've said before, the logos needs to support, needs to allow the psyche, the image, and the eros. If we want a logos that supports soul-making, if we take that aspect, somehow we want a conceptual frame that supports soul-making. Then the logos that we have of whatever it is we are in relationship to needs to support the imaginal perception that's happening and needs to support the erotic connection.

So, for example, back to that idea of the divinity of eros. That conception, that logos in the moment functions—if I'm really incorporating, if I'm really bringing it into the way of looking—that will affect what happens, what I actually experience and how I actually live, how I relate to life. It's supportive of soul-making.

The idea of discrepancy-based processing that I mentioned earlier—to me, that's not... I mean, it might be to a very limited extent because it helps kind of discern between different things. Maybe it creates a bit of letting go or something. But its potential as a soul-making, supporting logos is very, very limited. And there's a way that thinking too much with those kinds of ideas actually will really constrain the whole eros-psyche-logos dynamic, the whole movement of soul-making, the whole potential of soul-making.

Because wrapped up in a logos like that is, either explicitly or implicitly, and in most logoi as well: what is a human being, like I said, and what is important? What is actually important? Discrepancy-based processing—what does it tell me about, what does it almost imply in the kind of subtext and the quality of the idea? What does it imply about what a human being is and what's important?

Included, wrapped up in a logos is ontology—the question of what's real, the assumptions about what's real—epistemology about what's a valid way of knowing, cosmology, metaphysics. And all of this wrapped up in there affects the experience.

So we want a conceptual frame of conceptual ideas that actually support soul-making, that open soul-making. Support and open and support the opening of soul-making. And also that allow the increase, because soul-making is that increase in the psyche, in the image, the growth, the expansion, the widening, the deepening, the complexifying of the image and of the eros.

In other words, the logos needs to be able, at certain points, to support and allow that expansion of the whole soul-making dynamic, which means the logos needs to not be so fixed. It needs to be able to break and be replaced by something else.

You can see the logos of eros, logos, the view of desire. Just compare, oversimplistically: "Desire is a defilement. It's not okay." If that's the kind of logos and the subtext, that's how we're viewing desire. Compared to: "Desire is okay, it's just another thing, everything's okay"—a kind of loose, slightly sloppy, maybe non-dual kind of teaching. "Desire's okay, everything's okay." Or a little more nuanced: "The desire that leads to the end of suffering is good, but the desire that leads to an increase in suffering is bad." Is that enough of a delineation? Or: "Desire is something beautiful and divine."

Four ideas, although in the last one you can say, well, it gets diverted or constricted or contracted. That's possible. Too simplistic. But you can see how differently the different ideas, the different logoi and conceptions about desire would shape the experience.

This is something we're going to come back to again. We've said it already, but we're going to come back to it. If you are in love and you have the sense or you play with the idea that my being in love, our being in love is somehow mirroring the divine eros. We are somehow, through our being in love, participating in a divine in-loveness, in a divine eros. And that becomes the way of looking and the way of looking at your beloved and the way of looking at your life and this moment. What does that open?

What does that lead to?

There are many other variations we've already mentioned about how to view desire or the possible ways of viewing desire, but they all have different effects. We made that distinction—eros is a subset of desire and craving is a different subset and all that—but there are other variations too. The view, the logos, affects the experience. I have to really acknowledge this and find out how, what, why.

I've said this before, and I'll say something else that I've said before as well, just because I think it's so important. If our whole Dharma conceptual frame of thought, if our whole edifice of Dharma conceptually is too narrow or not subtle enough or not sophisticated enough and not making the right distinctions—if it's maybe what might pass nowadays for a sort of typical Dharma conceptual framework—if it's too narrow, and it doesn't have the right kind of levels of subtlety and sophistication and openness, then this can get quite entrenched, unquestioned and kind of stagnant. We don't realize that it's just one possible way of looking, one possible conceptual framework, one possible set of conceptual distinctions. You know: "Be with what is, everything's impermanent, everything's just flowing, so let go because you can't hang on and this is it, this is it now."

That kind of simplistic dharma can very easily become just entrenched, unquestioned, a stagnant kind of dogma and not realize this is just a way of looking. This is just a set of conceptions that informs a way of looking, one among many possible others. It will have its effects. Others will have their effects.

But if that happens and it does become something too narrow, not subtle and sophisticated enough, does become entrenched in that way, then what happens is we look at life that way and our hermeneutics, our interpretation of existence is constrained by that conceptual framework. We might think, "I'm not into conceptual frames, I'm not intellectual, I'm just—this is really simple, this is just really basic, true, not conceptual at all." It's a conceptual framework, and it constrains the interpretation of experience and existence.

And it also then constrains experience—I've said this before—experience of what? Of self, of other, of world, of cosmos, of time, of desire, of eros, certainly experience of soul-making. It constrains the range of freedom that's available to us and the depth of freedom, both wide and deep, the kinds of freedom. It constrains our creativity in all kinds of ways. It constrains our sense of beauty and again, the range and the diversity of the senses of beauty.

Now, if you ask, "Well, what is the relationship with, let's say, Pali Canon—the Pali Canon of what you're saying, or this conceptual framework of all this business that we're talking about? What's the relationship then with Pali Canon Dharma?" I would ask in response, I would say quite a lot in that, so I just want to say some things right now.

One question I would ask in response is: whose Pali Canon? Whose interpretation of the Pali Canon? The Pali Canon, just like any other text, is always approached with an agenda and always approached with assumptions as well, with certain conceptual frameworks in place already, certain ways of looking in place or a way of looking in place and available, a certain ontology, a certain epistemology, certain cosmology. Whose Pali Canon? Whose agenda? Whose assumptions? Whose conceptual framework?

If I approach the Pali Canon with the agenda and the assumptions and the conceptual framework and the limited range of ways of looking and ontology, epistemology, cosmology of, let's say, secular modernism—sort of based on classical science and a sort of materialistic view of reality and a kind of existential one-dimensional universe and humanism—what am I going to get? What am I going to see? I'm going to see a secular modernist Pali Canon. And then curiously, the Buddha seems like a guy just like me, because I'm looking that way. I have an agenda.

What would it be, we might ask—I think more interesting—to bring a post-modern critique of modernism, a post-modern attitude and kind of agenda, if you like, to the Pali Canon? What would that give rise to? To me, that's actually much more interesting.

But we bring an agenda, we bring a set of assumptions. What happens is we ignore this or that aspect of, in this case, the Pali Canon. We give a centrality of place to this and something else. And dependent on our agenda, and dependent on our assumptions, we have a certain fantasy of the Buddha, and a fantasy of, as well as conception, of what awakening is. All of this comes into creating, if you like, the Pali Canon—creating, discovering the Pali Canon. I need to see this, and I need to admit it.

So, a scholar, so-called, and actually, I have to point out that scholarship itself is part fantasy.

Scholarship itself is part fantasy. And again, I can say that from personal experience, but scholarship itself is part fantasy. What goes on for the scholar that keeps them at it, that makes it alive for them? There's soul-making going on in scholarship and it involves fantasy.

But anyway, a scholar without a practice related to the Pali Canon, a Pali Canon scholar, so-called scholar, without a practice and without really a lived engaging of that material in their life, in their practice, can't understand what the Pali Canon is about. They cannot claim that they understand it. Someone who doesn't have practice and a kind of really passionate engagement with it can't understand it.

And at the same time, yet a scholar who does have a practice that really matters to them and is engaging that material in their life, in their practice, they already have a fantasy and a conceptual framework. They already have an investment and an agenda and a perspective. So here, again, is a kind of version of, I don't know if it's the hermeneutic circle so much as a hermeneutical conundrum, hermeneutical situation about interpreting the Pali Canon.

If I try and have this objective, almost quasi-classical scientific methodology there, because I don't practice, because it doesn't mean anything to me, I don't really care about it, I'm not engaging it, I'm not really going to understand it. And if I do, I'm already bringing everything that I bring to it. And even someone who's supposedly not engaging brings their whole historical situation to it, and the assumptions of modernity and post-modernity, whatever it is. So here's a hermeneutical conundrum situation fact. Can I be honest and be aware of it? And what is the implication there?

Usually what happens, historically, and it still goes on, actually, is that we create, discover the Pali Canon, just as we do with anything else that's meaningful to us, anything else that's involved in our soul-making, to whatever extent. There is creativity going on. But if I cloak my creative discovery in the language of the tradition, in, let's say, Buddhist language, then it's almost like I smooth over. It's as if, oh yeah, sure, we're all talking about the same thing, there's no problem. We're not creating anything here, we're just discovering. Because we all use words like Four Noble Truths, and we all use words like suffering and awakening or enlightenment or whatever it is.

It might mean completely different things, utterly divergent things. There's a whole range of meanings of these Buddhist words, but because we're all using the words of the tradition it's okay somehow. It cloaks the fact that we're creating and not just discovering, and it also hides the fact that we may be talking about really radically different directions and ideas.

So when the Dharma comes to a new culture, a culture that's new for it historically, now it's happening in the West, the Dharma is coming here, it's just in its very early infancy, not even out of the birth canal really, or just as it went to China or Japan, what happens there? You know, really, if you take Japanese Zen, let's say Soto or Rinzai Zen, or Shingon, whatever, first of all, there's quite a variety there, but sometimes you'd be hard-pressed - I don't know, if the Buddha was alive, would he even recognize that it's the same thing that he talked about? Maybe some words are the same, but it's so vastly different. Or even what passes for Zen, or what has the label of Zen in Western cultures now.

I'm not saying that's a bad thing. I'm just trying to expose something here, and so let's be honest about something. There's historically a way of doing this that still goes on to do with cloaking the creation, the creativity, and using the traditional words to kind of cover something that's vastly divergent - a range of teachings and directions of vast divergence.

Or, you know, again, historically there is what happened with the Mahayana and the Vajrayana in India: you get the teaching that the Buddha said this, historically he said this, but he said it in secret to a small select band of disciples. And so, again, there's a kind of historical factual claim. And now they preserve this teaching in secret, and now we're revealing it, or now this is the tradition. It goes back to the historical, factual Buddha. Or the Buddha is revealing this on another plane of existence. And actually, strange as that may sound to some people, it actually makes more sense. It feels more viable to me if you open up the language of who the Buddha is and who my mind is, etc.

Or you get a terma was found, an actual teaching was found by this particular person, a tulku or whatever, found this old teaching, this ancient original teaching, a scroll or whatever it is. Or you get the sort of modern version of "what the Buddha meant was this. When he said this..." All of it is trying to claim authority and authenticity, and those words are related, via a fantasy of origins and via the particular fantasy and agenda that one brings to the Dharma, to the Pali Canon, to whatever it is, or the Mahayana texts, or whatever it is in front of one that one is invested in.

I don't think now that the Dharma can grow, and it needs to grow, if it's a baby coming out of the birth canal. It will grow. It will change. It has already changed. Western Dharma has already taken on, as I mentioned in one talk already on this retreat, has already integrated into it certain concepts that were absolutely not there in the Pali Canon or Zen Buddhism, like certain psychotherapeutic concepts and certain neuroscientific ideas we just take for granted. So it's already happening.

But nowadays, in our culture, the Dharma can't grow convincingly with this - to me, not convincingly at all - with this kind of appeal to the authenticity or authority of the actual reality of a tradition as if that's something real and we're not owning the fantasy, the fantasy of scholarship, the agenda, the assumptions, the concepts that one brings to it. All of that. For me, that's not convincing. The cat is out of the bag. The cat's out of the bag in regard to our hermeneutical relationship with text and tradition and all that, and historical figures. And if you know, I'm from modern philosophy, I'm very fond of Hans-Georg Gadamer, who talked a lot, wrote a lot about this, the hermeneutics and our situation in history.

Looking back at the text, it doesn't mean we shouldn't inquire and talk about the Pali Canon, but there is no pristine, unsoiled actuality that we're going to arrive at there. To think that we are is philosophically naive—philosophically and psychologically naive, I would say. The cat's out of the bag. We are too aware now of the cultural and historical context.

So if someone said the Buddha in secret taught neuroscience to a select band of disciples, or what's more common—that the Buddha actually did teach this in certain psychotherapeutic interpretations of what's happening—it doesn't really convince me. It's not very convincing.

What about being in dialogue with the Buddha, with the Buddha Dharma, with the tradition? Dialogue, dialogos—we're in a conversation, in a back and flow. That's part of loving a tradition and respecting a tradition: actually admitting that when we love, we're in dialogue with our lover. We're in dialogue with this. Dia logos—back and forth. Dia means through. Logos goes through one way and the other. It's like water through other water, flowing both ways, mixing and coming back.

To be in dialogue with the Buddha Dharma, with the tradition, with the Buddha, with the Sangha—to me, it's important to acknowledge that. And then creativity. Actually, we're acknowledging that we are creative. We are creating, discovering if you want, the Pali Canon or whatever text. We add things. All of that. So to me, it's disingenuous to try to convince others that we're discovering something authentic and independent, something independently existing. The fantasy of that, the fantasy of historical facticity.

Let me say a little bit more about this. I mentioned that word epistemicide—it's a great word. The killing, like homicide—epistemicide, the killing of ways of knowing, the erasure, the eradication, the starving and therefore killing of ways of knowing.

This is something that actually happened in Western society with the emergence of modernism, starting with the Enlightenment and the Scientific Revolution, but really with the Western Enlightenment. A certain way of knowing modeled on the methodology of classical Cartesian and Newtonian and Baconian science was claimed to be superior and to reveal the one universal reality. The project was to reveal one universally valid way of knowing things. It's a mixture of empiricism and rationalism, basically the scientific method.

But again, if you know much about recent Western philosophy, this has been radically questioned. The whole project of modernism and the Western Enlightenment project in relation to ways of knowing, ways of looking, and what reality is supposed to be has been radically questioned by postmodern philosophy, philosophers of science, post-colonial theory, feminist studies, and even philosophers from the so-called analytical Anglo-American tradition. I think I mentioned this in that talk—even Wilfrid Sellars and W.V.O. Quine, rigorous analytical, logical philosophers, question that whole take on epistemology and the monotheistic approach to epistemology and ontology and so-called reality and ways of knowing.

In this situation we now have, the yogi saying that the trees were calling, the forest was calling her, as she said so beautifully, felt and experienced. Or when I can feel this tree, this particular tree that I visit, is happy at my return today, is happy at my approaching it again. Or when people say in this culture or in other cultures, "We are sensing, we're perceiving the spirits that are around now." Or my friend says, "I'm getting information. It's like my ovaries are receiving information. I'm knowing through my ovaries, through my tongue."

We've talked about a sense of divinity, a sensation of divinity, and many—actually infinitely many more possibilities. All these kinds of ways of knowing that are implicit or claimed or spoken to through this epistemicide of modernism and secular enlightenment are discounted, dismissed, and often actually ridiculed, sometimes openly and also in some Dharma centers. Either explicitly or implicitly discounted, dismissed—there's an explicit or implicit epistemicide happening.

So the whole project of "we're just teaching mindfulness without a cosmology"—really? Is there not a cosmology wrapped up in the whole presentation there? And what is that cosmology? What's the one-dimensional cosmology of classical science? Empiricism with a bit of rationalism thrown in.

If one of us was teaching that way, and let's say someone from an Amazonian tribe or a First Nation Native American person heard it and accused the teacher of colonialism—of this kind of foisting, peddling this kind of view and essentially attempting epistemicide, a very successful attempt, not completely successful but pretty successful so far—what would the teacher say?

Effectively, what you're saying is basically dismissing and discounting and ridiculing ways of knowing that I have grown up with, that are very meaningful to me. If I'm teaching a kind of secular dharma or secular mindfulness, am I, in fact, enforcing what is effectively a kind of white man's religion? A white man's religion. Even though religion seems like the last thing, the furthest thing away from what I'm doing. Am I effectively foisting that, enforcing that somehow?

Somehow. I've been wondering about this for a while now, and I think it's wonderful and really important—the diversity initiatives in terms of people of color, gender orientation and identities, sexual orientations and identities, and all that. This is starting to open in some Dharma centers and dialogues, and I think it's really, really important.

But within that, how many people have stopped to consider that actually a certain presentation of the Dharma—which is sometimes quite aggressive, again, explicitly or implicitly—that a certain kind of secularized Dharma may actually be a form of proselytizing, a kind of violence that's akin to the Christian missionaries of centuries past?

We consider language and inclusion and the environment that we're teaching in and the way we might be more inviting and more inclusive to different groups and identities, et cetera, and respectful of that. But how many people are actually considering the content? Is there a blindness here that actually there may be something that doesn't allow or invite or sit well with certain groups of people because of the content?

You know, in America, the slaves brought over from Africa and enslaved there, or in Africa—African Americans, whether via slavery or Africans in Africa—some of them took on, or you could say were forced to take up, Christianity. But they took it on and—not all, but look at how much they gave to it, the dimensions they gave and gave to it, the dimensions of soul, their soulfulness. It became soul-making for them in their ways. It had to include more body, more hips, more groove than what the white missionaries might have had in their presentation.

So it was taken on board, but something had to be added to it to make it real, fertile, beautiful soul-making. And if you prohibit that—whatever it is that needs to be added, which may need to be certain epistemologies, certain ways of knowing—you're actually no better than a white missionary who would actually even try to disallow that.

So maybe what we consider stripped-down secularist Dharma in the way we present it—maybe that's amputating something, neutering something, as I said someone told me a while ago. Maybe we're smothering something to death. What? Certain ways of being with the body, certain ways of knowing with the body, certain embodiment, the hips, certain ways of knowing.

Epistemicide, like I said—there's a killing of certain ways of knowing. Another phrase: epistemic cleansing. I said I didn't come up with these phrases. I've been thinking about this for a while, and then Catherine taught at IMS recently, and she had a conversation with one of the staff people there who's alive to this. There's a teacher apparently, Bonnie Duran, who's also really drawing attention to this colonialism, epistemicide, et cetera, within the Dharma.

So there's a kind of—I doubt it's with realizing, I don't think it's intentional—but there's an enforcing of a cosmology and a metaphysics and limited fantasies and images of awakening. All of that is kind of enforced. And it's like closing doors and creating a kind of prison rather than opening doors.

A person might say—very tempting to say—"No, no, no, we're not doing that. We're just teaching a certain mode of mind called mindfulness, which brings freedom." Well, I would actually say, not sure, because I don't think it's a very deep freedom that comes from just that, if the mindfulness doesn't go beyond that deep into deeper insights about reality. If it doesn't include this movement into the unfabricated, the understanding of dependent origination at that very deep level, and if it doesn't open ways of looking, the freedom of ways of looking. If it doesn't liberate ways of looking.

And so sometimes dogma and truth—both things that most people would run from and believe that we're a million miles away from or want to renounce, being dogmatic or drawing in that word "truth," which has become very unfashionable now—but yet it's there, underpinning things without admitting or realizing it. How much is that the case?

The last thing about this—I'll pick up later. But I heard a Dharma teacher say in a Q&A that one can't go in a Dharma center, in a meditation retreat—one can't go, he said, one can't go from meditation to epistemology. In other words, just because you have certain experiences in meditation, you can't take that as saying anything about reality. It's not a valid epistemology. It's not a valid source of knowledge.

Now, I could say, okay, fine, you can say that if you want. Absolutely. But where do you get your epistemology from? You must have some epistemology. Okay, so you're just saying that for you it's not coming from meditation. I don't think you can say that for everyone. In other words, what gives you the right to dismiss that as a source of epistemology, and where do you get yours from?

So nowadays in Western philosophy, some of it is quite fashionable—for example, Richard Rorty and other philosophers—quite fashionable to sort of recognize the hermeneutical conundrum with regard to epistemology, but also ontology and all of that, and also recognize the kind of collapse, if you like, of the whole project of modernity and kind of coming up with the one grand theory of everything that reveals the truth and the way of knowing to know that truth, et cetera.

So philosophers like Richard Rorty respond to all that, kind of reiterate it and respond: abandon epistemology, abandon ontology, abandon all that kind of attempt in philosophy. And what it amounts to is a kind of just shrugging, shrugging at the whole question of ways of knowing. And maybe one comes up with different ideas—and for him it's solidarity with your community, just all kind of believing in the same sort of epistemology, ways of knowing, but kind of letting other communities have theirs. And so that sounds quite nice.

But effectively what happens is there's a reverting to the default epistemology, the default ways of knowing. In other words, you can say that as a sort of intellectual position and declare, "Well, I don't have an epistemology or an ontology or a cosmology," but you actually live one. You live one. You live an epistemology. In other words, there are certain experiences that you trust as being valid sources of knowledge and intimations of what's real, and you make certain conclusions about what's real. You live your life based on that. You live your life with a certain sense of what the cosmos is.

So to say there's no epistemology, no ontology, no cosmology—that's not tenable, as we said before. But because there's not the flexibility of the ways of looking, because there's not the meditative training to actually adopt different conceptual frameworks and different ways of looking, to actually see the experience open up, to inhabit, if you like, different universes, you can say what you like philosophically and intellectually and write it very nicely, but there's just a reversion to the default.

And where did you get that default from? The default is probably mostly from the dominant modernist Western culture. It's just what you receive as much as you learned in high school and whatever most people around you are sort of believing.

So a question would be: why? Where do you get your epistemology from? Is it from what's just popular around you, what's dominant in the culture? Is it just a kind of laziness, where it just slinks to in the being without questioning it? Is it just your own personal inclination? Are you admitting that? Am I admitting that? Why do I choose this or that?

Whatever it is—if I get my epistemology from logic, I get my epistemology from a high school science book, or I get my epistemology from the dominant culture, I get my epistemology from my meditation experience, I get my epistemology from what it says in such scripture or what such and such a teacher says—why? And is it possible to justify any of those epistemologies? I don't think so. Ultimately justify it, I mean.

This is partly why I think epistemology is so interesting: always an epistemology, a decision, a lived decision about what's real and what isn't, will come to rest on some assumptions that are not actually provable, that are ultimately not provable. I end up just having some recourse to some basis that's not actually provable.

So can we be conscious of this? Where am I getting my epistemology, and what are my claims for it? If I realize this—that epistemology rests on some assumptions, which somewhere needs to rest on some assumptions that are not finally provable—then what are my options? Where does that leave me? Am I just going to smooth this over? Am I going to talk as if it's not true, but then revert to as if there's a certain truth? I avoid the word truth—it's a bad word because it's not very fashionable now, and philosophers have shown that it's not a good thing to go bandying around or assuming. But basically I'm reverting to something that assumes a truth.

What are my options if I really hold this in sight? So what's happening in the epistemology? Classical scientific method, as I pointed out, rests partly on rationalism and reductionism—reducing everything to units and atoms and how these work together in a coherent way, atoms and then subatomic particles or whatever it is, or neural processes or whatever. Partly it rests on rationalism and reductionism.

But as Jeffrey J. Kripal, a scholar, pointed out, and he's drawing on someone else's thought called Charles Tart, he said rationalism and reductionism, if you're choosing that as your epistemological framework—that is the basis of it, which a lot of people do—rationalism and reductionism are also what he calls state-specific truths. This is the bit that he got from Charles Tart. That is, they are specific to highly trained egoic forms of awareness.

In other words, rationalism and reductionism pertain to, or are possible in, a certain state of mind that's actually highly trained. But these states of mind that allow rationalism and reductionism and epistemology and all that comes out of that—these states of mind are more easily reproduced and communicated, at least within our present Western culture. In other words, we are trained in that epistemology. We are trained in that way of looking. We are trained in those states of mind in which rationalism and reductionism sort of hold sway.

It's a training. Training of a state of mind, training of a way of looking. What does that sound like?

Oh, it sounds like a kind of how I would conceive of meditation. That we're training ways of looking. It's just that we're so used to certain ways of looking, certain epistemologies, certain states of mind in our culture, that these become much more easily reproduced and communicated, taught to others.

But if we think of meditation as the whole range of flexibility of learning and developing and moving between ways of looking, it starts to take a different kind of contextual place. Again, what are my options?

So we'll pursue this.

CHAPTER 71

Logos in the Garden of Souls (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 1h18

> In this third part of his exploration, Rob Burbea uses the powerful metaphor of musical perception to examine how conceptual frameworks support soul-making and imaginal experience. He begins with the analogy of someone who can only recognize "Yankee Doodle Dandy" among all music, exploring what happens when receptivity to deeper dimensions of experience is limited or culturally suppressed.
> Burbea addresses the contemporary clash between materialist worldviews and mystical perception, arguing that questions of "reality" versus "unreality" are less important than questions of soul-making value. He emphasizes that perceptivity—whether to music, nature, or imaginal dimensions—is developable and trainable. The talk examines how dominant cultural views can suppress individual openings to imaginal perception, and how a robust conceptual framework can provide stability against such cultural pressures.
> Central to this exploration is the concept of participation—the idea that consciousness participates in divine imagination, eros, and mind rather than existing separately. Burbea discusses how this participatory understanding, grounded in the emptiness of all phenomena and the diversity of ways of looking, can support ongoing soul-making without requiring belief in ultimate truth. He concludes by examining how soul-making might serve as a fundamental principle in developmental psychology, and how any conceptual framework—including his own—must remain open to expansion and eventual "breaking of the vessels" as understanding deepens.

I remember many years ago one of my music teachers saying that General Eisenhower —and I could have that wrong, but someone like that—proclaimed, "I only recognize two pieces of music. One is Yankee Doodle Dandy, and the other isn't." I don't quite know the context or even what he was getting at when he said that, and whether it's relevant that the tune he did recognize was patriotic, nationalistic, militaristic. But imagine or consider someone who has that kind of degree or extent of tone deafness in relation to music. They're really quite unreceptive to music and really quite unperceptive. So what they're perceiving, what they're getting from it is, for some people, staggeringly little.

Now, if such a person were to insist that there is just one tune, Yankee Doodle Dandy, and the rest of it was just random noise, or the rest of it was all actually the same thing, what would you say to such a person if they absolutely insisted that their perception there is reflective of reality? Probably in his case, he's surrounded from childhood with people who seem to be getting something from music—school teachers and others who hopefully kindly explain to him that he's missing something there.

But what if only relatively few people in the society got music? What would happen then? So there were only relatively few people to whom music was very meaningful, full of all kinds of relationships that they could hear between sounds and themes and modulations of key or pitches and harmonies and rhythms and textures. And they perceived a great deal of nuance of structure and shading, evolution and all that, and it had a huge effect on them—on their heart, on their psyche, on the body, on the soul, the meaningfulness.

Imagine if there were just a few people like that in a society where everyone else was more like General Eisenhower. Might it not be then that they were considered somehow a bit, perhaps even pathological, maybe crazy? Maybe some people would think, "Oh, they're just pretending. They're imagining something." And the claim would be, "Well, that's not real. What they're perceiving there and what they feel there, seeing these relationships, these meanings—it's not real."

For me, this is quite an interesting reflection. Is music and those relationships, the relationships between essentially just sounds, pitches, timbres—are they real or not real? It's an interesting question. Is music—and I don't just mean the fact that here's a pitch of so many hertz and this rhythm is twice the rapidity of this rhythm—I mean the whole gestalt of it, including its sense of meaningfulness and beauty and soul and all that. Is that real or not real? Is that even the right question?

Would we better ask: is it important? For some people clearly it's not important, and for others it's extremely important—music, those relationships, the meaningfulness there, the soulfulness, the heartfulness, the effects on the body, all of that, moving it to dance, or just touching the psyche to the core, stimulating. That's not a question of reality or not reality; it's important.

And another question, rather than is it real or not real: is it soul-making? Is it soul-making? So these questions of what's important and what's soul-making, rather than what's real or not real, are more important or relevant questions for certain areas of our experience—actually for quite a lot in life.

It's also interesting to note, and I know this as someone who was a musician and studied music, that the sensitivity to music, the perceptivity, the receptivity, the understanding and the noticing and the picking up of all kinds of nuances of relationships between what is, at one level, just sound, different kinds of sound—that is developable.

So the perceptivity, the capacity of perception, the capacity of the subtleties and nuance, the capacity of understanding concepts there and relationships, and even the degree of effect—all of this is developable, it's trainable.

What if we transfer that whole set of analogies around music and receptivity, perceptivity of perception and conception in relation to music and soulfulness and importance, and transfer that to the perception of nature and the perception of others in our lives or things or the cosmos? Again, we can reduce music just as you can reduce it to the physics of sound—this pitch, that frequency, this timbre with this kind of wave on the oscilloscope—but we are missing something that's more important to us, whose perception we can deepen and open and refine and enrich.

Maybe the same with nature. Maybe the same with perception of others. The imaginal perception that we're talking about, when there's an erotic relationship with music, with art, with nature, with another, with others, with a thing, an object, with the cosmos. So the whole real, not real question is a little misguided there.

And yet you can see how much what is kind of acceptable or the dominant view within a culture can tend to really hold sway and gain an authority just because it's what most people are able to perceive, or it's not what most people are able to perceive. And again, you get the converse as well in history—just the authority of those who claim to perceive something and the reality of what they perceive over those who don't.

And oftentimes this is what you get: apart from the political issues there, you get a clash of realisms, a clash of essentially fundamentalisms. "This is true, all reality is based on this," or "This is real." Someone describes something, a mystical perception, or a spiritual perception, a magical perception—"That's rubbish, it doesn't exist." And the other person says, "They do exist, these stones really are talking to me," or whatever it is. And both are assuming, even if they're not aware of it, they're drawing on, basing their arguments on an assumption of some kind of objective, independently existing reality.

And it doesn't exist like that, or it does exist like that. But that's all that reality kind of means. And people get very charged about this—it's a heated issue, certainly in particular circles.

Some people who oppose giving any importance or place to imaginal perception, mystical perception, or spiritual perception wage a kind of secular crusade. And probably vice versa in history and at present. Someone might say, "Science shows that these things don't exist." But actually this person has not understood science and the whole scientific project. Does it show that these things do not exist? What is the range of science? What does science even purport to be qualified or equipped to investigate? What is the range of the scientific method?

The very structure of the scientific method is to leave out, deliberately, a whole slew of aspects of our being—because it's determined that's not what we're doing in the scientific method. We're paring that away. Something similar goes on with mindfulness as well. One is amputating, chopping off a whole range of other dimensions of our being, of our experience, of our ways of knowing.

A person who says something like that would do well, I think, to investigate a little philosophy of science over the centuries and especially more recently. They might question even what science says about basic realities. For example, the electron—that subatomic particle. No one's ever seen an electron. The reality given to an electron is not the reality of a little tiny billiard ball. That's a model of it. And even that model is not really the model of modern quantum mechanics and science. It has no where, no when, specifically, objectively, independently existing. The electron is no place, and it doesn't occur at any time. It has no particular velocity or mass. It's not really even a thing, as Niels Bohr said. Does it even have existence?

Don't assume that what you learned in high school and what you surmised about science and what it proves or asserts is actually the reality of what someone at the frontiers of science—a particle physicist at the edge, actually doing creative research—would hold.

What anyway is the difference between the scientific method—where I would deliberately put aside feelings, imagination, even ethical values, aesthetic values—that's the ideal of the scientific method. And it's a method, a methodology, not a fact about reality. So what started as a scientific methodology in the scientific revolution and with the Western Enlightenment actually became, over several hundred years, entrenched as an unquestioned fact about reality and existence. Strictly speaking, it's a methodology. It's one way of knowing.

Someone a little more sophisticated, perhaps, who's keen not to give much place to imaginal perceptions—either intrapsychically or in and of the world—or to mystical states of consciousness and perception, would say something else. They would know that the notion of truth is no longer philosophically respectable. If you go using words like truth, it tends to raise eyebrows in certain circles—disapproval and questioning, supercilious questioning, which is fine. But then oftentimes they avoid that word, perhaps deliberately, and make a noise about avoiding that word. But underneath, they're assuming some kind of basic existential reality or facticity, to borrow a fancy, fashionable word from modern philosophy, of our situation.

"This is our situation. We live in a meaningless, material universe of which we are—our consciousness and our being and our complexity—an amazing evolution out of matter over eons of evolution. Consciousness is an epiphenomenon. Essentially, the world is material. There are no other dimensions, really. And it's finite. We are finite. We're faced by our death and the extinction of all that. And you're trying to pump up the imaginal or mystical perception or things that happen in meditation—ideas about something transcendent that we can open to beyond the senses, beyond materiality, all that. This is just your attempt at consolation because you can't handle the fact of our existential situation."

Of course, they don't use the word truth. They might use the word facticity or something. But the accusation of consolation seeking already assumes that this is the truth. The existential fact is what you seek consolation with respect to. So I might not use the language of truth, might hide it, but it's functioning there. And there's the clash of realisms so often in these kinds of conversations.

And a person who is drawn to investigating and opening up and exploring the imaginal and mystical states of consciousness and perception—questioning the whole assumptions about reality that are so pervasive in our modernist, materialist, and physicalist culture—can very easily embark on that kind of investigation with all their enthusiasm and openness, and yet very easily be shaken into doubt. They can be pressed into doubt just because of the pervasiveness of the dominant view in our culture.

They might hear a talk or read a book by someone presenting the case for erasing and eradicating mystical perceptions and mystical notions and any place for the imaginal. This could happen in a secular context, in a secular dharma context, here at Gaia House, or anywhere. It's very easy now for a person to be buffeted this way and that by all the opinions flying around in the community, whether it's a smaller community or the larger community of the culture.

So a person wanting to explore and having experiences, being really touched by certain experiences—imaginal openings and perceptions, or meditative openings and experiences of all differing kinds—experiences which potentially can be really fertilizing and fertile as seeds in the psyche, in the consciousness, in the life, can very easily, because of all these different opinions and because of what's dominant in the culture, and because of a lot of the aggression that often goes with that (which itself is very interesting—why is there so much aggression bound up with this question?), be assailed by doubt, even paralyzed.

They've had these experiences, been touched by them, feel drawn to them, want to open to them. Then something happens: they hear someone give a talk or read a few pages of a book, and somehow it goes into a kind of freeze. Something gets paralyzed, or they dismiss their experiences, or they're ashamed, or they keep it to themselves and then it withers—especially when what they read or hear is quite aggressive.

The person who is being dismissive and perhaps aggressive or polemical in their crusade against these kinds of openings of perception doesn't need to say anything particularly brilliant or radically incisive or particularly new. Oftentimes all they need to do is just slowly and clearly take their time and essentially repeat the dominant, unquestioned view of the culture to which we have all been exposed over years. Even if you grew up in a religious setting, you're still exposed to what I call the dominant view of modernism, of physicalism, of meaninglessness—of what the reality of our existential situation supposedly is.

A person can grow up buffeted by different views—this often characterizes our society—but this physicalist, flat worldview of secular modernism is something we've all been subjected to pervasively and from all different sides, loudly and implicitly. Many of these messages are really not even that obvious for years.

So all the person has to do is just slowly and clearly repeat what you've already heard, what some part of you already understands and knows, without actually making explicit the assumptions underneath that and the historical context. In a way, the power of that argument comes from the fact that it's a repetition—it's a hearing of what one already has heard before and been indoctrinated with. And there's a power from the solidarity, to borrow a phrase from Richard Rorty, just from the fact that so many people either buy into it completely or buy into it at least partially in this kind of cognitive dissonance between that and their more spiritual beliefs.

Because it's a repetition of what you've already been saturated in, and because everyone else seems to agree with it, that makes that position actually quite easy. I don't have to say or write anything particularly incisive or new. Often what happens is a kind of straw man gets set up as an opposition—an easy target. Someone like an Islamic fundamentalist terrorist, or some of the corruption in the papacy, or someone who's clearly ridiculously holding on to something out of desperate fear of their perceived existential situation and wanting consolation. It's a straw man, an easy target.

Why am I saying all this? Just to make the point again that a grasp of—and I use that word carefully—a rootedness in a carefully thought-out, structured, supportive, and generative conceptual framework, one that's to some degree reliable and robust and sophisticated and well-conceived enough, will provide stability in that kind of culture, which is the culture we are in now. We're buffeted by different opinions, often quite aggressive, having been exposed to certain points of view incredibly pervasively, literally inundated by that view, so that we don't even consider it a dogma because it's so pervasive. It's like a fish not recognizing the water it's swimming in.

But a grasp of, a rootedness in, a use of, an implementation of, an incorporation of a careful, supportive, and generative conceptual framework brings a degree of stability, a degree of clarity and orientation. It gives a kind of foundation, and actually will open up experiences further. So those experiences that are potentially fertilizing as seeds can actually be that—they can actually fertilize the psyche, the mind, the heart, the being, the body. This is for the soul that wants soulfulness, that wants soul-making. Admittedly, and I'll come back to this, we want that—human beings seem to want that to different degrees.

This is partly why a conceptual framework is really important: the entertaining of concepts and conceptual frameworks, deliberately, consciously, rigorously even.

We've said that part of what must be included in a conceptual framework is this whole unpacking or explanation of the process of soul-making, based on phenomenologically noticing and delineating different kinds of movement of desire. Drawing out this distinction of eros and what's involved with that and where it goes, just from observation of what is involved for us, for the psyche, for the citta, as human beings in our life. And then exploring and explaining the dynamics of that soul-making process—eros, psyche, logos in its expansion because of the pothos that we've talked about. In some way or another, part of the conceptual framework needs to draw that out and give it a conceptual grounding and structuring that's fertile.

Another aspect of the conceptual framework needs to be this non-separation of the citta—which includes the soul, what we're calling soul—non-separation of the mind, heart, soul, consciousness, citta. There's a non-separation of the citta and whatever we sense of reality, or whatever reality is. Implied in that, or included with that, is the emptiness of all things and the whole notion of ways of looking.

Way of looking is an aspect, or a mode of being of the citta at any time. So all that—this non-separation of citta and reality, and...

The emptiness of all things and the notion of diversity of ways of looking that are available to us. All that needs to be an aspect, an element, woven into the conceptual framework which is said already.

So that mindfulness is not and does not expose reality as it is, things as they are. It does not expose what is. Mindfulness does not bring us into an encounter with something called life—as someone put it, life "exorcised of the tumor of metaphysics." Mindfulness is just one way of looking, wrapped up with a certain conceptual—well, actually quite a lot of concepts wrapped up in mindfulness, in the experience, even of bare attention. It's one way of knowing. Great, it's fantastic, wonderful—it's one way of knowing. Actually probably it's more than that. Really implicit in what the Buddha meant by mindfulness is there's already a range of ways of knowing.

But what we want, what we need, what the conceptual framework needs is to open, open the ways of looking with this different, more sophisticated idea of reality and the non-separation of the citta, including the soul, and reality. Emptiness of all things and the ways of looking, all kind of implicit together in that.

So an idea that I already mentioned, an idea like participation. This is a concept. It's also a perception that I can have. It's an experience, if you like. It's an imaginal perception. But where does imaginal perception shade into what we wouldn't consider imaginal perception? We would just consider perception. But an idea like participation, for instance, that this mind, my mind, in its depths is, if you like, rooted in or participates in the mind of the cosmos. Not that it's just one with, but it participates in the mind of the cosmos. It expresses the mind of the cosmos, the divine mind.

Or that my imaginal faculty, the images that come to me, the images I perceive, either so-called intrapsychic or of the world, these too are the imagination of the divine, or the Buddha nature, or whatever. So I participate in the Buddha nature through my imaginal perception. Or again, the eros that I feel, and all that whole range and all the directions of my eros is—we've said this a few times—I have the sense that I'm participating in the divine eros, in the eros of the Buddha with his consort, the consort with the Buddha. However we frame it, there's some sense of this, of what I experience at one level as mine, is at another level mirroring, echoing, rooted in, originating in and participating in the divine eros, the divine imaginal faculty, divine imagination, the divine mind.

So that idea of participation, or the set of ideas that we might call participation, is an idea or a set of ideas that actually supports and stimulates soul-making. It brings more eros, more psyche, more image, gives imaginal dimension, opens imaginal dimension, and a stretching and a complicating of the logos, of the idea. So we get ideas, as we said, that actually support and fertilize the soul-making process. And therefore it is a valuable idea. Why? Because it stimulates soul-making. It supports and stimulates and gives this more dimensionality to the soul-making movement and dynamic. Therefore, it is valuable. And therefore, it is valid. It's valid because it's valuable. Those words are actually related etymologically. It's valid because it's valuable, and its value is that it stimulates what the soul loves, soul-making. It stimulates that beauty, that richness, that opening, that fertility, that creativity, that discovery, all of that, and the multidimensionality of that.

This idea of participation, which is, if you like, part of our set of ideas—this set of ideas called participation is part of a larger set of ideas which forms our conceptual framework, or may be part of our conceptual framework. But participation as a set of ideas also includes the understanding that we're not dealing with anything that has an independent existence. So we participate in perception. We participate in the world that's perceived, in the very perception of it. We participate in the divinity. We participate in actually anything. And so it has inherent, if you like, intrinsic to the very idea of participation is the realization that things are empty, that there are ways of looking, that our ways of looking are actually participatory. So what is seen, the way it appears and the way of looking, there's no independent existence implied in that.

So say, this idea of participation in the divine, is that—are you saying that's ultimately true? First of all, it's not necessary to the soul-making that we believe it's ultimately true.

A lot of people find this very hard to understand. I think it's intrinsic to a certain depth of soul-making, because we realize image as image, can actually also realize, if you like, idea as idea. I don't need to believe that something is ultimately true in order for it to have its power, its efficacy, its capability and potency to open and to seed and fertilize our experience, our perception, our understanding, our heart, our soul, our minds, and our lives.

Actually, if you go into this whole question of participation, the very question "is it ultimately true?" crumbles because of what the idea is in itself. If we turn it the other way around, to claim the independent existence, the separate existence of anything—separate from the way of looking, independent of the citta—I would say that is definitely not true. Any attempt at doing that so far in the history of humanity has been pretty seriously questioned. What one finds is that it's actually very hard to construct a coherent conceptual framework on a ground of solidity, on a ground of independent existence.

The attempt, for example, in physics to derive everything from the basic building blocks of matter just comes round again, or so far has just come round again to questioning the reality of those building blocks—the independent reality, independent of the way of looking. We can't find them as independently existing things, independent of the way of looking. Nagarjuna showed this even relative to Buddhist atomism—a brilliant critique exposing the impossibility of constructing a coherent conceptual framework on realist grounds. And again, in modern Western philosophy in recent years.

From different directions, it's almost like to have a grounding in a conceptual framework that actually has the effect of solidity, our ground needs to be not solid. You understand? We can't get away with claiming the independent, separate existence of anything and claiming that's the truth—that things exist independent, separate from the way of looking.

This idea, this set of ideas we're calling participation, also intrinsically implies the observation or acknowledgement that the way of looking both discovers and grants sacredness to something. We don't just discover it. We grant it. The way of looking grants it. We create it—whether it's an image or eros or whatever. That whole admission and observation is not a problem within the idea of participation.

To me, there's a more sophisticated ontology and epistemology and cosmology, in fact metaphysics, wrapped up in something like the idea of participation, which can sound at first sight like just abstract metaphysics with no grounding in anything real at all. So go into these things. Actually really question. Dare to question.

There's a kind of pragmatism here, which again is quite a popular word in modern philosophy, that essentially states you can believe what works for you. There's a pragmatism of approach and of conceptuality here, but it's actually one that opens possibilities—possible new ways of looking, or the possibility of new ways of looking—and actually implements them, opens orientations, opens experiences, opens the living, and opens the field of life for us, the field of our existence, the sense of existence, in ways that we actually move through.

Sometimes what you get is what's called pragmatist philosophy, but all it does is revert almost by default back to whatever was the default concept or ideation of ontology, epistemology, cosmology—basically the default hidden metaphysics there. Can we have something actually that's pragmatic? I mean, really practical. An idea or a set of ideas that is actually practical, that we live, that opens perception, opens experience, opens ideation, opens the heart, opens all that soul.

What is needed, I would say, is some kind of conceptual frame, which means some set of connected ideas that supports an ongoingness, a potential ongoingness of exploration, inquiry—supports the opening of frontiers, creativity and discovery in all domains and in all aspects of our being. And even those domains and those aspects of being can also get opened and increased. In other words, we discover domains, and we discover aspects of being, or we create them, or both. They are opened for us, where before we had no sense that there was even that domain of being, and that aspect of our existence.

Some conceptual framework, some set of connected ideas that will support this fecundity of exploration, expansion, opening—this infinity of domains and dimensions and aspects of being, of existence. Not just the intellect, certainly not. Not just the heart, not just the body, but the artistic, all of this, the soul.

Soul—what do you mean soul? It's a domain of being. The way these open up—like what the body can be, what the heart can be, what the intellect can be. In other words, how it can be conceived, not just the range of experiences there. And so opening up also, with all that, a kind of potential infinitude of interpretations. Back to this hermeneutics—that existence, life, world, cosmos, being, humanity, body, all of this, materiality—there's an infinitude of potential interpretations there. It's not constrained. It's not constricted. Through the participation itself, we're creating, discovering interpretations. That is, if you like, the nature of existence. The nature of the cosmos is not limited.

Infinite interpretations. The garden of infinite interpretations. The orchard of infinite interpretations.

Infinite interpretations, by the way, doesn't mean that any interpretation goes or that any interpretation is just as good as any other one. If you know your mathematics of infinity, there are different kinds of infinity. So you can still have infinite interpretations while not exploring a whole other infinite set. It's the nature of infinity. There are infinite even numbers and there are infinite odd numbers. So you can have infinite soul-making interpretations and helpful interpretations, and infinite unhelpful interpretations.

Only this kind of conceptual framework, to my way of thinking, would be philosophically viable, legitimate, and defendable. But more importantly, only this kind of conceptual framework can satisfy soul. Only a framework that's this fertile, that supports this ongoing expansion, complication, dimensionalizing—creativity, discovery, interpretation—can satisfy soul.

What if we play with the idea of placing soul-making—this movement of eros that stimulates the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, expansion, complication, widening, deepening, enrichment—as a conception that can form a base for other explanations of all kinds of things? Taking soul-making as something basic. Simply saying the soul wants, it has erotic desire for soul-making. It wants soul-making, the expansion of soul-making, the growth of soul-making, the movement of soul-making in all directions and domains, potentially infinitely, eventually.

There's a movement in time here, a becoming. It may happen in fits and starts, with blocks and then explosions and walls crumbling, or just gradual expansion. If we say something basic—it sounds really simple—the soul wants, has an erotic desire for the expansion of soul-making in all directions and domains eventually.

The soul-making in regard to the self, in regard to the beloved other or others, in regard to the world becomes potentially equalized, because the soul wants that soul-making expansion in all directions and domains. This is its natural, organic movement. So as imaginal and erotic objects, the other, the self, and the world are equalized, balanced there. They're all filled out. The soul-making movement is happening in all those directions.

But also in the domains or directions of body, heart, mind—all these are expanded too. The soul wants all these to be expanded: what the body is, how it can be perceived, what it means, what it can do, what it can feel, what it can sense, its ways of knowing, the heart, the mind. Not that one is blocked or stuck or cramped. That would be a blocking or cramping of the whole eros-psyche-logos process, the whole soul-making movement.

Problems arise when one of these directions or domains or aspects of being is blocked as an avenue of soul-making, or there's a stuckness there, or it's cramped—when the logos or the image is rigidified. Or there's an imbalance because one side is blocked, one direction is blocked, one aspect or domain is blocked.

For example, there's not the inclusion of the self as being filled out by imaginal perception, or there's a preoccupation with the self without attending to the other as an imaginal object, erotic object. Or the world is not included. What happens to our relationship with nature when we lose the eros and the sense of dimensionality of the natural world? What happens when we objectify another—when they lose that dimensionality, when we lose the eros there? Maybe there's still attraction, as we've talked about before, but somehow I've objectified them.

What happens if our notion of flesh or materiality or the body is not allowed—if the soul-making erotic involvement with flesh, with body, is not permitted in some way? Then our sense and our concept and our perception of flesh and body is stuck at one level—maybe one-dimensionality. It is this. It's good for that.

It's not good for this. It's this or that. And to me, this presents a fascinating exploration—an invitation to play with the idea of placing soul-making as a truly fundamental movement in our entire approach to psychology, spirituality, and path.

Consider, for instance, how we might reconsider human developmental psychology through this lens. I won't delve deeply into this now, but I'll offer something as a starting point for future exploration.

Freud regarded pleasure-seeking as the fundamental drive of human beings—this was what eros meant to him. Problems arose when these drives for pleasure, often sexual and oriented toward sensual gratification, were blocked or inhibited by the demands of culture, society, and parenting. His entire developmental psychology placed what he called eros—this pleasure-seeking principle—at its foundation.

Half a century later, Douglas Fairbairn, a Scottish psychoanalyst in the Freudian lineage working within what's called the British Object Relations School, proposed something different. He argued that the fundamental movement is object-seeking, which he termed libido rather than eros. For him, what the infant truly seeks is an object—the other. The fundamental drive is to connect with others, not, as Freud suggested, the gratification of sense pleasures or the reduction of tension in the pleasure drives.

Fairbairn proposed this libidinal drive as the primary force, alongside what he called an anti-libidinal drive—a protective mechanism that develops to shield us from the disappointment and pain of rejection or unavailability of the objects we seek. These dynamics can become internalized in complex ways within his theoretical framework.

Contemporary psychology often considers another model entirely: the notion that in the womb there existed a state of oneness and wholeness, a non-differentiated oceanic bliss of unity with the mother. Birth then becomes a trauma of separation into differentiated being, a shock to the system. The construction of self-sense becomes a force for coherence and delimitation—creating boundaries whose function is to protect against dissolution back into that primordial oneness, which carries the memory of birth trauma.

Meanwhile, ego psychology sets as its fundamental achievement the development of a well-boundaried, coherent self—this becomes the marker of psychological health and maturity.

What intrigues me is this question: What if we conceived of eros, as we've been exploring it, and soul-making as the fundamental drive? This would mean something more than Freud's pleasure-seeking, and it would also differ from Fairbairn's object-seeking, even though his focus on connection sounds remarkably similar to our understanding of eros as the desire for deeper connection.

The crucial difference lies in how we conceive the object itself. Fairbairn's object—what the child or infant seeks—is assumed to be fixed, well-defined, stable, and limited. Admittedly complex, yes, but not infinite, not full of potentially infinite imaginal dimensions, not possibly divine.

In our exploration, eros is not equivalent to a movement toward oneness and dissolution that must be defended against. Rather, eros organically creates and retains otherness—maintaining some degree of separation and distinction between self and other. Kohut's ideal of the well-boundaried self need not be fundamental either; it simply becomes part of what naturally happens in the soul-making process, as eros creates some sense of division and boundary.

I'm only touching on this to open possibilities for future investigation. The distinctions may seem subtle, but I believe they're quite significant. We've become so accustomed to thinking about developmental psychology in established terms that they've become almost entrenched. But what would happen if we placed eros and soul-making, as we've been exploring them, at the center as the fundamental drive?

What would this imply for constructing a developmental psychology? How would we understand various human pathologies in relation to this framework? Our conception of the object that the soul seeks differs from Fairbairn's understanding, and our sense of self certainly differs from Kohut's achievement model.

Implicit in our exploration is the recognition of image as image—all of this as part of the natural soul-making dynamic. The question becomes: which aspects get blocked, at what point, and in what direction?

So the soul-making movement doesn't lead to a dissolution of the self or a reification of the self. It's really important to have a sense of a real self before you can let go of it. But is that really the problem? The soul-making process doesn't reify self or object, but that might be a stage in the soul-making process. These aspects of the other—objects conceived less dimensionally, less imaginatively pregnant—might just be a stage. And Kohut's achievement of the psychologically-boundaried, coherent self might just be a stage of the soul-making process as well.

I'm simply playing with something here, but to me it's quite an interesting avenue to explore. So much of what we consider, or what modern psychology considers to be the self—and there is quite a range in that conceptualization—reveals how relative it is to Western modernist culture, as I mentioned before.

Ernst Cassirer wrote a whole series of books called The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms. He describes the Bataks of Sumatra, for whom the self existed in relationship with a spirit particular to that individual—I believe it was called a Begu. This spirit dwells within the person but not really, separate from their ego, separate from their "I." All kinds of conflicts can arise—the person wants one thing, the ego wants one thing, and the spirit wants another. Yet there's a power that this spirit possesses in determining the character and even the future of that person.

This is not the coherent, unfragmented self of Kohut, yet it was regarded as normal, as what a person naturally involves. Certain notions of what constitutes psychological health are simply products of modernist Western culture, which we mistake for reality and rarely question.

If we consider developmental psychology more deeply, we tend to think the past causes the present—causality runs linearly from past to present. We look for first causes, conditions, environment, trauma, and trace everything moving from past to present. But what if causality actually opens into a much broader sense of causation? What if it doesn't just come from the past, but we are also called toward something in the future? What if causality also emerges from the present, through dependent origination? And what if what's truly causal extends beyond what manifests simply on a material level in a purely human dimension?

The Bataks' notion of a non-material entity being quite causative raises profound questions. What do we need? What is actually served, and what is lost when we constrain our notions of causality—not just notions of self, but our entire understanding of what constitutes healthy thinking, healthy selfhood, and psychological well-being?

When we consider various pathologies that can occur for human beings, we tend to relate them to developmental psychology—some kind of arrested or incomplete development. But I want to point toward a different direction that could prove quite fruitful. What happens if the imaginal dimension becomes available to open in a certain direction—say, in relation to other but not in relation to self, or in relation to self but not in relation to other? There's a kind of lopsidedness to the soul-making opening and movement. What causes this lopsidedness initially, and what does it result in developmentally? What kinds of pathologies emerge when this becomes a long-term, habitual mode of being and seeing?

What if there's this repeated pattern of not seeing image as image, not understanding "this is image"? Of course, this is actually quite common, though we don't tend to realize it. In our culture and education, there's a real push to make sure the child knows what reality is, coupled with an almost palpable fear of imagination—that it might linger too much, except in very contained directions like art class or school theater. This fear of imagination leads us to suppress it while emphasizing something called "reality."

But perhaps healthy psychology actually requires that the imaginal dimension be allowed more, amplified more, explored and opened to more fully. This suggests a very different way of thinking about psychology, developmental psychology, and pathology.

I wonder: do children, does an infant, does a child really believe their images and confuse them with reality? When children are playing, this doesn't seem to be the case. There's this fear about over-imagination, as if pathology lies in allowing the imaginal to grow too freely. I wonder if we can actually trust the human psyche to naturally see image as image, to understand that image is image as part of its natural development—if it's allowed to, if it's supported, unless it's subjected to some kind of fundamentalist dogma.

And that fundamentalism can take obvious forms—religious fundamentalism that doesn't see image as image—or much subtler forms that are harder for us to recognize because they're so embedded in our cultural assumptions.

totally woven into our culture and we don't even see it.

Not seeing an image as an image is regarded as relatively acceptable if most people around me agree to see it that way—to agree that this is reality, not an image. If my whole community shares some image and doesn't see this image as an image, it's somehow deemed psychologically normal. From outside of that community, it looks pathological, bonkers, dangerous. But I wonder if there's this natural, organic movement of the psyche to understand the imaginal and to see it as image, if it's allowed to, if it's supported to, if it's not subject to the pressures of fundamentalism or some kind of logos that doesn't permit that recognition.

Again, when we think of pathology on this broader scale—as I said, expanding what we've explored in moment-to-moment meditative navigation—we might consider the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, this expansion and mutual fertilization. Where can this get blocked or fall out of balance? Is it in the logos? Is it the image getting stuck somewhere, rigidly identified, not seeing images as images—whether images of self, other, world, the eros itself, the love, or something like the body?

The body might be related to in a way that doesn't allow it to be imaginally filled out. There might be all kinds of belief in an image of the body, or an idea of the body, or the eros has gotten stuck in relation to the body. Something becomes imbalanced, something gets blocked in that whole circular mandala where everything wants to move in all directions. Something gets obstructed in the eros, in the psyche, in the logos, in the image of self, other, world, eros, body, whatever it is. It's not seeing image as image, and pathologies emerge from that—incomplete or arrested development arises from that, perhaps.

These are just some ideas to offer for reflection that might prove interesting and fruitful.

Lastly, I want to touch on something I've mentioned before. In the conceptual framework we're unfolding here with soul-making—the explanation of the soul-making dynamic and what's involved—we need, and perhaps we have, a conceptual framework that implies, already implicit within it, that eros and soul-making will always elude our final understanding. They are always more than we can ever comprehend.

Why? Because the eros, because of the pothos within the eros, always wants more of whatever it comes into relationship with as an erotic object. This stimulates the eros-psyche-logos dynamic to create and discover more—always more. It expands, opens, stretches, breaks the boundaries of anything it encounters in creating and discovering more of that thing, including not just psyche and soul, but eros itself. And whatever logos, whatever idea is involved with the notion of psyche or the notion of eros.

Whatever idea of these—those boundaries and ideas, as I've said before, are delineations. They create boundaries, but they will also be broken open, expanded, stretched. Simply because of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, they will eventually move in the direction of eros and in the direction of soul itself. The dynamic will include them in its whole expanding vortex of movement, involvement, digestion, transformation, transubstantiation, creation, discovery.

In a way, this whole understanding of the eros-psyche-logos movement, process, and involvement means that any logos, any idea, will expand or break in time. In time it will crack. To paraphrase Leonard Cohen: there's a crack in everything, and that's where the light comes in.

We might think of this in terms of our broken heart and our imperfections, but we can just as readily apply it to ideas, to logoi, to conceptual frameworks. Implicit in how we're discussing the soul-making dynamic—eros, psyche, logos, and all that—is the Kabbalistic idea of the breaking of the vessels. The Shevirat HaKelim—it will break. And the crack is a blessing. The light comes in. There's illumination, further expanse. Something of the divine, if we want to amplify that metaphor—the light of the divine enters through the crack.

We will reach a point with any idea, any concept or framework, where it won't be able to contain or account for our experience, new ideas, new observations. The very idea of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic may face this too. It's interesting as an idea, though, because it includes within itself this notion of the breaking of vessels, of cracks, because of what it implies about expansion.

There are already cracks in this idea—structural weaknesses, circularities, as there must be with any conceptual framework. Is that a problem? Perhaps theory, conceptual framework theory, is more theater. Theory is theater more than reality or truth. Theory is theater.

I don't think those words are etymologically related, but let's connect them imaginally: theory is theater. What does that mean? Theater actually has etymology connected to the gods, theos, I believe.

The question is not about its reality and truth, but what is it serving? What is it serving? A theory, a conceptual framework. And we've already said: soul-making. Serving soul-making is... And the theory itself is part of soul. The logos is part of what we're calling soul and soul-making.

So in a way, we discover a conceptual framework based on our observations and deductions from that. But we create it. We could say we forge it—with the double implication of what that word means. We forge a conceptual framework. We are forging a conceptual framework.

And theory is theatre.

This is, to me, a whole notion of concept that's soul-making, that's fertile. To me, beautiful as well.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 72

Doubt and Discernment (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h19

> In this foundational talk from the Eros Unfettered retreat, Rob Burbea directly addresses the natural doubts that arise when encountering teachings on eros and the imaginal, particularly regarding explicitly sexual imagery in spiritual practice. He transforms paralyzing doubt into active inquiry, encouraging practitioners to investigate for themselves whether these practices lead to escapism or deeper engagement with life.
> Burbea draws on his personal journey of gradually learning to trust erotic imaginal practice, sharing intimate details of dreams and meditation experiences that initially confused him but eventually opened profound dimensions of soul-making. He explores the distinction between genuine eros—which opens the energy body and creates soul-making resonances—and mere craving, which contracts and closes the heart. The teacher emphasizes that imaginal figures often come with a sense of duty or message, seeking translation into lived engagement rather than withdrawal from the world.
> The talk challenges common spiritual assumptions about 'fleeing reality,' questioning what we mean by reality itself and whether dismissing the imaginal actually represents its own form of escapism. Burbea argues that unlike paths toward universal oneness—which can render particulars replaceable—the erotic imaginal offers infinite creative possibilities for discovering sacredness through the unique and particular. He concludes by emphasizing the Buddha's invitation of ehipassikā (come and see), encouraging practitioners to maintain active questioning rather than settling for inherited assumptions about desire and spiritual practice.

Hearing all this talk about eros and the imaginal, engaging these practices and trying out these practices of the erotic imaginal—especially when they're explicitly sexual—it would be very normal, I think, in our culture, but also in the Dharma culture, for doubt to arise. It would be very understandable, very normal. So it's important to address this and to take a little time to look at that from different perspectives, to unpack it.

Some of what I'm going to touch on here we may have mentioned before here and there, but much of it is worth repeating. And I also want to take it a little further into other discernments, more refined discernments regarding eros and craving.

Someone could hear all this or even do a practice, and even when it happens—when they're surprised by what the practice opens for them and how touched they are by the beauty of it—someone can still come with a question: But isn't this escapism? This business with the imaginal, and especially when it's erotic, isn't this escapism? Will it lead to my not engaging with life?

In a way, is it? Is it escapism? Does it reduce your engagement with life, lead to some kind of cutting off from opening to life, meeting it, engaging with it? Does it close down your care with respect to life?

The best way to address the question of doubt is really to turn it into an active question. Find out. Because at the end of the day, only you and your inquiry and your experience will really have the power, the convincing power. Sometimes the teacher or an authority says this or that and people just trust the teacher—me or Catherine or whoever it is in this case. But really, at the end of the day, we can know something for ourselves through our inquiry, through finding out, turning the doubt away from the paralysis of doubt into an active engagement of questioning.

Find out: is this escapism? Does it lead to a closing down of the care and of the engagement? Notice, see what happens. We actually have to experiment to find out for ourselves.

We can give the question back to you—and I think that's very important—but we can also say more about it. Because we've talked about, a little on this retreat and quite a bit on previous retreats, for instance the Path of the Imaginal, about the fact that images often come with a sense of duty. Somehow, this imaginal figure or this image, wrapped up in that, comes with a message. Angelos means message bearer. And there's some kind of sense of duty.

Sometimes it's not at all obvious, or it's not obvious how or whether that needs to be concrete—whether I actually need to do something or say something or whatever it is. And exactly what the translation is, or how the image and the sense of duty in the image translates into my life, how obvious that translation is, in what way, in what form, in what idiom and what domain and what manner of expression—most images, not all, but most images seem to want, seem to demand some kind of translation somehow.

I don't mean translation to a meaning—"it means X, it means I should do this." I mean translation as in moving one thing from one area, dimension, domain to another. Translation. So from the image to the life.

Some images are already wrapped up in life—the imaginal perception we have of our lives, of others, of situations, of our work, of our loves. But somehow the image is asking to be taken into the world somehow. And so there's a discernment: is it asking that? How is it asking that? How does life and image kind of reflect or mirror or echo each other? What's the dance, the back and forth, the dialogue, the theater between those two stages reflecting each other, as if two plays on each stage and they're somehow corresponding and somehow interacting? The players on this stage and the actors on the other stage opposite each other, mixing even.

This is something to point out in terms of: is this escapism? Will it reduce my engagement with life? Will it lead to this kind of non-engagement, withdrawal into this fantasy world of images where one becomes kind of inert and unengaged in one's actual life?

But in relation to that, there's a sense of duty that images often have. So that's one thing.

Another is, you know—and I've pointed this out before, so I'm not going to go into it now—but there is, at least in some spiritual circles, and Theravāda Buddhism could definitely be a case in point, that there is the image of non-engagement, which is actually quite dominant. You understand? The image of the Buddha who kind of looks with affable equanimity at the entanglements of more worldly beings and is not himself engaged so much. So that's the eyes closed, the stillness, the equanimity, and of course the movement to transcendence, which is something we'll come back to.

But there is... It's more like, is there an image of non-engagement that's actually dominant, and oftentimes dominant partly through its unconsciousness, that we don't see it as an image, or we don't have enough range of other possible images, archetypal images, available to us as pictures of awakening direction? So it's not that images lead to non-engagement, and so we better not have images. Sometimes the way Theravāda Buddhism is taught is "don't have images," but there's a kind of not very conscious, implicit fantasy image of where we're headed, and that's towards a kind of non-engagement—politically, environmentally, and so forth. And I've talked about all this before; I'm not going to go into it now.

But engagement is given in part—in part it's demanded by an image, most images, because even an image of non-engagement is a kind of "how am I going to be in life?" I'm going to be not so embroiled, not so involved, not so heated by the fires of passion and involvement and social justice, and so forth. But the nature of the engagement or non-engagement is given by the image.

We could add to all this that, rather than taking us away from life, image and fantasy in the ways that I'm using those words—those imaginal images; I'm not going to say "imaginal images" every time, but almost always that's what I mean—images, imaginal images and fantasies, they actually bring a dimensionality to our perceptions of life and the world, self and other. So that's not a non-engagement; that's a deepening of connection, a filling out. They also bring meaningfulness to the perceptions of self, other, world, through the image, through the fantasy, through becoming conscious of that, feeling our way into it, opening to it, letting it open us.

People say, "Is this not just fleeing reality? Are you not just trying to flee reality?" Fleeing reality—I mean, we've also touched on this in other retreats, but fleeing reality, there's so much wrapped up in that ideation. Something like fleeing reality is a movement of fear and aversion, something I don't want to open to, something I want to run away from, close down from, turn the world off—turn that world off, at least. It's a movement of fear.

Is this what we're talking about, really, a movement of fear? And again, does it close the heart and close the engagement? Fleeing reality out of fear will do exactly that. It will—and it will become quite obvious in time, if not to oneself, to others around one—that there's a closing of the heart happening here. There's a closing of the psyche, and there's a lack of engagement in life. There's a dying of the engagement in life to a certain extent.

Then we could also, again, turn the question around and actually say that this whole notion of fleeing reality into imagination may be missing the fact that it's coming already out of a certain ontology, epistemology, cosmology, which has, over centuries now, belittled the imagination and belittled any kind of sacredness of that, or purpose to it, or soul-making as well. So if we actually open up the conceptual framework, the logos, and actually grant the world of the imaginal a place—a necessary place, an importance, a significance—then we can actually turn that question around and say, "Are we fleeing in our lives? Are we fleeing the reality of the imaginal?" Yes, it's a different kind of reality. And there are all kinds of, for me, very interesting ontological questions for us to work out as human beings. I don't think to find a final answer, but to explore creatively—creative epistemology, creative ontology, creative cosmologies.

But we could easily ask: all this dismissal of the imagination and this kind of fearful clinging on to so-called reality, are we fleeing the reality of the imaginal, fleeing the demands of it, fleeing its implications, the depth, the meaningfulness, the duty that comes from that, the ways that it opens the psyche, the soul, the heart, the vision, the sense of the world, the sense of the self, the sense of other? Actually, for me, there's more cogency and force in questioning that way around. I'm so used to assuming and thinking a certain way.

And on top of that is just the whole question about, related, is: what do you mean by reality? What are you assuming reality is? Atomic billiard balls buzzing around in some kind of scientific materialist flatland? Is that what reality is? Or is reality exposed by so-called bare attention or mindfulness, and therefore, the imaginal and all that is not reality? Again, I'm not going to go into that. I've talked plenty and written about that in the past, but there's so much kind of unexposed, implicit in terms of assumptions in these kinds of questions. Is it escapism? Is it fleeing reality? Is it wish fulfillment?

It's important to address these questions, but to actually really address them. So, I mean, really make them questions. It's very easy for something to sound like a question, and it's not actually a question. So, you know, "Is it wish fulfillment?"

Is it even my wish? In the erotic imaginal, do I really feel like this is me and my wishes and I'm indulging my wishes? Actually, look into that. Whose wish is this? I'm engaged in this erotic imaginal interaction or I'm watching this erotic imaginal, sensing this erotic imaginal interaction, whatever. Is it really my wish we're talking about? My wish, the ego's wish? Whose wish is it? It's quite subtle.

And am I able to let go? We talked about this before. Am I just dragged without any choice whatsoever, or am I able to practice putting down, letting go, walking away, picking up and putting down?

Someone might ask a variation on this kind of question: isn't all this just indulging greed? All this talk about eros and erotic imagination, isn't that just indulging greed? So yes, important to ask this question. But again, let's go into the question more. What happens to those who indulge what we might call greed or craving over time? Over a year or ten years, you watch a person and when that kind of tendency and habit to indulge greed and craving is given free flow—it's allowed, it's acquiesced to, it gains the upper hand.

People start making all kinds of justifications to themselves: "Oh, I work really hard," and this and that. And I'm talking about dharma folk, people who are living a dharma life in some kind of very full way. It's their work, it's their practice—it's really at the center of their life. And yet somehow over the years, what happens when just things like comfort, convenience, pleasure, security—all very normal—when the craving for these things starts to gain more leeway? It's given more permission, it's acquiesced to, it's not questioned so much. It just has its river flowing at the side of whatever else we're doing dharma-wise, and it's regarded as okay.

And what happens to the fire? What happens to the brilliance of being, to the intensity, to the luster of the diamond, of the citta, of the heart, of the soul, the radiance? What happens to that over time? Five years, ten years, twenty years?

And what happens conversely to someone who explores the erotic imaginal and actually discerns between eros and craving and investigates eros and opens to it and lets it take things deeper over time? What kind of citta, what kind of soul emerges or is shaped by indulging one or the other—eros or craving?

So look, look around you. Find out. Don't assume. Don't even assume that this person or that person must be living like this or making this choice or that choice just because I assume that about them or myself.

Doubt is questioning, and that's really good. But make it questioning. Make it real questioning. It means inquiry, investigation. Not just settling for a fog of paralysis or confusion, or just a sort of standard, easy answer: "I just heard this, so it must be true."

And then to investigate, of course, we have to begin to discern between eros and craving in the first place. We've talked some about this and we'll come back to it. Again, the centrality of the energy body—just including the energy body already in the awareness and the fullness of that—already moves it, helps it become eros rather than craving. The sensitivity, the openness to the whole energy body. And eros will be characterized, the erotic imaginal will be characterized by an opening and a harmonizing, perhaps energizing of the energy body, unlike craving.

And then there's the soul-making, which we can notice as well. So we've touched on this and we'll revisit it some more. But we can notice the differences here. And actually we can learn, as we touched on already in earlier talks, we can actually learn to navigate between or from craving to eros. That's quite possible.

Something might feel like I'm caught in craving or craving has caught me. There's the contraction of that, a certain way of seeing, a certain state of the consciousness and the energy body. I can discern this, and then with the development of skill and the art of practicing, I can actually explore whether we might liberate this craving into eros—not just let it go, though we can do that too. I've written about that elsewhere, but we can actually learn to navigate from craving to eros, allowing transformation.

Some eros, as I've said, is very, very subtle—and I'm not just talking about sexuality, I've mentioned this many times. Even there, there's really a range. Some eros and some of that erotic connection, erotic charge and movement is extremely subtle.

But let's not be too naive here. I don't want to be alarmist because that would be completely defeating the purpose and it's not justified. On the other hand, just because of this range of subtlety and also because of the distinctions we're making—what leads to what—I don't want to be too naive either.

We've said that eros is fire. There's something about eros that's like fire, and fire is potentially dangerous. At the same time, fire is also extremely useful, extremely productive, very helpful. But it's something that can be dangerous.

Yes, we can learn to navigate with practice, with time, from craving to eros, transforming craving to eros in the moment. But also, something may start as eros, and if we're not careful, may contract into craving, divert, contort itself, or get shrunk somehow so that it becomes craving. So there's a danger in all this—there are dangers in playing with fire.

If you've been around the Dharma for a while, you know that one of the Buddha's central metaphors was of extinguishment—extinguishing the fires of greed, aversion, and delusion. This imagery of extinguishing fires is very central in Pali Canon Buddhism.

This is partly an aside, but it's quite interesting because a case could be made historically that the Buddha picked that analogy for a couple of reasons. One was contextual—as all teaching must be, as all dialogue must be. The context he was dealing with at that time in India was a Brahminical religion, Vedic traditions, where they kept fires alive. There were people whose job, whose sacrificial duty it was to keep the fires going—I think there were three fires.

So the Buddha was addressing himself somewhat polemically, wanting to turn something upside down. You don't need to keep three fires going; it's three fires that you need to put out: greed, aversion, and delusion. You can see the relativity of that metaphor—it came partly out of context. Had he been in a very different context, would he have used that metaphor? We are now in a different context, especially living in cold England or New England.

There's a second reason the Buddha chose this metaphor, having to do with the physics, the then-current understanding of what fire was and what happened when you put it out. Nowadays, we think you just put it out—it's gone, extinguished, disappeared. In those days, the sense was that the fire was liberated. When you put out a fire—this wood fire or whatever—and you extinguish it, the fire is liberated in the sense that it's not clinging to any object. There's a kind of freedom that is beyond space and time—unbound.

There's an etymology there of nibbāna with that unbinding of fire—nibbāna as unbinding.

But it wasn't just a disappearance and non-existence. It was actually almost more potent, but not clinging to anything. So it was this kind of abstract fire that was liberated.

The point is that if we're used to hearing a certain directionality in regard to the metaphor, the imagery of fire, and then we're using the opposite analogies here about mastery of the fire and stoking it and tending flames, that can cause something in the being to shake a little with doubt.

When we talk about the imagery of Dionysus, which I did in one talk recently, we're speaking of how unsettling, how disruptive, how fragmenting, violent and erotic, and intoxicated this archetype is. Dionysus was the god of wine - intoxicated and wild, raving. This disrupts the sort of serene, controlled, placid, sometimes sterile course of what is regarded as civilized. That's all in the territory when we play with fire, when we're with eros.

And then there's that mythology of the breaking of the vessels from the Kabbalah, Shevirat ha-Kelim. All this - we understand what we're saying. This is in the territory of what we're opening to. This comes with the whole landscape that we're entering. It would be very understandable that doubt and trepidation arose. And again, it doesn't fit the imagery that we have or that we've absorbed.

There isn't a kind of Dionysus equivalent in Theravadan Buddhism. That iconography, that mythology just doesn't exist except as something to get rid of. In the Vajrayana icons and deities of Tantric Buddhism - I'm not sure, I don't know nearly enough about the history of how icons get mixed - but many of those gods are full of wildness, those yidams and deities, full of wildness, wrathful deities and phallic deities and the eros and the sexuality that's visible there.

But in Theravada Buddhism, in Pali Buddhism, we're really not used to that kind of mythology. It just is not given a place except as something to renounce, move beyond, get rid of, towards another archetype - the renunciate, celibate, equanimous, uninvolved, calm archetype.

So yes, playing with fire brings danger, and upset, and shatterings, and disruptions. All that goes with the territory of soul-making, and opening to eros, and fire. I don't want to be alarmist because we're also talking about really subtle movements and there's the wisdom of the navigation, but there is that possibility.

But even then, we can ask - and again, it's really important to ask - is there a path without risk? Is there some kind of practice that has no risk? Anyone who really loves a path or a set of practices, anyone for whom it's really important in their life, will be willing to put up with and open themselves to some kind of risk, some kind of sacrifice, some kind of discomfort or confusion at times. Suffering is regarded as okay and acceptable and even necessary on the path.

So ask this of yourselves. Look back at your path or paths you've taken and see at different times how ready and willing you were - and also the nobility of this, the beauty of this - to open to and enter into and go through all kinds of periods or moments, transitions of risk when you didn't quite know, or sacrificing something, confusion, discomfort, suffering basically.

The question is: what kind of risk, sacrifice, confusion, discomfort, suffering are okay on the path? What kind?

It's less dominant now, but the whole Mahasi tradition as it was taught by Mahasi Sayadaw and Pandita and some teachers was very, very intense and strict. The retreats there were full of suffering. Ask anyone who sat through some of those long retreats with Pandita. Someone from the outside might say, "Why do you put yourself through all this suffering? I thought you were interested in getting rid of suffering." But there's a whole logos there and there's a whole image that gives nobility to that suffering, and there's a whole purpose regarded. There are all kinds of sacrifice, all kinds of risk, all kinds of confusion, discomfort - or rather certain kinds. There's a range there in just that paradigm of strict Pandita style.

The question is: what kind? What kind is okay on your path, and how does it fit? What kind of discomfort, confusion, sacrifice, risk, suffering?

Or consider Ajahn Chah - there's a passage somewhere, maybe in A Still Forest Pool - where he talks about just meditating in the jungle when he was practicing as a tudong, just crying, this deep well of tears. He wasn't even sure why he was crying - maybe there was loneliness and such, but it was beyond that. Many of us know this: just practicing in this upwelling of profound sobbing.

And yet there's the whole image and logos that supports that. This is good. Yes, it's difficult, but this is good. This is heartful. This is healing. This is releasing, whatever it is. And of course, you get that in psychotherapeutic paradigms as well. I've been through all of this - sitting through lots of pain, huge upsurges of emotions, not even knowing what they were about.

What kind of risk, discomfort, confusion, sacrifice, suffering are okay on your path? When you think about an artist—someone who really, truly gives themselves, dedicates themselves completely—how much are they willing to put up with? There's risk in that dedication, confusion, sacrifice. This is not an easy choice. It's so similar to spiritual practice. This is part of the territory. When we love something deeply, when we're really engaged, these challenges arise naturally.

The question with all that is: what does it serve? If there's going to be disruption, confusion, some kind of risk and suffering or burning, what is it serving? All this goes together with an understanding, with a sense of where I'm going, with a logos, with a conceptual framework as we talked about. Any practice brings risk—absolutely. What kind? Multiple kinds. And what's it serving? How are we seeing it? What's okay for us?

If I trace my own process with imaginal practice—not just imaginal generally, but specifically with the more obviously erotic imaginal—I'm certain it took me quite a while. It was really a gradual process to move towards truly trusting images, or working with images of, say, attractive females. I was somewhat cautious.

It's funny now, some years later, after having experimented with all this for several years—I actually can't quite remember why I was so tentative and unsure about exploring the more erotic images. This is interesting in itself: something that had quite a subtle but powerful grip on my consciousness and my choices in practice. I was trying to remember while preparing this talk, but I can't fully recall.

I think it had something to do with a suspicion that anything like that would just be a distraction—would distract and dilute me from my central purpose of what practice was about. There was something in that kind of engagement with eros, sexuality, and the feminine that would confuse me. But this is partly a guess, and it's interesting to me that I can't actually remember. In other words, it's just past. Strangely, I was trying to find it in old notes, but I seem to have lost a notebook.

Carl Jung, in a way, developed his psychology partly from a predisposition that was similarly distrustful of the feminine and the attractive sexual—as if there's some kind of luring siren there. James Hillman and others have made this critique, wondering what kind of psychology would have emerged from Jung had he been more trusting, more willing to listen to what he called the anima voice, which he was so wary of in developing his psychology and his personal process.

Looking back, I see sometimes there was a tendency at first to choose a non-sexual image to work with in meditation. For example, if I'd had two dreams the night before that made an impact and I remembered both—one more obviously sexual, the other perhaps more obviously spiritual—I would choose the more spiritual one. There was that tendency to lean away from the sexual into what seemed more obviously spiritual.

Or if I was working with an image in meditation where there were multiple figures, I would tend to go to not the attractive female one, for instance. I noticed that tendency looking back. I also noticed I was quite tentative at first—tentative because, well, this is spiritual. So even when there was beginning to be more willingness to explore the erotic imaginal, even the sexual, it was tentative at first. Perhaps I wouldn't go into the more carnal and voracious sexual image, or maybe just hold back a little from letting it unfold naturally. No, this is meditation time, so it's spiritual.

I made a note a while ago about being able to trace a kind of gradual letting myself explore more and more this strand of erotic imagination and the specifically sexual in meditation practice, but I can't find that note. Still, I was aware of this evolution.

Then a few years ago, I had a dream. Somehow in the dream, I was trying to resist the seductive advances of a beautiful woman. I wasn't quite sure after the dream—why am I resisting this? I don't know if she was a yogi or something, if there was some kind of boundary issue. It was something like that. But I felt very ambivalent—very drawn towards her and attracted.

So I felt like only half successful in my attempts to resist her. By that time I was deeply interested in imaginal practice, so I took this dream into meditation. I allowed her to come again, and then I entered her deliberately—not sexually, but entered her being and became her, identified with her, which is one of the options in imaginal work.

I became her in the meditation practice and looked out through her eyes, out of her being, at me, at Rob. I was aware of how much kindness was there. She really cared for me—there was love there. But she was also somehow communicating: you're being a bit idiotic, Rob, and you're missing the point here. This was fascinating—someone very kindly pointing out a sort of stupidity, a rigidity.

As I experimented with different ways of working with images, I asked her what she wanted. Her response—I can't remember if it was verbal or not—but the sense I got was that she had a very simple sexual desire, a simple erotic, sensual longing. In the very simplicity of it was a kind of purity. It's like, look how simple and pure this is. And you're being a little idiotic, Rob.

This was intriguing, so I let myself experiment in meditation with the eros, with erotic imagery, with the sexual. But as I worked with it, confusion arose. What's the point of this? Where is it going? Where would this kind of exploration lead? I'm mindful of the sexual imagery and entering into that, but is it actually going to achieve anything? Does it lead to the end of suffering?

This confusion was very alive for me. A little later, I realized: I actually don't know. And more than that, I am deliberately in a period of exploration here. This is the domain of my exploration—I must always be in a period of exploration, but this is the particular domain. I don't know the answers to these questions: Is there a point? Where will it go? Will it achieve anything? What's it got to do with the end of suffering?

I remembered a time many years before when the domain of my exploration was the relationship between awareness and emptiness. I found all these conflicting teachings, unclear and contradictory, with people dogmatically saying this and that. It was such a searing investigation for me—so much heart and emotion and passion involved. I remember sitting outside at Gaia House, crying tears with so much longing to understand, wanting to penetrate with insight and just not having someone I could ask or fully rely on for an answer.

There was all that confusion in the investigation, the passion of exploration, but eventually insights came in relation to awareness and emptiness. Answers came, ways forward emerged. I found things, discovered things, worked certain things out, found ways to practice.

Remembering that, I told myself: you've been through something like this before—confusion and uncertainty about how to proceed, what's worth trusting. I reflected that in regard to the imaginal, there may be no definite final answer or truth. It's a different kind of investigation. At that moment, I was aware of this and actually okay with it.

So I was partly okay, and there was still this concern and trepidation, this real ambivalence about the possibility of a long but ultimately fruitless exploration. I might spend years, hours and hours of practice time, and eventually conclude that it was a waste of time, or actually not helpful, and find myself stuck with various problems. This felt like the risk—the risk of the research scientist. Listen to a theoretical physicist: "I spend my days working out equations on paper, trying theories on a blackboard, and at the end of the day, none of them have worked, and I just erase them all."

And then I do the same thing the next day. How many dead ends, how much unknown territory there is in the passion and the willingness to explore. Similarly, in a different way, the same holds true if you're an artist—sometimes there's something parallel there.

But I kept telling myself, well, that's the lot. If you're exploring, if you're actually finding out when there doesn't appear to be any teachings on this that I was aware of, then that's the lot. You don't know. There's a risk there. You're moving into the unknown and you don't know where it's going to lead.

In relation to that image that came out of the dream, what did emerge was a sense of a particular kind of holiness, a kind of feminine divinity that permeated nature. Now I would call that cosmopoiesis. Back then I didn't really—I hadn't made that connection yet. But I noticed that, oh, that's interesting. I worked with that and then outside there was this real sense of feminine divinity in and through nature.

A little later, going for a walk, something felt like I was in a different relationship, a different sensual relationship with nature. Something in the sensuality opened with regard to the nature around me, beneath my feet. It wasn't—rather, it wasn't just mindfulness of sensations, which I had been practicing for years, nor was it only just enjoying the pleasantness of the hot day or whatever it was and the warmth on my skin and all that. Something else, another kind of level came into my relationship with nature that was sensual. Something opened in the sensuality.

And yet it still could not be reduced to it. I wasn't going to put it in the box. It did not feel appropriate or right to say, oh, she, this figure from the dream and the imaginal practice, she represents my sensuality or something like that. No, there was a sense of there's something bigger here. I can't quite, again, get my mind around or fathom completely. It's as if she manifests or embodies this figure, some kind of, at present, unfamiliar kind of wisdom, an unfamiliar kind of depth.

So something was opening, but bigger than I could really figure out, if you like, or the mind could figure out.

A lot of this happens in small movements, and that's partly what I want to communicate about this kind of process, working with soul work and certainly exploring. A lot of it's in small movements.

I'll share another image, and I'll actually give more detail. This is, again, transition over time, some maybe a year later or a little less than a year, I don't know, half a year, a bit more. Again, why I choose certain images to share—sometimes I'll choose an image because it's really intense and really could be regarded as kind of crazy, and it's almost to normalize that there's that range too. Sometimes I choose an image because it's really the opposite. It's really not a big deal. It's not that colorful. It's not that unusual or dramatic. So to really give a sense of the range, like all that is there.

And sometimes I want to share or want to include what goes on in working with the images, including all the false starts and wrong turns in the practice. So you get a sense of actually creative working and responding and navigating, that it's not all just immediately obvious and clear. There's some dancing a little bit with the thing.

So, sitting in meditation and opening myself to see what came, I see a visual image. In this case, I see a young woman sitting by the side of the road and she's sad for some reason. I'm unsure whether to go with the image at first, but then I decided to go with it.

So I sat down next to her and her arms were attractive. There was something like I wanted to comfort her and I stroked her arms, sort of mixture with sexual attraction, but also because she was sad. I noticed that I wanted her to talk, but I also noticed at the same time that there was a pressure to make her talk because of some book that I was reading that basically said you need to get some verbal message or something from the image.

So I backed off a little bit from the pressure of wanting it to be verbal and just opened the sensitivity to, if you like, receiving communication—which, as I've said somewhere before, the communication can be just the image. It's not like there's the image and then it communicates something verbally or some kind of signal. Sometimes the image is the communication.

But this question: what does she want? Backing off the whole pressure to be verbal. And the sense was, she wants to be loved by me. There's some kind of communication in that.

Now, it was actually hard to stay focused. Again, I'm mentioning this because that's all part of it. It's like, oh, this image, my concentration flits in and out of it.

I lose it. It comes back. But I just think, okay, fine. That's just the nature of this image, or it's just one of those days. No problem.

And there's some kind of loving of her. So I'm working with this—okay, it's not so focused, but I'm in and out of that. And there's some kind of... I'm really loving her. But the loving, it's not that it's explicitly sexual. It's not really sexual. It's more just kind of sharing and being with her. Somehow there's love being communicated.

And she keeps changing. And somehow in that, I see that actually—or I kind of reflect—she's empty. She's changing. She's not inherently this way or that. And that makes me realize... I can only love—because I'm sort of trying to open myself to loving her. I say trying, it's a very delicate trying, supporting that movement of the heart and that opening of the heart and that flow. But I realize I can only love who is in front of me right now.

So she keeps changing—how she is, her appearance. And really, I can only love who is in front of me right now and commit to at least showing up for how they appear next. So here's what she is now. And just however she'll be in the next moment or minute or whatever, it's like, okay, well, I'm just going to keep showing up. And whoever it is in front of me, however she seems, I'm going to keep loving that.

So there's a sense of mystery in that, in her emptiness. And then I also realized with a thought, oh, this applies to real beings as well, because they change too, don't they? And it tells me something about love. But okay, so there's a thought, but I said, okay, fine, there's a little insight there about metta and stuff like that, with implications for actual life, so-called. But okay, just noting that, and I don't make a big deal of it, or I don't focus on it.

But again, the whole thing comes in and out of focus. And I have to remind myself to see it all as an experiment. I really have to make a conscious... again, there's this kind of unsureness. What am I doing here? Is it leading anywhere? But I just remind myself of this attitude of experimentation. And that helps.

And so there's this kind of sharing and meeting and she sort of opens up to me. Her being opens and it's like I enter her and then all kind of kaleidoscopic geometrical forms appear which feel quite mystical and significant and wondrous somehow, quite subtle. But again, doubt arises and I don't particularly... so I'm not necessarily picking up on these kaleidoscopic geometrical forms, even though they feel very wondrous.

But then after all this, I feel the subtle after-effects of that whole interaction, of that whole imaginal interaction. So you can hear, as I'm saying this, how kind of undramatic the whole thing is, how much unsureness there is, and how the whole thing is just really these micro-movements that at the time can really seem like... I'm not sure, is this significant? Should I stay with this? Is anything happening? All that.

The word for psyche is a Greek word and I'm pretty sure it's either related to or even some very similar word is the same word for butterfly. I can't remember if I've shared this in a talk before. So psyche and butterfly are related. Now butterfly—I'm taking this from James Hillman—butterfly makes little flitting movements from side to side. It's not this direct supersonic jet flight or crow's flight or bird of prey sort of thing, falcon soaring through space at great speed. It makes these little flitting non-direct movements from side to side, not very fast. That's the characteristic movement, the characteristic flight of the psyche.

And so there's a lot, as I said, in this soul work, soul-making work and imaginal work—a lot of it feels like little micro-movements, little this side and then that side, not this sense of great strides in a direct line that can characterize other movements or other dimensions of soul movement, the movement of other dimensions of soul, spirit.

Now, what's also interesting, again, in the sort of seeming lack of power at first of this whole experience was... so I get up and it was soup time or whatever, and the thought just goes through my head of something I'd read not too long ago. I actually read it again...

about the cosmos being erotic, something to do with Kabbalah that I had encountered. And it's like that thought—just vaguely remembering it, that seed planted from what I had read—somehow came into alchemical reaction with this image that also didn't seem particularly fruitful or dramatic at first, that I was ambivalent about and uncertain of.

But then somehow they came into interaction, and that opened up the whole sense of the eros of the cosmos on multiple levels. It's quite subtle, but really quite a subtle yet powerful transformation of the perception of the world, related to or imbued with this sense of that imaginal young woman and the feminine divinity pervading her. This feminine divinity pervading consciousness, seeping out into what I now call cosmopoiesis—some kind of alchemical transubstantiation of the world there. And then a lot of happiness came with that.

So I made a note: don't judge the value of imaginal practice while you're actually doing it, because it may not feel like much or seem very significant, and the effects can come later sometimes. Again, we're back to this discernment between intensity and efficaciousness. An image or something planted from what we've read or heard in a teaching—these things are like seeds and they can do their work underground and blossom later, just like metta practice.

And then even later, I went for a bike ride and found myself walking, just walking my bike for a while. There was a sense of being in this alive universe—personified, impersonal for sure, but also having this divine personification of what is sometimes called anima mundi, the soul of the world. Related to this image, related to the idea that I had read a little while ago, but such joy and freedom and some kind of sense of relief there, and a really touching sort of mystical beauty in that particular perception. It almost made me laugh with the joy of it.

I'm sharing this partly for the details and the sense of playing with something, staying with it, altering things—picking this up but not that, picking that up but not this. That's a little bit of my process in terms of the movement in relationship to doubt with respect to all this eros and the imaginal.

But basically, as I said at the beginning of this talk, you need to know for yourself. I've had my process with this—it's still going on in other areas related to this—but you need to know for yourself. For that, we all need to keep questioning, keep exploring with respect to desire and craving and eros.

It's that spirit that the Buddha was pointing to when he said the Dhamma is ehipassika: come and see for yourself. Ehi—come. Passeti—to see. Come and see. That spirit of finding out for yourself—you have to keep exploring. We have to keep exploring. Keep that questioning alive.

It's very easy to think we're doing that and to believe we're doing it because we did it in the past, when actually it's dried up a little bit and we're just running on kind of an old range of insights, not extending that questioning.

For example, it's very easy to see sometimes how desire arises from some kind of sense of lack. And then we make a conclusion, and that conclusion is reinforced when we hear teachings that say exactly that: "Yes, desire comes out of lack—existential lack"—people put it different ways. It could be a Dharma teacher saying that, it could be some kinds of modern psychoanalysis.

But the question is: is that always true? Is it always the case that desire always comes from a sense of lack? If we don't revisit this later, I want to say now: no, find out. Because sometimes there's joy and celebration that give rise to desire. Joy or celebration where there is a sense of the libido overflowing—it's not lack, it's the opposite. It's a kind of superabundance. Something is overflowing.

Libido, remember, is etymologically related to libation and has to do with the pouring of liquid—it's one of its etymological connections. And the libido is overflowing. It's anything but lack. Other times it can have a sense that this desire is already flowing—from me to you, from me to this thing—eternally somehow.

It's already present—not a lack I'm trying to fill. There is desire, an erotic connection, and it's already happening. It's not lack-driven. It's flowing from me to you, pouring from me to you, rather than me grasping at something out of emptiness.

But investigation, knowing for yourself, keeping the questioning alive, and not resting on just a limited range and the assumptions that become entrenched from that narrow scope. Any investigation, any exploration needs sensitivity. And this investigation in particular—into Eros, into the imaginal, into soul-making—requires tremendous sensitivity. This exploration demands what I've talked about before: the poetry of perception. It needs sensitivity and subtlety. We must develop the subtlety of our attention, the subtlety of our discernment.

When we speak of imaginal practice and mindfulness of images, of bringing mindfulness to bear on the whole realm of the imaginal-erotic, we definitely include the energy body, emotional awareness, sensitivity to the whole soul-making process. But there's another dimension we need to make clear—we must also be aware of, make ourselves subtly attentive to, the subtleties of relating.

The erotic imaginal implies relationship, erotic connection, and all the subtleties of that relating, of the kinds of eros, the kinds of love with respect to each imaginal figure. Again, back to particularities and uniqueness. Each imaginal figure is unique. With each imaginal erotic interaction, what kind of eros is present here? What are the subtleties of the relating? What kinds of love inhabit this interaction?

Perhaps with an imaginal figure I've had a long-standing relationship with, worked with in meditation many times—but right now, in this interaction, what are the subtleties of the relating that seem to be asked for? What kind of eros, what kind of love, is alive here and now? With the erotic imagination, we're speaking of living relationships—responsive, sensitive relating.

It's so easy for things to degenerate into just a set of techniques. We need vigilance about this. Keep the sensitivity alive, keep the subtlety of discernment and attention vibrant so it doesn't become merely formulaic—"Here's my image, then I do this, then I do that." We want it living, alive, like any practice, but perhaps even more so in the realm of the imaginal.

An imaginal figure, an imaginal relationship—hopefully it never gets consciously or unconsciously dumped into a category we consider completely known. "I know that one, completely understood." What if we approached human others this way? Human relationships with this attitude: "Oh yeah, I know all about you. I know who this person is," with a sense that we completely know them. Of course we know some things, rely on certain recognizable patterns. But what if we carried this attitude into our caring relationships, our erotic connections with human others, our sexual intimacy—just "Oh, I know that. I have the whole thing packaged"?

Or with our perceptions and conceptions of nature—how easy it becomes: "Oh yeah, I know what that is." Perhaps there's some scientific understanding I lack about how trees function or animals behave or evolution works, but there's this sense that nature and all its diversity, nature as a whole, is just "kind of known" in my perception or conception. What happens then to the relationship?

Again, when we use the words "image" or "imaginal figure," we're not speaking only of so-called intra-psychic phenomena, but also our perceptions in the world—perceptions imbued with the imaginal. Imaginal perceptions of self, other, world. All of this is included.

It's important to recognize what differentiates meditating on an image of an explicitly sexual interaction from mere indulgence in what we might call more typical sexual fantasy—fantasy in the small sense. What creates this differentiation?

Everything that differentiates imaginal practice from daydreaming and craving. The mindfulness of the energy body, the sensitivities of the energy body, the subtlety of attention to emotions and soul-making resonances throughout the body and the whole psyche. The non-identification—quite significant, isn't it? The sense of both other and self as theatrical. This is theater. There's something not real here.

The self engaging in this, or involved in this, is not real—but is also real. There's a middle way parallel to the middle way of emptiness between existing and non-existing. There's a middle way of the imaginal between real and not real. There's a sense of the theater of it, different from much psychotherapeutic work or some spiritual work where the self uses imagination but maintains a sense of the self's reality.

Here, what characterizes this is more this sense of theater, and yet potent theater, as theater can be, or as all art can be. There's something palpably not real in the way that we usually think of that word, but also real and powerful there. In other words, we're seeing image as image, to use that phrase we've used before.

But it's also differentiated—this kind of erotic imaginal practice differentiated from what I don't know what to call it—humdrum sexual fantasy, typical sexual fantasy—by the conceptual framework that's operating. So there's a whole, as we said, there's a whole logos here. And that logos structures things and navigates and gives a direction and a purpose.

Wrapped up with the logos, or emerging out of the logos, is a whole intentionality. Because the logos, the conceptual framework, also constellates an intentionality with respect to the image and the eros. So I'm not just chasing pleasant sensations or distracting myself because I'm procrastinating on some project. The intentionality is wrapped up in or emergent from, given by, determined by the conceptual framework in part. And that intentionality, as well as the conceptual framework, makes a big difference.

And the sense of dimensionality in the image that we're relating to—that's a key piece. That's characteristic of the imaginal and the erotic imaginal. And the eternality of the image. These are things, as I've said before, you may not notice at first if you're new to this, but then you begin to see, "Oh yeah, that's there." The dimensionality, the eternality—that differentiates imaginal from imaginary, or just imagination.

And of course, eros is distinguished from craving, and imaginal practice is distinguished from daydream, differentiated by what they lead to in the moment, in the energy body, in the soul-making, and long-term as well, in terms of engagement and longer-term soul-making. The opening of beauty, both in the moment but also longer-term. Meaningfulness, again, both in the moment but also long-term in the life. And the soul-making is the stimulation and the opening of eros-psyche-logos.

So also the mind is involved here. The mind is stretched. The conceptions, the visions, the perception—all of that is stretched into what was previously unfamiliar territory. This is the soul-making expansion. So what's the difference? Well, one leads to all that, and the other doesn't.

And again, as someone asked me just this morning, "Just remind me why we need all this. What's the purpose of all this? What's the purpose of delineating something called eros?" Again, I've talked about it before on this retreat, but just to say one thing right now: we can have a spiritual practice or a path where, for instance, I'm moving towards the insight and the perception of oneness—universal oneness. And actually many kinds of oneness: universal love, universal awareness, universal being, or the unfabricated. There are different kinds. Actually, there's a limited amount of kinds. I've never actually bothered to count, and then there are micro variations of each.

But once one has seen, had those experiences enough times that it's really gone in there as a viable perception and has changed my sense of what existence is and what the self is, opening to all these kinds of oneness, then you're sort of done. And then you either declare yourself liberated or do what you do based on that declaration. But there's a kind of—it's just done, it's finite, and there's almost a formulaic quality. You can map this stuff out.

So in terms of that movement towards oneness, you can pretty much map it out—what the perceptions are, the various ways they might happen. There's always the possibility it just goes by itself, but generally speaking, if you do this and that, it will tend to open this way and that way. You can map it as a kind of predictability or formulaic nature to that kind of opening. Important as it is, I'm really not knocking it. It's really crucial.

So that's one thing about that kind of path of oneness. The second thing about it is that the particulars and the uniqueness of things or beings or aspects is not actually that important. So there's a kind of equivalence or replaceability. Because everything is one, it doesn't really matter what there is. Because whatever else there is in this thing's place, it will also be one. It's all the same. So if this forest gets cut down and made into a car park, or even if species go extinct, it's all one.

Whatever I say, it's all love or it's all awareness or it's just the play of awareness or something.

So there's a validity and a value to these perceptions, absolutely. And there's also, again, there's a danger, there's a risk. In this case, non-engagement and a certain... certain directions and certain doors won't open that way.

Because in contrast with the expression of the erotic imaginal, I would say it's infinitely creative. There's infinite possibilities for creation and discovery of beauty, meaningfulness, dimensionality, dimensions, a sense of sacredness and divinity. The opening of eros, psyche, logos, meaning ideation and image, is actually infinite in its possibilities. It's not just a sort of set and fairly predictable range of experience.

And with the erotic imaginal, the sacredness and the divinity is in and through the particulars, as well as in and through the universal oneness. In and through the particulars. It somehow rescues the particulars. And actually gives them more dimensionality, more kinds of sacredness, more kinds of senses of divinity. How many? I think infinite, potentially infinite.

This is infinite possibilities for creation and discovery. The path of soul-making is endless, open-ended, infinite, potentially infinite.

CHAPTER 73

Doubt and Discernment (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h19

> In this second part of his exploration of doubt and discernment, Rob Burbea addresses the sophisticated discernment required when working with eros and the imaginal in meditation practice. Drawing on years of traditional insight meditation training, he explores how practitioners can distinguish between eros—which opens the energy body, relieves dukkha, and supports soul-making—and craving, which contracts and brings suffering.
> Burbea addresses common concerns about "feeding the kilesas" (defilements) and provides practical guidance for navigating the complexities of erotic imaginal practice. He draws parallels with samatha development, where initial struggles don't mean abandoning the practice but rather developing wise effort and refined discernment. The talk covers the relationship between eros and various meditation states including jhāna, mettā practice, and states of rest, while emphasizing the importance of understanding emptiness as a foundation for this work.
> Throughout, Burbea emphasizes that this path requires both conceptual understanding and intuitive artistry, comparing the practice to art-making that involves both framework and spontaneous discovery. He concludes by exploring the nature of deep longing and how it reveals both what the soul desires and what it serves, making this discernment essential for avoiding the dissipation of our spiritual energies through unconscious craving.

Of the practices that we've developed that we've devoted attention and effort to for many of us over years—the practices of mindfulness and the refinement of attention, the awareness of and skill with the energy body and the emotional awareness, insights into emptiness, spectrum of fabrication, dwelling in states of less fabrication—all that. Because of the practice with regard to that and the accumulation of those skills and arts, the diligence there, we are well-equipped for this investigation that we're unfolding. We have the tools and the refinement of discernment necessary to really open it up and make it fertile. And all that comes as a result of practice for many people.

And at the same time, being as many of us are used to a certain range of teaching and concept and direction within a tradition, one can very easily, as I said, doubts can arise very easily. So very commonly someone who's had quite a bit of practice, let's say in a more narrow context, tradition of insight meditation, will say, "Isn't this just feeding the kilesas, the defilements? Isn't this, all this, what you're talking about eros and being with eros and opening up, isn't it just feeding the defilements, greed, aversion and delusion?"

So again, can we actually take that doubt deeper and make it fertile, not paralyzing, but fertile, dynamic, make it into a real question and look, notice, find out? So that we see that eros, in the way that we are talking about it, and practicing with eros, has a quality. It opens. It supports opening. Opening of what? Opening of the energy body. You can feel this. It needs a certain sensitivity, but you can feel this. With eros, the energy body tends to opening up, the perception of the world tends to opening, and if you like, deepening. The sense of dimensionality opens. The senses of sacredness and divinity also are opened. So eros brings with it, supports, instigates opening of all kinds. Beautiful openings.

Actually, in the way that we are talking about it, because the imaginal is involved and wrapped up in what we're calling eros, then it doesn't bring this pressure to act out because there isn't the movement necessarily at all to concretizing, to simple concretizing. I have a desire for X, therefore I must get X, therefore I act to get X. There are all the imaginal dimensions that are opening out there, instead, usually. And there's also eros tends to relieve dukkha. Eros tends to relieve dukkha, although there is the pothos, this wanting more. So there's not complete peace there. And there is the erotic tension that we talked about. But in practice and in life we can see this tendency of eros to open things up in a beautiful way, to relieve dukkha and away from a sort of simplistic concretizing or being tied in to acting out this or that just because I desire it.

Craving, on the other hand, is opposite to all of that. It tends to close, close the energy body—you can feel it, you can notice it, you can be sensitive to it. It does not open the cosmopoiesis, it does not open a sense of dimensionality, it does not open a sense of sacredness, divinity. It tends towards concretizing and a sort of pressure of the impetus to act out, and it brings dukkha. And we can see that, again, both in the meditation practice and in our life.

So it's possible to discern between eros and craving, in those ways and in others. It's quite possible to make these discernments. And it's not always easy and not always simple to discern between the two. Can we dare to experiment? Can we dare to question? Because this is how we're going to really find out and develop our discerning chops, if you like, our capabilities, the refinement of our discerning. It takes a certain daring to question these things, to open up these questions, to experiment and find out for ourselves.

The SAS, the British Special Forces, they have their motto: "Who dares wins." Sometimes, actually often in practice, when we talk about more radical practice, whether it's emptiness or this or that, at some edge, "who dares wins" means there's a certain daring, a certain boldness in venturing into the unknown to find out for oneself.

Sometimes, as I said, it's not always easy to discern between eros and craving, for example. Sometimes we think this is eros, and then it gets all tangled, and we feel, "Oh, well, the energy body is contracting, there is a contraction, there is dukkha." But even the entanglement there, or the tangling of eros and craving together, the two threads tangled, doesn't necessarily mean immediately throw the whole thing out. This is quite important.

There's a parallel here, for example, for anyone who's ever devoted some time and some dedicated practice to developing samatha, samadhi. And often, you know, if you make that intention and practice over whatever it is, however long, on retreat, off retreat, you will absolutely inevitably encounter this question of it's moving towards something, there's something I desire here, I desire to open up these states of samadhi.

I desire to discover them, to master them, enter them, whatever. And in that, I meet, I encounter the question of effort. I need to make effort. There's the desire involved. We talked about the Buddha and his four bases of success. His list there. And I encounter too much effort, too little effort, too tight effort.

So there's going to be dukkha. It gets too tight, the effort towards the samadhi, and here's dukkha. And how many people, what percentage of people in the insight meditation world think, "Oh, this is painful, forget it—this is ego, this is striving." They pick up some other teaching that says, "Oh, you know, just let it all be. Don't try and make anything happen or something." And the whole thing, baby gets thrown out with the bathwater, basically.

So that's a mistake—at least in relation to samatha, it would be a mistake. Rather, can I learn about wise effort? Can I learn about having aspirations and goals and things that I yearn to move towards and to know and experience myself in meditation, in spiritual life, in life in general? And learn how to handle that, how to relate to it wisely without either just getting completely entangled in pain around that, or throwing the whole thing out and not getting anywhere—not really developing mastery of samadhi, etc.

So just the arising of suffering or contraction, if we're working in this area with eros, etc., I wouldn't just use that as a criterion of discernment between eros and craving. The two can get mixed, and our relationship with the whole thing can get fraught, and sometimes it gets a little tight. Remember I was telling you about those Upandita retreats, etc., where actually there's quite a lot of suffering in the service of something.

So just because we meet a bit of tightness or entanglement or confusion doesn't mean we drop it and throw it out. It's actually asking for more subtlety, more artistry in the discernment, in the balancing, in the responding.

As I mentioned, we can start with the arrow. It's all very beautiful and there's the fullness of the image and everything. If something happens, it contracts until it gets diverted, perverted into craving, and vice versa. We start with what's obviously a state of craving and the contraction of craving and limited seeing, and actually with skillful, artful working, we can re-guide that and navigate to open that into the beauty and the fullness of eros.

So there's art here. There's skill. It takes care in the discernment between the two and in the navigation from craving to eros. But certainly in the discernment, there's art, there's skill, there's care, there's sensitivity. It's asking for quite a refined and, if you like, sophisticated kind of discernment. But we develop that. It's really possible.

One of the aspects, as I said, that can help us discern is the sensitivity to the soul-making dynamic and what is happening with that soul-making dynamic, meaning the mutual insemination, fertilization, ignition, widening, deepening, complicating, enriching of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic constellation. This tells us that we're on the right track, and you can get sensitive to the different aspects of that when it's moving, when it's in progress.

With a sexual image, for example, as I said, we can notice the specificity of the image and the kind of iconic quality of the sexual image, if that's what we're working with. It doesn't tend, mostly, to want to escalate to the next thing, the next thing, and then escalate: "Now I need to have an orgasm or now I need to release some steam or whatever"—the next thing until it goes towards, you know, whatever it is, genital intercourse or whatever. There's this specificity of the image. It's sufficient to itself, I think was the phrase I used. There's an iconic quality. It's not really going anywhere except deeper into dimensionality and divinity and beauty. It's not going anywhere in a kind of narrative accomplishment sense.

The pothos there, the desire for more that goes with the eros that we talked about, tends to go to find, to discover and create more in the dimensionality, in the multifacetedness of the beloved other and of the self, etc., as we said in the cosmopoiesis. It doesn't tend to seek its more in the acquisitiveness of greed spreading one-dimensionally: "I have one car, now I need three. I have one lover, wife, husband, whatever it is, and now I need another sexual partner," because somehow they're not interesting to me enough, because I'm not opening to their dimensionality. So then the more needs to go out sideways to the one dimensionality, so we can recognize this difference.

And actually, as I said, we can redirect it, if you like. We can guide it. If it feels like it's getting diverted, contracted, craving, there are ways of seeing, ways of approaching it that redirect it back on the track of eros.

So yes, it's absolutely possible that some uses of the imagination—the imaginary and fantasy in the usual sense of the word—are not what we call imaginal.

Piaget was a very well-respected child psychologist, enormously influential thirty years ago when I was an undergraduate. In his developmental psychology, he said that the imaginary others of children—though I don't think he made that distinction—were "immature and egocentric creations designed for wish fulfillment." That was all he could see in children's use of the imagination. Or perhaps it was helpful in planning and learning conceptual structures, but really, is that always the case?

It's clear with a little more careful looking, a little less biased looking, that that's absolutely not the case. That's why we make this distinction with the word "imaginal" versus "imaginary," or certainly just the casual use of the imagination. One wonders what was influencing Piaget, because already by that time, the imagination had been severely demoted in the Western worldview and psychology. But that's certainly not what he was referring to—not the whole picture, and not what we mean by imaginal and fantasy.

And you can tell: is it wish fulfillment? You can tell sometimes in the sense of the autonomy of the image. Some people might want to discern between the imaginal and the imaginary, between eros and craving, because they sense the autonomy of the imaginal other. It has a kind of independence and intelligence and can actually surprise us. Its actions, what it says, what it does in relation to us—these things surprise us.

I could give so many examples of this, but here's one that comes to mind now. I was working in practice with this beautiful, erotic, imaginal meditation. At the same time, something in the wider politics of the dharma world had upset me—something that affected me directly but was really a much wider issue. I was disturbed by this and could feel that I really wanted to go into that and dwell with it, rather than engage this erotic, imaginal meditation.

The beautiful woman who was in the meditation—at some point she took my hands and put them into the prayer mudra, anjali. She took my hands, put them in that posture, and then mirrored that gesture herself with our fingertips touching, as if to communicate: "Just forget about that right now. We have this beautiful devotion to dwell on, to feed on, to attend to between us." That really wasn't what I wanted to dwell on at that point. Another part of me was really wanting to figure out this bigger situation and upset. But there was a kind of autonomy there, and her intelligence—and of course it was the intelligent thing to do. There was deeper wisdom there.

We get the sense—I could give so many examples of this—is it really my wish fulfillment, as I asked the other day, that's happening with the erotic imaginal? Countless examples make this question possible.

So some people may want to use the sense of the autonomy of the imaginal other as an indication. That's good, but I would be a little cautious there. I know, for instance, James Hillman spoke very strongly against any kind of ego involvement with the imaginal. If the ego decided to do this or that, he was very suspicious of that. I'd like to question that, actually.

For me, it's fine if it feels like your ego is initiating something in the relationship there—in the imaginal relationship—or initiating an image or whatever. That is not necessarily a problem. The test is whether it feels soul-making. I've said this before, but it's really, really important: the test is you can actually feel the soul-making in all the ways that we've talked about in the past on other retreats. I would rather have that be the guide rather than: "Was that my ego? Did I just make that happen?" Don't worry about that. It's fine. It's fine if you did. It's fine if you didn't. I wouldn't get too caught up in that as a criterion.

You can tell if the erotic imaginal feels like it's soul-making. It's very clear in the beauty there, in the devotion, in the divinity, in the dimensionality—all of that.

Sometimes we get a little unclear about what's actually a problem here in our doubt. This uncertainty causes some confusion. What's a potential problem?

For instance, as we already touched on, sometimes something that happens with an image or an image itself, or an erotic relationship with an image, is really intense or just really weird compared to what other people seem to be speaking about or what we know from what the culture feeds us. Very easily a person can think, "I'm nuts, I'm crazy," or "If I'm not crazy already, this is taking me towards craziness. I'm going crazy. If I follow this, I'll go crazy."

This is the voice of fear, and the voice of the indoctrination from the cultures that we move in. As I said, the imaginal has no place. It's not given a place in the culture. We have a suspicion, unless it's quite contained—you know, making movies or writing sci-fi novels or whatever it is. So it's understandable that there is fear in relation to this.

We have been actually for centuries and centuries kind of indoctrinated, dogmatized if that's a word, to be afraid. Because it doesn't have a place, and there's all kinds of—it's not given a place, it's not given respect, validity, purpose, in our sense of our existence, of what healthy psychology is, of the spiritual paths, etc. So there's all kinds of cultural assumptions coming in there, in that kind of doubt: "I'm going crazy, this is too intense, this is too weird."

So what we're doing here partly is really trying to support, trying to move towards giving the imaginal and the erotic imaginal a place—a meaningful place and purpose in a conceptual framework that's coherent, that really serves something—and to come into relationship with these images. Wise relation, not just drop them and turn away, not just indulge without any sensitivity in a kind of imaginary, wish-fulfilling, daydreaming thing, seeking pleasure. Through the concepts that we're talking about, through the path that we're delineating and filling out, and through the sensitivity and the artfulness of the living relationships here—living, erotic, imaginal relationships—we want to move it towards all that and the fullness of all that.

And as I also said, we want to also give place to and respect to and trust, if you like, to what seems like the darker, more intense sexual images that come up and eros that comes up. Have a look. Is it disrespectful? Don't jump so quickly to conclusions. Is this disrespectful? If I want to devour you and drink your holy blood and lick your bones and eat your organs, is that sadism? Is that some kind of pathological cannibalism? Is it because I'm angry? Is it without love?

So easy to assume all this stuff. It's like, actually have a look, feel, feel what's there. Is it an objectification? To me, objectification means I don't see and value the totality of the other's being. The being of the other. I don't see and value all that they include. I'm bringing them down to one dimensional, one purpose. Whether it's an actual person, whether it's a purely imaginal figure. Is that the case?

Or we can also objectify because I just see them from me. And that includes a kind of spiritual or psychological objectification. I just see this imaginal figure, or this person, this teacher, or this whatever it is, this partner—they just exist. I've kind of shrunk down my seeing them. They just exist for my growth, for my psycho-spiritual process. And we tend to see imaginal figures that way. "Oh yes, I'm developing my faculty of X, Y, Z through this imaginal figure." That's an objectification. Or I don't see, as I said there, I don't see and value their totality. Is it objectification? And if it is, what do I need to do to let it fill out?

Is it out of control? People often go, "Oh, this... This will take me out of control, or this is out of control." Is it? Maybe a little bit at one level, but that's just the nature of things. But really, one can get up and walk away, or there's so much in the art of navigation and steering that we've talked about.

So right there in what for many would be kind of taboo, sexual erotic images and interactions frowned upon, regarded as weird or pathological, right there we can actually sense holiness, sense of sacredness, divinity, feel it.

Or someone might have the opposite doubt: "Oh, this isn't intense at all, and so-and-so shared such a weird image, it was really far out and incredibly dramatic and colorful, and mine is just kind of ordinary, so it's not working for me, or it can't be very deep."

Again, don't jump to such conclusions. Eros includes a great range from very, very subtle to intense, and the same with the imaginal. It can be very ordinary or very strange.

Intensity does not necessarily translate to potency, and it's potency we're interested in. Intensity can just be right there—that experience feels intense, and it's like, "Wow, now I have to tell the teacher, or I have to tell my friends," or I get worried, or whatever it is. And then maybe half an hour later, or a few days later, it's like nothing came of it. Maybe. Other times, something's not intense at all. And actually, because we're relating to it wisely and skillfully and with the art and with the discernment and the beauty of that navigation, the subtlety of that, actually what was not intense can be very potent long-term.

Or someone has the doubt: "Well, I don't really get any images." And I've been through this on the other retreats. So really? Really? Look, you might not get any visual images, but images can come in the way we're using that word. It doesn't just mean visual at all. It might not be anything visual involved at all. It involves any of the senses, as I've said before.

And also, our life is full of fantasies and images in the sense that I'm using that word. Look where you love. Pay attention where you love, where there's a sense of meaningfulness in your life. There is the operation right there. Somehow involved in that is the movement and the operation, the saturation of images and fantasies in the good sense that I'm talking about. Where you love, where things are meaningful, where something is meaningful. But I've been through all that before.

What's more a problem is, as I also said, reification—meaning identification with an image, a rigidification of the sense of self, a concretization of the sense of self, a realism of the image or of the self. Jung's word "inflation" is perhaps misleading. I think what he cautioned about inflation with respect to images—I think what he really meant, as far as I understand, is more what would be better to have said: that the problem is really, as I said, reification, identification, realism, concretization, literalism.

It's not a problem if, to the undiscerning mind, an image seems grandiose. Often it's, "Oh, I can't possibly have that kind of image." Sometimes they're beautiful images, images of service, and someone goes, "Oh, that's too grandiose, that's me in some Mother Teresa fantasy or whatever." Or if an image seems ungrounded because it's very light and insubstantial and involves a kind of flying or all kinds of things. Or if it's weird, as I said, or pathological, if it's not politically correct or psychologically correct. For instance, if it's a sexual thing and it involves some kind of domination or submission—well, that's not psychologically correct, that's not politically correct, this or that. The undiscerning mind can be too quick to jump in here with certain pre-packaged psychological truths about what it's suspicious about, what it's afraid of.

But rather the problem is realism, reification, identification. And it's a problem if, as we said, there's not a kind of equality and pervasiveness of seeing image as image, of seeing the emptiness of everything. So self, other, world, Eros itself, body—all this must be seen. If it's lopsided, where we see image as image and where we don't, where the soul-making is able to open up the dimensions and where it isn't, that also can be problematic, as we've talked about.

Or if there's a rigidity—so we talked about, for example, the image or the ideal of being a passionate person or being an equanimous person. And the image and idealization that's kind of wrapped up in that can actually be a kind of attachment. There's an attachment to an image of what Eros looks like—passionate like this, for example. There's a rigidity there to the image. So all these are more the problem.

As I said, I think certainly on Re-Enchanting the Cosmos retreat, I'm interested in a path that actually really has an understanding of emptiness as a basis for the whole path—understanding the emptiness of everything without exception. What happens when that is placed as a basis of the path, not just emptiness as something we add on as an advanced thing or something that's an option? And not an emptiness, an understanding of emptiness that leaves some things tacitly not empty—the process or the time or the awareness or the "things as they are" or whatever it is.

So a basis in emptiness lies at the fundament of all this. There's a basis of emptiness, not a truth claim, not some or other truth claim. It's quite a different orientation. You could say, not so interested in building on reality claims—"What is reality?"—but rather on efficacy or potency. If we look this way, if we conceive this way, what happens? If we conceive in this slightly different way, what happens? What is the effect, the efficacy? What is potent there in terms of what it opens for the being, for the vision, for the sense of existence, for the life?

When we conceive only one particular way or look exclusively through a single lens, what unfolds? We begin to prioritize efficacy and potency over reality as our criteria—as the foundation for how we navigate this terrain and what guides our judgments and discernments.

I understand this can be challenging sometimes, this notion that something is "not real." How do I trust something that lacks reality? And if it's not real, or if I'm meant to question whether it's real or not real—if there's uncertainty about understanding this middle way between real and not real—tremendous doubt can arise.

Yet an understanding of emptiness opens immense possibility. It provides a basis of legitimacy for all kinds of beautiful and soul-stirring experiences, creating pathways for us. When we truly comprehend the emptiness of all this, doubt can genuinely subside. Some people, however, may not be quite ready for that understanding, and I appreciate this.

I also believe this can be developed—we can cultivate this stance and understanding that represents a kind of middle way between real and not real, an imaginal version of the middle way, positioned between existence and non-existence. This is developable. We can genuinely cultivate this as we engage with these practices in parallel, through emptiness meditation or through the imaginal itself.

Regarding emptiness understanding, often there's some degree of insight into emptiness that a person can draw upon. Perhaps someone hasn't engaged with the complete emptiness teaching and fully realized the emptiness of everything—that's actually quite rare. But they've practiced enough to perceive some degree of the emptiness of self, to a certain level. Right there, they can draw on that parallel insight. Because they see some degree of the emptiness of self, yet they don't dismiss the self. They don't reject it or ignore it. They maintain respect for their self and for other selves. They have care for the self, for selves. They perceive selves.

Knowing that they're empty, they possess that insight, but they still perceive them and relate to them, and sometimes they release that perception. Knowing that they're empty, they can perceive, relate to, and care for the self. This represents a level of seeing that something isn't real and yet entering into relationship with it—a relationship of respect, interaction, taking seriously, caring. The same applies to the imaginal.

If you think you don't know how to approach this, perhaps draw on whatever level of emptiness insight you've already integrated. You see that emptiness doesn't mean you need to completely reject something, never perceive it, or never respect it. It's the freedom to move into relationship.

When we see the emptiness of something, it opens a freedom of choice regarding ways of looking. Yes, I can see through this thing and choose not to give it attention, or I can give it attention. I'm free. The emptiness makes me free either way. And as I said, I can relate to it, knowing that it's empty, while still respecting and caring. The same holds true with images.

My experience teaching this reveals that someone can have very little understanding of emptiness from previous practice, and yet somehow sense, in working with the imaginal, that it possesses what I mentioned the other day—this theatrical quality. It's both definitely not real and has a different kind of quality. The way I'm seeing this self in interaction, the way I'm seeing this other, carries this quality that resembles theater. It's not real, but there is a kind of reality to it. It exists somewhere in between, in a middle way.

I'm not simply relating to this self's process and the image of the self undergoing this process in this imagined relationship as merely real—as if what I see of this self is just reality. There's an element, or rather a feel, a quality of theater to it. I'm uncertain whether the word "theater" relates to "theos," meaning divinity, but even without practicing emptiness, sometimes you can actually sense this difference.

Even in using and opening to imagination regarding psychological work on the self—I was discussing this the other day with someone working with inner child work, that therapeutic approach popular some years ago, or other methods where imagination is allowed, such as certain Ridwan inquiries—the imagination operates there, skillfully and beautifully used. But the self inquiring, the self observing that imagination, regards it as real. This becomes a real aspect of self; it doesn't possess that theatrical quality.

Imagine something different, and we can notice when it's one and when it's the other. Even without knowing anything about emptiness, it carries a different quality—the quality of theater, the quality of not being real yet still being genuinely potent, beautiful, moving, and transformative.

Again, something I mentioned before but bears repeating: the big picture, the conceptual framework, will help with our doubt in the broad sense and also inform our micro-choices, our moment-to-moment decisions in practice. This is genuinely important to me.

To cultivate that sense as much as possible—to build the big picture, the conceptual framework: how does this all function, how does it fit together, where are we going, what does this mean as opposed to that? It truly informs our choices. But all this is really an art.

I like to think of it as an art. Which means, and for me, art involves one element—one aspect of art is there is a conceptual framework involved. No matter who you think you are, free jazz, going out of tonality and out of rhythms, there's still plenty of conceptual framework. Jackson Pollock, whatever it is, there's a conceptual framework there.

And if it's art, it involves the conceptual and the intuition, the following of hunches that arise, the arising of what surprises us and what's unexpected in the process of the making of the art, in the process of working in the meditation with the imaginal relationship. And then there's the improvisation of responses to, and the navigation of all that. And that includes the art of working with the energy body, and the art of the different emphases and leaning this way or that, more or less, that we discussed before.

So all that is involved in the art, and all that helps in relation to our doubts and kind of unsurenesses with regard to all this. Understanding the conceptual framework, as I said, functions as a kind of—gives context, gives support, like that trellis in the rose garden. Giving support to what wants to flower.

And out of that conceptual framework, it frames and gives rise to—helps to shape and direct our intentions, which helps so much. Because the intention is for soul-making, for the increase of the sense of the sacredness, the widening of the sense of sacredness, the diversity of the sense of the sacredness, for the perceptions of the other subtle dimensions, for subtle discernments of sensitivity. All these intentions are given, if you like, are determined or handed to us by the conceptual framework that we're developing. So all that really helps.

But discernment, you know, discernment is so key. So for example, regarding the discernment between just what we're calling desire, what we're calling craving, what we're calling eros, and the various responses there. Discernment and response, responsibility. All that's really important.

What is the appropriate or right or necessary order for you? Now at this stage in your practice, in your life, what's the necessary order of practice development with regard to what we're calling craving, with regard to what we're calling clinging in its relationship to that deep investigation into emptiness, that whole revealing of the deep meaning of dependent origination, and with eros?

So even just with those—with craving, the exploration of what we're calling clinging, and what we're calling eros—what's the order necessary for you, your soul's calling? You know, just discerning that is not always so easy. And I don't want to shove it into a formula. You have to do this before you do that. I don't think souls fit in formulae so easily at all.

But if we want to explore making a little more finer distinctions, discernments here—so for instance, between eros or the question of eros in relationship to resting and also in relationship to jhāna practice and in relation to mettā practice. Some of this we'll revisit, but I just want to say a little bit about this now and get a sense of how the discernment can go even deeper.

So human beings, you know, we need to discharge, if you like—if we're kind of like energetic systems, sometimes we need to discharge after we've been charged up. Even when, certainly when the charge is just stress, you know, but even when the charge is wholesome, some creative endeavor or inspiration that comes through us or a beautiful kind of electricity of the being, flame of the being that's there at times, you know, there's a charge there and the system needs to discharge often or usually. And so there's, you know, we rest. We find different ways to rest.

Now what's the relationship between rest and eros? Because we can rest with or without the erotic imaginal. So perhaps more often we are accustomed to a resting, a going to sleep that's a kind of wanting to turn the world off. It's a vibhavatanhā, the kind of craving for non-being, if you like, that we talked about in some of the first talks. There's not the interest alive there. I just want to basically go into a kind of not engaging mode. There's not the interest. There's no image alive there. There's nothing imaginable. And there's no soul-making or eros there, because there's no image. No aliveness there, really. And we just want it to rest, to turn off.

Other times, and probably more rare, but really available to us, is a kind of resting where we're still in relationship with the imaginal, either the intra-psychic imaginal or the imaginal perception, the fullness of the imaginal perception of something or someone in the actual world. And there's the eros there in the imaginants, in relationship. And sometimes there can be, with that kind of resting, a really beautiful, pervasive blessedness at the same time as resting.

And here, actually, because the erotic imaginal are involved, the self, the sense of the self, the image of the self, the other, the world, the eros itself—all these four in that co-constellation are alive, multidimensional as images. They're alive as images. And then they have that multidimensionality and perhaps even the sense of divinity that comes with that as the dimensionality gets kind of richer and deeper. The Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic is alive there.

It is working and moving, and there's rest. Usually then the rest feels very beautiful—there's a real quality of beauty and blessedness present. So it's perhaps rarer, but really available. Again, can we discern the difference there?

Sometimes in regard to rest, what we want is to be cozy. That's quite an interesting phenomenon, perhaps, relatively speaking. Is the imaginal operating there with this desire we have when we want to be cozy and rest? Is that what I just referred to—this kind of resting in relationship with the erotic imaginal, where there's blessedness and the aliveness of multidimensionality?

Some of you will know Celestial Seasonings teas. There's one—I don't know if they still make it—called Sleepytime tea. On the cardboard box, I think I remember, there's a sort of drawing of a cute teddy bear dozing in an old armchair. He's wearing one of those old-fashioned sleeping gowns and a floppy sleeping hat, and he's by the fire in his living room—in his snug. I learned that word because I have one in the cottage where I'm staying. The snug is a little old-fashioned living room with a fireplace and armchairs, and the whole idea is that it's snug, it's cozy. Actually, the one I have is completely freezing and drafty, so I don't even sit in there, but that's the idea. So he's in this old armchair dozing in his sleeping gown and floppy sleeping hat by the fire.

So there's an image—the image on the tea box. And it has a certain attractiveness to us. But is that an image for us unless there's eros, unless there's this sense of dimensionality, multidimensionality, unless there's an opening to a kind of sense of sacredness or divinity, unless the eros-psyche-logos, the soul-making dynamic is aroused, ignited, inseminating each other? And there's an interest in the image and in the images of self, other, world, and eros in the constellation.

Now, that image, that kind of image of coziness may be an imaginal image, may be an image in the sense that we're talking about. But in the discernment, the question is: Is it in this moment for you? Is it really imaginal in the way that we're talking about it? Or is it just an image in the flatter, cheaper sense that is in common parlance? And of course, even if it's not an image, it may still have its place in our life. That's fine. But we're talking about the discernment. When is it eros? When is it imaginal? When is it not?

More interesting than that is the whole question of what's present and what's involved in states of jhana, or states of less fabrication, where there's a lot of letting go, a lot of reduction in clinging, and we're resting in awareness, or resting in a vastness of awareness, or in a state of so-called just receiving, and so forth. Any of those states of less fabrication, or states of jhana—the progressive states of jhana—are actually states of less fabrication. This is quite interesting with regard to eros. So there's a kind of rest in these states, but they're very alive as well. This is quite interesting in relation to eros.

In themselves—is there such a thing as "in themselves"? Is there such a thing as anything in itself? No, there isn't, because of emptiness and dependent origination. But for the sake of what we want to draw out right now, let's go along with this idea. In themselves, these states are only soul-making in a quite limited way. Why? Because they involve actually a quieting of image. You understand? Jhana and other states of less fabrication involve both perception and imaginal perception getting less. So there's a quieting of the imaginal faculty, among other things.

Although the series of jhanas or states of less fabrication moves on—so there's something beyond this state, until a certain point there's something beyond this state—each state by itself doesn't have an unfathomability, a sense of unfathomability of meaningfulness. It might have another kind of unfathomability. I actually think jhanas are unfathomable in quite specific ways—for instance, the degree of concentration.

The degree of concentration in jhana is in many ways infinitely increasable. But there's not this sense of unfathomability of meaningfulness within each state itself—not in each jhana or each state of relative unfabrication. This is quite significant.

What does this mean for eros and the imaginal? It means there's a limited kind of soul-making involved in those states. Now, there is a dimension of the soul that loves and desires to know the oneness that comes with these different states—different kinds of oneness—and desires transcendence and the unfabricated. That dimension of the soul is very much nourished by these states.

But the dimension of the soul we've been exploring is only nourished and supported by these states through the fantasies and conceptual frameworks that surround the experiences. These fantasies and conceptual frameworks may support the soul-making dynamic—the ignition, insemination, and expansion of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic. This is an important distinction.

For example, when there's pīti or rapture and bliss in the first or second jhana, a person might interpret the experience within certain contexts. You don't have to be a Buddhist to enter jhana—these are simply human experiences. A person might say, "This experience of total bliss and rapture and white light—this was God making love to me, making love to my soul." There's a certain concept and fantasy image of the experience.

Or someone might say, "That experience of jhana, that bliss and rapture, was my participation in—I entered into consciousness of my participation in the divine or the cosmic sat-chit-ananda"—borrowing from traditions that speak of being, consciousness, and bliss.

Neither of these interpretations—God making love to my soul, or participating in divine being-consciousness-bliss—are classical Buddhist ideas. What's more likely within a Buddhist framework is the sense: "Not only was that amazingly pleasant and beautiful, but I am experiencing what the Buddha described." Coming out of jhana, there's this powerful sense of matching his descriptions, of walking the path of the elders, walking in the tradition. This can be such a beautiful, striking feeling.

But there are fantasies wrapped up in that too—fantasies of tradition, fantasies of self (and I use "fantasy" in a positive sense), fantasies of awakening and moving toward awakening, fantasies of being on the path, fantasies of the Dharma itself.

So the soul-making we've been discussing comes through the fantasies and concepts around the experience of quietening perception, unfabricating, entering jhana. It also comes through the longing to know and attain these states that are beyond what I already know. They live in my imagination as a "beyond" for the pothos to desire. This very beyondness creates eros, and in relation to them—and the self and tradition—there is this erotic-imaginal connection. But it's primarily in the fantasy and concept around the experience.

Let me draw another discernment to illuminate these subtleties. What about experiences like resting in the lap of the Buddha, or resting in Grandma's love? If you were at the Re-enchanting the Cosmos retreat, we did an exercise with the imaginal figure of love. Some people chose figures like Grandma, and later Catherine and Nick sang that beautiful Bill Withers song about Grandma's hands.

When I'm resting in the lap of the Buddha or in Grandma's love—is this the imaginal? Is this eros? There's certainly love there, and use of imagination. But if Grandma or this figure represents simply mettā or unconditional love—which is beautiful and can be profoundly helpful—but if I'm not deeply interested in Grandma herself, if I only want the feelings of warmth, comfort, coziness, security, or just the quality of mettā, then this figure will not be soul-making, will not be imaginal, because there's no eros there.

I'm not deeply interested in them. It won't stimulate the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, or only to a very limited degree. Grandma or the Buddha, in that instance, is not an erotic object for me. "Erotic" need not be sexual, but there's no erotic dimension in the sense of unfathomability, of wanting more discovery and enrichment through the eros-psyche-logos dynamic. There's no aliveness and arousal of interest in her depths, her dimensionality. There's no sense of divinity—it's very sweet and lovely and helpful, but I don't find those aspects of unfathomability and mystery in her.

Perhaps with Grandma or the Buddha in this flatter way, we want to rest and sleep in that love, in that comfort and security. This can be perfectly okay, but it's not soul-making.

And it may be actually necessary sometimes, perhaps at certain stages in our life or certain stages in our practice. It may be really necessary, but it's not soul-making.

Or it may be that we're relating to it because we're actually using it in a certain way. We're using this imaginary figure, figure of the imagination, to get in touch with, for instance, the quality of metta or a certain degree of metta. And then we actually forget them. We forget grandma. Grandma, in that case, is just a springboard, a kind of touchstone for a quality of metta. So it's skillful. You use that, you get the quality, and then you can forget grandma. Great, skillful. It's a springboard, a touchstone into the quality of metta. But the soul-making then will be limited. It would be limited soul-making, because it doesn't have this interest in her and her unfathomability, her dimensionality and her depths.

So if I'm primarily, if at any time I'm primarily looking for pleasure, or for rest in this sense, or just for the quality of metta—or if the self and the other, the images of self and other are too concrete and not unfathomable as images are in the sense that we're using, they're not unfathomable, they're too concrete—then at best, in those cases, the soul-making will be very limited and the opening and the expansion and the fecundity of the soul-making dynamic of Eros, Psyche, Logos together working will be very limited.

So there are all kinds of discernments that I think are important as we develop these practices, develop our range and go into this territory.

Another discernment, another thing to notice is where for you the imaginal, the soul-making, the erotic imaginal is alive, and where is it not alive? So for example, some people in meditation, or with respect to meditation practice, there's actually very little eros. There's very little arousal of interest, maybe in general, but there's very little in the way of images, imaginal images of self, other, world, eros, alive with respect to or in meditation. Whereas in some relationships in their life or some actions in their life, all that is alive. The interest, the images of self, other, world, eros are alive there and soul-making—maybe in relation to service, or maybe in relation to activism, or in relation to one of those but not the other, perhaps service but not activism, activism but not service. Whereas in practice, in formal practice, there's very little eros there.

Other people, it might be the other way around, that the eros and the soul-making is alive in and with respect to meditation practice, but in actual life it seems harder to be suffused with the imaginal, to be impregnated with the imaginal. Harder for life to become imaginal in our perception. Harder for soul-making in life, in activity, in relation to the world more widely.

Now, either of those two types or categories—either the one who has the soul-making alive in the world but not in the meditation, or the other who has the soul-making in the meditation but not so much in the world and activity—very easily when there's something not working in my practice, very easily one of the answers that person gives themselves is "I need more concentration, I need more samadhi." So maybe, maybe that's what needs to happen in your practice to open it out, to make it more potent, more widespread, pervasive in its potency and deeper. Maybe that's really what you need, more concentration.

But maybe not. And again, just a little footnote here: please hear all these teachings in context. I'm addressing common assumptions that I meet as a teacher at the same time as probably a good proportion of my teaching over the years has been teaching sa-madhi, teaching jhanas, and really helping people develop that art and the mastery there and go deeper and deeper through the jhanas. So please take this right now in context.

But oftentimes people have this thought, "I need more concentration, I need more focus." It might be that that's what needs to happen, or it might be actually that what needs to happen is the imaginal needs to be released. There needs to be more suffusion and more fullness and opening of and opening to the imaginal. A wider, deeper imaginal sense igniting, involving Eros, the interest, the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic and soul-making. Maybe that's what needs to happen. So somehow I need to allow it to spread to the areas where it isn't.

Or it might be that the kinds of images and fantasies that are operating are too restricted, too narrow. So again, there could be many examples here, and I've given them in the past in relation to engagement or whatever it is, or also in relation to actual meditation—many possibilities. But for example, just one I mentioned: it's very understandable with some people because of what they've been through and everything that they tend to look to meditation for rest, for some degree of comfort and even coziness or a sense of safety. That can be very understandable and quite important sometimes.

But maybe a person has also been in that and actually got stuck in a narrow range of image in relation to meditation and practice. And that's what needs to expand, is the imaginal range, to for instance include images and fantasies of struggle, of courage, of putting up with difficulties. The fantasies of nobility, the nobility of courage, the nobility of being able to sit through the fire, through the struggle, through the difficulty, the nobility of the soul's willingness to do that, the self's willingness to do that, the beauty of that.

Sometimes that whole range of fantasy is missing in a person. They just don't have that there. And without these, there's a kind of—you know, with all the best intentions, there's a kind of flaccidity in their practice. They keep, somehow, something keeps collapsing, because it doesn't have the imaginal support, it doesn't have the filling out of the beauty of the fantasy that would allow one to sit through the difficulty. It's not rendered beautiful, the courage, it's just not given this nobility through the beauty of the fantasy and the richness of the fantasy.

There's a caving in again and again, something collapses, something just stops practice. You just stop practice, turn away from the difficult, always looking every time for what's easy, for what's comfortable, because there isn't the imaginal support for something else, for a different relationship.

And if we do that every time, that has massive consequences in terms of the patterns it sets up—certainly in meditation but also in one's life. Massive consequences. So that's just one example—I could give many, quite opposite ones.

But really, this discernment and noticing where the eros, the imaginal, the soul-making is alive for us and working beautifully and potently and impregnating, and where it's not—it's for us to look and see in our lives.

And related to that, of course, is the discernment and the noticing of: What do I really desire? What do I really want? What is it that I long for? Do I even allow my being to have deep longing? This is an interesting question—we'll come back to this.

But there's the discernment of what do I long for? And then there's also discernment, if I can let myself feel at times the deep longing of my soul. There's a discernment within the longing as well, which is quite interesting.

Deep, intense longing has this bittersweet quality, something that's hard to bear, and yet also has a great beauty in it. But that's longing—it's a desire for me. I want this. My soul yearns for this.

But wrapped up in the very longing is another aspect. It's telling me about what I'm devoted to. It's telling me about what I want, what I serve already or what I want to serve. You understand? The longing is telling me what I'm devoted to. It's not just for me, but it's telling me what I'm devoted to, what I serve or what I want to serve.

And so the longing, the experience of longing, if we can bear it and open to it and even nourish it, can help us discern what we want to serve. Through my longing, through my deep desire, it's telling me something, it's guiding me. So with the longing, there are both important aspects. What do I want for me—this soul wants something for itself—and it's telling me about what I want to serve. There are facets, if you like, to discern between—two facets of the same current, the same deep current, deep movement of longing.

And again, in relation to all this and the doubt that arises: why is this important? Why is this thing about longing important? Well, it's exactly what matters most deeply to us. It's almost a definition of importance—it's what matters most deeply to us.

And it matters to make these discernments. It matters to discern what is craving. If I'm not conscious of craving, if craving gains in power in the way that we're using it, what happens? I end up squandering my energy. I end up squandering the treasures

I've been given. I end up dissipating my soul, if you like, my citta—the energy, the strength, the coherence of it, the beauty of it, the gift of it. I squander and dissipate in the end. I squander and dissipate my life and my soul through craving.

And the discernment of what we mean by clinging and the exploration of all that—why is that important? Because through that I can really understand something profound, radical, utterly surprising in a way that opens up the whole sense of existence. That's important.

It's important to know what matters most deeply to the soul—the longing. It's important to know what is craving and therefore squandering or dissipating one's life, if it's given too much leeway and power. It's important to investigate clinging because of the jewel of the Dharma and the teaching of dependent origination, emptiness, and what that can open for us.

And it's important to discern eros because it brings soul-making. And soul-making is what the soul needs, what the soul loves. Soul-making is what the soul needs and loves. And soul-making needs eros. Or souls, to different degrees, let's say, need eros and soul-making, more or less. We'll say more about that later.

But it already exists. Eros and soul-making in our life already exists. We need to acknowledge it—it's important to acknowledge it, to see it, to discern, to see that it's different from craving or just any ordinary desire. We need to understand its movement and to care for it.

It's important to make these discernments, to be clear and to care for what serves, what opens beauty, what opens a sense of the sacred.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 74

The Holy Life (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 59 min

> In this opening talk from the 'Eros Unfettered' series, Rob Burbea examines the Buddha's emphasis on transcendence in the Pāli Canon and its implications for practice. Drawing extensively from suttas across the Saṃyutta Nikāya, Majjhima Nikāya, and Udāna, he demonstrates how the Buddha consistently pointed toward the 'unfabricated' (asaṅkhata) - a dimension beyond all sense experience, the five aggregates (khandha), and conventional perception.
> Burbea analyzes passages describing the cessation of the six sense spheres, the transcendence of nāmarūpa (mind-body experience), and the Buddha's instruction to 'smash and destroy' form, vedanā, perception, saṅkhāra, and consciousness. He explores how this transcendent orientation relates to the 'holy life' (brahmacariya) as described in the Canon - not merely ethical living, but the complete path aimed at ending rebirth.
> The talk identifies three possible orientations for eros and soul-making: the transcendent (seeking what lies beyond all fabrication), the existentialist (limiting freedom to one-dimensional sense experience), and the immanent (finding divinity within form while acknowledging beyondness). Burbea examines how cultural modernism influences contemporary Dharma interpretations and considers the shadows and limitations of each approach, setting the stage for deeper exploration of where eros can be directed in spiritual life.

So I'd like to begin opening up more fully the exploration of where Eros is directed in our lives and on the path—the whole exploration of Eros on the path, Eros for the path, and Eros for awakening. This includes soul-making on the path, soul-making in the path, and the path as a path of soul-making: to what extent and how? Where does the Eros go in our lives? Where does the soul-making get to flourish? What are the possibilities there, and what are the limitations that we might inadvertently create and sustain?

There's quite a lot to this, so we'll take it gradually.

In the Pali Canon, the Buddha very clearly and very often puts forward as the aim of the path—intrinsically involved and wrapped up in the aim of awakening and enlightenment—the ideal, the goal of knowing, reaching, and experiencing the unfabricated, what is beyond the perception of any kind of world. In that sense, there's a real transcendent or transcendental thrust to the Pali Canon Buddhist teachings. Transcendent comes from the Latin transcendere, meaning to climb beyond.

If we open the Pali Canon, this is unavoidable to meet—this constant pointing towards the transcendent, as if the whole path is really aimed at that. There is this transcendent thrust, transcendent aim, or aim of transcendence.

I could read many passages from the Pali Canon that refer to this. Some of you will know these quotes, which to me are quite an important aspect of the path. For example, in the Samyutta Nikaya, the Buddha says:

"That sphere, that dimension should be understood, should be known, where the eye ceases and perception of forms fades away. That sphere should be understood and known where the ear ceases and the perception of sounds fade away. That sphere should be understood, should be known, where the nose ceases and the perception of smells fade away, where the tongue ceases and the perception of taste fade away, where the body ceases and the perception of tactile objects fades away. That sphere, that dimension should be understood, should be known, where the mind ceases and perception of mental phenomena fades away."

Great stress on this, isn't it? It's beyond any sense experience whatsoever. Sense experience here is fading, is not fabricated at that time. There is a movement beyond, a transcending of sense experience—the whole world, in other words. Not just the creation of stories and complications based on sense experience, but actual sense experience is transcended.

The Buddha calls this the end of the world. In a slightly playful moment in another quote he says, "I say that the end of the world cannot be known, seen or reached by travelling. Yet I also say that without reaching the end of the world there is no making an end to dukkha."

So again, this transcending of the senses, this going beyond the world, the fading of the world, the fading of the senses, and the opening to whatever we can call that which is beyond, that which transcends it—this is central to the Buddha's project of awakening and ending dukkha. Without reaching the end of the world, there is no making an end to dukkha. And he's not talking about traveling. Very clear.

In the Majjhima Nikaya, the Buddha says, "There is the inferior, there is the superior, and beyond both, there is the giving up of this entire field of perception." There is the inferior, meaning ordinary perception of the ordinary world. There is the superior—the perception of higher worlds, the perception of what the Buddha called the fine material realm, the realm of jhanas and the immaterial realms, the realm of the formless jhanas, the four higher jhanas, the Brahma realms, and these kinds of things, perhaps attained through different meditations. There is the inferior, there is the superior, and beyond both of these, there is the giving up of this entire field of perception, the entire field of experience of things, objects.

Again, tying it in to the end of suffering—it's not just an interesting kind of experience that one can have if you want. It ties this in with the end of suffering. So it says, "Where nama-rupa"—which really means the whole movement and experience of mind and body, but more in detail it means sensation, vedana (pleasant, unpleasant, neutral), intention, contact, perception—experience, in short—"where nama-rupa, experience, together with impingement and the perception of form, cease without trace, it is there that the tangle is cut."

Nama-rupa ceasing also means vedana, sensation, is ceasing. There is the end, in that experience, of sensation of vedana. It doesn't just mean the end of unpleasant vedana or the end of pleasant vedana to some kind of neutrality—everything is just blank in the sense of being neutral or not registering a vedana.

It means beyond even the neither-pleasant-nor-unpleasant. Sensation is, in a way, a more accurate translation for vedana. It's beyond sensation.

The Buddha speaks of this transcendence in the Udana, the Inspired Utterances from the Pali Canon. Addressing a group of monks, he declares: "There is, monks, an unborn, unbecome, unmade, unfabricated. If there were not that unborn, unbecome, unmade, unfabricated, no leaving behind of the born, become, made, fabricated would be discerned. But because there is indeed an unborn, unbecome, unmade, unfabricated, a leaving behind of the born, become, made, fabricated is discerned."

A leaving behind, a transcending of what is born, what is become, what is made, what is fabricated. All this world of creation, all this world of sense experience, is left behind. There is that possibility. There is a possibility of transcending that. The text implicitly points to this truth: this leaving behind is intrinsically wrapped up in what it means to awaken, what it means to be free, what it means to end rebirth in full awakening.

From the Samyutta Nikaya, the Buddha speaks of something we can know beyond the senses, beyond the body, beyond sensation, beyond perception and experience, beyond all movements of mind, beyond consciousness itself. His instruction is direct: "You should smash, destroy and demolish form. You should smash, destroy and demolish vedana, sensation. Smash, destroy and demolish perception. Smash, destroy and demolish sankara, mental formations. You should smash, destroy and demolish consciousness."

This strong language points to a meditative technique—learning to unfabricate this whole world of apparent forms, apparent body, apparent sensations, perceptions, mental formations, and consciousness. Smash it, destroy it, demolish it.

What is the Buddha saying in relationship to life? Life, as we consider it, consists of sense perception and the five aggregates: form, vedana, perception, sankhara, consciousness. So what is the Buddha's orientation? How does he orient the path and goal of awakening in relation to life? What is the place of life in the longing for awakening? How does life and the end of rebirth relate to the vision and experience of the transcendent?

It should be clear that the Buddha is not merely talking about a state of concentration. This experience of the transcendent is not some ultra-concentrated state where the senses don't impinge because you're absorbed in an object. All these passages make clear that this is intrinsically wrapped up in the whole liberating process—the ending of rebirth and what awakening truly means.

The Buddha typically refers to this transcendent or unfabricated in negative terms, because it's so transcendent to what we can usually perceive or experience. Being transcendent to the senses and aggregates, it's also transcendent to what we can usually conceive—conception being based on subject, object, time, and experience. So usually he speaks of what it's not, what isn't there.

Very occasionally he describes it in positive terms. In the Digha Nikaya, the collection of longer discourses, he speaks of going beyond the six senses—the usual five plus mind in Pali Canon Buddhism. With the cessation of these six senses and six sense consciousnesses, what remains is described more positively as "consciousness without attribute"—consciousness that does not look at anything, point anything out, or indicate anything. In other words, consciousness without an object. Consciousness without attributes, without end, luminous all around.

"Here, water, earth, fire, and air have no footing. Here, long and short, subtle and gross, pleasant and unpleasant, and nama-rupa—all that experience of mind and body, the movements of mind and body, the elements of mind and body—all are destroyed with the cessation of consciousness." Here, each of these is destroyed: earth, air, water, fire, long and short, subtle and gross, any kind of distinction, any kind of experience, pleasant and unpleasant, nama-rupa—all destroyed.

Here, each of these is destroyed—earth, air, water, fire, long and short, subtle and gross, any kind of distinction, pleasant and unpleasant, nama-rupa—all destroyed. But it's not a complete nothing. This is not annihilation, not total erasure.

And finally, one more quote from the Udana, the inspired utterances also found in the Itivuttaka, another set of discourses from the Pali Canon. The Buddha says: "There is that sphere, there is that dimension where there is neither earth nor water nor fire nor wind. Neither sphere of infinite space, nor sphere of infinite consciousness, nor sphere of nothingness, nor sphere of neither perception nor non-perception"—those are the four immaterial jhanas, realms—"Neither this world nor the next world, neither sun nor moon. And there, I say, there is no coming and no going, no staying, no passing away, and no arising. It is without foundation, non-continuing, and objectless."

This is pointing to something quite beyond the jhanas, quite beyond any sense of materiality or perception of this or that or anything, quite beyond either impermanence or permanence. It's beyond time—no coming, going, no staying, no passing away, no arising, non-continuing. This is really talking about something utterly transcendent there, not just a state of concentration.

Clearly these passages are not pointing to a state of being in the moment. It's beyond a sense of the moment, beyond a sense even of the arising and passing away of things, beyond a sense of being with or reduced to or just open to the process of life or the flow of life, if you prefer slightly more poetic language. Clearly it's way beyond that. It's not continuing, no arising, no passing away. Utterly beyond the senses. Utterly beyond anything whatsoever. Can't talk about process or flow. Flow of what there? Utterly beyond, again, a sort of state or stance or ongoing experience of the touch of life or of meeting life. And certainly beyond anything that could be construed as being with things as they are. Utterly, really transcendent.

Instead, reading the Pali Canon, for me it's unavoidable—these kinds of passages and how everything kind of funnels towards that. The whole path is constructed towards this understanding as central in the opening of liberation. So you can try and explain it away or try and de-emphasize that, but you've got quite a job there. If you try and do that, it's not something you can really ignore. You are confronted with these many, many passages and the whole way everything kind of moves towards that, as I said.

Something, as I said in one of the talks, somehow we need to account for this unfabricated, and the Buddha's emphasis on it, and also our experiential experience of unfabricating and the whole understanding of dependent origination there, and emptiness that we talked about much earlier.

But in a way, the Buddha is mostly saying, in another passage: where all phenomena cease in this transcending, where all phenomena cease, all manner of speaking, all ways of speaking cease. It's only possible to talk in negatives. It's not this, it's not that. There's the absence of this, there's the absence of that. This is not there, that is not there.

And there's what's called apophatic language, or apophatic theology is the equivalent in the Christian and other theistic traditions, or the via negativa. So there's not only that this transcendent lacks any attributes that we can talk about, it's actually that the way to it is a via negativa, a negative way—meaning a putting aside of this, putting aside of that, letting go of this, letting go of that, and going beyond this, going beyond that, going beyond anything, any sense perception, any form, anything, anything conditioned or created. So any experience in the normal sense of the world, of some kind of thing experienced. One goes beyond that, one puts it aside, and one comes to something that is also via negativa in the sense of lacking in attributes that one can ascribe to it.

This kind of thrust is common, I think, probably in all the major religious traditions, spiritual, mystical traditions, certainly because we're really in the realm of mystical experience now. So certainly in Buddha Dharma—or in some Buddha Dharma, let's say—and certainly there in the Pali Canon, in Neoplatonism, in mystical Christianity, Islam and Judaism, etc. And from many of those, or within strands of many of those traditions, it's absolutely intimately linked, if not equivalent, with the supreme goal of the path. So knowing that, opening to that experience—that is entirely conflated with the supreme goal of whichever mystical religious tradition we're talking about.

And so again, in relationship to the world, and in relationship to what we must call life, there is this longing and this aiming for and this pointing out of the availability of something beyond all this, beyond the world and beyond life, beyond sense experience, beyond the aggregates that make up life and our experience of life, self and life.

So Gregory of Nyssa, great saint of the Orthodox, Eastern Orthodox Christian tradition, says, "For the thirst of human souls, the thirst of human souls requires some infinite water. How could this limited world suffice?"

So there is, in these different traditions and in the Pali Canon Buddha, this yearning, this longing. And as I point out, the Buddha was extreme in his dedication for wanting to go beyond and open to this. There is this yearning, this longing, this desire, this eros for this transcendent. This exists—this eros, this yearning exists—and it exists very, very strongly in some people. And some people a little bit less so, and some people it doesn't seem to exist much at all. In fact, there might be a turning away from that, a rejection of that possibility, fear of it, all kinds of things. We'll come back to this.

But one possible direction of our eros and our whole movement and longing of the soul is towards this transcendent, towards knowing it, towards opening to it. We want something that...

In Gregory's words, this limited world doesn't suffice. We'll return to that quote because I want to explore the different possible directions for eros and soul-making, so we'll revisit it later.

But one possible direction is towards this transcendent. The eros, the thrust of the eros, and the yearning to open—again, if we use sexual, metaphorical language—is towards this, or in relationship to this transcendence. That transcendence I don't know yet, for some people and to differing extents.

And it's transcendent, clearly, from those quotes. One could read numerous quotes from different traditions—Neoplatonism and the various mystical traditions of monotheism, the monotheistic traditions—but it's beyond. Beyond what? Beyond the world, beyond appearances, beyond even certain knowings of oneness, as I said. Beyond a oneness of love, beyond a oneness of consciousness. It's beyond, transcending—it climbs over, transcendere.

So the pothos... Remember, the pothos is what wants more with the eros. The pothos wants this more, and it's kind of set this really transcendent more, this really profound—if you like, or very high, depending on up or down in the analogy. The pothos projects it there, or smells it there, intuits it there, has heard of it there. That's where the more, the pothos, that's where the more gets placed, the sense of the more, and that's where the eros gets directed.

So there's not the spreading of eros in the small sense in one dimension. Yes, the pothos wants more, and so I just get more cars, more sexual partners, more tasty food and different cuisines of different countries, more traveling, more whatever it is. It's not spreading into one dimension. There's actually another dimension, or other dimensions, because usually this unfabricated is mapped—not just conceptually, but experientially—at the end of a series of dimensions.

In a way, you could conceive of the jhānas, the eight jhānas that the Buddha of the Pali Canon points to, as I've said before on this retreat, as states of progressively less fabrication. Each of them is a dimension. So the realm of infinite space—we could say the dimension, same word, āyatana—sphere of infinite space, of infinite consciousness. These are different dimensions or realms of being, realms of experience, realms of perception, dimensions. And transcending the eighth, the next dimension, if you like, is this unfabricated. Sometimes actually referred to as nibbāna.

But the pothos is moving into other dimensions and has as its ultimate aim, or what it believes is its ultimate aim—which is something I'll come back to—this ultimate dimension of the transcendent, unfabricated.

Nor does the eros just accept one-dimensionality. So it doesn't just accept that there is only one dimension. And although I have this desire for some other dimensions, what I really need to do to be free of suffering is just accept the experience on this one dimension. In other words, what the senses give to me, the apparent or seemingly obvious finitude of my life, the difficulties that I encounter—all of that. And my job, to be liberated, what I'm moving towards is a stance, hopefully an ongoing stance, of just accepting, not craving, in relationship to this one dimension. Because there are no other dimensions, so don't look for anything there. Rather than spreading out to just want more and more on this one dimension—more cars, more partners, whatever it is, more experiences—the liberation is in just accepting and kind of containing or cutting off the movement of the pothos, the movement of the eros, of the more. And so being accepting of just what is given to me in this one dimension.

So what is the relationship, as I said, of eros with life, if you like? How is eros directing itself in relationship to life and the world?

The holy life—some of you will know—is something that the Buddha talks about and refers to frequently in the Pali Canon texts. It's a very clear, common phrase: the holy life. There are stock phrases in relationship to it. So he might say, or there might be a story, this person or that person, man or woman, received the going forth into the homeless life—so they became monastic. Actually, they were more homeless then because they didn't stay in one monastery; they tended to move around. Then to spend the rains perhaps in one monastery, or short periods staying in this monastery or that monastery, but generally speaking, they were on the move. They were much more homeless than most monastics are today.

But so-and-so received the going forth into the homeless life, and then a little later, or a long time later, this so-and-so reached the supreme goal of the holy life. So the homeless life and the holy life—the holy life, if it's a Buddhist homeless life, is regarded as the holy life. In other words, you can be homeless in another tradition that doesn't have the Eightfold Path, but that's not the holy life. So the holy life is the tradition of the Buddhist monastic practicing the Eightfold Path.

She reached the supreme goal of the holy life, knowing and realizing it, the supreme goal for herself in the here and now. He knew, she knew—and this is the person speaking, what they say at liberation. It's a stock phrase when they've become an Arahant, fully liberated: He knew, she knew, "Birth is ended, the holy life fulfilled"—or "the holy life has been led. I've done it, finished the holy life. Done is what had to be done. There is nothing further for the sake of this world."

So there's an Arahant—there's nothing further for the sake of this world. The holy life, in other words, the path of practice in a celibate, renunciate, monastic tradition, is the holy life. So life itself is not holy. The holy life refers to something very specific that's actually oriented towards what is the end of rebirth, if you like, the end of life, the ending of future lives. So it's not life as a kind of wonderment of biological evolution and diversity.

It's not life as in just this amazing, changing kaleidoscope of experiences. That's not holy. What's holy is getting beyond all that.

Nor is the holy life really just living the ethical life. So it's not a holy life if it's just ethical. Ethics, the sila and a celibate life in this case are indispensable. They're also admirable and praiseworthy, but they're not the point or the end. An ethical life is not the point or the end of the path. It's actually just a prerequisite, a necessity for ending rebirth. It's part of the path if you really want to become awakened. And that's what makes it holy: the end.

When the Mahayana came, this began to shift a little bit. With more popular versions of the Mahayana, there's a shift. The bodhisattva ideal became quite prominent—someone who's fully awakened or almost fully awakened and who makes the choice to stick around, not to end their rebirths, but to remain out of compassion, out of love for other beings who are suffering. So the holy life actually becomes more tied in with an ethical movement as we would tend to understand it, meaning a movement of love and a commitment of love. This person is sticking around, not ending rebirth. There's a shift in that with the Mahayana and with the populist understanding of Mahayana teachings about bodhisattvas.

Also in the Mahayana, there's much less of a distinction—there's a kind of non-duality between the unfabricated, totally transcendent realm and the world of fabrication, the world of senses. But as I said, in the Pali Canon, whatever one decides to bring to our interpretation of it, we unavoidably have to deal with this transcendent thrust that's there.

The Buddha talks about escaping from this world, and the jhanas, as I said, have been progressive states of less fabrication—they're actually progressive states of escape. The Buddha described the first jhana as an escape, and then the second jhana as a better escape from the world, and so on. The eighth jhana is the best escape minus the last one.

In talking about vedana too, the Buddha makes a distinction between worldly vedana and non-worldly pleasantness—for instance, the pleasure of the jhanas. It's not coming from the senses. The rapture, the bliss, the ecstasy of the jhanas is not coming from sensual touch, taste, smell, sight or sound. The Buddha also in the Pali Canon talks about the supramundane, beyond the world, the loka—meaning the transcendent.

So there is implicit in all this a kind of relative denigration of the world, a denigration of life. Life is only serving something that goes beyond life. Life is only good to the extent that we use it to get beyond life. And the world is something to be transcended, something to be gotten beyond.

Now, this is not that popular, or rather it's not really brought out much in a lot of modern Western teachings. Sometimes people really try to make the case that the Buddha or the Pali Canon absolutely didn't have a transcendent thrust, and that it's really about being in this life and being open to everything. I find that a little hard to twist things that way in an interpretation of the Pali Canon.

But it's interesting. Why is there that insistence by some that the Buddha of the Pali Canon did not have a transcendent thrust? That to me is very interesting for different reasons. Some is purely individual, having to do with the soul of the person and the soul calling of the person. But a lot of it is also cultural.

In our modernist culture, in our modernist society, with the views that we've grown up with, there's a kind of abhorrence for various reasons for anything that is transcendent in that sense. It's too close to a kind of life-denialism. And if life is all you have—which is what a lot of modernism asserts, that there's just this, and when you die you die and that's it, and there's nothing beyond—and there's absolutely no place for metaphysics, there's no place for anything beyond the senses or what you can see through the senses or through a microscope and infer from that.

So there's a real thrust of that kind of absolute dogmatic ruling out of metaphysics from modernist philosophy and actually most postmodern philosophy, and that has spread into the culture. A cardinal rule is nothing beyond, nothing beyond—there's just this. And we have to find what we're looking for in this, in just this, meaning the experience of the senses, meaning what comes to us empirically. It also means what science seems to tell us, though that gets a bit more confusing if you take science a bit deeper.

It's not that simple because although many people nowadays clearly believe this is it and when you die that's it, a lot of other people clearly believe in some kind of life after death, some kind of spiritual world beyond where they'll be with grandma again and their spouse. But that kind of beyond is not at all like the unfabricated. It's still a realm of experience, pretty much like this one, only it sounds nicer in some way, and it's not subject to impermanence. There's a kind of split between people who believe that and people who believe there's just extinction, but this whole unfabricated something beyond experience, or a series of dimensions that move beyond all sense experience, all perception—

This perspective feels, I think, for many people too much like extinction, or it simply lacks attraction for various reasons. And so we find ourselves squeezed—with this refusal of transcendence—into either hoping for something better beyond death, where there's this eternal being with one's loved ones, or we're compressed into "just this," into "just life."

The version of Dharma that emerges from this compression into "just this" or "just life"—perhaps reduced somewhat atomistically into recognizing that the self isn't real, that what exists is process, but everything else is also just process, atoms, and so forth—somehow squeezes us into what I might call an existentialist version of Dharma. This approach closely resembles existentialist philosophy or draws from existentialist psychoanalysis.

"This is it." This becomes your arena to somehow find, to eke out some kind of okayness or freedom or acceptance of this undeniable existential situation—that this is it, that there is this life that's essentially meaningless, essentially finite.

But the question here is: when there is this rhetoric of "just this" or "life," what is actually meant? I've spoken about this before. When you say "this," what do you mean by "this"? "There's just this." What do you mean by "life"? Especially when you give that word a capital L—do you mean just the senses? Do you mean bare attention? What's revealed by bare attention, or something else? Or something incorporating much more than that?

Broadly, in this non-transcendent approach—this refusal of the transcendent—we could distinguish two possibilities. There is what I just alluded to: a kind of existentialist path where there is just this one dimension that comes to us through the senses.

There's nothing more than that. We refuse anything beyond what is obvious to most people in Western culture, beyond what the senses of most people in Western culture can perceive. In other words, we're simply going along with what most people in our culture of Western scientific materialist modernism can actually perceive through their limited training in perception.

So there's a kind of flatland of one-dimensionality, and the question becomes: what freedom is available in relationship to that one-dimensionality, taking it almost as given? As I said, it might be acknowledged that the self doesn't really exist and is more of a process, as is everything else. So what's the possibility for freedom there? What's the possibility for soul-making in such a one-dimensional flatland that refuses any kind of other dimensionality or transcendence?

Where does that possibility lie? Is it that working within and accepting that range of possibility—that flatland freedom and flatland soul-making, whatever freedom and soul-making are available there—is actually an individual soul-calling? Might there be, for some people, a genuine calling of the soul to see the world this way, not to see it in ways more expansive or beyond that, and to create soul-making and freedom within the limitations of that view?

Or is it actually the limits of the eros-psyche-logos process for that person—limits that have been reached and become somewhat stuck, cramped, or confined, as we've discussed before? Is this coming from a kind of indoctrination from the culture, or from fear of not going along with mainstream opinion, whether academic, cultural, or from one's various communities?

All these questions—whether it's individual soul-calling, whether it's the limits of a certain soul, whether it's indoctrination from culture—we could also apply to the transcendent view, to the perspective of a transcendence which one wants to know and open to, having heard about it. Again, it could be an individual soul-calling, it could be some kind of limit operating, or it could be indoctrination or cultural conditioning.

So there's this transcendent option for the movement of soul-making and eros. There's this refusal of transcendence into what we might call a flatland, a one-dimensionality. And then there's a third possibility that we might call immanence.

Immanence is related etymologically to "remaining in." Here, what I mean by immanence—and what it means in most religious traditions—is that the divinity remains in the world, in life, in form, in matter, in the senses. It infuses all this. It's not, at least in the way I would like to use it, limited to that. In other words, there might be a beyond. I know I've been deliberately open with the definition of what I even mean by divinity—we'll revisit this—but one aspect is that divinity has some kind of beyondness to it, relating to dimensionality.

So whatever this beyond is that carries a sense of divinity is both beyond and also in life, form, world, matter, senses.

In terms of individual orientations, reactions, and transformations in relation to all this, some people will recoil from the transcendent thrust and transcendent teachings. Something in them is either not satisfied, afraid, or resistant. So it's interesting to consider what's happening for someone who doesn't accept that transcendent dimension, and perhaps also doesn't accept the flatland either. They may want, or have the intuition of, divinity not just beyond but in and through. Or some people refuse that transcendent beyond—it's just "in" somehow. Still, I would say it has some kind of sense of beyondness.

We'll revisit this in terms of beyondness and divinity.

In terms of individual orientations and reactions to these transformative possibilities, some people will recoil from the transcendent thrust and transcendent teachings. Something within them is either not satisfied, afraid, or simply resistant. It's interesting to observe what's happening for someone who rejects both the transcendent path and the flatland approach, yet still wants or intuits divinity not just beyond but in and through everything. Some people refuse the transcendent beyond while sensing something sacred just "in" somehow—though I would say this still carries some sense of beyondness. We'll revisit this in terms of beyondness and divinity.

What I really want to explore are the individual reactions, the different stances and gut responses to these three possibilities. These orientations can change over a person's life and practice, and each carries its own shadows, limitations, or potential weak points.

Consider first the transcendent orientation. We can see how someone might want to go beyond the world, rejecting it and directing their longing toward the unfabricated, toward transcendence. But this could become confused with vibhava taṇhā—craving for non-existence. The movement might be polluted: "I want to get out of the world, I've had enough, I don't want to be reborn, I want this experience that turns everything off, and then I want to end it all." This represents a confused interpretation, not what the Buddha was actually pointing toward.

There can also be aversion or fear of the body, wanting to transcend its messiness and sexuality, even an aversion to soul-making itself. This becomes a shrinking or avoiding movement—hoping for transcendence while skipping over all the earthy, messy, confusing realm that John Keats called "the vale of soul-making": body, eros, embodied existence. But this movement arises from avoidance, fear, and contraction of being.

Another shadow of extreme transcendent orientation is potentially not caring for the world: "I'm out of here, I'm on my way out, this world has no value." In an extremist transcendent view, the world serves only as a stepping stone at best—there's no inherent divinity in the world itself. This represents an extremely dualistic transcendent stance, yet I know people, including Buddhists, who hold this view.

The second orientation—the one-dimensional existentialist approach—carries its own limitations. There can be attachment to a limited view of the senses, to a narrow logos, to the flatland perspective. This creates narrowness of perception, experience, and even ideation. Paradoxically, though it seems opposite to the transcendent view, this too can lead to lack of care for the world. When we refuse any beyondness or divinity to the world, it becomes difficult to generate deep care. While the humanistic, modernist, secular paradigm may care for human beings and environmental concerns because degradation affects humans adversely, it's challenging to cultivate profound care for a world viewed as merely meaningless matter.

This approach may also limit both the depth of freedom and the range of soul-making available, because the actual sense of the world remains very constrained.

The third direction—embracing divinity in and through the world—has its own challenges. It demands tremendous rigor from us intellectually, ethically, and in terms of practice artistry. If we're truly going to open to body, soul, sexuality, and eros as fields of divinity, it requires integrity, clarity, and scrupulous attention to these areas. It's easy to adopt certain language while lacking genuine rigor intellectually, ethically, and meditatively.

These three directions reflect patterns we can observe throughout history. Sociologist Robert Bellah has investigated what he calls "the history of world rejection"—how religious movements relate to and view the world. Building on Max Weber's insights, Bellah acknowledges that world rejection has manifested differently across various world religions and historical periods. However, he notes a striking pattern: "I want to concentrate on the fact that they were all, historically, in some sense rejections, and that world rejection is characteristic of a long and important period of religious history."

Bellah contrasts this with "an equally striking fact, namely the virtual absence of world rejection in what he calls primitive religions"—those existing before the first millennium BCE, prior to the Buddha's time—"and in the modern world."

So historically, we see primitive religions with virtually no world rejection, followed by a middle period where world rejection became quite pronounced in various forms, and then the modern period with again virtually no world rejection.

"Primitive religions," Bellah explains, "are on the whole oriented to a single cosmos. There is no beyond. They know nothing of a wholly different world relative to which the actual world is devoid of value. They are concerned with the maintenance of personal, social and cosmic harmony." The overriding goal of salvation that dominates world-rejecting religions is almost absent in primitive religion. The idea that salvation, freedom, liberation, awakening, or nibbāna involves getting beyond the world simply wasn't present in these earlier traditions.

"World-rejection is no more characteristic of the modern world than it is of primitive religions." This observation is particularly relevant for understanding what influences us culturally, how we read backwards into the Pali Canon, and how we orient ourselves in our spiritual lives.

So this is really what I want to explore in more detail: the relationships with these directions, what I'm calling the transcendent, the sort of existentialist flatland that refuses transcendence, and if you like, the immanence—which may include a transcendence, but actually insists, if you like, on a divinity, some kind of divinity in the world, in life, in matter, in form and the senses.

So, how does soul-making work in these three directions and inclinations? How does the eros work there? Where does it go? And as I said at the beginning, what is the movement of eros on the path or for the path and for awakening if the path and awakening are construed differently in these ways?

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 75

The Holy Life (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h28

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea continues his exploration of eros and the spiritual path, investigating how our relationship with the path itself can become erotic and soul-making. He examines three different approaches to sense pleasure within Buddhist frameworks: the traditional cutting of papañca (conceptual proliferation), the transcendent movement toward the unfabricated, and a soul-making approach that allows imaginal dimensionality to infuse our experience of the world.
> Burbea draws connections between Vajrayana iconography of divine sexual union and the erotic relationship between wisdom (prajñā) and skillful means (upāya), showing how awakening can be conceived as an intimate union with appearances rather than escape from them. He critiques both reductionist and deflationary approaches to dharma that limit eros, arguing that the degree and kind of a person's eros determines the depth and breadth of their spiritual path.
> The talk addresses how secular and limited visions of awakening - those focused merely on reducing suffering or being with 'what is' - cannot sustain deep erotic engagement with practice. Burbea suggests that robust spiritual paths require visions of awakening that include otherness, mystery, and dimensionality to nourish the soul-making dynamic. He explores how anti-libidinal psychological patterns can block eros, and how rigid conceptual frameworks prevent the natural expansion of our understanding of path and awakening.

So we want to unpack, unfold, have a closer look at and inquire into eros and the path—the relationship of eros and the path, but also eros on the path and eros for the path. What is it to have an erotic relationship with the path that one is on? We want to inquire further into this and explore it all, opening it out for our investigation and questioning and practice.

Because of all that we've said so far about what eros is and what it does, to talk about eros and the path, eros on the path, eros for the path, means, of course, to talk about soul-making and the path, soul-making on the path, soul-making with respect to the path. As we've said, eros stimulates soul-making. It's a part of soul-making, and soul-making always involves eros. As we're using those terms, they implicate and involve each other. So eros and soul-making on the path and with respect to the path.

Now, we should also point out that when we talk about path, implicit in talking about path is the idea or the sense or the vision or fantasy of where that path is going—its aim, its direction, its goal. Awakening, whatever the concept, vision, image, fantasy of awakening is. So talking about eros and soul-making with respect to the path necessitates, involves already talking about eros and soul-making with respect to whatever idea and fantasy of awakening we have, or the different ideas and fantasies of awakening.

And further, to tie a third point in, any idea or fantasy of awakening implies an ideation, a logos, regarding the world. In other words, how does the vision of awakening, the idea of awakening, conceive of the world? What's the relationship between world, the senses, what we experience through the senses, which we could call the world, or life? To talk about awakening means also talking about that—senses, world, life, sense pleasure, all that. The relationship with that is implicit in the idea of awakening, the vision of awakening, the image of awakening. And the idea of awakening is implicit in the vision, image of the path.

So if we talk about eros and soul-making and the path, eros and soul-making on or for the path, wrapped up in that is the whole fantasy and logos of awakening. And wrapped up in that is the whole idea about the world, about the senses and life. So that to talk about eros for the path and on the path is not really separate from talking about eros and soul-making and its relationship to the world. What the path and the ideation, the vision of the path allows or disallows, encourages or doesn't, in terms of the directionality of eros and soul-making with respect to the world.

So these three are connected: the world, life, the senses; awakening; and path, eros and the path. Three aspects that are actually interwoven inevitably in each other when we begin to unpack these things. And as was already made clear plenty of times, hopefully by now, when we talk about soul-making, we are talking about eros, psyche, and logos. In other words, this erotic movement, this erotic inclination, attraction, desire; psyche, meaning image and fantasy; and logos, meaning ideation and concept. So all those three—eros, psyche, logos—are wrapped up with those three: path, awakening, and world, or senses, or life. So all these, one set of threes and the other set of threes, they're all completely interrelated, interwoven.

So let's go into this a little bit and take our time. What does the mind do with respect to, let's say, sense pleasure? How does this tie into what the path says about what we do with sense pleasure? Because that's related to how awakening envisages a relationship with sense pleasure, and tied in with that then is a relationship with the whole world. So eros, sense pleasure, and awakening—there are possible ways they're constellated or conceived of in different frameworks or different visions of path and awakening.

One that you'll be probably quite familiar with, even if you're not familiar with the words, is that when there's pleasant vedanā, a pleasant sensation, when there's sense pleasure, or the possibility of sense pleasure in the future, then what quickly comes in for unawakened human beings is papañca. Of course that applies to unpleasant sensations as well, but here's this possibility of pleasantness—that chocolate cake, whatever it is, that attractive person—and the mind starts spinning around that and veiling it over, hyping it up with papañca. How wonderful this thing is, how beautiful it looks, how dear they are, how interesting they must be, this person, or whatever it is. There's a veil of papañca, of ideation, thinking and imagination. All that's called papañca—complicating.

This is unanimously regarded as a bad thing. Papañca creates more craving and clinging. It's part of that process and creates self and basically creates dukkha and entanglement in dukkha. And the practice is therefore cutting that link, cutting the link from pleasant vedanā, which is unavoidable in life, and what can flow out of that in terms of craving, but now particularly the papañca. So just cut the papañca off.

What you get wrapped up, implicit in that kind of view often, is that when you cut that off, then there's a kind of reductionism. So we are reducing all this hype, clearing away all this hype and all the entanglement, all the veils of illusory thinking and aggrandizement of the object that I'm attracted to in this case, and the imagery that goes with it, the imagination that goes with it, and we're reducing to just sense pleasure—just sense pleasure. So when I'm in a situation which involves sense pleasure, there is just sense pleasure and I'm not adding any more to it with imagination or concept. There's a kind of reductionism in there.

This can go a couple of different ways, which are not really separate, and we've touched on this before. So it can go into a kind of atomistic, a reductionism towards an atomistic process view, as if there is just this moment of bare sense pleasure, which can be revealed with bare attention.

There's the registering of sense pleasure, but nothing more is added to that in terms of imagination or thought. And so really, what reality is that we can be with is just this bare process of bare registration of sense pleasure. Yes, it's enjoyable, but we just register that and we don't add anything. That's the movement there to strip away down to the bare elements of this atomistic and automatic process, at its barest level.

Or it can go into a slightly softer-sounding vision of path and awakening, which is to be with what is. Be in the moment, be with the touch of life, open to the touch of life. And if the touch is pleasant, then that's what you're open to. And if it's enjoyable, that's what you're open to. And if it's unpleasant, that's what you're open to.

Here, implicit too, there's a kind of realism of the "what is," which is assumed to be real—the touch of life. There's usually the assumption of reality wrapped up in that. When I strip away this parpancha, then I'm passively receiving the real touch of life.

Now that one—the touch of life or being with what is—is slightly more romantic. There's a bit more possibility for some kind of eros and soul-making than with the atomistic process view. But the two get mixed. As I said before, sometimes the word "process" gets replaced with the word "flow," for instance, and then you've got river and water analogies or imagery associated with it, which can be a little more juicy.

But still here, with this kind of view of cutting the parpancha, the eros and the soul-making is limited. A path says: imagination or fantasy and thought about the sense object, about the sense pleasure, is parpancha. Cut the parpancha. In cutting the parpancha, psyche and logos are cut, and eros in relationship to the senses, in relationship to the world, is limited and cut as well.

So that's one view. And whether you know the language, familiar with that exact language or not, you'll recognize that kind of thrust of the teaching.

A second view: actually, if you take a closer look at the Pali Canon, while there certainly is that level of teaching about parpancha, there's also... parpancha is filled out in terms of what it actually means, what the Buddha really means by parpancha. It says a lot more—it has a lot more depth to it than what I've just explained.

There's a sutta where I think Sāriputta is explaining about parpancha. And he says that what parpancha really means—it's equivalent to sense perception. In other words, it's equivalent to sense experience. Parpancha is really objectification, meaning making objects, making things—self and this, this lamp, this table, this piece of paper, this person. So parpancha means the making manifold, the construing in the perception, in the actual experience, in the world, into objects, separate objects, things that seem to exist.

So parpancha is actually equivalent with fabricating the perception of objects, the perception of things. So parpancha has this whole other level of meaning to it, beyond this idea of being cut and removed with bare attention, which is there, but there's a whole other level.

In other words, what actually is the Buddha referring to when he says parpancha? What's included in that? What's the extent of that?

There is, if you like, the parpancha of the senses, meaning the equivalence, actually, of senses and parpancha. So that to let go of parpancha is really to let go of the whole edifice of what we were calling clinging, and the whole edifice, the whole building, construction of the fabrication of perception.

So a moment of no-parpancha is really a moment of no fabrication of perception, a moment of the unfabricated. Where there is no-parpancha, there is no object. You can't really talk of anything, as the Buddha said, where all phenomena cease or ways of speaking cease.

Here then, if the path is construed as this—here is the sense experience and we're trying to get rid of parpancha—the whole movement there, again, is towards the unfabricated. The eros, the erotic movement and attraction is away from appearances, away from the world to the unfabricated. So therefore, of course, the psyche and logos, the soul-making in relation to the world is very limited. It's not itself really an object, an erotic object, an object for soul-making.

Compare that with a view—a third view of sense pleasure—which would perhaps make a distinction between parpancha and the craving that goes with that, and soul-making and the eros that goes with that. So parpancha craving on one side, and psyche, soul-making, eros on the other side.

So where there's eros, there will be soul-making. What's the difference? And we've touched on this before. What's the difference between parpancha and psyche, parpancha and soul-making? Eros and craving, we've talked about: the lessening of contraction, the different experience in the energy body, the fact of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic opening things up and liberating the object away from realism and expansion—all that.

So that, for example, if we talk about sense pleasure, eros in touching a lover, in the touch of two lovers, or eros with respect to the touch between two lovers—eros. What's going on for those two lovers when there's the erotic connection there? Is it really just sense pleasure? Is that all it is between two lovers? It's just pleasant sensation?

And would we teach those lovers, "Bring mindfulness to the sensation in your lovemaking? Notice the bare sensation of pleasure"? Is that the guide to profound lovemaking that we're going to offer them? Bare attention and the noticing of sense pleasure—is that all that's going on there?

Or is it just sense pleasure plus papañca? Are we really going to say that? Some people would. Or are we even going to say that in the touch between two lovers, what's really going on is yes, there's some sense pleasure, and then there's some love, meaning care—they care for each other. So what's really communicated and felt in that touch is a combination of sense pleasure and care. Again, some people will say yes, that's what's going on—a slightly more generous view.

Is it, though? Is that all that's going on? It's not that there's no sense pleasure, and hopefully it's not that there's no care. But really, can we inquire into this? Is it papañca? What's the missing ingredient? Or is it actually soul-making? That there is, in the eros, fantasies, images, dimensionalities, beauties—in the erotic other, in the touch itself, in the sense of the eros, in the autoeroticism, all of that. You could call it papañca, but you would probably be missing something. And to call it just sense pleasure and care, again, would be missing something.

Or again—you know, at Gaia House, and I venture this is true for most retreat centers in the insight meditation tradition, probably all retreat centers in the Buddhist tradition—how many cookbooks are there in the kitchen? It's staggering. If you go into the kitchen, there are shelves loaded with cookbooks, and some of the cooks who cook in the kitchen have their own personal cookbooks as well. Really a lot.

What's going on there? So here, in cooking for the retreatants and the staff, is it just pleasure seeking, the pleasure of pleasant food? Is it just pleasure plus care for the retreatants? Or is there not another element—a fantasy of soul-making in relation to the food? All these cooking programs, all these cookbooks with their fantastic photography and suggestions of the abundance of the earth, the fruit of the earth, the freshness, the interconnectedness with nature, the sophistication of certain orientations to food, the sophistication of the palate and the refinement of sensitivity, or the interconnectedness with all things there.

Wrapped up in this relationship with food and in the movement of preparing food is soul-making, is fantasy, is logos. It cannot be, I don't think, reduced to sense pleasure plus care. Or you can notice when it is—what a different relationship. Different kinds of cooks cook very different meals. Sometimes when it's just about care, for instance—make it pleasant—it's a very different presentation, a very different orientation and relationship.

Or again, in Vajrayana teachings, when the teachings see all appearances as divine—there is in that already some tendency that will tend to transform the vedanā into pleasant. But again, this tantric movement is not just about sense pleasure, not about just enjoying sense pleasure, something very cheap versions seem to mistake it for. And you could say, "Well, that's just papañca," and offer a kind of dismissal of that whole Vajrayana movement and intention. Is seeing appearances as divine just sense pleasure? Is it just sense pleasure and papañca? Or is it the movement of soul-making?

There is, in that and in the cooking and in the lover's touch, this eros and soul-making with respect to the senses. In other words, how are the senses viewed? What eros and soul-making with respect to the senses, the touch of the world? Certainly with respect to sense pleasure, but actually also with respect to neutral and unpleasant. We're looking at that—what's the eros and soul-making that's allowed by the conception, by the vision with respect to the world and the world of the senses, and in this case, particularly sense pleasure.

If we expand that a little and touch on some Vajrayana teachings, which are very much related to what we're talking about here with soul-making and imaginal and eros, then you get, as I said, these icon statues or tankas or paintings of...

of sexual union between the female and the male Buddhas or bodhisattvas. There's eros between the feminine and the masculine aspects. The feminine is often—or rather the prajña, the wisdom, the insight—is depicted as female in those iconographies. And the masculine often represents what's called upāya, which is usually translated as skillful means.

So in a way, this erotic union, this icon of erotic union between the feminine and masculine, is actually representing aspects of Buddhahood as a union of wisdom and means. The union of feminine wisdom and masculine means, traditionally depicted in this way.

This becomes particularly interesting in light of what we're exploring, because this word upāya in the Vajrayāna tradition can also refer to the maṇḍala. And the maṇḍala is, if you like, not just this arrangement of sand painting or whatever it is, but at its deeper level represents the world of divine appearances.

In other words—and we've talked about this on the re-enchanting retreat—one level of what the maṇḍala is, is this. Right here. If I see it the right way, where I am sitting right now, where I am walking right now, wherever I find myself, in the transubstantiation, the transformation of perception, becomes the maṇḍala. It becomes the means, the skillful means.

In other words, the world of appearances, of divine appearances, when the world and the appearances and the senses are seen a certain way, it becomes the upāya. What is the means of the Buddha? The skillful means. The skillful means is the world. This is what the Buddha uses.

So that means that this sexual union depicted in the iconography—between the feminine prajña, the feminine wisdom, which at its level of Buddhahood actually has the word jñāna, which is related to our word gnosis—the sexual union between the gnosis of the Buddha and the upāya, the divine appearances, the world and sense experience. There's a sexual union, there's an erotic connection.

How different this is from the first version—cutting the papañca, where there is almost no eros allowed, or moving away from it towards the unfabricated, there's no eros, very little eros allowed with respect to the senses and with respect to the world. We'll revisit this several times as we go on.

But here there's eros depicted, symbolized, between, if you like, the experiencer, the wise experiencer, and the experience—in other words, the senses, the world, the divine appearances—between the knower and the known, between the divine subject, that Buddha, that Buddha nature, that ultimate gnosis, that ultimate mind, if you like, ultimate kind of consciousness, between the divine subject, that divine subject, and the divine object of sense experience, of world.

Some people—this is a bit of an aside—actually refer to the coalescence of emptiness and appearance, and that has a couple of different levels of meaning. One meaning, which I've referred to in the past, is just that appearances are empty. You can't get an emptiness that's separate from appearances. That's what it's referring to, and appearances are empty through and through.

There's another level in the teachings, or rather in some traditions of the teaching, which actually redefine, if you like, or expand on the very word emptiness. The word emptiness means different things in different Buddhist traditions, and you should be aware of this. So it can mean really quite a range of things—there's quite a range of what it's taken to mean, the word emptiness.

Mostly I use it as the absence of inherent existence—that things don't exist independently, from their own side, independent of the way of looking, so to speak. That's mostly how I use it. But there are traditions where emptiness and this jñāna, this gnosis, are equivalent—this Buddha's gnosis, this ultimate mind, if you like, ultimate citta.

So that's actually the meaning of emptiness, more than just absence of inherent existence. It includes the absence of inherent existence of what is observed, what appears, and it knows that absence of inherent existence, and it also includes the absence of its own inherent existence. This jñāna, this gnosis, this Buddha nature, this ultimate knowing, is also lacking in inherent existence.

But there's also, as well as all that, a kind of non-duality between the knower and the known, so that this Buddha nature, this ultimate awareness, if you like, encompasses both the knowing and the world, the senses, the appearances.

There's some case in the Prajñāpāramitā Sūtra, the Heart Sutra, which is a very famous sutra, where it actually says "form is emptiness, emptiness is form." I used to think that was just bad Sanskrit, and what it should say is "form is empty," rather than "form is emptiness."

And then it continues through all the aggregates. Vedanā is emptiness, emptiness is vedanā. Perception is emptiness, emptiness is perception. Saṅkhāra, mental formations, is emptiness, emptiness is mental formations. Consciousness is emptiness, emptiness is consciousness.

But from some case, and I think some scholars would very much argue, do argue, that actually the meaning of the word emptiness in some of those Prajñāpāramitā sutras is actually in this much larger sense, meaning to refer to the Dharmakāya in this bigger sense of the Buddha's gnosis of the ultimate kind of awareness, if you like, of the Buddha nature.

That's a slight tangent, but I think it's important to know if you really want to get into all this stuff and explore the teachings and understand that there are important divisions to be aware of. And I think I've said in the past, everyone might use the word emptiness. There's really, really quite a range of differences in what people are actually talking about when they use that. And there's a lot of confusion that comes when we don't really understand what a person means by emptiness, etc., or dharmakāya, or Buddha nature, or these words.

But the important point for right now is that, as I said, there's a very different notion implicit, a very different eros allowed between the practitioner and the world of the senses there, and the world in general.

Because this also gets mirrored in Kabbalistic teachings, and we'll come back to all this later. But this union that's depicted in the iconography there between, if you like, aspects of Buddhahood, aspects of the Buddha—aspects of Buddha nature, aspects of the ultimate, aspects of the Buddha's gnosis, whatever—this union between those aspects is actually to be practiced, to be mirrored, if you like, or mimicked by humans in their practice.

In other words, that iconography is encouraging and allowing, but also encouraging, a certain way of looking, a certain way of relating, a certain way of conceiving of senses and sense pleasure and the whole movement of what awakening is and the path and the soul-making in relation to the world of the senses. So, as I said, it's all wrapped up together there. But this union that's depicted between aspects of, let's call it Buddha nature, is something that is to be mirrored, or better, mimicked, echoed—mimicked is a good word—in human beings' practice, in a practitioner's practice.

So you can see just there, with those three or four different kinds of castings of the path in relationship to sense pleasure, in the first one that the bare senses, or what's received in the senses, the sense pleasure, is regarded—whether it's pleasant or unpleasant—as a basic kind of reality. Missing a whole level of the emptiness of that very sense perception itself, of the sense pleasure, of the sense unpleasantness, whatever. And it also, as I mentioned, as I stressed, limits the soul-making eros in relation to the senses itself, and in relation, therefore, to the world and to life, because world and life is what we get through the senses.

In the second, this movement kind of beyond, this transcendent thrust that we're referring to that refers to puncture—and the senses are kind of coterminous in what they refer to, and movement is beyond the world of the senses. To drop the senses, if you're trying to puncture that and open up to the unfabricated, then there, the unfabricated is regarded as real. And the word fabricated implies a fabrication, something not real. The unfabricated is reality. Everything else, the world of the senses, is essentially papañca. And rather than some kind of basic reality revealable there, the world of the senses is not reality. Unfabricated is reality in that view.

And there's a strong case for that view, of a reading of the Pali Canon that way, very much. But there, the soul-making is only in relation to that unfabricated. That's the thrust. That's what I want to open to. That's what I want to penetrate and reach. And then the fantasy of the path is around that.

In the third, the versions—either the soul-making vision of what we're talking about with the imaginal, etc., and eros, or the Vajrayana versions of that, where they, in fact, overlap, I would say—there's not the reality so much assumed of an independent existence, either of the unfabricated, and certainly not of the senses. Or I should say, most Vajrayana teachings, I would say. The emptiness is implicit there, or in the soul-making, we say, knowing image as image.

But the general point here is there's always a way of looking. There's always a conceptual framework and there's always a fantasy involved regarding sense pleasure, vedanā, and world. There's always a way of looking. In places I've said before, there's always some logos and some psyche, some image and fantasy in relationship with the senses, with vedanā, with sense pleasure or unpleasant or whatever it is, with world. And that's determined by context, by teaching, by intention, by the conceptual framework of whatever tradition of Dharma we're being exposed to or we're in. And it has implications for eros and soul-making in all kinds of ways—certainly in relation to the senses and the world and what's allowed there. Actually more than that. I'll come back to that, but let's just start there.

So we're looking at: where does the eros get to go? Where does it get to be directed or to flow? Where is it allowed?

So a person—and this is not just a hypothetical example I'm going to give—but a person could have with them a lot of eros flowing in their system, a lot of libido, if we use that word, a lot of eros towards the unfabricated. They really want to know that. And towards the opening to, the penetration of, the realization of deep emptiness in their life. And they bring their energy and their intelligence and their creativity and their really into practice in that direction, everything that's involved in that directionality, and they reflect a lot, and they're experimenting, and all that.

But in relation to the world—there, with the things of the world and the senses, there is only craving, there is not eros. In other words, there's no fantasy and image with respect to the world and the things of the senses. The imaginal is not operating there. The imaginary may be operating, the imaginal is not operating.

And then this person is putting all their energy, all their libido in the direction of the unfabricated or deep emptiness. And if you like, just trying to kind of let go of their craving with respect to the world, but they can't shake their addiction—and they're calling it an addiction. They can't shake their addictions to food, keep going to the refrigerator, what's going on there, to sense pleasure in different forms, and to what they were calling ego aggrandizement. Despite the certain amount of, actually relatively deep penetration into emptiness, and despite a certain amount of practice with that, and a certain amount of practice with the jhānas.

What's missing here? What's going on?

In terms of the jhānas, I should say—this is again a slight side point, but it's important to make—the second jhāna is characterized by a really overwhelming, maybe overwhelming at first, then you get used to it, a very deep, deep upwelling of happiness and joy.

And that's the essential ingredient of the second jhana—one becomes really absorbed in that happiness, suffused and saturated in this joy that runs through the body, heart and mind, permeating and filling the entire being.

This repeated sitting in the second jhana has a direct bearing on our addiction to sense pleasure and our need for sense gratification. All the jhanas do, but something particular about the second jhana addresses our relationship with sense pleasure. With time, we're weaned off our habitual seeking—it's no longer where we go to look for happiness. We develop a much richer source of fulfillment.

But this weaning is only possible if we really sit and marinate in the jhanas, particularly the second jhana. A little bit here and there, just dipping in or racing through because you want to experience all eight jhanas before moving on to insight meditation—this style of practicing probably won't make much difference to the operation and pervasiveness of craving in our life. We have to really marinate, really sit in it again and again for hours, soaking it up until something deep in the being is transformed in terms of patterns, needs, and where we truly feel fulfillment. But only if we sit underwater in that happiness like a sponge for hours upon hours. Then it makes a lifetime difference.

The main point, though, isn't about jhanas. Could it be that these practitioners need something completely different? Rather than having all their eros directed toward the unfabricated, with soul-making fantasy centered only around that movement toward the transcendent thrust of the path—while refusing the imaginal in relation to the world, allowing only craving there—maybe what they actually need, completely contrary to conventional assessment or wisdom, is for the world itself to be imagined. Food, even ego, sense pleasure—all of this needs to be imagined.

We need to let the imaginal infuse world, food, ego, whatever we're addicted to. Through this infusion, as is characteristic of the imaginal, these experiences gain dimensionality. Food becomes more than just sense pleasure. Even ego, even self begins to receive image. The whole world of the senses starts to gain dimensionality, and through that dimensionality, some kind of sense of divinity emerges.

Eating or drinking—a simple cup of tea, whatever we're consuming—becomes divine nectar. This is an example of allowing the imaginal to infuse the realm of the senses, instead of refusing the imaginal dimension there and just trying to cut the craving. Why isn't it working? "I'm doing my emptiness practice, I'm really committed to that. I'm doing jhana practice. Why isn't it working after all these years?"

Might it actually be that there's a doorway opening into freedom here that's quite the opposite of what we assumed?

If divine nectar sounds silly or contrived—and it can be contrived—I would say practice with this. Practice in relationship to the world, to the senses and sense pleasure. Images await you. Images that work for you are waiting to be discovered. You don't have to choose the standard Vajrayana ones—divine nectar is a standard Vajrayana practice or instruction for seeing food and drink. But we're practicing the imaginal in a more open and creative, less prescriptive way. Images that work specifically for you are waiting for you to discover them in relation to the senses, to sense pleasures, to the things of the world.

What's the difference between this and what one of my oncologists said about taking holidays—that sense of escaping something? What's the difference between seeking sense pleasure as an escape, seeking to escape something in sense pleasure, or seeking escape from the world into jhana or the unfabricated, as the Buddha sometimes described? What's the difference between that and something that brings embodied soul-making into our sense experience, into relationship—an erotic, soul-making, imaginal relationship with the experience of the senses, with life, with the world?

Pilgrimage instead of vacation.

Nietzsche wrote: "The degree and kind of a man's sexuality reaches up into the topmost summit of his spirit." I'll leave this in his gender-biased language for now. He wrote this in a book containing mostly single-sentence aphorisms, so the immediate context isn't exactly apparent. But what if we replace sexuality with eros? "The degree and kind of a person's eros reaches up into the topmost summit of her or his spirit."

This starts to make sense in terms of everything we're discussing. The degree and kind of eros will shape and determine, open to lesser or greater extents and ranges, the degree and kind of spirituality or path that a person chooses or engages in. The degree and kind of a person's eros determines the degree and kind of the path—and not only in obvious ways.

What is it, then, that might limit eros with regard to the path? If eros determines the path, and if eros itself becomes constrained, it will inevitably limit the kind of path we engage with, the very notion of what spirituality encompasses.

This investigation reveals fascinating and varied dimensions. Richard Tarnas, in his beautiful work The Passion of the Western Mind, traces the intellectual currents that have shaped Western culture. He points to a pivotal moment in England: the restoration of the monarchy in 1660. Following this restoration, prominent clergy, philosophers, and doctors began emphasizing what they called "sober natural philosophy"—a mechanistic understanding of the world as composed of inert material particles governed by fixed laws, the Cartesian worldview that emerged with the scientific revolution.

This emphasis on sobriety served a specific purpose: to undercut what Tarnas calls the "passion-inflaming enthusiasm" supported by esoteric worldviews and radical religious streams of that era. Here we see how a particular kind of logos actively undermined the eros that people could bring to their relationship with the world and their spiritual paths. The very word "enthusiasm" reveals this dynamic—entheos, the influx of the divine. What was being systematically squeezed out was juiciness, exuberance, ecstasy, breadth of emotional range, and the heat of passionate love.

We've touched on this before: how inspiration from the divine, imagination, and other ways of knowing were replaced by an epistemology that dismissed anything falling outside the narrow confines of emerging Western scientific materialism. The heat of passionate love gave way to mere warm goodwill. Philosophy and religion became sanitized, sobered.

But notice how logos and fantasy intertwine here. Alongside the conceptual framework of the scientific revolution and the so-called Enlightenment ran a powerful fantasy image of sobriety itself. This raises a crucial question: does this pattern persist today? Are juiciness, exuberance, ecstasy, breadth of affect, and passionate love still being squeezed out of certain dharma paths, creating that same sober tone, that same suspicious regard for the ecstatic, the entheos?

Consider how some process views—the atomistic, moment-by-moment analysis of vedanā, sense perception, and mental formations—mirror that mechanistic philosophy of 1660s England. This too can become a kind of mechanistic processing that systematically undercuts eros. The emphasis on cooling, on simplifying, deliberately excludes and shuts out certain dimensions of experience.

Sometimes what's worse is the subtle disempowerment of eros through apparent acceptance: "It's okay if you feel passionate, it's okay." But this differs radically from actually giving passion a meaningful place and purpose—honoring the ecstasy, the entheos, the metaphorical intoxication, the wildness, heat, and passion that comes with complexifying, with richness, with imaginal engagement.

This "everything's okay, just let it come and go" attitude can prove more destructive to the erotic, soul-making, and imaginal dimensions than outright opposition. At least clear opposition acknowledges the power of what it resists.

What's particularly striking about that historical moment in England is how political motivations shaped these limitations on both logos and eros. After the perceived chaos following the monarchy's removal and subsequent restoration, the imperative became clear: preserve order, reinstate stability, keep the lid on passion. The range of permissible logos—the scope of religious imagery and worldview—became deliberately constrained.

These limitations on eros, psyche, and logos were, in significant part, politically motivated. And this raises the essential question: was this merely a historical anomaly, or do similar dynamics continue shaping our spiritual landscapes today?

The Logos, if you like, shapes or allows a certain amount of eros—or rather, shapes and allows a certain amount of eros that determines the eros. And the eros and the soul-making shape and allow and determine the logos, as we've touched on before. But let's go into this a little more from a psychological point of view.

Again, a little bit of history. There's a stream of philosophy—modern Western philosophy—called pragmatism. Some people regard William James, the psychologist and philosopher who was active at the turn of the century from the 1800s to the 1900s, as one of the first exponents of this view. In a way, what he was saying was similar to what we're saying about ways of looking and conceptual frameworks. Rather than thinking about reality in absolute terms, he emphasized what works and what effect a certain way of looking or conceptual framework has. It's pragmatic—something to practice. If you put it into practice, into praxis, and it works for you, then it's something worth pursuing.

More recently, in the 20th century, the philosopher Richard Rorty—who died not too long ago—also labels himself or is labeled as a pragmatist philosopher. But there's a difference between Richard Rorty's version and William James' version. Writers like Jorge Ferrer and Jacob Sherman stress the difference between these different kinds of pragmatism.

I would say that Richard Rorty is what could be called a deflationary pragmatist. Although he's also saying don't get hung up on this idea about reality—that you can come to some way of determining reality or find a single right way of looking and realizing the true nature of things—and advocates moving toward this more pragmatic view of what works for different cultures, there's something in his project that seems intent on disallowing anything that involves enthusiasm, anything that involves a perception or way of looking that would open the perception to other dimensions, to religiosity and divinity.

Somehow wrapped up in what he's saying is a kind of deflation. It's almost like: there is no truth, there's nothing to really penetrate and know, human beings are very limited, we can't really know things. Just calm down and accept this fate and give up on any sense of being able to expand the perception of things in a way that brings enthusiasm. This runs through his philosophy, as far as I can tell from what I've read.

So there's a deflationary pragmatism, and one wonders: where does that come from? Why is it that some people, having grasped hold of the same idea, thrust toward deflation—a popping, a bursting of bubbles and balloons? While other people allow this expansion of the eros and the psyche, an expansion of the balloons, without falling into realism?

I think we can recognize this in different versions of the Dharma as well, in different teachings and emphases. There is a kind of deflationary explanation or take on emptiness, for example: everything's empty, nothing's really there, there's nothing mystical, it's all just interconnected phenomena, there's no ultimate basis. The whole movement sounds like a similar conceptual framework, but the thrust is to burst bubbles—just calm down, don't get too excited by mystical inspiration. It's a deflationary emptiness.

Versus—and I can't help revealing my leanings here—the realization of emptiness being something utterly mystical, utterly wondrous, profound, something to really be excited about. There's something so transcendent about the usual way of seeing, something that brings wonder and joy and dimensionality to existence, and all kinds of possibilities. Instead of closing down possibilities, it actually opens them up.

Emptiness allows a flatland, one-dimensional view, certainly. I have that view a lot of the time, or it's one I can pick up and put down. It allows that, but it also allows much more mystical conceptions and views. Whereas a deflationary take on emptiness tends to, by default, encourage this more one-dimensional view.

Sometimes that extends to the whole Dharma, so that an approach to it is essentially deflationary: simplify, calm down, just be even. Don't get too excited, don't get too depressed. There's a kind of "it's just this—this is what you have to deal with, just this." The flatlanding, reducing the dimensions, is also a kind of deflation—deflating the eros, deflating the soul-making dynamic, the way that expands and grows.

One gets deflationary psychotherapeutic theories or approaches as well: just calm down, just ground more, just rein it in, just sober up a little bit. And I wonder sometimes if there's even a kind of deflationary approach to art, to the arts or different arts.

I mentioned in an earlier talk the Scottish psychoanalyst Douglas Fairbairn, who was active in the mid-20th century. His understanding of libido—similar to what we're calling eros, though lacking the dimensionality we're exploring—centers on movement toward making connection.

In Fairbairn's view, the human psyche splits into two dynamics: a libidinal ego that thrusts toward connecting with objects—essentially with others—and an anti-libidinal ego that constellates out of fear that the object will reject us or be unavailable. This anti-libidinal ego functions as a kind of protective alter ego, dampening our enthusiasm: "Don't get too excited, don't make yourself too available, don't reach toward that too much, because you might get disappointed, they might reject you, they might not be there for you."

There's an ongoing struggle throughout life—until one becomes more conscious of it, and even then one is simply more aware of it and perhaps less controlled by it—between this libidinal thrust and the anti-libidinal restraint, between the libidinal ego and the anti-libidinal ego.

If we take Fairbairn's insight and expand his meaning of libido to encompass what we're calling eros, we might ask: how much does this limiting of eros through anti-libidinal movement stem essentially from fear of disappointment? "Don't puff things up. Don't get your hopes up. Don't make too much of things"—whether that's the path, our sense of the world or reality, or the unfabricated. There's a restraining of what we're calling eros, a limitation born from this anti-libidinal ego that wants to protect us from disappointment, or from the discomfort of allowing that much eros, that much libido to flow through our being.

How much does this anti-libidinal movement of the psyche actually end up limiting the eros and then limiting the soul-making? How much does it limit the eros-psyche-logos dynamic because we're pulling back the eros, not allowing it because of fear, protection, discomfort, or some other defensive reason? And then we choose something that's more of the deflationary philosophy—the deflationary version of the dharma or emptiness, deflationary psychology or whatever it is. How much of this choice actually comes from what Fairbairn would call the anti-libidinal movement?

Let's explore this further in terms of eros and how it chooses, creates, or finds a path—which path, what kind of path it will choose, find, or create.

We've established that eros needs a perception of otherness. Eros requires this other, this erotic object that is other than itself. It's not just collapse into union, into oneness. Eros needs a perception of otherness, and something in that other needs to have something more or beyond in it. There needs to be a fascination with the other—this is necessary to eros. Part of this fascination is that there's more there in this other, in this otherness, that I don't quite know yet, that I'm not quite in contact with. I can maybe intuit it, or I've been told about it, or I kind of half-perceive it, but eros needs this perception of otherness and, within that otherness, this sense of more and beyond.

What this means in relation to eros for the path is profound. In order to have eros for the path—to be deeply, fully in love with the path and with where it's heading, with awakening—I need to have a vision, a sense, a logos or image of the path and of awakening that has some otherness to it. There has to be something other to know. Just as with another being—a person or thing—the path itself has to have some dimension of otherness, some sense of more, of beyond that I want to know.

For eros to really impregnate the path, to have a truly erotic connection with the path and with awakening—when people are deeply, fully in love with the path and with that movement toward awakening, however they conceive it—something has to constellate. The vision, the sense, the logos and image of the path and awakening has to have some otherness to it, something other that I don't already know.

If my sense of the path and awakening is just about reducing my suffering—if that's my vision and logos, my conception of what the path is—that doesn't allow eros. It doesn't allow enough eros. It's just about reducing my suffering. I can't really fall in love with such a path. It might be very useful to me. I might engage in it, might even be fairly disciplined in my engagement with practice to reduce my suffering. But if that's the only thing in it for me, if that's how I'm seeing and sensing and conceiving of the path, eros cannot really establish in relation to such a vision. I can't really fall in love with that kind of path.

Some secular visions or conceptions of awakening, some visions of where one is headed in secular versions of mindfulness, some secular approaches to how mindfulness is taught and characterized...

Their conceptual frameworks and visions of awakening are characterized by an absence of there being much else to discover or perceive than what is already obviously true, apparently obviously true, or apparent—more than we already know. They're actually characterized by the absence of much beyond to discover or to perceive. The vision of awakening isn't really that there is much more beyond what we already sense and perceive to know.

It may be I learn or discover not to believe thoughts of how I am, or how she is, or he is, or how terrible this situation is, or how wonderful this situation is. And again there's this sort of even keel—go for the equanimity. Don't get too seduced by something seeming wonderful, don't get too taken in by something seeming terrible. So there's an acknowledgment of that, but basically, this that I currently perceive is, for the most part, taken as reality. For the most part. And the vision, the concept of practice or path or awakening is really just a disentangling of my relationship with that reality.

There's not much more to perceive. I'm just changing my relationship by more letting go, by just not being so entangled with that reality. But the reality is pretty much the reality, except for the kind of crazy bunch of things I get into about believing this person's like that, or this situation is absolutely awful, or whatever it is. There is not, then, in such a conception, such a vision of awakening, very much more at all to open the perception to or to discover. Maybe a little bit—oh, there's not really a self, there's just a process, so that's a little bit more. But there's not really that much erotic connection one can have with that idea, or soul-making connection. Again, it's in itself quite a deflationary idea.

Compare that conception or vision of awakening with a path that says something like: awakening means to discover your true nature. Or awakening involves the realization of the thorough and deep emptiness of all things. Or awakening involves an opening to the unfabricated. Or awakening involves a union with the divine, or a becoming divine. In any such conceptions and visions of awakening, the otherness there, the beyond what I already know, what I've already tasted, that is in the vision, in the conception of awakening, and therefore of the path, is much, much larger.

There's more otherness there, and therefore more eros. You understand? More eros, more otherness—because there's more otherness, more beyond, there's more eros can get constellated there, and more soul-making. Very different logoi and fantasies of awakening allow, if you like, and constellate different erotic relations with the path, degrees of eros with the path itself and with practice.

But then even within the limits of what we might call secular religions—why I'm using that phrase is, you know, the religion in the sense of just an insistence, a kind of dogmatic insistence that there is just this, there is just this one dimension. And that dogma, that insistence makes it a kind of religion, but a secular religion, if you like. But even within limits of secular religions, and there might be different versions of that, there's still going to be—and this is where it's interesting—eros is in us as human beings, so there's still going to be a relationship with some kind of otherness that is constellated by the eros.

In other words, the eros in the being will constellate a relationship with some kind of otherness, even within the limits of a secular religious view and vision of the path and awakening. And that relationship with whatever the otherness is that it constellates will be erotic to some extent. In other words, from our definition, there will be a wanting of more contact, of more intimacy, of the aliveness of that contact and intimacy with whatever this kind of other is.

So then you get presentations of awakening or visions of awakening, concepts of awakening that have to do exactly with awakening being an intimacy with life, for example. And again, what's life there? Well, it's—good question—it's senses or whatever, or a flowing with life. In other words, again, here, it's not just a reduction of suffering. The eros has come in, created a kind of otherness, but in this case, the otherness is with what? It's with that one dimensionality. And it's trying to make more of that otherness.

So life becomes an erotic object. Life with a capital L. Intimacy with life. It becomes the erotic object. And there's a kind of romantic, if you like, quasi—I'm using that in a loose sense—the romance of life and the intimacy of life and being with life and flowing with life or whatever. And the touch of life. Life becomes the erotic object. There's a kind of romantic relationship with an elevation of the importance of life, give it a capital L, and an elevation also in the importance of this intimacy with it and the touching life. And there's this desire for the contact, the intimacy, the touch of life.

So eros is finding some otherness there, and this otherness is life, if you like, and it does what it does. It pumps it up, it gives it importance, it gives it a kind of romance in the relationship with it, and there's the desire for the intimacy. But there, the eros is limited into how much it can actually expand the notion of life, if the logos is absolutely rigid.

So, even then, that kind of erotic relationship with life and intimacy with life and that vision of awakening will only allow a limited eros, a limited falling in love with the path and a limited involvement of the whole being with the practice, with the path, with that movement towards awakening. There's still eros trying to do its thing, constellating another, creating a kind of romantic relationship with that other, trying to fill it out, elevating its importance, desiring more contact. But actually it's limited.

Now, if we take Nietzsche's quote again, he may say—and he doesn't pull any punches, Nietzsche—so he may say, well, many on that kind of path, that kind of secular religious path, he might say, well, they just don't have much eros, and they don't have much psyche, and that's why they're okay with that. We might more fairly say, I think, or more generously say, if a person has limited eros psyche, limited libido—and remember, that might just be, you know, people are different.

People are different. If a person has limited libido, limited eros, and a certain circumscribed psyche, then that conceptual framework with its limited otherness—an otherness which cannot expand or become multidimensional because that's refused—might be enough for their souls. There's already a limited amount of eros-psyche-logos fertilization and expansion anyway, so a limited vision and idea of path and awakening comes out of that limited eros-psyche-logos dynamic. This limited vision, this constrained conceptual frame, this bounded image and fantasy of the path and of awakening might be sufficient for some people.

The opposite is equally true. A limited conceptual frame, a restricted logos and circumscribed image of the path and awakening will also limit the eros for the path and awakening—the eros that we can genuinely feel and embody in relationship to the path and the movement toward awakening. The question is: where are those limits coming from? How is it that the eros or the psyche or the logos gets constrained in these ways? Some people encounter limits, but the crucial inquiry is: where does that limitation originate?

If there's a genuine limit on the libido, on the eros, on the psyche, then it might be enough. A constrained conception of what the path is and what awakening is—a vision that doesn't extend much beyond what we already sense and know—may be sufficient for that soul. It depends where the limits are coming from.

Someone with much more libido, much more eros, will need something quite different. If they begin to have an erotic connection with the path and with the whole movement toward awakening and that vision, they will need a bigger vision, a more expansive idea of what the path is and involves, what awakening is and demands and involves and opens to. They need more otherness. They need more beyond. Why? Because the eros needs it and will create it. It will discover it, find it.

People with abundant eros need a greater, wider path, a deeper path. They need more to discover, more to move into. They need a beyond—a more beyond. This "more" that they want and discover because of the eros and because of the expansion of vision that they create and discover will include, at some point, some kind of sense of dimensionality and divinity. In other words, divinity gets somehow included on the path.

If they start with just a flat-line view, dimensionality will be added to that. Eventually transcendence will be added to that. Or if they're oriented only toward the transcendent, eventually the path, the vision, the concept of the path will have to fill out to include the immanent as well. It can't just be about the unfabricated. Why? Because the eros is pushing, penetrating, opening, expanding, and in its relationship to the erotic object of the path and awakening, it opens and expands the sense of the path and awakening—what the dharma is.

So it can't be just transcendent. It can't be just this world. It will be both, eventually, gradually. If there is no sense of the divine, a sense of the divine will come. If the sense of the divine is only in the direction of an impersonal divinity, then it will add the personal. If it's only personal, it will add the impersonal.

There's this movement toward discovering more and more, actually including and embracing more and more in the path—gradually, gradually. Gradually more and more depth, more and more range, more and more fullness, multidimensionality, more and more richness, more and more complexity. More to the path, more to the sense of what awakening is and can be. All of this comes from the eros, predominantly from the eros-psyche-logos dynamic.

People with abundant eros will, if they're not blocked, tend to keep opening in these different directions gradually over time—not smoothly necessarily, but persistently. A vision, a sense, a concept of the path and awakening which doesn't ask for any more, or much more, to be perceived or discovered of reality or true nature than is already apparent to normal, popular, consensually agreed perception—such a logos and vision of the path and awakening will limit the soul-making dynamic, the eros-psyche-logos, and the eros in all kinds of ways. This includes limitations in relation to what we conceive of and our image of the path and of awakening.

If a person's eros is strong enough, though, it will expand that image, that fantasy, that concept of what the path is and of what awakening is. Or it will actually shatter it—shatter whatever the current image, fantasy, and logos is—and create or discover or find a larger view, a larger concept, a larger conceptual framework, a broader, richer, deeper, more far-reaching image and fantasy of path and awakening.

If this logos of nothing more to discover—which is usually implicit, by the way, sometimes explicit, but often implicit, not actually voiced yet present nonetheless—if this logos is too rigidly held, stuck in place, or not questioned sufficiently, then the eros and the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic cannot expand. It cannot flower. The soul-making movement is thwarted. It lacks the necessary food or sustenance, the necessary soil or basis. It doesn't have this beyond to nourish it, to move into, to open toward.

And the basis we're speaking of, remember, is a basis of groundlessness—groundlessness because of the teachings of emptiness and because of seeing image as image. It's precisely this groundlessness that allows the expansion, the deepening, the enrichment, the creation and discovery of more of the object—in this case the path, but whatever else we're engaging with as well: the world, the beloved other, whatever.

The eros can be blocked, and it can be blocked by this kind of anti-libidinal movement of fear, if you like, or self-protectionism or something of that nature. It appears as self-protectionism. But also the image, the fantasy can be blocked, or the logos can be blocked. So it can block from any direction, and can be blocked in any way.

We've been talking about limited paths and what I was calling secular-religious and one-dimensional views, but it can also be blocked with a transcendent view—just blocking it into that direction, for example. So the blocks can work from any direction and in any direction.

We'll continue with this exploration and delve deeper into these movements.

CHAPTER 76

'The Holy Life' (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 1h19

> In this profound exploration of dharma practice, Rob Burbea examines four fundamental approaches to the spiritual path: the medical model (focused on reducing dukkha), the scientific model (research into consciousness), the religious model (replicating the Buddha's awakening), and the artistic model (open-ended creativity and originality). He investigates how our unconscious fantasies and images of the path, awakening, and ourselves as practitioners profoundly shape what becomes possible in our practice.
> Burbea argues that when our vision of the path lacks authenticity to our soul's needs, practice becomes dry and stagnant, often leading to ego-driven self-measurement rather than genuine soul-making. Drawing on the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, he suggests that the soul requires beauty, mystery, dimensionality, and a sense of infinities to expand into. The talk explores how rigid adherence to limited concepts of awakening can block the natural movement between transcendent realization and immanent engagement with the world.
> This teaching offers a radical reconceptualization of awakening as an open-ended, infinite process rather than a fixed attainment. Burbea suggests that our very ways of imagining the path are themselves part of what awakening means, calling for a transformation of idols into icons - converting fixed, limited concepts into portals of infinite depth and possibility.

We're looking into the whole area of Eros for the path, Eros on the path, and Eros for awakening—and how that ties in to, or what are the implications there, how it's connected to what's then allowed or supported in terms of Eros with regard to the world, to the senses, to sense experience, to what we might call life.

When we come to talk about Eros, we must be talking about soul-making. That involves images and ideas. So the ideas, the vision, the concept, the fantasies and images of path are involved in this. We're looking at that, wanting to open that investigation up a little bit. Implicit in that will be ideas and images, fantasies about awakening, of course, since path leads to awakening or in that direction. And implicit in that is again ideas and, if you like, a range—what range of images in relation to the world, the senses and life. Those three, we said, are connected.

Let's go a little bit more into this, specifically with regard to eros for the path, an erotic relationship with the path, with the path of practice, with that movement towards awakening. Most people, if you ask them, who've been practicing a few decades, will say, "Oh yes, I'm still very passionate," and so on. But when we say eros, we're talking about fire—fire on the path, fire for the path, fire for awakening.

So there, in comparing how that fire is now, how that eros is now in one's practice compared with ten years ago, twenty years ago, thirty years ago—is it honestly still the same intensity, depth, beauty? Are we still opening? There's still the penetration, still the inquiry, the heat of that, the flame of that, the passion. And that includes, sometimes, the hassle of that. Fire can be aggravating. There's this possibility of the breaking of the vessels, the shattering of what we once knew and how we once oriented, and the radicality that's involved with questioning and opening at a very deep level in terms of what's fundamental.

It's interesting for some of you who have been practicing many, many years to just really ask yourself about how the Eros is now compared to twenty or thirty years ago. This is what right now I'm interested in: Eros on the path, Eros for the path, and how that involves logos and psyche and sense of ideas and concepts and images and fancies of path, of awakening, of world, senses, life.

If the Four Noble Truths are central to our sort of conception of the Dharma—and for most insight meditation practitioners we'd place that there, even whether they were conscious of it or not—that means that we're approaching the path, we're approaching practice and approaching the movement towards awakening or what awakening is, with a vision and a concept that has to do with ending or at least reducing suffering. Because that's what the Four Noble Truths are referring to: there is suffering, there's a cause for suffering, there is the possibility of ending suffering, and there's a way to that. So the whole of practice really is oriented towards lessening suffering. Freedom, meaning freedom from suffering.

Even if we put aside for now what those words mean—suffering and freedom and all that—we can say that this is a very common approach. Let's call it for now the medical model: the approach to practice and to the path that centralizes the reduction of suffering. The Four Noble Truths actually are, in fact, modelled on the Buddha's—in the Buddha's time, the Buddha modelled his Four Noble Truths on a physician's sort of way of stating diagnosis, prognosis, cure, the Four Noble Truths. So we call that the medical model in that it's trying to alleviate suffering. It's centralizing the alleviation of suffering.

Notice that this approach, what we call the medical model, can certainly, it's very happy to use so-called scientific data to shore up its claims and to perhaps give faith. So if a neuroscientist does CT scans of brains of long-term meditators or people in meditation versus non-meditators and finds that a certain membrane is thickened, which is associated with happiness, or certain secretions increase or decrease in the neurochemistry, then this adds sort of conviction to that medical model. We do measurements, questionnaires of well-being and that sort of thing, and we ascertain that yes, medically this is working—meditation is good for you, it increases well-being, really good for depression, and so on.

That's different from a second kind of fantasy of the path and of practice, which I might call scientistic, by which I mean that the practitioner, the individual practitioner, is actually motivated primarily by a sort of interest in consciousness or an interest in experience. And so sees themselves, has a kind of fantasy of themselves as a kind of researcher: "I'm a researcher into consciousness. I'm a researcher into experience and the range of experience and what's involved there."

Of course, I'm going to give four sort of generic models, and of course they can overlap, and it's really a matter of emphasis. But you can see that the medical model is different than what I'm calling the science fantasy, the researcher fantasy.

And then a third model might be what we might call the religious fantasy, in which what practice is and what the path is and what the movement towards awakening is essentially a replication—it's an attempt to replicate the experiences, insights, awakening, path and practice of the sages of the past, and perhaps the present. To replicate the Buddha's awakening, the Buddha's enlightenment to the best of one's ability. To discover, if you like, or rediscover their truth, the truth that they discovered, the truth that the Buddha discovered.

So it has this replicative kind of agenda to it, replicative fantasy, wrapped up completely, of course, with the fantasy of the Buddha, fantasy of the past, fantasy of the tradition. It's religious in that sense that it's tied to the past and puts the authority in the past, in the text. People say, "Well, the Pali Canon," or some other text, or whatever it is. The authority is in the past, which is very typical of the religious fantasy. Someone might even do that when they consider themselves a secularist.

There's still something religious about doing that.

That's a third model. And a fourth model might be what we might call the artistic. So this is, you know, if you think about an artist, someone who's really deeply involved in their art, that has a kind of open-endedness to it, to my mind, to my sense of that fantasy. It may involve the replication of the works of past masters and imitating them to learn how they did things and kind of, if you like, absorb and digest their styles, their artistry, their conceptions. And certainly that's part of developing as a deep artist and a powerful artist.

But it also goes beyond the merely replicative into the support for and the interest in new directions, originality, whether that's in terms of practice and path, whether that's new and original kinds of practices or kinds of concepts, etc. So again, all this is a matter of emphasis, but I mean much more by the newness and originality of practices and concepts—of what the path is and where it can go and how it can open and what its range is, etc.—I mean much more, for instance, than just teaching mindfulness to some new demographic, whether it's people in prison or people with a certain mental health issue or this or that, all of which is really, really valuable and really important, but it's really just extending the reach of the medical model, if you like. I'm talking about really, in the artistic fantasy, I'm talking really about the way art breaks and goes in very new conceptions and directions of what it's even trying to do.

So four kinds of fantasy there, which is really a matter of emphasis. But you'll notice, for instance, in the last one, actually in a lot of them to different degrees, but certainly the last one, the artistic one, that dedication and even obsession may be completely okay. Whereas from another perspective, we would say someone's completely obsessed with whatever they're trying to do, or with practice, or they are developing, and that kind of interest. So, well, maybe they're a bit out of balance, or this or that. But certain of these models, for instance, the religious one or the artistic one, actually allow a kind of obsession. It's different than, let's say, the medical model, where there can be a kind of like, let's find an easy medication for everyone. And if we find that easy medication for everyone, that's a really, you know, that's a goal that one might be interested in developing the medical model.

But really what I'm talking about here is how one sees one's individual practice. So whether one is regarding it as a kind of medicine, reduction of suffering, whether one's fantasizing oneself as a kind of researcher or in the stream of the tradition, religiously replicating the past or as an artist with that possibility of open-endedness. You never reach the end of the path with the, either with the scientific or the, well, actually, scientism might say you reach the end in terms of you know everything now. Some scientists have that fantasy. But certainly with the artistic, unlike the religious or the medical, there's no end there. It's open-ended. And although there can be an interest in replication, there's also this interest in the possibility of new directions, new conceptions, very different movements and ranges there.

Most people, in regard to their practice, seem to have a mix of the first and the third, the medical model and the religious model. So in other words, one really thinks in terms of reducing suffering, freedom from suffering, that's the language, that's the intention, that's what makes sense, and that's what's talked about and kind of taken in. And at the same time, we're in the stream of the Buddha, and kind of replicating, discovering for ourselves a truth that they discovered, and the authority is in the text there, as well as it is in the scientific data that support the medical model.

The other two, the researcher fantasy and the artistic fantasy, need, can you hear, they need quite a lot of confidence. It takes quite a lot of boldness and balls even, to kind of even see oneself or fantasize oneself that way. And quite a sense of independence. So this to me is very interesting and has all kinds of implications, makes a huge difference for how our practice unfolds, how much eros is allowed in relation to the path, and what possibilities open up for our path, and the directions and the ranges, etc., that can be made available to us. So a lot depends on the fantasies operating.

But where there is devotion and deep love for the path, a lot of you listening to this will be devoted and have a deep love for the path. There is always some conception and some fantasy or image of the path of awakening, and of the self on the path. Always where there's devotedness and deep love, there is always some conception, some fantasy or image of the path of awakening and of the self on the path.

And the fantasies and images we have, or each practitioner has, or are operating for a practitioner, the fantasies and images, they need to be authentic to that practitioner, for that practitioner. If they're not authentic, they won't be fertile. There'll be a dryness and a certain amount of fertility, but actually a kind of a level of barrenness in what the path can be.

So, for example, if the ideas and the images of path and of awakening are just kind of inheritances from the subcultures that we move in, and maybe from books and talks, kind of indoctrinations, if you like, on whose rungs of measurement and attainment the ego fastens itself. Somehow I've just absorbed this way of thinking about the path, and there's some kind of sense of attaining or measuring or where am I at in this conception, this vision of the path. And if it's not authentic, what happens is what gets hold of it is the soul doesn't get hold of it so much as the ego gets hold of it in its habit of self-measurement. Here it's got something called awakening, something called reaching this insight and that jhāna or being such and such mindful for so much of the time or whatever it is. And what's got hold of it is just the ego with its propensity, its addiction to measuring, measuring things and measuring itself.

And the soul has not got, it's not really the fertile soil for the soul. And this ego measurement actually, and the lack of soul soil there, will smother and kill the soul-making that, if you like, we need, the path needs, the soul needs the whole path to have.

Whether it's mindfulness or insight into emptiness that is regarded as the essential aim of the path—whatever is considered the ultimate goal—if it's not authentic to me, if the vision I carry is not truly mine, then sooner or later a frustrating stagnation will set in. A person begins to wonder, "When am I going to get it together?" or feels, "Maybe I'm just not good enough, maybe I just can't hack this."

Then what often happens is either they tolerate those thoughts and feelings—sometimes for decades—or they become drawn to teachings that say, "Don't try, don't do, there's nothing to do, there's nowhere to go." This becomes the only apparent option between frustrating stagnation and the painful cycle of trying harder, contracting, and giving up again while feeling like a failure.

But is that really the only option? Or is it, once again, a question of soul-making?

I wonder if our vision of the path might be primarily characterized by open-endedness rather than attainment. What if the path is fundamentally open-ended? Consider the path of the imaginal that we've been developing over these past years—to me, this path is inherently open-ended. When will I reach the end of the path of the imaginal? Never, in the conventional sense.

At first, yes, there may be confusion: "What are they talking about? What does this mean? Is this an image or not?" Initially there might be some frustration, some self-judgment. But once one grasps the basic concepts and modes of practice and experience, it becomes open-ended—an unfolding of richer and richer, increasingly diverse ranges and depths of experience.

If the path is characterized primarily by open-endedness rather than attainment, is that familiar kind of frustration and self-judgment even possible? The frustration that comes with thoughts like "I am awakened, I'm not awakened, so-and-so is awakened but I'm not"—can this arise when the path is understood as fundamentally open?

The fantasies, images, and views we hold of the path's goals and aspirations need to be beautiful for us. They need to be beautiful. But if we take them too literally, or if the image of the self becomes too bound within them, they will be neither beautiful, nor fertile, nor freeing. Can we enter into the poetry of the image? This poetic sense, this poetic understanding—the language, texture, and relationship implicit in the imaginal?

But woven into this need for beauty is a crucial question: What do you deeply want? What do you deeply want? Is it a reduction in suffering? The end of suffering? So-called freedom—if we just leave those words for now?

If it is freedom from suffering that you most deeply want when you really look and open yourself to that question, let me ask another: What kind of freedom? What kind of freedom, and in what domains? There are many kinds of freedom, many domains of freedom.

What do you deeply want? Perhaps a more essential question is: What does your soul need right now? What does my soul, what does your soul need right now?

Can we, in asking these questions, release the assumption that we are most fundamentally concerned with freedom, with liberation, with ending or decreasing suffering? We assume this so easily, and then all the language, all the discourse, all the movement and explanation and thinking about the path becomes wrapped up in this framework.

It may well be that ending or reducing suffering is actually the most important thing for you. There are certainly times when that will be crucial. But what if we allow a little more space into this entrenched and pervasive way of thinking about path and practice?

Most Dharma teachings and most other spiritualities cast their paths and make their appeals in that direction—freedom from suffering—with the assumption that this is what we most fundamentally, most deeply want. But it seems to me, listening to people, watching people, reflecting on my own experience, that it's not always liberative efficacy that moves us most deeply. Not always the utilitarian question of how well this path or practice actually liberates me from suffering that attracts us most profoundly.

And who is to say it should be? Why should it be?

On whose authority? On what authority?

Someone was telling me about a sangha in another country where they have different teachers come for retreats, and they were debating whether certain teachers should come. Someone was advocating for two or three teachers to come who would teach together—they taught a kind of what we might call neo-Advaita style. The message they reported was that these teachers came into the retreat and sort of said to the group: "You know, we've all tried technique. You've all tried technique, and you've all tried striving, and we have all, all of us in this room—we and you—all of us have found that technique and striving doesn't work. Now, we are going to open you to the highest teaching. This is the teaching of no effort, no technique."

And so there's this argument that ensues very easily then: Is what they're saying actually liberating? And is it true that the people who teach technique and some degree of striving are actually teaching something that's less liberating or not liberating? And so the argument kind of locks horns on that level, deciding who should come to teach and whether it's okay for them to say that, etc.

But to me, there's a whole other level to engage that kind of claim, or any kind of claim, about any kind of path, which is: maybe this path that you're painting, whoever it is—could be these people or some other people—maybe this path is boring to me. It just bores me. It's not about whether it frees or not, or this or that, or works, or even whether the Pali Canon says this or that text says that. Actually, it's boring. What does that mean? It means it's not interesting enough for my soul. It's not sexy enough—and I don't mean sexual enough. It's not captivating. It's not full and juicy enough and doesn't have a wide enough range for my soul. It's boring.

And we'll think, well, what kind of argument is that? But actually, in terms of soul-making, it's very relevant. Instead of getting into this argument that's confined and constrained along certain lines of what is it that frees and does it work or doesn't it work to bring freedom, etc., etc.—sure, that's a part of what's important, but there's a whole other thing which is just to do with what is boring or interesting or fertilizing for my soul or your soul right now.

Sometimes people say, you know, nowadays we say we need a Buddhism for our times. We need a Buddhism for our times. We have to rethink Buddhism for our times. And I would say, you know, I don't care about my times. I care about my soul and a path that allows and supports this soul-making dynamic, which means the eros, the psyche, the logos, the whole engagement of all that.

For instance, that neo-Advaita path that's so attractive and so popular to so many people seems to be—or the kind of, yeah, if it's a secularist path—it's not about what's more authentic or what the texts say or this or that. It's about what's going on there. I've talked about this before in terms of soul-making. It's actually what engages my, or your eros, my intellect, the soul of my intellect, my imagination, the whole imaginal dimensions of my being, my creativity, the range and diversity of my longing and my devotion, my heart in its depth, the subtlety of my attention, my particularities.

I don't care if that fits modern times or if it's archaic or if it belongs to something in the future that modernism hasn't yet caught up with. All of that's kind of—who cares? What the soul cares about is what's fertile ground for the soul.

Something has to be, in my vision, in my sense, concept, fantasy of path and awakening—something there has to be fertile enough, provide fertile enough ground to birth, to galvanize and to support all this in me. The eros, the intellect, the imaginal, the creativity, the devotion, the longing in all its range and diversity, the heart's depths and subtleties, the subtlety of attention and sensitivity, all of that, and all my particularities. And to galvanize and support and give birth to and suggest a whole wide range of practices—because practicing in different ways and different directions is beautiful, is creative, is part of the love of practice. And again, to birth and support and open up all kinds of insights, all kinds of experiences and perceptions and openings, widenings of perceptions and all kinds of creative endeavors and arts, etc.

What the soul needs is something that's fertile and commensurate with where the soul is at. That may be bigger than the question of liberative efficacy in terms of reducing suffering. Of course, there's another kind of liberation there. Can you hear that as well? There's a liberation of the intellect, there's a liberation of the eros, there's a liberation of the imaginal, there's a liberation of the creativity, there's a liberation of the longing, all that.

Yet the point is the conversation gets constrained because we tend to keep thinking in certain ways and imagining in certain ways, and it's too small for the soul. Or at least it's too small for the soul at a certain point—it will be too small for the soul. And for many people, it will already be too small for the soul. We don't realize what's going on, and why are we feeling constrained here? Why do we keep going back into the same way of thinking?

So we need something, each soul needs something authentic to that soul, for that soul. But because of the soul-making dynamic and what we talked about—this expansion, deepening, widening—complicating that happens with the eros psychologos, interaction, mutual insemination.

Even if a vision, a fantasy, a concept of the path and of awakening is authentic for a while, because of the soul-making dynamic and the expansion of eros psychologos, at some point we may well outgrow that vision, that concept, that fantasy. So this is quite common, it happens in all kinds of ways. Something is pushing against the walls and the edges of what the vision, fantasy, logos is of the path and of awakening.

For example, I know a young man who for many years had really quite a fairly strong eros with regard to the path. But the conception, the vision, and the fantasy of the path only really allowed that eros to flow in the direction of a certain image of a kind of monk. He was actually living as a layperson, but living in a very simple way. I think he didn't even have a bank account. He was doing service work and living in a retreat center. But there was this ethos and this mythos of the sort of free-flowing monk. That was the fantasy image.

So within that, the ideals and images of letting go, let everything come, let it go, easygoingness, fluidity, non-preference, whatever life gave him—that's what he would just go with. He wouldn't intrude into that process with his preferences and insist on this or that. The whole thing had a lot of spaciousness, so very beautiful, very potent, with a lot of freedom, a lot of ease, a lot of simplicity. There was this eros to know the transcendent, to know the unfabricated, but it wasn't so much dominated—it wasn't that that dominated his relationship with the experiences of life. So that was there, but not at the expense of a relationship with what was around him. But that relationship had some fantasy of easygoingness, fluidity, spaciousness, non-preferences. So very potent, very lovely, very freeing, very spacious.

But at some point, there arose an overwhelming attraction, almost to the point of a kind of imprisonment of the psyche, to someone, a woman, whose soulfulness extended and was more obvious in relationship to the world and the things of the world. Her soulfulness involved a much more involved relationship with things. Much more, instead of the simplicity of one fantasy image—and not even seeing it as an image. That was the thing. He was in this image. It was very helpful, as I said—freeing, spacious, peaceful—but he didn't realize that it was in fact a soul image that he was caught in the mythos of, caught in the fantasy.

She, on the other hand, had all kinds of images about self, about nature, about relationship, all kinds of things—complex, an enchantment of the things of the world that his fantasy didn't allow because it was a lot about letting things go and everything's just the same: good, bad, beautiful, ugly. It's all just beautiful, just one. There were fewer erotic objects in his world. In the space of that kind of fantasy, in that kind of logos, the world was not full of erotic objects. The world was just all a kind of ground for letting go.

James Hillman, I've mentioned this before, makes the distinction between what he calls spirit and soul. Spirit is this movement towards spaciousness, transcendence, letting go, disentangling. And soul, in his language, has more this quality of entanglement, complication. So spirit is the hermit on the mountaintop in the clean, clear, crisp air with long views. And the soul is more in the valley, in the undergrowth, in the complication, in the messiness of relationships and images and all that.

I'm less keen on that division and would prefer to just talk about these as both soul directions—both the attitude of letting go and that monk image and the spaciousness and the sense of oneness as a movement of soul, one movement of soul, and other kinds of movements of soul as well.

But here was this someone caught in this fantasy of the monk and the spaciousness, the fluidity, the non-preference, the easygoingness. And he was then overwhelmingly hooked, almost to the point of a kind of imprisonment, I think he would have said, by an attraction to this woman who embodied and expressed and represented a much wider and richer kind of soulfulness, psyche.

It wasn't just that in his monastic endeavor he wanted sex. It wasn't just that he was dealing with "ah, yes, the sexual drive will get them in the end. That's the one that's really hard to overcome." It wasn't just that he was lonely and wanted romance. That wasn't really what was going on, I don't think, or that's one way of understanding it.

He could let go of everything else to quite a remarkable degree, and people were very impressed by his ability to let go, almost in relation to everything, but not in relation to this woman, not in relation to wanting her. It's one thing, this one thing. He can let go of everything, but what's going on here?

Could it be that what was happening was there was an unconscious attraction to psyche, to soul-making? You know, in the myth, Eros and Psyche are lovers. Eros wants Psyche.

We don't need to inquire into his relationship with his mother and locate the cause in the past. There's something present in the natural wish of the soul for expansion—the eros-psyche-logos dynamic moving in all directions. Something, a rigidity of fantasy that isn't realized, hasn't been seen, image as image, hasn't been recognized there, prevents this expansion. And so it knocks and insists. Eventually it will, or possibly it will cause an expansion or a rupture.

However—which I think is actually what happened after we talked—he develops and allows his actions, the sensibilities and the dynamism of soul-making in his life more widely. He starts opening and tuning to and allowing and supporting and investing in and exploring soul-making in his life more widely. That means in relation to everything—what's around him, money, body, relationships, whatever, everything, nature.

Then actually what can happen, what did happen, is he was no longer so imprisoned in his desire for this woman. There might still be attraction, of course, but in a way, what was, if you like, most deeply wanted there was soul. Soulfulness and soul-making wasn't being allowed. Something in him wanted it to go in these other directions. But now, actually, with a little time, actually the soul-making can be everywhere. It permeates life. And then it's not solely and inexplicably in her. She becomes inexplicably this attractive object that he couldn't let go of, his desire there.

The question is: what allows and supports the fantasy-image-logos of practice to be soul-making? What kinds of images or what actually would support the discovery or the shaping of fantasy images, logos, of practice, so that they can be soul-making? What allows the infusion or pervasion of whatever soul-making fantasy and image works for us? What allows that to pervade and infuse the whole of the path for us, the whole of that movement and that engagement?

In a previous talk—I can't remember when it was on this retreat—I gave the example of someone for whom there is no real image in the meditation, there's no eros really alive, no aliveness, no arousal of the imaginal with respect to meditation practice. Very easily there's not this fantasy of the nobility of struggle and putting up with what's difficult. And very easily they just stop meditating or give up—peers go and they don't practice. It's not alive with fantasy, with the range of fantasy that's needed.

One response—a very common response—is: you need to make more effort. If you want to suffer less, you need to make more effort. So this person is suffering, and yet they can't seem to really get a relationship with meditation that really works. Someone might say it's a matter of you just need to try more, stick it out when it's tough, if you want to suffer less.

Is it that, or is it, as we suggested the other day, actually what needs to happen there—there needs to be a widening of the image and of the fantasy of meditation itself, in meditation, of meditation. So we have to approach the whole thing, perhaps, in quite a different way, in a soul-making way. Not so much: what's the easiest? So, oh, this is too hard, the meditation, I'll just go and have some cookies or have a little rest or be cozy or whatever. Not so much that—what's easiest? Not so much get it together, try harder, but rather the question: what is soul-making? Where is the sense of soulfulness for me right now? Is there a way of visioning this, imagining this, finding a fantasy and a logos that actually the practice itself becomes soul-making and soulful, even if it's difficult?

So when I use the word authentic and say it has to be authentic for a practitioner, it means authentic for the soul-making right now of my soul. For my soul-making right now, for your soul-making right now—that's what I mean by authentic.

When there is deep love for the path, when there is eros for the path, that includes and implies—involved in that is a love for soul-making in regard to the path. What we love is the soul-making. We love the soul-making that is involved in the walking of the path. It's not just that it releases us from suffering. We feel a bit better and there's less suffering. That's all good and important. For some people, that's all their meditation is or their mindfulness exercise or whatever it is. But when there's really eros there, when we love it, we love the soul-making that is involved in the path.

That means we love the image. We love the images that are involved in the path. We love the ideas. The ideas themselves are beautiful and attractive to us, interesting to us. We love the eros. We love the actual sense of eros there. We love the expansion of the psyche-logos and eros.

And, as I said, the image of the self on the path. Wrapped up in all of that love of soul-making is a love of beauty. Beauty is always a part of soul-making. So part of what we love, when we love a path, when there's eros for the path and for the practice, we love—there's some love of beauty there. It's not just a purely functional kind of utilitarian exercise in reducing suffering and providing a bit more ease. Something in us finds beauty there, and that's part of soul-making always.

Beauty implies that what is beautiful to us, we draw close to. We want intimacy with—there's the eros. We want connection with. And we love the intimacy and connection. You can see how all this starts feeding on itself, fertilizing itself.

We love sensitivity. When you speak to someone who's really gotten into insight meditation, part of what they love is the sensitivity. Yes, the opening of the heart and all that, but part of what people love is the sensitivity that comes with it, that it develops. So we love the tuning, the sensitizing, the differentiations and nuances that go with rich practice. This is part of the eros of the path. Where there's beauty, there's sensitivity when it's soul-making. Beauty is part of the soul-making.

As I've said in the past, the soul needs some sense of beyondness—some sense of beyond that it can intuit or feel or dimly perceive or sense or that it's heard about—beyond what it already knows and what it already experiences. In order for there to be eros and soul-making, there needs to be some kind of sense of beyond. Perhaps, hopefully, a kind of infinities experience into which to expand, infinities to expand into. The soul needs that to stimulate the eros there.

The soul needs beauty, mystery, dimensionality, sense of sacredness and divinity, needs eros, needs the expansion of the logos, the enrichment of the ideas, needs fantasy and the imaginal, as we've said, needs a sense of meaningfulness and embodiment. So all these things—beauty, mystery, dimensionality, sacredness, divinity, eros, expansion of the logos, fantasy and image, meaningfulness, embodiment, the sense of infinities to expand into—this is needed. This is what the soul needs. This is part of the beyondness that the soul needs. There's more there of these things, of these qualities, if you like, these perceptions.

All these, you'll notice, are kind of implicit and organically and obviously involved when we're talking about practice with images and imaginal perceptions and theophanies and cosmopoiesis. There is the beauty, naturally, to that. There is the mystery, the dimensionality, the sacredness, divinity, the eros, the expansion of the logos that comes with that, the image, naturally, the meaningfulness, somehow the embodiment. There's a sense of the infinity of dimensionality to expand into, always, when we're talking about practicing with images, with theophanies, with cosmopoiesis.

When the practice and the eros is in this other direction towards oneness, towards the transcendent or a decrease in fabrication or the unfabricated, when it involves, in other words, not so much image and imaginal perception as a quietening of a degree of perception, including imaginal perception—so a quietening of images—we can, in terms of those elements that I just said that the soul wants as part of the sense of beyondness, see that they're all there in the relationship. We talked about this, in the fantasy of treading on that path towards this sense of beyond. It's around the actual experience or in relationship to the path to the unfabricated or to this insight into oneness or this perception of oneness. So the soul-making comes most obviously in the relationship.

But it's actually also there, so to speak, directly. These elements that the soul wants and needs are available directly in relationship to the experience of transcendence or the unfabricated or oneness—a lot of them: beauty, mystery, dimensionality, sacredness, divinity. To a certain extent, yes.

For instance, the unfabricated itself—not speaking in terms of the journey to it, but the experience itself—we could say well, that transcends meaning. It's beyond anything we could call meaning. But I would say, somehow, the experience of it is deeply meaningful. And it's hard to actually say, what does that mean? Something about participation there, something about what it says about the whole of existence, potentially.

And there's also an expansion of logos. But there's no thought there, but actually in the movement towards non-conceptuality, the very fact of it being non-conceptual is in a way an expansion of the logos. Somehow I have to have conceptual movement that expands into non-conceptuality.

But if in that movement to unfabricating, to the unfabricated, or to certain levels on the way of that, to certain kinds of perceptions of oneness, if the eros, psyche, logos—if any of them are limited—then the sense of these elements of beauty, mystery, dimensionality, and kind of infinity to expand into, the sacredness, the divinity, the eros, the ideation, the image, the meaningfulness, the embodiment—the sense of those elements, the perception of those elements with regard to the world will be limited, even if one already has an experience of the unfabricated.

Even if the Eros Psyche Logos is limited, if the soul-making dynamic is limited, then the sense of these elements with regard to the world—the sense of these elements that the soul wants—will be limited.

For example, in a talk some time ago, I gave the example of the senior nun talking about the birds and seeing them in a very narrow way in terms of biological evolution: why they're colorful and what they're actually doing when they're singing or flying around. For her, these were all just the strategic movements of evolution or the effects of natural selection. Someone asked me afterward, "But this nun was a mystic, surely." Yes, she was a mystic, but the mysticism there was only allowed in the direction of less fabrication, toward formlessness, toward oneness or the unfabricated, or the movements toward that in terms of the jhānas, which are states of less fabrication.

So even after attaining or opening to a direct experience of the unfabricated—which one assumes, based on what she shared and wrote, that she had—the mysticism, the mystical perception, was limited in terms of the world. The mysticism was all in the direction of oneness, of states of less fabrication, and of the unfabricated. There was then, in relation to the world, a kind of renunciation and a denigration of the world of things and sense experience. The images and fantasies that were attractive were only forms of the Buddha or of the Buddha-Dharma—only these were regarded as worthy of veneration or holy.

Other forms—the birds, the other particulars of being and life and others and things and nature—were not available to her as theophanies. The perception of them as theophanies, other forms that were outside the range of classical Buddhist forms, were not available to her perception as theophanies, except in the sense of being just equally, like everything else, manifestations of universal oneness, universal emptiness, or whatever.

What I want to say is this: if the eros is strong in a person, and if the psyche and the logos—the range of images and the ideation—is not blocked, either by dogma or rigid adherence to some tradition or teaching, or politically blocked; if the eros is strong and the psyche and logos are not blocked, then even after an experience of the unfabricated, after one has gotten used to that and digested it, I would predict that there will be a return to the world of sense experience, to the world and to particulars, and to beginning to see them as theophanies, beginning to see them imaginatively, beginning to see and open to the holiness in them.

In other words, there is a movement from transcendence—not throwing away the transcendence, but a movement to then extend what the soul-making wants to extend into what we called, at the beginning of this long talk, the immanence. And not just in the sense of "oneness everywhere," "it's all one love," "it's all one awareness," "it's all one whatever." The soul is hungry. The soul wants more.

So we go back to that Gregory of Nyssa quote: "How could this limited world suffice? For the thirst of human souls requires some infinite water." The emphasis I would put is on that word "limited." If the world is seen in a limited way, yes, the soul is going to want more and move into transcendence. What is beyond this world? This is a really beautiful, important, profound opening of the understanding and the vision, the experience, the consciousness, the citta.

But it won't stop there. Back to the world—back to the world of sense experience and particulars, but not the limited world, the unlimited world. Unlimited because liberated through the imaginal and through the eros and through the soul-making dynamic. So there's a return to that, even after one has had this transcendent experience and digested that and been liberated by that in certain directions to a deep extent. There is a return to the world and the imaginal and the logos and the eros engaging, infusing, filling out there in relationship to the world and the experience of the world.

There's an expansion of the soul-making eventually in all directions—in all directions. This is what we're suggesting in terms of the theory: that the soul-making will do this eventually, in all directions.

If I start with a flat worldview—flatland, one-dimensional—but I don't insist on that rigidly so that it blocks the logos, and I don't refuse the imaginal, and I allow the eros to flow, then even if I start with the flat conventional view of modernism, that eros and soul-making dynamic will liberate the perceptions and the ways of looking that reveal dimensionality. Eventually, one of the directions of dimensionality will deepen to a perception of the transcendent, the unfabricated. One of the directions of the dimensionality deepening.

But even if I start with a transcendent inclination and path—if that's what I've been taught, that's what I grew up with, I do my practices, I discover that for myself, I experience that, and the citta opens to that unfabricated, unfabricating, marvelous, staggering—even then, if I don't stop the soul-making dynamic there, if I allow its natural organic wish to grow, to open, to fertilize, then I come back to what we're calling immanence. I come back to the world and fill it out, giving it depth or allowing its depths to open in the immanence through the imaginal, through the soul-making, in relationship to the senses, to the world. The beauty is there, divinity is there, meaningfulness is there, all these other pieces we talked about—mystery, sacredness.

So eventually, the transcendent and the immanent, the immanent and the transcendent—just because of what the Eros Psyche Logos dynamic will naturally want, the ways it will naturally want to grow: multidirectional, unstoppable, infinite.

We could go even beyond this, even more than just the inclusion of the transcendent and the immanent. In the last few years, several people have either said to me or written to me—I don't think they're meaning it as a criticism, but maybe some people are, and maybe some people are meaning it as a compliment—they've labeled me or called me an iconoclast. I really don't think of myself that way at all, for a number of reasons. But if you're going to think in those terms, maybe a better way of saying what I'm interested in is: I'm more interested in smashing idols.

An idol is different than an icon. Better to say, I think, that I would maybe—again, if you're going to speak in these terms—say that I'm a seeker of icons, or even a creator of icons, as we all can be.

An icon is something with infinite depth, infinite capacity to open itself, to open us. It's in relationship with us, and it opens us, opens our psyche, but it itself opens infinitely, potentially more and more.

It's, if you like, a gate to infinity, a gate of infinity, a portal to the infinite. But it's also a portal from the infinite. And I don't just mean infinite space—I mean the infinite riches of the soul, the infinite diversity of perceptions and holinesses and all that.

So an icon keeps opening out to more depth, more dimensions, more possibility, more divinity, more soul-making, without end. There's no end to that.

Therefore, this process that we're engaged in, or part of the process of what we're engaged in, involves questioning more typical or rigidified ideas of the path or awakening, which have actually become idols—idols in the sense of something solid, unmoving, fixed, of a fixed and limited form and depth. We're questioning those idols of the path and of awakening, what have become for me or for you idols regarding the path and awakening, opening up instead new possible visions and ideas of awakening where awakening is not limited either by an endpoint or by a direction. Then we're converting idol to icon. What was stuck and rigid and anything but infinite, what was quite limited in form and depth and range, can actually be liberated and opened up into an icon.

And then, with an icon, an icon of awakening, the eros never collapses. Because there's always an infinity of possibility beyond—an infinity of possibility of what is not yet known, into which the eros can move, which it can penetrate into, which it can open to, and into which the soul-making dynamic can expand. The soul-making dynamic actually creates this infinity because of all we've explained before.

So, if you like, the eros never collapses, it never dies down. There's always the possibility because there's always more, there's always beyond, there's always unknown. I don't even know, I can't even construe what might open. Can't even yet imagine the directions and possibilities, ranges, particularities of what might open as awakening opens more and more and infinitely.

So awakening is not something we reach and then tick off.

Again, just with all this to say something we've already said, but to draw it out a bit more as well: Eros for the path, eros for awakening, needs us to see the beauty of ourselves on the path. Yes, just like we talked about in relationship with any erotic object. For eros to really be allowed and supported for the path, for awakening, we need to see the beauty of the self on the path. The image of the self on the path needs to be beautiful to us.

And the beauty of our longing, our yearning, our desire, our passion for the path and for awakening—this also needs to be beautiful to us, needs to be seen as beautiful to us, as well as the images of the path of awakening, including the image that we have of the tradition, the idea of the tradition, the image, the fantasy, the idea of what a Buddha is and what the Dharma is and all that.

Eros needs psyche. Eros needs images and fantasies and ideas that are soul-making. Ideally, we really see and understand images as images. Those images of path, of the self on the path, of our passion, of the tradition, of the Buddha, of the Dharma—all as images. We see image as image.

And because of that, we can actually allow this inflation, this expansion, this deepening of the fantasy and the image. So we're allowing eros, but not craving, because there's not this rigidification and reifying. The eros is stoked, ignited, supported, fed. The craving is released.

So that expansion of the fantasy and image of path, of awakening, and of what the Dharma is might involve—well, we've been talking about a fantasy of the path of awakening and of the self on it that allows an endlessness or an open-endedness. So what fantasies of the path of awakening, of me on the path to awakening, allow that kind of open-endedness, such an expansion and deepening of the very image and fantasy of path and awakening that actually it's expanded in some senses infinitely?

If we go back to our generic models—the model of the researcher, the scientist, the research scientist, or the model of the artist—these allow, as we mentioned, an endlessness, an open-endedness, assuming you regard science as never getting to the end. Although some people do think we'll reach the end, for me it will be open-ended.

But also, other fantasies and ideas of the path. For example, the Mahayana presentation of path and what awakening is, and the Vajrayana presentation of path and awakening. They involve such a vastly extended and deepened and complicated image, an idea of where the path is going, what it involves, what awakening is, what a Buddha is. They're effectively impossible to reach. There are goals that are impossible to reach. We'll never reach such an awakening, realistically. It will always be further. There will always be a beyond, which is what the soul needs. They're effectively infinite.

And what does that mean? It might mean, with these kinds of fantasies of the path, and there could be others, that something in us can relax and give ourselves fully and passionately and dedicatedly and with fire and aliveness to the path, but enjoy it, enjoy its fruits without getting constrained and hung up and cramped and self-measuring. There can be momentum, practice, dedication, devotion.

The Eros-Psyche-Logos can be active and mutually inseminating, but without judgment or self-judgment, without pressure even, without the pain of the kind of constriction that comes from self-measurement. This happens when the ego is involved and grasping in its measuring tendency, but not so much the soul.

So there are other possibilities. I offer this just to give you a sense of what might be needed if we really take soul-making seriously.

Can you get a sense with all this? I hope you can get a sense. I hope it's not just conceptually, but striking a chord in your soul, something deep in the psyche. Can you hear how this is opening something, if you like, at a whole other level?

The very ways we think of, construe, and imagine path and awakening are part of what path and awakening means. The very ways we think of, construe, and imagine path and awakening are actually themselves part of what the path involves and what awakening involves. There's some infinity here. There's some potential, if you like, for involvement of the totality of our being in all this.

And that totality itself is acknowledged. What we mean by totality and what we recognize to be the totality itself will expand because of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic expanding. Something—even I can't quite articulate what kind—it's like a gong resounding deep in the soul. Something is asking to be opened here, and it has very much to do with participation.

The whole soul is participating in the creation and discovery of what the path is and what awakening is. The whole soul is participating in that and also participating in what even the meaning of soul is and what it is to be fully involved. All this is being created, discovered, expanded, and involved. There's a sort of profound sense of participation in all this.

This is available to us—this kind of level of involvement, level of beauty, soul-making, eros. It's there. It's asking a lot, for sure, and we'll come back to that, but it's possible. And for some people, it will probably be profoundly attractive.

CHAPTER 77

In Love with the Way: Images of Path and of Self

Rob Burbea · 1h34

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea examines the essential role of fantasy and imagination in spiritual practice, particularly how we envision ourselves on the path toward awakening. Drawing from his deep understanding of both traditional Buddhist teachings and innovative approaches to practice, he outlines four primary fantasies that shape our relationship with the spiritual path: the medical patient fantasy (following the Four Noble Truths as diagnosis and cure), the religious fantasy (replicating past awakenings), the scientific researcher fantasy (discovering new insights), and the artist fantasy (creating beauty and meaning).
> Burbea challenges the conventional presentation of dharma practice as solely aimed at ending dukkha, instead proposing that authentic spiritual life requires rich, multidimensional fantasies that nourish eros and soul-making. He explores how these different ways of imaging the self, path, awakening, and tradition can overlap and evolve, emphasizing that where there is genuine love for practice, there must be fertile fantasy operating. The talk offers detailed inquiry practices for recognizing which fantasies are authentic and life-giving, examining how different approaches manifest across various domains like emptiness practice, samādhi, mettā, and ethics. This teaching opens radical possibilities for understanding spiritual development as potentially open-ended participation in divine creativity.

Often it seems to me that there is so much to say, so many angles of exploration and perspectives to open up, directions to explore, dimensions and openings to make available—aspects and pieces of a jigsaw, pieces of a larger picture that feel potentially quite significant and might be very helpful for different people at different stages in their own explorations and considerations.

With so much to try and communicate, I often find myself hurrying through pieces that I would do better not to hurry through. When listening to new material, especially when something is communicated in a hurried way because I'm trying to get on to the next thing, it's not easy for the listener to actually discern what might be significant. Something might be a really potentially significant opening or avenue of exploration, but because of this hurrying or simply because it's new, it's not always obvious what's significant. It's not always obvious where something that is presented fits in a hierarchy of significance, of important ideas, of potential openings.

I apologize for that tendency I sometimes have. But I'd like to redress it a little and take more time to explain something we talked about the other day, to explore it more and actually invite you to explore it in some way.

We were talking about eros—eros for the path, eros for awakening, for the goal, if you like. What is it to have an erotic relationship with the path and with that movement towards awakening? What does it mean to have an erotic relationship? Are you in love with the path? Are you in love with practicing? Is there a sense of beauty? Is there a sense of the richness and dimensionality of the path itself and of yourself on the path?

Is there enough of a sense of a beyond, a more—more to discover, more to open to, more to realize—that allows the eros to be there? And is there enough richness and authenticity and power and fertility to the fantasies and images of the path and awakening? In the sense of a kind of other there—the path and awakening—and also of the self and also of the eros. As we said, these fantasies of other, self, and eros—in this case of path and awakening, self and eros—will constellate together. They will be pieces of a larger imaginal constellation where there is eros, where we love, where something is deeply alive for us in that way.

Also wrapped up in that, and often with fantasies, is some relationship with past and future—in this case with tradition. What's the relationship of the path as I sense it, as I vision it? Path and awakening. Myself on that path. What are the images of all this? The image of my love. The image of my desire on the path. My love for the path. And the image of the tradition that, if you like, goes with that path or that hands us the path.

All these aspects will be involved in a really fertile, rich erotic relationship with the path and with the movement towards awakening. And it's particularly this aspect of fantasy and image of path and awakening, of self and of the desire and of the traditions—particularly the fantasies of the path—that I want to explain a little bit more about and explore with you and invite you to explore.

For most of us, the usual presentation of the teachings and of the path—and this doesn't go just for a Buddhist context, but the usual presentation in a lot of spiritual contexts, not all, but many—is as a movement to end or at least reduce suffering. And with that, to replicate, if not the Buddha's awakening, at least some of the Sangha of old, the enlightened ones, the Arahants of the past.

So one is essentially discovering or rediscovering for oneself, or following the instructions of what some sage or mystic in the past discovered for themselves and offered as teachings and a map. One is essentially seeking to replicate that awakening.

So the awakening is something that's reconstituted, if you like, or sought from the past, from what was given to us in the past. Someone else's awakening that we're reconstituting.

This is not necessarily only Buddhist. We could be on all kinds of paths trying, in a sense, to reconstitute the kind of awakening that we get a sense of—for instance, that Ramana Maharshi seemed to have discovered, or Nisargadatta Maharaj, or Krishnamurti. It might be put in a secular context or a Buddhist context. It might be Advaita, Indian, this or that, or whatever—Buddhist, traditional Buddhist, secular Buddhist—which also has a certain vision, a certain idea of what it means to end suffering, and a certain movement to replicate the Buddha's awakening.

Even if a path is just about mindfulness and we're seeing that as somehow the way to end or reduce suffering, we're replicating that way from whatever we conceive of the tradition there, whether it's Buddhist or not. Usually, there's the ending or reducing of suffering and the replication of someone else's past awakening or something close to what they seem to be pointing to and trying to articulate in language or in their being.

But usually those aspects of the presentation are not recognized as fantasy. They're just presented as "this is what we're doing." It's often not quite stated so boldly that we're trying to replicate something, but those are the two principal thrusts. I'll come back to the fantasy aspect of those.

That's the usual presentation that most of us encounter, whether you're in the Gaia House tradition, or the Insight Meditation tradition, or the Buddhist tradition, or Neo-Advaita, or whatever else it might be. It's a similar kind of presentation, a similar kind of fantasy of the path—a double fantasy of the path there.

These two strands of that presentation, when we talked about this before—and I felt like I hurried through it and wasn't so clear—these two strands we could say constitute what we might call the medical patient fantasy.

So in the Buddha's time, the physicians and doctors of his day would present their medical assessment in a particular formula: diagnosis of the disease, its cause, the possible prognosis if the full course of medication was taken, and then the prescription itself—the main treatment and what else was involved.

This is actually, if you can hear it already, the presentation of the Four Noble Truths. They are modeled on this medical formula. And so we, so to speak, are to follow the doctor Buddha's—the physician Buddha's—orders.

He says: What's the diagnosis? There is suffering. What's the cause? The patient is craving because they have avijjā. So let's say craving and avijjā—what we were calling clinging. The prognosis: if the patient will take the full course of medication—meditation and surrounding activities—they can realize a complete cure of this disease, the end of suffering. And the prescription for that is the Eightfold Path.

So we follow, as patients—as good patients—the Buddha who has diagnosed us and given us a prescription, a possible prognosis and all of that. We're to follow the Buddha's orders. And if we do so, we can end suffering, or at least reduce it to the extent that we're really able to take fully on board his recommended prescriptions.

Now, why am I calling that a fantasy? I'm drawing attention to the fact that there are fantasy elements inextricably woven up with that, as there are with actually all perception—or most perception, or certainly a lot of our perception when we're involved with something, when we love something. Partly, this is fantasy because it gets enriched through the eros and through all kinds of ways that it becomes filled out and meaningful and beautiful to us, and we really care about it.

Partly, also, it's fantasy because—as I've addressed in a few talks in the past—what does suffering mean? It sounds like an obvious thing that we're all talking about the same thing, but what actually do we mean by dukkha, the Buddha's word usually translated as suffering? And what does freedom from suffering mean?

We could have a vision of the path as just coping with the more obvious difficulties, stresses and strains and unpredictabilities and fragilities of our life. Something like continuous mindfulness allows us to meet again and again the incessant stream of the next thing that life throws at us, and cope with it by meeting it in this way that reduces suffering.

There's a kind of minimal sense of what suffering is and what freedom from suffering is possible—what those first and third truths are really referring to. One minimal way is coping through mindfulness—actually extracting just one term of the Eightfold Path—while also acknowledging that some dimensions of existence are just really hard. This is our existential situation. It's brutal, it's meaningless, etc. And we can do our best to bear up to that and cope with it by meeting it without too much demand or expectation, by going with the flow, by bringing bare attention or mindfulness and not superimposing religious ideas or hopes. That's one kind of fantasy already wrapped up in that approach.

Another way is around the whole healing paradigm: healing of body, of energy system, of our psyche—the kind of psychotherapeutic meditation, healing the wounds of the past, healing the ways our personality has gotten twisted from events or situations or just pressures, long-term pressures of family or history. The fantasy that's now quite rich in the culture—the typical psychotherapeutic fantasy, of which there are actually many—makes the path really about that.

In that kind of picture, what does suffering mean? What does it really refer to? And what's freedom from suffering? What does it look like? What tone does it have?

Even somewhere like Gaia House, if you listen to enough teachers over the years, you really get the sense that what people are talking about or pointing to or holding up as a possibility or the goal for practice is quite divergent in terms of what suffering means and what freedom from suffering means and looks like and what its range is. There's actually a huge range in the interpretation or presentation of that third Noble Truth, and by implication of the first Noble Truth as well.

Some teachers at Gaia House and elsewhere say, "I do not suffer. I do not suffer." And you know, at quite the other end as well.

As I've said in the past, in a way, the Four Noble Truths' teaching about suffering and freedom from suffering is more like a skeleton. To borrow the Buddha's image of fleshless bones—an image he used in another context relating to the senses that we talked about—the Four Noble Truths are like fleshless bones in a way. What do they mean for us? What do we make them mean? We need to flesh them out.

We share vocabulary, but it's just like a skeleton. And within that shared vocabulary, of course, it can sound like we're all talking about the same thing, but there's... It might be that for the most part all we have in common is that vocabulary and the kind of reference of belonging to a certain tradition.

But that fleshing out, that filling up of the skeleton happens how? With Psyche and Logos. What are we referring to? How does it work? How does it look like? What does an awakened person do? What do they look like? How are we on this path? Where are we moving to? What's it going to be like? What is it like now? What are the pressing issues that I feel are to be faced, to be opened to, to be explored now?

So there's this medical patient fantasy, as we said, that's part of the usual presentation. And there's also, I would say, religious fantasy wrapped up in the usual presentation as well. Again, whether it's Buddhist, whether it's some other spiritual tradition, it's still presented that way. Freedom from suffering, and you're replicating something that he or she is pointing to in different ways, usually in a certain style of linguistic communication. And those styles can differ hugely as much as the fantasy of what it looks like and what it involves.

But why I'm calling it religious is because one of the things we could say, one way we could use that word religious is in the sense of re-ligio. Ligio is from the Latin, like ligament or legislation. Something that binds. So it's binding us, re, again, to re-bind us to something. In other words, to bind us to something from the past.

Whether you accept that etymology or not is kind of irrelevant, but there is something about religions, as far as I can see, for the most part, in that they place their authority in the past. The authority is in the past. We've touched on this a little bit on this retreat, and I've certainly touched on it in other retreats.

So you can hear that in replicating the Buddha or whoever it is, Nisargadatta or Ramana Maharshi or Krishnamurti, and replicating that kind of, the sense that we get of the awakening that they're trying to communicate and are somehow trying to replicate it, even if we're not thinking in terms of replication, that that's actually what's happening there. That kind of movement of replication and the authority in the past.

Even if this person is still alive, it's their past awakening that we're referring to. They say, well, on such and such day or whenever this happened and now I'm like this. And we say, wow, that's amazing. And we try and replicate that.

So I'm placing the burden of the meaning of the word religious in religious fantasy for now, not necessarily with respect to the subject matter, but with respect to this kind of fantasy of having the authority in the past. Some people say, no, religious has to do with believing in some kind of metaphysics or metaphysical beyond or transcendent or believe in life after death or you believe in God or divinity or that kind of thing. You could say something like that if you want.

I think just for now, given the flexibility of how we're using words, what I want to point to is this: it's not so much that, but the fantasy about the style, the style of fantasizing self on the path. That's what I'm talking about in these four kinds of fantasies that I've offered already, and I'm just elaborating a bit more. The fantasies of, or the style of fantasizing the self and the path, and the self on the path.

So there's something, as I said, replicatory here with the authority in the past. Now, it may be that this path, or our vision of the path, may involve a kind of felt promise of this more, or beyond, which we can discover later regarding how we perceive self, other, and the world. In other words, the perception of things, our sense of the path might include this promise of something beyond what I already know. It could be just a little bit beyond, not that different. It could be something massively beyond, radically different, opening up in the perception there of self, other, world. And it could be that that sense of what's radically different is an obviously, quote, religious difference in the way some people use that word.

But that actually could be present, that beyondness could be present in any of these things, any of these four fantasies. And it could also have the kind of religious flavor of beyondness or transcendence or et cetera that's opened up in the perception. But that's not the key thing I'm pointing to because it could be in any of these four.

But as I said, the two sort of interwoven strands of fantasy in the usual presentation of the path or the usual way that most people tend to consciously or for the most part consciously fantasize their path is the medical patient fantasy and what I'm calling the religious fantasy.

And compare that, or either of those, or both of those, with what I was calling a third possibility, I've changed the order here by the way, but let's call it now the third possibility of the scientific researcher fantasy. In contrast to putting the authority in the past, science also looks to the future and anticipates, in its very assumptions and in its very project, anticipates making new discoveries in the future that it does not know today and that were not known in the past.

So yes, it uses the past, but it remains quite prepared to make radical breaks with the past and throw out anything from the past that no longer works or no longer serves as part of the most coherent and economical framework for understanding things.

But science, in contrast to the religious fantasy that looks to the past for its authority, looks also—or let's say predominantly—to the future. There's this... And I think I gave this example a few years ago in a talk. Let's take the scientific study of gravity. We had Galileo and Copernicus making initial observations and hypotheses about the movement of planets and about gravity at the time of the scientific revolution. Then along came Newton who synthesized Copernicus and Galileo with a theory of gravity related to the whole new physics that was emerging and the whole new scientific method. This rested on certain assumptions about scientific method, about reality, about all kinds of things wrapped up in that theory. He drew on Copernicus, he drew on Galileo, and he drew on many others as well—both the scientific methodology and the ideas about planetary motion and gravity.

Then a few hundred years later, along comes Albert Einstein, and in effect, to a certain extent, demolished Newtonian ideas of motion in space and time. Later, Einstein did the same with the Newtonian theory of gravity, replacing them with a whole other theory of gravity that was really quite different in fundamental respects regarding what was assumed to be real, the whole structure of the theory, and what its implications were.

Nowadays, what's at the cutting edge of research in modern physics is trying to synthesize theories—having realized that Einstein's general theory of relativity, which is a very successful and beautiful theory, doesn't actually work well with the other main theory of modern physics, quantum theory. So various theories have been proposed—none anywhere near proven yet—like quantum loop gravity and superstring theory.

If a scientist were to say, "I believe that Copernicus was right, and I'm only interested in Copernicus. Anything beyond Copernicus is a pollution of the tradition. It's not proper science. It's a devolution," this would strike us as... I'm not sure about this person's scientific standing and authority and how they're thinking about things. It's only the religious fantasy that puts all the emphasis on the past like that.

So you get this fixation on "what the Buddha said." Someone was just telling me the other day about a teacher who said, "This is where Buddhism went wrong, this is where Buddhism lost its way"—going on about the Unfabricated. "This came after the Buddha. It was put in by Vedanta people—the jhanas, the Formless Jhanas and all the rest of it." And it's like, how strange. What is going on there to have this insistence on what the Buddha said as being the ultimate authority? What's going on there? It's a religious fantasy.

A person might be absolutely committed to secularism in the sense that they find exactly that—the idea of an unfabricated or a transcendent—abhorrent, but still there's a religious fantasy. There's a religious secularism there, or secular religiosity or whatever. Am I aware of the fantasies? How come I've just decided that the Buddha is the ultimate authority? Can I not see that there must be a fantasy going on there?

And a person might admit, even within that fantasy, "Yes, well, he was a little bit conditioned by certain views of his time and the limitations of the Indian worldview—perhaps around his political views. I could be wrong here, but he didn't seem to speak up much against slavery, against the practice of owning slaves. Or his attitude towards ordaining nuns seems a little dubious." But still, apart from those kind of slightly minor details, he is the fundamental authority and we are trying to replicate something. We're trying to find what he really said, assume he's the ultimate authority and somehow replicate that.

The scientific researcher does rely on the past and uses the past, but may jettison or shatter models of truth from the past, assumptions about reality, directions of investigation, all kinds of things—as we said with Einstein and Newton. And I think I mentioned this the other day, that the scientific research fantasy may be an open-ended fantasy. If you talk to some scientists, they would say, "We'll never fully understand everything about the universe completely. There's always more to understand." It's open-ended in that sense. Or it may not be. You talk to other scientists and they actually think there will be a time when we've pretty much figured everything out. Slightly comically...

Slightly comically, there was an English physicist who said exactly those words just a few years before both the quantum revolution and Einstein's theories of relativity, which threw everything into disarray and showed how much more there was to understand.

But there is, whether it's open-ended or not in the fantasy, this openness and interest in the new and intentionality towards discovering new discoveries. The emphasis is towards new discoveries in research science.

Relating that to what this means in terms of Buddhism or whatever—the newness here is not so much presenting old teachings in slightly adapted ways to new groups or demographics. Rather, the possibility here is of really different understandings, really different insights.

I remember when I first used this idea of the researcher fantasy. I just tossed it out playfully when I was talking about the beauty of desire in part two of this series. What was so interesting and striking about the material in that talk was this shouldn't happen. I felt like I'd discovered something—I'm not saying other people hadn't discovered it, but for me, I had not seen it before. And this shouldn't happen.

According to the teachings of the Buddha and the Pali Canon, as I understand them, desire, wanting—unless it's in very specific directions—basically brings suffering. But if you find that you can actually go deeper into that desire and hold it in a certain way, as we'll explore in this retreat, it actually does not bring suffering. It brings joy and fullness and abundance of being. Well, that shouldn't happen. So that's really interesting.

That's like Max Planck at the start of the quantum revolution presenting his findings in the laboratory. He really didn't want to present them because he knew this contradicted everything we think about radiation, black body radiation and how radiation is emitted by hot bodies. He said, "I don't want to share this. Something is really up here." And he did anyway, thankfully, though he felt very ambivalent about it. He knew something was up.

This is really what I'm talking about by the researcher fantasy—things that don't fit, areas that don't fit, directions, insights, openings that actually move into new territory, new insights.

In comparing these different fantasies we're outlining, one may be a researcher into mystical states, for example. One may be a researcher into insights and approaches that some people would deem religious or spiritual. But the fantasy of the movement, how the self engages, how it sees itself, how it images itself in that movement in relation to a path—this is what I'm calling the scientific researcher, the person who can discover, make new discoveries.

These four fantasies overlap, as I mentioned. It's a matter of emphasis. What's dominant for you, for me? What's dominant at different times? Do we have flexibility with them, or am I just stuck? Can I only look this way, only fantasize this way? Is there flexibility?

The fourth is what we're calling the artist fantasy. This is also quite different.

You might ask, what is art for? Is it for the end of suffering? Some art clearly is—politically motivated art with a message. But not necessarily. Even the scientific research fantasy may not be for the end of suffering, or even the reduction of suffering. It might just be an interest in mystical states, an interest in consciousness, an interest in experience, an interest in dependent arising that's not motivated so much by wanting to end suffering.

So what's art for? And who can answer that question? Who is to say what art is for? Is the impulse for art so deep in the human being, in humanity—let's say, because it's not in some people, obviously, but in humanity—that it can't be contained by a certain statement of purpose?

We might also ask what is the artist's relationship with tradition.

So most artists—and I'm speaking of artists one would take seriously—would never confine themselves to merely replicating the masters. If an artist declared, "I only paint like Michelangelo. Anything after Michelangelo is rubbish, and I'm simply trying to replicate his style," we might respect their freedom to hold such a view, but it would sound remarkably limiting. Such a stance would suggest a rather constricted artistic vision.

On the other hand, a serious artist would hardly remain ignorant of their tradition. A painter would likely study not only Michelangelo but what followed—the Impressionists, Cézanne, Picasso, the abstract expressionists. There would be learning to replicate the tradition, perhaps dialogue with it, maybe even fighting against or transforming it. But if an artist were either ignorant of their tradition or wished only to copy Michelangelo, we might question their depth, capacity, power, or fertility as a creative force.

So what might it mean to have a fantasy of self and path that we could call artistic? Let me leave that question fairly open for now.

I believe it was in the talk "In Praise of Restlessness" some years ago where I first broached this radical possibility—a fundamentally different conception of the path and of the self on that path. A vision, a fantasy of the path as art and the practitioner as artist, in a way that goes far beyond mere technique. In the two talks preceding that one—"Questioning Awakening" and "Buddhism Beyond Modernism"—I attempted to expose gaps in the constructions of belief and view that prevent such a vision. Those talks provided groundwork for this artistic fantasy, creating space for its possibility. And certainly in our last retreat, "Re-enchanting the Cosmos," we explored the poetry of perception and the art of perception, further supporting this possibility.

Let me point out another dimension of the artist's fantasy that reveals its deeper complexity. The artist—whether dharma practitioner, soul-maker, painter, sculptor, or musician—may sense or imagine that their discoveries and creations are actually participations in divine creativity itself. They become part of the art of the divine, of Buddha-nature, of God, of the daemons. Their discoveries and creations participate in that divine movement, that divine outpouring, that divine discovery and creation of new logos.

This introduces a profound level of participation, where one's art becomes a conscious collaboration with divine artistry. I mean something more here than the common report of "going with the flow" or "getting out of the way" so that the poem writes itself or the painting paints itself. This vision may involve tremendous struggle, sketching, working out, trial and error, thinking, planning. It shouldn't be mistaken for a merely passive "let it flow and don't think" approach.

This sense of deeper participation in divine creation could apply equally to the researcher fantasy. The creation and discovery of new observations, ideas, logos, frameworks, and conceptions might also be experienced as participating in the becoming of God, the evolution of the divine, the unfolding of Buddha-nature.

This brings me to an important point about overlap. These fantasies are not hermetically sealed categories. The artistic and research fantasies can interpenetrate, as can others we've discussed. These four fantasies I'm outlining might appear neat and separate, but they actually blur into one another. They're also not exhaustive—there may well be many other possible fantasies for envisioning ourselves on the path, our relationship to awakening, to goals, to tradition.

The degree of overlap depends partly on the scope and permission we grant ourselves within each fantasy. Take the researcher fantasy, for instance. The crucial question becomes: what's the scope of research I allow myself? What am I given permission to inquire into, question, and investigate?

You might hear me or other teachers emphasizing play, experimentation, discovery—encouraging permission to be creative. You might apply this when facing a difficult emotion, experimenting with different qualities of attention. Will you laser-beam it with microscopic, intensely energized attention? Hold it in soft, spacious awareness? Touch it delicately like a feather? In that moment, you're researching, experimenting to discover what's most helpful.

But notice how this experimental research remains nested within the medical-patient fantasy—it's oriented toward reducing suffering, which is perfectly fine. However, the scope and permission I grant to my researcher identity remains quite limited. Other things might be occurring in practice that I don't dare pick up on or question, perhaps because I feel I'm still developing my basic capacities—learning to work with difficult emotions, explore the energy body, practice emptiness, navigate the imaginal realm and its new language.

And so, quite rightly, one doesn't start researching at full depth until one has had a certain amount of training. Perhaps the table is a little cleared in terms of not being too overcome with other difficulties.

So there's a place for all this, but sometimes we simply do not give ourselves permission to expand the scope of our research fantasies and to dare to question. We may not even notice certain things that are perhaps worth questioning or might open up a whole new area of investigation, some new discoveries, just because we haven't given ourselves that permission. We haven't given that self-image, that self-fantasy and the relationship with the path and awakening enough scope.

So there's overlap. These four categories are not exhaustive. And to reiterate, all four of these that I'm laying out are valid. They're all lovely and wonderful things. I'm not wanting to imply any kind of hierarchy—first you do this, then you move to that, but if you're really, really good, then you have this one.

The question is: what is authentic to you? What way of fantasizing self, path, awakening, and tradition is authentic to you? That's a different question than simply thinking, "Oh, the artist—that sounds pretty cool. I think I'll go for that one because it sounds more interesting or rarer." We're asking what's authentic to you, and that's not necessarily an easy question. I'll return to that in a moment.

I can also point out something I alluded to a few moments ago: we can be so used to a certain mode of relating to and seeing and fantasizing self on the path in relationship to the goal—for example, the medical patient fantasy or the religious fantasy—so used to a certain fantasy that any venturing out or opening up to another fantasy quickly gets shrunk back down and put in the box of the habitual fantasy again.

For example, maybe I see that I've been in the religious fantasy, with this idea of trying to duplicate or discover for myself this awakening that I hear teachers talk about. They speak of different levels, and I wonder where I am. What happens is that this fantasy easily, as I said, squeezes into a kind of ego measurement.

Then maybe I hear about these different ways of fantasizing self and the path and awakening, and I let go of that whole religious fantasy model—moving towards some awakening which someone else is talking about that's supposed to be fantastic. When I let go of the confines of that religious fantasy and everything it seems to imply, all the baggage it brings with it, I realize, "Oh, that's better. I can breathe now." There's the letting go of that whole structure of self-measurement.

And lo and behold, with that letting go, there's less suffering. I feel unburdened of a kind of suffering because there's less of this ego measurement: Where am I? Am I there yet? Why am I not there yet? Why do other people seem to have got it and I don't? Am I going too slowly?

I let go, there's less suffering. Then very quickly, I relate to the whole idea of different fantasies back in the frame of: "Oh, it's good. When I let go of that one, I have less suffering. So which of these will bring less suffering?" Right there, I'm back in the medical patient fantasy. I'm thinking in terms of less suffering.

There's nothing wrong with that. It's perfectly valid. The question is: A, is it conscious? And B, is it authentic? Is it the most soul-making? What are we actually steering towards? What's possible here?

Because in what I just described, I've found my way—probably not that consciously—back into the medical patient fantasy with the logos, with the view and conception that it's about less suffering, and that's what matters most.

So it's tricky, all this. I'd love to simply say something about these four categories and have it be very simple, very cut and dry—hey presto! But you can see how much things overlap, how there are other possibilities. It's really not that simple.

When Jung introduced the idea of the archetypes in his way of thinking about things, he insisted on something people often don't realize: you don't ever get a pure archetype. Archetypes, if you like, their—what was his word there?

always in, his word was contamination, they're always contaminated, they're always mixed, was really his word, with other archetypes. You never get a single archetype on its own.

Again here, you never get a single fantasy on its own. It's variable, it fluctuates, depends on how we're relating, it moves in time, it moves depending on all kinds of conditions, and they're mixed. You have multiple things going on at the same time, multiple fantasies even going on at the same time in different mixtures and emphases.

And then this word authentic is also not so simple a word. When I say it's important which fantasy or what fantasy—better what fantasy, because it might not be just these four—it might be something outside of these four. Which is authentic to you?

Now, that could mean which is the fantasy of the path that's kind of given to or for your soul, so to speak. What are you called to? What is the impression, the fantasy that is summoning you, if you like? Already that question, putting the question that way, implies already a certain fantasy in a certain concept or logos of autonomy, as if the soul has a certain calling in a certain direction, has a certain archetypal influence, that's given to us and waiting to be discovered. Either we're authentic to that or we're not, we're in it or out of it, we're in it to a certain extent or in some situations or not, in others and not others, more or less. I'm not saying it's a bad idea—I think it's a very powerful idea.

But contrast that with the possibility that I would somehow like to hold as well: that we can experiment and try different fantasies. In this case, we can try different fantasies of the self on the path and fantasies of the path and of awakening and of self in relation to tradition. We can experiment, we can create our own or discover slash create, as we said before, new fantasies for ourselves. Try on different ones and see which is the most soul making, so to speak.

So this word authentic might replace which is the most soul-making, which we can either feel into and sense what's calling us, or we can play with things and experiment and find out and try different ones on. I would like to hold both of those fantasies of the approach to soul-making in relationship to these fantasies. I would like to keep both of them open.

But however we relate to that movement and that question, as I said, we need fantasy. We need a fantasy of the path for there to be eros. We need fantasy. And if we love the path, and if we love practice and everything that's involved in that, or a lot of what's involved in that, if there is love, where there is love, there is fantasy. There's a fantasy operating. But to be in love with the path and to have an erotic relationship with path, we need fantasy—we need rich, fecund, beautiful fantasy operating.

So this is, as I said, I wish I could just say something simple, and here's these four and it's very simple, it's very cut and dry and hey presto. But you start to go into things more and you realize that it's not so simple. It's not so simple.

So just drawing attention to some of the complexity of what we're presenting here without hopefully overburdening it with so much complexity that it becomes just utterly confusing and a kind of thicket. But to pretend that it's so simple would also not be very helpful, because very soon you would discover as you experiment and inquire into these ideas that actually it's not so simple.

And can you also hear that there are many levels of this idea of participation involved in what we're talking about? Many levels of this idea, for me, of a very profound idea—the idea of participation, participating in the divine, if you like, participating in the Buddha nature, however you want to put it. In this case, we participate in the creation, in the creating of what awakening is. We participate in the creating, or creating slash discovering of what awakening is.

Which is a different idea than there is something called awakening, sort of there and waiting as a possibility, and you either have it or don't have it, are it or are not awakened, or you're at a certain stage of awakening—you're at the second stage or whatever. That's the usual notion.

What is a radically different notion? We participate in the very creation of what awakening is and can be. Usually when we hear something like that, we tend to think, well if I'm creating it, it must be worthless. It's not real. The only real, the only worthwhile thing or worthy thing is something that exists independent of my creation of it.

I don't know, can you get a sense of a whole other level of ideation here? To me, a whole other level of beauty of an idea, or profundity of an idea, that we actually participate in the creation, and possibly delineation, of what awakening is.

So, going back to these four possible fantasies, what I really want to do is just open up, if you like, a basic notion here, a very basic notion about fantasy with respect to awakening and the fantasy of the self on the path to awakening and in relationship to tradition. Just that as a really basic notion. And just waking up to that fact, if you like, that we fantasize in relation to all that. And that it's not a bad thing, it's an important thing. And so to understand this, understand what other possibilities might be there, and if you would like to somehow stimulate your inquiry into all this.

And that's important to me. I said at the beginning of this talk, to me this is actually very significant, or potentially it's extremely significant, what we're talking about—this fantasy of the self, how we fantasize the self on the path to awakening, all that constellation of fantasy there. It's potentially extremely significant and far-reaching, but it's only potentially significant if we find our way into those ideas and those fantasies and have something move there.

If we don't work this material and this inquiry for ourselves, then the significance and the ramifications of it and the effects of it only remain potential. They don't actualize.

So I wonder if it's possible for me to offer some lines of inquiry for you to ponder, to take away, to carry into your heart and soul and let them do their work. Perhaps we can work with this material together—on the cushion, away from the cushion, in your life. Hopefully we can plant some seeds here.

Let me suggest four threads of inquiry, rich threads that can guide this exploration. The first thread has many elements to it, quite a constellation actually. And of course, you may discover your own threads of inquiry—that's part of the whole creativity of this process. That creativity is itself part of the fantasies we're exploring.

The first level of inquiry asks: Do I recognize where and when there is a fantasy operating—alive and fertile—of the self, of the path, of the self on the path toward awakening and tradition? This whole constellation of self, path, awakening, and tradition. Do I recognize when this fantasy is alive and inspiring, informing and motivating, doing its soul work?

Can I discern the contrast—where and when what dominates is more of an ego-measuring relationship with this same constellation? When is fantasy and soul-making fertile, and when has ego-measuring gained the upper hand? And where is it neither? Where there's no particular fantasy nor ego-measurement lens operating—just nothing much going on.

This first place of entry simply asks: Am I even aware of the difference? Can I tell the difference? What does that require? What kind of looking?

Fantasies can be subtle—the kind I'm speaking of are indeed often very, very subtle. Perhaps it's best when they are quite subtle, functioning as background colorers and inspirers, givers of beauty. This subtlety can make them difficult to notice.

But as I said, where there's love, where there's eros, it implies fantasy. Sometimes what happens is that because of ego-measurement coming in, a fantasy gets squashed. Or perhaps temporarily, or in a certain area, it's simply been suppressed. Or there may be areas of practice where fantasy has not yet arisen.

So this first platform asks: Can I recognize where and when there's fantasy, in contrast to where and when there's ego-measurement, and where there's neither?

Let me nuance this a little. In looking back over your years of practice and involvement in Dharma—or other spiritual practices—you might recognize different periods where the fantasies in play were markedly different. At different stages in your practice and life, for various reasons, different fantasies were dominant or operative. In reflecting on this, in feeling into it or noticing the colors and effects of fantasy and their influences—or their absences—you may see they shift significantly across different periods and stages.

Now let me add another strand to this inquiry. It's important to see that fantasies include not just self, path, awakening, and tradition, but also fantasies of others—images and fantasies of others. For example, the Buddha (which connects to tradition), or other teachers who mean a great deal to us, with whom we have heart connections, soul connections. Fantasy is involved there. They may be alive or dead, we may know them only through books or quite intimately.

It's crucial to recognize that this constellation of images and fantasies, in order to be fertile, must include some fantasy of others: Buddha, Sangha of the past, teachers, present Sangha, friends, co-creators, fellow wayfarers on the path.

This has to be okay. It's part of how the soul works, part of how soul-making works. It's immature not to realize this, immature to try to eliminate it. What's psychologically mature is recognizing it and allowing its depth and function, recognizing image as image.

But the particular nuance I want to open right now concerns different areas of practice.

Because it might be that in different areas or different practices or strands of practice, you actually have quite different fantasies operating around those different directions or domains of practice—different old fantasy constellations of self, others, path, awakening and tradition.

So if I ask you to reflect, in relation to five different areas of practice or directions or strands of practice, on what tends to be the kind of dominant fantasy or fantasies in those directions or domains.

For example, the first of these five: What do you notice is for you the common or dominant fantasy of this constellation—self, other or teacher, path, goal, and tradition—in relationship with deep emptiness practice? That's the first of the five. How do you tend to...what kind of relationship of view do you tend to get into in relationship to the whole area and direction and domain of deep emptiness practice?

Could be...some people say, "Well, when I realize deep emptiness, I will end rebirth. I won't be reborn again," et cetera. Could be that idea is involved. Could be—and probably what's maybe very common is—"When I realize, or if I realize deep emptiness, then I will end suffering. I won't suffer anymore, or I will at least significantly reduce my suffering." And that would be very understandable if that idea was there. That's part of the fantasy. It's part of the logos and it's part of the fantasy involved.

But let's see if we can really open this up and bring in a kind of openness of view and assumption, also a kind of honesty here. And ask: Is that—is ending rebirth, or is ending suffering or significantly reducing your suffering—is that what you most want? What you really most want, what you really most love, what you really most care about? Is that what you feel called to?

It may well be. Or it might not be, or it might be of some importance, but actually there are other things that are more important. So what I'm really interested in here, again, is this authenticity—opening up this territory of inquiry.

And there might be other elements that come in that are important for you. Perhaps there's something about the tradition: "I love hearing the Heart Sutra. I love those kinds of enigmatic-sounding mystical quotes that go back thousands of years. And when I'm engaged in emptiness practice or reading about it or hearing about it, I somehow feel connected with that tradition and it does something." You just recognize this is part of it—this is a thread of the fantasy that's alive for me and important.

Or it may be that that person just says, "Yeah, well, it's not so much all of that, not even so much that I really hope to end suffering. I just kind of enjoy it. I enjoy playing in those ways. I enjoy what that whole framework of moving deeper into emptiness and understanding of that and the practices involved. I just enjoy what it opens up in my perception and my conception and my assumptions and my—I enjoy the way it supports a kind of liberation of ways of looking, that all these other ways of looking become available and all these practices and there's a kind of beauty and art in them."

Which fantasy would that be similar to in our framework of four possible fantasies?

Or again, it might be that in relation to the whole deep emptiness trajectory, it's just not alive for you yet. Or it might be that it very often gets squashed. There may be a love, there may be a fantasy, but that fantasy often gets squashed into a kind of ego measurement thing, and it gets too tight. Too what? Realist? Lacking in soul-making? That would be the first one for you to kind of reflect on, ponder, see what comes to you, see if you can feel into.

The second area or direction of practice would be imaginal practice. And right away we can—for me at least—point out a distinction there. To me, I'm not sure imaginal practice has a goal, has a final arriving point. With emptiness practice, I suppose that at least in the way I would think about it, you can kind of reach a final arriving point, right? You could kind of say, "How much of the time am I able to dwell in that realization of emptiness without getting kind of shifted out of it temporarily or to some degree or whatever?" But basically, it might be one way of conceiving it is just: once one has realized the emptiness of everything, then tick that box kind of thing—it's done.

Whereas imaginal practice, at least in the way we're conceiving it, it doesn't have a goal. It's characterized by not having—it's open-ended, as I said in several talks in the past. There's no end to soul-making. It might be, you know, if you're new to it and these words—what is it that cosmopoiesis means again? And what's the difference between just having an image, using my imagination...

Once you get oriented—and it might take a little while to become familiar with the logos we're setting up, the conceptual framework, and some of the skills and techniques in practice—but once that foundation is there, imaginal practice simply exists without a goal. And because it doesn't have a goal, a kind of scale of measurement can't really fit onto it, as much as the ego might like to do that. It doesn't really stick. There's nothing to grab onto, unlike something like emptiness practice, which can tend to have depths and stages. Even if it's not formulaic, there's a trajectory that you can kind of measure—in a way, you could assess where one is on that scale of realization. In imaginal practice, I'm not sure that's at all possible.

So the second area of practice: how do you tend to fantasize in relationship to imaginal practice? That whole constellation of self, other, path, awakening, tradition—how does that operate for you?

The third area we could explore is samadhi. Traditionally, at least, the Buddha pointed to eight classical stages of jhānas—four form jhānas and four formless jhānas—a beautiful exploration and trajectory there. How do you tend to view that? Or you might be stuck in the idea of nailing the mind to one thing, like the sensations of the breath coming in and out of the nostrils or the abdomen, and that's what samadhi means to you. How does the self fantasize itself in relationship to samādhi practice? It partly depends on what I consider samādhi practice to be, of course, but still—I see so much how this shrinks into a kind of ego measurement for people. So much, whether one views it in terms of jhānas or simply as "how focused am I on the breath?" or "how continuously am I in the moment?"—whatever definition one is using of samādhi. But the question again: can I be aware of what's operating for me in that constellation of self, path, goals, tradition, others, with respect to samādhi practice?

Fourth: what about mettā and the brahmavihāras? You might find this is just the same with all areas of practice—though it might actually be quite different in relation to one area versus another. That's why I'm going through these five. Mettā and compassion may be very alive for you. There may be a real beauty or fantasy there of what you're moving toward and what you're dedicated to, and others who inspire you in that way. Or again, it could be something contracted into ego measurement and self-judgment: "I'm such a mean-hearted person. I'm so judgmental. I should be more kind." Or it simply doesn't register for you—"Yeah, mettā, never was much interested in that." And if it's a fantasy, it's not just saying, "Oh yeah, there's a fantasy there," but really, really sensing what the fantasy is—sensing its beauty, its multidimensionality, its fantastical nature and everything involved in that.

The fifth area, for now at least: what about ethics and the whole domain of ethical practice? This is an interesting one. I've talked about this in the past—in the talk "The Necessity of Fantasy" was one place—but Buddhist ethics, at least, is predicated and set up for the sake of reducing suffering, actually primarily for reducing one's own suffering. So we may be fantasizing Buddhist ethics and thinking of our ethical practices just in terms of the medical-patient model. I know one of my teachers would think of it that way: you're staying out of trouble, making sure your mind isn't bothered and hassled by regrets and worries about being found out for saying something or someone chasing you for this or that. It's not restless and worried about all that.

Or again, it might be that with ethics there's actually a much richer fantasy going on—that something really moves you about purity and goodness and straightforwardness and openness and transparency. There's something deeply touching and beautiful and calling to the soul about the ethical life, whatever that means and looks like to you.

Or it may be that in relationship to ethics, the fantasy of the domain of ethical practice is really as inquiry. In a globalized world, with issues like climate change and very different political systems and possibilities for destruction—destruction without destruction being consciously intended, through the environment or consumption or consumerism having global impacts, all kinds of other things, or ethics around sexuality—we live in a different age now. What might be beautiful to you about ethics is precisely as a domain and arena of inquiry. And that's the fantasy of the self in relationship to the path of ethics. That might again have certain people who are inspiring to you, a certain sense of what you're moving toward, a certain relationship to tradition.

But what often happens in contrast, in relation to ethics, is...

One relates to it out of fear. I better keep these precepts or commandments or whatever it is in a different tradition or these laws or whatever. We just follow authority or what we've been told, kind of out of fear.

Or again, it might just be that ethics—and I think this is the case for quite a few people—is just not interesting. There's a lot more kind of interesting stuff in Buddhism, and so it's just not an area that the fantasy life has enriched and made fertile and made beautiful. It's just, "Yeah, well, probably keep the five precepts," but it's not really alive imaginatively.

So that may help this inquiry into this whole area of fantasizing the self on the path in relationship to the goal and tradition and others. These five strands of practice are just offering possibilities for investigation so that you can till this soil and make it fertile in relationship to this whole imaginal dynamic and constellation around self and path.

So all that was the first area. It was really about recognizing and inquiring where and when fantasy is operating, where it's more ego measurement, where there's just nothing operating particularly—different periods, different arenas of practice or directions of practice.

The second possibility of inquiry to add to that is: Could you play with, could you take for a spin, so to speak, a test drive of these four fantasies, separately perhaps at first, and try them on? Experiment with them. Imagine your way into them. Imagine relating to the path from, say, the researcher fantasy, or whatever it is. Think your way into that.

So just as a kind of experiment in creative inquiry, as a way of extending and loosening up the soul and the soul-making process there. Again, part of why I'm saying all this is we get—it's so easy for us to get tunnel vision, but also just stuck on a railroad track without the ability to steer ourselves in any direction, experiment and be creative and move things and create more space and more possibility there.

So could you, just in your imagination—or even in actual practice—try on these four fantasies that I've been outlining: the medical patient, the religious, the researcher, and the artist? Play with them and think about them and what that would mean and what it would look like and what it would feel like and what it would imply. I think it would probably be fun and informative to do that.

The third inquiry here is really what we mentioned before: What fantasy or fantasies work for you? It doesn't have to be one of these four that I've outlined. It could be something else. You come up with your own, or it chooses you, if you like, if we use a certain language—giving soul more intelligence and autonomy. This fantasy chooses you, calls you.

Again, this word: What's authentic to you? What works for you? How do I recognize that? This presupposes, as I said right at the beginning of outlining these inquiries: How do I even recognize where a fantasy is alive and fertile and offering, irrigating the soil, inflaming the soul, giving fire, giving beauty, giving depth, giving richness, stimulus? Can I even recognize that compared to its absence or compared to the constriction of a more ego-measurement relationship?

But what works for you? What's authentic? What's fertile?

And then the last sort of question or inquiry is: How do you feel about this idea or possibility of the path being open-ended?

It's one thing to be handed and to receive from the tradition a sense that the path has an end. A person might think, "Well, yeah, but I'm never going to reach that end. Other people can." But it can be possibly quite a different thing to actually view the path itself as potentially open-ended because of the possibilities that we've been talking about.

How do you feel in relation to an open-ended path? And how does that idea, or that possibility, affect the possibilities of then how you fantasize self in relation to such a path, and others, and tradition?

That would be another way in, possibly, to all this. But I hope that one way or another you can work this soil a little bit. It doesn't have to be immediately, but maybe carving out a little time or a little intention—setting up the intention to, as I say, till the soil, work the soil, turn it, to bring these questions into the soul, these possibilities into the soul.

I really want to open up—as I said, to me it's quite a basic notion, really potentially significant. Something to understand here, something to stretch the soul a little bit through inquiring into it, into this area.

CHAPTER 78

The World and More: Immanence, Tantra, and Transcendence (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h28

> In this opening talk from the "Eros Unfettered" series, Rob Burbea weaves together themes of erotic soul-making with traditional dharma teachings, examining how different Buddhist traditions approach the world of sense experience. Drawing from the Dakini Vajrapañjara and other tantric texts, he explores the teaching that "through passion the world arises, through removal of passion it is destroyed," connecting this to dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda) and the fabrication of experience through clinging.
> Burbea examines how the Insight Meditation tradition has selectively incorporated teachings from the broader Theravāda canon, often emphasizing transcendence over immanence. He contrasts this with Vajrayāna approaches that see emptiness and divine appearances as inseparable, exploring parallels with Kabbalistic teachings about the erotic union between transcendent and immanent aspects of divinity. Through personal imaginal practice examples, he demonstrates how eros can lead to both world-transcendence and world-enchantment.
> The talk introduces the concept of "diamond passion" (vajrarāga) - an inexhaustible, sacred eros that, when thoroughly known as empty, transforms the practitioner into a "diamond being" (vajrasattva) perceiving divine appearances. This perspective offers a middle way between world-rejection and materialist attachment, suggesting that understanding dependent origination enables both skillful unfabrication and conscious, sacred fabrication for soul-making purposes.

Let's continue then with our weaving of this tapestry that we are revealing, creating together. We continue weaving together elements and themes and threads that we've touched on before, introducing other threads, making connections, moving back and forth over the same areas and bringing more out, strengthening connections.

If we look particularly, following on from what we've been talking about, we weave the connection between erotic soul-making and then our relationship to dharma and to notions of awakening, visions of awakening and what the path is. Included in that, we said, must be also the relationship to the vision, the view of the world—which means the senses and sense experience, which also means Eros included in that itself. What is the relationship with Eros itself that comes out of soul-making, if you like, that is necessary for soul-making, but also that is furthered through soul-making? As an element of that, the view and relationship with sexuality itself.

In going over this again and bringing out certain elements and tying elements together, I also want to look at some parallels or point out some parallels and connections with other traditions. In some cases, other Buddhist traditions, particularly the Vajrayana traditions, Tantra, but also other Western traditions.

As a footnote to that point, the insight meditation tradition—which I consider my sort of root tradition—is an evolving animal. It's an evolving tradition. It's actually relatively new. You could point to its birth in the 20th century, perhaps in Burma and Thailand. There's a case for that. But as a tradition, there's a case for saying it's relatively new, and there's definitely a case to be made for the fact that it's evolving.

Looking back at that short period of the insight meditation tradition since its emergence or inception, we can see very clearly, if you look at the Pali Canon texts, for example, that the insight meditation tradition has thus far been quite selective about what it takes from the Theravadan tradition. It's probably more catholic now in what it takes, more wide in what it takes than it was, say, thirty years ago when I started.

Part of that selectivity has to do with cultural congruence and what Westerners feel comfortable with or what Westerners can buy into or what it was thought that Westerners can buy into in terms of beliefs and cosmologies. Some people are very trenchant in their view that this needs to be upheld as a selection process. But not just in terms of cultural criteria, cultural congruence criteria, but also, for example, a teaching like the jhānas and samādhi is so central in the Pali Canon, so much so that the Pali Canon in the text, when they write it out, doesn't even bother to repeat when the Buddha mentions it again, just referencing "as in this sutta, as in this sutta before," and just references you back rather than repeat it all again.

Only quite recently is there a sort of emergence of interest in the insight meditation tradition in the practice of jhāna and recognizing that as really valid and valuable current of practice, stream thread of practice. Or how little emphasized, for example, the contemplation of death is despite it being so central in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, which is regarded as the central text of the insight meditation tradition.

In a lot of ways, we could say how narrow is the selection of the insight meditation tradition from the broader Theravadan tradition of texts and practices and teachings. In addition to that, the insight meditation tradition was born or came out of what had influenced or the teachings received by the teachers in the insight meditation tradition, the initial teachers and then teachers since then. So it has mixed in with it a good dose of particularly Soto Zen, in the tradition of Shunryu Suzuki and others.

Also—and this again you can trace it back to a certain time period—a sprinkling of Dzogchen, Tibetan tantric teachings. But there again, it's very selective what is taken from the Dzogchen teachings or Mahāmudrā teachings, and they particularly only take... usually, what is taken is teachings about the nature of mind and the way it seems they are congruent with teachings about resting in awareness and non-doing and so-called non-contrivance, and the unfabricated nature of awareness and all this.

So the teachings on the nature of mind form an element, a strand within tantric teachings in tantric Buddhism. And there are different levels of the teaching of nature of mind. What you see when you really go into this is only sort of tantric teachings, a little bit taken out of context for one thing, and also taken at different levels and brought in to mix with or find another language for certain insight meditation teachings.

This is just good to know, and also as a precursor to what I'm going to go into a little bit, and what we've already touched on in terms of corollaries and parallels with other traditions. But also to come back to this point later on: that the insight meditation tradition is evolving. It always has been evolving, and I would say that's a good thing.

That was a little bit of a sort of preface. But let's start with a couple of lines from a tantric text, a Buddhist tantric text called the Ḍākinī Vajrapañjara. All these lovely Sanskrit tantric titles, because of the nature of the Sanskrit language, can be translated in many ways. We could give a translation there: the dovecote of the diamond sky dancers, the dovecote of the diamond sky dancers, potentially, or the indestructible net of the ḍākinīs, or the diamond ceremony of the ḍākinīs—many possible translations. I think, though I'm not sure, that this text, this tantric text, is a commentary on a basic tantra called the Hevajra Tantra, though I'm not sure about that.

But it says: "By passion, or through passion, the world arises. Through the removal or the giving up of passion, it—the world—is destroyed." And then the second line says: "By thorough knowledge, by thorough knowing, or by thorough gnosis—that word gnosis again, that we used before—by thorough gnosis of the diamond passion, the mind becomes Vajrasattva, a diamond being."

All these words that can be translated differently in the title, and even words like "diamond passion" and "diamond being," have in the Vajrayāna teachings, partly because of the Sanskrit language and partly because of the multi-dimensional nature of those teachings and multi-faceted nature of the teachings...

the vocabulary itself has this polysemous nature - it means multiple meanings, multiple levels of meaning.

So what is a vajrasattva? What is a diamond being? What is this diamond passion? And as we saw, the titles can be translated in different ways, kind of like a jewel, like a diamond, reflecting different facets - giving different faces of meaning, of hint, of inclination, of depth, of beauty.

Vajrasattva is like imaginal figures, which a Vajrasattva is, so to speak, in our language - an imaginal figure, an imaginal deity, possessing an infinite depth of meaning as an imaginal figure, a diamond being, as does diamond passion.

Vajrasattva is related - one meaning of Vajrasattva in the Japanese Shingon tradition is simply a tantric practitioner, someone who is moving on that path, opening that path of the empty imaginal in our language. So tantric practitioner is what Vajrasattva means.

Vajrasattva is also the high bodhisattva, or the Buddha, if you like, or an element of Samantabhadra - a primordial cosmic Buddha that has to do with action, and not just meditation. And Vajrasattva is also connected with Sambhogakaya, which I think on the last retreat, Poetry of Perception, we can actually translate in terms of systems as the mundus imaginal - it's the world, the realm of the imaginal.

So there's much more in that word Vajrasattva. It is a tantric deity, really.

But let's explore these lines from the Dakinivajra Panjara. The first one: "By or through passion, raga - we touched on that word in the first talk of this retreat - through passion the world arises. Through the removal or the giving up of passion, the world is destroyed."

I hope it's clear that this is referring to exactly our understanding of dependent arising - dependent origination through what we're calling clinging. By passion, let's say by clinging, the world arises. Through clinging, in all its multiple richness and spectrum of depth of what clinging means - we've been through this before, I'm not going to repeat it here. Through clinging, the world arises: the world of fabrication, the world of things, of self, other, objects, space, time.

No clinging, no arising of the world. Through the removal, giving up of passion, of clinging - when we learn through the art of meditation, meditation on emptiness, to attenuate the clinging in the moment, really drain it out of the plumbing system, the inflation system of dependent origination. Through attenuating avidya, through attenuating the push-pull with experience, through the removal, giving up of passion, of clinging, the world is destroyed, meaning the appearance of a world is destroyed, is not fabricated.

So that first sentence of the Dakini Vajrapanjara couplet there is really just reiterating in a very succinct way the whole of the Buddha's teaching of dependent origination, emptiness of the world of perception, fabrication, dependent arising, dependent fading. And out of that, the understanding of emptiness.

The second sentence: "By thorough knowledge, by gnosis of the diamond passion, through the thorough knowledge of the diamond passion, the mind becomes a diamond being."

Could this be referring to - or one way of reading it is exactly that - through letting go of clinging, but then knowing that everything is empty, and allowing, in our language, eros, that erotic connection, which we also know is empty because we know that everything is empty, and because eros stimulates soul-making, which knows image as image? Then what arises is this diamond being, Vajrasattva, a Buddha who arises with his or her mandala.

Buddhas in Tantric Buddhism, bodhisattvas, go with Buddha realms, Buddha fields. They go with worlds. They're not separate from the world - their mandala, what is around them, which is their perception, the world that they perceive.

So to become a Vajrasattva means to become a tantric practitioner, means to become a diamond being, an empty being who knows an empty world that is divine, divine appearance - the mandala of the world of divine appearances.

So this second sentence can be understood as - yes, the first sentence reflects the dependent rising, dependent fading, which we know from Theravada Buddhism, what the Buddha taught there, and Mahayana Buddhism. And in the second couplet, the Vajrayana tantric understanding of a Buddha's tantric fabrication of a divine and empty world.

Let's pull a few more pieces out of this. I recall that quote from Jung in his autobiography: "Eros is a kosmogonos," he said. Kosmogonos - his fancy Greek word - means a generator of cosmoses, that which inseminates, gives the seed for a cosmos. Eros is a kosmogonos, he wrote.

In our language, we would better say that desire is a kosmogonos. In other words, desire - whether it's craving or whether it's eros, clinging, desire - is a kosmogonos, because of this understanding of dependent origination. With the movement of clinging, in the whole breadth of what that means - desire - it will fabricate cosmos, cosmoses, depending on different aspects of what's involved with that.

Desire, clinging, is kosmogonos. Craving - and this is our language - when it's craving, there is one of the aspects of craving we delineated before and drew attention to.

Craving is based on realism, on the assumption and perception and conceiving—even if unconscious—of the reality of the self at any level. Even a process view of the self, or self as just vast insubstantial awareness, still contains realism. There's still a level of self-view operating.

So craving, in our delineation, is based on a realism of self and of world and of object. When there is realism, what gets generated in this cosmogonic process through desire, through clinging, is a real world—with all the rigidity of that, all the contractedness, and all the imprisonment that goes with realism and the perception and conception of realism, and thus all the dukkha.

This is one of the essential ingredients that delineates craving from eros in our language. When the kind of desire in the cosmogonic movement is what we're calling eros, then what we get is not the imprisonment of a realist sense of the world, of self, of other, of world. We get rather a non-realist self-other world, and also, eventually, a sense of a divine and non-realist self-other world. This is the cosmos. When eros is the cosmogonos rather than craving, then the cosmos that we get is a divine and non-realist self-other world.

Going back to the Pali Canon and the Buddha delineating bhava tanha as what can be translated as craving for becoming or craving for being—that word bhava in Pali and Sanskrit can mean either becoming or being. There isn't really that distinction there. Being and becoming, and if you understand that time is empty—same, same: being, becoming.

So bhava tanha can be rūparāga, meaning desire for the perception of form, or arūparāga, which is a more subtle bhava tanha, a more subtle craving for being or becoming in what's called the immaterial realms or the experience of the formless jhanas. This was a defilement in the Pali Canon, and there's a progressive escaping from this.

Most human beings have desire for material forms and what the Buddha called the cords of sense pleasure and sense experience. To have just a desire for the rūpa jhanas—what the Buddha called fine material form, the realm of fine material form, which if you know the jhanas really makes sense. The body is experienced as much more refined form, energetic form, which we've drawn attention to with our talking about the energy body. This is an improvement, a move away from the gross entanglement of sense pleasure and materiality in what's called the material realm in the Pali Canon.

But even an improvement over that attraction to the fine material realm of the first four jhanas is an attraction solely to the arūpa jhanas, the formless jhanas, the immaterial realms. And eventually even that—as this is one of the last bastions of craving, of tanha—for what's called a non-returner in the Pali Canon, the third or fourth levels of awakening. With arahantship or full awakening, even that craving for being, becoming, experience of the arūpa jhanas, the formless or immaterial realms, even that is let go of. There's this movement, a gradual transcendent movement to the unfabricated, to that which is even beyond the formless realms in terms of its degree of unfabrication.

So there's a weaning off—that's a good way of putting it—a weaning off attachment to being in any sphere whatsoever. This gives a shape, an articulation to what Robert Bellah called this movement of world rejection that's characteristic of religions of a certain period, and it certainly was there before the Buddha. He inherited that. It wasn't the only teaching around in his time—just as in ancient Greece, there was a pick of world-rejecting movements and religions and philosophies, and those that denied any kind of world rejection and were flatly material. The Buddha chose to incorporate that, to keep that, to sanction that in his initial presentation of the path.

There's a movement through this progressive weaning—what's usually progressive, though sometimes you read of a very sudden ending of that bhava tanha, craving for being or becoming. There's a progressive weaning to the ending of rebirth, to the ending of being and becoming once and for all in any world of form or formless. There's this transcendent thrust.

But either with a tantric formulation or conceptual framework, or the kind of parallels that we're talking about in the language of eros, psyche, logos—there are parallels between those two. I wouldn't make them equivalent, and I'm not interested in doing that for myself, but there are parallels there.

Could we then talk about a non-realist becoming, a non-realist bhava, being or becoming? So that yes, the self is fabricated and the world in a certain cosmopoiesis, the imaginal self and the imaginal other. There is the becoming of that, there is the being of that, but it's a non-realist bhava with the cosmopoiesis that goes with everything we've been talking about. It's part of the tantric mandala and the tantric view of divine appearances. So again there's a distinction between craving and eros, and there's a distinction between realist bhava tanha and what we might call non-realist bhava or becoming and world.

This Vajrasattva, this diamond being, is implied in that imaginal realm. He's a Buddha associated with the Sambhogakaya, with the imaginal world opening up, the seeing of all appearances as divine. These tantric Buddhas, Vajrayana Buddhas and deities and bodhisattvas, they're not separate from the mandala they appear in. There's non-duality there, subject and object.

Included in that, and absolutely as a premise of tantric practice, is that self, world, and other are thoroughly known as empty. So tantric practice should take place, should take its launch from that understanding and be imbued all the time thoroughly with that understanding—the emptiness of self, the emptiness of the deity, and the emptiness of the perception of the world, of any world.

What does this mean, diamond passions? The word vajra, diamond, has multiple levels of meaning and facets. One of its implications is that like a diamond, it's supposedly indestructible—so indestructible passion. It also implies empty. When you say something is vajra this or vajra that, it implies already that it's empty of inherent existence, and implies too a kind of holiness, a sacredness there.

Indestructible passion, empty and holy, and, if you like, everlasting passion. What is that? To me, we could make a parallel there with what we're calling eros. And I've said many times now, can we notice in the imaginal practice, in the meditation, when there's eros around—and there always is eros to some degree with imaginal practice, even if it's very subtle—can you notice or begin to notice the sacred and divine nature of eros? Meaning just the perception of sacredness and divinity, the aroma, the intimation, the feeling of sacredness and divinity, whatever that means or however that is communicated in the imaginal terrain.

In the practice, however it's communicated to you, however you pick up on that, whatever the expression or manifestation there of sacredness or divinity is—there are many, many ways that this can be presented to us. We can get a sense of that in infinite ways, in fact. Sometimes it comes in a very clear way. It's actually personified, if you like, in the image itself.

Let me share something. There's a sort of background to this image that I think I might have shared in a previous retreat, though I actually can't remember. It belongs to a series of images, moving slowly over a period when I was on retreat and practicing with them, pacing myself as they evolved. One thing led to another slowly over some days, weeks even.

One whole set of images involved a burnt man, a man who's horribly burnt and receives healing bathing from a holy pool, from a kind of beautiful goddess—very pure bathing in pure waters and very loving, very healing. He's horribly burnt and sort of outcast because of that, so burnt that he's incapable of tending to himself and bathing himself. She bathes him with this beautiful, pure water, and there's a lot of grace there, and mercy infusing her healing, infusing her being. A lot of tenderness, a lot of compassion, a lot of grace.

At some point in this image, it's not just his face that's melted from the burns, but his arms too, so that they're melted into his side and he can't even raise them. They're always pressed to his side, so his whole body is fused. There's one large surface of burn-scarred flesh. In this fusion, with the body smoothed out by this scarred flesh, his whole body began to look to me like a lingam, like a huge phallus or those divine phallus sculptures that you get in different cultures—just like a huge phallus.

After a few days, another image linked itself to that image of the lingam that had evolved from this image before, or kind of handed over to another image. Here there was a goddess connected with that first goddess who was bathing the burnt man. This goddess now—is it the same? Is it different? I'm not sure—she was passionately making love with, erotically embracing and being penetrated by this lingam. This lingam, if you remember, is slightly bigger than a tall and wide human body. Again, it doesn't make sense anatomically, biologically, but it's an image, so we have room for that.

She's rubbing her whole body ecstatically and passionately and lovingly against this lingam. It's very sexual, very erotic in that sense. She gives herself. There's this total opening and abandon. She gives herself and her whole body to it. Despite the seeming physical impossibility because of its relative size, she's penetrated by the lingam everywhere—every possible entry point biologically, but even ones that don't make sense biologically. This is more an intuitive sense in the image rather than visual. Penetrated through her eyes. What does that mean? I don't know. It's a poetic sense. Through her senses, through her whole body, everywhere at once.

She is on fire with desire—not literally fire, but her desire is wild, it's fluid, it's fiery, it's full, and it's full-bodied. It's also insatiable. There's something I recognize in the image as I'm working with it about her and about her desire. There's this quality of insatiability to her eros. Or should I say, because it's not that she's unfulfilled or pained by the dukkha of desire, by this insatiability—it's just that her eros is inexhaustible. And there's no problem with that inexhaustibility. It's part of the divinity.

This inexhaustible quality is holy. Part of its holiness is precisely its inexhaustibility. She is devoted to this lingam, devoted also to the erotic meeting, to the surrender, to the passion, to eros itself.

In this image, in this imaginal practice, I sometimes feel—we've talked about this before—how identification can be mobile in imaginal practice. At times I feel very vividly as if I am that lingam. I feel the goddess rub herself against me, open to me. At other times I become the goddess and feel it all from within her body. And at times I seem to feel both together simultaneously.

There is so much love here, such love and beauty in this wild passion. I too am filled with some kind of worshipping—worshipping this that I am witnessing and participating in. I'll share one more thing about this image, because I also felt very strongly something going deep and firm within me—some kind of nuptial commitment emerging through and in this particular erotic image. I could have simply regarded this as weird, really out there.

This is partly why I'm sharing all these kinds of images. I've said this before, but it's worth saying again: for many people hearing this, some will simply say, "That's just weird, I can't relate to that." But others will be hearing, and I want to cast a different light on images that may arise for people—images they're initially fearful of, that they think are weird or pathological or unhealthy. I want to say: maybe there's something holy here.

If I can just let go of that stranglehold contraction of my initial fear-mind programming that regards it as abhorrent or too weird—"What will it mean about me? Will I become some kind of deranged or uncontrollable monster?"—I'm partly sharing all this at the risk of people thinking I'm weird. But I know that I'm not, because people talk to me and share similar experiences.

I want to really open this up and normalize something, to expand the range of what practice is and prevent the pain that happens when people start fearing their own mind and the images that arise, assuming something pathological simply because of what the culture—or certain religious or secular subcultures—have indoctrinated them with.

Going back to the image: there is this deep feeling, this strong sense of something going deep in me and very firm—like a kind of devotion, but also a commitment, a nuptial commitment. I'm somehow, through this particular image, binding myself as in a wedding ceremony, though I can't even say exactly to what. I feel drawn into this and somehow assent to some kind of commitment.

I'm not sure exactly what this commitment entails. It's not that it could be anything, but whatever it is, it's something I haven't been fully committed to before. It's something new. In some ways it seems to be a commitment to the earth, to nature and protecting her. At some points the image goes off into other images and imaginal figures I've had from the past—this wrathful deity nature protector I think I've shared before.

But there's also a commitment here to this goddess. I'm somehow committed to this goddess. And with that, I'm committed to this erotic embrace and this penetration, this lovemaking—whatever that means at all levels.

Later—this was relatively early in this practice for me—I have the intuitive sense that the very meaning of this image and of the commitment can grow and will indeed keep growing and expanding, because of eros's tendency toward extension and expansion. At times the whole image has started to include imaginal perception of the world, birdsong as sacred text, other kinds of cosmopoiesis spilling out of that.

I've shared this example for several reasons, but two main ones: First, there was the clear sense, personified in the very image, of the inexhaustibility of eros, and that inexhaustibility being one of the aspects of the holiness of eros. There's this sense of holiness and devotion, unlike ordinary eros. A particular dimension or aspect of that holiness was the very inexhaustibility—this infinitude we've been referring to that relates to divinity. Divinity and infinitude go together in all kinds of ways, perhaps infinite ways.

This is very different from what the Buddha called tanha. This word actually means thirst, with the implication of unquenchable thirst. This inexhaustibility of eros has a holiness to it, unlike the unquenchable thirst of tanha. Can they be mistaken for each other? Do they somehow overlap? Can one transform into another? Yes, we've explored all this before.

That's one element of why I shared that image. And also, again, this sense that there's devotion, divinity, and duty within an erotic image. This is perhaps an element pregnant within the meaning of diamond passion—to return to that tantric word, vajrarāga.

Diamond passion and the duty and divinity that emerge from that. "Knowing, by the thorough knowing of the diamond passion, one becomes a diamond being"—vajrasattva. Empty, divine, and with this, the purpose of the bodhisattva.

As I've said, a Buddha in Vajrayana and Mahayana teachings always comes with his Buddha field, his Buddha realm. A Buddha or bodhisattva comes with that—comes with the mandala, with the world of divine appearances, with the divine world.

And we can see tying that into what we've been saying about eros and soul-making and cosmopoiesis, that that's exactly what we expect. When there's the diamond passion, when there's the eros, and we thoroughly know that, and know the image is image, self and world are divinized in our perception.

So as we've been saying, eros starts to involve, it implicates all the other elements and facets of our experience, of our world, of our self, other world, and draws that in. Through the diamond passion one becomes a diamond being in a world of divine appearances.

And what we've been saying so far is that eros will bring, when it is unfettered, so to speak, when it's not blocked, when eros psyche logos are not blocked, when they are allowed to expand and fertilize each other—eros will bring, will give rise to, will stimulate a widening, deepening, multiplying, manifold sense of divinity. The senses of divinity will widen, our sense of divinity will widen, deepen, and grow more manifold.

So we could start with any erotic object, or eventually any object can become erotic for us. We may start with a human other. We may start with a purely imaginal being that's the beloved other, the erotic object. We may start with eros towards the transcendent, unfabricated, the deathless nirvana, the ayin of the Kabbalah, the nothing, the transcendent nothingness of the Godhead. We may start with the world, either the world conceived as matter—matter is what we love, matter is what we feel this erotic connection with—or the world conceived of as appearances, or just one thing, this tree, that forest, whatever it is.

And also the erotic objects can be mixtures of all these. And in fact, there's this manifold possibility of where eros can go and then what it can make divine. Even in mixtures, because the erotic object can be a mixture of these kind of elements, and because of the eros psyche logos dynamic and because of cosmopoiesis, there will be, I would say, a natural tendency, a natural movement to the mixing of these facets so that each object becomes multifaceted and its very divinity is multifaceted.

So the soul-making dynamic, the eros psyche logos expansion, insemination, movement, widening, deepening in relation to a human other, for instance, we begin to perceive them, sense the divinity of them, in them, through them, in their humanity. And then that spills over into cosmopoiesis, to the world. We've been through this.

Or we start with a desire, the eros for the transcendent God, for the unfabricated, the hidden God, apophatic movement. And at some point, perhaps after the realization of the unfabricated experiences of cessation and that sort of thing, but perhaps before, there's a sense of that divinity. The sense of divinity widens, it deepens and it particularizes so it's not just in this oneness that pervades in different ways, but we can know and we move towards knowing and wanting to know the divinity or God, if you're okay with that language, or the ultimate as transcendent and immanent, as universal and as personal, as circumscribed in itself, so to speak, separate, if you like, from creation and without any circumscribing, without limit, without borders, infinite and in everything or everything in the divine or God or whatever, in everything in the same way, and in each thing in a way unique and particular to that thing.

So all these directions and all these mixings and multifacetedness and the multidimensionality of the sense of divinity—eros will naturally tend to widen, deepen, multiply the senses that we have of divinity, that we can feel, perceive, know. Making manifold, more manifold, ever more manifold of our senses of divinity.

And how to navigate all this? I'd just call on what we actually already touched on. So again, just weaving things together here, going over what we've already gone over with new stitching, perhaps new colors, making new connections.

There can be eros towards the unfabricated, eros that longs for the transcendent other, eros that longs towards different levels of oneness that perhaps we don't know yet, or we're only getting to know. And that eros needs a skillful development of the art and understanding of working with clinging, letting go of clinging, as we've talked about, what we're calling clinging, that whole spectrum, and learning to move or to be moved along that down on the spectrum of decreasing fabrication. And that's a skill and an art that we can develop, an absolutely beautiful and precious thing that is to develop all that range.

So there's that kind of eros towards the unfabricated, to different kinds of oneness. And then there's eros directed towards the world, towards the senses, towards selves and others and the world of sense experience and things. And this kind of eros for the particulars and the not wanting to transcend—this will, in just saying what we've already said in other language, re-enchant the world and the senses, self and other and the cosmopoiesis. There is a divinization, if that's the right word, of the world and of the senses.

So, a while ago, one of the talks said we can reconfigure some of the original teachings, add a whole other level here that might echo, if you like, or sound almost like tantric language. But now we can say something like what I said before: knowing the emptiness and eternality of the imaginal, or knowing the emptiness and the timelessness of the imaginal, the world is re-enchanted. With the world re-enchanted, or in the world re-enchanted and empty, one is free to become impassioned. Eros is free to flow, to ignite. Impassioned, infinite things open infinitely.

So knowing the emptiness and eternality of the imaginal, the world is re-enchanted. In a world re-enchanted and empty, one is free to become impassioned. Impassioned, infinite things open infinitely.

So it's really saying something about how eros is woven into the imaginal and soul-making, how that re-enchants and divinizes the world, knowing, seeing, sensing the emptiness and the eternality that allows more eros, and everything—infinite things, even more things than we even realized were there, more aspects are revealed to us, and they open infinitely, they gain dimensions, dimensionality.

And as we said before, that sort of quasi-tantric aphorism—or if you like, you can turn it around, because there's always going to be mutual dependent arising between such elements. So the eros is what re-enchants and what reveals to us the timeless level of the imaginal, that sense of the timelessness.

But in fact, they're all mutually dependent. So eros re-enchants, and the opening up of things gives rise to eros, to more eros, because there's more that's attractive there, there's that sense of the beyond, and that stimulates more re-enchantment. All these elements are mutually dependently arising.

In terms of navigation, what's this asking for? It's drawing out one element of our conceptual framework again, as it's so worth getting clear about. It's asking for us to understand this whole idea of the choices we have regarding fabrication and degrees of fabrication. To understand that, and to make choices about navigating and develop the arts of unfabricating to different degrees, expanding our range and capability through understanding dependent origination, skill in practice, and the art of practice with emptiness.

That's one direction. Another direction we might call skillful or tantric fabrication or soul-making fabrication—actually recognizing this is fabrication, of course it is, but it's serving the purpose of soul-making and it's non-realist. So there are these two directions: the decreasing of fabrication, the attenuating of fabrication, and the deliberate fabrication for the purpose of soul-making.

At one point on that spectrum is what most people would call mindfulness or perhaps bare attention, where there's a very slightly reduced level of fabrication compared to normal consciousness. Reduced from more papañca, but just a little less than normal consciousness—though this depends on the intensity of the mindfulness and what else is included with it. But this is simply a point on that spectrum of fabrication and how we're going to orient to that in practice. It's very useful at times. You go into a mode of bare attention, go into a mode of simple mindfulness. It has its place for certain things, for certain disentanglements.

But the whole path, as I would say it, encompasses much more. That's just an incredibly small sliver that has certain limited usage and certain limited possibility for soul-making, certain limited possibility for deepening insight. It's there and it's useful, but to shrink the path to that would be an enormous shame because you would be cutting off so much possibility.

This understanding and developing one's arts of movement in these different directions, these different places on the spectrum of fabrication, is important for our navigation in the wider sense, in the wider picture of what practice is.

As we said before, all this implicates and involves the senses and sense experience and sense pleasure and our relationship to all that. Let me read you something from Nietzsche, a little passage where he writes:

"In the main, I agree more with the artists than with any philosopher hitherto. They, the artists, have not lost the scent of life. They have loved the things of this world. They have loved their senses. To strive for 'desensualisation'—that seems to me a misunderstanding or an illness. I desire for myself and for all who live, who may live, without being tormented by a puritanical conscience, an ever greater spiritualization and multiplication of the senses."

Without being tormented by a puritanical consciousness, an ever greater spiritualization and multiplication of the senses. Indeed, he continues, "We should be grateful to the senses for their subtlety, plenitude and power and offer them in return the best we have in the way of spirit."

Translate this into what we've been talking about. "What are priestly and metaphysical calumnies against the senses to us? We no longer need these calumnies, these threats and teachings. It is a sign that one has turned out well when one clings with ever greater pleasure and warmth to the 'things of this world.' For in this way one holds firmly to the great conception of man—that human being becomes the transfigurer of existence when she learns to transfigure herself."

The great conception of the human being: that human being becomes the transfigurer of existence when she learns to transfigure herself. Can you hear in what he's saying what could be very much construed as exactly what we've been talking about if we substitute for "transfigurer of existence" the words transubstantiation, alchemy—things we've talked about in the last retreat?

Through relating, through an erotic connection with the senses and letting that psyche-logos dynamic do its natural thing that it wants to do, there's a transfiguration of existence in Nietzsche's terms. There's a transubstantiation of self, other, world. There's an alchemy that happens in the perception.

Again, there's a comparison between tantric practice and emptiness practice. The tantric practice of seeing appearances as divine, sense experiences as divine—what reaches us, what we perceive, what we open to, what we fabricate through the senses, in the senses—is to see that as divine and empty.

When there is a fading through insight—just for instance, really getting into the practice of regarding things as not-self, or things as empty—there's an attenuation of avidyā at that point. So ignorance, avidyā, usually regards things as self, and usually regards things as having inherent existence. When I engage a way of looking that regards things as not-self and as empty, the world of appearance—things, self, others, and the whole world of appearance—will fade to some extent.

But one can, in practice, with the development of practice, learn to engage that, incorporate that knowing of emptiness, so that things fade a little but they're loosened up and they lose some of their substantiality, typically. But you're not leaning all the way on that insight into emptiness. You're modulating it like the gas and the clutch pedal on a car. You're just modulating, so you're retaining perception and imaginal perception of divine appearances.

And you can either allow divine appearances to arise naturally or consciously choose to perceive them as divine. You're lightly knowing the emptiness, keeping that awareness present within the perceptions. There's a degree of unfabricating happening, but you're not letting them fade completely. You're not saying that fading is the better thing. You're not turning away from the senses or denigrating this world, this form of perception and experience.

You're playing at that midpoint, mimicking a Buddha's perception—a Buddha who is able to know emptiness completely and still perceive a world of appearances, of divine appearances. Transubstantiating the world, transubstantiating the self, and sense experience.

This is beautifully captured in Vajrayana iconography through the yab-yum, the erotic coupling or union of the Buddha and his consort. I've spoken about this before, and I find it so beautiful and profound that I want to repeat it now. The prajñā, usually characterized by the female figure, represents wisdom, while the upāya represents skillful means. At one level this means compassion; at another level it represents the mandala of appearances, of divine appearances. The wisdom—the knowing aspect that knows emptiness—and the awareness that perceives the mandala of divine appearances are represented as being in erotic sexual union, penetrating and co-mingling, depicted iconographically through sexual union.

The wisdom consciousness, the prajñā, is the wisdom knowing. And remember, let's keep that knowing plural. If I really have wisdom, what I have is multiple ways of looking and infinitely expandable ways of looking. That's what I end up with if I really understand emptiness, if my prajñā is truly developed. There is not, therefore, the epistemicide—the shrinking down where mindfulness reveals things as the way they are, or classical Newtonian science reveals things as the way they are, or whatever it might be. There is not that epistemicide, what we're calling epistemic cleansing.

There is this opening, because incorporated within that wisdom-knowing is a whole range of ways of knowing. I heard the fabulous phrase "epistemic disobedience"—just refusing to go along with this cultural indoctrination in the West of what qualifies as a way of knowing reality. "This is knowledge. That's reality. There's only one way of getting there." Or if it's a Dharma teaching, shrinking it down to mindfulness or whatever.

I heard someone ask, "Do you want your reality with or without additives?" The teaching there is supposedly that if you want the pure, real reality "without additives," that's what is given to you by mindfulness. And apparently mettā as well. But is that really a full enough, deep enough, radical understanding? Is there not a misunderstanding wrapped up in that?

But anyway, back to this tantric iconography. There's an erotic sexual union, an interpenetration between the wisdom knowings—the knowings that know emptiness and thus have a range of ways of knowing—and the world, the world of form, of matter, of senses, which is recognized to be empty and divine. As I said before, in the Buddhist iconography, this Buddha and consort, this Bodhisattva and their consort, are not actually separate. They together make the Buddha—male, female, both, whatever. Not separate there.

There's not the separation of the wisdom consciousness, the wisdom knowing, and the world—the senses, the world of form and matter. All of it empty, all of it divine. And within that, if you know the teachings, there's room for the transcendent aspect of the gnosis, the transcendent aspect of the Buddha's mind beyond appearance, beyond any form, beyond anything that can be said of it or predicated or attributed to it—unfabricated. And at the same time, there's room for the immanence and the revelation, the discovery of the divine in and through the world of forms and experience in different ways.

You see this also in Kabbalistic teaching, in the Jewish mystical teachings. There's the eros between aspects or faces of the divine, aspects or faces of the godhead called sefirot. For example, between the sefirot of Tiferet and Malchut—which is also the Shekhinah that you may have heard of—in other words, between the divine transcendence and the divine presence in the world, the immanence, the Shekhinah—there is an erotic connection, an erotic love, an erotic union.

Right there, spelled out in all these mystical teachings in very erotic language and depictions, is the understanding that between the transcendent and the immanent, there is eros. Between the wisdom-knowing and the world of form, matter, and senses, there is sexual union. There is this erotic connection.

Or to take another teaching from the Kabbalistic tradition, again from the sefirot: the two sefirot Chochmah, which translates as wisdom, and is associated with a kind of level or dimension of being or a world of pure conception. If we go back to the teachings about dependent origination and fabrication, the simplest conception is just any kind of self, any kind of knower, and any kind of known—which a knower always needs—and any kind of time, not just the present moment, but knowing, a known, and time.

That's the barest pure conception. You could say that's the seed in Chochmah. And that seed fertilizes Binah, another sphere, a third sphere called mother, the celestial mother. She, that sphere, has a kind of parallel, or is associated with a dimension of being, a level, a world of what's called knowing. It's the initial—don't take this temporally, but it's the first forming, if you like, of objects, of perception or beings, the first appearance of distinct, finite creatures, the realm of angelic or spiritual beings, the mundus imaginalis. Maybe there are parallels there.

But again, there's this erotic union depicted between the transcendent pure conception, if you like, and the world of appearances, the mundus imaginalis, the world of forms. Again, eros and the imaginal are wrapped up together there, and you can also see some parallels here with teachings about dependent origination. Any fabrication needing, as I said before, some elemental, incredibly subtle conception there. The pure conception, perhaps, of Chochmah and how that gives rise then to the world—not necessarily in a temporally discrete progression there.

What's interesting in the Kabbalah about this erotic union is that human practice is necessary to restore these two sefirot, Chochmah and Binah, the wisdom and the mother of the world. Human practice is necessary to restore union, to restore their lovemaking, to turn them back face to face after a mythic rupture within the divine itself. What's necessary for what's called tikkun olam, the restoration, the healing of the world, is also the healing of the divine. Through human practice, these two, if you like, faces of the divine come back into the erotic embrace of lovemaking, of sexual union for which they were originally intended—the wisdom, the father, that's pure conceptuality that generates fabrication and the world that is fabricated there, the world of forms.

So you get in this teaching the idea that human practice is necessary for divine and cosmic healing and completion. And wrapped up in this teaching as well is the fact that this breaking of the vessels is part of this whole mythology or psychology or metaphysic—this multi-leveled, multi-faceted teaching. This breaking of the vessels, shevirat hakelim, happens repeatedly on different levels of being and in our own psyche and souls. Every time that happens, the Chochmah and the Binah, the celestial father and celestial mother, the wisdom and the appearance of forms, are turned away, turning their faces from each other in opposite directions, away from their erotic union. And every time that happens, because it happens repeatedly, this breaking of the vessels, that rupture in the erotic union occurs. It's up to us, up to the human being, to restore that lovemaking between these aspects, directions, faces of God, faces of our being.

Interesting to me. I don't know if you can hear the poetry in here and hear how many resonances there are in terms of ideas that can fertilize soul-making further.

In tantric practice, as I mentioned before, there's a kind of mimicking of a Buddha's gnosis that can see emptiness and has some aspect that's completely transcendent at the same time as immanent and appearance. Mimicking a Buddha who is the only kind of being that can know fully the emptiness with the wisdom there, and perceive appearances and forms. Tantric practice is a kind of skillful, artful mimicking of that Buddha gnosis. And within that, there's this understanding that the Buddha gnosis is referring to something—a cosmic dimension. This jnana, this gnosis, is something cosmic and divine. And at the same time, it's not other than our very minds. Our very minds, at one level, are the Buddha nature, are the Buddha mind, are the Buddha gnosis already.

It's not separate from, not other than our minds and this world. That mandala, the divine appearances, is this world perceived differently, perceived through the lenses of gnosis, perceived through the lenses of imaginal perception when the eros is allowed to fertilize it, perceived through deity practice in tantric tradition.

Because it's not other than our minds and because it's this world that is being created and discovered as divine and revealed that way, there is this aspect to all these teachings of participation. In the Kabbalah, human practice is necessary for this healing of the divine and restoration of the erotic union between the faces of the divine, and that's part of the healing of the cosmos as well. Participation is woven into these teachings. That idea of participation that I've touched on before and drawn attention to is woven into these kinds of teachings.

Some years ago, I'm sure I would have heard all this—these kinds of things—and it just sounds like completely abstract metaphysics or some ridiculous kind of mythology. Now, it's so resonant, so alive and multifaceted, these kinds of ideas. Anything but abstract, anything but slightly strange, disembodied metaphysics from another era.

What is it, as I hope I've said before in this retreat, to take ideas and let them be seminal, let them be seeds in the psyche? Through entertaining them, can we translate them into ways of looking and into imaginal perception? An idea actually seeds the imaginal and fertilizes the eros. The idea and the image start mixing and giving birth to other images or other dimensions of image. So not abstract metaphysics—all this Vajrayana stuff and Kabbalah and Neoplatonic material—but to be practiced. They refer to practices, to things and experiences that we can actually open to in practice, in our lives. They refer to ways of living and ways of seeing, ways of looking, viewing.

In another strand or related strand of Jewish mysticism that emerged in Eastern Europe in the eighteenth century, they talked about a double movement. There's the movement to nullify the self and nullify matter and form in favor of the Godhead. In other words, to realize the emptiness of self, the emptiness of matter and form, and to become nothing, to dissolve into the unfabricated, we could say in our language.

into the ayin in the Hebrew, in the Kabbalistic tradition—the nothing of God, the pregnant nothing of God, the infinite nothing of God.

So this one movement is the nullification of self and matter or form in favor of the Godhead. And the second movement of the double movement is to bring about an infusion of the divine, of the divinity, into the material world through religious worship and ritual and ethical action—what's called the mitzvot in the tradition.

So there's a double movement here: what's called the upper unification—this annihilation in their language of the self and of the world, this emptying, dissolving into the transcendent, infinite, unfabricated God. And paradoxically, that upper unification, the ability to do that, enables a drawing down. I would say, to the degree that we're able to do that, we are more able to draw down, in their language, the divine essence into the vessels of the finite world. And this drawing down, this ability to draw down, is called the lower unification.

That kind of teaching is wrapped up in all kinds of language that, for a lot of us now, will be really quite loaded and charged and sometimes, for some people, scary. And there are also elements of that language that I would not actually incorporate, just because it makes either too much of a duality or this or that. So, for example, they talk about leaving the bodily sheath and divine will and divine commandments. Just leaving aside all that kind of language and taking something central from that because of its parallels to what we're talking about.

You can see there, for instance, the parallel, or you can see that double movement in what we're describing as tantric practice. So in typical tantric practice with a yidam, with a tantric deity, there's first the dissolution into emptiness, the knowing of emptiness, and then the emergence from the emptiness and the imagining, if you like, of the deity and even the becoming of the deity, and then at the end dissolving it all back into emptiness. So there's the drawing down or even becoming a vessel of the divine, this drawing down of the divine essence, but that's enabled and shot through with the knowing of emptiness—enabled by or shot through by the knowing of the emptiness and the fading of things.

This is also parallel with imaginal practice, just as we've been talking about: working with an imaginal figure, working with a daimon, if you like, and feeling a sense of the divinity of that, and the way that the sense of the divinity and the dimensionality of divinity of that figure, of that daimon, of that imaginal figure, and then the sense of divinity... Can you see that too? I know it's image, it's image, it's empty, and that kind of enables me to listen, let's say, feel, sense this sense of divinity and divinity. It's all wrapped up together. And then the question is, how does that divinity embody in the world? Is it just in a sort of inner devotedness? Or is it somehow spilling over into the world—careful of this literalization, concretization? But you can see the parallels there.

In alchemy, there's an alchemical phrase summing up the goal of alchemy as "the spiritualization of matter and the materialization of spirit." The spiritualization of matter and the materialization of spirit. And so again, you can see here echoes of these different streams of tradition kind of reflecting each other. Different traditions and the way they express things kind of paralleling or mirroring each other or kind of groping towards the same thing. Spiritualization of matter—this nullification of self and matter, recognizing it as empty and as divine that way. And then the materialization of spirit—meaning something like the drawing down of this divine essence into the vessels of the finite world, the divine influx.

In both the Kabbalistic Jewish mystical teachings and in the tantric teachings, in the Vajrayana teachings, there's a kind of double perspective going on. It's made very clear in the Kabbalistic teachings. And this double perspective—it's almost like holding two perspectives, so not just a double movement, but a double perspective held as well. And this double perspective, to me, ensures a thorough non-dualism of the teachings.

Even sometimes we're used to Advaita teachings, teachings of non-duality, and unwittingly, they can actually create another kind of duality in teaching that there's nothing to do, there's nowhere to get, meditation's pointless. You don't need to do anything. They don't say much about ethics and all that. And there's a kind of almost like denigrating of effort, of striving, and that kind of movement there, and avoidance—or rather, missing—of the divinity and the particularity we've touched on.

But with this double perspective, to me, there's a more thorough non-duality. So one of the perspectives is: already recognize that everything, all, is already divine. It's already all one. It's already all perfect. The essence of everything is divine. And the illusion of separate things that are not divine or separated from the divine is exactly that—it's an illusion, because essentially all is one and already divine.

That's one perspective, and the complementary perspective is that we express, or better, we create and we manifest the divine, that we are therefore necessary to the divine. And this implies to me a whole other level of participation: that we are participating in the divine, we create, we manifest the divine, we are necessary to the divine.

But holding those two perspectives—all already perfect, there's nothing to do, any illusion of separate, non-divine things doesn't recognize the essence, the shared essence, the oneness of an already perfect divinity, everything is already just divine—and at the same time, the complementary perspective that no, we need to create, manifest the divine, and we are necessary to the life of the divinity, if you like, to the soul and the soul-making of the divine.

Both the tantric framework and the Kabbalistic framework and these teachings are related to practice.

They absolutely imply and demand practice. They are not, as I said, abstract metaphysical teachings that have nothing to do with our life.

I want to continue exploring these themes further—delving more deeply into historical processes within different traditions, examining how these developments have particularly affected sexuality, and perhaps touching on some other related elements. But let us pause here for now.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 79

The World and More: Immanence, Tantra, and Transcendence (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h15

> In this profound exploration, Rob Burbea examines the historical evolution of eros across Buddhist Tantra, Christian mysticism, Jewish Kabbalah, and Islamic traditions. He investigates how these paths gradually elevated sexuality from defilement to sacred practice, asking whether tantric sexual imagery is purely symbolic, merely expedient, or genuinely re-sanctifying. Drawing from the Guhyasamāja Tantra, Kabbalistic texts, and Christian theosophical writings, Burbea demonstrates how erotic imaginal practice can transform our relationship with the senses and the world itself. He challenges the "myth of origins" - the assumption that earlier religious forms are purer - proposing instead a teleological view where traditions evolve toward greater authenticity. Through detailed analysis of imaginal experiences involving solar-lunar symbolism and cosmic mirroring, he shows how sexuality can reflect divine creativity and participate in cosmic harmony. The talk culminates in exploring how both transcendent awakening beyond the world and immanent sacralization of the world offer "infinite water" for the soul's thirst, with eros as the key that transforms this limited world into unlimited revelation.

Notice how central eros is in everything we've talked about in the first part of this talk: in the tantric symbolism and language, in the kabbalistic symbology and language, in the relationship with the world of sense experience opening up, in the movement towards the transcendent, in the re-enchanting of the world, in the very relationship with the world itself.

When eros is allowed to do its thing, when it is allowed to inseminate, impregnate, galvanize the soul-making dynamic—this mutual fertilization of eros, psyche, logos, this mutual complication, enrichment, deepening, widening—then it will affect the notion of the path and of awakening, the sense and the vision of what that is. It will also affect the relationship with senses and sense experience, with the world, with life, and of course, with sexuality.

It's interesting to notice historically—and I'm definitely not a historian—the rise of Tantra in Buddhism, for example. This historical evolution came after the initial first turning of the wheel in the Pali Canon. Buddhist Tantra came afterwards. In Judaism as well, you have Song of Songs and other allusions earlier in the history of the text, but with the emergence of the Kabbalah in the Middle Ages, and also of Hasidism in Eastern Europe around the seventeenth century and after, something shifted. Hasidism started as a very radical, mystical, ecstatic movement—a real revolution within the stream of Orthodox Judaism. Now it seems to have become something rather more conservative and really not so radical in that sense.

But in Judaism, in Buddhism—there's this gradual emergence or ascent or elevation of eros historically. Also in Islam, I think, with Rumi and Ibn Arabi pointing to these kinds of things. In Christianity, which maybe we'll come back to, some people would argue that it was there right from the beginning in Jesus' relationship either with Mary Magdalene or the so-called disciple that Jesus loved, who might have been another man. But in terms of what's mainstream orthodox and historically entrenched, and then in time, there's this gradual ascent, usually at the sides in the esoteric, more elitist streams of the tradition. It's a gradual ascent of eros.

It seems that way to me, just looking historically, though I could be wrong. Eros becomes actually more integral to the whole vision. It's given a more central place in spiritual experience, in the path, in these different traditions and in the whole conceptual framework.

Now, of course, many people would look at that and, for example, look at Buddhism as a deterioration from the purity of the Pali Canon—a pollution in time, a devolution. People might look at it that way, but we could also say that it's a necessary evolution. There's something operating in all these diverse spiritual traditions that's manifesting humanity's spiritual genius, let's call it that—the intuition that reaches out and gropes in some way to formulate, to articulate, to create and discover a way of including eros more centrally, sanctifying it, and also matter and sexuality. I wonder about seeing it that way.

It's interesting that I could speak for myself and maybe for other people—I wonder if this reflects not only a historical evolution, but also a personal evolution in practice, in conception, in what one's eros is directed towards and what eros is taken to mean, and where it moves, and then in the whole vision of the path. If the soul-making dynamic is allowed here—eros, psyche, logos—this is what will happen. It will start to re-evaluate, reconfigure the relationship with the senses, with the world, with sexuality, and in that, with the whole path and goal of awakening. All of that. It may happen on a personal level and it may happen on a historical level over centuries. It's interesting to see how they can mirror each other.

I've talked before about Nietzsche's phrase, "the myth of origins"—highlighting the fact that we tend to assume that most people assume the first birth of a religion, of a philosophy or an ideology, is the most pure, the most authentic, the most radical—as in radix, as in root—and the most powerful. Therefore they try to scrape away historical accretions or cultural accretions and try to return to some kind of hypothetical original form in the present, or actually have a fantasy and reconstruct that vision in the present. Or, mixed with that, they're actually bringing fantasy and preconceptions in and just take what doesn't challenge the current popular metaphysics from this supposedly pure original version. Or they just look at it in a way that history and the knowledge of history deconstructs the whole thing, so that the whole edifice and the whole religious impulse and the whole religious creation and construction becomes devalued, dismissed. Any religion, any philosophy can just be deconstructed historically in a way that renders it almost valueless. There's a certain way of approaching it that way, a certain intention of approaching it that way.

But Nietzsche pointed to this myth of origins, this assumption that the first birth is the most pure, most authentic, most radical. Why not, though? Why not regard religions and philosophies teleologically? We've talked about that word before—the telos, the aim. Where are they headed? What are they drawn to? So that the evolutions of, in this case, the different religions or Buddhism or whatever, and the telos is actually regarded as more authentic, more true, more radical, and more essential. This is upside down from the usual way we think. But in other periods of history, with Aristotle and after that, this was regarded as a very valid way of thinking about causality.

What about the possibility of actually turning the whole thing on its head and seeing it differently? So whether it's slowly, gradually, or suddenly, human beings think, reflect, intuit, experiment, create, and discover religious forms and practical forms and practices and conceptual frameworks and experiences that are actually part of an evolution and moving towards something. As Michelangelo said of sculpture—I can't remember the exact words—he's just removing the bits of the marble to reveal something that's already there, the statue that's already there in the marble. He's moving towards something, so to speak.

The historical currents and events then are not so much regarded in a way that devalues and deconstructs and then dismisses, but we could even go a stage further and regard them too as the operation of some...

greater intelligence.

So even if there are historical factors coming in and adding to something and shaping and reformulating at different periods in the history and evolution of a tradition, of a religion, even that could be regarded, for instance, as the kind of intelligence of the world soul operating to inform and influence the evolution. All that is, is an intelligent operation of the world soul towards a telos, towards some goal.

But that goal, unlike Hegel's philosophy, is actually open-ended. What does it mean to have a telos, to have a goal, but actually it's open-ended—one never finally reaches it? There's this open-ended movement, but the evolution is regarded as towards more authenticity, if you like, towards more purity, towards more radicality. Why can we not regard things that way?

Despite what I've just said, I know that there are quite a few people around who believe the old scholarship around Buddhist Tantras, which stated that Buddhist Tantrism was basically borrowed from or evolved from Shaivite Hindu Tantrism, and it was just a derivative thing. Therefore, the whole Vajrayana was again a historical devolution, a pollution of the pure, original Buddhist teaching by alien influences in India.

More recent scholarship, for example Bhattacharya and others, actually points to it being quite the other way around. Their research indicates that Buddhist Tantras actually had a big influence on the evolution of Hindu Tantrism. In fact, mantras and dharanis and mandalas and mudras and all these tantric notions and practices are actually present in Buddhist texts as early as the first century of the common era—for example, in the Manjushrimulakalpa and things like that.

This is interesting if we're going to play the game of what's the pure origin of something and regard everything that comes afterwards as a sort of movement away from purity, as opposed to regarding it telistically, teleologically, the other way around—a movement towards more authenticity, a growth, an evolution.

But there is, it seems to me, as a non-historian, a gradual ascent of Eros historically, and therefore also of sexuality. It becomes more integrated, less denigrated, more elevated, given place in the whole spiritual outlook and approach, religious practice and thought.

You see this in Christianity, for example. There was a seventeenth-century Lutheran called Johann Gischtel. Listen to these instructions to Sophia—we have to explain, Sophia is found in the Old Testament, in Proverbs as well. It literally means wisdom, Greek for wisdom, but she is regarded as the first being that God created. She was with God and God's love almost from the beginning, so to speak. She's not God, but she's somehow divine and part of God or something like that. So there are different ideations around who exactly she is, but she's a feminine, quasi-divine figure of devotion prominent in different streams within the Christian tradition.

Listen to this from Johann Gischtel in the seventeenth century. To Sophia, as the essential love: "Make yourself more united, more known to Sophia. And while praying, focus your imagination on her as you do on your wife and give yourself over to her way of loving with your body, soul, and spirit. You will find within your soul a great relief and sweetness and an excellent strength in your prayer."

Actually wrapped up in this teaching about Sophia is a whole cosmology or cosmopoiesis in our outlook. He points out that Sophia's presence is regarded as permeating the created world—the skies, the plants, the flowers, the metals, everything. So he writes, "We also recognize Sophia in this created world since she is emanated in the heavens and on the earth, and in everything that grows, and is to be seen and found on the firmament, and likewise in herbs, flowers, their colors, odors, tastes, or virtues, also in metals of the earth and their tinctures."

There is, one can sense in there, a whole quite elaborate conceptual framework and theology involved in Sophia and relationship with the world and levels of existence and what's called in the Hermetic and other traditions "sympathies"—harmonic resonances between, for example, metals and their tinctures and certain herbs and colors and odors and tastes with spiritual dimensions.

However, Johann Gischtel and the other theosophists that had a similar kind of outlook in relation to Sophia and erotic relations with Sophia in imaginal prayer still often regarded actual physical sensual relations, even within the context of marriage, as much less preferable. Somehow there's still a bias and perhaps a result of entrenched views regarding sexuality and the so-called battle against the flesh, which is such an entrenched notion in both Western and Eastern thought. It goes back to Plato, probably even before that, and is reflected in monotheistic traditions.

But it's striking to listen to that as a kind of imaginal meditation instruction, similar to what we've been talking about.

What comes to mind is a piece of writing by Thomas Merton, the Trappist monk who died, I think, in 1968. Beautiful, beautiful writer, beautiful person. He has a really gorgeous piece called, I think it's called "Hagia Sophia," if you've ever come across it. He describes waking up in a hospital bed with a nurse there by his bedside. He opens his eyes and sees this nurse and sees in her face and in her manner and the tenderness of her ministrations—he sees Sophia. He perceives her theophanically. Something very beautiful there, and he weaves a beautiful piece of writing around that.

I wonder how much that perception there was a result, again, of the personal evolution of his practice. I don't know enough about where he came from. He certainly was living as a celibate monk, a Trappist monk, very strict order at that time. I'm told that he had, or I heard somewhere, that he did in fact end up having some kind of presumably unconsummated relationship or friendship with a nurse. I'm just wondering, again, what the play there was of imaginal theophanic perception tied into a beautiful, mystical, multidimensional theology and conceptual framework and vision, and then actually allowed to permeate the human relations and still open to that multidimensionality. I don't know.

In Christian Gnostic traditions, and I'm aware there's a lot of...

In Christian Gnostic traditions—and I'm aware there's considerable confusion around what the word "Gnosticism" actually means and whether it even refers to anything coherent—there's a text called The Greater Questions of Mary. Here it describes Jesus in the presence of Mary, who is probably Mary Magdalene, producing a woman from his side, beginning to have intercourse with her, and partaking of his emission—meaning that he ate his ejaculate, his semen—partaking of his emission to show that "thus we must do that we may live." Thus we must do that we may live.

This presents a very striking depiction. You'll notice how heteronormative the bias is in these historic texts—that bias is reflected in the text and its depictions. But one wonders about this image in The Greater Questions: is this talking about an imaginal practice, that one does this imaginally? Is it talking about an actual practice? You can't actually produce a woman from your side, but perhaps it means actually having sex and actually partaking and eating of the sexual fluids. Apparently certain sects—I think one was called the Barbarites—actually did this as part of their religious practice and ritual.

So is it an imaginal practice it's referring to? An actual practice? Or is it simply metaphorical and representational—a reference to semen? Because in many Gnostic texts, apparently, the divine element in humans that must be gathered during the process of salvation was metaphorically called semen. So perhaps these images—Jesus and the woman, the intercourse and the semen—are all just symbolic metaphors.

What is it: imaginal practice, actual practice, or metaphor? Throughout history, people have interpreted it very differently.

Similarly in Buddhist Tantra, the opening lines of the Guhyasamāja Tantra—which is the root tantra, the most important tantra for many Tibetan Buddhists, particularly for the Gelug tradition of the Dalai Lama—begins like this. I've heard that most tantras, or at least many tantras, start with the same opening line: Evaṃ mayā śrutam—"Thus have I heard."

This phrase can actually mean many different things. As I mentioned before, it has to do with the way Sanskrit can fit words together, creating multiple permutations of possible meaning. I would say this plurality of possible meanings implicit in the Sanskrit constructions is intended. It invites the reader into a kind of poetic participation with the text, an exploration that implies a practice—a meditative encounter with the text that must include a flexibility of imagination, view, and conceptual constructs.

This isn't just a text you read for information. It's multifaceted, and you enter into such a text with these multiple meanings as a kind of offering of different meditative stances. A door opens to different meditative possibilities—imaginal and conceptual possibilities embedded in the very polysemous nature of the language.

This intrinsically ambiguous or polysemic articulation supports not just a poetic and practical approach and an openness of interpretability. It also supports a whole conception and view of the image—or of any perception of reality—as multi-leveled, not singular, possessing many faces all at once, none of which exist independently of the mind. They are instead elicited or activated by the way of looking or interpreting reality that the mind has in that moment in relationship with the image.

There are parallels here with Tantric and Vajrayana language in the tantras, with what we're discussing regarding imaginal practices, and as I've mentioned before, with Kabbalistic teachings regarding the Bible and other sacred texts.

But returning to that Sanskrit opening line: "Thus have I heard. On one occasion, the Blessed One was dwelling in..."—now you could translate it as "in the vaginas of the diamond maidens of the mind of all Tathāgatas." At one time the Blessed One was dwelling in the vaginas of the diamond maidens, in or of the heart essence of the body, speech, and mind of all Tathāgatas.

That word I'm translating as vagina—bhaga—which is indeed often translated as vagina, also has many possible meanings. It can mean vagina, but it can also mean enjoyment, happiness, or prosperity. It can mean place or inheritance. It can also mean love and sexual passion. So it's a multifaceted word.

It's an interesting choice of word, especially together with all the tantric symbolism. Now you get commentaries on the tantras, on this kind of sentence, which assign each word different levels of meaning. They would say that bhaga really refers to the clear light mind, or emptiness, or various other things. So the Buddha was residing in the clear light of emptiness, and each word would have different levels of meaning.

But again, we're left with this question: what actually is Buddhist tantrism getting at with its sexual symbology and references and language? Like we discussed regarding the iconography of the yab-yum, the sexual union of Buddha and his consort—is it just symbolic? That's one option: that the eros depicted, the sexuality, the sexual fluids or organs or energy that are referred to, are simply symbols.

So that, for example, the yab-yum, the sexual union of the Buddha and the consort, is just the union of wisdom and means that we talked about before, and it's only a symbol. So you get commentators who insist on that: this has nothing to do with sexuality, nothing to do with that. It's purely a symbol for spiritual orientations or realities or unions.

But one possibility is: is it symbolic, or perhaps only symbolic? Another possibility is that sexuality and sexual energy are regarded in Tantra, or used in Tantra, as a vehicle that's purely practical—as a means, an expedient means. It's just because it's a powerful energy which, when gathered and channeled in the body and in the energy body, can give rise to great bliss and actually shift consciousness.

This is, again, a very common presentation of the tantric relationship or view of sexuality, sexual energy, sexual fluids—that you're gathering a certain very powerful energy. Because sexuality is regarded as the most powerful energy that a human being has or is subject to, it's powerful enough that if it's gathered in a certain way, channeled in a certain way, preserved in a certain way, and then channeled, it can bring this bliss and a shift in consciousness.

Now, for some, actually, it's just about the bliss, in the kind of pop versions. A shift in consciousness is possible that will enable one's consciousness to open to emptiness or clear light without having to do a lot of other practices which are harder and take longer to develop.

But this is a second possibility: that the tantric perspective and relationship with sexuality and sexual energy is really just as a vehicle. And if it was another energy in human beings, or that human beings were subject to, that was more powerful and was more expedient—I don't know what that would be, eating chocolate or whatever—then they would just use that instead. So there's nothing about sexuality per se that's interesting, other than it's just a vehicle, it's just a means of getting from A to B that's kind of turbocharged.

Or is the tantric view and relationship and conception of and regard of sexuality and eros actually attempting a re-sanctification, a re-enchanting, a divinizing—perhaps a kind of transubstantiation, but certainly a re-sanctification, a re-enchanting, a divinizing—of what was often seen before that as not holy, not sacred? A re-sanctification of sexuality, which was regarded as a defilement.

So: symbol only of something spiritual, a vehicle, or a re-sanctification of sexuality itself, a re-inclusion of sexuality itself in itself. With the vehicle, it's not that sexuality is itself holy, because it's just an expedient means. It could be replaced by anything. But in the third option, it's actually that sexuality itself is being re-sanctified.

People have very different interpretations of tantric texts and teachings. Or is it all three? That it is symbolic, that it has this multi-dimensional, multi-leveled resonances and reflections, sexuality, eros, sexual imagery—that yes, certainly it could be a re-sanctification and also a vehicle.

For us, at least for how we are thinking of it, I would say it's all three. It does have this multi-leveled, multi-dimensionality to it of symbology, of what the image reflects, what the eros, how it's mirrored. And it is most certainly a re-sanctification. I would like to see it that way. There's a widening, a deepening, an extending of what is regarded as sacred, a re-enchanting of the cosmos, and very much part of that is the view and the relationship of sexuality—and not just in a one-dimensional human way as expressing love and our right to pleasure.

And as a vehicle, except that for us, the vehicle is not so much about the energy. I mean, that's fine, and I would actually say there's more possibilities there with the energetics, because you can take any opening of the energy body in a number of different directions if you know how to navigate it. But primarily, the vehicle for us is as a vehicle of soul-making, because the eros and the sexual imagery and the erotic imaginal actually impregnate the imagery, give it dimensionality, and open up that soul-making, and open up the divinizing, the perception of dimensionality and divinity. So it's a vehicle in that sense, but it's a vehicle for the imaginal and the soul-making.

But in all this, you can see in these examples I've been given from the Christian tradition and the Jewish tradition and the Buddhist Tantra tradition, that sexuality is implicated in and reflects and affects the perception of cosmos, world and divinity. So there's a kind of mirroring here. We've talked about this in these different examples. The human sexual reflects, mirrors, expresses, manifests, affects the cosmos, the world, and the divine.

I remember an image. I shared one very small part of this image a few talks ago. It was where the beautiful woman took my hands and placed them in the prayer posture and then mirrored that with our fingertips touching, and drew my attention to our relationship rather than what part of me wanted to get caught up in some larger political issue.

Following on from that, what happened in that image is, at one point, I take the sun out of my heart. The sun feels like it's right at my heart center, in the center of my chest is this really radiant, bright sun, and I take it out of my heart center to give it to her. It feels like I want to do that as an offering of love, and it seems natural to the image. It seems so at first, but then I become unsure in two respects.

One is, I'm unsure if I'm making this up, if—I think, where did I get this from? Is it that I maybe was looking at some alchemical text briefly and I've just forgotten about it?

I certainly didn't recall ever seeing anything like that, but I somehow became suspicious that it was just some idea I got from something—alchemy or Jung or something or other.

And secondly, it just felt like it wasn't the right thing to do.

Regarding the first suspicion or hesitation, I would make this point now—this was a few years ago, but now it seems clear to me that it absolutely doesn't matter if that idea or gesture or movement was stimulated or seeded by something I had read before somewhere in some text, or something I had flicked through or seen a picture of. It does not matter. That doesn't make it unauthentic. What matters is the soul-making.

Whether the idea came from previous exposure to similar imagery—people sometimes will be more impressed if I really hadn't seen anything like that before, and then later found it in an alchemical text. This is the sort of thing Jung would do quite often, pointing to the reality of universal archetypes. For me, it doesn't matter. What matters is the soul-making. And there's an acknowledgment that this soul-making can be fed, sometimes mysteriously so, by anything at all—by ideation, by reading, by hearing teachings, by dreams, by whatever it is.

More important was the second objection. It just felt somehow, as I did it, that actually this was not the right thing to do. And more important was that the sun stayed in my heart. That was part of preserving the polarity, in fact. Because later, she seems to have the moon in her heart center. And this gave another dimension to the polarity. There's the sun in my heart center and the moon in hers.

And there's this attraction between sun and moon, and polarity there between sun and moon, but also a kind of balance. And all that is mirrored somehow in our erotic, imaginal relating—the attraction, the polarity, and the balance. In that, it seemed like this attraction, balance, and polarity had what I would now call cosmopoetic overtones. And again, later this spilled out into the world in terms of the cosmopoiesis.

So this image stayed for a few days. It would come back in different meditations, or I would bring it back, but oftentimes it would just return of its own accord. It became more involved erotically, with some sexual imagery. And I remember at that time, I could feel my mind trying to grasp intellectually what was going on. What does this mean? What does this sun and what does this moon represent? I was trying to fix this or that meaning.

But letting go of that a little and more getting an intuitive, vague and subtle sense of this sun and moon and this polarity and this balance—it was reflecting something cosmic. It was reflecting a kind of cosmic harmony or relationship, or a part, a dimension if you like, of some kind of cosmic harmony. And that harmony and relationship existed already as a perception.

So it wasn't that this was saying something about me and my psychological balance—balancing sun and moon and masculine and feminine and all that. I was trying to make it mean something like that, but just relaxing a little bit and actually getting a sense that this is something beyond just the personal. It was already existing as a kind of cosmic balance that was already present to be realized and appreciated, rather than telling me something about what I needed to do to rebalance myself or something like that. That was the sense of it.

And also in that sense, in that kind of cosmic, multi-dimensional, multi-level mirroring, there was a sense of the cosmos not being separate from me, not being separate from my imagination. So again, something in the erotic imaginal, mirroring and reflecting something, a level of the cosmos, of the divine.

And we can say there's a kind of alchemy, there's a kind of magic going on there, but it's in the perception, in the sense of the world and of the human being. That's the kind of alchemy and magic that we're interested in.

And again, there's another text, a Hermetic text called the Asclepius, a very old text, and it describes or states that the act of sexual union between two lovers is a divine mystery. That sex itself is a divine mystery. Not only, it says, because it's an image, it's a mirroring of the productivity and the androgynous unity of God—that means the transgender or bigender, hermaphroditic nature of God being neither male nor female, both and neither.

Again, actually, in this text, there's still a sort of heteronormative bias there, a normalizing bias of heterosexual orientations. But this is hopefully a progress in history where the logos, the ideation, the image of what sexuality can be might hopefully be growing.

But the act of sexual union in this text is a divine mystery, not just because it's an image of the productivity and the androgynous unity of God, but also because it is actually possible for both of the lovers to experience that original androgyny. In other words, to experience another dimension, if you like, of their being, but also of God's being, of the divine being.

That hermetic text, the Gospel of Philip, also says that the act of sexual union mirrors the union of the human being with the divine. So there's all kinds of mirroring going on. You get this sense in a lot of these traditions and texts—something emerging that points to a multi-level, multi-dimensional, multi-faceted mirroring, echoing, reflecting interconnectedness, inner and outer. It's all interconnected, mirroring, influencing each other.

This word "participation"... There's a mutual participation that's multi-leveled and multi-dimensional. This citta, this mind and heart, this soul, this body—it participates in the soul, if you like, the body of the cosmos and of the divine. Participation. This citta, your citta, my soul, my body, your body—participating and mirroring, influencing, completely connected: the inner and the outer, the personal and the universal, the human and the divine, the material and the spiritual.

But this is a way of looking. It's an invitation to a way of looking, rather than—as I'm sure it can sound—some very abstract and very strange idea. It's an invitation to a way of looking. We can make this a reality. In a sense, you make it, you open to it as an experience by entertaining certain ways of looking through the imaginal perception, through the attitude, through the heartfulness, through the soul-making looking, soul-making sensing. It becomes actually lived and actually materialized—the spiritualization of matter, the materialization of spirit.

Apparently in many, I think, medieval Jewish prayer books, there was an Aramaic formula that preceded certain prayers, or many of the prayers, and some or all of the ritual commandments, what's called the mitzvot, in the prayer book. And it said something like: "This liturgy is performed," or "this or that is performed for the sake of the union of the Holy One, blessed be He, with His Shekhinah, with the Divine Presence or the Immanence." So this prayer that I'm going to say now, this ritual that I'm going to do—whatever it is, washing my hands or eating bread or drinking wine or whatever—this is performed for the sake of the union of the Holy One with his divine immanence, his immanence.

So again, this marrying of the levels, the transcendent and the immanent. Erotic imagery, erotic language running through these different traditions and emphasizing again and again the multi-leveled, multi-faceted, multi-reflecting nature of all this.

One wonders, historically—and I don't know enough about it—what that then was taken to imply by different people at different times and different places in history and these different traditions. What was that taken to imply for the nature and the place of human eros and sexuality? And what was it taken to imply for the meaningfulness—all this erotic sexual description of the divine realms, and the meaning of prayer and what that does, and other rituals and actions, reflecting, influencing, etc.? What was that taken to mean regarding the meaningfulness, the nature, the place of human eros in sexuality?

It seems to me—and again I'm really not a historian—that there was a lot of tension in that question and a lot of ambivalence historically around what it actually meant or implied for actual human sexual relations.

But even that aside, all this is really quite different, I think, from the way we're used to thinking of things in this era of modernism and secular modernism and humanism, secular humanism.

I was raised in London and had an Orthodox Jewish upbringing, very strict, and had to follow all these rules and rituals—you can't do this on the Sabbath, and you have to do this, and you have to wear that, and you can't do that—a lot of rules. But the whole explanation of it that I was given in that Jewish education, in my family and at school, it was all very literal and all actually very one-dimensional, in fact.

And so there was a lot of fear as a young child—a fear of breaking these rules and these commandments and God being angry and punishing you and all this kind of stuff. And it was enforced both at the school and in my family home. And it seemed to me at some point—I really rebelled against it—that there was just a lot of i's being dotted and t's being crossed. A lot of very particular attention to details that seemed—I didn't have the language perhaps at the time—just seemed to be lacking a whole level, amplitude, dimensionality of meaning and resonance there. It was just this kind of literal one-dimensional fulfilling of certain commandments. A lot of them seemed completely bizarre.

And just as soon as I hit my teenage years, I think, pretty soon, I became an atheist. And just the whole thing didn't... just seemed stupid to me. And I was a sort of secret atheist, and then a much less secret one. Interestingly, an atheist is also just in the grip of a very literalist view. There's a literalist view of all these...

What's called the mitzvot—the commandments, the rituals. And there's a literalist view of how silly they are. It's taking the whole thing—the sense of divinity and the sense of the rituals and what they're for—and both sides are just literalisms arguing with each other.

Compare that with the more Kabbalistic or mystical kind of relationship, the participatory understanding of these rules and ritual elements in Judaism. I'm going to paraphrase a writer called Daniel Matt who writes about Jewish mysticism, though I could have picked quite a few other writers. This is quite a minority view within the Jewish religion, but it's reflective of certain strands of mysticism within that tradition.

Kabbalah, he says, constructs its mythical realm out of the elements of Jewish law. In other words, here are the elements of Jewish law—these rules and rituals that one is told simply come down to one, some of them seeming pretty bizarre. Rather, what the Kabbalah does is this spiritual genius of approaching something that's given and finding, creating, and discovering whole other dimensions of meaningfulness, invigorating it with life in a participatory way.

So Kabbalah constructs this mythical realm out of the elements of Jewish law. The commands of the ruler of the world become instead sacraments and mystery rites that simultaneously reflect and influence the pulsating life of the universe. Sacraments and mystery rites that simultaneously reflect and influence the pulsating life of the universe. The code of law becomes a secret code. Judaism is transformed into a mystery religion. Symbolic and magical aspects of the mitzvot, the ritual commandments, are alternately emphasized. Symbolic and magical, alternately emphasized.

The mystic integrates into the pattern of the cosmos and stimulates the flow of divine emanation. Integrates into the pattern of the cosmos and stimulates the flow of emanation. The ritual act represents the divine and calls it forth. Represents the divine and calls it forth.

Not a rationalization of these laws in earthly terms—for example, you can only eat this because it's actually better for your health, or you can't eat that because it's not good for you. The Kabbalists expand the dimensions. It's not just rational and earthly now. The human actor is now a protagonist in the cosmic drama. The mitzvot are literally the essence of life, according to the Kabbalist Joseph Kikatila—his life and God's life. They are not reducible to autonomous reason, not just practical, humanistic reasons. Nor are they simply imposed heteronomously—a separate God just saying, "You better do this. Watch out if you don't."

As extensions of the divine qualities, they—the commandments, the mitzvot, the ritual acts—permeate the universe and constitute its fabric. What a different view that is, and the beauty, the fullness, the multidimensionality of that creative engagement with this received tradition, giving it whole other dimensions of life, whole other dimensions of beauty.

This is different than a view of ritual that says if we don't do X ritual, the sun won't rise tomorrow—which is clearly not true and quite provably not true. So it's not that kind of literalism, and it's neither the literalism of the one-dimensional child's view of ritual nor the simplistic atheist kind of literalism.

How do we conceive? How do we look at the elements that we are given? How do we look at life, action, our human being, divinity? How do we conceive of these in ways that are soul-making, in the broadest possible range and depth?

In the Zohar—and these Kabbalistic texts, the Zohar being an ancient Kabbalistic text from the early Middle Ages, I think the twelfth century—again, this understanding is offered that the purpose of practice, spiritual practice, religious practice, is to mirror and affect the divine. The purpose is to mirror and affect the divine.

In the Zohar, it says: In every commandment, in every mitzvah, your effort is to unite the Blessed Holy One and His Shekhinah. So this transcendent aspect of divinity with the immanence, with the divinity that permeates the world. In every ritual action, your effort is to unite the Blessed Holy One and His Shekhinah, this divine immanence.

So that mystical understanding and enactment of the commandments, of the mitzvot—in our language we say mystical understanding...

And in the language of our tradition, we could say that the conceptual frameworks and the ways of looking we entertain, we skillfully use in our life and in our meditation practice, open up perceptions. And also our action and our embodiment in the world, when they are engaged with the world seen as divine, as a divine creation, with that sense of devotion and with that sense of participation.

In the words of the Zohar, they serve to "light up the queen." The queen is this divine immanence, the Shekhinah, this feminine aspect of God. "Light up the queen to strip her of the dark clothes of literalness. Strip her of the dark clothes of literalness and adorn her with garments of shining colors of the mysteries of Torah."

Torah is a Jewish word, but we could say: strip her, strip the world of the dark clothes of literalness, and adorn her with garments of shining colors of the mysteries of the mandala, of the mysteries of the Buddha's kāyavākcittaḥ—body, speech and mind. The mysteries of the Buddha nature.

It's a similar principle through the engagement of the erotic imaginal—a whole different way of entering into and relating to and conceiving of and practicing whatever it is: meditation, prayer, action in the world, embodiment, speech. All the beauty of that, the poetry of that impregnating it with this soul-making potential, seed, life.

So in this view, in this opening, in this soul-making perspective, the cosmos is erotic and divine. And the eros is divine. And we are implicated in that divine erotic cosmos, divine cosmic eros. We are implicated in that. We reflect that. We echo it. It echoes us. We express it. We manifest it. We are involved. We are called upon and we are necessary in and through our perception, our imaginal perception, our practice, our meditative perception, our ways of looking. In and through our perception and in and through our actions.

So again, this is not a naive belief in the power of ritual or magic in some very naive way, if there are even such people anymore who believe that—I'm sure there are. Not so much that, as an alchemy of perception, an alchemy of the perception of the cosmos and of the human being. So it's not just intrapsychic psychology we're dealing with here. There's something about this inseminating and fueling and firing up an alchemical process that involves our whole perception of ourselves, of each other, and of the whole cosmos. So in and through perception and in and through action.

And that can include our erotics and our sexual acts, our actual sexual participation. So in other words, if we're including our action in this, then we can include the sexual actions as well, potentially. Not only symbol—they can be seen in this way too, in this larger soul-making way too.

Eros, whether it's in the meditation, in the imaginal perception, in the way we're relating to the senses and the way we move and act and embody in the world, whether it's actually in our sexual relations—the eros is, as we've been saying all along, it brings with it the possibility of stimulating and increasing the soul-making and expanding, enriching, deepening the sense of the sacred.

There is then the tikkun ha'olam, the healing of the world in the perception. In the perception. So we have this kind of place in the cosmos then. And our perception, our thoughts, our vision, our ideation, our speech and action, our embodiment, our sexuality—all have a kind of multi-leveled function. And we have a place where integrated then is not necessarily the heavy kind of responsibility. It's actually quite light because we see it's all empty. This is not a realist view. We're seeing image as image.

But if we can find the way into this through the practice and through that opening up the logos and the imaginal perception and the whole ways of looking, then in the very non-realism of it and through that and through all that opening up, the world can be sacralized. It's re-sacralized. The world is sacralized and becomes infinitely revealing. The world is a world of infinite revelation. There's no end to the revelation in the world that the world is—revelation of soul, of divinity, of Buddha nature.

And the world, through these practices and ways of conceiving and entering, the world is sacralized and becomes potentially infinitely revealing through our perception and through our embodiment, including sexual.

It's sacralized. It's re-sacralized. The world becomes sacralized and infinitely revealing. The world is a world of infinite revelation. There's no end to the revelation in the world that the world is—revelation of soul, of divinity, of Buddha nature. And the world, through these practices and ways of conceiving and entering, the world is sacralized and becomes potentially infinitely revealing through our perception and through our embodiment, including sexual embodiment.

This is very different than an objectified world. Sacralized, infinitely deep, infinitely opening, infinitely revealing, rather than just one-dimensional objects and the objectification of that. What is the difference in the embodiment there—the erotic embodiment of the pilgrim versus the tourist or the vacationer, as we've said many times now? This sacralization and this infinite revelation happens through the eros. How central that is, the eros.

One last thing. In all of this—in the creation of the divine, in the healing of the divine, in the creation of the Buddha nature, which is implicit in what we've been presenting, in the creation and discovery of the imaginal dimensions of the self, aspects of the self, of the other, of the world—in the erotic moving towards, the erotic movement towards what is beyond, what is not yet quite known, the moving towards the angel out ahead, in Corbin's words, either never quite reaching it because the angel is always out ahead and keeps moving on itself, or never remaining at least in union with the angel or what is beyond.

In all this, there's a kind of infinite movement, or infinite potential of movement, potentially infinite movement, as we've talked about with the eros-psyche-logos dynamic. There's telos here, there's moving towards, but that's open-ended.

What I want to draw attention to now is the fact that all of this—this creation of divinity, this creation of self, other, world, this moving, the eros moving towards, beyond, to the not yet known, always this infinite movement—it implies the dynamism of becoming. It implies time. In this movement, time, growth, if you like, telos, the dynamism of becoming, temporal becoming, is seen to be holy. It's bhava. It's becoming. But it's not realist.

And at the same time, there is also the timelessness here. There's also the dimension of timelessness, of eternity, that we know, as I've pointed out, in the iconic nature of the imaginal—that we feel that timelessness, that eternal quality—as well as in the unfabricated, that which is beyond time. So something in all this gives a sanctity and a place and an importance and a holiness to both the dynamism of becoming and the temporal, and to the timeless and the eternity.

If we go back to that line from Gregory of Nyssa: "For the thirst of human souls requires some infinite water. How could this limited world suffice?" How could this limited world suffice?

So yes, beyond the world, beyond the limited world, beyond the limited world into the transcendent, into the unfabricated, beyond the senses, beyond perception, beyond experience, beyond space, beyond time. Yes, know that. And all the levels going up to that of different kinds of oneness, the eros for the transcendent—the thirst of human souls requires some infinite water. Yes, the transcendent. But yes, also the world sacralized. Why? Because, as I said, it's potentially infinite in its revelations, infinitely revealing, infinitely opening. Through the eros, this limited world becomes an unlimited world. Or in the form of limitation, infinite depths are revealed.

So both the transcendent—away from the world—and the world too, but the world reviewed, seen through the heart of soul-making. Both those directions provide us with infinite water. And we can actually move in both of those. We can drink from both of those streams. And in a way, this is what will be a natural movement if eros is allowed to do its thing, as we've said.

CHAPTER 80

Refractions: Of Body, Sensuality, and Sexuality (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h33

> In this opening talk from the Eros Unfettered series, Rob Burbea challenges conventional Buddhist attitudes toward body, sensuality, and sexuality. He examines how different meditation styles—from Mahasi noting practice to non-doing approaches—can limit erotic engagement with sense experience by reducing it to bare attention or seeking oneness. Burbea argues that both transcendentalist rejection of the senses and reductive materialism miss the soul-making potential inherent in sensual beauty.
>
> Drawing on early Buddhist teachings while critiquing their limitations, he explores how the Buddha's strong warnings against sense pleasures in suttas like the Nagaravindeyya Sutta (MN 22) have created confusion in modern Dharma. The talk introduces a third way: allowing eros, psyche, and logos to work together in fabricating richer, more dimensional relationships with sensuality that neither chase craving nor dismiss the body's spiritual significance.
> Burbea connects beauty, fabrication, and the sacred, suggesting that acknowledging the constructed nature of aesthetic experience doesn't diminish its value but opens new possibilities for practice. This perspective has implications not only for meditation but for art, nature, and environmental consciousness, inviting practitioners to participate more fully in the multi-leveled dimensions of existence.

I'd like to say just a little bit more about our relationships with and our views, conceptions of and our experiences of body, sensuality and sexuality, in the service of opening up the discourse, opening up the questioning, opening up the exploration, and opening up, hopefully, some avenues there.

Before I get immediately onto that, I want to say something else that's related. The reason I want to say it is because it's so easy to listen or read teachings and approach them from within a certain set of fixed assumptions. Sometimes we're not even fully conscious what those assumptions are. Or we may be conscious, but they still go unchallenged—they're not really questioned.

Eros, we have said already many times, may be sexual or non-sexual. It can be very, very subtle, extremely subtle, and it can be very, very intense. Whether it's sexual or not sexual, the eros can have that whole range of force or depth—subtle to intense—and can be what some people would regard as extreme. The eros running in a certain direction in a person's life can seem to others quite extreme. Their devotion to their beloved, whatever that beloved is; the devotion of an artist to their art and the dedication that takes; the devotion, the eros towards a lover when one is in love; or a religious eros, the devotion to the religious beloved, whatever form that takes—all of this can seem extreme, obsessive, ruthless even, out of balance.

Easily, when the eros is very strong and can seem, from a certain perspective, to be extreme, it's easily pathologized by others. When the eros is towards, for example, the transcendent—someone wanting to know the unfabricated and, in some cases, staking one's life on it as the Buddha did—this kind of eros, from many perspectives, particularly from most modernist perspectives of our culture and non-religious culture, seems very easily pathologized as some kind of crazy thing. What you're wanting sounds like nothing for a start. It sounds very abstract and seems to be away from life.

From the other perspective—a more renunciate perspective of certain religious traditions—the eros towards a human being when one is in love is also pathologized. This is delusion, this is crazy, or the eros towards the world.

This pathologization, pointing the finger and regarding others as pathological because we don't share their erotic attraction, and certainly not the intensity of that, happens very easily, either way, in either direction, from either camp, if you like.

What happens there so often is that in contrast to this sort of extremity or intensity of the erotic movement and opening, moderation is elevated. Moderate in all things, and this is regarded as healthy. Anything immoderate or extreme is regarded as pathologized. That may have its place sometimes and may have a certain wisdom to it, but what are the consequences of moderation being elevated? How easily moderation can breed a kind of mediocrity in terms of what opens to us, what we can discover, what we can create. Remember, discovering and creating is the movement of soul-making—mediocrity in terms of what soul-making is then available to us and opens for us as one of the potentially negative consequences of this elevation of moderation.

Why shouldn't one be extreme in one's eros for the transcendent? Why shouldn't one burn with an intensity for knowing the unfabricated, for knowing the divine or the deathless, the divine beyond all concepts, the deathless beyond all concepts, beyond space, beyond time? Certainly, as I just said, the Buddha was extreme in his desire for that, or in regard to any kind of religious erotic movement or desire or longing or calling, yearning.

For example, someone who wants to become a celibate monastic or is a celibate monastic—for so many people, for some people who don't share that, who can't really resonate with that longing, it seems like such a strange movement. It's true that one may be desiring to be a celibate or a monastic or to go beyond the world to know the unfabricated out of fear, out of some kind of closing rather than the opening movement of eros. It's certainly true.

But I mentioned Thomas Merton the other day. He's this beautiful writer and he has an autobiography of a period in his life, I think up to the time he became a monk, a Trappist monk. At that time, the Trappists were an extremely strict order. Their rule was very strict. Not only were they, of course, celibate, but I think they couldn't actually speak, so they had to communicate when necessary about only very necessary things in sign language. It was known as one of the two or three most strict of the monastic Catholic orders.

He describes in this book, Seven Storey Mountain, his partial autobiography, the growing longing in him, an inclination to become a monk and to give himself to that life. He visits monasteries and talks with spiritual advisors and priests, and oftentimes the priest didn't share that extreme longing and regarded it as a bit too extreme. But at one point, I think with one of his spiritual advisors or a priest, he says, "Father, I want to give God everything. I want to give God everything." Because the priest was asking, why can't you choose a kind of easier order to go into, less extreme, less renunciate, less hardcore and full on. He said, "Father, I want to give God everything."

So easily that view is just not resonated with, not understood and regarded as pathological.

I also remember for myself when I was living as a musician in the US and I was in a PhD program in composition and teaching at the university there, I made the choice to give that life up and the plan was to ordain as a monk after doing a year retreat at Gaia House. People asked me or I met people and they would ask me...

What are you doing? And this and that. And I would explain, well, this is what my plan is. And in quite a lot of cases, the person I was talking to, their face would drop, their jaw would drop, and a look of horror and disgust would come over their face in reaction to this idea of living as a monk or dedicating oneself to a celibate life and renunciate life away from sense pleasures, devoted to some kind of—what, as I said, probably seemed like just some abstract longing and life of loneliness and all this, who knows what they were thinking.

But this view comes out of not understanding, just not resonating, not having that—the soul aflame in that direction, in the direction of what we might call the religious, knowing God, whether it's the unfabricated or other directions of religiosity. The eros there is limited when people pathologize that or judge it as extreme, that kind of desire. Their eros in that direction is just very limited and therefore they don't value—they can't see any value in that.

And so often, as I said before, what happens is we prioritize something called balance and something called psychological health. First of all, we have very limited views, very socially constructed views of what balance looks like and what something called psychological health looks like—views that we've gathered from our contemporary society and worldview. So the limited views of something called balance and something called psychological health, which of course are related, and sometimes these almost become ends in themselves. I'm practicing my meditation for psychological health. Not that that's not important, but does it always need to be limited to a view that puts that first and sees that as the end or the only legitimate end?

And we've talked about balance before and actually the importance in navigating, but sometimes we prioritize—I feel sometimes we over-prioritize this idea of balance and being balanced. And we have either a static picture of what balance is, or we've just elevated the whole ideal of balance. Maybe there's a place and times for being really not balanced. I am falling, I am climbing, I am out of balance as I run towards something, whatever it is, as I dance. Maybe I just fall, I stumble, and it's part of the erotic movement.

So we can very easily hear or meet someone, or even in the instances of our own eros, look at ourselves and see a kind of—what from certain perspectives looks too intense, is too extreme, this eros in whatever direction. And I said, what about balance? What about psychological health? And I don't want to dismiss that. So again, all teaching is contextual. So I'm responding, as I said, to what can become quite entrenched, often unconscious, but quite a lot of the time not quite fully questioned views. Well, what is it that I have this assumption? And is it really a necessary assumption? What's it based on?

This prioritizing of balance and psychological health, whatever those notions come to mean for us, in contrast with another approach, which would be a little bit in line with what we're saying—let the eros lead. What if we trust the eros and trust even the directions that it wants to go in so that it will make soul and forge ahead and open and penetrate and search and discover and burn through in the directions that it wants to? And if that's towards the transcendent, beautiful. How does it want to? Where does the eros want to move? And trusting that, and trusting that as we've been describing, at some point in that process, just because of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic and that mutual insemination, mutual fertilization, mutual widening and enriching, and how that will start moving out to touch everything else. The eros, the directionality of the eros and the directionality of the soul-making will spread.

So as I said, if one opens to the unfabricated, for instance, or even before one has opened, it starts spreading. Something happens. Why? If I don't dampen the eros, if I don't block the movements and the expansion of psyche and logos, it will do that. So another view is actually to trust that and trust being off balance at times and being extreme and people thinking you're weird and this and that.

There's a different kind of imbalance that comes when the eros is blocked or the psyche is blocked or the logos is blocked. Then, as I said before, some people entering the monastery or becoming deliberately celibate or whatever it is, or chasing some transcendent, unfabricated—because the eros is dampened, it's a movement of contraction, of fear of eros. And I'm afraid of sexuality, the body disgusts me, I'm afraid of human relationships, whatever it is. Or the logos is cramped. And this could be, as we said, in any direction.

Well, what about trusting eros and just opening the space for that soul-making dynamic to do its natural thing, which will be like water—it will find its direction, find its multiple directions where it can flow. Or like fire.

So this seems to me important just in the way we're hearing and viewing all this. But as I said, I just want to spend a little time talking a bit more about how eros and in its insemination, its ignition of the soul-making dynamic involving eros, psyche, logos, will affect the views, the relationships, and the experiences of body, sensuality, and sexuality.

So transforming, opening, giving dimensionality to all that. Because of what we said about the potential endlessness and open-endedness, and multi-directionality of the movement of the soul-making dynamic, these aspects of our existence—body, sense, sexuality, along with a lot of others—are potentially infinite. So the way the views can be transformed, the dimensionality given to them, the new openings of perception and view and sense and actual experience, what these things mean to us and the place they have, that is potentially infinitely openable.

In other words, wherever we are now, wherever I am now, there are some unforeseen insights, experiences, views, conceptions, openings, relationships with body, with sensuality, with sexuality, that I have no inkling what they are right now. It's unknown to me now. It's part of the beyond of the eros, of that whole soul-making movement. I just don't know.

So in this field of potentially infinite opening, you can only obviously say a little here, partly due to time and partly because of the fact that relative to infinity, whatever we say is only going to be a little.

Just before we even get into it, notice that even if we have a strong desire, a strong eros flowing through us for the unfabricated—I want to know that, I want to open to it, I want to taste it—in the traditions of Buddhadharma, in following that eros for the unfabricated, we do not, in the way of the Buddha Dharma, the way that the Buddha taught to know that, ignore or cut off or beat down the body and the senses. Absolutely not.

There is mindfulness of the body as the first foundation of mindfulness. It's absolutely integral to the Buddha's path—careful attention, particular kinds of attention, mindfulness of the body, to the body, and to sense experience. So there's attention to sense experience, mindfulness of body, and mindfulness and attention to sense experience.

In some traditions of Buddhadharma, more in the tantric traditions, also with regard to sexuality and sexual energy, it's regarded as a vehicle. This is actually something we do engage. We don't ignore it. We don't cut it off. We don't beat it down. We engage it as a vehicle because we can gather and collect those energies and channel them in certain ways in the energy body, and this allows certain openings of the perception—particularly in the tantric schools, an opening to the clear light mind.

But in all traditions, certainly in Pali Canon Buddhism, the emphasis is that you're not ignoring the body, you're not cutting it off, you're certainly not beating it down. There's mindfulness of the body and mindfulness, certain kinds of attention to the body and to the sense experiences.

However, this mindfulness to the body and to sense experience and the attention to them serves the understanding of the dependent arising, the fabrication of the perception of the body and of sense experience. In other words, it's not for a reveling in the body and sense experience and sense pleasure. It's not for a glorification of the body. It's not to see the beauty or even the miracle of the body and all that. It's actually, at least in my reading of Pali Canon Buddhism—why are we mindful of the body? Why are we mindful of sense experience? We're mindful in certain ways to understand the dependent arising of the very perception of body and sense experience. And wrapped up with the mindfulness, in a context of practicing ways of looking that actually fabricate less perception of the body.

For example, the jhanas, the progression of the jhanas, you could say, are what they really are: progressively unfabricated perceptions of the body. So the first four jhanas especially, it's really about the body and the perception of the body. The body is, rather than being perceived as this solid material structure, starts to be perceived as fine material form, what the Buddha calls fine material form. The body becomes rapture in the first jhana, becomes happiness in the second jhana, becomes exquisite peacefulness—tender, exquisite peacefulness—in the third jhana, becomes just stillness, still light often in the fourth jhana. Very, very refined perception of materiality.

And then in the fifth jhana, that perception of solidity and what the Buddha calls obstruction is unfabricated even more, is dissolved even more, is transcended even more. And there's no perception of solidity, materiality of body at all. One enters the fifth jhana, the jhana of infinite space. And then that too is refined through the remaining jhanas, all the way to beyond the eighth jhana to an experience of total unfabrication in the transcendent, in the deathless, in nirvana.

So one is moving there, one is using mindfulness and an understanding of fabrication, practicing different ways of looking, of which mindfulness is one. Actually, mindfulness is several. If you read the Satipatthana Sutta, it implies ways of looking. But what they have in common is that they fabricate less to different degrees, and through that we understand fabrication, but we're moving—the experience is moving beyond the body and beyond sense experience.

So what this means is, yes, absolutely not ignoring, not cutting off, not beating down the body and the senses, but we're using mindfulness and attention to body and senses for very specific purposes in a way to go beyond them to the unfabricated.

What that means, though, is that there's limited value given to both the body and sense experience. Limited value in that transcendental inclination of Pali Canon Buddhism, of the Buddha as he originally taught, to know the deathless, to know the unfabricated, to know that sphere, that dimension, where the eye ceases, the perception of forms ceases, as I quoted. There are many passages.

So all this means that, yes, we pay attention to body and senses, but they have limited value. And the stress is on not desiring...

And the stress is on not desiring for the body and not getting attached to the body and to the senses and to sense pleasures and experience. They therefore—body and sense experience—have limited place given to them in the construction of the path in Pali Canon Buddhism. Even though they might feature very centrally, they're actually given a place that is quite limited because it's just serving this other movement.

I would point out that there is a limited—if you like—view, interpretation, and therefore sense of and perception of both body and sense experience. The whole view and interpretation is construed within the framework of a transcendentalist path, and so that actually limits and constrains the very sense and perception we have of both body and sense experience. Because experience and perception of both will be limited by view and concept and interpretation.

So, for example, related to all that, in the first foundation of mindfulness there's a passage on contemplating what the Buddha calls the unclean parts of the body—liver and spleen and kidneys and bile and blood and pus and synovial fluid and all the rest of it. And again, in the Satipatthana Sutta, there in the foundations of mindfulness, there's the encouragement to contemplate the body as the elements of the body—the classical elements of earth, air, fire, water.

One way of understanding that—the simplest, kind of the less contorted, probably, way of understanding that—is at that time, conceiving in terms of elements was actually just like what we would consider now, conceiving in terms of atoms. Look at the body and consider it as just a group of atoms. There's probably calcium there in the bones and potassium and all the stuff that bodies are made of. So there's this view of the elements classically.

We can interpret it and take it in different directions which do different things. There's always a certain view, a certain spin will take the perception and open it in different directions. But one way is just to think of it—what the Buddha was getting at there was this was the view of materiality back then, that it was constructed of basic elements. And it's something similar to our kind of deconstruction. The intention was a kind of deconstruction then of the body. This thing that we tend to get attached to and think, "Wow, how wonderful," is just saying it's just the elements. It's just the elements. It's like us saying it's just a bunch of atoms—in the service of less attachment.

So there is wrapped up in... Actually, let's put it this way. Emerging from our heritage in Pali Canon Buddhism and the transcendentalist thrust there—that's not always acknowledged or realized or given emphasis or place in modern interpretations of the Dharma and teachings of the Dharma that still try to place the Pali Canon at their base—this causes all kinds of confusion and contradiction.

So one is in regard to the body, but also in terms of the senses. In the Majjhima Nikaya, in the snake simile in the middle-length discourses, the Buddha gives—he says sense pleasures, you know, don't go chasing them. So he's really reigning in the eros with regard to sense pleasure, certainly reigning in the craving, but it doesn't make the distinction with regard to eros. So it kind of all gets, as we've said, shoved in one basket, so to speak.

But he says sense pleasures are like fleshless bones. It's like throwing a bone with no flesh and just sort of blood-stained to a starving dog. It completely just gets the dog a little bit excited. The dog will gnaw and chase and chew on this bone, but it's not getting any satisfaction there. So the sense pleasures, the Buddha said, are like fleshless bones.

They're like carrying a flaming torch of straw. So imagine that—a collection of straw, and you're holding it, and it's a flame, and carrying that against the wind. And so what's going to happen there? Your hands are going to get burnt, your face is going to get burnt.

He continues: the sense pleasures are like a pit of burning coals, which you're dragged through. They're like borrowed goods. You might enjoy them, but they're temporary. You have to give them back.

He is even more extreme and more strong in his analogies. The sense pleasures are a slaughterhouse, he said, or like a butcher's block—the block of wood where a butcher will cut up the meat, the carcasses. They are like a stake of swords—those stakes sticking out of the ground with sharp ends where you're just going to get impaled.

They are like a snake's head. Yes, you get bitten and there's poison to the bite. These are really strong words - sense pleasures bring suffering and disappointment. Sense pleasures are perilous, he says.

It's very rare these days to encounter such extreme language or such a forceful thrust of teaching regarding sense pleasures, certainly in the insight meditation tradition and other Buddhist traditions I'm familiar with. I do know teachers who speak this way, though one I'm particularly thinking of does so quite tongue-in-cheek. But even among monastics, why is this approach so uncommon now?

Of course, some of you may know that Tantric texts in Tantric Buddhism actually reverse this teaching regarding sense pleasures - we may explore that more as we continue. But this teaching around sense pleasures in the Pali Canon, its current and tenor, strongly influences our present attitudes and views within the Dharma. Yet it actually results in quite a confused, unintegrated, and incoherent teaching in relation to sense experience and sense pleasure - and there are reasons for this, which we'll return to.

Especially regarding sexuality - sometimes it's actually avoided as a topic altogether in Buddhist teachings - there's this underlying attitude and view permeating the discourse, yet it's mixed with other attitudes and views that we can't quite reconcile. This applies certainly to sexuality, probably to all sense pleasures, and we could say more about romantic love as well, which we've touched on.

So there is this tenor, this voice, this thrust running through the teachings right from the early sources. And I think it has all kinds of consequences. Some people regard the Buddha Dharma, across different traditions, as quite misogynistic. You'll know that in the Theravada tradition there's been considerable controversy and heated debate in recent years around whether nuns can be fully ordained and have equal status to monks within Buddhism.

Quite rightly, I think, there's a case to be made that a kind of misogyny runs through Buddhism - through many Buddhist traditions, not just the Theravada. I've certainly heard stories from women, even teachers of mine, about being in monasteries as young women trying to practice meditation with dedication, only to have many monks treat them with disdain and disrespect. One teacher told me they basically looked at you like you had the plague, as if all they could see was someone distracting them from their path because you appeared to them as a temptress.

Again, you hear this fear and avoidance, this contraction of view and contraction of eros that we alluded to earlier. But I sometimes wonder if the misogyny actually has its root, at least partly, in something more fundamental - a stance of being anti-sensual eros. It's as if sensual eros, eros in relation to sense experience, has no place in certain communications of the teachings, in certain movements of practice.

There can be eros for the transcendent, and there can be eros for the Buddha to a certain extent, in terms of soul-making and imagery. But there's a cutting off, a dismissal, a refusal of place, and a fear of sensual eros - eros with regard to sensuality. And out of that, at an even more fundamental level, perhaps comes the fuel for misogyny. I don't know, but I wonder.

Because in some visions or images - even if a person doesn't think that imagery and fantasy operates for them regarding the path and awakening - it's almost as if the very vision, the fantasy itself, the image and concept of awakening is exactly a life without eros. That's what awakening looks like: the flame has gone out. There's certainly no eros toward sensuality or with regard to sensuality, and there's no eros even for the unfabricated or for any other kind of contemplative opening because that has been realized.

So there's this sense, this image, this fantasy of awakening as what it looks like: a life without eros.

I've touched on this before - oftentimes in teaching insight meditation, if one even mentions or gives instructions around what to do with sexual images or sexual energy that arises, it might be in the more generous and somewhat open traditions. The guidance is usually: "Just notice them, just allow them. That's okay." But implicitly: don't encourage them. For heaven's sake, don't encourage them. Sexual energy, sexual images - as we've said before - they are not...

They are not given any positive place on the path. They simply don't really fit. The only way they fit is in the sense of, well, they're just something else to be open to in a kind of attitude—which is relatively popular—of just being open to all things. They're just equal to anything else, and our job, like with anything else, is just to let them go. Let them come, let them go.

Underneath all that is this: it's better if they don't arise—at least less hassle if sexual images and sexual energy don't arise. But regarding that, and regarding sense pleasure, there's this—sometimes it seems to me, or has seemed to me, and I know that other people feel this way—it's hard. It's rare for them to actually be able to articulate it to themselves or to another. There's a kind of confusion, especially regarding sense pleasure, even more than sexuality. Or there's a kind of lack of coherence or integrity often in our thinking about this, in our view, in our conceptual framework.

So we might say, for instance, contrary to what the Buddha taught for the most part—we turn it a little bit upside down. We say very often to meditators: "Don't chase meditative pleasure. You might have a blissful sitting, but don't try and make it happen again. You might fall into a jhāna, but these are really things you want to be careful not to get attached to them, and don't try and repeat it," etc., etc., etc.

Whereas almost every day in both monasteries and retreat centers, extremely pleasant-tasting food is served. A lot of time and energy goes into preparing that for the retreatants, for the monastics. And if someone dedicated to the Dharma wants to share about, "Oh, I'm going to go skiing in such and such a place," or whatever it is, it raises no eyebrow—even if it's just, "Oh, that's going to be a pleasant sense experience. It's going to be fun and pleasant."

This is completely the opposite of what the Buddha would originally encourage, which is: "Yes, strive to attain jhāna, strive for that bliss. This is something worth striving for. Develop it, don't fear it." Whereas in relation to wanting sense pleasures—nice food, nice sights, sounds, etc.—he was very discouraging.

So there's something here. First, we've mixed up the emphases the Buddha placed on these two things—where we should actually strive for and put effort into, and where we shouldn't. But even more generally, there seems a kind of confusion in our minds and a lack of integrity—coherence is perhaps a better word.

If we're wanting to lessen our confusion, to increase or support a sense of more coherence, more making sense in terms of our vision and our concept of the whole path—what that really means for our life—because we can have a concept that makes sense, and then when it comes to our life, we're not actually really living it. We're talking about people who really love studying the Dharma and are involved in the practice, but actually, these things don't really hang together very coherently in terms of what the teachings say and what one might communicate with others and what makes sense, but then how one actually lives and the choices. There's a lack of coherence, a lack of integrity often for us there.

So if we want less confusion, if we want to support a making sense of the whole thing, integrating it into our life and feeling like we have integrity and there is coherence there, then this means getting clear about a few things. Or becoming more clear regarding quite a few pieces here.

But by clear, I don't primarily mean clear seeing, as in "I see clearly what's there," which implies a notion of reality. Maybe clear means, and getting clear and clearing means more like something like "clear a path"—clear a path for movement. And what movement? The movement of soul-making, the movement of eros, the movement of creation, discovery, etc., that we've been talking about.

So yes, there's some clear seeing in terms of distinctions and delineations, like we've talked about between eros and craving, for example. But more it's like: what's blocked for us? And when does that blocking not serve? So clearing a path, but also clarity of delineation.

Now, included in all that is being clear, delineating between the three or four possibilities that we already talked about—ways that the path and the vision of awakening and the concept of awakening construe our relationship with sense experience.

So, for example, just reviewing now, as we talked about: one very common view is that regarding sense experience, maybe sense pleasure, our job is to cut the papañca—cut the proliferation, cut the veil of images and thoughts and concepts around sense pleasure. Cut it, remove it, so that we can just meet experience "barely," "nakedly," "directly," etc. There's this myth, really, of bare attention—something the Buddha never talked about.

And then there's either this construct of being with what is, meeting the touch of life, meeting life, open to the touch of life, whatever it is. Or there's this kind of movement to a kind of atomistic reductionism: you cut papañca and you're just with the micro-moments of vedanā and perception and all the rest of it.

Both of these—either the myth of "what is" and the touch of life, or the atomistic reduction to perception, conception—both of them are realist, as we've said all this before. But that's the first group of views: cut papañca and practice bare attention to sense pleasure.

And then it's just a moment of pleasantness, and there's nothing else with that.

A second view has a broader and deeper meaning given within it to the word papancha. And the whole movement there is not to the touch of life and the atomistic reality, but rather beyond all that to the unfabricated, to the transcendent, beyond all sense experience. So here is sense pleasure, sense experience. Cutting papancha really means unfabricating. And for the sake of that transcendental thrust, the opening to the knowing of the realization of that sphere, that dimension where the eye ceases, where the ear ceases, where the perception of forms, the perception of sound ceases—that unfabricated, deathless realm we talked about.

In contrast to those two, a third construal or conceptual framework regarding the senses and their place on the path and in the vision of awakening contrasts papancha with what we might call psyche or image or fantasy—good terms in our vocabulary—with soul-making, basically. Papancha versus soul-making, erotic, imaginal engagement with the senses, or in the language of Tantra, with skillful fabrication, the fabrication in which Tantrism engages.

So there's a deliberate fabrication of perception, enrichment, if you like, of perception, a multi-dimensionalizing of perception. Eros, the imaginal soul-making, comes in to enrich, imbue, complexify, widen, deepen, and give dimensions to the perception of and relationship with the senses. Whereas the first two construals—cutting the papancha and being with bare attention, or cutting the papancha as the movement completely beyond the senses to the unfabricated—these do not allow that in those thrusts or those visions of what the path is. They do not allow the erotic imaginal and the soul-making with regard to the senses.

But with respect to all that, what we've been saying is, first of all, to acknowledge that soul-making already happens. No matter what view you have, it will come in one way or another to our path and to our relationship, our view of ourselves and all that.

What we need to do is acknowledge this—acknowledge the presence of eros, fantasy, and soul-making in our lives, in what we love, and if we love the path, that means in relation to the path and to awakening.

And acknowledging that and then delineating that, and delineating that by creating, as we've done, making these concepts and then seeing what that does and what opens up in terms of perception. And also being clear about what we talked about, the degrees of fabrication. So in other words, there's a place for this bare attention, a small place, and there's certainly a place for the whole spectrum of unfabricating, and there's a place for skillful fabricating, for beautiful fabricating, for soul-making fabricating. And there's also a place for the different directions of eros, towards the senses, towards the beyond the senses, the unfabricated.

So all of that, to me, creates more coherence, more sense, allows us to actually have more integrity with respect to all this, and for all that to be integrated more into a vision and a fantasy of the path and a relationship with sense experience, which we can't avoid. You can only transcend sense experience for certain periods of time in deep meditative practice. Otherwise we live in the world of sense experience. That's what the Buddha meant by the world—sense experience, as he says. That's his definition of the world.

So it seems important to open up a conception and a vision here that does justice to really how we're living for a start, but also to soul-making and to that, the movements of eros in the soul and the opening, the discovery of the sacred.

Now, if we're talking about eros, we're talking, as I mentioned, and soul-making, we're talking—eros implies soul-making, soul-making implies eros, and both of them imply a sense of beauty. And beauty and the senses, of course, go together. So sometimes we can, again, here, we can almost be a little simplistic or naive or unquestioning in our assumptions around what beauty is and what its place is or isn't and what it is when it's in the realm of the senses.

So eros implies beauty and a love of beauty and an attraction to beauty. And we've touched on this. What we love in regard to beauty and in regard to soul-making and that whole movement of eros, is the intimacy with beauty. We love the connection that's involved when the beloved other is beautiful to us and there's that soul-making. We love that. We love the sensitivity and the tuning. We've touched on all this.

But what actually is beauty? Now, I've actually written about that, so I don't want to go off on a whole big, too long tangent on all this. I'm not going to say too much about it. But actually, it strikes me as a really important question. What do we mean when we say beauty or we find something beautiful?

So this is an experience we have as human beings. Again, we can ignore it, we can try and put it in the dustbin or whatever, but we have the experience of beauty as human beings. Can we reduce beauty to just pleasantness? To me, they're just not equivalent. Pleasant sensation does not equate to beauty. And any time you feel touched by beauty or in awe of beauty, have a look, you know, look more carefully. Is this just about pleasant sense experience? A pleasant, even if it's art, is it just a pleasant arrangement of colours and proportions on a painting or of pleasant sounds and their temporal arrangement in a piece of music or whatever?

Is it really just about pleasantness? What's happening when we're really touched and moved and kind of opened by a sense of beauty? To me, it's a really interesting question, a really important question for us as human beings.

Is it that there's some kind of resonating going on between us or between the soul, in the soul, with what is beautiful, with the beloved other? Is it that this, whatever it is that I'm finding beautiful, is mirroring something in me? What's going on? Is it that I recognize something?

And if it is any of that, is there some kind of sense of belonging when there's beauty? Like I somehow feel like I belong to something, and I'm not even sure what that thing is. Maybe I don't have a sense of it, maybe it's just this sense of dimensionality that opens, and I belong to that dimensionality. Or maybe it's a divinity, maybe it's not, maybe it's an archetype, maybe it's clear, or not at all, maybe it's just a very vague sense—and often it is.

One of the things I would like to actually insist on—and again I'm not going to go into this now too much—is that a sense of beauty implies a sense of depth. Now some people would do their utmost to try and refuse that notion. But I think for us, when we have a sense of beauty, I'm talking about a sense that really touches us, when we really feel like the heart and the soul and the being is touched by a sense of beauty, there is a sense not only of our own depths, but also the depths of that which is beautiful to us.

And this is very much connected with the whole movement of Eros and soul-making. We've said Eros needs this depth, this dimensionality, this unfathomability of the object, and that's part of what the imaginal gets fabricated with, or is inherent, if you like, in the imaginal—this unfathomability, this dimensionality and depth. So something here about unfathomability and depth, wrapped up in beauty, wrapped up in the erotic relationship with anything.

Now if we think for a little bit, or consider for a little bit, different styles of meditation, even different styles of insight meditation. Many of you will know of the Mahasi style, taught by Mahasi Sayadaw, beginning in the twentieth century. It was really one of the absolutely dominant influences or streams within insight meditation for many years. So one of the very first influences in the construction of insight meditation was this Mahasi style. Sometimes it was almost an exclusive prevalence of that or domination within how insight meditation was taught. Certainly when I started in the mid-eighties, insight meditation scenes and circles and retreat centers and retreats and teachings were all very dominated by Mahasi-style teachings, alongside others—Ajahn Chah and a sprinkling of Zen. But Mahasi-style was very dominant.

In that style, there is, I would say, a very precise noting of moment-to-moment experience and it tends towards a narrow focus of attention, so a very penetrative, intense application of continual mindfulness to sense experience and an emphasis on bare attention—that notion of bare attention—moment-to-moment, intense sustaining of the mindfulness on the particles, if you like, of experience.

I would say with that, that there is either no, or let's say very limited eros there. There's either none or very limited erotic possibility. Why? Because sense objects are not unfathomable. In that whole presentation of the path, in that whole way of teaching, in that whole presentation of the concept of what one is trying to do, sense objects are not unfathomable. And we've said Eros needs an unfathomability to it.

There is an assumption there in that whole presentation of the teaching—related as it is to Abhidhamma, Theravadan Abhidhamma, which tends towards atomistic reductionism, actually a whole set of teachings of atomistic reductionism that was so criticized by Nagarjuna in the Mahayana teachings on emptiness. But there is an assumption that this atomistic reductionism that's happening through my very probing, narrow focus of sustained moment-to-moment mindfulness on the particles of sensation and sense experience and mental experience, there is an assumption this atomistic reduction reveals reality.

When I'm paying attention in this way, this so-called mindfulness, this so-called bare attention, by its very nature this label is regarded as penetrating to reality. And that assumption supports that kind of attention, that attention reinforces that kind of assumption, and it's a kind of attention and a kind of assumption that stops the eros and therefore the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, because there's not this unfathomability that eros needs.

There is a sense of beauty there, but the beauty comes—people love, you know, actually some people hate it and some people love it, and whatever people have an ambivalent relationship to that way of practicing. But part of the love of the beauty there is more in what I was relating to before. It's in the intimacy, in the connection, in the sensitivity. That's what people love about that path. I don't know whether anyone can really love that kind of atomistic reductionism. So there is some degree of beauty, but the eros there is actually very limited.

In recent years, the predominance and prevalence of Mahasi style in the insight meditation tradition has waned, and it's become part of what informs retreats, and some teachers who just teach that way and practitioners who just practice that way. But more, it's just kind of waned and taken its, I would say, rightfully more modest place and mixed in with other concepts and approaches to practice and teachings.

And then also more recently, in recent years, a kind of elevation of the idea of insight meditation and practice as being most authentically—or one is most truly practicing—when one is practicing "non-doing" or just receiving experience or opening to experience and sitting in or walking in a non-doing, standing in a non-doing and just receiving experience.

I would actually say, in terms of we're asking about eros and sense experience, that that mode of conceiving and perceiving practicing and the assumptions there also limit or there is a lack there of eros as well within that way of practicing. Why? Because again there's a tacit assumption of the reality of being, and being as opposed to doing, that this is somehow real and reveals the way things really are.

Doing would distort the way things are. This non-doing or being or receiving reveals the way things are. And that reality, that barrier there, prevents eros. So where there's a fixed reality view, the eros is limited, in this case in relation to sense experience, in that mode of thinking about practice, in that mode of practicing.

Secondly, you could point out that we used words with sexual connotations – opening and penetrating – to describe the erotic movement, opening to the erotic object, the beloved other, and penetrating it more, wanting more opening, wanting more penetrating. Here, in this mode of practicing – this kind of receiving, opening to receiving experience, and non-doing – the erotic movement is limited to one of opening. In the Mahasi style, it tends to be limited to one of penetrating, not always. And so that style is, if you like, more phallic in its thrust, and this style is more receptive. But either way, this style limits the range and the style of erotic movement there.

But perhaps most importantly, the reason why it lacks or limits the eros is this way of practicing of so-called non-doing and receiving, opening to receiving. It tends towards the perception of oneness and not particularity, and not the retained otherness of eros. It tends instead towards oneness.

In other words, if I just sit, and I really practice – as much as it seems to me, if I don't realize that it's a bit of an illusion – if I just sit and I believe in so-called receiving and opening to receiving and non-doing, what will happen is it will unfabricate sense experience to a certain extent and it tends towards less of a perception of separation and distinction and towards more of a perception of oneness of all things.

Sense objects, then, are not unfathomable. They don't have an infinite dimensionality of depths in that sense of unfathomable, because at some point in doing that kind of practice we recognize that rather sense experiences are universally one with – probably awareness is the most likely thing, sometimes one with a kind of universal awareness – although as this practice goes deeper, before one realizes that it's actually based on a mistaken conception, an illusion of non-doing and realism. At some point, though, we have the perception and the sense and the kind of recognition that all sense experience and all sense objects are universally one, most likely with awareness, with a universal awareness. And so that's the way that that practice would go as it deepens, as one dedicates oneself to it.

In which case they are then fathomed. I've fathomed their true nature. They are awareness in their essence, or they are love in their essence. Even if the awareness or love is infinitely vast in space or in time – in other words, this awareness seems to have no limits in space or in time, and this love seems to be infinite in space and in time – there's a certain kind of infinity there, but I've reached the bottom level of the dimensionality. It is awareness, or it is love. So they are not – sense objects don't have this unfathomability; they reach a fathoming, they reach a level beyond which they don't go deeper. You understand?

So both these styles – the Mahasi style and the way of non-doing, if you like, or the way of receiving – tend to actually limit the eros with regard to sense experience through the whole way of thinking and through the way of practicing that comes out of that way of thinking and then reinforces that whole view and that whole relationship with sense experience, so that there cannot be the erotic soul-making in relation to the particularities of sense experience and that unfathomability that's part of that, and otherness that's part of that, that's part of the direction of a certain kind of soul-making.

So this, to me, is again – what are we trying to do here? How is our conception of the path and the way we're practicing limiting certain possibilities, whether that's the possibility of a deeper understanding of dependent origination and emptiness, whether that's the possibility of degrees and depths of freedom or directions of freedom, or the possibilities of soul-making and opening to sacredness? So these questions to me are really, really important. These considerations are really important.

So easily we can bring in assumptions or rest on our practice and our view of practice and of path and of awakening. Rest on certain assumptions that are not fully checked out. All kinds of assumptions.

So in relation to sensuality, the experiences of the senses, and the beauty there, I would say – beauty, what is our relationship there? What place, is there a place for beauty? What does that mean?

So we could be talking about art here, any kind of medium of art. We could be talking about nature. We could be talking about whatever. But as I said, is the beauty that we feel in relation to art or music or whatever it is – is it only sensual? Is that what's happening for us, that there's a sensual pleasure because of the arrangement of these colors or these sounds or whatever it is? Is that what beauty is? Is it just reducible to sense pleasure?

And I can sort of... I'm best served by kind of giving a bare attention to the object of art, whatever that is, or the thing that's beautiful, and then just enjoying the pleasing effects of the arrangement of these elements of the artistic work in time and in space – the colors, the form, whatever it is, the proportions there.

What happens to our sense of beauty if we actually do manage to kind of squeeze it down to that mode of relating to the object, to the art or the beautiful thing?

What happens also, just as with images, if we reduce whatever this beautiful thing is, whether it's something in art or something in nature – what happens when we reduce it to "it means X"? It represents specifically exactly X or Y. What happens when we reduce it to a kind of monovalency of meanings? What happens to an actual experience of beauty?

So beauty seems to me, as I said, to involve this. Yes, of course, that's part of beauty. If you make art, of course it matters—the proportions, the timings, the spatial patterning, the colors, whatever it is, the timbres. This matters greatly. You can't talk about the art separate from those elements. And it may well mean this and that, but to reduce it to either of them or both of them will kill the beauty.

Beauty needs something unfathomable in the depth, some kind of dimensionality to it—I would say some kind of inexhaustibility, including of meaningfulness. In other words, I can't quite capture everything about it. Beauty and eros implicating each other and soul-making and all that. And it has this beyond—I can't quite capture or define or reduce it. This, as I said, applies also to our relationship with nature.

For example, consider landscape, or a tree, or going for a walk in autumn, where there's the autumnal scene with trees of vividly bright colors. One can be really moved and touched, of course—I hope you know this—by the beauty there. Sometimes it moves us to great depth, this kind of beauty, for instance, of an autumn scene.

Is it just that they are pretty, vivid colors? Sometimes we talk as if that's what the beauty consists of, alone. How much can that really touch us? How much depth and beauty can that have? Or is it that, plus the fact that we're amazed at the biological wonder of it? How amazing that trees evolved, with the light and the photosynthesis, and then the chemical changes occurring with the change in light and seasons, making the colors certain ways—that's amazing.

Or even in the autumn scene, the poignancy of impermanence. Here is decay, here is death, here is the cycle of life and death and the poignancy of that to the being. Or even all of those—pretty vivid colors, amazing biology and evolution, and the poignancy of impermanence that the autumn scene speaks to us.

It can be all of those, and yet I would still say that in what I'm calling a sense of beauty, and in what really touches us in the relationship with the sense experience there, can be all of these, but something more is there when we're really touched and we really have this sense of beauty. Something else can be there and hopefully is there because we don't cut it out.

So in our relationship with sensuality, what can be there? What needs to come in in order for beauty to be there? Something that we can't quite define or capture. Some other depth, some dimensionality. Not the monovalency, not the reduction, not just plain or mere sense pleasure, pleasing sense experiences. Yes, that's all fine. Those levels are included. But more.

So I would say, if we want to include a sense of beauty in our lives, and on the path, and include it on the path, and open it, and have it be alive, and give it place—and if we're interested in soul-making and eros, which, as I said, always include a sense of beauty—then it's actually necessary that in our relationship with the senses, in our relationship with sense experience, we don't reduce the view to "this is simply seeking and enjoying pleasant sense experience." Whether that's what we want or that's what we dismiss, there's not a reduction. We don't see it that way. We don't conceive of it that way. Nor are we denigrating the senses because we only want the transcendent beyond. There's something else that's possible here in the relationship with the senses.

I'm talking about how can we understand, acknowledge, recognize, practice, live in a way that allows soul-making, allows eros, understands differently in our relationship with sense experience—so we don't just dismiss it or feel guilty. And we don't flatten it, which would actually kill the beauty and kill the soul-making. We actually acknowledge, get interested, allow and support this sense of dimensionality, which is available to us in relationship to the senses, necessary for beauty and necessary for eros and soul-making.

And in that, something in the whole relationship with senses and sense experience and world transforms, opens up. And in so doing, a whole sense of the path can as well.

German philosopher Heidegger, the twentieth-century philosopher, traced the etymology of the word for beautiful in German, das Schöne. And he traced the etymology to Scheinen in German, which is the root of the word for illusion, Schein.

So that's interesting. He's tracing the notion of beautiful to the word for illusion. Now, we could hear something like that and put it straight into a kind of narrow interpretation—for some streams of the teaching, a very typical Pali canon influenced interpretation. Yes, sense beauty is illusory. And that's what we get from this etymology that Heidegger's pointing to.

Heidegger, one of the things he was accused of was very dubious etymological playing with things. So it may or may not be the case, but again, what matters more to me with playing with words is what comes out of it in the soul-making. Because we could hear it that way—sensual beauty is exactly illusory. It's illusory. There is sense experience, and there is the experience of pleasure or unpleasantness in regard to the senses. But sense beauty is illusory. The beautiful is related to illusion.

Compare that with a deeper understanding of fabrication, the more tantric view, the soul-making view, and the view that allows the erotic-imaginal. And there we acknowledge, if you like, the fabrication and that the beautiful is created and discovered. It's created by the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, giving more dimensionality, giving more multifacetedness, in relation to that. But because of our deeper and more integrated understanding of what fabrication is and what it involves—the inevitability of it, the place of soul-making and the necessity of that, the place of eros and all that—there is no problem that the beautiful is connected with the illusory or the fabricated. No problem at all. We understand this is expressing a deep wisdom and a deep way of integration. It unfolds the possibility of a path. It opens the door of a wider avenue of practice, of creation and discovery, and of sacredness.

One of the things I've been thinking about for quite a while in art and beauty and all this is that in a lot of modern Western poetry, there was a point—I'm not sure exactly when it happened—when the emphasis shifted really to things. It's like the important thing to have in a poem is things. In other words, don't talk about your feelings. Don't talk about—certainly for heaven's sake—metaphysics or spiritual realities or that kind of thing. Talk about things. Depict things. Give us, in a different sense, images of things.

So that's the most dominant tenor or fabric of a lot of modern Western poetry—it's really based in things. The message there to budding poets is everything to sense experience. Tell us about things. Don't tell us about your feelings. Tell us about things, and your feelings will be communicated indirectly by what you say in and through what you say about things.

But the things there are so often just imagined purely materially. They are conceived of as purely material. There's a kind of one-dimensionality or flatland view of things, and therefore of sensuality. And that view of things is also tied together with a view of things and human beings as well, of their fragility—the fragility of these things and the fragility of human beings, of the ephemeral nature of both humans and things.

All that is wrapped up, of course, in a kind of assumption about the reality of our existential situation, our death and our finitude. All of these—fragility, ephemeral nature of things, solidity of things, the sensual being the only important thing, finitude and death—all of these are taken as realities in the unspoken backdrop.

So that so often what the poem becomes is just about things, and about holding things and others as dear, because that's all we have given our existential situation. We have these flat things and humans, and these things can become dear to us. But it's all against a kind of tragedy—though not in the classical sense—of our existential situation, of finitude, of death, and of one-dimensionality.

How different the view of the image of things and the image of human beings. So there's a whole current—and some of you may be aware of this—there's a whole really dominant current in modern poetry in the West that kind of ties all this together. These are the kinds of poems that are acceptable or taken seriously, and others won't be taken seriously.

And it's all based on a certain worldview. It also tends towards the kind of deflationary art I mentioned the other day. So the view of art and sensuality and life and what's beautiful reflects the culture's conceptual framework and logos regarding reality, regarding the senses, regarding things, regarding apparent existential situations, regarding what human being is. It reflects the dominant worldview and the actual lack of eros and soul-making within the wider culture.

To me, these things are really important. They might not seem relevant to you, but to me, poetry is very important, art is extremely important, music, all these things, and the relationship with nature. And what then is given, for example, to our relationship with nature if we can open the view of all this—in regard to our sense experience, in regard to the eros and soul-making—and let that in: dimensionality, and the non-realism.

What is given to our relationship with nature, and therefore to the environmental movement and the ecological movements, if we open our view and if we understand the soul-making dynamic and eros, psychologos and everything that we've talked about? I would say that whole relationship with nature and also the environmental gains are given other levels. It opens up in different ways. The environmental movement is given other ways to enter the discourse.

So it's not just about one-dimensional nature in a materialist sense that we're somehow trying to elevate in value. And so we can only speak in terms of humanistic values or instrumentalist values as resources or this or that. There's very rarely any talk of sacredness in relation to nature or anything else, apart from mainstream religion, because that's kind of gone out of the discourse of the worldview. And I wonder—I've talked about this before in those talks on ecology of love, so I'm just moving very quickly here because I need to end—but I wonder, can we dare to talk that way and dare to open up that kind of view and relationship with nature?

Then we see, in understanding all this and what we're talking about in this retreat, then we see the soul, the citta, is not separate from the beauty, from the divinity, from the dimensionality, from the unfathomability of nature. And we open those dimensions and that sense of sacredness. And then that can open the whole discourse around the environmental movement, which sometimes just seems so stuck on one level.

So if we go back to what Heidegger wrote: the illusion in beauty, or the fabrication. This doesn't—the realization that fabrication, if you like, which is tied to the word for illusion—something is a fabrication. The acknowledgement of that, the realization of that, the entering into that does not at all demean the beauty that is fabricated there.

Beauty is not separate from us. There's a whole other level of participation being alluded to here. What does it mean to participate in nature? Yes, I've touched on this before. There's a whole other level here in the soul level, in the soul-making level, in the erotic movement, in the recognition of fabrication, in the recognition of the creation and discovery of beauty and dimensionality.

So illusion is only a derogatory word when we're harboring an assumption somewhere—usually at the back of our mind if you're used to these teachings, still harboring something at the back of the mind, or at the front of the mind if you're not familiar with these teachings on emptiness. But illusion is always put in contrast to some assumption: there's something that's not illusion, there's something that's not fabricated, some experience, some bare experience that's not an illusion.

But there isn't. The only thing that's unfabricated is beyond experience, beyond the senses, beyond any form, beyond any being of an object. So there's not this supposed non-illusion to which illusion is compared and found to come up short. And when we realize that, then the fact of fabrication, the recognition, the admission, the entering into that is not a demeaning.

And there's something—can you hear it? Can you grasp it? What this is inviting us into in terms of responsibility, but also in terms of the awareness of the multi-leveled participation we have in the cosmos, in divinity, in being. Opening up the preciousness there.

CHAPTER 81

Refractions: Of Body, Sensuality, and Sexuality (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h09

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea applies the fundamental Buddhist insight of paṭiccasamuppāda (dependent origination) to sexuality, demonstrating how our sexual experiences are always shaped by our ways of looking and cultural conditioning. He contrasts reductionist biological views with the rich imaginal possibilities found in ancient Sumerian mythology of Inanna and Dumuzi, showing how sexuality can participate in something cosmic and divine.
>
> Burbea challenges practitioners to examine their unquestioned assumptions about sexuality inherited from Western Christianity and Pāli Canon Buddhism, questioning whether sex truly prevents samādhi or realization of the unfabricated. He explores various intentions behind sexual activity—from pleasure-seeking to soul-making—and investigates what allows sexual experiences to become imaginal, revealing multidimensionality and sacredness.
> Drawing on Michel Foucault's analysis of how sexuality became central to modern identity formation, Burbea examines the double-edged nature of this development. He emphasizes that the test for any relationship with sexuality should be whether it serves soul-making—the expansion of meaning, beauty, and sacred dimensionality—rather than ego-contraction or neurotic identity-fixation.

When we reflect on sexuality, I hope one of the most basic insights in relationship to it is that of dependent origination and emptiness. In other words, we are aware and never lose sight of the fact that sexuality, like anything else, like everything else, does not exist independently of the way of looking. Sexuality doesn't exist independent of the way of looking. It has no inherent existence as this or as that. It's always colored and shaped by the way that we're relating to it, the way that we're regarding it, our assumptions about it and our assumptions about the path and about what is spirituality or morality or what is in contrast to it.

When a person thinks, "Yeah, but really sexuality is this," it's that "really" that needs to be called into question. This is the movement of avijja, not realizing the dependence on the way of looking. So when we talk about sexuality, we're talking about something that is not a fixed independently existent thing. No matter how much it seems to be just a biological fact, we can't look at it independent of all kinds of assumptions, ways of relating and regarding it, and archetypal styles.

How open is our imaginal context for what sexuality is and can be? If we use even just the Greek gods as archetypes, Aphroditic sexuality—with its attention to pleasure and sensuality and the generative urge of procreation—is very different from, say, Hermetic sexuality. Hermes is not interested in monogamy, for example. Or consider the Dionysian, with its ecstasy and intensity, and also the effeminacy as much as the power. These are all different archetypes from that of the faithful monogamous couple in marriage.

We bring both conceptual ideas and assumptions, and a kind of narrowness or breadth of archetypal lens to what sexuality is. Some of that we get from the culture, from the wider culture, and some from the subcultures that we move in. We're always bringing something. We're not talking about something that exists independently that really is like this or really is like that. This is a fundamental insight that we must keep in mind and keep in our consciousness as we're exploring sexuality and opening it up as a topic.

I remember when I was an undergraduate studying psychology, just after Richard Dawkins' book The Selfish Gene had been released and people were talking about it a lot. I actually had Richard Dawkins as a personal tutor for a very short time, which is a whole other story. A student colleague of mine, a friend, was quite influenced by that book and that whole way of thinking. He used to say, "Love is just a genetic program to release certain chemicals in your brain. And that's what love is. That's all love is." This is a very fundamentalist, evolutionary, biological survival-of-the-fittest way of reducing things—a very reductionistic way of looking.

Or consider a person I knew, a practitioner, who was very adamant that sexuality is just a biological impulse to procreation that's been evolutionarily selected. He was very intent on that conception of sexuality, and that was the same person who described himself as addicted to internet porn. Is there any relationship there between the view and the behavior? Is the behavior coming out of a certain view, because it doesn't allow for much more?

Nicolas Chamfort, a French moralist around the time of the French Revolution, said or wrote, "Love is nothing but the contact of two epidermis"—that's the biological word for skin—"and the exchange of two pale fantasies." I don't know enough about him to know whether that particular aphorism was coming from a broken heart—his wife, I think, died—or how much it was just the view that he arrived at at a certain point in life.

I've talked about the Buddha and what he's recorded as saying in the Pali Canon in relation to sexuality, using very strong language, very dismissive. There are views that reduce sexuality and lovemaking, and even human love, in different ways, and pigeonhole it, either biologically or spiritually.

I remember teaching a retreat at one of the major retreat centers in another country. We were sitting at lunch with a few senior teachers and some others around, and something came up because it had come to their attention that there was a subgroup of teacher trainees elsewhere in the country who had started a group involving something like mindful sex. I'm not quite sure of the details, but it may have involved mutual masturbation. They were promoting it as a sort of spiritual practice to integrate sexuality, to explore and open sexuality mindfully.

I was just listening, not knowing much about it, and watching the back and forth of the conversation. What struck me was the immediate dismissal of this group and this idea, and the wanting to be clearly disassociated from it and make sure the insight meditation world was clearly not in any way associated with it. There were some strong statements about how the Buddha taught that we need to let go of cravings, so this couldn't be related to Dharma.

Then in the very same mouthful, the teacher who said that commented on how this was such a lovely meal that we were being fed by the retreat staff, and how this was in fact their favorite meal. I was struck by the obliviousness or seeming obliviousness of those two statements. One was around the area of sensuality around sexuality, and one was around the area of pleasant-tasting food. One was completely okay—seemingly to just declare one's enjoyment and that one had a favorite there—and one was really not okay.

This struck me very much at the time. I remember being struck mostly by the seeming lack of openness and questioning there.

Sexual ethics often draws intense scrutiny—consternation, outrage, tutting—while other ethical issues, like climate change, receive almost complete silence. We rarely see the same willingness to speak up, to teach ethics around environmental destruction, or to take strong positions there. Yet sexuality readily provokes heat, strong statements, black-and-white declarations, with people very ready to condemn.

So I wonder: Are we exploring our relationship with sex and sexuality deeply enough? Are we truly examining the views we hold about this? Or are we simply absorbing, drinking in, being unconsciously indoctrinated by some unquestioned legacy—perhaps Western Christianity that saturates our culture? Even in secular contexts, Christian ethics largely remain, as Nietzsche pointed out. We're saturated by Christian-influenced views of body, sensuality, sexuality, alongside those found in Pali Canon Buddhism.

My inquiry concerns how open our questioning really is—how willing we are to examine our relationships and views around sexuality, sensuality, and eros. I'm absolutely not advocating moral nihilism, suggesting anything goes around sexuality. Rather, I'm questioning how much genuine questioning exists regarding our attitudes and assumptions.

For me, this remains an open exploration rather than contracting down to "we know the answer, this is the decree." There is not, as yet, any arrival at a final answer.

When someone declares in a dharma context that "sex is a distraction," or "sexual thoughts and images are distractions," this already implies a particular view. Such seemingly authoritative statements carry assumptions we rarely examine. Yet anything can be a distraction—pleasant food, ideas about dharma, whatever. I'm certainly not advocating abandoning ideas or being "non-conceptual," simply noting that anything can become a so-called distraction.

Similarly, statements like "the Buddha said X, therefore X" imply all kinds of views and fantasies that we rarely unpack. What assumptions lie behind such compact-sounding pronouncements?

What's the most important thing? Is it being a Buddhist? But what does being a Buddhist mean? Is it freedom? What kind of freedom, and how many kinds exist? Is it soul-making? Freedom and soul-making together?

How does what I'm thinking and saying to myself and others actually reflect what I consider most important? Or have other considerations gotten tangled in there—assumptions, views, fantasies I haven't recognized?

Whenever anyone says "Buddha said," there are usually many unseen views and fantasies wrapped up in such statements—fantasies of path, awakening, Buddha, tradition. All these things we've touched on remain typically unexamined.

Is it really true that sex, lovemaking, sexual arousal, sexual energy, sexual images prevent samadhi? I can relate experiences—my own and those many students have shared—where sexuality, sexual energy, sexual images, actual lovemaking, actually quite support samadhi. They don't leave stickiness, craving, or contraction of being at all.

Yet people often assume it's either-or: either you're open to sex and sensuality, or you're going for the unfabricated. Is this really true? To disprove such thinking, we need only find celibate people who haven't realized the unfabricated alongside non-celibate people who have. Both certainly exist.

This either-or thinking wraps up all kinds of unexamined assumptions. Often there's real polarizing—perhaps tracing back to Plato, Neoplatonism, or Pali Canon Buddhism's rejection of sensuality and sexuality in favor of knowing the transcendent unfabricated, versus rejecting anything transcendent altogether.

We'll return to this later.

We know we've touched on this—the whole field polarizes. Either this or that. Is it really the case? Is that really true?

So we can compare, for instance, such views as we were talking about before—my undergraduate fellow student, or the person who described himself as addicted to pornography, or what Shafo said, or what seemed to be articulated by the teachers around the lunch table. Compare all that with views of sex and sexuality, whether actual physical sex or imaginal, that we touched on the other day: the view of sexuality and sex as participating in, mirroring, echoing something much larger, something cosmic, and even perhaps creating or healing the divine through that engagement.

What a different view that is of what sexuality is—or should we say could be, can be, how it can be transformed, again, by the way of looking. Really quite a different view.

Sometimes I wonder if that kind of view—participating in something much larger, something more cosmic through sex—if that sense is perhaps easier for women. Because of the cycles of menstruation, for example, and because of the potential, at least if not the actuality, of pregnancy, one really feels subject to something much larger. Someone once told me that in the cycles, in what is being born in you and coming through you, what your body is subject to, your whole being is subject to—menstruation, pregnancy—you're subject to something much larger. And there's the possibility of feeling that in a very different way, much more embedded, cosmically reflecting the earth and cosmic cycles. Something bigger than you are.

Whereas potentially, at least for the male, it's possible to scatter one seed, sow one seed, enter and leave, and not have that sense of being caught up in something or at the center of something much, much vaster, much more multidimensional, much more cosmic in its order. It may be easier for the woman, for the female, to feel that than it is for the male, perhaps.

But compare those views I was talking about before with this participatory view, or let me read you something from the myth of Inanna and her courtship with Dumuzi, the shepherd. Inanna was a Sumerian goddess, and Dumuzi may have been immortal—it's unclear, I'm not an expert on this myth—but may have become divine through lovemaking with Inanna, through partnership with the goddess. There are all kinds of parallels here to what we've been talking about.

This passage is quite long, but because it's so different from the typical ways we regard sexuality in our culture, I think it's worth reading at length, just to get a completely different sense of the regard, the reverence, the texture of what sexuality is and what lovemaking can be.

So Inanna, at her mother's command, bathed and anointed herself with scented oil. She covered her body with a royal white robe. She readied her dowry. She arranged her precious lapis beads around her neck. She took her seal in her hand. She's a goddess, remember. Dumuzi, the shepherd—he's becoming the king through this lovemaking—waited expectantly.

Inanna opened the door for him. Inside the house she shone before him like the light of the moon. Dumuzi looked at her joyously. He pressed his neck close against hers. He kissed her.

Inanna spoke: "What I tell you, let the singer weave into song. What I tell you, let it flow from ear to mouth. Let it pass from old to young. My vulva, the horn, the boat of heaven, is full of eagerness like the young moon."

As an aside, I read a short interview with Diane Wolkstein, who translated this not too long ago. She was talking about translations made first in 1937 of the Sumerian myth, and they kept words like "vulva" in Latin because back then you simply could not publish such things in English. The culture was not ready, she said, though she thinks we're more ready now. She found that rather amusing.

So: "My vulva, the horn, the boat of heaven, is full of eagerness like the young moon. My untilled land lies fallow. As for me, Inanna, who will plow my vulva? Who will plow my high field? Who will plow my wet ground? As for me, the young woman, who will plow my vulva? Who will station the ox there?"

Who will plough my vulva? Dumusi replied, "Great lady, the king will plough your vulva. I, Dumusi the king, will plough your vulva." Inanna said, "Then plough my vulva, man of my heart, plough my vulva."

At the king's lap stood the rising cedar. Plants grew high by their side. Grains grew high by their side. Gardens flourished luxuriantly.

Inanna sang: "He has sprouted. He has burgeoned. He is lettuce planted by the water. He is the one my womb loves best. My well-stocked garden of the plain, my barley growing high in its furrow, my apple tree which bears fruit up to its crown, he is lettuce planted by the water. My honey man, my honey man sweetens me always, my lord, the honey man of the gods, he is the one my womb loves best. His hand is honey, his foot is honey, he sweetens me always. My eager, impetuous caresser of the navel, my caresser of the soft thighs, he is the one my womb loves best. He is lettuce planted by the water."

Dumusi sang, Inanna sang: "Make your milk sweet and thick, my bridegroom. My shepherd, I will drink your fresh milk. Wild bull Dumusi, make your milk sweet and thick. I will drink your fresh milk. Let the milk of the goat flow in my sheepfold. Fill my holy churn with honey cheese. Lord Dumusi, I will drink your fresh milk. My husband, I will guard my sheepfold for you. I will watch over your house of life, the storehouse, the shining quivering place which delights Sumer, the house which decides the fates of the land, the house which gives the breath of life to the people. I the queen of the palace will watch over your house."

Dumusi spoke: "My sister, I would go with you to my garden. Inanna, I would go with you to my garden. I would go with you to my orchard. I would go with you to my apple tree. There I would plant the sweet, honey-covered seed."

Inanna spoke: "He brought me into his garden. My brother Dumusi brought me into his garden. I strolled with him among the standing trees. I stood with him among the fallen trees. By the apple tree I knelt as is proper, before my brother coming in song, who rose to me out of poplar leaves, who came to me in the midday heat. Before my lord Dumusi, I poured out plants from my womb, I placed plants before him, I poured out plants before him, I placed grain before him, I poured out grain before him, I poured out grain before my womb."

Inanna sang: "Last night as I, the Queen, was shining bright, last night as I, the Queen of Heaven, was shining bright, as I was shining bright and dancing, singing praises at the coming of night, he met me, he met me. My Lord Dumusi met me, he pushed his hand to my hand, he pressed his neck close against mine. My High Priest is ready for the holy loins, my Lord Dumusi is ready for the holy loins. The plants and herbs in his field are ripe. O Dumusi, your fullness is my delight."

She called for it. She called for it. She called for the bed. She called for the bed that rejoices the heart. She called for the bed that sweetens the loins. She called for the bed of kingship. She called for the bed of queenship. Inanna called for the bed: "Let the bed that rejoices the heart be prepared. Let the bed that sweetens the loins be prepared. Let the bed of kingship be prepared. Let the bed of queenship be prepared. Let the royal bed be prepared."

She spread the bridal sheet across the bed. She called to the king: "The bed is ready." Inanna called to her bridegroom: "The bed is waiting."

He put his hand in her hand. He put his hand to her heart. Sweet is the sleep of hand to hand. Sweeter still is the sleep of heart to heart.

Inanna spoke: "I bathed for the wild bull. I bathed for the shepherd Dumusi. I perfumed my sides with ointment. I coated my mouth with sweet-smelling amber. I painted my eyes with coal. He shaped my loins with his fair hands. The shepherd Dumusi filled my lap with cream and milk. He stroked my pubic hair. He watered my womb. He laid his hands on my holy vulva. He smoothed my black boat with cream. He quickened my narrow boat with milk. He caressed me on the bed. Now I will caress my high priest on the bed. I will caress the faithful shepherd Dumusi. I will caress his loins, the shepherd of the land. I will decree a sweet fate for him."

The queen of heaven, the heroic woman greater than her mother, Inanna, the first daughter of the moon, decreed the fate of Dumusi.

Her advisor, Ninshibur, the faithful servant of the holy shrine, led Dumusi to the sweet thighs of Inanna and spoke: "My queen, here is the choice of your heart, the king, your beloved bridegroom. May he spend long days in the sweetness of your holy loins. Give him a favorable and glorious reign. Grant him the king's throne, firm in its foundations. Grant him the shepherd's staff of judgment. Grant him the enduring crown with radiant and noble diadem.

"From where the sun rises to where the sun sets, from north to south, from the upper sea to the lower sea, from the land of the huluppu tree to the land of the cedar, let his shepherd staff protect all of Sumer and Akkad. As the farmer, let him make the fields fertile. As the shepherd, let him make the sheepfolds multiply. Under his reign let there be vegetation. Under his reign let there be rich grain. In the marshland may the fish and birds chatter in the canebrake. May the young and the old reeds grow high. In the steppe may the deer and wild goats multiply. In the orchards may there be honey and wine. In the grasslands, may the lettuce and cress grow high. In the palace, may there be long life.

"May there be flood water in the Tigris and the Euphrates. May the plants grow high on their banks and fill the meadows. May the lady of vegetation pile the grain in heaps and mounds. O my queen of heaven and earth, queen of all the universe, may he enjoy long days in the sweetness of your loins."

The king went with lifted head to the holy loin. He went with lifted head to the loins of Inanna. He opened wide his arms to the holy priestess of heaven.

Inanna spoke: "My beloved, the delight of my eyes, glistened me. We rejoiced together. He took his pleasure of me. He brought me into his house. He laid me down on the fragrant honey bed. My sweet love lying by my heart, tongue playing one by one. My fair Dumusi did so fifty times. Now my sweet love is sated."

It's possible, I suppose, that some people could hear this poetry and interpret it through a historical lens, deconstructing it: "Ah, yes, well here was the beginning of agriculture—or at some point agriculture was very important to this civilization, and this was just their way of not understanding agriculture, so they presented a myth of how crops grew, and they prayed so that crops would not fail, and the floodwaters would come and irrigate the soil."

There's a way of hearing it that reduces it to some kind of biological evolutionary impulse from an ignorant time when they didn't understand the science of agriculture. But you can hear in that poetry something very different—a completely different regard for lovemaking, for sex, for sexuality, for sensuality. There's nothing there that implies any kind of dirtiness or lessness or demeaningness.

It's juicy. It's completely holy because it's tied in with the cosmos. It's full of cosmopoiesis.

It's full of the earth and references to the fertility of the earth and the agriculture and the blessings of that. Honey and wine and orchards and fields and milk. This whole thing is redolent, pregnant, overflowing with multi-dimensionality of divinity, of spirits, a reverence and sense of participation. I feel the sexual act, the human sexual act, reflecting divinity, reflecting the vision in cosmopoiesis, reflecting and echoing, participating in the cosmic. This gives rise to a very different sensibility regarding sexuality and sensuality.

We live in a different time now, in a very different culture. When we come to sex, it's interesting to see what intentions nowadays are present, what we can use sex for, what is the intention in entering into sexual acts and sexuality between people.

Certainly it's possible that sex is just reduced to wanting to experience pleasant sensations—a desire to experience pleasure, pleasant vedana, basically. It's also possible that we may be using sex, to some degree or as part of the mix, for what we might call ego gratification, to prop up or inflate a certain self-view, a certain ego image. Either this happens through making sexual conquests and wearing them as a feather in one's hat, or through using sex as an indication of one's own desirability or lovability. "He loves me, she loves me, they love me. How do I know? Because we had sex." All this is possible.

Frankly speaking, sex can be for political reasons. Certainly in the history of different cultures, marriages and liaisons have been arranged for political reasons, for empire reasons, all kinds of things. But even within a relationship, there's a political possibility that sex is granted or withheld or used in strategizing, maneuvering for other purposes as well.

Sometimes there's the possibility that one is approaching sex just, either just or in part, seeking a release of stress, a release of tension. Whether it's work or something around the home, there's a certain amount of energetic stress that accumulates in the body and tension, and certainly orgasm can discharge that. Sometimes one is driven by that. Psychologically, it's interesting to consider what's giving rise to that stress in the first place—all kinds of psychological factors that have nothing to do with how busy we are or how much stress there is at work.

There's also the accumulation of energy. Some people are consciously entering into sexuality as described in some tantric practices, entering into conscious sex with another or with oneself, trying to accumulate and gather the sexual energy in certain channels in the body. Either this opens up consciousness or gathers bliss instead of discharging into orgasm.

Of course, the reason for having sex can be about love—expressing love and feeling the connection, the heart connection of love between two people. And sex can be for the sake of soul, for the sake of soul-making to some degree. In that case, the imaginal is involved, just based on everything we've been saying about soul and eros.

So we can come to sex with all these different intentions mixed together, and probably many more besides that I can't think of right now. But if we're talking about soul-making in and through sex, sex in the service of soul—and this doesn't need to exclude any of these other things—that involves soul-making, which implies the presence of images and engagement with images.

If we are interested in soul-making going into every direction and dimension and domain of our existence, then that will include sex. If we're interested in opening up sex and sexuality and sensuality, then it means allowing the soul-making and soulfulness and the imaginal and the erotic to imbue the sex. Because remember, we can have sex without eros. But soul-making involves this meeting and pervading of each other—the imaginal and the sexual.

Then the question arises: if we're interested in soul-making with regard to sex, what allows, what supports memories of sexual moments—whether on one's own or with another—to become images, in the sense of imaginal images? What allows just a memory of a sexual moment to be elevated, to have the fullness of the imaginal?

Or during the actual sex itself, what allows and supports the perceptions, the experiences in the present, to become imaginal, to become image, to have that iconic sense, that sense of the eternal, that sense of dimensionality, divinity, participation? What allows the multidimensionality to be revealed? What supports the multidimensionality to be discovered or revealed?

To me, that's quite an interesting question. What allows the soul—not just talking about heart, not reducing soul to heart—what allows the soul to be present? That's a connected question, but it's a different question.

What allows the soul—not just the heart, but the soul—to be stirred and awakened through sexuality? This is a connected yet distinct inquiry. What is it that allows the sex to be soul-making?

Is it simply a matter of pacing? Do we need to slow down to allow that dimensionality to unfold, for the perception to expand into the fullness of the imaginal? Perhaps, but I wouldn't want to be formulaic about this. Does this mean we must always have slow sex? When I speak of slowness, I don't necessarily mean the physical movements themselves, but rather the pace of the entire encounter—the rhythm of being itself.

Perhaps it's more about not becoming too carried away in a certain momentum of goal-orientation toward orgasm, or swept up in a contracted view or intention. This offers a clearer way of understanding it. Once again, everything returns to contraction—and this encompasses far more than just the heart. We speak of contraction of view, contraction of vision, contraction of sensibility.

The heart could be completely open while the soul-making sensibility, the visionary way of perceiving, remains quite narrow—closed, contracted, restricted to a limited view. So perhaps the question becomes whether we're being carried away in some contraction toward whatever goal we hold, whether orgasm or something else, or whether our view and intention have become constricted.

But when we're not carried away, when there's no contraction, then possibility opens. The possibility of perceiving, of imagining, of the soul-making dynamic—the psychopoios—actually coming alive in the moment, expanding, taking on its own life, filling out. However we might describe it: the fire spreading, the water flowing and filling, plumping out and expanding, so that dimensionality emerges. The cosmic dimension opens, the vision of the other deepens, the vision of oneself clarifies, the erotic imagination flowers—all of this that we've touched upon becomes possible because we're not contracted in greed, craving, or narrow vision.

Still, I wouldn't want to impose any rigid rules or formulas for exactly how this unfolds. This remains, for me, a deeply fascinating question to explore.

What's remarkable and worthy of gratitude is that even when we miss the soul-making in the moment, the beautiful emptiness of memory allows experiences to become soulful later. Dimensionality can be revealed and discovered and opened through remembrance. This applies not only to sexuality, of course, but to any experience. Sometimes the vision in the moment isn't consciously open enough, yet as memory holds the experience—perhaps the next day or whenever—it can begin to gather imaginal reality, imaginal dimensions.

This opens an intriguing exploration: What supports soul-making in sexuality? What allows sexuality to become soul-making? This extends beyond heartfulness, beyond love, beyond all the other elements we've discussed, into the specific question of what nourishes the soul through erotic experience.

Related to everything we've explored, if soul-making through sexuality is what interests us, it might initially seem more obviously soul-making when the sexual experience—whether actual or imaginal—carries certain flavors, tones, or characteristics. For instance, when it's very light, melting, warm, tender—obviously warm and tender. Such experiences, whether imaginal or actual, might feel unmistakably soul-making.

But in the eros of psychopoios, because of the movement toward expansion, can we —and some will find this easier at certain times than others for many different reasons —include not just the light and melting and warm, tender sexuality that obviously nurtures the soul, but also, as we've discussed, the darker, more voracious, less conventional expressions? These too hold tremendous soul-making potential.

Again, we must resist quick assumptions. Some people assume, because of social norms, cultural conditioning, various forms of indoctrination, that certain expressions must be disrespectful. They assume there's no love in such encounters, that they necessarily involve objectification.

But what does objectification actually mean? To me, it means not seeing and valuing the totality of another person's being. Can we look again, more closely, more openly, without assumptions, and actually question: Is this truly disrespectful? Is there really no love present? Am I actually objectifying?

Perhaps there's a holiness, a divinity, a sacredness here—whatever words we might choose—that becomes palpable and evident when we open our eyes and attune our gaze. Perhaps we need to notice it, to relax the gaze, because this isn't something we can force. We cannot gaze at an image or experience and demand a sense of sacredness appear.

I don't want to be heavy-handed with this approach. Remember: the poetry of perception, the art of perception. This is always an art.

And sometimes that's more a matter of being more open, more spacious, more receptive, more attuned, more subtle, more light. There's a time for heavy-handedness. There's a time for laser beam attention and all that. And there are other times where what we more is revealed in the art of perception through much softer and less pressured approaches.

But again, if we're talking about soul-making and we talked about the three different ways that, for instance, the sexuality and the sexual images and language in tantric Buddhism could be interpreted—as just a symbol, only symbolic, referring to spiritual realities, certainly not bodily or sexual ones. There's one interpretation. But if we're really interested in bringing the soul-making, allowing the soul-making to fill out, to change and to open and to give dimensionality and beauty and divinity to our sense of sexuality and our experience of sex and sexuality, then we have to go beyond just this view that it's only symbolic. That sexuality can only have a symbolic function in the path, in spiritual teachings.

Can we—is it possible, and I think it really is—re-sanctify sex and sexuality, a whole relationship with something that has been deemed dirty and kind of low? Or that has just received a modicum of soulfulness in its relation to heartfulness—"I really love this person"—which is wonderful. But can we actually re-sanctify it?

As I said, that means not just the light, but also the dark. Not just the insubstantial, but also the dense. Not just the gentle, but also the ferocious. So that the whole range of possibilities becomes opened. We're not shrinking down, limiting the soul-making dynamic with regard to sexuality.

In that third possible interpretation of sexuality in Tantric Buddhism, it's only a vehicle. It just happens to be the most expedient vehicle for re-channeling the energy, body energies, so that the consciousness opens to emptiness or clear light, or so that you get a more intense bliss or ecstasy. That's all good and fine and possible and certainly valuable to explore. But in the way we're talking about all this, it's also a vehicle for soul-making. And that means the cosmopoiesis and the divinity is wrapped up with it, as we said, in this whole sense of participation. It's not only symbolic, and it's not only a vehicle for bliss or energy or emptiness.

So re-sanctification of sex and sexuality actually involves the imaginal. It involves the imaginal. This is what will open a multiplicity and multidimensionality of sacredness in the perception of anything, once the relationship with that thing becomes eros, imaginal.

As we alluded to before, what can easily happen is, instead of the relationship with sex and the conception of sex, and the view of it, and the way we regard it, instead of being soul-making—and the sex itself, and the whole way we conceive of it and relate to it—it can very easily become about the ego. And that's different than soul-making, isn't it? Because it's got this reification thing, and it's got this tight self-view thing. Ego's not a word I use a lot, but let's say that. Versus the dimensionality, the openness of our definition of soul-making.

I think I mentioned early on Michel Foucault and his history of sexuality. He did a lot of these studies where he called it archaeology—tracing movements, political movements, or certain discourses in modern Western societies and modern Western culture, and how certain discourses grew or took certain directions and certain institutions developed, and ways of thinking and political laws and all kinds of things.

One of the studies he did was in relation to sexuality. He also did something similar in relation to madness and other things as well. So he traces through the 19th century the upsurge, swelling in the kind of discourses on sexuality. It started then, and suddenly there's this burgeoning of discourses on sexuality. And particularly among these discourses, the focus on details of what was regarded as sexual perversions from the norm. So that suddenly started being fascinating for people—chronicling it and dividing it up and diagnosing it and all the rest of it.

He traces certain institutions that were part of that process and concentrated that process and crystallized it. One was the Catholic confessional. Of course, people go and —"Father, I've sinned." "What have you done?" "Well, I've masturbated," or whatever it is. And then also Freudian psychoanalysis, where there was an intense scrutinizing of sexual fantasy and sexual behavior, put in quite a rigid interpretive framework, as was, generally speaking, the Catholic confessional, and other institutions and discourses that emerged then, in that time, in the 19th century. I mean, the Catholic confessional goes back before, but there was perhaps a growth in that then.

Foucault was quite interested in power dynamics and what happens to the whole notion of the human subject. So he traced, in this archaeology, he traced the emergence of a series of discourses and practices that either were deliberately designed or intended, or inadvertently had the effect of making the subject of these discourses or these procedures or institutions more reliably and extensively responsible for itself.

I'm actually quoting someone called David West now, who wrote a book on certain philosophical streams in the 20th century and before in Western philosophy. But Foucault's quite interested in this—something was really not much of an issue.

Sexuality was promoted in this process from a relatively unimportant fact about bodies, like going to the toilet or digestion, to something decisive for an individual's sense of identity. That's really quite interesting to me. Sexuality promoted from being a relatively unimportant fact about bodies in Western culture of a certain time to being something decisive for an individual sense of identity. Again, not for everyone, but quite a lot.

So it becomes something quite loaded and quite central and intimately connected with the whole sense of self and identity. And wrapped up in that is this whole power dynamic, which Foucault was particularly interested in. So that, for instance, in the Catholic confessional or in Freudian psychoanalysis, you are now responsible for this. We're opening up this territory. You're talking about this experience. We're interpreting it a certain way.

In Freud's case, it's something very dangerous that civilization needed to keep a lid on, so to speak, and maybe let out enough steam so that the boiler doesn't blow. But generally speaking, the id and the instinct of sexuality needs to be repressed to a certain extent, or controlled at least to a certain extent. And again, in the Catholic confession, it has a certain interpretive view of sexuality, and so this is now getting the subject, this self or that self, to be, in West's words, more reliably and extensively responsible for itself.

So something that hadn't been so, this whole area that one needs to fret about and think about and control - it becomes now an area either to worry about, to feel guilty about, to obsess about, or, what's more common nowadays, central to my identity. So a lot of identity construction revolves around sexuality, sexual expression, sexual style, sexual manifestation, sexual experience, or lack of experience - sexual prowess, whatever it is.

I probably wouldn't make this too black and white. I'm sure these were all seeds that existed in Western culture anyway. But what's interesting is how they get amplified and drawn out and connected with the sense of identity.

This is related to something I've touched on a couple of times over the talks: our whole sense of self, our whole notion of self, and our whole actual sense of self - who I feel I am, who you feel you are, what we feel is involved in a self and important in a self - is actually enlarged in modernism or with the advent of modernism to include, in this case, a new delineation. Sexuality, what kind of sexuality, what's the sexual expression, what's the sexual style, what's the sexual domain of experience, and so on.

The larger point is that the self that we experience as so natural, and in many cases problematic, is actually a different kind of self-experience than, say, that the Buddha was addressing in the time that he was teaching in India - Pali Canon Buddhism. We now have a whole kind of complexity and range and landscape of psychic interiority that didn't really exist for people before these delineations were made, whether it was sexuality or this or that or whatever.

So the whole complexity and range - making these delineations makes the interiority more complex and more stretched, if you like. And then all this plays into questions about identity and our fretting about identity or our celebration of identity and all of that.

Now, I'm not actually judging this or even the rise of the importance of individualism and identity. I mean, it certainly has a shadow side and we don't need to rehearse that again and go over it. It's pretty obvious, especially if you've been exposed to any Dharma teachings. But go back to what we were talking about - making delineations near the beginning of this course. And Epictetus saying, "Everything's got two handles. Beware of the wrong one."

So when we make delineations, for instance, the whole fretting of identity can get hold of it in a way that's actually, like a double-edged sword, problematic. It can be problematic. There has been a proliferation, according to Foucault and even beyond his time, around sexuality and its relationship with identity, and it's become, as I said, something decisive for an individual's sense of identity. Not for everyone, and certain generations may be less so, but certainly beyond a certain date in Western society.

People may not talk about it so much, but that may also be wrapped up in reasons why we're not talking about it, and there might be someone not talking about it. Actually, there's still a kind of identity view around that. Not for everyone.

But this kind of proliferation of delineations and of the whole emergence into what it means for the self, and what a self is, and the interiority, and the complexity, and the identity there - it is a sort of double-edged sword. There's a growth there, which we could regard as papañca, or we could also regard it as exactly the eros-psyche-logos dynamic expanding in terms of making delineations, thinking about these things, having fantasies and images around all that, and even the eros in regard to sexuality - in other words, the erotic relationship with sexuality, in the meaning of the erotic imaginal, filling it out.

So it can be that, and it can be that for the individual, or it can be a snag for the ego - get too tight around this whole identity business and fretting and worrying and feeling constrained or whatever it is. So as always, in our way of thinking, I'd say the test is: is it soul-making? Is it soul-making? And if it's not, can I actually find a different relationship with it that opens it up as soul-making? Rather than it leading to neurosis or worry about the self and the identity and alienation, pressure to conform, pressure to perform, whatever it is. Or pressure to be interesting or unique or whatever. All this is the concrete, narrow, contracted...

self-view or ego, if we use that language. It's not soul-making. Can soul-making be the test here?

It doesn't need, or it shouldn't need saying, but it's actually important to say: there needs to be kindness with all this. How easily we can get either very self-judgmental with this, or down on ourselves, or worried about ourselves, or actually quite militant and rigid in our thinking. Again, it's just too much concretism, too much concretization, too much literalism, too much reification.

But really, in regard to all this and the possibilities in our relationship with sex and sexuality, we really need kindness in the exploration. So that's really important to say, to realize that.

CHAPTER 82

Refractions: Of Body, Sensuality, and Sexuality (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 1h13

> In this profound exploration, Rob Burbea examines the shadows cast by Buddhist insights and the importance of questioning our own tradition's blind spots. He warns against a "lazy Buddha Dharma" that dismisses the complexities of embodiment and sexuality as mere papañca (proliferation), arguing that soul-making requires engagement with delineation-making rather than spiritual bypassing.
>
> Burbea presents a revolutionary understanding of the body through the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, showing how soul-making inevitably opens up our sense of embodiment. Drawing on phenomenological approaches, he explores the energy body across its full spectrum of perceived substantiality—from ethereal lightness to dense materiality. The body becomes both imaginal object and subject, a locus for diverse ways of knowing that extend beyond conventional sense perceptions.
> Challenging Freud's notion of "polymorphous perversity," Burbea proposes instead a "polymorphously erotic soul-making" where the body reveals infinite facets and dimensions. He envisions the body as a "soul-scape" with its own intelligence, will, and desire—not merely a biological system but an endless source of discovery and creation through the soul-making process.

To say in different words something I think I've said before, perhaps on a few different occasions: It's important, I feel, to question and to be mindful and to be on the lookout for our own shadow. As we proceed on our path, it's very easy to look at someone else's path, some other tradition, and see their shadow, their weak spots, their unexamined areas, their blind spots, places where they're out of balance. More relevant, more important, is to look at our own shadow and the shadows of our own tradition and our own trajectory and our own path-making.

I'm using the word shadow here probably in a slightly different way than you might have grown accustomed to it. I'm using it in the sense that any time we throw light on something, anytime any object or event or thing is illuminated by a light, by consciousness, by exploration—so anytime a light illuminates something—that thing, or that whole process of the light and the thing, casts a shadow. Any time we open something up to questioning, we illuminate it, bring consciousness to bear, look at it from different perspectives. All this creates shadow. Shadow is not just the place rejected by trauma or something in the psyche. It's actually what happens any time consciousness brings itself to bear, so to speak, or is put in relationship with anything. Light and an object causes a shadow—if you think just about the physics of it.

In other words, insights illuminate, but they also cast a shadow—a shadow of insight. Each insight, each perspective that insight brings, or each insight that is a perspective, casts a particular shadow, or a shadow in a particular direction, has a way of shadowing in a corresponding direction to the insight. Imagine here's the light of insight shining from a particular direction on an object—a stone, a tree, an animal. There's then a shadow behind that stone, tree, animal in relationship to where the light is coming from. It's just how light and shadow works. It's similar with insight.

We can talk about the shadow of particular perspectives, or the shadows of particular insights. The whole Four Noble Truths is a kind of insight system, a perspective, a set of insights, if you like, and it casts a lot of light, a lot of illumination, but it has a shadow to it, or shadows to it, blind spots—things that by virtue of that very light that's shining from a certain direction are then cast into darkness.

The whole movement, or just the insight of not-self, no-self—fantastic insight, really liberating—will cast a particular kind of shadow in relationship to the self. Or the movement of renunciation. Or the whole movement to simplifying. It can be so helpful to simplify: just papañca, proliferation, let go. But this brings a certain blindness, a certain blind spot in a certain corresponding or corollary or opposite direction. What's the shadow of simplism? What's the shadow of the teachings of no-self? What's even the shadow of the Four Noble Truths?

This is important. I mean it in that sense, in a very wide sense. For me, wherever we are, whatever we're opening up, whatever we're exploring, however we're moving, there's this possibility of shadow, shadows, and there's an ongoing kind of exploration there. It won't ever end. We don't ever get to the end of shadow, so to speak. It's created by the very process of consciousness itself. So this is important to know and important to include in our ongoing journey.

In relation to what we just finished in the last part of the talk—elaborating on and describing this emergence of sexuality as a sort of area of delineation that then became interesting and became filled out and became complicated and added a new complexity to the self and the notion and the felt sense of self—and that whole movement, historical movement that Foucault was tracing and we were talking about in different ways, elaborating on and adding to what he said: we said this proliferation of delineation, this increase in complexity, increase in the psychic interiority of the self and the whole sense of what the self is, that that proliferation is a double-edged sword. We have to be careful with that.

We can see that it is a movement of soul-making, a movement of this expansion, widening, deepening, complicating, enriching—the eros psychē logos, the dynamic of soul-making, and those three facets kind of do to each other or involve each other. It can also be a snag, a snare, a trap, a net of entanglement for ego. So it's a double-edged sword.

Now in terms of shadow, what I mean is that it may be easy to look at all this from what we could call the perspective of a kind of lazy Buddha-dharma, the response of a lazy Buddha-dharma. One could sit here and just in a very relaxed way, very almost lazy and sloppy, say: "Proliferation. You see, that's papañca, that's exactly the translation of papañca—proliferation. Sex, these things bring dukkha. They only bring dukkha. Let go."

Let go. Be simple. Let go of all this business about self. Let go of all these delineations. Let go of all this exploration of the complexities of sexuality and all that. Let go. Be simple. So shrug it off.

And basically there is this shrugging off and the seduction there of the simplism, the seduction of the promise of peace, but the seduction also of simplicity. And really the encouragement is not to engage. Don't engage with the process of soul-making and the complexities of soul-making, which will involve a rub, which will sometimes involve a rupturing of vessels, as we've said, the breaking of the vessels, which will involve friction and heat and confusion at times and expansion and stretching of the soul, of the vision, of the concept.

So one of the shadows of Buddha-Dharma—and it almost comes with the package of the Four Noble Truths, and what I was referring to as the medical model and this emphasis on peace and letting go—so it's a treasure, but it comes with a shadow. And part, especially nowadays, part of that shadow is this what I call simplism and the seduction of simplism and the kind of non-engagement.

What will happen if we adopt that approach, if we sit back in that kind of lazy posture there, what I'm calling a lazy Buddha-Dharma, then there will not be, there cannot be the soul-making with respect to self and individuality. And personhood and persona and these things that we've touched on in the past, self as a whole, direction, avenue, doorway, movement and manifestation of soul-making just cannot happen. Nor sex, nor sexuality.

Why? Because we've just gone back to the simplism and shrugging it off and calling it all just papañca, proliferation, and just self equals a bad word. Didn't the Buddha say there's no self?

And in that, one is not recognizing, if one adopts such a posture, one is not recognizing something we touched on right at the beginning of the retreat, and we spent a lot of time expanding, elaborating on that. The soul-making process, the soul-making dynamic, the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, involves and works by—in part works by—making delineations.

Delineations become clear to the perception of the sensitive soul, of the sensibility that is refined through eros, through interest, through arousal, through contact and desiring more contact, emotional sensitivity, perceptual sensitivity, sensual sensitivity, mental sensitivities and delineations of the concepts.

We can call it papañca and proliferation, and yes, there's all kinds of dangers involved in it, as we're pointing out, but it is also intrinsic, for the most part, to the soul-making dynamic.

And even when one moves—I can't remember if I said this—but even when one moves towards the simplifying of less fabrication, states of oneness, jhāna, and moves on that trajectory of lessening fabrication towards the unfabricated, there is still a very subtle and important delineation making going on, according to what? According to the Four Noble Truths. Where's the suffering? Where's the release from suffering? What is involved in supporting suffering, in what we're calling clinging, and everything, all the subtlety of what's involved in clinging, and letting go of that, all these subtle delineations are involved in that particular movement of soul-making towards the unfabricated, towards the different levels of oneness.

But generally speaking, adopting that as a kind of lazy Buddha-Dharma posture or stance in response to all this and the complexity and the demands, really, of all that, what the soul is being called to, what the soul is calling us to in relationship with sexuality, in relationship with sexuality and body, and also in relationship with self, self-notion, self-construct, self-view, self-images—to adopt that lazy posture would be not to recognize the intrinsicness of delineation making, not to rise to that challenge, not to meet it, not to open it, not to be bothered, really.

So the soul-making dynamic involves delineation making of all kinds, and more subtle and more complex delineation making, not as some kind of sort of anally retentive accountant approach, categorization process and boxing everything into neat boxes and being too picky about that. But it includes that.

And the soul-making process will include and will affect the sense of self, the view of self, the idea, the concept of self. The sense of other, the view of other, the idea and the concept of other and of eros. So all this, it's included. We can shrug it off, try and be simple, decide not to engage, criticize it with certain Dharma by labeling it with Dharma concepts of papañca and self, defilement and all that. But the soul-making process will involve delineations and will include and affect how we view, sense and think of self, other and eros, which means sexuality as well, as a part of eros, as a dimension or a strand of eros.

You know, in recent years there's a growing movement of opening up and making more visible and opening up for discussion and questioning not just the possibility of sexual orientation and the definitions and what's allowable in terms of sexual orientation, but also in terms of gender definitions and delineations, and a kind of refusal to be limited by the sort of two possibilities given to us, male, female, that are handed to us, if you like, seemingly, obviously. So there's a possibility of being polygendered, if you like, or both, or neither, or something completely different.

This whole movement of opening those discourses up around sexual orientation, around gender, delineations and definitions, identities, opening it up, questioning, talking about, and refusing to be nailed into just two delineations there—I wonder whether that whole movement of opening that's happening more and more I think in recent years, if that could also be seen as a soul-making movement.

It's the movement of your psyche-logos doing exactly what it tends to do. And that can be an individual movement, of course, for the individual in relationship to those areas and those delineations. The soul making comes into contact with them and it doesn't fit. It wants more. The vessels need to be broken. And it can also be a cultural movement. Soul making can happen on a cultural level as well.

So I wonder if that's one way of seeing what's going on there, quite aside from all the political issues there. There could be really at heart there a soul-making movement.

In imaginal work, as I've mentioned before, when I remain open to the imaginal and allow the mundus imaginalis—the imaginal realm—to receive me and lead me without constraint, the whole restriction of gender simply doesn't apply. One may embody the gender typically associated with oneself, or the opposite gender—though even thinking in terms of "opposites" reduces the vast spectrum to merely a binary male-female possibility. One could be hermaphrodite, could be non-gendered, or might transcend even the constraints of biological and physical actualities.

The imaginal eroticism one witnesses or participates in may be heterosexual or homoerotic, may not involve human beings at all, or may involve partly human beings. As I've said before, one might be penetrating or penetrated in ways that don't correspond to biological actualities. The imaginal realm remains radically open in this way.

And as with all imaginal practice, one of the essential questions becomes: what wants to manifest in actual life, in lived experience, and how? Among all these imaginal possibilities, some may require no manifestation or expression in daily life whatsoever. Some need manifestation that isn't obviously related at first glance to the original image. Others call for more direct, recognizable forms of expression.

The eros-psyche-logos dynamic—the soul-making dynamic—as we mentioned almost from the beginning, will eventually open everything up. More precisely, it tends toward opening more and more of our experience, more and more facets of being. This represents its natural inclination because of how it fundamentally operates. Included in this opening is the body itself: what the body means to us, how it appears to us, how we feel and sense it, how we think about and conceive of it. This opening up of the body through the soul-making process becomes inevitable—it must be included.

This opening happens in very obvious ways and also in much less obvious ways. Already we've touched on some of this, and it forms part of what we're presenting and teaching here. Simply by beginning with what we call the phenomenological approach —attending to the actual experience of body—we discover what we term the energy body. Just by adopting this phenomenological stance and backing away from rigid ideation about what body is according to whatever dogma we've been indoctrinated with—whether modern secular materialism, scientific reductionism, or some religious worldview—just by giving a bit more space from these conceptual strangleholds, the sense of the energy body begins to become clear.

As we play with this perception through different ways of looking, experimenting within our phenomenological approach with various modes of attention, tuning in differently and bringing sensitivity and curiosity to this experience of the energy body, the very range of energy body experience starts to open. Already, through this basic, simple approach and exploration, there is an opening of what the body is to us and what our experience and idea of the body encompasses.

But at some point, wrapped up with this or in addition to it, the body can also become image. We realize there are imaginal dimensions to our perception of the body. This can happen both directly and indirectly. The body—our own body, a lover's body, or someone else's body—can become the erotic object for us, included in their personhood or simply as body per se. The body becomes the erotically beloved other. In this way, the body gains imaginal dimension directly through erotic relationship.

Or something else serves as the erotic beloved, and there's a spilling over, an expansion of soul-making sensibilities that comes to include and involve the perception of the body, perhaps through cosmopoiesis. We realize, as we do with all perception, that imaginal threads and imaginal dimensions are woven through our perception of the world, of body, of everything. We can speak of imaginal body just as we speak of imaginal earth—the imaginal perception of body, the imaginal perception of earth.

But whether directly or indirectly, the body in the soul-making process—in being included, wrapped up in, drawn into, involved in this soul-making gestation, digestion, vortex, whirlwind—becomes more than it was yesterday, more than it was last year, more than it was to us before. The body becomes more, like everything else included in the soul-making process. It gains dimensionality, beauty, sacredness, multifacetedness, complication. The body becomes more.

It becomes alive in ways beyond what we typically consider in our usual, culturally given and sanctioned ways of thinking about and perceiving the body. Where we normally think of body as either alive or dead in an obviously biological sense, it becomes alive in other ways, becomes more. It's given dimensionality and multifacetedness that it didn't possess before.

This "moreness"—this gaining more, being given more, having more discovered within the body—happens in two ways I'd like to delineate. First, the body as object: the object of my sensing, my perception, my vision, touch, smell, taste, hearing. Also the object of my thought and of my imaginal perception. All of these are interconnected, of course. But the body as object becomes more, becomes more alive, is given dimensionality.

Second, the body as subject—meaning the body as a kind of place, a gathering place or locus for ways of knowing. Subject is what knows, as opposed to object, which is what is known.

Body as locus of ways of knowing. And those ways of knowing, again, they're more than I knew yesterday. They may be new to me as an individual. This body, and through the body, through the soul-making process, through the erotic imaginal ways of knowing, are open to me that opened to me in that process that I hadn't known before, that I wasn't familiar with before. All ways of knowing that are new to the culture.

So it might be that those ways of knowing were known to perhaps ancient cultures or certain indigenous cultures in this or that place in the world, but they might be new to this culture, or they might be new to all cultures. But again, because of the soul-making process, there is not this contraction of ways of knowing in some kind of dogma. Only this way of knowing and that way of knowing are legitimate. Everything else is a delusion, a projection, a fantasy in the bad sense, immature wish fulfillment, whatever, confusion and ignorance.

There is not that epistemicide and epistemic cleansing that we spoke of before. Rather, there is an opening of epistemic potential. The body becomes more as both object of sense, thought, image, and as locus of ways of knowing, potential ways of knowing.

We'll return to this. But already, previously on this course and on other courses, we've presented things and tried to open up the sense of the body and what the body is. For example, with the teachings on the energy body and our trying to stress and insist on an inclusion of the whole spectrum of perceived substantiality of the body.

In other words, if we talk about energy body, it can be extremely refined—almost like you could put your hand through the body, or it's just light, or sometimes even beyond that, it's just empty space—all the way down to really dense, solid perception of materiality. I'm saying all of that spectrum is included in what we're calling the energy body. Sometimes I regret the way I name things—I feel like I could have chosen better words, but anyway, it's there now. Including all of the spectrum, really getting familiarity with that whole range and everything in between.

Sometimes this encouragement to do that is a matter of kind of rebalancing where there's too much tendency one way or another. For instance, occasionally there are people who keep tending just towards the very sort of airy, more refined, less substantial sense of the body, and it would be good for them to dwell a bit more, have equal range and play in the more solid, more densely material, heavy sense of the body.

But for me, the encouragement to have that whole spectrum there is really not only for the sake of so-called psychological health or psychological balance. Yes, that's important sometimes, but really for me the more important thing is for the soul-making. Because the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic wants, in its natural inclination, to open in all directions and include everything that it can possibly come in contact with. It wants to have all that spectrum. It wants to inhabit and fill out and sacralize all that spectrum.

Part of what it wants and what it achieves by doing that, and for me part of the whole purpose of all this teaching, all this work, is to widen our senses of the sacred and, if you like, of the divine—if you're okay with that language—widen our senses of the sacred, so that the sacred is not just limited to the ethereal, the insubstantial, the white light. It's also right there. The divinity is right there, as we've touched on before, in the density, in the solidity, in the so-called darkness of matter.

We can look at different cultures, whether they're spiritual cultures or the wider culture, wider Western modernist culture, and ask: what's the typical sort of leaning here? In the wider culture, it's certainly towards density. Probably very few people in the wider culture have regular experience of a sort of light body or anything like that, and would probably get quite alarmed if suddenly they did have that—that's my guess.

Conversely, there might be certain traditions of spiritual teaching and practice where they emphasize much more the light body and almost put down the more dense experiences. But what I think we're interested in is both—both the dense ends and the more refined, more insubstantial, more ethereal ends. Everything in between is open to be filled with the erotic imaginal, seen through the erotic imaginal, filled with soul and soul-making and thus sacralized. And one is familiar with that whole range of experience.

We've talked about that in terms of opening up the body. We've also drawn attention to, again with the way we're talking about the energy body, that the felt sense of the space that the body is or occupies is larger, potentially, phenomenologically. It's actually larger than what is obvious to the visual eye or what is obviously physically measurable. In other words, the sense of the energy body can extend either a little bit beyond the visible, physically measurable physical body, or actually quite a bit.

But the space of the body is also something, or the perceived and conceived space of the body is also something that we have expanded in the way that we've been presenting these teachings. Soul-making tends to include and involve more of the body space. Soul-making, again, is part of the whole Eros-Psyche-Logos tendency of expansion, isn't it? But when there is a movement of soul-making, when there's soul-making in process, it will tend to expand, to include, to involve more of the body space, or the body space, the center of the body space, to have more area to it.

In fact, in our kind of definition of what imaginal practice or mindfulness of images involves, if you remember, it involves, by definition, attention to the whole energy body, mindfulness of the whole energy body. We're including that in what soul-making is, what imaginal practice is, in the way that we're talking about it. And if it's not there, it's something that one can open towards or encourage or lean towards or support in order to give good ground to the soul-making process.

Actually, in connection with that, if we refer back to what we were talking about yesterday with regard to soul-making in sex, whether it's actual sex or imaginal sex—what that then means is that if we want to support sex that's soul-making, sex that's soulful in our sense of the word, then that soul-making needs for the attention not to contract to a small area. For example, the area of maximal pleasure, whether that's the genitals or whatever it is. Because of what we just said, soul-making tends to include more of the body space and expand that, at least to a certain extent.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 5/9). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

If we contract the area of attention—say just to the genitals or wherever there's maximal sensual pleasure, which would be a typical movement of the attention—that won't support soul-making. Rather, it needs us not to contract that awareness, or it's supported more by not contracting that, as well as, as we pointed out yesterday, not contracting into a kind of craving for pleasure or a craving for achieving the goal of orgasm or whatever it is.

If there's contraction in those ways, then soul-making won't be supported so much. This means, in other words, that the imaginal perceptions of the whole experience and the imaginal dimensions that are discoverable or revealed in the whole experience will be diminished—whether that's of the other, of the beloved other, of the sexual partner, of the imaginal other, of the self in that moment, and also of the eros and the sexuality itself. If there's contraction, either of the area of attention too much, or into a kind of goal-driven contraction, then the imaginal perception, the imaginal dimensions of other, self, and eros are diminished, contracted as well, limited, not supported.

But returning to what we're talking about mostly today, in terms of opening up the body and what we've already touched on—we've already alluded a little bit, I think, in different examples to the way that different organs of the body and different body parts can become ensouled. So, for example, the hands or the feet or the genitals or the intestines—they are ensouled in the sense of being given imaginal dimensions, given imaginal beauty, imaginal place. They are seen and felt and sensed to reflect, to echo, to mirror, to express not just the personal in the human level, but also the archetypal, the daimonic, the imaginal dimensions and the imaginal figures expressed in and through the organs or body parts, or the body parts expressing, being those things.

There are all kinds of possibilities here, and I actually can't remember now what examples we've given over the different retreats, but really so many possibilities. I think we talked about the possibility if you massage someone's feet when they're ill or an old person, and how those feet and those legs might take on whole other imaginal dimensions. For instance, they become Jesus' feet or connected somehow with Jesus' feet or something like that. That would be one example.

Another very common one—many of you will probably be familiar with this, I imagine—is just how sensitive the hands are. How easy it is, especially with practice with the energy body, to feel healing energy streaming from your hands or from the palms of your hands. How easy, or relatively easy, let's say, that is, or maybe relatively common practice.

We could say that's an energetic perception. Of course, it's also an imaginal perception. They're both mixed there. And it's a lovely, lovely thing to practice. Sometimes, sitting with someone who's suffering in one way or another—and they don't even have to know—one just turns the palm to them, and it's a way of radiating healing, perhaps as they're talking, perhaps as you're sitting silently, perhaps as you're talking. There's a whole other level of the interaction going on there that's bringing these imaginal dimensions and the blessings of healing and connecting bodies and all of that.

If you haven't played with that sort of thing, it's really a lovely possibility and I would encourage that. And of course it could be from anywhere in the body, the whole body or the heart center or whatever. So many possibilities here.

What about—we talked on the last retreat, I'm not sure how many people picked this up, it's part of what I was referring to as the problem of inertia that we sometimes have as human beings, as practitioners—but the possibility of actually moving in the meditation. Meditation doesn't have to be static. So either the physical body is moving, and it's visible to others if others are there, or the physical body is still, but the energy in the imaginal body is moving and one is really sensitive to the feeling of that. That might look like a kind of slow dance thing or it could look like anything. Or one adopts certain postures that may not be typical postures because something is being expressed through the energy body and through the imaginal body.

What would it be, for instance, to play with that kind of thing—a sensitivity to the whole energy body and feeling the whole body and really attuning to that and feeling the movement of the hands and sensing the movement of the hands as music? Again, there's a synesthesia that we referred to in the last retreat, in the retreat on the poetry of perception. Music is a sound thing, and hands just moving is a bodily, kinesthetic sense, and perhaps a visual sense as well. What is it for the hands moving that they're somehow making music? Maybe they want to move and the hands do a slow dance or a fast dance or whatever it is. And it's music. And what is that music? Celestial music, divine music, the music of the deep body, the music of the earth, of the soil.

All kinds of possibilities here for this expansion of the body in terms of its parts and its organs. The expansion of our sense, our perception, our ideation of it. So the images of the body, the psyche with respect to the body, and the ideas of the body, the logos of the body, open up in all this, in the soul-making process.

But also the eros, the third of our little trinity there—also the eros of the body opens up. This might mean for some people that there is more eros and more libido flowing through the whole system. The system is open to more eros. We can see that as a divine influx. One is open more to the divine influx of eros. One can just see it as the, if you like, inevitable mechanics of the soul-making process. As we've said, as the eros stimulates and opens the psyche-logos, then there is more of the reciprocal stimulation of the eros, and so there is more eros. There's more attraction, there's more beauty, there's more divinity, there's more dimensionality, there's more yumminess, there's more sensitivity. All of that, and so there is more eros.

So the eros that's running through the psyche and through the body is opened up. And with that, the erotic sensibilities of the body are also opened.

So the images of the body, the ideas of the body, and also the eros of the body and the erotic sensibilities of the body—all this is opened. This is just one of the smallest examples of how this could happen, for it could unfold in countless ways. It's one of the ways the eros opens, if you like, and with that the perception of bodies opens.

I remember being at a course with one of my teachers, a monk in the States. It was a half meditation, half study retreat, and somehow we were discussing renunciation—perhaps exploring the Satipatthana Sutta. He was talking about the ways of contemplating the unattractiveness of the body as methods to let go of attachment. I think we were examining the passage from the Satipatthana Sutta on the unclean parts of the body. He explained how you could use that contemplation if you were bothered by sexual desire—contemplate the unclean parts of the body, and that would dampen your sexual fire.

Then someone in the group spoke up: "Oh yes, but I work as a nurse on the surgical team for transplants. When someone's waiting for a liver transplant and we get the call that someone has died in a road accident and they're a donor, and their liver is on its way in the ambulance—it's operation time. There's this anticipation for this liver to arrive, and it gets delivered in this blood bath. It's literally in a basin, soaked in blood because it needs to be preserved in blood. Something which, to most perception—in terms of what you're describing—would be absolutely disgusting: a liver soaking in blood, a raw liver soaking in blood. But actually, it looks beautiful. There's real beauty in the scent of the miracle of it—this is going to save a life."

My teacher, being very skillful, acknowledged this perspective. He didn't use the language of "ways of looking," but I'm pretty sure that dependency was recognized. This was long ago, but the point about the dependency on the way of looking was clear.

We've given examples too of the erotic imaginal—this sense of feasting on the flesh, feasting on the organs, drinking the blood of the erotic beloved. In that sense, the erotic relationship with the body has gone far beyond this division of clean and unclean parts, beyond the yucky and the superficially pleasant. It's transcended what traditional teaching often presents: "It's all very nice on the surface, but if you really saw the inside, you wouldn't like it." The expansion of eros has moved way beyond that.

In this eros moving through perception, moving through the body, there's also an expansion in the ways it perceives the body as attractive and what that encompasses. As I mentioned when giving those examples, there's no danger here of actually becoming a cannibal or anything like that. We're speaking of something deeply respectful, beautiful, loving—strange as that might sound to some people—imbued with holiness, but a lustful holiness, a lusty holiness, an erotic, full-blooded erotic holiness with much more range to it. That's just one small example among many, many possibilities.

So in other words, yes, there's this traditional contemplation of the unclean parts, and usually we think it's all very nice on the surface, but you'd be pretty put off in terms of the eros you feel toward someone and their body if you could see inside. But the nurse was saying it's not that simple, and that was acknowledged. We're adding a whole other level to that understanding as well. There are so many possibilities here.

I'm aware of painting in quite broad brushstrokes the whole movement here, but there are indeed countless possibilities. Freud, at one point in his theorizing, said that the human infant is characterized by "polymorphous perversity"—a wonderfully evocative phrase. The human infant is polymorphously perverse. Part of what this means is that the whole body of the infant is erotically sensitive. The entire body is, if you like, an erogenous zone. The infant naturally will be inclined, perhaps at different stages, to seek to gratify its eros—in Freud's view, its desire for sense pleasure—through different parts of the body, the whole body, in all kinds of ways.

There is thus the necessity of training by parents or caregivers, and through that training and what Freud called the superego—the moral supervisor, if you like, in relationship with the ego—this dynamic leads to a kind of contracting or shrinking of that polymorphous perversity, that unrestrained and all-inclusive eroticism. It's contracted through the training of upbringing and through the psychic structure of the superego, perhaps pushed down into the so-called unconscious. And also physically, there's a shrinking of the ways the body feels eros most easily, what's available in terms of how the eros moves in and through the body, where and how.

Now Freud—you can hear it in the very language he used: "polymorphous perversity." Perversity implies something bad, twisted, abnormal, negative, problematic. But Freud, in his view of human nature, regarded this contraction as really necessary. In his understanding, we are basically wild animals.

He was following on from Darwin and all that. We're basically wild animals with massive instinctual force that needs to be tamed, controlled by the strictures and structures of civilization and upbringing, and even the structures and dynamics of the psyche internally. So polymorphous perversity is part of the Freudian theoretical legacy.

But now we're saying soul-making will open everything. The eros-psyche-logos dynamic will open everything, including the body, including the eros, in all kinds of ways. So we might say that in its opening up of the body and of the eros and of the sexuality, what it supports and opens is a polymorphous erotic soul-making—a polymorphously erotic soul-making, and a polyvalently erotic soul-making.

Polymorphous may mean it can change and manifest this way, manifest that way. Polyvalently might mean it can be situated here or there—the eros, the arousal, the erotic connection—in all kinds of locations, physically and psychically.

Rather than polymorphous perversity—suggesting something is there intrinsically and then needs to get squashed down—we're suggesting quite the reverse. The soul-making process, the expansion, enrichment, complication of eros-psyche-logos, actually begins to open the erotic soul-making of the body and of the psyche, so that there is this polymorphously and polyvalently erotic soul-making.

This means that the whole sense of eros and the body as a location and a vessel and a point of contact of the eros—and an object and a subject of the eros—becomes multi-faceted and multidimensional and multi-delineated in different ways. In other words, the body presents, and the eros of the body grows new facets, grows new ways, things we hadn't even thought of before, things we hadn't even been sensitive to before.

Facets, dimensions, delineations—going back to what we said before, delineations get made. Because the eros-psyche-logos dynamic inevitably will include the body. It has to include the body at some point, and it will do it more and more. It's an increase in the facets, a multi-facetedness, a multi-dimensionality, an increase in the delineation, a kind of poly-erotic, poly-directionality of the eros. An increase in the modes and the surfaces and the subjects of the eros within one body and the directions.

Again, I'm aware of painting in broad brushstrokes, but just to give you a sense of the principle involved here is the most important thing.

Now, if there's potentially—theoretically—no limit to the soul-making process, to the dynamic of eros-psyche-logos and the way that expands, deepens, widens, what that implies is there's no limit to the ways the sense of the body can open. If the body is included in the soul-making process and gets involved in that, then there's no limit to the ways the sense of the body can open, because there's no limit to soul-making.

This means that the images, perceptions, ideas, understandings, and experiences of the body—no limit to the way all that can open. But also, no limit to the way the sense of the body as a site for myriad and diverse ways of knowing, ways of perceiving—that's also potentially infinite in the ways that it can open. The body as a site for myriad and diverse ways of knowing and ways of perceiving.

We've touched on this—for instance, my friend saying she senses with her ovaries or her ovaries have intelligence or knowing, knowledge coming through the imaginal tongue. There are all kinds of possibilities here. And if it's potentially infinite—the way that the body can open up as a locus, as a site for myriad and diverse ways of knowing and perceiving—we can't know what the future holds, what ways of knowing might open up for me, for you, for humanity. Because it's infinite, because the soul-making process will make delineations that don't even occur to me right now, or you, or us. It will gather sensitivities, will open up visions and senses and knowings there.

No limit to the ways the sense of the body can open, potentially, because there's no limit to soul-making.

Included in that is a statement about the logos of the body—in other words, the conception we have of the body. So often we consider the body and the mind or the body and the soul as different things. But as the soul-making dynamic opens up more and more, what it does is open up different views, different potential views. Going right back to the beginning of what we were saying, what that eventually means is that there is this potential to move in and out of different views, to entertain different views.

So the statement that the body is not the soul, or the body has no soul, is just one view. It can enter into that, it can see that way, it can sense that way, it can think that way. Sure. But it's only one view. And there are other views.

If by soul we mean—going back again to the beginning and the kind of glossary we were doing—that which knows and senses soulfully, that which knows, sees and senses soulfully, well, does the body have that?

Or one goes to a purely material view—there is no soul, there's just matter, and if you connect things the right way chemically, you get consciousness and thought and such—and that's just another view.

With soul-making and with reflection and intelligence and understanding, we have the capacity to entertain different views. The range of views we can entertain, the range of concepts and conceptual frameworks we can entertain—this expands with soul-making, with the practice. We're not believing in one idea, a single or ultimate truth or reality. This is how things are. This is how the body is. This is what matter is.

So there's something here about the very idea, the very logos of body. But there's also something here about the body as logos, meaning the body as a structure or structures of knowing, and the expansion of that beyond just the five senses given to us by contemporary psychology. The Buddha had six, but there are systems that have seven or eight or nine, and sometimes I've heard up to twelve.

The body as logos, as a locus of structures of knowing, more than the ones we are given by current neurophysiological science. The body as a womb of epistemic structures, a womb of modes of knowing. As the soul-making process, as the eros-psyche-logos dynamic meets and subsumes matter, flesh, body, then there is this womb, this potential. The body becomes a kind of womb or an area of potentiality of epistemic structures, of possible modes of knowing. They can emerge, they can be born out of that. That's what the body is as subject.

With the whole imbuing or filling out of the sense of the body imaginally, the imaginal perception of the body, and that sensitivity and the beauty of that—the body, the sense of the body, the perception of the body can become greatly expanded in all kinds of ways, alive and multidimensional in all kinds of ways. This body can become a landscape, a soul-scape that is alive with its own intelligence, with its own will, with its own soul. Body as soul-scape that we can enter into. The multi-dimensionality of that. A very different way of perceiving and conceiving of body.

For some, that might be already the experience and already quite obvious. Body has its own intelligence. Again, I don't just mean how clever it is that the blood can transport immune factors to a site of a wound. I don't mean just a kind of metaphor of intelligence for something that's actually quite blind and dumb—a process that's just evolved through the forces of blind natural evolution, survival of the fittest. I mean intelligence, different kinds of intelligence. And I mean soul, and I mean will and desire.

For some, that's already obvious and already part of the experience. For others, this might sound completely preposterous, and the possibility of actually being able to perceive such a body—the body that way, with one's own or someone else's—might seem very distant.

In a way, it doesn't matter either way. What matters really is: what's the next step for the soul-making? With the intelligence of the movement of soul-making, where does it want to go next? And is there a block there?

We can ask that for the individual. Where does the soul-making want to go next? What does it want to do if it's with the body right now? What's the next opening for that individual, for any individual, me or you or whoever? Do I need to stay with a certain opening for a while, get used to that, before something else starts pressing and insisting on opening? And what am I blocking? What's being blocked and how? Through the image, through the logos, whatever. The block of the eros.

We can ask it individually, but also culturally. What is the next step? What is the next step for the soul-making? Where does it want to move? What does it want to expand? What does it want to enrich, widen, deepen, complicate?

With regard to the body, then, the body becomes infinite. Or the body is infinite. But by that I don't mean spatially infinite, and neither do I mean the body is infinite in the sense of being interconnected with all things—the butterfly wings in China affecting the breeze, or breathing in the air that the Buddha breathed in his first sermon. I don't mean infinite in that sense, interconnected with all things. I don't mean spatially infinite. I don't mean there being infinite awareness or infinite love or whatever it is in essence that the body is.

I mean infinite more in the sense of endlessly revealing, endlessly opening up for discovery, for creation—creation-discovery—new facets, other facets, dimensions, aspects of body, and endlessly revealing as infinite in that sense.

So really, we're interested in what the body becomes, what it becomes through the soul-making process.

Also, of course, what the self becomes, what the other, what others become, what the sense of a human being becomes, what animals become, what plants, what the cosmos becomes through the soul-making process, and can become, what matter becomes, what divinity becomes through the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, what it becomes to us, to our experience, to our perception, to our conception.

And that's a different question than what it is. Being interested in what the body is presumes more of a realist notion—it is this. And I'm going to discover or prove to you or insist on my version of what it is. In terms of the energy body, you get different systems. There's these chakras, and they're placed here, and then another system, and some other tradition will say, "No, no, no, there's these many chakras, and they're placed here, and they're this color, not that color," and so forth. "Well, these are the channels that flow, the energy channels through the body, not those channels."

Or someone insisting on, again, the sort of scientific reductionist, classical scientific reductionist view of matter—this one-dimensionality—that's the reality. Or even what's quite popular in some more modern ways of thinking is kind of systems theory. The body as a system. So it's not reduced to a sort of basic element there, but it's a system. It's still a kind of limitation there, an insistence on reality and a kind of reductionism. Even as much as systems theorists protest that they're not reducing, there's still a kind of reduction to physicalism there.

But we're interested—I'm interested—in what the body becomes, what the body can become to us, just as I'm interested in what the self can become, what the other can become, what a human being, what animals, what the cosmos, what matter can become, what divinity can become, what nature can become.

Becoming—if we talk about the body, what it becomes as a felt field of experience, again, that whole range, what it can become as imaginal object and imaginal subject, what it becomes as object and subject, and what it can become as a locus, a field, a womb of ways of knowing. How can the body be experienced in perception as an object and as a subject in its epistemic potentials, with its epistemic potentials?

And again, for me the interest here is not even primarily—certainly not only, but not even primarily—for the sake of psychological health or balance, but the interest is in what does the soul-making want? What does the eros want? And to me that's interesting individually and culturally both.

And one of the movements there is a movement out of being restrained by a kind of duality between soul and body. So that there's, as I said, this opening of views to more plurality and more flexibility of views. So that one view is body and flesh has intelligence, intelligences, has desire, has eros, has soul, has will. And the sense of the body, the experience, the perception, the concept can be expanded. We can discover.

CHAPTER 83

Eros and the Brahmavihāras

Rob Burbea · 1h13

> In this dharma talk from the "Eros Unfettered" series, Rob Burbea carefully examines the connections and distinctions between eros and the brahmavihāras—mettā (loving-kindness), karuṇā (compassion), muditā (sympathetic joy), and upekkhā (equanimity). He clarifies that while mettā involves universal, unconditional love for all sentient beings, eros includes desire, attraction, delight, and love for the particular uniqueness of the beloved other.
>
> Burbea explains how imaginal practice naturally involves erotic love between self and imaginal figures, which differs from simply using imagination in mettā practice. He explores how eros complexifies and adds dimensionality to perception (increasing fabrication), while the brahmavihāras tend toward simplification and oneness (decreasing fabrication). Both paths can lead to experiences of cosmic, divine love, but through different mechanisms and with different qualities of sacredness.
> The talk offers practical guidance for combining erotic imaginal practice with brahmavihāra cultivation, showing how the energy and divinity arising from eros can be directed toward compassion for suffering beings. Burbea emphasizes that sexual energy and erotic images need not be distractions from loving-kindness practice, but can actually deepen and energize it when skillfully integrated. This integration serves the broader purpose of soul-making and expanding our senses of sacredness beyond traditional categories.

Until quite recently, I tended in teaching to try as much as possible to avoid repeating myself—repeating things that I had said in other talks or teachings. This was partly a personality style in relation to creativity, perhaps, but partly also because I felt it didn't serve the teaching or the student. In the age of recordings, or with a book where you can always go back and read again to do your own repetition, I thought this approach made sense.

I also used to think that sometimes it's better not to spell out fully the obvious consequences of whatever teachings one is presenting. For example, in the book I wrote or in other series of teachings, I didn't fully spell out all the consequences, partly because I thought that if the listener or reader engages and inquires and questions into the material, that personal engagement would actually lead to them digesting, understanding, and assimilating the material better, having it available to them more fully.

But I'm really questioning all that in the last couple of years. I think there are a lot of assumptions there. Certainly in terms of people engaging, I think that happens in different ways. It takes a certain amount of confidence to question or even make one's own conclusions from certain things that are presented. So I'm questioning all this and revising it very much.

Why I'm saying this is because now, at the risk of repeating myself but for the sake of clarity, I'd like to take a little time and explore the relationship of eros and the brahmavihāras—loving-kindness, compassion, joy and equanimity. I want to explore these relationships, the differences there, and also point to the possibility of using eros and the erotic imaginal in the service of brahmavihāra cultivation and practice, or even in actual brahmavihāra practice with metta and compassion.

As I've already said, with imaginal practice there's a lot that's not immediately obvious. Once we hang out with it and get used to that terrain and that opening, that world, we start to notice certain qualities or aspects, characteristics of that world and the relationships there. One of the things we've pointed out that's noticeable—maybe immediately, maybe very obviously, maybe really much less obviously, something that dawns on us slowly or gradually or only in time—is the presence of love.

Within the imaginal, in the imaginal space, there is love. Maybe obvious at first, maybe much less obvious. There is love from ourselves to the imaginal figure. We love imaginal figures. Sometimes this is really not obvious at all, but it's there in one way or another, in one form or quality of love or another. The range of kinds of qualities or presentations or flavors of love is enormously variable.

There's love from self to the imaginal figure, and there's also love from the imaginal figure to self. Everything we just said applies: it may be really obvious, it may be not obvious at all. It comes in a whole wide range of flavors, colors, expressions. But what we're talking about here is erotic love, because eros and the imaginal go together. So we're talking about erotic love in the imaginal, in the imaginal world between imaginal figures and ourselves.

Eros has a lot of aspects in common with metta, but it's also more than metta. There's more to it. It's different, and this is what I want to really make sure we're clear about.

Most people, perhaps, when they practice metta—loving-kindness or compassion—use their imagination to some extent. At least you have some kind of sense of the person to whom you're giving metta. Maybe you use white light, or maybe you see them smiling, or you just sense their being in the imagination without a visual image there. The use of imagination in metta is great, really valid and okay, and for most people it's very helpful in whatever ways that works.

But that per se, the use of the imagination in metta, is not the erotic imaginal. Imagination doesn't equate as imaginal, and metta doesn't equate as eros.

We also gave the example of what we were calling in the last retreat an imaginal figure of love, and using them actually in different ways—one for the sake of cultivating the metta and the other for the sake of the whole movement into the erotic imaginal. We talked about, for instance, grandma or the lap of the Buddha.

I made the distinction that if grandma is not an erotic object for me—not necessarily a sexual object, but an erotic object in terms of meaning that she is full of dimensionality, my interest is aroused, there's more to her, I want to know her and contact her, she has these dimensions to her being that I want to enter and open to—if that is not there, then grandma may be a really valuable metta-figure, a figure for the cultivation of metta, an imagination figure, but she's not imaginal, and that's certainly not erotic there. There's no eros.

This is really valuable, certainly okay, very helpful, but erotic imaginal is something different than just the use of the imagination for the sake of metta, or this figure that may express metta to us but is not full of eros either way, from us to her or from her to us.

But there are similarities and overlaps between eros and the brahmavihāras. Certainly there are. As I think I said right near the beginning of this course, care, to me, is a part of eros. When there's an erotic relationship, there is care there.

And I was using love in that sense as care, care for the other's being. So to me, that's actually part of eros.

There are other similarities, for example, between eros and the brahmaviharas. Equanimity is something you may know that we can talk about in two ways. The Buddha kind of implicitly made this distinction between equanimity towards beings and equanimity towards phenomena.

So there's equanimity towards beings. Here it's related to compassion practice. We care for their suffering. We try and do what we can to alleviate the suffering of some being. But we also realize that in a way they need to take responsibility. There's a limit to how much I can do sometimes. There's a limit in complicated relationships, complicated situations and circumstances to what I can do to alleviate their suffering. Recognizing those limits and recognizing that they may need to take responsibility in some way is a part of what supports the equanimity towards beings in the context of compassion towards beings. And actually, sometimes another person's suffering is really up to us, and we can step in there and do something, extend ourselves.

But as well as equanimity towards beings, the Buddha talked about equanimity in a way that what he's really referring to is equanimity towards phenomena, pleasant or unpleasant phenomena. There's a kind of evenness, not getting so aversive to the unpleasant and rejecting it and trying to get rid of it, caught up in that kind of knee-jerk reaction. And so not craving and contracted around seeking out the pleasant or seeking to hold on to the pleasant, fear of losing it. So there's a kind of equanimity and evenness, an impartiality, if you like, towards phenomena - pleasant, unpleasant, beautiful, ugly.

So it's possible to practice equanimity, to have equanimity in relation to beings and in relationship to phenomena. And the same is true of eros. Everything we've talked about on this retreat - there's eros certainly towards a human other, but there's eros towards anything that can be alive for us as an erotic object, if it fulfills the criteria that we've delineated. The relationship with anything. It could be this lamp in front of me, it could be this talk, the ideas, it could be you as the listeners, it could be an imaginal figure, it could be a tree, anything. It could be a heartache, that there's an erotic relationship with my heartache. It's different than just a metta relationship with my heartache. And the heartache has dimensions, has divinity, has meaningfulness, has purpose. It comes alive in that way through the erotic relationship.

But like equanimity, eros can also be towards beings and towards phenomena - actual beings, physical beings, imaginal beings, and phenomena, actual phenomena and imaginal phenomena.

And maybe some of you will know this, some of you are less aware of it, but this is also true of metta and compassion, loving-kindness and compassion. Most of us understand those or have been exposed to those as teachings of what we can practice, qualities we can cultivate in relation to beings, to sentient beings. But I think really beautiful practice and very powerful in terms of the insights that it can liberate - not just the healing and opening that it can bring experientially, but also the insights into dependent origination - the practices of loving-kindness and compassion towards phenomena, directing love towards dharmas. This is less commonly practiced and much less commonly understood in terms of its implications for understanding emptiness and dependent origination.

But anyway, there are lots of similarities and overlaps between eros and the brahmaviharas. But what about the differentiations between them? Can we get clearer about differentiating between eros and the brahmaviharas?

So eros, we have said, has desire in it. It has this wanting, wanting to connect, wanting to connect more, wanting to contact, wanting to know, to penetrate, to enter, to open to. In that sense, it has attraction, it has desire and attraction in it. It also has delight as part of it. It's accompanied by delight, or delight is part of the whole experience of eros, we have said.

So desire, attraction, delight. Also with eros, the perception of beauty is an integral feature, an inevitable feature of eros. The perception of beauty and also, I would say, of meaningfulness. This erotic other, this beloved other, whether it's an object or a person or whatever, a being, is somehow meaningful to my soul. And the eros itself is also meaningful. But that is because eros goes with the imaginal. All these qualities are part of that.

So desire, attraction, delight, beauty, meaningfulness. In contrast, metta, for example - attraction is not part of metta. Metta does not involve a desire to connect more with, to know more, to penetrate, to open to.

Let's be really clear here. Metta may support a realization of interconnectedness, that we are already interconnected. There is already an interconnection, actually on lots of different levels, of being between me and this person I'm offering metta to, directing compassion to. So metta may support and open the realization of an interconnectedness that already exists. And similarly, a realization of interconnectedness supports metta. To the degree that we realize the depth of our interconnectedness, to that degree is metta made easier and supported. The practice of metta towards this person is made easier and supported by the degree and the depth to which I realize and the fullness to which I realize our interconnectedness.

But that's different - realizing interconnectedness that's already, so to speak, an existential fact, if you like, is different than a desire to connect more. It's different than that. You understand?

And again, in contrast, metta may support, give rise to, and increase our perception of the beauty of the other. If you've done much metta practice, you'll know this. Here's that person - they're just kind of neutral, I don't think much of them, or I actually find them aversive in some way, even ugly or repulsive. I don't like them. But as you practice metta, you start to see in different ways - all kinds of different ways - some beauty there. There might be some delight in their being, in their presence, certainly in the practice of metta itself.

So metta may support an increase in the perception of beauty and delight, but the perception of beauty and the experience of delight in the other - delighting in how they are - these are not essential to metta. Almost by definition, because that would make metta conditional. In metta, the whole point is that it's unconditional. I don't need to find you beautiful. I don't need to perceive you as beautiful. I don't need to delight in your being and presence. It might arise from metta practice, but the whole point of the unconditionality of metta - that's the goal, the ideal of metta - is that these are not essential, not necessary to metta: the perception of beauty of the other and the delight in the other.

This contrast is quite important to be really clear about and draw out.

We have been saying that eros includes something like what we might call personal love - in other words, love for the particulars of this being, of this person or thing. Love for the uniqueness and through the uniqueness. And that's different, again, than metta.

Again, metta is just - you love them. Why do you love them? Just because they're a sentient being. It's not about loving their particulars. It's not love for the particulars. It's for the universals, in a way. Sentient beings suffer. We share suffering. Even if I don't share exactly the same kind of suffering that you do, there's something in common with suffering, with mortality, with fragility, illness, vulnerability, emotional vulnerability.

The compassion runs through those strands of universality. Just because you're a sentient being, just because I'm a sentient being - whereas the eros is for, in and through the particulars and the uniqueness.

This is noticeable with images in the imaginal realm. Sometimes it's immediately noticeable, and sometimes we need to perhaps spend longer dwelling with sensitivity, with openness, with receptivity and a kind of fine-tuning or attunement of our attention, of our being, in the imaginal realm with an imaginal figure, to realize: ah yes, there's more than metta here. There is this personal love, or love for, in, and through the particulars and the uniqueness.

In that story of the retreatant who had this beautiful relationship with the trees and the forest - loved them, was in love with them and their particulars and their uniqueness - at first felt there was discrepancy, an inequality: "I'm just loved because I'm one of Gaia's children," a kind of universality there. But then, actually hanging out with the image until realizing: oh, oh yes, there's something else here.

It might feel like something has shifted in the image. I actually think it's there from the beginning in the imaginal and we need to notice it.

What I want to say is we need that kind of love as well as we need metta. We need this personal love. We need to love particulars and uniquenesses. And we need our particulars, our personhoods, our particular personhoods, our unique personhoods, our particularities and uniquenesses loved. We need to feel that.

Why? Because we have - as I've pointed out before - we just have, we experience, we sense, we viscerally feel ourselves to be a different kind of self. We have a modernist self now. The whole self-experience is different. It's more complex. It is more individual. There is more complexity to individuality nowadays - more particularities, more edges, more contradictions.

This is something that modernism... Actually, I was talking to Catherine the other day, pointing out that it started with St. Augustine, perhaps, and then through centuries actually changed Christianity. The relationship with Jesus was part of what gave rise to more of the sense of individuality in the modern self.

But anyway, at this point, in our culture, we have a certain very complex, very multifaceted sense of self of which uniqueness of that self and the personhood and the uniquenesses in that self and the particularities are absolutely essential dimensions. We can't just erase them and get rid of them.

And someone might say, yes, but that's a construct. And I say, yes, of course it's a construct. But it's also our experience, our visceral gut experience. Not all the time, because there are different practices, different ways of looking that move in and out of that and turn it up and turn it down. Bring out the contrast, fade them through less fabrication. But it is an experience that we will keep coming back to. And we will keep being confronted by it because we've grown up with it, but also because it's in our society.

And anyway, if a person says that's a construct, that kind of self is a construct, say yes, but everything is a construct. Show me something that's not a construct. Show me something that's not fabricated. As we've explored, if you point to bare attention or the moment-to-moment process of aggregates, I would just say, look deeper. More practice. More practice with the ways of looking that show that that, too, is a fabrication. That, too, can fade. How it gets fabricated is just a level of fabrication.

And thirdly, we could see, from everything we've been saying, what we've explored in this retreat, we could see that modernist construction of self as indeed a construction, but a construction emerging individually and culturally from the very process of the soul-making dynamic, from the stretching of the eros-psyche-logos. A new kind of self is created or discovered, or if you like, the self is expanded, complicated, enriched, widened, deepened, given dimensionality.

The modernist self may be, or one way of seeing it, is actually as a result of an individual and cultural process of soul-making. And now, that modernist self is inviting a further level of soul-making through all this, through the love that it's asking, the erotic love that it's asking for, asking us to open to this dimension, not shut it out, and open to what personhood can be and can mean and divinity of it and all that. It's inviting and asking for more soul-making.

But we cannot erase or ignore this self that we feel. You certainly can't erase it permanently. That can go quiet to different degrees, beyond the personality, and then much deeper than that even. But we can't live in a way that erases that self or ignores it. And to try to do that, or to think that one has to, would be poverty's mistakes, and they would make us poor rather than richer and fuller and freer. They're actually strangely kind of constraints. And to try and ignore it, to try and do that, would just betray actually a lack of full insight, I believe.

So there's this, what we're calling love for in through the particulars, the uniquenesses. And what would it be to dwell in that, to open to it? Both our love for the imaginal figure in their particularities and their uniqueness, or the uniqueness and particularities that are, so to speak, part of them, and also their personal love for us and our particularities and our uniqueness. To sit in that, to dwell in it, to abide in it, to feel it, soak in it, absorb it, take it in, either from the gaze of the imaginal other or from some other communication which may or may not be verbal, it may be tactile, it may be sexual, it may be from life streaming—all kinds of possibilities—but to open to and dwell in and open to receive the imaginal figure's love for you.

Is that possible? So much healing is available there. To feel loved, to be loved, to know one's love, to recognize that one is loved in all kinds of ways, in our particularities, and with all the sense of dimensionality to that love, to that figure—in other words, to the origin of the love. Because the imaginal figure in that case is the source of that love. And to feel like that source itself is multilevel, multidimensional, multiaspected. And also in ourself, what receives it within us is multidimensional as well, or it's received at different dimensions of our being, put it that way.

And again, as I said before, this can be difficult, this kind of opening to the loving gaze of the other, whether it's a human other or an imaginal other can be difficult. Oftentimes, teaching mettā practice is interesting because you just see for so many people, it's often harder to receive mettā and compassion, to receive love than to give it. Oftentimes that's—and perhaps in the Buddhist time, you would have found that very, very strange. Certainly, I know the Dalai Lama was very surprised when he came to the West first and saw that. For a lot of people, certainly not for everyone, absolutely not for everyone, but it's often harder to receive love than to give it.

And we talked before how even we can have in all this a very ambivalent relationship, a very charged relationship with being seen. Something in us yearns and longs to be seen, to be naked, to be gathered in another one's gaze, to be transparent, not hidden. And also, this can be very, very difficult, very charged, very hard to tolerate sometimes for some people, this being seen. So they end up with a—one ends up with a very ambivalent relationship, something we yearn for and fear or run away from or back off from or close ourselves off from, turn away from. Or it might just be, it might be the whole of ourselves, it might be just places within ourselves, parts of us.

I find that there are parts of ourselves where being seen places us right on the edge of ambivalence. Pain can be wrapped up in this dynamic, shame that causes this ambivalence. We're ashamed to show some part of ourselves. We believe we're unworthy, or we shouldn't be a certain way, or whatever story we carry. And grief, too, can be wrapped up in this difficulty with being seen.

This pattern is relatively common for us in the modern West. It perhaps exists in other cultures as well, though I'm less familiar with those contexts. When this ambivalence is present, we face the question: what order should we follow with these kinds of practices? How should we pace ourselves?

Am I going to acknowledge this real ambivalence, or will I force myself into surrendering to the gaze of this loving other—whether it's an imaginal figure with their erotic gaze or simply their loving presence? There isn't a formula for this. Not everyone needs to proceed in the same order. One approach won't always be easier than another, and there's no prescribed pace that works universally.

As always with these kinds of practices—with practice in general—we need sensitivity, the ability to feel what's right. This changes constantly. We must remain fluidly responsive to the whole unfolding of our practice. But in time, with this responsiveness, perhaps with the help of teachers, loved ones, and friends, practicing alone and together, there can be an increasing capacity to expose ourselves to the erotic gaze, to the love of the imaginal figure or other, and to dwell there.

When we first explored this territory, I mentioned the possibility that if there is this ambivalence—if there's even an inability to give metta to ourselves in traditional loving-kindness practice—there might be an imaginal figure we can approach. We can bring this very difficulty to them and simply observe: What do they say? What do they do? How do they respond?

There's an autonomy here that imaginal figures sometimes possess, an autonomy that can truly surprise us. The way they express love, their desire to love us, their wish to communicate something—this can be startling in its authenticity. The word "angel" means messenger, communicator. The angels that come to us in the imaginal realm, the figures we open to there, they want to love us and they want to communicate something. They possess this sometimes surprising autonomy, a kind of intelligence that we couldn't have engineered or predicted.

Here's something that might seem to come out of left field, but there's love there anyway. Their love exists regardless. It's not something we have to earn or achieve. It's ongoing, whether we try to avoid it, turn our attention away from it, or resist it entirely. At one level, this love simply is.

We can and hopefully do learn about love through our human relationships. We can take care of and work at those relationships that matter to us, learning how to love and how to be loved, how to receive love. We discover what love is and what it involves through our commitment to staying present, working through difficulties, and hanging in there with the challenges that arise in our human connections.

But we also learn about love through, with, and from our imaginal figures—the beings of the imaginal realm that come to us. We can discover profound truths about love through our relationships with these figures.

Yet with all this exploration, remembering the distinctions we made earlier, eros involves more than metta. Whether flowing from us toward the other—the imaginal object or the actual other—or from the other toward ourselves, eros encompasses dimensions beyond loving-kindness alone.

Sometimes we can be overly simplistic in how we understand the Dharma, in what we take from it and what we neglect to explore, flesh out, and bring alive in our lives. Very easily, we think there is just metta, loving-kindness, with its far and near enemies as traditionally taught. We learn that metta's far enemy is ill-will, and its near enemy is attachment. These become our categories, our complete map. But the territory of love is far vaster than this framework suggests.

And it's got to fit somewhere in there. So if you say, "Well, yeah, I really love my partner or my lover," and I say, "Well, okay, it's metta, definitely metta, plus some attachment"—and yeah, okay, it's just attachment. But actually, is that what's going on? I mean, not to say there isn't attachment there. There may well be. There often is in the complexity of human relations, of course there is. But there are also other delineations that we can draw out that this doesn't really capture, does it? Metta and attachment—that's the mixture of my love here, the love that flows between us.

So again, we can be a little—I don't know what the word is—lazy, sloppy, simplistic, oversimplifying, a little too quick to close the case. But this is not to imply that eros is always better, or we should always strive for an erotic relationship. That's not to imply that at all. There's absolutely a place for metta and the simplicity and the simplifying that it brings and involves, and for its universality and for its unconditionality. Absolutely necessary. And that's why the Buddha placed such emphasis on it. I don't know how common that was in the teachings of his time to actually put so much emphasis on the brahmaviharas, but so important and skillful to really know those practices and develop them. I can't say how much treasure there is in that.

So I'm not saying eros involves more than metta, therefore it's always better, therefore always try and do that. I'm not saying that at all. There's really a place and a necessity for metta, compassion, and the brahmaviharas—their simplicity, their universality, their unconditionality. But there are differences.

In fact, related to just these factors that we just talked about—simplicity, universality, and unconditionality—in relationship with another, whether... and actually that other could be an imaginary other, an actual other, or the self, in relationship with the self, or in relationship with a phenomenon, the practice of metta, for example, or compassion, or equanimity, leads to, progressively, as you do it more, its direction is towards fabricating that other less, fabricating the perception of the other less.

Again, whether it's self, giving metta to self, whether it's giving metta or directing metta or compassion towards phenomena or equanimity, or equanimity towards phenomena, or towards another, the brahmaviharas actually tend towards a decrease of the fabrication of the perception of the other—of certainly the object to whom one is directing the metta or compassion or equanimity or whatever, but then eventually to all things. They simplify the perception of the other as part of that movement. And also, because self-other-world always arise as constellations, as we said, they will also simplify the sense of self. So the simplification is part of the movement of less fabrication.

And the perceptions of oneness that come out of that—self and other are really one, one luminous heart essence of love or whatever the perception is—the perceptions of oneness, as we've said several times on this retreat, are also, if you like, station points on the spectrum of lessening fabrication of the perception of the other and self that happens through the brahmavihara practice. You understand?

So the brahmavihara practice—they decrease, as you get deeper into them, they decrease the fabrication of the perception of other and also self. Part of that is the simplification of the perception of other and self, and partly also world, and partly the perceptions of oneness, the sense of oneness that happen there. It's all wrapped up in the movement of lessening fabrication.

In contrast, eros actually fabricates more. It doesn't simplify. It adds complexity to the object, to the beloved other. It becomes multifaceted, multidimensional, as we've said, this beloved other, whatever it is, whoever they are. And they may even increase in the images they sort of express. So one person for me might sort of hold a whole range of images and might manifest to me with different imaginal faces. The movement of eros is an increase in complexity, a complexifying, a complicating, as we said, and an increase in the fabrication of other.

Yes? Eros can go towards melting and union, so to speak, with the other. And we've talked about that in practice, and you've probably experienced that by now. But it will seek, after a sort of dip into that union, it will seek to kind of reinstate the sense of twoness, the erotic polarity, the erotic dyad there. There will be a return to that, because of the fertility of that and the necessity of that to the eros. Even when we know the oneness, it's like the knowing of the oneness would just be something that's sort of in the background, part of just the mix of what is known in the erotic twoness, in the erotic coupling, in the erotic tension of twoness there in the dyad.

What ensues from that particular difference—the difference in the movement towards less and towards more fabrication, if you like—what ensues is a difference in also the perceptions, the openings, the experiences of sacredness and divinity that come out of these two directions of practice.

Why is that important relative to the brahmaviharas? Because—and again, you'll know this if you've done a lot of dedicated brahmavihara practice, especially metta and compassion—but if you did that, say, cultivated metta and compassion, let's say on a retreat for some weeks or at home, you know, whatever, then there would be a point, and I think this is an inevitable point, unless something's kind of getting in the way, there will be a point, maybe quite fast, but usually quite gradually, where the metta or the compassion begins to feel like I'm not doing it. Actually, I sense it everywhere. I sense it in the air.

I sense it in the space. I sense that metta or compassion is woven into the fabric of the cosmos itself. There is metta and compassion filling this space, the space of the universe.

When I begin to feel that, I can let the cosmic metta, the cosmic compassion that pervades everywhere, do the work. Often people having this kind of experience—opening to it—apart from the relief and beauty and how deeply it touches, find it brings also a sense of divinity. They will often start speaking in theistic language, even if they've had no inclination to do that before.

As I said, it begins to feel like it's not me doing the practice—I'm not cranking this wheel of metta and compassion. I'm not holding the other person's suffering, if that's what I'm trying to do within compassion practice. I'm not having to respond. It's almost like it's already there, a little bit effortless. It's like the cosmos is doing it. The divine is doing it. Buddha nature is just doing it. All I'm doing is opening to letting that happen as it's already happening and recognizing it. All I'm really doing is opening and tuning my attention to that, tuning into that wavelength of perception.

Because it doesn't feel at that point like the self is doing it—the self is responsible, the self is having to work at this compassion, I'm responsible for this compassion, I'm the one holding the suffering—this brings huge relief. There's this sense of "Oh, wow, phew."

With all that, equanimity comes in. The vastness gives rise to an automatic sense of effortless compassion and love, and the holding equanimity and steadiness that are shot through the cosmos allows the self to be much more equanimous in relationship to the suffering we're touching in compassion practice. Correspondingly, with all that, there's an increase in our capacity to face suffering, to open to suffering. We don't have to run away. The heart—in some respects we could say literally—gets bigger. It's no longer my personal heart; it's the universal heart. It's the universal compassion, the divine compassion that the heart is opening to.

Our capacity to meet suffering, to face it, to hold it—although it doesn't feel so much that we are holding it—is vastly expanded when we're in touch with that sense. Because it's not me that has to do it. It's not little old me that has to somehow hold this enormous suffering you might be going through, or that's in the world, or that we see on the news, or that the planet is facing. Something much vaster, more powerful is holding it. We don't have to create and work at it; all we have to do is recognize.

Now that kind of divine or cosmic, cosmically infused love and compassion could be just from normal, standard loving-kindness and compassion practice, or it could be coming from the erotic imaginal—even the sexual imaginal. We can know both these possibilities.

That sense of cosmic, divine love and equanimity that imbues loving-kindness and compassion can come from more standard Brahmavihara practices—loving-kindness and compassion without any of the imaginal, certainly without any erotic imaginal, and certainly not with any sexual, erotic imaginal. That's very possible, and I've just described that—a very normal thing I would expect for people doing the Brahmavihara practices in the standard way.

But we can also know it through and with the erotic imaginal, and as I said, even the sexual, erotic imaginal. We can explore both, know both are possible, and explore the differences.

What's part of the differences? Well, they both give rise to this divinity. They both sacralize. They give rise to and spread a sense of sacredness.

Eros does it because of the eros psyche logos dynamic we've talked about—giving a sense of dimensionality and beyondness to, at first, the erotic beloved, the other. That's part of what will happen with the eros psyche logos dynamic as it gets going, if it's not inhibited, if it's not blocked. In the sense of dimensionality, in that sense of beyondness and mystery and beauty, there will at some point be some kind of sense of the divine or the mystical.

I'm going to come back to these words because they're actually hard to define, and rightly so. But the mystical is, you could say, partly just—when does something become mystical? When it's beyond whatever is agreed to be the normal, agreed-on perception of what something is. Obviously there are lots of caveats with that definition, but because of the eros psyche logos dynamic—the opening up of dimensions, the perception of dimensions, the perception of the sense of beyond, of mystery, of beauty, the logos then expanding the idea of what that thing is, what that other is, and all the soul-making involved—there is an inevitable sacralizing that comes with it through eros, because of the soul-making dynamic that it instigates, ignites, inseminates.

Metta and the Brahmaviharas also sacralize, but they sacralize through this decrease in fabrication, this lessening of fabrication of perception that they support or unlock. Because of that, there's a kind of limited direction of the sacralizing. It's always going to be in the direction of less fabricating, and that follows a kind of spectrum.

Perhaps you could say there are infinite gradations on that spectrum, although it certainly seems in my experience that there are typical or common stations along the way—stopping points, plateaus along the spectrum of lessening fabrication. But there's a limited direction. It will always have something about oneness in it, some kind of oneness, and to greater or lesser degrees and different kinds of oneness, always then some sense of universality, often some sense of luminosity as well. But universality and oneness will be characteristic of this narrowing of the direction of sacralizing.

Whereas with Eros, when Eros and the sense of love and cosmopoetic divinity come out, there are infinite possible directions of sacralizing because the Eros picks up on and amplifies, ramifies the personal, the particular, the characteristic, unique qualities there. It multiplies or spreads them through the soul-making dynamic, perhaps in cosmopoiesis, to discover and create them—discover/create/discover/create—everywhere throughout the cosmos. So it's infinite in the sense that there's not a limited number of possibilities of the flavors that can have and the characteristics that can have. It doesn't just move along this narrow line deepening into oneness and less fabrication. Certainly there's depth there, but it's much wider in the sense of the number of possibilities being infinite.

So what I would like to open, apart from getting clear conceptually—because I think it is helpful—is also the possibility of practice. If you feel enough trust in practicing with Eros and the imaginal and the erotic-imaginal, you may want to explore this combination, this navigation, this mixing of the Eros with the Brahmavihāras, if and when you feel enough trust in the practice of the erotic-imaginal. And again, I'm really including the sexual erotic-imaginal as well.

Though it might also be that doing this kind of practice and seeing how the erotic-imaginal, even the sexual erotic-imaginal, can support the Brahmavihāras greatly adds to your trust in the practice of the erotic-imaginal.

So one possibility is working with imaginal practice, getting a sense of the Eros involved there in the practice with this imaginal figure and all the beauty of that and the multi-directionality and multi-dimensionality of that. And then when that's there—and sometimes that can be very quick if you're familiar with it, and sometimes it takes time to get used to all those different aspects and qualities and linger in it and feel the beauty there, but actually it can be very quick—then one can navigate either straight into a mettā and compassion practice and just let the image go. But more interesting for us is actually to direct it, including still the erotic-imaginal and the Eros and the sense of the Eros and even the image, and directing, navigating, steering in a way that includes the erotic, the Eros, and the erotic-imaginal while opening to the mettā and compassion. So it's a kind of fusion, a mixture.

For example, one can be working with the Eros in the imaginal practice, and then introduce a person that you know is suffering. Of course, it could be your own suffering, but for instance, introduce a third person. So there's the self and the beloved other, the object of the Eros, and then a third person. And you know that they're suffering, and you just introduce that into the constellation. Maybe it has to constellate spatially a certain way—you can be really creative here.

And what's possible, as I said, is the erotic divinity, the sense of the divine love that's coming out of, being supported by, emerging from the erotic image, can actually be what then spills over and meets the suffering and the suffering person. So it can become like water spilling over, like a tide coming in, or light can radiate, or all kinds of possibilities. Actually, all kinds of possibilities. You can be very creative here for the way that the divine love that is emanating or being expressed through the erotic image extends and carries over to include and to meet and encompass and address the suffering other and their suffering. All kinds of possibilities. Again, we can be really surprised here. The imaginer has a dimension of creativity which is not our own. And we can also be more deliberate and bring our own steering—do it this way or that way, more deliberate, more intentional navigation.

When I first started exploring this nexus, this meeting point of Eros and the Brahmavihāras in practice, this was really interesting to me. Because typically we would assume that Eros, in the way that we usually think about it, is associated with craving, and it's kind of self-interested. What can I get for me? I'm interested in my pleasure. I want to keep this erotic object for me. I want to hoard the pleasure for myself, or my whole being and my orientation is contracted around the Eros, contracted around the other, and around the self. And one sees that, actually, that's not the case. Interesting.

Again, because Eros tends to open, open up in all dimensions, in the energy body and so forth as we've talked about before, this was much more possible than I had anticipated. I mean, I thought actually that it would work, but it was really much easier than I anticipated.

Also, what was easier was the fact that we can actually hold two very different images simultaneously. So there's this image of the beloved other and whatever Eros is happening inside, communicating, flowing between us in that image, or maybe not even between us—it could be a couple, an imaginal couple that we are witnessing outside of ourselves. But then we can have a third image of this suffering person. So there's the erotic other, and there's the suffering person. And this possibility to hold a kind of network of images, certainly more than one image or two images at the same time.

And also that because we tend to think, especially with mettā, of it being something very tender and gentle and soft, and that's the direction of the mettā practice as it evolves—

This transformation unfolds with surprising ease—the dharmic possibility becoming accessible through what reveals itself as a natural capacity to hold multiple images simultaneously. There emerges the erotic beloved, the flowing eros between or through us, perhaps witnessed as imaginal couples existing beyond our immediate experience. Alongside this, a third image: the suffering being, whether within ourselves or another. This network of simultaneous images expands our contemplative range beyond the typical constraints of single-pointed practice.

The discovery challenges our usual assumptions about metta's trajectory. We expect loving-kindness to evolve toward increasing subtlety, gentleness, and steadiness—less tempestuous, less tearful when compassionate, moving toward reduced fabrication with greater equanimity. This movement represents the natural progression toward less constructed states of being.

Yet what emerges as particularly striking is how the complete spectrum of erotic expression translates directly into the brahmaviharas without dilution or domestication. The carnal and voracious eros, those demonically divine images that carry such power, lends itself remarkably to compassion without requiring transformation into something merely tender, sweet, or desexualized. Similarly, the most subtle eros—perhaps just the gentle holding of hands, or even subtler intimacies of pure non-physical connection—translates with equal authenticity into the qualities of divine abiding.

Fierce eroticism might give birth to protector deity consciousness, manifesting love and compassion with that same fierce quality. Even the seemingly transgressive images of consuming or feasting upon the beloved's flesh and bones can transfer directly to the suffering other, where this apparent devouring expresses profound compassion. The strangeness dissolves when we recognize that in the imaginal realm, such fierce intimacy can embody the deepest care.

Catherine once witnessed this principle embodied in Sarnath, where a wounded dog —throat somehow cut—was surrounded by other dogs who licked the wound continuously until it healed completely over several days. This tender persistence, this healing through devoted attention, mirrors how erotic licking in imaginal practice can transform into the gentle ministration to suffering hearts. The dogs' instinctive compassion reveals something essential about how intimacy and healing interweave.

The translation between erotic image and brahmaviharic expression takes many forms. Sometimes the action itself transfers directly—the licking becomes tender care. Sometimes light emanates from the body parts or actions central to the erotic image, carrying both erotic quality and compassion toward the suffering being. Sometimes a particular emotional quality—devotion, for instance—becomes amplified and spread, washing through the suffering person with that characteristic devotion now expressed as compassionate care.

The possibilities are truly infinite. Light may beam directly to the suffering person or suffuse in all directions. The transfer might occur through qualities rather than actions, through emanations rather than direct contact. Each practitioner discovers their own pathways of connection.

What surprises many practitioners is the natural arising of bliss—not merely sexual pleasure, but authentic pīti, sukha, and samādhi. These jhānic factors emerge from the erotic imaginal whether practiced alone or combined with the brahmaviharas. This challenges our assumptions about what constitutes spiritual versus worldly experience.

Perhaps most remarkably, a natural, effortless equanimity accompanies this practice, particularly when working with suffering beings. Anyone engaged in sustained compassion practice quickly recognizes the necessity of equanimity when opening the heart to worldly pain. The cosmopoetic dimension—the recognition that divinity or deeper sources operate through these practices rather than the small self performing them—naturally generates this supporting equanimity.

These possibilities deserve our attention and, when readiness arises, our experimental exploration. They invite play and discovery within the sacred space of practice.

One might ask: why complicate what already works? Why not simply practice metta and compassion in their established forms? The traditional approaches certainly need not be replaced—they remain foundational and complete.

It may be that for some people at certain times, because there's so much libido involved, so much energy available when Eros is alive in us, this gives a whole other level of energy to loving-kindness or compassion or mudita practice when it's allowed to infuse those brahmavihara practices. There's an immediately available depth of energy that becomes possible when we can join them and make the navigation work.

But I also want you to know that sexual images, sexual energy, eros—none of this has to be a distraction. If one is intent on brahmavihara practice and it feels like the eros is coming in, the sexual desire is coming in, the sexual energy and images are arising, and this seems like a distraction from metta practice or whatever it is—actually, it doesn't need to be regarded as a distraction. You can include it in very creative ways that actually give a whole other depth and texture and range of possibilities to the brahmavihara practice. So just to know that's possible.

But for me, it's something in just knowing that it's possible that's opening up our views and our understandings and our conceptual framework and our exploration. And this, to me, is really important, really, really important.

It's not that doing this is just for the sake of the brahmaviharas, because then you might ask, well, why not just cultivate them without the erotic imagination? It's more complicated, you've got more to learn, and so on. Fair enough. If my goal is simply the cultivation of the brahmaviharas, if that's the sole purpose of my practice, then certainly this might seem unnecessary.

But in this wider understanding of what practice is, where we're going, what the possibilities are, what I want involved and integrated into my sense of practice and life, integrated into my understanding—if it's more than just the cultivation of the brahmaviharas, then this integrating and including and experimenting with eros and the imaginal and the ways they may interface and contribute to and flow into and open up directions and possibilities with the brahmaviharas becomes a necessity. There's a point beyond just the opening up of the brahmaviharas. Soul-making.

For me, what's so important is the opening, the increasing, the adding to our sense of sacredness—our senses, plural, of sacredness. The pluralizing of our senses of sacredness. The giving of depth, breadth, and range to the senses of sacredness, the experience of sacredness, the experiences of sacredness, the expansion of all that. To me, that's one of the main reasons for all of this and all these teachings.

So I offer this as an opening, as a possibility, as something you may want to practice with and experiment with, and also as an avenue for further investigation. You can find out things here for yourself. You can add to the research, if we borrow that fantasy. All kinds of things are possible.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 84

Opening The Dharma of Desire (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h08

> In this foundational talk from the Eros Unfettered retreat, Rob Burbea presents a revolutionary approach to working with desire that differs from traditional Buddhist methods. Rather than viewing desire as a kilesa (defilement) to be overcome, he offers a three-step practice: first, asking 'what am I really wanting here?' to unhook from obvious objects and discover deeper desires; second, clearing away Dharma preconceptions and entertaining trust in desire's intelligence; and third, fully opening to the energetic current of that deeper desire in the energy body.
> Through detailed examples including a woman's long-distance romance and his own impatience with learning, Burbea demonstrates how this practice can transform dukkha into abundance and fulfillment. The talk explores how what we typically call craving may result from not connecting to deeper desires, suggesting that desire contains a treasure when approached with proper understanding. This practice differs from imaginal work by focusing on the energy and general qualities of desire rather than retaining specific images, yet both approaches share common ground in trusting the deeper intelligence of eros and working skillfully with the energy body.

Let's continue our inquiry into desire, the whole realm of desire and desires, and expand our explorations regarding desire—our skills, our capacities, our insights in this area. I'd like to offer a different approach, a different way of working with desire than we've elaborated so far, and tie that together with some of the previous things we've been discussing while making some other observations about desire and our relationship to it.

This different approach I mentioned briefly in the past, in the talk "Beauty of Desire Part 2" from 2011. You can find it if you're interested in more details and examples. But I want to offer it again here.

What happened for me was this: I was meditating in my room at Gaia House and felt moved to try something different in my meditation. Through this approach—which I'll explain—I discovered something that was certainly new for me, something quite surprising that I'd not heard anyone else mention or describe or point to, something that had very surprising implications outside the box of what was, up to then, my understanding of Dharma, and any other understanding I'd heard of Dharma at the time.

I can't actually remember what was troubling me. I know it was something to do with Gaia House politics—I only remember that because it's in my notes. I didn't write down what it was. In the course of time, exactly what was upsetting me in the political situation at Gaia House behind the scenes has completely faded and is of much less interest to me than the actual insights that came and the possibilities for practice that emerged and felt like they were discovered.

So something was going on and I was troubled, agitated, and a little upset by something to do with Gaia House politics. I was sitting in meditation, being with this situation and my feelings. For some reason, I found a different way of approaching it, and I asked myself: What do I really want here? Is there a desire for something? And if there is, what does that desire really want?

I can't remember whether it was obvious to me that there was wanting and desire in the first place, or maybe I just assumed that because there was dukkha. But anyway, I asked this question: What do I really want here? What does this desire really want? I let that question reverberate in the being.

The answer that came was: freedom from constraint.

I understood that answer. It had meaningfulness for me, even though it might sound quite abstract. In its very abstraction—this is something I'm going to come back to—it was very meaningful for me. Freedom from constraint. This really was what the being, the psyche, desired.

So I felt into that desire for freedom from constraint and really allowed it, felt its movement within me. More than just within the psyche—within the whole energy body, actually. The energy body reflects the psyche, reflects the citta. They're completely intimately connected, as we've discussed before.

But not just allow it, accept that it's there. I mean really open fully to the energetic current of that deep desire for freedom from constraint. Really allow it. Really feel the movement of that current of desire, really open the whole energy body, the whole body, even bigger than the physical body—open fully, as fully as possible, to that energetic current or stream or movement of desire through the being, through the energy body.

When I did that, it felt like the quality that I was wanting—this freedom from constraint—was actually already available. It was, so to speak, made available or discovered to be already available through this way of approaching it. So I had, right there, the very thing that I most deeply wanted: this sense of freedom from constraint, this knowing of freedom from constraint.

And it came not from turning away from the desire, but actually going deeper into it and allowing it more fully, opening to it more fully. It wasn't a putting down, it wasn't a letting go, it wasn't a recognition that desires are delusions or anything like that—quite the opposite.

Out of this discovery, which really struck me very strongly—I thought, "Oh, that's really interesting"—so very enjoyable as an experience, but the insight there was really striking. This is not what should be happening according to conventional understanding. I haven't seen this before. I haven't heard this before.

This was condensable, filterable down to a set of basically simple practice instructions. When one notices that there's dukkha—whether one notices that there is a desire obviously there or not—in other words, sometimes we're experiencing dukkha, we're experiencing dissatisfaction, and it's clear: "I really want this, I need this," or whatever it is. It's clear that... the desire is present within the dukkha and wrapped up in the dukkha. And sometimes we have dukkha, and it's actually not obvious that there's a desire there at first. So it doesn't matter either way.

When there is dukkha, whether desire is present obviously or not, the first step is to ask yourself: What am I really wanting here? What am I really wanting?

This question involves unhooking the desire from its most immediately obvious object—from the thing that captures our attention. I want that person, I want a relationship with that person, I want this event to happen, I want that object. This is the immediately obvious object of desire. And in a way, this question—what am I really wanting here, what does the desire really want more deeply—is asking us to unhook from that immediately obvious object that it tends to get stuck on, contracted around, infatuated with, and let the desire reveal what its deeper essence is, what its deeper purpose is, what is more deeply wanted.

This will often be, in fact it will always be, more general, more of a generality. It might even seem, if you're hearing this, more abstract. Notice too that it involves an unhooking from the image.

So we're on a slightly different tack now—a different way of working, a different approach to the deeper desire. In my case, like freedom from constraint. It wasn't that I wanted this or that to happen politically, or someone to say this or that. In the example I gave, it was freedom from constraint. It sounds more general, more abstract. It's the deeper desire there.

The answer to the question "what do I really want" was not so much coming from the mind, but it's like dropping that question into the being, to the whole citta, the whole psyche, the heart and the soul and the mind.

So first step: What am I really wanting? What is really more deeply wanted by this desire? What is the deeper desire?

Second step: clear away, clear off the table, sweep clear the table of any dharma preconceptions that one has regarding desire. Desire is a kilesa, it's a defilement, it's an impurity, it leads to dukkha, it is self, it brings self, it's craving and that's problematic—all this stuff that we're used to, familiar with, that's really important as perspectives and approaches. But just for this approach right now, clear it. Just clear the table clean of any preconceptions.

And in that open space, more open from preconceptions, just introduce—is it possible to play with, just a little bit, some kind of trust of the deeper intelligence of the soul, or of the desire? Just playing with the idea, the possibility, that this movement of desire that looks problematic, may even look petty, certainly looks like it's causing dukkha or wrapped up in the dukkha—just play with the idea that actually there's something to trust here.

There's a treasure deep down there in the desire. It manifests in its movement a certain intelligence of soul, like phototropism—the movement of sunflowers turning towards the light, turning towards the sun, and other plants as well. You know how plants and trees grow towards the light. Maybe the desire deep down—certainly it gets twisted, certainly we get into a wrong relationship with it—but maybe deep down there's something akin to phototropism there, a kind of intelligence of the soul.

But at any rate, let's just trust it and see if there's not a treasure here that, if it's not actually already there—if that's too much as an idea to trust—actually trust that the way of relating to desire can turn it into a treasure. That's an easier step in terms of trust.

So the second step: clear away preconceptions, introduce some degree of trusting this movement of desire.

Those first two steps are actually reversible. The asking "what am I really wanting, what does this desire really want," unhooking from the obvious object—that's the first step. The second step, clearing away preconceptions, introducing a little bit of trust, entertaining some trust of the desire—you could flip them. Even when I don't yet know what the deeper desire is, I could just introduce the entertaining of the idea that there is a way of paying attention to desire that turns it into a treasure, or there's something buried deep in desire already that is a treasure that can be discovered. The order doesn't matter.

There are those first two steps. Then the third step in this three-step process would be to really feel that desire and really allow it. It's almost like you can feel it in the whole being and especially in the energy body and feel it—perhaps it's a current, a movement, a stream, a surge.

Perhaps it's really strong. Perhaps it's quite subtle. But really feel it. Really, really allow it and really open to that energy, that stream, that current, that movement. Really opening the space of the energy body and allowing that to flow. That's the third step.

So let's give some examples to flesh that out a little bit, that process, that practice. These examples are actually repeats from that talk I mentioned, The Beauty of Desire, where there are more examples as well. Part of the reason for repeating them is because after I discovered this practice, I became very interested in it and started trying it out with this hunch that I had about how it would work. I began experimenting with it on yogis in distress during interviews, with friends, colleagues, and with myself in different situations.

This was part of what I'm tying in now to the researcher fantasy—this whole exploration actually grew and emerged alongside that fantasy, though to be honest, it had been there on and off as an available fantasy for quite a while for me. But it emerged with this discovery, and then I rode with that expanding researcher fantasy as part of the whole investigation that fed into everything. So I was conducting research, if you like, on myself and with others, trying this process out when people were going through different difficulties.

I experimented with it for perhaps a couple of months, quite intensively. And I estimate that it was successful in the ways I expected about 95% of the time. It became so predictable—exactly what would happen, how it would open things up in this particular way. There are nuances I may come to later, but basically it would open up, relieve the dukkha, and reveal the abundance of what one was desiring. The dukkha would release, and there would be a transformation of the experience of the body, the energy body, the consciousness, and the psyche as a different state would open up.

This became so predictable that I actually stopped pursuing it so intensively in my research and stopped taking notes on what I observed with myself and with people. The one time I remember it not working was with a friend who, as we were doing it, was slouched on a sofa. I hadn't suggested—partly because it was a friend—that she sit up so the energy could flow more easily. Apart from that instance, I'm pretty sure it worked every time. So I became convinced and stopped taking detailed notes, which is why I don't remember many examples now, as I moved on to using the researcher fantasy to explore other areas.

So these are old examples. Excuse me for repeating them. They're actually good examples because they reveal different facets of the process and the assumptions involved.

One involved a woman student who was not on retreat but had met a man in another country and was engaged in a long-distance romance. He was very far away, and this was a new romance for her with lots of texting and messaging back and forth. She came in for an interview that she requested and said, "I'm craving." She had done considerable dharma practice, and we had worked extensively in the past with vedanā—watching craving, stationing awareness on craving, noticing different vedanā, and learning not to get caught up in craving. We had done quite a lot of that practice, and she was very interested in equanimity. That had been her leaning and interest for quite a long time in practice.

She said, "I'm craving, and I feel that craving is a contraction of the being. It's painful. There's also fear that I might lose this budding romance—it might fall apart. I fear that..." She was planning to visit him to see what would happen. "I fear that it won't work out, and then there'll be the loss and the pain, and this is all dukkha." So amidst the loveliness, she was also getting into a reasonably difficult state with the whole situation.

She was aware that craving involves hype. We had talked about this before—how it involves constructing artificial differences and amplifying the differences between things and times, so they seem really different. That over there becomes so much more preferable than this over here. Here and now becomes less than, not so interesting, not so desirable. It's really markedly different from that over there. The papañca that comes in amplifies that process. The word papañca is actually connected etymologically with the word "amplify"—it implies expanding, amplifying.

She was already somewhat aware of this, but we talked about how it was operating in this case, because she said, "The adventure begins then." In other words, when her plane arrives in that country to see what happens with this man—"The adventure begins then," she said.

Now I'm just kind of in limbo. I'm just waiting.

We examined this and saw how much of a construction it was, because there was actually lots of lovely electronic exchange happening in the present moment. But the papañca comes in and the kilesa comes in and denigrates the here and now while raising up the there and then. Really inquiring into this - is it actually that different without the mind making it so? Without this process that craving tends to ignite, this papañchizing process that increases differences, which then feeds back to cause more craving in that whole saṃsāra cycle?

We talked about a way of looking that worked against the papañca. I suggested she recognize that she has six sense objects here and five aggregates here, and when she arrives in that foreign country to see him, there will be six sense objects and five aggregates. Is it really that different, or is it the mind painting things, making them seem different in a way that's actually not helpful?

This is fairly standard Dharma teaching. We went into deconstructing the hype so that craving could release, and as craving releases, the hype gets deconstructed - a mutually reinforcing process. This approach was helpful, and we explored it thoroughly in our long interview.

But then I introduced another, less standard approach. I asked her simply, "What are you wanting?"

Her reply was immediate and certain: "Him." Very simple. Him. It seemed obvious to her - I want him. She looked at me as if I were asking the most elementary question imaginable.

You can see how difficult it sometimes is to look beyond the most obvious object that desire seems to be presenting. I want him. But I encouraged her to explore this more deeply. What's actually involved in that desire?

When I asked again, creating more spaciousness to open up the inquiry, she said, "I love that I can say anything with him and I'm listened to." Even this was more general - an expansion from the specific person to a quality of relationship.

We went deeper still, exploring what lay beneath even that desire. She identified four components of this deeper longing: "I want the opening of the heart. I want the expression. I want the connection of being received. And I want to love."

Can you hear how these are relatively general, more abstract sounding? Certainly more universal than "I want him." At this level, the desire is no longer hooked on or contracted around a limited object. What it wants is actually a more open object, a deeper-level object. It's not really even an object in the usual sense of the word.

Feeling into this deeper current, she recognized it as quite powerful and profound - not how she usually experienced herself or, in her words, how she usually took herself to be. I encouraged her to let this feeling fill her body, to really allow it and feel it, emphasizing the importance of opening the body to this current if possible.

As she did this, with my support, something remarkable happened. She reported that her self-boundaries - the sense of the edges of herself - began to dissolve, and an expansion started happening throughout her whole being.

Now, she had done some practice, but not much at what I would call the deeper levels. So this expansion of her entire sense of being, with boundaries dissolving, was quite frightening for her. Some resistance and contraction kicked in naturally.

I reassured her: "We don't need to force anything. Let's just respect the fear here. What are you afraid of?"

What's the fear that's causing this resistance and contraction? Is it fear? Yes. What is it? Is it losing yourself? Is it disappearing? Is it just the unfamiliarity? No.

At that point we ran out of time in the session and I had another meeting or something. But we talked about the need for compassion for the self that's resistant and fearful to that opening and that new experience. The compassion, introducing the compassion and not forcing over a threshold into new territory of being and experience. The compassion for the self that feels fearful, that is resistant, that is a little bit contracted there, or trying to keep contracted, can really help.

It's possible to play one's edges with new experiences. But eventually—and whether it happens immediately or relatively quickly, or really quite at a gentle pace, slowly over some time—these kinds of expansions of being, and I'm mentioning it because it's actually quite a characteristic experience of working with this practice that I'm elaborating on right now, not always, but often. Eventually, we're able to allow that kind of expansion.

We can feel in that a whole new sense of life force, libido, connected with the desire, a whole new sense of self that goes with that, a whole new sense of strength, openness, independence—being independent of this or that thing happening, event happening, getting this or that object. One sees this abundance and opening and independence and strength and beauty that comes. All that treasure that kind of comes up to the surface and is made available is strangely not seen to be dependent on the object of desire being there, as I said, on having it.

We are fulfilled to a huge extent, to a surprising extent. I mean, almost always there was a surprise involved here for people. Fulfilled to an extent more than what we are used to feeling in our lives. We're not used to feeling that extent of abundance and fulfillment and openness and treasure and brightness. But we're fulfilled not by getting this or that object, and not even by trying to renounce or ignore or "let go" of the desire, but actually through the very flow of the deep desire. We're going, as I said, deeper into it and really respecting and really opening to it. The libido, the life force is opening the being there through the desire.

Then we may wonder: is it actually possible that craving, which as we've been saying has this kind of contraction to it, feels painful—in this case, this woman, there will be the swings to the fear of loss, of rejection, involves this repeatedly moving away from the present moment to daydreaming and being lost in the future and that kind of poor fantasizing—is it possible that that kind of craving, in that sense, the contraction of craving, is actually a result of not connecting to, not allowing, not realizing, recognizing, and not allowing the deeper desires to unfold, to be felt, and for those currents to flow?

You understand? What we call craving is a matter of not connecting to, not realizing, not allowing the deeper desires to unfold and to flow. Similarly with eros, it goes to craving when it doesn't have the imaginal dimension, when something is blocked in terms of psyche and logos. Here is a slightly different approach that we're talking about, and it will move to contraction of craving when there is not this deep respect for the desire, connecting to it, recognizing it, feeling it, and really allowing it.

This funneling into craving and the contraction of craving and the pain and all the kind of craziness that goes with that may just also be a habit of the being. In other words, we are trained away from the erotic imaginal and away from the deeper levels of desire, as we talk about in this other approach.

One wonders, what is going on here? Why does it take one course habitually into the contraction of craving and not others? Is it that actually there's a result of not allowing something else—not either in the context of the erotic imaginal direction, not allowing the psyche and the logos to expand, not allowing the imaginal dimensions to flower? In the context of this kind of practice, not allowing the deeper levels of desire and that movement of the being there—the contact with it, the allowing it, the opening to it, the respect for it.

Another example I could give is actually also from myself, partly because it's a different kind. This goes back a few years when I was interested in—still am actually very much—what a study of modern physics could bring to a Dharma understanding and the ways it could open up certain parallels with emptiness, but also the implications there for ontology, cosmology, and more and more now, actually, epistemology as well, studying the philosophy of science.

But this is back then, as I said, these are old examples, and I was studying a lot about modern physics. In the heat of the eros there, of the desire, I felt something which I recognized was familiar to me and my kind of personality structure or constellation. It was a kind of impatience to understand and a pressure to understand. So I was hungry to understand. I was studying a lot.

Really the sense was, well, you read something, but that just takes you to the next thing to read, the next book. One book leads to another, and you kind of follow these leads. The feeling of impatience and pressure was coming in, sort of in the background, but then a little bit pushing on the whole psyche. It felt like I was unable to read these books fast enough. There was something, a sense of, I wanted to arrive at the sort of end of the whole process. Now I understand. Now there's no more books to read. Phew, done.

So I recognized this pressure, actually just as dukkha, didn't see that there was a desire in it, then recognized the desire that was pressuring there, and felt it, as I said, with these instructions I've outlined, and going to the deeper question, what is it wanting, this desire?

This example is a little bit interesting because the desire at first blush seemed to say, I want to end this process of inquiry. I want to understand everything so I don't have all this kind of continuous more books to read sort of thing, because one thing leads to another and one understanding leads to another, or one line of inquiry opens another one.

When I went more into it, actually, what was deeper and more fundamental was that it was a desire for inquiry itself. It was this desire to question, to make discoveries, to explore. In this case, discovery for myself by absorbing what others had discovered and making connections with what I was doing in my own practice.

This question—what is it wanting—actually opened this sense of joy in the ongoing inquiry. So the desire changes tack in the inquiry. Or we could say that it opened to a realization of how much of a desire for inquiry was ongoing. The change in tack is that ongoingness becomes beautiful and becomes the thing that's wanted.

And there was tremendous joy liberated with that—the joy of ongoing inquiry, ongoing questioning, ongoing discovery. So this whole pressure that was felt and the sense that "it needs to end" was liberated through asking the question and opening to it. There was a whole beautiful and energizing opening that happened in the energy body, in the whole citta, in the whole psyche really, of this joy of discovery.

Let me state again those three steps. So there are two examples, three steps. First—and I may clear away... let's reverse that, because the first two steps are reversible, so we'll put them in the other order this time.

First, one clears away whatever dharma preconceptions make one dismiss desire, or denigrate it, or be suspicious of it. "It's a kilesa, it's only coming from self, or it feeds the self, or it causes selfing, or it is selfing, or it's craving, it just brings dukkha," all that. Just clear away, even just momentarily, even just as an experiment, just temporarily—without needing to clear them away forever or saying there's no insight involved in them, that's absolutely not true. Just temporarily clear them away and see if you can introduce, just temporarily, a kind of playing with or entertaining of a trust, a trusting of a deeper intelligence to the movement of desire. That there is, either in the way that I relate to it, or already there at bedrock, if you like, a treasure waiting to be discovered in the movement of desire.

And then this question, second step: what am I really wanting? What is this desire really wanting? What is the desire really for? Unhooking or ungripping, if you like—letting the desire ungrip from its immediate, obvious image of what I want, or this person or that object or that event, whatever it is to be this way or that way. And let it find or reveal to you what's the deeper thing wanted, the deeper level, if you like, of the desire, which will probably sound more general.

And then really feeling that in the psyche, in the body, and allowing it, especially in the energy body—really opening, really opening the space for that current, that energy, that movement there.

Now, I was going to report some more findings regarding the actual experiences and the states that seem to tend to open up when one does this kind of practice and bring a bit more specificity and nuance to that. But I think I'll leave that actually for now and leave you to research it for yourself and play with it and see what you discover in terms of the directions and the experiences and the states that can open, and if there's patterns there and repeatable kind of observations and movements that happen. So perhaps that will be for another retreat.

But just to say something around all this—actually around everything we're talking about on this retreat: sometimes with desire there is lack wrapped up in it, or it's coming from a sense of lack, or another emotion, or something like that. And sometimes, of course, we may need to first be with the actual emotional experience of distress or difficulty or lack or sadness or grief or whatever it is—anger, upset—that's going on. And maybe that too has a few different aspects, or is a mixture, as often an emotional state is, a mixture of different emotions. Not always, but often. And just to be with that, and see, and feel, and allow what's going on there emotionally.

And oftentimes there is a lack there that's felt. And the question then is: two questions. One is, do I have the skill to do that? Do you have the skills to do that? As we've talked about in some of the energy body work and on other retreats and teachings elsewhere—just really developing my ability, your ability to work well with, in this case, difficult emotions. Also, beautiful emotions can be difficult to handle. But do I have that? Do I know that? Is that in my toolkit—that I really have different ways of working well, meeting well, opening to, caring for, in meditation, in my life, the range of emotions that come up for me in the course of life and practice. So do I have that skill? First question.

And second, is it necessary to first do that before trying this other approach? Because what can often happen is we assume that it is. And even more than that, we can get into a kind of habit where we always go to the lack or we always go to the negative and we always kind of linger there in a way that just keeps it at a feeling of lack. In other words, it doesn't really transform it very much, or maybe it just kind of...

gradually, gradually soothes and we're kind of okay or we just get distracted by the next thing that's demanding our attention. But we can kind of get stuck in a habit here and also in an emotional constellation of lack.

So that, yes, lack and desire often go together, not always, often as I'll come back to. And we can get more into or have a habit of tending towards, going towards the lack thread of those two threads that are interwoven, the lack and the desire. We always go to the lack thread.

And we might feel, because of our habit of doing that, that this practice that I'm explaining now regarding a way of being with desire, this practice, that's a kind of artificial construct. You're making something happen if you do that because it's not natural if you do that. The real thing, the thing that's actually present, the thing that's natural, the thing that's unartificial, not a construct, is the lack itself. And that feels like the natural thing. I'm just, quote, "being with what is."

Failure then to see the dependent origination. This is so important. We've touched on this before. So, so important. I'm not seeing the dependent origination. If I have that kind of view and that kind of response to hearing these different practices and these different approaches, I'm simply not understanding the dependent origination of experience.

And it may very well be that through the habit of what I pay attention to and the ways of paying attention to it, that I'm actually, I just keep building this particular range, limited range of emotions and experience. Through what I pay attention to and how I pay attention to it and the habit involved in that, I do not see that I'm actually constructing. I think I'm just being in a way that's very natural and not adding anything to the experience. I'm just being with what is, but I keep constructing that same "what is," whether it's a sense of lack or whatever it is. I'm not understanding the dependent origination, the fabricated, constructed nature of all experience and all perception. And I'm just locked into a kind of habit there without even realizing what's going on. And I take it as the truth, reality, quote, "what is." Things as they are, et cetera.

So again, you know, it's just my particular emphasis in how I teach is that can we hold this aim of flexibility—flexibility of practice, flexibility of approach, flexibility of conception—that can we hold that as a principle aim of practice so that we can do it lots of different ways? Here's this dukkha, I have lots of different ways of approaching it. Here's this feeling of lack, I have lots of different ways of approaching it. Here's this desire mixed with the lack, we have lots of different ways of approaching that. Lots of angles and ways that it unfolds the experience in different directions.

Can we, again, experiment and see, rather than just being locked into a set of assumptions that we're no longer investigating. Experiment and see. Okay, can I go to the emotion and care for that and be with that in different ways? And can I actually other times try this thing with the desire? Can I do both? Can I learn to do both? Do I have that in my repertoire? And if not, can I actually gradually move towards a place, a time when I have that—then both in my repertoire? They're both just ways of approaching things.

Part of that might be that I actually need the skill to differentiate lack and desire. Because they're not the same. They're two different things. I mean, they're connected, for sure. They can be connected. But I can differentiate them as two strands that are perhaps entangled, and actually unentangle them.

And I'm not necessarily assuming an order. First I have to do this, and then I'll be able to do that. Well, then only then am I allowed to do that. Only then should I do that. First I have to do this. Yes, sometimes, and sometimes not. Sometimes you could go straight to this working with the desire, as I've elaborated in this talk, and the Beauty of Desire Part Two talk, and sometimes not. Sometimes I want to dwell more with the emotional difficulty, care for that in different ways, then maybe go to the desire thing, or not do the desire thing at all.

So there's a lot here about ways of practicing and order of practice and our assumptions around all that. And again, presenting this kind of practice, is it a desired prerequisite, a necessary preliminary capacity to be able to let go of desires and cravings that we talked about right at the beginning? You know, some familiarity with that. Do I also even allow myself to feel desire? Or is there this kind of—we talked about this anti-libidinal force.

I just shut it down before I've even felt it. And then it's wonderful to find Buddhism because it seems to validate this approach: "Yes, desire is bad, therefore just shut it down." But what's actually propelling me is a kind of anti-libidinal drive—in Fairbairn's terms—or this deep fear of having desire at all.

Can I actually feel it? Can I feel the energy of it, have the feeling? Do I recognize it? Do I know it? Do I know the different shades of it? These may well be prerequisite skills—capacities and abilities that could be necessary for these kinds of practices.

So there are three basic steps, and this question about being with the lack beforehand—or how much, or whether I need to—these are questions involved in all of this that I'd like to open up as inquiries. There's this need, I think, to experiment, to learn how to approach things in different ways, from different directions, in different orders, questioning our assumptions throughout.

Another element to add to the instructions for this practice concerns posture. For most people, certainly at first but often most of the time, posture will be quite important. Allowing and opening to energy flow—the third step of this practice—will be easier when the physical body is relatively open and upright and uncontracted.

I'd like to offer this practice and encourage you to pick it up as another possibility and play with it—try it, do it repeatedly. It doesn't have to be now, but at some point, engage with it repeatedly until you understand how to do it. Have it, as I said, in your repertoire. But to have it available as a working resource, you need to actually do it. You need to try it. You need to experiment with it.

My suggestion is that through experimenting, through trying it and making that effort to play with it for yourself, it can become incorporated into your toolbox. And that's a really valuable tool to have—not to use all the time, certainly not. It's like a toolbox: you have a range of tools. Apart from being genuinely helpful because it increases your resources, it's also enjoyable. That's part of the creativity. But you're only going to incorporate it and have it available as a tool if you pick it up, listen again to the instructions, play with it, and make it your own. This applies to all practices, of course.

One thing that struck me when I first introduced this in teaching was that I only heard back from two people who actually took it on board in a way that they repeated it for themselves. In other words, not with me sitting there guiding or offering it to them, or even asking if they were willing to try it and then guiding them through it, but doing it independently.

Now, it could be that many people were practicing it everywhere, but I doubt it. I could be wrong, but I only heard back from two people. One of them actually died a few years ago. The other—I don't know if she ever repeated it after the initial thrill of discovering it, the ability to do it, how transformative it was, what it opened up, and how remarkably easy it was to do.

This observation is quite interesting to me. Either people simply weren't telling me, or it reveals something about my own naivety in not repeating teachings sufficiently. I think that for new things to be taken on board—new approaches, new teachings, new practices—they need an enormous amount of repetition, probably by much more than one person. They probably need to be quite widespread in their dissemination, across continents and over time, with different voices. They also need to be offered much more slowly—even slower than I'm doing here in this talk—so that they become integrated into instructions repeatedly and people become accustomed to them, really hearing and doing them.

Maybe it also needs a special name. We have names for different practices, and perhaps that's part of what allows something to be digested and assimilated organically. I'm not very good at names, but something like "opening to the deeper current of desire"—that's a way of summarizing this practice. Still quite a mouthful, but anyway, this was interesting to me. And again, it connects with this whole researcher fantasy theme that runs through these teachings.

I wonder why people didn't learn the practice or repeat it for themselves, apart from this need for repetition in teaching. Often what happened when I worked with people through this practice, taking them through it step by step, was that they were so struck by the actual experience and transformation—the sense of the body, the state of consciousness, the feeling of super-abundance that arose. It was a "wow" experience.

But this is really interesting to me: how we can be captivated by the intensity of an experience—I've talked about this before—the wow factor, and miss the principle involved. This relates to the researcher fantasy because it's the principle, the learning of the technique or practice, and then the principle that emerges from it. What is it saying about desire? What are the principles of the practice and what are the ramifications, the implications?

Actually, the more significant "wow" to me is not so much the experience that opens up in the moment when you do this, but the principle itself—how it fits or doesn't fit with narrower Dharma understandings, the greater freedom that emerges from that, and the questioning of it all.

So one thing I observed was that people were often quite struck by the experience and neglected to inquire. In other words, there was an absence of the researcher curiosity to explore the principles.

What's going on here? Isn't that surprising? What does this imply? What does this mean we have to rethink? What avenues does this open?

Sometimes, of course, part of this absence of deeper inquiry stems from people simply feeling relieved to feel better. Someone might have been feeling quite upset about something, and after working with this approach, they're just grateful for the relief. This is entirely understandable, but there's a way the deeper investigation gets eclipsed. This connects directly to our exploration of fantasies of the path and of the self—the researcher fantasy isn't being supported in these moments.

One final observation about this practice: I've found myself explaining this approach in various settings, and occasionally someone will respond with something like, "Oh, so what you're saying is just to accept everything and be with what is." For many reasons, I've come to expect this kind of response. There's a tendency to hear something new or different and immediately assimilate it into what we're accustomed to hearing, what we already know.

People are familiar with basic dharma teachings about being with what is, accepting what's happening. Even when someone might be presenting something quite different from that, it can simply get missed. This used to shock me, but I've grown accustomed to it. I think it stems partly from how we're taught and partly from how we learn as human beings—it's important to create categories and fit experiences into those boxes, but there's a cost at certain stages of development.

Clearly, though, if we examine the three steps of this particular practice, it's not the same as simply accepting everything. It might sound somewhat similar, but when we say "really opening to the energy," this isn't the same as mere acceptance. Acceptance can be very passive, very "meh." It's not the full-bodied, complete movement of opening within the energy body that I'm describing.

Neither does simple acceptance include this active engagement with trust—entertaining the idea that desire might be trustworthy, might conceal or eventually reveal treasure if we relate to it differently. This element isn't present in generic "be with what is" teachings.

And there's certainly no exploration of the deeper level of desire—this question of "What am I really wanting here?" Generic acceptance might notice, "Oh, I desire this person, I want this to happen, I wish that wouldn't happen," but it remains at the more immediate level of objective desire, not diving into the deeper currents.

So this approach is actually quite different. If we have a limited conception of what the dharma is—if it's simply about being with what is and trying to accept everything—then our understanding remains constrained. And when our understanding is limited, our practice becomes limited because it flows from that understanding. Practice gets reduced to generically trying to be present, to what someone once described to me as their understanding of dharma: "essentially just trying to be in your body."

This limitation in concept and practice inevitably leads to limited experiences and insights. The range of practices available to us, the spectrum of experiences that might open, the possibilities for shifts in perception, openings in consciousness and feeling—all of this becomes constrained by the narrowness of our conceptual framework and the practices that emerge from it.

One final point: this practice of opening to the deeper current of desire—surely there's a better name—is also different from what we've been exploring in imaginal practice. In imaginal practice, the image is always retained. It may deepen, it may transform slightly, but the image remains central and is always preserved. By central, I mean we don't reduce the image—we don't say it's "really just" a representation of something else.

In this practice of opening to the deeper current of desire, however, the image is regarded as secondary to discovering the deeper, more fundamental desire. In this sense, the image might be seen as representational and secondary. Generally, the image isn't retained because we're moving toward what we might call the more general, deeper level of content—both the object of desire and the energy involved.

We're exploring a different doorway into the experience of desire, a different approach entirely. Though having said all this, it's really a matter of emphasis, and there's certainly overlap between these approaches.

Erotic-imaginal practice, as we've emphasized throughout this retreat and others, involves trusting—playing with trust, offering at least some measure of trust to both eros and image. It also involves working with the energy body, including opening and expansion. So there is overlap here.

And when we look more deeply at this practice of opening to the deeper current of desire, we discover that this whole deeper trust of desire we're entertaining is both an idea and, in its own way, a kind of image.

So I hope in the future to explore how image and idea are really not separate. They shade into and imply and connect with each other.

We could say there is overlap here because the opening to the deeper current of desire practice already involves image in the imaginal, in its relationship with desire, in the form of this deeper trust of desire that involves the imaginal.

But to say something we've emphasized right from the beginning of the retreat—and hopefully by now you're getting very aware of this, it should be blindingly obvious—just how easy and relatively common it is to stop or arrest prematurely what could be much wider, deeper, more nuanced explorations of desire, craving, eros, clinging than we may first assume are warranted. It's so common to just stop that movement of exploration so it doesn't actually get very wide, doesn't go very deep, and lacks subtlety and sophistication around this whole area of desire, craving, clinging, eros.

We see this in the practice I talked about in "The Beauty of Desire Part Two," which we're now calling opening to the deeper current of desire. We saw it in terms of this bigger and more subtle exploration with what we were calling clinging, and realizing the spectrum of clinging and all the subtlety that can be evolved in that, along with the framework of understanding what's happening there—that when we let go of clinging, there's less fabrication. When we fabricate, there is less fabrication of perception, self, other, world.

This is telling us about the Buddha's teaching about dependent arising, dependent origination, and emptiness, which is intimately connected with the understanding of dependent origination through the fading of perception that happens, and through the fabrication moving up and down the spectrum. We've talked about this extensively, and I've written about it a lot. That's a whole other deeper exploration of this whole question of desires, a whole direction there that goes much deeper. We can actually realize a whole integrated conceptual framework of understanding regarding dependent origination and emptiness through the investigation of clinging and playing with clinging and the spectrum of clinging and its reduction and what that means.

So that's two large areas. And then of course the whole area that we're focusing on for the most part on this retreat—eros and soulmaking.

Just see how much there is worthy of a wider, deeper, more sophisticated, more subtle, more careful and more nuanced exploration in these directions. In other words, with regard to desire, eros, craving and clinging.

CHAPTER 85

Opening The Dharma of Desire (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h19

> In this continuation of his profound exploration, Rob Burbea delves deeper into the sophisticated understanding of desire, particularly the crucial distinction between eros and craving (taṇhā). He examines how our assumptions about desire—that it always stems from lack, always leads to dukkha, or always reinforces selfing—can be questioned through direct inquiry and imaginal practice.
>
> Burbea offers practical guidance on working with challenging desires, such as longing for an unavailable teacher or beloved, showing how boundaries can create an alchemical vessel (temenos) that transforms craving into soul-making eros. Rather than simply 'letting go,' he demonstrates how allowing the imaginal dimension to open can lead to equanimity with eros intact, recognizing that what we often seek is not the concrete object but the soul-making process itself.
> The talk explores how desire is inseparable from our entire cosmological view—our understanding of self, other, world, and time. Through examining the etymology of 'desire' (from Latin 'desiderare'—from the stars), Burbea reveals how this fundamental human experience can be viewed as divine influx rather than defilement. He concludes by articulating the double meaning of 'alchemy of desire': both the transformation of craving into eros, and eros's capacity to transubstantiate our perception of existence itself through the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic.

Perhaps more fundamental than any of the details of what I'm talking about or elements of the fabric, the structure of what we're trying to communicate and convey, is this encouragement, permission, and even request to inquire for yourself—to experiment, to play, to ask questions, to turn over stones and see what's underneath. Let yourself find out, interrogate.

So the permission, the encouragement, and even the request to inquire. A part of inquiry is becoming aware of what our assumptions are and questioning those assumptions. Inquiry can be very much a movement of soul-making, part of soul-making. I would say the other way around: soul-making always involves some inquiry because of this expansion of the logos in the eros-psyche-logos. Inquiry can be soul-making.

More general and fundamental than any of the details or the little insights or this or that practice is this need for inquiry and this permission and encouragement to inquire.

In the practice we described in the first part of this talk—what we're calling the opening to the deeper current of desire—through that practice, it will almost certainly question or overturn certain assumptions if those assumptions are in place. For example, the assumption that desire that is not for ending suffering or a desire that is not just for metta or for jhāna—such desires that are not so narrowly conceived as kind of path desires—that other desires are defilements and lead to dukkha. Through engaging such a practice, it should almost inevitably upturn and uproot such assumptions, question them, bring one face to face with them and their questioning.

Or the assumption that desire is always from something called the self and leads to selfing, building this bad thing called the self. Again, looking at such desires and feeling where they come from and what they do when we relate to them in certain ways should confront us with these assumptions and hopefully bring more sophistication, more nuance, more depth and breadth of insight into our whole understanding and relationship with desire.

Through this course, we could say there are many uncommon observations—not commonly reported or talked about or chronicled or systematized observations in relationship to desire, what desire is and does and can be. Observations that are contrary to the usual assumptions and conclusions, at least in our kind of contemporary dharma understanding. We have quite a whole host of these observations that don't fit in the usual logos and set of assumptions and conclusions.

For example, we have talked about delineating eros from craving, saying desire is a large subset and we can delineate something—a kind of desire called eros and a kind of desire called craving if we use language in a certain way and define them. We're saying these are not equivalent, interchangeable words. Eros is not craving. And the imaginal is not papañca. So the erotic-imaginal is a very different thing than the contracting and proliferating and crazy-making movement of craving and papañca.

We shared that if one is involved in one's life perhaps with some other who is unavailable for whatever reasons—either because of boundaries or because they're already involved with someone else or they're just not interested or unavailable due to health or whatever—and one feels the contraction of dukkha, stuck in the contraction of craving, looping in a circle and feeling the pain of that, contrary to usual instructions to "just let go," let go of that person, let go of the craving, let go of the attachment, one possibility is actually to allow more of the imaginal element, the imaginal realm. Allow the imaginal to open up in the seeing of the other and open up the whole constellation.

Everything that goes with that—the sense of beauty, the sense of meaningfulness, the sense of necessity, depth, dimensionality, especially the dimensionality that comes with the imaginal—so that this other that I seem to be so stuck with and frustrated by not being able to have, actually they become more through the allowing of the erotic-imaginal, through seeing and sensing in that way. They become, if you like, expanded imaginally. They become more angel, if we use that word in its imaginal sense. Their angelic function becomes more apparent to our erotic gaze, to our imaginal sensing. And also then, related to that, their divinity.

So opening—actually, rather than turning away and trying to close down or just avoid this person, or shut down the desire, or contemplate their foul body parts—another possibility, and yes, it's not easy perhaps at first, and it's certainly unusual, but with practice, absolutely possible, is to enter more into the imaginal, the imaginal vision, the imaginal sensing of this person.

The expansion that they then go through in perception of this other, the filling out and the expansion, widening, deepening, complicating of this imaginal object that they are, also brings with it, rather than more problem, the evidentness, the self-evidence that this is image. So rather than getting stuck in a kind of concretization and realism, as we let the imaginal inflate, give dimensionality, give extra beauty, give angelism, an angelic function, a divinity to this person, all of that, it's obvious that we're dealing with image.

The mindfulness is there, and the energy body, and the attuning to resonances. That takes, because it punctures the realism, the problem out of it and it's no longer craving. It steers craving towards eros more.

So letting the psyche, the image expand and deepen so that this object, this beloved other, this person that I feel I'm infatuated with or frustrated by or whatever, they're obviously more than just what they seem. And it's obviously imaginal.

When we get stuck in craving, even despite the papañca, there's the realism there, as we said before. Actually, the object is limited. It's limited, it's capped. Even if there's proliferation, it's capped.

The extension of the object goes into fantasizing about the future rather than expanding the dimensionality of the object itself and of the self. So I'm reviewing now these unusual, uncommon insights that we've unearthed here.

In allowing the eros, in allowing the feeling of the eros, often that actually brings an equanimity in the experience of the eros, and a spaciousness at the same time as there is eros and soul. It's not an equanimity devoid of eros. It's not an equanimity and spaciousness devoid of soul, or at least with only very limited soul-making.

In allowing the eros—we've given examples of this—actually allowing the eros, trusting it, trusting the erotic imaginal, there can be peace there, even if I'm not able to have this person for whatever reason in the way that I think I want them. There can be peace here, not from letting go, turning away, avoiding, repressing, or deciding to see them as ugly or stupid or unworthy. But in the very opening more to the eros and the imaginal, we can have a sense of peace because somehow we have more. We have more through the image, in the image, with the image.

I'm not talking about daydream—I don't need to repeat all this now. But in the increase and the allowing of the imaginal and the erotic in relationship to this other, with whom I've been contracted and craving and stuck, there can be equanimity, spaciousness, with eros, with soul, and also peace.

So "just let go"—which is sometimes so simplistically offered as a teaching recommendation—is certainly an option. It's a good possibility sometimes. But it may come at a cost. What's the cost? What am I losing there in terms of eros and soul? It's an option, absolutely, and it's something we can cultivate—that ability and capacity and skill in letting go in that sense. But it's not the only option.

Wrapped up in that option of "just let go" is the assumption of all kinds of things. One of the things it's assuming is a realism: this real self is letting go of that real object. One can contemplate the emptiness of self and object. But there's also this other way of actually recognizing who this person is to my psyche, letting the psyche create and discover the depths and the fuller beauty of this imaginal other. Yes, maybe that sounds dangerous, maybe it sounds crazy, but it's absolutely possible. And it doesn't really take that much development of practice to be able to do that.

We've talked about fantasies of the path and self on the path, and one piece of that constellation I mentioned was the fantasy of the teacher, the fantasy of others on the path. As with working with a therapist or working with a teacher in any area or domain of education that one loves and cares about, there can be the fantasy of the teacher and the eros in relationship with the teacher. This is really quite common, I'm sure many of you are aware. At the same time, there's the boundary between teacher and student. It's not just a relationship where one enters into this or that and decides to consummate sexually or just be friends.

Oftentimes the encouragement is to let go or just stop doing that—either the teacher says to the student, or someone else says, "Drop it. Think of something else, find someone else." Or it's conceived in a classical psychoanalytic model of the Oedipal triangle: "I want this mummy or daddy," and it's related to that way—it's a projection based in the past and needs a healthy walking through together, the disappointment and the firm keeping of boundaries, just walking through that disappointment there. Fine.

But in that kind of approach, other possibilities, other dimensions of possibility, are actually missed. Like any other teacher, I've been on the receiving end of that—that's a strange way to say it, isn't it? That has arisen. Students have expressed that from time to time towards me. It's completely what I would expect. When a person loves the path and there's that relationship, in the teacher-student relationship, and there's the fertility of the soul-making, the eros is going to involve, in this case, the teacher, as that's part of the constellation.

I don't take that, if it happens or when it happens, in some way that's going to puff up my ego. It's not me as real. It's not that it has nothing to do with me, of course, nothing to do with what I teach—

But I can't take it about me. It's about the soul. It's about soul-making. It's about the erotic movement of the soul and the erotic imaginal there. And if a person is told "just absolutely stop it, just turn it off," or if it's only reduced or shrunk into that kind of Oedipal paradigm—or variations of the Oedipal paradigm that are common in modern psychotherapeutic circles—if it's only that... I'm not saying that's not sometimes an important element to address, but if it's only that, something else gets missed.

Someone wrote to me a while ago, and I realize the danger of sharing this and how people might hear it and what they then assume. So I'm not talking about anything that involves boundaries not being there and being very clear. They absolutely were there, and neither am I talking about something that I took personally or got off on in some way at all. I hope you can really hear that and trust that and understand that we're talking about something that's a little more sophisticated than probably a lot of too easy assumptions and explanations about the people involved or about what's going on.

And the person wrote: "After some time, you and your teachings have never been just a teacher and teachings for me. You've been a key that's unlocked the whole cosmos and let it out of a box."

So this person then actually realized after some time what was happening in that movement of eros and the fantasy of the teacher. In this case, there's an erotic image, there's an erotic beloved other, and soul-making was allowed through that image, because she didn't just stamp on it and turn it off, and she didn't just reduce it to "it's about daddy and wanting daddy."

So the soul-making was allowed through an erotic image, and when she said "a key that's unlocked the whole cosmos and let it out of a box," in a way she literally meant that. Because, as we've been talking about, allowing the eros and the erotic imaginal opened up the cosmopoiesis. The whole realm of the imaginal perception of herself, of others, of the world—all this soul-making, cosmopoiesis, cosmopoetic sensibility—was opened through, yes, through the teachings, but also through the allowing of the erotic other and allowing of the eros there.

And she says, "Falling in love with you was falling in love with an entire world. No wonder it felt so big." You understand? She also says something... so it feels so big because it literally is big. It's a whole world. It's a whole world that's opening up in cosmopoiesis. That's actually what she's falling in love with. It isn't me. It's not me, this person, that I should then take personally and feel like, "Wow, aren't I this or that or attractive." It's actually falling in love with an entire world. What world? The world of soul-making and the world seen and sensed through the soul—through the eyes of the soul, the sensibilities of the soul.

And she continues: "I think I needed to borrow your soul for a while while my own was just waking up."

So the attraction, the eros and the love is for the soul-making. We could say psyche is in love with itself. Eros is sparked by the glimpse of psyche's own treasures. So you might see in someone else the treasures that belong to psyche, they belong to you, not just the other person. Psyche is sparked by a glimpse of its own vision—of its own possibilities of deepening, widening, being enriched.

Do you understand? Psyche is in love with itself. The eros is really—the eros of the soul, the eros of psyche—is for soul, for psyche. Psyche is in love with itself, it's in love with its own growth. Soul loves soul-making. Soul wants soul-making.

And when something happens with a person and there's that erotic connection there, often what's happening is they or the relationship or something in the relationship or the totality of that constellation is feeding soul-making. And at first sight, it can seem like it's them. "I want them. I need them in a certain form or mode of relating."

Sometimes it may be that that's allowed for in the circumstances and it's the right thing and lovely. But oftentimes it's not really about that. We make the mistake. It's really about the soul-making. And we love it and we sense it and the soul longs for it.

And she's honest here: "Of course the immature enchantment got mixed in there too. Maybe if you'd been an eighty-year-old wrinkly sage, it wouldn't have. But I'm glad that part has been ebbing; soul has taken hold."

So there was this process over time of going back—there's soul-making, but it veers into craving and contraction: "I want this," or a very particular form. But the boundaries...

But the boundaries that the relationship has—that it only exists within this particular range and not a larger range, extending itself to manifest in this way or that way, whether sexually or as friends or whatever in the usual sense of the word—that agreement functions as a boundary. And the boundary creates a kind of container. It functions to create walls, if you like, that manifest the potential for an alchemical vessel.

In other words, that container can become, if it's related to in the right way, an alchemical vessel. The fire of eros heats up the soul material in that vessel, the contents of the vessel, and there is the alchemical process—the soul-making process that is allowed by the vessel and the fire and the imaginal perceptions.

So that container is not there to contain the feelings, if you like, so that one can feel the original disappointment with one's parents, in the more standard psychotherapeutic models. That may be part of it, as we've acknowledged, but principally it's an alchemical vessel, a soul-making container in potential. We still need to have the art of alchemy relate to it rightly—protect that vessel, watch the fire, work on the contents, on the images.

The walls there, note this too, are not walls or barriers or blocks to image, nor to logos, nor to eros. The Eros-Psyche-Logos trinity—no aspect of it is walled off or blocked or limited or cramped. It's the boundary that creates the agreement, that creates limits of action and actual manifestation. Of course, there's going to be friendship there, deep friendship, but it's limited in terms of how it manifests.

And that boundary—not walls of Psyche, Logos, or Eros, but that boundary—allows what we called before a temenos, another Greek word, which I translated as sacred space. Better to translate it, in this case, as a space that allows the making sacred. A space, temenos is a space that allows sacralizing, allows the alchemical process to transubstantiate the material into divine material, sacred material, soul material.

So temenos, a boundary, creates a space of potential. It may or may not realize that potential of soul-making. And how does it do that? This goes back to what we said much earlier on the retreat. How does it do that? It's because the more that's desired in the eros, the pothos in the eros cannot pursue or look for that more at a certain point. It realizes it cannot, it will not get its more on the level of one-dimensionality and the level of more contact or sexual contact or hanging out or whatever it is.

So the only way it can get more is—it's forced, if you like (maybe that's too strong a word), but it's contained in this alchemical vessel. The only way it can get more is in the imaginal. Only or principally, let's say, the imaginal is the direction and space made available and offered for the movement of eros and the more of the pothos, the more that it wants. So this is the available space. This is the fire of the eros and the materials directed into the imaginal.

And there's, in the discovering of the fullness of the imaginal, more and more fullness of the imaginal, the creation of that, the discovery and creation of that, there is soul-making. And because self too, we've touched on this, will be wrapped up or involved in that constellation—soul-making constellation—it's not just about the other, about the teacher, about the therapist or whatever. Self, other, world, Eros itself—the whole constellation will be involved there and is supported to heat up and have that soul-making process.

And the soul-making is allowed to deepen and widen until it's seen for what it is. And it's not that object that I want, that person in that form. I actually want something more than that, deeper than that. Yes, in some instances I will get that through a certain form of relationship and that's all fine if it's okay. But actually the soul is after something else, hungry and thirsty for something else.

So then that, as you said, that part of it ebbed away. And there's still strong love, she writes, but it's very different now. It's eros, and love and care, minus the craving. The craving has been drained out of it.

So that whole process was allowed to give rise to soul-making—more and more, wider and deeper, a complicated and beautiful process of soul-making over some time, and peace, supported by the temenos or the alchemical vessel provided by the boundaries and provided by the teachings and provided by a certain way of relating to the whole thing.

All this is still talking about assumptions now, and opening up assumptions and inquiry. Do we trust Eros? Do we trust the imaginal? Do we trust the erotic-imaginal? Do we understand Eros? Or put it another way, because we said it's impossible to finally answer: is there an expanding of our understanding of Eros? Are we moving in that direction, or have we just decided something and stopped looking?

Do we trust the movement of soul-making and the intelligence that might be propelling that movement of soul-making? Can we trust that?

Sometimes what happens is there's a sort of partial trust of the eros in one direction but not in another. So, for example, in that polarity we've talked about between the unfabricated on one hand—some people with a longing and a desire, an eros towards the unfabricated, if you like—and they might look, such people might look with distrust and suspicion and disrespect at people whose eros seems to be for the world and for their senses and for others.

And vice versa. The people whose eros seems to be, or they feel it, directed to this world and the senses and beauty here and other human beings, look with perplexity or suspicion of some kind of psychological wounding or something at those whose eros wants the unfabricated and maybe has chosen to leave aside the world and the senses and the kind of erotic engagement for the sake of the erotic movement towards the unfabricated.

So these two camps of directions are often suspicious of each other.

This becomes so heated and contentious philosophically within the Dharma as well. This assumes one even allows eros, but such opposition is taken for granted between what we might call the transcendent, spirit, or the unfabricated on one hand, and the immanent, matter, the senses, or worldly things on the other.

But this opposition—whether in terms of inclination, philosophy, or otherwise—can only really hold if there's realism. This dichotomy, this tug of war, this mutual suspicion can only exist on the basis of realism. If we don't understand or see the emptiness of both—the emptiness of the world, the emptiness of sense perception, and the emptiness of the unfabricated—only then does this opposition hold.

Or perhaps we've moved beyond realism because we've explored the eros sufficiently in both movements. We've explored eros enough to understand that whole movement of rendering things, allowing their imaginal nature to open up, seeing image as image. And perhaps we've explored both directions.

So there's this apparent opposition between the transcendent, the unfabricated, and the world or matter. We need to account, as I said, in our logos—I feel we can't really ignore this phenomenological observation that when clinging is reduced, to that extent there's a decrease in the fabrication of the perception of self, other, and world. Somehow I need to account for that. I can, based on certain epistemological assumptions, decide to ignore it, but to me it's something we need to account for, especially as meditators.

So we need to account for it. But it also seems to me that if eros is strong—if there is a strong, deep, and powerful eros running through a person—and if there's a logos or intelligence that allows expansion and understanding, and also if we've been exposed to a concept or idea of the unfabricated or transcendent, or if an intuition of it or the possibility of it has emerged somehow in consciousness—a glimpse, an intimation of it, either in meditation or through a certain direction of inquiry around fabrication, or as one moves about in the world and there's perhaps the veiled sense of it, the glimpse of it, there as an intuition of a possibility—then the eros will actually eventually go in both directions.

It will be eros for the transcendent, if we've been exposed to the idea, probably. If there's a certain amount of intelligence and logos that can hold such a concept, even if we don't quite understand it yet, and if the eros is strong, then the eros will go towards the transcendent at some point. It will actually go in both directions. We've said this before.

But the desire for mystical knowing and the desire for the unfabricated, to me, when they are there, they are signals, almost always. They are signals of a rich, deep, powerful eros in a person. People with less eros tend not to want to know the transcendent, the unfabricated. That very desire indicates a deep, powerful longing, a deep, powerful movement of eros.

It's really quite remarkable. Several people have reported to me that others look at them—maybe they know them relatively well or perhaps less so—and they see someone who has this mystical inclination and who has a desire to know the unfabricated, and they assume that because they want that, because there is this eros in that direction, this movement towards the unfabricated and the mystical sensibility, they assume that they're therefore not interested in close relationship, in erotic or sexual relationships. Strange assumptions, based on this opposition, this dichotomy.

Actually, it's probably the opposite that is the case. A person who longs for the unfabricated, who moves in that direction, who makes inquiries and practices in that direction and wants to know and wants to open and wants these other levels of perception that we could call mystical—usually that person has a lot of eros and also has a lot of eros in human relationships, and sometimes in the purely intrapsychic imaginal.

Sometimes there are assumptions made by those without so much eros running through them. They make assumptions about other people in a way they don't understand, because they don't know, because they're basing their view on just how much eros they have. Or there's actually an anti-libidinal kind of fear that we talked about, that they're making their assumptions based on—this fear of allowing eros. Not just that they don't have it; they might have it, but they might be dampening it. And so their eros is dampened or only channeled or allowed in a few limited directions because of this anti-libidinal fear of disappointment, rejection, whatever it is. Based on that view, the view that comes from that limited eros, they're reading other people and making assumptions about other people and what's going on for them or what they're like.

So there can be so much—it's so easy, again, just on the theme of this part of the talk—it's so easy to not let our questioning loose, if you like, or not to gather power in our questioning. Questioning is related to eros. It's penetrating, if we use that image, or it's opening. So sometimes the questioning is actually driven by eros. And again, sometimes people who keep questioning—it's also indicative of the movement of eros, of the fullness, the depth, the force, the power, the richness of the eros there.

But with all this, we see just how easy it is for assumptions to be operating without us even realizing. And these assumptions wield a lot of power and they have a lot of effects. They really affect how we view things, how we view others, how we view self, how we view existence, and then what unfolds for us. All kinds of assumptions.

So we mentioned, just as an example, the assumption that desire always comes from lack, from a feeling of lack. Does it? Does it? Can I question this? And it's possible—I would say it's possible—for desire to come out of joy, out of a sense of celebration, out of a sense of abundance, overabundance even, superabundance.

Somehow the desire flows out of that. Again, this word "flow" is intimately related to libido. There's an overflowing of the libido that manifests as desire. And sometimes, at another level—and we've already touched on this as well—there's a recognition that desire is somehow already flowing from me to you on the imaginal level, in the imaginal realm, so to speak. It's already flowing. It's not coming out of lack. It's already there in some fullness.

I think earlier, at some point in one of the previous talks, we explored how desire may be viewed in different ways. We can view it as really not okay—it's a defilement. Or even if we don't use such strong language as kilesa, we somehow anticipate or imagine that in awakening there's going to be zero desire, and we're just kind of going along with the flow without really wanting anything or desiring anything. Somehow the whole movement is away from desire. Desire becomes a sign of non-awakening.

Or we might have a view that desire is, well, it's okay. Everything's okay. Everything's all equal, it's all one—whatever it is, no problem. There can be that kind of view of desire.

Or there might be a more nuanced view that only some desires are okay. For the Buddha, the desire for jhāna was certainly okay. The desire to cultivate the brahmavihāras was certainly okay. The desire for awakening was certainly okay, the desire to live an ethical life, the desire to ordain into the monastic order. Some desires are acceptable depending on what they're for, where they're headed, while others are not.

Or we may have the view that desire is okay if it's only a momentary arising. In other words, you get a pop-up of something called desire or craving, and as long as the mind doesn't cling to it and attach to that desire, get caught by it and dragged along with it, even just in the mind, then it's okay—it's just a momentary arising.

That would be a fourth view. Or a fifth view: that desire is something divine. There's a treasure there, a divine treasure of great beauty.

I can't quite remember if I've shared this before on this retreat, or even on another retreat, so forgive me if it's a repeat, but our word "desire" in English comes from the Latin desiderare, which derives from de sidere, meaning "from the stars." In other words, from the heavenly realms, from the gods, as the stellar constellations were seen and regarded as gods, as divine. So right there in our English word "desire," it bears the etymological origin of a regard for it as divine.

So we could say there are five ways that desire may be viewed. But actually, maybe even more discernment is needed than that, more nuance to our views of desire.

If I haven't said it already—and I hope I have—the conception I have of desire and the evaluation of desire plays a role in what the desire does, or what happens to it, or what unfolds. It's not a neutral factor; it's part of the dependent arising of the desire itself. The same is true with anything, in fact. The conception and evaluation of desire plays a creative part, plays a role in fabrication.

And there's always some conception and view of desire. Sometimes it might be quite elaborate and involved, especially if you've had a lot of teaching and Dharma training, and desire is quite a loaded, central subject. But even if not, there's always some conception and view of desire.

There's also always—and I'm just reviewing a few things before moving on—an imagined or assumed relationship with getting the object that we desire. For example, here's this desire, and I anticipate getting what I want. Something simple like being thirsty, so I want some water, so I go to the tap. I anticipate getting it. I don't anticipate a drought, or certainly not in Devon anyway. I don't anticipate not being able to find clean water, because one of the good things about our society is it provides clean water.

But that's part of what comes into the whole relationship of desire. And this is often overlooked, because it's very different when I have a desire and I anticipate not getting it, not getting the thing I want. How does that color and shape the whole experience and the very desire itself?

Or then there's this other possibility—as we said—of realizing or sensing that on an imaginal level, there already is what I desire. What I desire is already here. And that means there's a relationship with eros there in the imaginal.

So there's a relationship with the anticipated getting, or not getting, or realizing it's already here on another level in the imaginal realm. We're talking about very different things then, and there's always going to be some view about or relative to this getting, or not getting, or however we relate to the object.

So that last one—the sense of it already being here—as I said, already involves the imaginal.

Again, just reviewing a little bit. Desire with the imaginal—desire that's become eros—opens up all kinds of possibilities. We explored several ways of looking, which are really practices for transforming desire into eros, allowing more equanimity and spaciousness while supporting soul-making and beauty.

Four approaches emerged from our exploration. The first involves seeing one's desire—perhaps a desire that feels problematic because fulfillment seems impossible—as having its origins in divine influx. When we recognize that the desire itself springs from this sacred source, what happens to our experience? What transforms in the desire itself, in our sense of the whole situation, in any dukkha that might be present?

The second approach, which we just touched upon, involves recognizing through imaginal sensibility that what we desire is already happening in what Henri Corbin called "hierophantic time." Through attunement to the imaginal realm, through opening that particular lens of perception, we discover that our longing is already being fulfilled on another plane of reality. Again, what does this recognition do to the dukkha, to the desire, to our entire perception of the situation?

A third possibility involves the practice of seeing—and this requires developing considerable facility and skill with imaginal perception, which can indeed be cultivated to extraordinary degrees—seeing the desire, the beloved other that one is yearning for, and the self as theophanies, as faces or aspects of the divine. This differs slightly from the first approach. Rather than the desire originating in the divine, here the desire itself is divine. The desire is divinity, is God, is the primordial Buddha or an aspect of the primordial Buddha.

The fourth possibility we explored was practicing a way of looking that sees the image of the other, the image of the desired object, the image of the self desiring, and the desire itself—all four elements—as the primordial Buddha making love to herself, or God making love to himself.

Now, for some of you hearing this for the first time, the question naturally arises: "How could I ever develop the capacity for such perception?" Actually, it's far from impossible and not as distant as it might initially sound, especially if you haven't yet engaged deeply with imaginal practice. We can learn to play with the views of desire, of self, and of the desired object or other, developing this as a genuine art.

These approaches differ fundamentally from seeing that desire is not-self, is anatta—they represent entirely different ways of looking. But we can indeed develop these skills, this art of perception, and discover the extraordinary diversity of beautiful possibilities awaiting us.

All of this emerges when we include the imaginal in our relationship with desire—when we allow the imaginal to enter that relationship and infuse it, amplify it, extend it, and beautifully complicate it.

We can also transform our relationship with desire by working with the energy of desire as it manifests in the body. This becomes particularly clear with sexual energy—sexual energy that feels problematic because it cannot be moved or released due to circumstances. Pressure can accumulate in areas of the body, often in the genitals, creating sensations that can be uncomfortable, even painful, and genuinely difficult to bear. This is, of course, a perfectly normal human experience.

One possibility we explored involves expanding awareness, ensuring it stretches to encompass the entire body, the entire energy body. Sometimes simply stretching awareness allows the energy to begin spreading naturally. What often happens in the uncomfortableness of stuck energy is that everything contracts—around the desired object, around the imagination of fulfillment—and the energy itself becomes contracted. This contraction creates pressure, for pressure and contraction are intimately related. When gas is compressed, it exists under higher pressure, and that pressure becomes uncomfortable.

Sometimes we don't even need to actively try moving the energy around, though that remains a valid approach. A more subtle and refined method involves simply spreading the awareness itself.

Because the awareness has more space, the energy will also spread to fill that space. And because it spreads, it's less contracted, there's less pressure. And sometimes what can also happen in that movement, in allowing the energy to move because it has more space, because the awareness is giving it more space, is that the pressured, uncomfortable sexual energy actually turns to bliss, to something like pīti or rapture.

There's a second possibility I'd like to offer as well. If there's a similar kind of situation where the uncomfortable pressure of sexual energy is gathered in one area of the body—say the genitals—try being aware at the same time of the heart center in the center of the chest. Be aware of both regions simultaneously: the heart center and the genitals where the pressure feels gathered uncomfortably. Just being aware of both will allow the energy—I don't have to move the energy or make it do anything or yank it around, all of which is fine too, but this is sometimes all you need to do—just be aware of the heart center as well. Not instead, not saying "go away from the genital area," but include both. It's almost as if there's a channel then made between the heart and the genitals, that area of pressure.

One's including both. And naturally, what will usually happen is the energy will begin moving up that channel and into the heart. So then it's spread between the heart and the genitals. What you then have is it stimulates the heart or re-invites the heart back into the energetic experience and the emotional experience. So it actually allows more love and warmth and connection with the other that one might be desiring. So you've got the heart as well as the genitals. And in that spreading and in that softening with the love and warmth, it doesn't take the sexual energy away or dampen it or get rid of it or anything like that, but it allows it to spread and include another dimension—in this case the heart dimension—so that it's less pressured and less uncomfortable.

So that's just a little suggestion, an offering, if that's sometimes the case, if that experience arises and it's difficult. But the main point right now is that, like anything else, like images, like actually any perception, any desire is dependent on how it is looked at. It's dependent on the way of looking, what we're calling the way of looking. And if you remember, the way of looking includes the way of conceiving and the way of relating to it.

So any desire is what it is, how it is, how it's felt, what happens to it. All that depends on how it is looked at—the way of looking, which includes the way of conceiving of it and evaluating it, and also the way of relating to it.

Whatever name we give to desire, we've chosen to use certain labels. But whatever name we give to it, it's not good or bad in itself, so to speak. Neither its nature nor its trustworthiness is determined by its obvious object. In other words, not "that's a sense desire, therefore it's a kilesa," or "that's a desire for awakening or compassion, therefore it's positive." It's not so much as we would usually tend to think with Dharma teaching—that this is a desire to trust, this is a desire not to trust, dependent on what it seems to be for. Because we've gone into this "what is the desire for" in a number of different ways, whether actually allowing the imaginal amplification and dimensionality to open up through the imaginal of this obvious object, or through asking the deeper question of what is being desired.

Sometimes we think about this desire or that desire and imagine that it's a thing in itself, but we get confused because we're kind of implicitly including the idea of acting on it or following through on the desire physically or practically in the world.

So when we go into all this, or just this question of even the impulse to inquire into desire, we start to realize—in addition to all that I've just said in this talk, much of which is just reviewing what we've already been through—we start to see we need to consider and differentiate in our inquiry. If we're going to inquire into something called desire, then there are differentiations to be made between:

Desire acted on, or desire repressed, or desire "let go of," or desire not noticed. Or desire whose energy is open to, but in relation to a deeper object, if you like, as we did in the opening to the deeper current of desire practice. We need to differentiate desire from the movement of what we were calling pathos and that kind of infinite longing as something spiritual or soul-making. The kind of desire when we realize, in relation to what we said a few minutes ago, desire when it's realized to be already consummated in hierophanic time in the imaginal realm. Desire seen as empty.

All these differentiations: desire seen as divine influx as we talked about; desire regarded as defilement or problem or sin in other language; desire regarded as or assumed to be originating in lack, whether that's an emotional lack or an intuition of the existential lack of a solid self. Some people explain the Dharma that way—that actually we have a suspicion or intuition or occasional glimpses that we lack a solid self, and based on that we try and solidify a sense of self, as if getting things and getting involved with desire will somehow shore that up. It's based on this intuited sense of existential lack, lacking a solid self. Or desire assumed to be originating in the existential intuition of impermanence of all things. The sense of impermanence of all things—that's why there's a kind of hunger there. Or desire regarded as an avoidance strategy, avoiding grief feelings or these feelings of lack. Can't handle the impermanence. Can't handle the lack of a solid self or whatever.

So it's interesting. We, as usual, assume something to be findable as that thing. There are things and they're findable. They're obvious what they are. So we assume desire is findable as something—a mental event, if you like, a momentarily arising quality, an inclination, a factor in the process of the citta, whatever language you want to use. There is a thing called desire. There it was, right there in that micro-moment in the process of the citta.

But actually, desire is inseparable from all kinds of other factors.

It's actually inseparable. I cannot find this thing called desire in itself—not just inseparable from the thoughts and actions that follow from it or are imagined in pursuit of the desired, but also at a much more subtle level, from the very conceivings of object and desired, of objects in general. Inseparable from that, inseparable from time view, time sense, self view, world view, philosophical system—even unconscious philosophical systems, which actually most philosophical views and systems are. They're just kind of habitual views about what's real and what the world involves.

In a person's life, in any instance or any moment, the relationship with desire and the conception or view of it—conscious or unconscious—the relationship with it and the conceptual view of it, view of desire, conscious or unconscious, whether we're conscious or unconscious of the conceptual view—these are woven into a whole view and sense of existence and cosmology. You understand? It's wrapped up in the whole thing. It's implicit in what we've been saying all through the retreat.

The relationship with desire and the whole view of desire are woven into a whole view and sense of existence and cosmology. If it's a flat world, this is it. If there's an assumption there's no real meaning or purpose to existence, then let's just maximize the pleasure. The view of heaven and hell, reward, punishment, sin. Or the view that we need to transcend this world, as the Pali Canon suggests, with its transcendental thrust to achieve an ending of rebirth. All these, and much more subtle ones, are woven into our relationship with desire.

This is woven in and informs our relationship with desire. All these assumptions about objects, things, time, self-view, world-view, philosophical systems—this informs and shapes the relationship with desire. And similarly, the relationship with desire and the conceiving of desire, any desire, or desire in general—both will make a big difference. Again, the causality is both ways. The very ways we conceive of desire will make a big difference, not just to the unfolding of that desire and the actions involved that it impels or doesn't impel in the world, but also to the view and the sense of self, other, cosmos and desire too. How I conceive of desire makes a big difference to all of that—the very view and sense of self, other, world, cosmos and desire.

I'm just drawing out what we've perhaps only alluded to here over the days. We asked, what is desire? Well, on one level we can define it. Of course, on another level it's an unfindable element. I can't find it. I can't find it separate from all this other stuff. It's inextricably interwoven and linked with all that. It's unfindable.

And yet, amazingly, we can still inquire into unfindable things, and we can still talk of the alchemy of this unfindable element, the alchemy of elements. The alchemists used to talk about different elements—mercury and this and that. Unlike the alchemists who used to work purifying this or that element, it's not possible to have pure desire, just desire in itself as some kind of isolated thing. We can't reduce this complex, interwoven mass of existence, can't really reduce it down to its basic elements and separate them. But still we can talk about the alchemy of those elements and the alchemy of desire.

I can't remember if I've already said this, but it's hopefully obvious by now if I haven't—that phrase, "the alchemy of desire," we were using with a double meaning. We're talking about the transformation of desire, greed and craving, what we were calling greed and craving into Eros, and into the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic being liberated—into the liberation of the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic soul-making movement. The transformation of greed and craving into Eros and the Eros-Psyche-Logos movement. In other words, the transformation of a desire that's neither freeing nor soul-making into a kind of desire called eros that is more freeing and more soul-making. So that's the first meaning of alchemy of desire.

And the second meaning, which it means at the same time, is that the possibility that desire, when it manifests as eros, and that eros is allowed to stimulate and galvanize the eros-psyche-logos dynamic—when neither eros nor psyche nor logos are blocked or cramped in some way or another—then that kind of desire, that kind of eros and the eros-psyche-logos dynamic will lead to a transubstantiation, a sense, a perception of the transubstantiation of other, self, world, and eros itself. There is an alchemy, if you like, of everything—of existence, of the whole cosmos. Transubstantiation of how? Given these imaginal dimensions and depths and divinity and sacredness and beauty and all of that.

So on one level we can't find it. On one level we can delineate it and make these delineations. On another level we can't find it, desire. And yet we can still talk about and practice this alchemy of desire and all the beauty and the soul-making that comes out of that. As we said before, knowing the emptiness...

CHAPTER 86

From Mindfulness to Divinity: Towards the Tracing of a Phenomenology of Soul (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h51

In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea examines how honest, open mindfulness naturally reveals the play of eros, fantasy, and soul-making in our lives. Rather than dismissing these as distractions, he demonstrates how acknowledging their inevitability and necessity opens profound dimensions of practice. Drawing on both classical Buddhist texts and contemporary understanding, Burbea explores how our phenomenological approach—investigating ways of looking and their effects on fabrication—can lead to experiences of both transcendent and immanent divinity. He addresses the complex relationship between soul-making and the reduction of dukkha, questioning simple assumptions about Buddhist goals. The talk examines how experiences of the divine involve relational qualities, infinite echoing, and dimensions of timelessness, while critiquing reductive approaches that separate 'real' from 'imaginary.' Burbea argues for starting with phenomena rather than metaphysical postulates, showing how careful investigation of experience can reveal the sacred dimensions often missing from contemporary Buddhist psychology.

If we pay attention well, if our mindfulness is not too blinkered or too narrow, if we honestly and carefully observe our experience and our life—especially the play of meaningfulness, senses of meaningfulness in our lives, and the play of any sense of devotion (I don't just mean religious devotion, but anything we are devoted to, when we feel or want to devote ourselves to something)—if we honestly and carefully observe our life and those aspects of our life, then we will come to recognize and inevitably acknowledge the play of something that we are calling eros, and the play of what we are calling fantasy, and something we are calling soul-making.

Just through careful, honest, open observation of our experience, of our life, especially in certain aspects of our lives but actually in general, these things will be recognized and acknowledged. These delineations that we have made and explored will be recognized and acknowledged, as well as the inevitability and the necessity of eros, of fantasy, of soul-making in our lives. This whole complex—eros, fantasy, soul-making—is an inevitability that arises in different ways at different times as threads running through our life: threads of meaningfulness, threads of fire, threads of all that. And they are necessary. They are inevitable and necessary to us as human beings.

When we recognize and acknowledge that, then we can begin to actually allow more this soul-making movement, the eros that's involved in it in different ways, the fantasies, the images. We can allow and explore that whole complex movement and process and dynamic of soul-making involving eros, involving fantasy, implying the imaginal and the attention to what we're calling image.

Allowing and exploring all that, a lot will be opened to us, for us. A lot will open in our experience, in our sensibility, in our feeling, in our emotion, in our conception. Much will be opened, much will unfold from that allowing and that acknowledgement, that recognition, that allowing and that exploration. Much will open, much will unfold, much will be discovered and much will be created. Much will be discovered/created.

Let me recapitulate some of what we've drawn attention to—some of what will be opened, unfolded. We will notice (and it's sometimes quite subtle, sometimes what we don't actually notice at first when we begin to start exploring these territories) that implicit aspects of the image, or of what we're calling the imaginal, what we're calling image, will start to reveal different aspects.

For example, the resonances. What is imaginal for us, what is image for us, involves and creates whole sets and ranges of resonances in the being that we can notice. Part of the resonances are resonances of meaningfulness. This is an implicit aspect of what we're calling image or imaginal.

It also has this sense of theatre to it—this kind of middle way, if you like, between real and not real. Powerful, potent, moving, captivating in a way, but not really real. Theatre at its best, if you like.

There's the aspect that we notice of timelessness, what we're calling the iconic nature of image. There's a timelessness, there's the eternal that's palpable as a dimension of the image, of the imaginal.

There's the unfathomability that we sense there of an image, the inexhaustibility and thus, in a way, the mystery, because it always involves something beyond in that unfathomability.

Often there's the aspect of duty involved somehow, somehow to be discovered, created, found out in relation to the image: duty, how does it interface, how does it stream into my life, the physical reality that I move in.

There's the aspect of love in the image—love in the image, from the image to me, from myself to the image. Love. This is plural. There's an implicit aspect that we notice. All this is maybe not so obvious at first. It's like our eyes, so to speak, become accustomed to the light in the imaginal realm if we use certain language in relation to images, and we start to notice these things. Sometimes they're really obvious at first, sometimes less.

The eros there, what we're calling eros, begins to be more obvious to us. The effects on the body and the sense of the energy body. This sense of the dimensionality or the dimensions, the opening of dimensions in the erotic imaginal, in the erotically beloved other, in the image.

There's the whole complex movement and dynamic of eros-psyche-logos in that mutual insemination, fertilization, expansion, enrichment, widening, deepening that we've talked about. However we use words or however exactly we slice up the delineations and definitions, something of that will be discovered as an aspect implicit in the imaginal, in image for us.

There's the cosmopoiesis, the spreading into the world, but also, as we've said, into the self. The image gets involved not just in the other—self, other, world, and eros itself become imaginatively infused, become alive as images for us. And with that cosmopoiesis, actually implicit in the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, in the dimensionality that comes to be perceived and sensed that way in self, other, world, and eros, different kinds of senses of sacredness—of, let's say, the divine—different senses, various diverse senses of the divine, start to become more and more palpable, more and more obvious, more and more evident and experienceable in the imaginal constellation.

Then, for example, as we said, that unfolds more and more, the dimensions of divinity into divinity, if you like, so that it becomes both a perception and a concept that my eros, this eros that I am feeling, is divine, or is the divine. It belongs, it comes from, it originates, it has roots in the divine. That's all kind of an implicit evolution, if you like, or already present in the image. Or, as we said, that my eros participates in the divine eros.

So all this is kind of implicit, waiting to be discovered, revealed, if you like, once we acknowledge and then allow ourselves to explore eros, fantasy, image—the whole constellation, the whole movement of soul-making.

It's these aspects of divinity that I actually want to dwell on and say something about in this talk and the next talk. So we'll return to that, but it's worth running through a little bit and drawing out again, going over again, things that we've already mentioned that are implicitly involved or implied by this movement and opening to explore soul-making and the erotic imaginal.

So one of those aspects involves an implicit movement toward making less discrimination and harboring less of a conception of difference between something called "life" and something called "fantasy." That whole division—so imposed on us by the dominant philosophy of modernist Western culture—tends to become attenuated. We become more and more aware that there is nothing called "life" separate from fantasy. Life and fantasy blend into each other. Our lives are full of fantasies. We need to learn to notice this, to attend, to become sensitive to that reality. This is really, really important in terms of a direction that's implicit for me in this exploration of soul-making, of Eros and the erotic imaginal.

So often, images of self or images of other or images of the world move toward—there's a gradual evolution, and sometimes right from the beginning or even now—they are operating as images of self, of other, of world. They look, for instance... an image of self appears just like it's simply me. So at first blush, at first sight: Who are you in this image? "Oh, it's just me," someone might say.

Or it's that depression, which can feel like other—something visiting me, this darkness descending and wrapping around me. Or this anger that wells up, this fire of anger. Or the world—it looks like it's just this depression, it's just that anger, it's just the world as it usually is.

So the image of self, for example, can be something where I'm involved in this image and the image of self is something very odd. Suddenly I'm some kind of creature or something. I'm a bull with horns, bellowing fire or something like that. So clearly there's an image of self that I'm identifying with.

But this is not necessarily the case. We've been through all this on the other retreats. Again, I'm recapitulating, but there are certain things that are important to draw out. This is one of them: that the image of self or other or world doesn't necessarily need to be very odd or different from the normal sort of appearance, or obviously different from that. And there may be a gradual evolution, a process, an opening to include the more subtle images, if you like, that bear more resemblance—at first sight—to just, "Oh, it's just me, it's just this thing," or whatever.

Now, it is the case sometimes that we have no fantasy, no image operating in relation to something—no image or fantasy in relation to myself with this aspect of the path, or myself... whatever it is. There is either a kind of realism—so actually there is a kind of fantasy there, but in the poor sense, and we're taking it as real: "I'm a failure. I'm a loser because I keep experiencing this," or whatever it is. It's not a fantasy in our pregnant, dimensional, theatrical sense. It's a realism.

So sometimes that's the case for us. Sometimes there's a flat kind of absence of the imaginal, where in flatland we're perceiving the self, others, and the world flatly, or some aspect of self, other, world, and eros flatly—the absence of the imaginal.

But sometimes fantasy, for example of self, is there, but it's subtle, as I said. And this needs us to, if you like, expand the range of subtlety of our attention, allow our attention and our sensibility to become more subtle, to enable us to notice the subtle fantasy that's operating and to attune to it.

So these kinds of subtle fantasies, subtle images, are often present in our life, but we just don't recognize them. And we come into wrong relationship with them.

There's something related here as well that we should note: that often we are given images. We are given fantasies, if you like. We are called to them. We notice or discover images. So we have to, as I said, develop the sensibility, the sensitivity to discern them, to sniff them out, as it were.

It's not the case that it's always either possible or advisable just to move into a kind of active manipulation mode of practice where you just decide to see the self or life or this situation or this other or whatever it is—see it some way or other that's prescribed from the outside—as an image, as a fantasy, and that's supposedly helpful. Sure, there's a place for that, there's a time for that. But there's also a dimension of soul that we are given. As I said, we discover, we notice, we're called to, rather than just taking it out of a textbook and deciding to see it this way.

So both of these are helpful, but for me, for the fullness of soul-making and the depth, we also really need to be open to what's—if you like—what am I called to here, now? What image, what fantasy, what eros am I called to? Can I notice that?

But the main point right now is that sure, there's a place in our practice, in our lives, for images that are obvious. I had a dream last night and it's clearly an image visiting me in the dream. It may not seem to bear any relation to my life immediately, obviously. So I take that image from the dream and I can work with it. Or I'm sitting in meditation and doing some samatha or doing some emptiness, and the loosening that happens gives birth to an image. Or I'm tracking my emotions, I'm opening to my emotions in the energy body, and that gives rise to an image of this or that in meditation, and it's clearly an image.

But to me, the whole movement starts to include more and more.

The increasing subtlety of what image means to us, what fantasies we are in touch with and alive to in our lives—this is the movement. Eventually, we sense life as image, as soul. We sense life as image and as soul.

Imaginal meditation practice should gradually increase and develop our sensibility, our ability to sense life. What is life? Life is experience. Life is experience and appearance of self, concept of self, other, world. That's life. So imaginal meditation practice should develop and increase and open and deepen our sensibility and capacity to sense life as image, as soul.

Implicit in this is that there is less and less separation between something called meditation and something called life or relationship or work or whatever it is. But our culture—the dominant culture in the West and sometimes the dominant meditation cultures—do not support this.

That kind of bleeding into each other, overlap, interpenetration, recognition of the saturation of image and fantasy in our life, the necessity and inevitability of that recognition and the permission to enter into it and explore it and even expand it and use it artfully—the culture and the dominant teachings that we get through the larger culture of Western modernism at present does not support this. It supports rather the division into a simple real and a simple unreal. It's either real or it's imaginary. Or what is image gets reduced to some kind of psychological explanation.

Another thing that becomes evident as we recognize and acknowledge the centrality, necessity and inevitability of eros, psyche, fantasy, and image, and soul-making in our lives, and we begin to allow and explore all that, is that we start to realize that what we are calling soul is actually a missing element, an absent element in many psychologies at present. Certainly not all. And there are some psychologists who might use that word soul, but actually mean something either much smaller than what we're talking about, or in fact quite different. And certainly many philosophies in the past have used that word soul to mean something different.

We start to see—because we can't help but look around and feel the difference—that it's a missing element in many psychologies, this idea and experience of soul that we've been unfolding and exploring. Certainly many psychologies include heart and heartfulness, and certainly thought and awareness of thought and analysis of thought and belief, and maybe even the concept of modes of mind to a certain limited extent. But much less so elements of what we would call soul-making, soul and eros and the imaginal as we are presenting it.

Again, many psychologists might use the imagination, and some might really shun that and be fearful of the imagination, any use of the imagination, fearing one will lose touch with reality. But generally speaking, the element of soul and soul-making and eros, as we are talking about them, is often absent—it's a missing element.

Even in classical standard Theravādan Buddhist psychology, which is handed down to us in the Abhidhamma—the so-called higher teachings—you see this kind of minute attempt at classification, categorization, analysis, an almost bureaucratic movement of the mind in categorizing, for example, emotions and mind states. So you get a list of sad, happy, excited, peaceful, aversive, desiring, bored, and so on.

But one quickly gets the sense that it's either what we would now call a psychology without soul, or a psychology that does not serve and support and nourish soul-making. We get that sense, or that there actually is a fantasy operating there, but it's a fantasy of order, usually of one-dimensionality, of reductionism, and of clarity—a fantasy of clarity, that in dividing things up this way into some kind of neat categorical system, there is clarity.

But the question is: in that fantasy, that kind of limited, oftentimes one-dimensional fantasy, what comes from that? What is allowed from that? Where does it tend to go? What does it tend to open up for us in the experience of life? Where does it lead? What does it support? What does it not support? What does it not allow? What does it nourish? What does it not nourish?

We will also notice, again, if we recognize and acknowledge these aspects and dimensions of our existence that we're calling eros, fantasy, soul-making, image—the inevitability and necessity of that—we will also notice that there is fantasy operating in our relationship with the path: a fantasy of the path, a fantasy of awakening, a fantasy of the tradition, a fantasy of the self in relationship to that tradition on the path towards awakening.

And with all that, there's a fantasy or fantasies of the Buddha, if you're a Buddhist, or whatever teachers are important to you, have come alive to you through the aliveness that soul-making in relation to them must be there if there's devotion. The fire of that must be there. Whatever teachers have become alive to you and important, there will be fantasy of that. So it's fantasy of Buddha if you're a Buddhist.

And it's not that in realizing there's a fantasy of path and awakening and Buddha that we then say, "Oh, this is rubbish, throw it all out." There's a much more sophisticated understanding here, a much more sophisticated psychology here. Actually recognizing the fact that we have fantasies of the path, fantasies of the Buddha—the Buddha for us is fantasy. It doesn't mean it's completely made up. Fantasy is in dialogue with what's there on the page in the suttas and what we've heard from other teachers and everything. But there's a fantasy that imbues that dialogue. I cannot separate it. And in the more sophisticated psychology, we understand we don't want to separate it. It would be a silly move.

There's a liberation of that capacity for fantasy to a certain extent. We feel liberated in relationship to the fantasies of Buddha, path, awakening, tradition, self on the path, and so forth. And there's soul-making allowed there.

I hope that you will dare to explore this in your relationship with practice in your life. So a person might say, if they hear from such and such a teacher, or read from such and such a teacher, or someone or other—some scholar or supposed scholar—"The Buddha taught basically something very simple. Try to be kind. Everything is impermanent. Everything is a process or a flow. So let go and experience ease. This is the goal. That's what the Buddha taught."

And the person might hear that or read that, or someone's trying to convince them of that. But recognizing this aspect of fantasy, they might actually say, "Is this such a Buddha who just taught that? Are they even that interesting as a Buddha? Is the fantasy there that I can kind of build on that or around that? If that's my fantasy of the Buddha, is it a fantasy commensurate with my soul and the needs for soul-making? Would such a Buddha as that be worthy of study and of the injection of eros and devotion in all the ways that devotion can come in—all the dimensions, if you like, or manifestations of devotion that can come into a path? Would such a Buddha as that be actually worthy of that much study, or the infusion of the erotic imaginal?"

And again, if one is subject to that kind of insistence from a writer or a teacher or whatever it is, who claims the Buddha did not teach any transcendent, unfabricated knowledge—as might be one interpretation of the Theravāda, that its central thrust is to a transcendent, unfabricated—and so and so might be saying, "The Buddha did not teach transcendent, unfabricated. He did not teach what we might call in our language the deep emptiness of all things," which perhaps was one of the two central thrusts of the Mahāyāna, of the development of the Mahāyāna. "And the Buddha did not teach how that understanding of the deep emptiness of all things begins to reveal more and more the divinity, if you like, or the sacredness of all things," which again you might see as one of the central thrusts of the Vajrayāna. "And presently the Buddha taught none of that." The person is insisting or claiming and trying to create a scholarship which sort of claims that.

Then one response would be: can I discover then, if you're saying that, can I discover or create and discover, create a Buddha that did or that will? I'm aware already that I discover slash create the Buddha anyway. I create and discover, you create and discover the Buddha anyway. And you might want a Buddha that taught deep things, wonderful things, much more for you to move into, to learn, to discover—a Buddha that taught the unfabricated, the transcendent unfabricated, that taught the deep emptiness of all things, that taught the opening into the perception, the cultivation of the perception of the divinity of all things, as they say in the Vajrayāna, to see all appearances as divine, the sacredness of all things.

Recognize that we create, discover the Buddha anyway. Aware of that, can I discover, create a Buddha that did teach all that, that will teach all that?

We talked also about this strange religious fantasy that puts the authority in the past, and if the historical Buddha didn't teach all that, why can we not regard it as an evolution of those who came later in his wake, in his stream, drawing on his platform, his teachings and giving another dimension, another level to the teachings as an evolution, as an improvement?

But there's something here about actually taking away a realist basis for the path in different ways through the emptiness and through the understanding and the imagination, taking away realist basis and recognizing the primacy of image, the inevitability of image and fantasy, the necessity of it, as we said. So the whole path, it's like taking away a tablecloth, you know, when you've got all the plates and cups on, whisking it away—and it comes to rest on the solid ground of what? Emptiness and image and fantasy.

So we have our solidities reversed, usually. We think the tablecloth is the most substantial thing that's keeping everything up, its insistence on reality and historical fact and whatever it is. Actually, as we've said, it's usually just me importing whatever my metaphysical beliefs are into my interpretation, my scholarly interpretation. Scholars do that. And actually taking away that insistence or desperate attempt at a kind of realism and actually recognizing that all this rests on the ground of the groundlessness of emptiness and of the imaginal. A whole different basis for what we're doing. A whole different basis. And the possibilities that opens up for us—experience and perception and conception and soul-making.

So there's all that. And again, one last piece about what we recognize, what we come to when we recognize and acknowledge this movement of eros in our lives and fantasy and soul-making. And we allow ourselves to explore. We recognize, implicit even in that statement, is that we recognize that we care about soul-making. We care about soul-making. And more than that, we see that sometimes soul-making is not the same as reducing or ending suffering.

When we recognize this movement of Eros in our lives—in fantasy and soul-making—and allow ourselves to explore, we encounter a fundamental recognition: we care about soul-making. More than that, we see that sometimes soul-making is not the same as reducing or ending suffering. This presents us with a profound dilemma.

In what we're calling our phenomenological approach, we begin to recognize fabrication—of self, of perception, of world, of dukkha. We begin to understand dependent origination through playing with ways of looking. This gradually reveals the emptiness of all things, and eventually even reveals the emptiness of the whole notion of fabrication itself. It's a radical, radical emptiness of all things.

In the end, what we're left with is the recognition that all we have are ways of looking. There are just ways of looking, and those ways of looking are empty too. But that's all we have. There's something akin to a very radical version of postmodernist understanding here—all we have are ways of looking and the range of ways of looking that we have developed and can play with.

This raises a crucial question: how does one choose? On what basis does one choose between these different ways of looking—all the diverse ways we may have cultivated in practice?

The standard Buddhist answer would be that you choose according to the Four Noble Truths. In shorthand: I choose a way of looking that brings less suffering, either now or in the future. Whether that's metta, compassion, exchanging self and other, seeing whatever difficulty as anatta, contemplating impermanence—there are many possibilities. The standard answer from Buddha Dharma would be to choose the way of looking that most diminishes suffering.

But we might also choose a way of looking by asking: what brings soul-making? What is the way of looking, the way of relating to this experience—this constellation of self, other, world—right now that brings soul-making?

If we recognize in our lives Eros and image, fantasy and soul-making, and acknowledge their inevitability and necessity, then often we'll have two options. We can ask which of our available ways of looking decreases suffering, drains it out of the situation, or leads to less suffering. Or we can ask what supports, nourishes, opens, ignites soul-making.

Sometimes these two roads—toward less suffering and toward soul-making—are the same. Quite often they overlap significantly. But sometimes there are areas where they diverge.

The relationship between soul-making and the reduction of suffering is actually quite complex. If we're honest and careful in our observation, we cannot avoid this complexity. We will encounter these questions about the relationship between soul-making and suffering.

We've said that Eros and soul-making bring a decrease in dukkha and contraction—unlike craving and papañca, they actually bring less dukkha and ease contraction in various ways. But simultaneously, Eros always involves a certain amount of erotic tension, because it maintains the polarity and the pull toward more. The erotic relationship, because of imagination, often involves some sense of duty—to be deciphered, discovered, created. And if there's duty, then in relation to that duty, there is not complete freedom.

So we have freedom and the end of suffering on one side, and duty and erotic tension on the other—all involved in Eros. The relationship of Eros and soul-making to suffering is not straightforward.

Additionally, with the firing up and expansion of the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic, as the fire catches and spreads deeper and wider, sometimes in the breaking of the vessels, this expansion causes walls to shatter—walls of concept, vision, sensibility, awareness, relationship, structure. This expansion, particularly when sudden or abrupt, is not always peaceful. Sometimes it's even disturbing and disorienting.

Is that a reduction in suffering when soul-making happens that way? Sometimes it's delightful and beautiful, and sometimes it's not. The relationship remains complex and worthy of our deepest consideration.

And yet again, with all that, we could say, well, there's a kind of freedom of sorts right there. Freedom of what? Well, these walls—the walls of concept, the walls of vision, the walls of perception that I was enclosed in—have now just crashed open, and a certain freedom of thinking, of seeing, of sensing has emerged. So there is a kind of freedom there, but it's not always peaceful. And sometimes it's disturbing, complex.

James Hillman, in his presentation of the way he thinks about the imaginal and all that, insists that what he calls pathologizing is part of what the soul does. The soul is always involved in creating dukkha through the imaginal, and he devotes quite a lot of time to that and insisting on it. I would actually not agree with him that it's always the case. In a way, maybe he was, as always, teaching contextually, and he was perhaps reacting to certain currents that were very dominant around him at that time in the 60s and 70s when he was first developing his ideas.

But I think for myself, I don't always agree with him about that at all. Or rather, I don't agree that that is always the case. Sometimes I think we need to recognize what he calls the pathology in a certain image opening up, the pathos in it, the kind of suffering that is endemic, intrinsic to a certain image, so that certain images do open up freedom in one way and a certain kind of pathos or suffering in another way.

So, for example, in the past I used to share about certain images that I would get recurrently, different variations of the kind of solitary wanderer. Beautiful, beautiful images and the divinity in them and the kind of archetypal nature of them and the beauty and the meaningfulness and depth of resonance there. I wouldn't want to trade that in for something that was more bland and avoided the soul-making that was implicit and involved in them. But there was a kind of loneliness in those solitary wanderer images, beautiful and moving and touching and opening and deepening as they were.

So I wouldn't agree with James Hillman in saying it's always like that, that soul-making always involves pathologizing. But I think we really need to keep the door open and be sensitive and discerning when that pathologizing—when the suffering—is actually part of the image, but it has this beauty and this meaningfulness-making and this opening quality to it in the theatre of it, and in the beauty of it. So it's almost like, don't shut the door on that. Recognize that it's necessary to some images at some points, and some movements of soul-making. And can we discern, can we listen, can we recognize?

Fourthly, in the Dharma, there's the teaching of—to quote Ajahn Chah—the suffering that leads to the end of suffering. He used to ask people, is this just suffering, or is it the suffering that's leading to end of suffering that you're going through right now? What kind of suffering are you going through right now if you're feeling suffering, if you're miserable, if you're distraught? Is it the suffering that leads to the end of suffering?

So there's this idea of the suffering that leads to the end of suffering. I was telling you about the Sayadaw U Pandita retreats in the 80s and how much suffering people used to experience—they called them the Dukkha retreats. It involves suffering, but it was thought to be the suffering that leads to the end of suffering. Or even just in people so often, as I think I mentioned as well, trying to develop their samādhi, their samatha, and hearing about the jhānas and wanting to go for that, and getting so tight around that movement and that directionality and that goal orientation, and then just dropping the whole thing because it's like, "I'll just be with what is" or whatever.

How do we determine if it's actually the case that this suffering that I'm experiencing is a suffering that leads to the end of suffering? It's not actually that obvious.

Furthermore, we recognize that soul-making is involved in a fantasy that's involved in the practice, about the practice, about the path, and about the suffering that the path involves—the difficulty, the hardship, the stretching of oneself. So, for example, on a Sayadaw U Pandita retreat, plenty of fantasy around the retreat, the retreat form, the experiences, the teacher, where it's going. And even the suffering on the retreat becomes embroidered into that fantasy. It's part of the fantasy, the suffering itself, the hardship, the dukkha.

Or on other retreats, in Goenka style, for instance, the suffering is conceived of as a purification. But certainly that kind of suffering becomes part of the fantasy. It's wrapped up with the sense of meaningfulness, the fantasy of the self, of the tradition, all of that.

It's not simple, this relationship of soul-making and the supposed lessening of suffering. And implicit in all these four ways that it's not simple that I've just gone through is what I've also mentioned before at different times—that the meaning of dukkha, often translated as suffering, the meaning of that word as the first noble truth, and the meaning of ending dukkha, ending suffering, or even reducing suffering, is now completely open to interpretation. Completely open.

Now where a lot of people, perhaps most, don't really subscribe to a belief in rebirth and that the end of dukkha is the end of rebirth and all that—what does it mean, dukkha, suffering? Some people say it just means this constriction and sort of pain at the existential situation, it's just that one is not adding to that with a kind of neurosis. But basically, in all these different interpretations, all these different explanations of the path and Buddhism, the meaning of the two central terms—dukkha and the end of dukkha—has become open to interpretation. So that also adds to the complexity, the openness of that question of what is the relationship between soul-making and the end of suffering.

Even more, and I'm not going to dwell on this, we can easily assume, if one is a Buddhist practitioner or certainly a Buddhist teacher, that one's engaged in something that just brings less suffering in the world. And it's very clear we're part of the movement towards less suffering in the world.

And so this question warrants much more investigation than might initially appear possible. Even when a person expresses deep gratitude—"You're so helpful, your teaching means so much"—I don't find myself completely drawn into the assumption that I am simply serving the end of suffering in the world. Even when hundreds of people offer such appreciation, it still warrants deeper investigation.

I've spoken about this before, though I won't dwell on it here: sometimes certain streams of Buddhism, particularly the insight meditation tradition I'm most involved with, tend to demonstrate a relative lack of engagement or modeling of political and environmental activism by us teachers. All of this leads me to question whether we can truly examine these fundamental assumptions—even the seemingly obvious one that we're contributing to a movement toward less suffering.

It appears so self-evident: of course we are, because we teach about love, letting go, kindness, and release. How could we not be reducing suffering? But I'm not prescribing how people should or shouldn't be, or what they should do instead. I'm not claiming definitively that we are or aren't creating less suffering. Rather, I want to open and insist upon questioning what we actually mean when we speak of ending or reducing suffering—dukkha and the cessation of dukkha. Can we perceive everything involved in these concepts, all the assumptions, the diversity of views and interpretations, the contradictions in our very language?

This questioning invites and necessitates an awareness of soul-making and fantasy in all of this. So again, the question of choosing ways of looking, of navigating our paths and lives—how do we choose? Is it simply those approaches that reduce suffering? What about soul-making ways of looking, relating, and conceiving that generate more dimensionality for the soul?

The relationship between these two premises or criteria for choosing and navigating is profoundly complex. If it doesn't seem complex, I believe it's only a matter of time before it will. As we delve deeper into both sides—the meaning of suffering and the recognition and exploration of soul-making—we discover a beautifully intricate relationship. We needn't be daunted or discouraged by complexity; it invites further exploration and questioning.

This lengthy introduction serves to recap what unfolds when we recognize and acknowledge eros, fantasy, and soul-making—when we accept their inevitability and necessity, allow them, and explore what opens from that recognition.

What I want to focus on now, and perhaps in the next talk as well, is how through this phenomenological approach, we begin to experience what we might call the opening of senses of divinity, along with the development of concepts of divinity. In both experience and ideation, divinity begins revealing itself through our phenomenological exploration.

I want to first acknowledge that different people have varying responses to certain words and language. Some, particularly some Buddhists, react strongly or uncomfortably to words like "God" or "divinity." Others experience quite the opposite—these theistic terms open something that Buddhist language doesn't reach or illuminate as fully.

Someone recently shared—a person with Catholic upbringing, though this doesn't necessarily depend on cultural conditioning—that hearing the word "God" opens far more within them than hearing "Buddha nature." Another expressed that their sense of the sacred heart of Jesus holds much more dimensionality, beauty, attraction, meaningfulness, and resonance than simply the word "compassion" or "karuṇā," or the cultivation of other beautiful qualities.

People differ in their responses, and I find myself somewhat torn about what to suggest. I could advise simply being comfortable—if I or others use words like "divinity" and you're uncomfortable or unmoved, substitute words that resonate for you. Choose your own language, be at ease.

On the other hand, I might suggest using words that stretch you, that you're unfamiliar with, that leave space for something new to open within you. Words you haven't already categorized with "I know what that means" or "It refers to this experience I have."

Perhaps it would be interesting to experiment with both approaches—the comfortable and familiar, and the stretching and unfamiliar.

Words like "divine," and I would include "Buddha nature," imply something—perhaps not even a thing—that cannot be fully captured, something infinite.

When I use terms like Buddha nature and divinity, I mean something not capturable, something infinite. Something not containable or graspable or fully definable—and this is often recognized in relation to divinity itself. So having said that, there is considerable folly in then going ahead and starting to talk about this. But still, I think turning away from the whole thing is also not the answer—just not speaking at all or not exploring delineations, definitions, the magic of words. All this can be soul-making. All this can fertilize our perception, our sensibility, our conceptions.

So we could draw attention to some aspects of the divine, if you like, or what we might call the divine or Buddha nature. I'm actually going to use those words interchangeably—or God or whatever—and I realize, of course, that's very contentious for some people. But we can draw attention to the fact that both experiences and concepts of divinity or the divine have in those experiences and concepts some sense of something that is more than the experience or more than the concept, something that's beyond.

In the very experience and concept is wrapped up, I think, a recognition, a feeling that the concept or the experience can never fully capture what divinity is. However, I would insist that concepts can still be helpful. It's like a jewel with infinite facets. This concept illuminates or reveals for our encounter, for our contemplation, for our experience and exploration—it reveals one facet, and a different concept reveals another facet. But the jewel itself could be said to have infinite facets. Therefore, it's still helpful to explore concepts. Just know that you're never going to get a concept that completely circumscribes the whole thing.

And the same with experiences of the divine. In the experience itself, there's this feeling—generally speaking I would say—as if there's more. Something that, this experience is just one face, let's put it that way. The experience is just one face of the divine. With experience, that's not always obvious at first. And of course, we can come into wrong relationship with concepts and believe that we have captured something like that fully, the divine fully. But with concepts and experience, I'll say it's the same.

There's such a diversity of experiences of the divine, such variety. And again, I would say infinite—the senses of sacredness that we can have, the senses of divinity we can have are infinite, partly to do with the eros-psyche-logos dynamic and the way that moves, as we've been discussing.

Implicit in what I want to say also is that our experiences of the divine over time evolve. We get to have more depth, more diversity, more range in our experiences of divinity. So we're talking about something that, in both the experience and concepts, hopefully—certainly potentially—evolves. Experience and concepts of divine evolve. Partly, as I said, because of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, and partly just through deepening insight into less fabrication. But there's always this sense of more or beyond or an infinity in some way that can't quite get around.

Concept means to, in a way, to take. So there's a taking, a kind of grasping at—the word concept actually implies a holding of something, taking hold of. There's something in the sense and the concepts of divinity that I would say sooner or later, and usually soon, recognizes that can't be completely grasped that way, either through the experience or through the concept.

But I want to point out something about experiences of the divine that maybe isn't obvious, partly because it's so hard to articulate. If we look carefully and kind of get used to those kinds of experiences, experiences of the divine have—we sense something of relationship. They're relational experiences. Now, they can include the sense of a personal divinity and the relationship of this self with a personal divinity, absolutely. But even experiences of an impersonal divine—vast awareness or vast love or all kinds of things—they still feel or seem, or we still sense, again maybe not obviously at first, but they're related to who I am. So there's still relationship implicit in them in terms of who I am.

Or we could say experiences of divinity are related to who I am. They have something to say, something to open me to, to inform me about who I am. They bear on who I am most essentially, most fundamentally in my depths. So this, I think, is not obvious at first, but I'd say—I just want to draw out a couple of characteristics of experiences of the divine, despite their diversity. I'd say they're relational—at least they're related to who I am. They say something about me, inform me about me, open me to realize something about who I am.

Now, we could say that experiences of the divine involve a sense or recognition that who I am, this self, the very existence of this self, of who I am—whether I realize it or not, I recognize in an experience of divine that whether I realize it or not, when I'm aware of it or when I'm not aware of it, or if I'm not yet aware of it or someone else who's not yet aware of it—is somehow always contained. This self, this who I am, is somehow always, or at least a part of who I am, is always contained or subsumed in or part of or related to or participating in something vaster.

Not something vaster that's rigidly boundaried, like a nation-state, for example. So someone could feel like, I don't know, with the rise of nationalism at different times in history, in different places, and feel like I'm really part of something vaster. But that's very rigidly boundaried because there's us and them.

Not like that. Rather, something that also contains, subsumes, includes, and in a way is everything—and more than everything. In other words, it's not just the totality of things.

We could say that experiences of the divine are relational, involving a recognition about the relationship of who I am. They relate to who I am in its relationship with—whether one realizes it or not—something much larger that contains and subsumes it, that the self is a part of or related to or participates in. And that something is not a rigidly bounded identity, but rather something that, as I said, also subsumes, contains, includes, or is everything and more than the totality of things.

But even that may be too far a step. If we just go back a little and say experiences of the divine—the diversity of experiences of the divine—have some sense of being relational. They are related to a sense of who I am most deeply, and recognize that this is the case anyway, whether I realize it or not. What they say about who I am and what who I am is in relationship with is the case whether I realize it or not—because that is an aspect of experience of the divine.

Perhaps it would be better to say that the nature of the experience of relationship with the divine in those kinds of experiences is something akin to echoes—like echoes in a canyon. We cannot find the end point. We cannot find the terminus, the termination, the limit of those echoes or of the sense of the divine. So there's a sense in this relating that it's somehow like an echo, echoing into the infinite beyond or the unknown.

It's something I know very palpably and it's very right here, and yet there's also this dimensionality, this echoing into the infinite beyond, the unknown, some kind of unfathomability, and therefore some kind of mystery. Again, there's a range, a huge variety there.

But the nature of the experience of relationship that's intrinsic to an experience of divinity is something akin to an echoing without an end point. Or something like infinite mirrors reflecting each other—the reflection of the reflection of the reflection of the reflection. It's hard to put this into language. This is the best I can do right now. But again, I'm pointing to something that we can notice in our experiences when we feel a sense of divinity. It's very hard to articulate.

That sense of infinite echoing, infinite mirroring, the endlessness of that, the sense of endless mirroring or echoing—it doesn't necessarily imply spatiality, that kind of endlessness. It might or it might not. It doesn't imply vastness in that sense necessarily. But that sense of endlessness and infinity intrinsic to the experience of the divine—that sense of infinity and endlessness in the echoing and the mirroring and the lack of a discernible end point—is not nihilistic in its implications or its feeling. It doesn't give a sense of meaninglessness. Rather, it gives a sense of beauty, a sense of belonging, of love, of place, of blessing.

All this, as I said, are aspects of experiences of what we're calling the divine. There's a huge diversity, and the experiences of the divine evolve, or can evolve, as well as the concepts for different reasons.

I would also say that there's a dimension of timelessness to the divine, to the Buddha-nature. For me, it involves that. It might not be all that it is, or all the dimensions of the divine might not be timeless, but there is a dimension of timelessness to the divine, to the Buddha-nature.

As we said, there will be dimensions of the Buddha-nature that are beyond the full grasp of our understanding or our conceptualization. But in all of this, there's a sense of rightness. There's something right about the experience. There are implications—a sense of meaningfulness implicit in the experience, involved, woven into the experience, implied by the experience—and beauty. In the divinity, there is beauty. And in our relationship, our sense of the relationship that's implicit in the experience of divinity, there's beauty in that as well.

All that I would point out—again, what's actually quite hard to articulate and what's not always obvious in these kinds of experiences. I'm sure I'm leaving much unsaid.

Now, our experiences and our concepts of divinity we could divide into two types, and I've touched on this before already.

We could divide our experiences and concepts into the transcendent experiences and concepts, and what we call immanent. Now these two words, transcendence and immanence—people use them in divinity contexts and in very different ways.

What I mean by transcendent in this case is that the divinity or the unfabricated transcends perception, transcends space, time, a sense of self, of other, of any object whatsoever. It transcends any kind of conventional perceptual constellation of subject, object, time—even if it's a sense of oneness and a sense of present moment. So I mean it in that sense: the unfabricated, the transcendent, what's transcendent to our usual perception is the main point.

As I said, we've talked a lot about and written about the way that in the Dharma, meditation practice can be used—certain ways of looking—to fabricate less and less perception and eventually open up to that transcendent, unfabricated.

So there's the transcendent sense of divinity, or kind of experience and concept of divinity, and there's what we might call the immanent. Again, used in different ways, but what I really mean here is this world of fabrication and a sense of that world itself being divine. So yes, these objects that I perceive, this self that is perceiving, the subject, the object, the perceiving itself, the world—all of that. There's a sense of an increasing fullness, if you like, of the perception of divinity in the realm of perception and in all kinds of ways, so that yes, it's fabricated. One acknowledges that. One has gone perhaps deep enough into the understanding of fabrication that divinity starts to reveal itself in different ways, and different possibilities for that perception open up.

But we want, I would say, to open up these experiences of transcendent and immanent divinity from our practice or through our practice. In other words, from what we're calling our phenomenological approach. This, for me, is really important. From the very phenomenological approach that we talked about right at the beginning of the retreat: through practice, through approaching practice with a certain very open, basic conceptual idea, and then through the exploration of ways of looking—all this can open up.

So often, historically in the West, it is assumed that anything that kind of talks about or points to or upholds something beyond the sort of flat one-dimensionality of materialist existence—any talk of divinity—is metaphysics. Metaphysics is often a very charged word and a very derogatory word sometimes, but it's used in very different ways, or rather it means quite a lot of different things and it's used to mean different things by different people at different times.

But one of the things it means is this talking about or referring to or pointing to or insisting on or drawing attention to anything that's beyond this sort of flat one-dimensional view of reality. Any talk of divinity—anything, actually, that is more than what is obvious to the normal, untrained, modernist perception, unless it's approved scientifically by scientific authorities. Anything that is more than what is obvious to the normal, typical, untrained perception of a Westerner today in our modernist culture is regarded as metaphysics.

And it's often assumed that any talk of divinity or something like an unfabricated is metaphysics. And metaphysics is rooted in abstract thought, in belief, in speculation. Those words often go together: metaphysical speculation. Actually, the word speculation is from the word speculum in Latin, which means mirror. So it's supposed to mirror reality, if you like, or truth, but it's come to mean something quite different. Speculation is just like conjecture, or groundless speculation.

But there's often this assumption that all this talk about divinity is just metaphysics. It's just metaphysics. It's something beyond the seemingly obvious one-dimensional, therefore it's not real.

For example, I have this book here by a guy called Moshe Barasch. It's a book called Icon, studying the histories of the idea of the icon in Western, but also Middle Eastern thought. And he quotes a passage from our friend who I mentioned earlier in the retreat, Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, who wrote some works, one of which is called Mystical Theology.

Barasch writes that he gives a concise summary of apophatic negative theology in the shape of a compressed description of what happens when we are being uplifted. Let me read the quote from Pseudo-Dionysius and then come back to what this means or how one might read it, how different people read it.

So Pseudo-Dionysius writes in his Mystical Theology: "As we climb higher we say this: It is not soul or mind, nor does it possess imagination, conviction, speech or understanding. It is not number or order, greatness or smallness, equality or inequality, similarity or dissimilarity. Darkness and light, error and truth, it is none of these. It is beyond assertion and denial. We make assertions and denials of what is next to it, but never of it. For it is both beyond every assertion, being the perfect and unique cause of all things, and, by virtue of its preeminently simple and perfect nature, free of every limitation, beyond every limitation. It is also beyond every denial."

You will recognize, if not in all of that, at least in other words—apart from the thing about cause—something very, very close and almost echoing the Buddha's words in some of those quotes I shared earlier about when he taught about the unfabricated. There are passages in the Pali Canon: "This neither long nor short, beyond measure," and so on, "no sun, no moon shines there," all of this, where phenomena cease, all ways of speaking cease, beyond mind. All this is very characteristic of what is called the apophatic movement—the movement, in our language, towards the quieting of fabrication and eventually the cessation of the fabrication of perception. In Christian terminology, that's called the apophatic way, the via negativa, the way of negation. Not this, not that, neti, neti. What we want is something that's beyond all fabrication, all perception, therefore, in the usual sense.

To me, that passage clearly reads as a description of...

of the experience of the meditator or the person in prayer, as they go through this process of letting go of fabrication, letting go in relation to what is fabricated and therefore fabricating less. Remember, relating all this to clinging, letting go of clinging, the spectrum of what clinging is, and then the decrease in fabrication. And going, if you like, in St. John's language, into the cloud of unknowing, into the darkness of God. Or in Meister Eckhart's language, beyond creatures, beyond what is created, what is fabricated.

To me, this passage of Pseudo-Dionysius is a clear description of a meditative progression of experience. What strikes me as amazing is what follows immediately in Moshe Barasch's book. He writes: "It is tempting to speculate what Dionysius could have had in mind when he tried to imagine, however vaguely, what the ascending soul might meet on its way upwards." In other words, he's reading this passage as just some kind of imagination and speculation on Pseudo-Dionysius' part. It's merely metaphysics, this abstraction coming from thought that you then imagine what someone might experience. And then Barasch continues: "This is not the place to indulge in such speculation."

So often there's this assumption about talk of other dimensions or divinity or something that sounds like what we just heard from Pseudo-Dionysius or the unfabricated. There's this insistence that it's just abstract thought. I don't know enough about the history, but sometimes I read things and it does seem that often some people start with some kind of ultimate metaphysical positing of, say, perfection. There is something or some entity that is perfect, and then proceed logically from that to deduce all kinds of things from that ultimate speculation about something that's perfect—speculation in the modern sense of the term.

So for example, in Plato you get something called the Good, and it's the ultimate reality, and it's assumed to be perfect. And then following in Neoplatonism and in Thomas Aquinas and many, many teachers and writers in Western history, there is the perfection of the Good. And because the Good is supposed to be perfect, therefore it follows X, and therefore it follows Y. So for example, out of this perfect One, because of its very perfection and absence of limitation, the many are born. And there is the world of manifestation and plurality and diversity that comes out of it. And even out of this Good, because of its perfection and superabundance and lack of limitation, even evil comes out of it.

There's a kind of logical movement from some metaphysical postulation of something ultimate and perfect, and then a sort of logical deduction of the world and what we find in the world coming from that. And this is detectable not just in Western philosophy and the Greek tradition, but it's also evident in Indian traditions. In Dzogchen it's actually called the Great Perfection.

I don't know enough about the history of that, but certainly in Indian Mahayana teaching you can see a historical movement, inclination, tendency to kind of axiomatically posit as a fundamental truth the Buddha's perfection—so he is the ultimate being and he is perfect in every way. And so what follows from that: he must have been like this, he must have had this kind of body and he must have had this, and he must be able to do this and that. This is a kind of expansion of what a Buddha means historically just by virtue of positing his ultimacy and perfection.

Now that had all kinds of strange and unforeseen consequences, also very interesting consequences, and I think actually fruitful ones, but I know people would debate that. So if a Buddha is, for example, ultimate in his compassion, he is the ultimately compassionate being, how do I square that with the fact that by virtue of his realization, his enlightenment, he's going to end rebirth and therefore not be available to help people who are suffering? He's supposed to be ultimately compassionate.

So these two conflicting threads of the teaching and the supposition about ending rebirth and yet being ultimately compassionate, infinitely compassionate—they actually came together because they're conflicting. They actually had to give rise to a kind of expansion of the logos of what Buddhahood was, the Buddhology, if you like. And included in that, which I've touched on before, was the whole explanation and ramifications that came out of it, of how then the Buddha is the only being, a Buddha is the only kind of being that can fully and deeply see the emptiness of things at the same time as actually perceiving those things.

Because for everyone else, as I'm pretty sure I've explained, as you contemplate the emptiness while you're looking at something, that thing will fade. Why? Because the avijjā is getting less, and the avijjā fuels, stimulates the fabrication in the wheel of dependent origination of nāma-rūpa, of which perception is a part. More avijjā, more perception, more solidity of perception, more forms, more delineation. Less avijjā, it quietens down. No avijjā, no perception.

A Buddha is the only person—this was all very, I think, beautifully and cunningly, but slightly bizarrely, had to be drawn in to answer this question of: well, if he ends rebirth and he's ultimately compassionate, how does that fit together? Because if he's compassionate, he needs to see beings, but yet he must...

Anyway, the main point is that it's often assumed that metaphysics is rooted in abstract thought, abstract belief, abstract speculation. So there is an aphorism or slur that, I don't know who came up with it, but it's sort of around, that metaphysics—in other words, the pursuit of divinity and of the unfabricated—is like a person walking into a dark cellar at midnight with no light and looking for a black cat that is not there. So it's kind of funny, but obviously it implies that metaphysics is something ridiculous. It's a futile endeavor. Looking for divinity or the unfabricated, some kind of beyond—just silly, pointless, futile.

What, though, if we start with phenomena instead?

Which I'm almost certain that many of these teachers in the past, and possibly even Plato, certainly Plotinus, had experience of this unfabricated, this beyond, this good, this whatever they called it. Certainly it is not the case that everyone is starting with this abstract thought.

What if we start with phenomena instead—in other words, appearances, that's what that word means, appearances. What appears to us? What do we experience? What if we start with phenomena instead, rather than starting with some kind of ultimate postulate of what God is or whatever?

Then we might say that metaphysics taken the other way round—starting with some kind of postulate of what God is or how God must be or what the divine is or what Buddha nature must be or what Buddha must be like—then a better metaphor for metaphysics, rather than this looking for the black cat in the dark that isn't there, would be something like putting the cart before the horse. In other words, getting things in the wrong order.

What if we start with what we observe, what we actually experience, and investigate that experience and the range of it and how it is affected in different ways by ways of looking? Then that phenomenological approach can actually open up the discoveries of metaphysics in the sense of other dimensionalities, the divine, the experience of the divine, the unfabricated. We start from phenomena, from appearance, from experience, and our play with that, our investigation of ways of looking at that.

Now that implies that experience is somehow being used as a basis for our epistemology, for our claims of knowing something. Experience is somehow a basis for epistemology. But what I would like to say is we must include a range of experience there. We must include the experience of lessening fabrication, the observation of how appearances fade to different degrees depending on the degree of clinging. We must include the experience, if we can call it that, of the unfabricated. We must include this growing understanding of dependent origination and of how ways of looking condition and fabricate the experience.

So experience somehow is a basis for epistemology, but how and to what extent? And there is always an epistemology. There is always an epistemology that we are engaging in, living and practicing. And epistemology always involves some assumptions, always rests on some assumptions that actually are ultimately not provable.

So that goes for what I'm presenting as the phenomenological approach. It's not outside. It doesn't exist without certain assumptions. It certainly involves an epistemology, what I'm calling a phenomenological approach. And that epistemology rests on some assumptions, and some of those assumptions are unprovable. And that is an inescapable fact of our existence.

One of the questions here is, can we recognize this? That there is always an epistemology. That epistemology, whatever we use for our epistemology, always involves some assumptions. And actually expose that, recognize it, become aware of it, and expose it. Be honest about it. So not doing that leads to all kinds of pitfalls and contradictions and limitations.

You can imagine a kind of conversation, for instance, if I said to someone of a certain dogmatic persuasion, "Space and time are not fundamental, they are emergent." And they might reply, this person perhaps from a sort of devout, secularist, dogmatic point of view, "Oh, that's metaphysics." If I say space and time are not fundamental, they are emergent—"Oh, that's metaphysics, because that's saying something about some kind of transcendent beyond."

And I might say, or a person might say, "Oh, but actually it's science." And the word science has a certain clout in our culture. "It's still science." And then you refer to theories of both special and general relativity, and how time and space are shaped and relative to the observer and all kinds of things. But even beyond that, in the more contemporary theories that haven't been proved yet but are certainly strong contenders and themselves emerging into the forefront of modern physics research, is actually not just that space and time are shaped, but that they actually emerge from something more fundamental, that is beyond space and beyond time. Even the present moment, all of it. Not just shaped, but actually emerge.

So I could say, whoever is in dialogue with this person, "Oh, but that's science," and explain that a little bit to them. And they might say, "Well, that's all very good and well, but it's better for practitioners to go back to their experience, or we are basing our teaching on experience," to which a person might respond: "But what if a transcendence of space and of time are sometimes a person's experience?" Certainly something that we cultivate in meditation, the access to that kind of experience.

So you're saying, "Oh, forget about all that science stuff, which can sound kind of mystical. Let's go back to experience." But what if a person's experience does include that? Sometimes going in and out of a transcendence of space and time and things. If you're basing your epistemology and teaching on experience, then why not include these experiences? Especially as they're repeatable experiences. One can actually learn how to move in and out of such experiences, dependent on certain laws—if you like, laws of fabrication, of dependent origination. Why do you say you include those experiences, but not these experiences?

We have the authority of science, but science involves training. Not everyone can be a theoretical physicist who understands relativity or quantum mechanical reality. It involves training. It's not easy. Practice is the same. It involves training. Maybe not for everyone. Not everyone wants to. And some of it's not easy.

But there's something, a question here. Why, if you're basing it on experience—which you clearly are, or a person says, "We base our dharma on experience"—but then you're excluding certain meditative experiences just because what? Because you haven't had them? Why should the authority of what counts as true or untrue, or dharma or not dharma, or epistemologically valid—why should the authority rest with those with less skill and less range in their experience and meditation?

Some people get nervous. It's like, "Well, we can't have elites claiming a certain esoteric knowledge and then having all the power." There's a danger there, of course there is—priests and abuse and all that kind of stuff. Because we know, we have the power, we have the mystical insight that you don't have. There's a danger there, of course there is, and people have pointed to this in history, in all kinds of ways, religious and secular as well, in fact. Nowadays, sometimes some journalists are pointing to the swing the other way. There's a kind of dismissal and ignoring and denigration of any kind of expertise. So it's like ignorance is to be somehow celebrated.

But there's questioning about authority, about epistemology, about consciousness and honesty about epistemology and authority, exploration of these things. And what is the place of experience—and what range of experience—in the epistemology, in the revelation and discovery of, let's say, reality, truth, dimensionality, divinity, whatever words you might want to pick there.

So going from what we're calling a phenomenological approach—and just to point out, our phenomenological approach, or the way we're using that word, phenomenological approach, that phrase, is not just the same as just observing. We're including more than that in our phenomenological approach. I would say just observing is a bit of a misnomer and based on a misunderstanding, but it's one of the ways that the term phenomenology gets used or practice gets thought about as well.

Why is it different? Why is it more than that for us? Because we realize and we acknowledge and we see that the ways of looking fabricate the experience. So the experiences that we encounter, undergo, that are open to us, that we live, if you like, are dependent on the ways of looking that we are employing, that are in place at any time. And we recognize, we realize, we acknowledge, we see also the necessity and the inevitability of making certain delineations in our conceptuality—conscious or unconscious, subtle or gross—and how that also gives rise to, fabricates the experience.

And the exploration of all that—contingency, dependency on ways of looking and conceiving, how all that gives rise to experience and the range of experience dependent on that—that's what we're calling our phenomenological approach.

So sometimes some phenomenological philosophers want to talk about the experience of self phenomenologically, but there is no one phenomenological experience of self. A, it's culturally conditioned hugely, and B, as we've just said, it's dependent on the way of looking and the delineations existing at any time. So we can talk about experiences of something that we might call self, but it is plural. If we just observe, what we realize is that the self is like this. More than that, we, as I've said many times before, we actually see that without distinctions and delineations and ways of looking, no perception is possible. There isn't any perception without some conception, which involves distinction, delineation—even the barest subject-object, or present moment, delineation, distinction, discrimination. Conception is involved in perception. Perception implies ways of looking. Nothing arises, is fabricated without distinction, delineation, ways of looking.

And there is no reality—if you like, there's no perception independent of these. There's no experience independent of ways of looking, distinction, delineations. Nothing is given to us by something independent of ways of looking.

The myth of the given, I think, is a phrase in contemporary philosophy.

So with our phenomenological approach—what we're calling our phenomenological approach—we can open to the unfabricated and the understanding of dependent origination or the emptiness of all things. That is one type, one face, if you like, one aspect or dimension or divinity that can open through the phenomenological approach.

If I view practice—Dharma practice—as just being mindful in the sense of just being present and learning to concentrate or focus my mind and developing metta, developing kindness, being kind... if that's what my practice involves, just that: mindfulness, being with what is, concentrating my mind, focusing my mind on my breath or at times to calm down, and being kind—that's not the phenomenological approach that we're talking about. That involves this exploration, conscious exploration of the range of ways of looking.

That kind of view or conceptual understanding of what the Dharma is and what practice involves and what meditation is—mindfulness, concentration, and metta—almost certainly is very unlikely to lead to an understanding, a deep understanding of the radical emptiness of all things. And it's highly unlikely that it will open up all the possibilities that come both out of seeing emptiness and out of the recognition of soul-making and eros and the allowing of that.

So what we have again is a broader mindfulness, a certain way of thinking about what mindfulness is that we're calling our phenomenological approach. And that can open us to, in time, the sense of a transcendent divinity. We might call it the unfabricated, or whatever word we use for it.

And within our broader phenomenological approach, within a sort of—as I said right at the beginning of this talk—less tightly constrained or conceived of mindfulness, we will also lead to an exploration of eros and soul-making. And that will bring more of this, more experiences and concepts of the immanent divine. I mean, the way via reduction of clinging and going right through the unfabricated and then the emptiness of the unfabricated also brings a certain kind of experience of the immanent divine, absolutely. But the range is greatly opened up once we include an awareness of eros and soul-making and allow that and begin to explore that.

Let's go into that a little bit more in the next talk. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 87

From Mindfulness to Divinity: Towards the Tracing of a Phenomenology of Soul (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h41

> In this profound dharma talk from the Eros Unfettered retreat, Rob Burbea continues his exploration of how a phenomenological approach to meditation—understanding how different ways of looking create different appearances—naturally unfolds experiences of divinity. He examines how the practice of lessening fabrication leads through various onenesses to the unfabricated, and ultimately to seeing the emptiness of all phenomena including the unfabricated itself.
>
> Burbea demonstrates how this understanding of radical emptiness opens permission to explore the imaginal realm, as the division between 'real' and 'unreal' softens. He details how the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, when allowed to unfold naturally, creates both transcendent and immanent experiences of divinity—from universal consciousness to the recognition of all things as sacred. Key concepts include the 'angel out ahead' from Corbin, the tselem from Jewish mysticism, and Vajrayāna deity practices as ways the self participates in divinity.
> The talk explores how soul-making eros moves in two directions: toward the unfabricated transcendent and toward soul-making fabrication in the world. Drawing on Kabbalistic and other mystical traditions, Burbea shows how these apparently opposite movements can be unified, with our human eros participating in divine eros itself. He concludes by examining how phenomenological practice arrives at insights equivalent to classical metaphysical teachings, but through lived experience rather than abstract theorizing.

When we adopt what we are calling our phenomenological approach to practice—when we think of meditation and practice and inhabit it as the exploration of how different ways of looking lead to different appearances, different experiences, different perceptions—we engage in an investigation into the dependent arising fabrication of appearance, perception, experience, of self, of others, of the world, of things both external and internal. We explore how different ways of looking condition, give rise to, and fabricate differences in appearance.

When we adopt that phenomenological approach as a way of conceiving what meditation is and as a way of directing our practice, this will unfold a stream of discoveries and insights whereby we understand dependent origination—the Buddha's teaching of dependent origination—more and more deeply, more and more thoroughly, really unfolding and unfurling for ourselves the mystery and beauty of that teaching.

Part of this process is the development of the skill of learning to fabricate less, so that we encounter and open to states of less fabrication of perception, less fabrication of experience. With time and practice, we extend our range on that spectrum of lessening fabrication and develop the meditative skill, art, and know-how of moving up and down that spectrum and broadening that range.

Through all of this, or as part and parcel of all of this, we encounter as stages of lessening fabrication different kinds of onenesses. As we've said before, there is the oneness of a kind of cosmic consciousness or universal awareness, of infinite space, infinite nothingness, oneness of materiality, oneness of love—all kinds of oneness.

We also encounter, eventually, hopefully opening to the unfabricated, what's beyond even those kinds of oneness. And we can even go beyond, so to speak, the unfabricated, to recognize the emptiness of all things—absolutely all things. We see the emptiness, the thorough emptiness, not just of the self, but also of all things, all objects, including the aggregates that make up, in one system of Buddhist psychology, the elements of the process of self. We see those too are in themselves empty of inherent existence. They are fabricated as well. We see the emptiness of space, of time, and even the emptiness of the unfabricated.

Following this trajectory of deepening insight and the beauty of that path, we come to a position of freedom where we have liberated ways of looking and are left with ways of looking to play with—a potentially increasing range of ways of looking. There are, if you like, only ways of looking, as a way of putting it.

In that journey, there are various experiences of divinity that will emerge for us as palpable experiences at different stages of that process—different stages of the insight opening, different stages of perception unfabricating throughout that whole journey.

These kinds of oneness can be perceived and felt as perceptions of divinity, absolutely, and they usually are. As a teacher, I'm struck by how people often start talking in theistic terms when they open to this universal sense of compassion that seems to be woven through the fabric of the cosmos, or this infinite consciousness, or whatever.

Then there's the divinity of the transcendent, unfabricated—that's also part of that journey. And there's the experience of another kind of divinity, where all is divine. This comes because one has gone beyond and seen through any duality between the fabricated and the unfabricated. We see the emptiness of that duality eventually, and it collapses, so to speak, so that we can enter into a way of looking that sees all things as not separate from an awareness that is beyond time and beyond space, and not mine. Then everything is sacred. There isn't this hierarchy of unfabricated over fabricated. All of it is divine.

But it's all, in a way, beyond time—unlike the other awarenesses, the other onenesses of universal awareness or infinite consciousness or universal love that seem to exist eternally in the sense of for an everlasting time.

On that route I've talked about and written about much before, we could say that there are these kinds of divinities that emerge for us, are revealed to us, that we discover. They include, if you're listening carefully, both the transcendent kind and what was called the immanent kind, because it does involve the oneness, the divinity here, pervading, woven into, not separate from the things of the world. So that direction of unfolding of divinity includes both transcendent and immanent experiences and conceptions of divinity. But they're all universal divinity—all experiences or conceptions of some kind of universal divine on that trajectory.

Any point on that trajectory satisfies something in the soul, satisfies something in the psyche, in the citta. The oneness of universal love, for instance, really satisfies something in the soul. Something in the soul is really touched by that and really is satisfied. Is it finally forever satisfied with that? No. But something is satisfied.

The fantasy that gets woven around that journey and that movement to these different stages of realization, the eros in relationship to these different beyonds that we're yet to encounter, the fantasies and the eros in relation to these experiences of universal divinity and concepts of universal divinity—those fantasies and eros in relation to all that is soul-making in the sense that we have been talking about it.

So these unfoldings, these openings, these relative unfabrications, these deeper movements and openings of insight, satisfy something in the soul. And in relation to them, soul-making in the sense that we have been talking about on this course is also involved.

Now, when we really understand for ourselves the emptiness of all things, the thorough and radical emptiness of absolutely everything—certainly when we see that for ourselves, but even if we can only intuitively sense it before we've even seen it, or even if something in us has faith in that—this can also be quite powerful. What happens or what can happen is that such an insight, or even if it's only an intuition or faith—by intuition I mean just a not complete realization in the being, in the perception, in the experience, and in the understanding—can be transformative.

That realization of the radical, thorough emptiness of absolutely everything softens the divisions that we tend nowadays in our culture to make between the real and the unreal. Because we understand there is no object of perception that is not fabricated. There is no object of perception that is not fabricated.

We can only really buy into that division of real and unreal when we believe that the real refers to something, or we are vaguely implying in our thought that what we think of as real is something unfabricated. Going deeply into emptiness, we rather cannot find an object of perception that is not fabricated. It's all empty.

Because it softens the division between real and unreal, this is the least that emptiness does: to open up a permission and a legitimacy for exploring the imagined. Because there isn't this hardcore distinction between the real and the unreal, the real and the imaginary.

Now, it's not quite that simple just to say everything's empty, therefore everything's equally real or real in the same way or unreal in the same way. At a certain level, that's true. In other words, the ultimate ontological status, the ultimate kind of reality that everything has is that it's empty, so that ultimately they're the same. But on other levels, there are differences. Of course there are differences.

So there are differences in what we call ontic status, in the kind of reality that's possessed by, let's say, a physical object on the one hand and an imaginal perception on the other. Just because everything is empty doesn't imply that the imaginal has the same kind of ontic status as physical objects. Ultimately it does, in both being empty and thoroughly empty. But they're not quite the same.

Still, the seeing of the deep emptiness of things, or trust in the deep emptiness of things, conviction in the deep emptiness of things—the thorough emptiness of all things gives, as I say, at the very least, in relation to the imaginary, some opening, permission, legitimacy, freedom and flexibility to explore the imaginary.

I actually think the ontology is interesting. What exactly can we say about, in our ontology, about the kind of reality that an image has versus what is imaginary, the imaginal versus the imaginary, versus the psychic, a dream or an image that is actually what we call extrasensory perception, picking up on something that then happens in the future exactly as one imagined it. And what's the difference between that and physical objects or mental thoughts or emotions?

To me, that's all very interesting. People at different points in history have offered different systems of ontology and explanation, either with a lot of intelligence or not so much intelligence and more or less value in terms of the use that comes out of it. But these change over history. And on what authority could we ever even finally discover the truth about this? To me, it's still interesting.

Something happens when we realize something about conceptual frameworks, about logos in general and truth, and we realize that no conceptual framework, no logos is going to capture once and for all and universally the whole truth of things, of existence—even of one dimension or aspect of our existence. Let's say the imagination or even emotion or eros, or even materiality.

Once one realizes that kind of level of emptiness, then to me it's possible to explore and play with, as I said, entertain different conceptual frames, different logoi, different ways of looking. In other words, different ontologies and epistemologies, different cosmologies, rather than just shrugging at our inability to find a final truth and then ending up just by default reverting to whatever is the most popular worldview of ontology and metaphysics in our culture.

Instead of just shrugging and reverting, we can actually be quite creative with this. Enter into and entertain different logoi, different ontologies, different conceptual systems. Because one realizes something about conceptual systems and truth in general.

In addition to these points, we've also said that if we just observe our life and our experiences honestly, openly, without too much constriction in our logos, and what we actually observe—in other words, if we're quite open in what we're paying attention to—there's another kind of phenomenological approach here, or an aspect of our phenomenological approach.

We begin to recognize and acknowledge that eros is in our lives. There's something called eros which isn't really the same as craving. It's a kind of desire. It's different than what we might call craving. We need to make a delineation. Something is there that's operating already in our life. Maybe a lot, maybe a little. Fantasy operates in our life. Soul-making operates in our life.

These are delineations that need to be made once we start looking at our life, and making delineations, as I've said, actually opens them up further, enriches them further—like putting your foot in a crack in the door and being able to open up a path. We recognize and acknowledge the inevitability and the necessity of eros, of image, of fantasy, of soul-making. Then we begin to explore.

We can begin to explore. And what do we notice, as we said? We notice the perception of more dimensionality, more dimensions here in the erotic object, in the element of the erotic constellation, the imaginal constellation.

We notice dimensionality, dimensions, meaningfulness, beauties, timelessness, unfathomability—all these aspects of the soul-making erotic imaginal. And all these aspects—dimensionality, meaningfulness, beauty, timelessness, unfathomability—we could say they are all aspects of a sense of sacredness. We could use that word.

So we start to encounter more and more of a sense of sacredness. And why more and more? Because the soul-making dynamic, the eros psyche logos dynamic, tends to expansion, fertilization, enrichment, complication, multifacetedness, widening, deepening. So that involved in that, implicitly involved in that, is the sense of sacredness. And because that's woven into the soul-making dynamic and the expansion of eros psyche logos, the senses of sacredness are also enriched, deepened, widened, complicated, given other facets, given other dimensions.

So they're widened cosmopoetically—in other words, more and more this sense of sacredness spills over to infect, in the good sense, the way laughter is infectious, infect the whole cosmos, so to speak. It widens in that sense. It also widens in the sense that the kinds of sacredness, the perceptions of sacredness and what sacredness means to us widens. The senses of what we might call divinity widens. So there are at least two ways it widens there.

And all this, again, is something that we notice. If eros is doing its thing, if it's igniting the soul-making dynamic—in eros, the interplay and the mutual reciprocal feeding and nourishing and supporting and fertilization of eros psyche logos—we notice, we begin to notice this, to become sensitive to what's happening here.

And implied in the eros psyche logos movement and dynamic is that it spreads to involve everything. All aspects that include, that are elements of that dynamic, all aspects of our being, all aspects of existence, and the kinds, as I said, of divinity. So self, other, world, eros—all those involved as elements of the imaginal constellation, of the erotic soul-making constellation—and kinds of sacredness, as we said, kinds of divinity, universal versus particular, or universal and particular, gets included, starts to get ignited, both those faces and kinds and directions of experience of divinity, concept of divinity, both the personal and the impersonal.

Infinite potential here. Unlimited, endless, boundless possibility here. Because that whole process creates. It's creative. It's endlessly creative if we don't block it, if it is not blocked. As we've talked about, there's the creation-discovery, the creation-slash-discovery process of perception, of images, of imaginal perception, of ideas, of delineations. All that means that that process will be endless if it is allowed to be.

And why have we harped on and on about the soul-making dynamic and the eros psyche logos dynamic and what it involves and what it implies and what it does and how it works? Why? Because if we understand that movement, that dynamic, that process of soul-making, of what we call eros psyche logos, then, because we understand it, or to the degree that we understand it, it actually informs our practice. We then understand how to practice, what to look for, what might be needed, what might be being left out, why something feels like it's, quote, going wrong, or we feel stilted or stultified or blocked or stagnated or whatever it is.

So understanding, again, understanding the logos means that we can understand how to practice. How to practice. It means how to think, how to perceive, what to look for, how to work with images. All this is kind of, or a lot of it is implied in just understanding this very large, or large-scale conceptual idea of the soul-making dynamic. And that's why, it's partly why we're going on and on about it.

So eros involves—literally it brings into its bubbling cauldron and stirs in, involves, turns, it brings in to turn with, to stir with—the elements of self, other, as we've said. And eros will, in that, increase, if you like, and expand and deepen and enrich the sense of the divinity of the beloved other, the erotic object, whatever that is, and, as we've said, of the self and the world and eros itself. And again, this is what we notice.

And there are all kinds of different ways it can do this and different possibilities. So in regard to the self, mentioned on, I think it was the Path of the Imaginal Retreat, perhaps a few times, Corbin's phrase, the angel out ahead. So this angel is always out ahead, appears to me, appears to you in its presence. Sometimes we think we have one angel, but sometimes it seems like there's more. But certainly in our view, there's more than one angel.

It's an image that appears to us that's always beyond reach, or so to speak, is always itself growing, evolving, changing, taking a step further away from us as we move towards it. From another perspective, it's moving towards us, but... So there's this, again, there's this infinity there to the angel out ahead. We never reach it, so the pothos is included in our erotic relationship, as it must be with the angel out ahead.

In the Jewish mystical teachings, they speak of the tselem, the divine image. This image serves as one's counterpart—one's angelic counterpart, as Corbin refers to it. The Eastern Orthodox Christian tradition similarly speaks of imago dei, human beings made in the image of God, as Genesis tells us.

This tselem, this angel out ahead, is not universal—it is uniquely mine. It appears to me in a particular way. The soul reveals something essential about myself through this image. The self enters relationship with something that is somehow myself and somehow not myself, yet is divine and utterly particular to me, bearing unique characteristics that belong to no other.

In the Vajrayana tradition of Tantric practice, practitioners learn to identify with a chosen deity—usually one given by the guru or teacher. Through visualization, one practices becoming that deity in the imaginal realm, in reality itself. This profound practice rests upon the understanding that I am empty and this deity is empty. Both share the same essential nature of emptiness. As this understanding grows more subtle, we can recognize ourselves as image—recognize ourselves as images.

The Greek Orthodox writer Panagiotis Nelas teaches that this archetypal presence that speaks to us, this angel in our midst, this being made in the divine image, represents both a gift from the divine—or if we shift our language, a gift from Buddha nature—and simultaneously a goal toward which we move. This process of deification, this theosis, must be approached with great care. The ego can easily grasp these teachings and hear them completely wrong. But when heard with the beauty of understanding that knows the emptiness of all things, that recognizes image as image, these teachings make the self pregnant with dimensionality, beauty, meaningfulness—with all the riches of the imaginal.

It is not only the guru or teacher who manifests as image of the divine, as Buddha. The self is equally so. This understanding can open within us, become something we move toward, something we play with as an idea and way of looking. We can let it permeate our lives so that our whole sense of self gains ever more imaginal dimension. We recognize ourselves as image, with everything implied by that word in our imaginal understanding.

Meister Eckhart wrote: "We must become heaven on earth so that God can find a home here." We might interpret this on one level as a call to create the kingdom of heaven on earth through moral behavior and kindness, establishing a social order where God can dwell. This interpretation carries profound importance.

But there exists another interpretation—what we might call theophanic. We must become heaven on earth by seeing ourselves as heaven on earth, as temple, as not separate from a world that is itself heaven, as divine. When I see myself this way, when I live this way, then God has a home here. Perhaps from this theophanic understanding—from grasping the deeper implications of Buddha nature—the social manifestations naturally follow: the creation of the kingdom of heaven, or in other language, the sangha as bodhisattva.

So much opens here as we revisit these themes. Yet for most people, the self remains overlooked. The imaginal dimensions of the self go unfilled. There is always reification—either grandiose or, more commonly, a flattening and constricting that diminishes us into something inferior. This is why these teachings matter so deeply. Something profoundly beautiful becomes possible for us here.

Of course, we do not pursue the imaginal self at the expense of the imaginal other and world. Rather, we include everything—the full spectrum of imaginal possibility.

Thomas Aquinas observed that all beauty yearns to be seen. The original Latin suggests something even stronger: all beauty yearns to be conspicuous. Through the spreading of eros, through allowing and breathing space for eros, we recognize the beauty of the self—the beauty of what we are, of what manifests through us, with us, in us. We discover the dimensionality of self as well as other and world.

All beauty—this treasure, this recognition—all beauty yearns to be seen.

What does that mean for the way we see? And what does it mean for the way we live? Am I going to, as Jesus said, hide my light under a bushel? What is my light? What is your light? Or lights?

So yes, to include the self, or the self will naturally—there will be a tendency for the self to be included, drawn into, involved, to turn with, to mix with this divinization process: self and the other and the world, seeing the beauty, the divinity and all of that in that. And this is what we refer to as the art of perception—the art of perception, the flexibility in that and the possibilities of perception that can open up for us with practice.

And this is amazingly the case. Of course, if one isn't practicing this, all this just sounds completely abstract, far-fetched, theoretical, silly metaphysical nonsense. With practice, so much is possible, even for someone who comes at this starting with quite a narrow, let's say, one-dimensional, flatland, materialist view. Just practice. Just allow things. Just be a little flexible. Just play with perception. See what happens. See what happens to the experience. See what happens to the senses of self, other, world. See what happens to the understanding.

So Eros, as I said, left to do its thing, or encouraged to do its thing, supported to do its thing, will spread into every direction, dimension, aspect, facet, draw everything into that soul-making dynamic, so that the Eros itself, as we said, will come to be also regarded as divine. Not just the self, but also the Eros.

And one begins through practice opening up to a sense, moving in and out of a sense that human nature—my human nature, your human nature—reflects and is rooted in divinity, the divine. That we participate in the divinity's eros. My eros participates in the divinity's eros. My awareness participates in the divine awareness. My mind in the divine mind, my soul in the divine soul, my soul-making dynamic in the divine soul-making of Psyche Logos. And not just by virtue of sharing in a universal essence, but also through the particulars. We've touched on this so many times, especially in the last retreat—through the particulars, this is actually feeling the necessity of my particularity, of your particularities, and the particular events and the particularities and uniqueness of your personhood necessary to the divine unfolding, to the divine movement of Eros Psyche Logos, to the divine mind, however we want to say it, the divine soul.

If I don't include all that, and if I don't allow and explore Eros, image and soul-making and all that—if my mindfulness is either without Eros or with a very limited Eros, a limited allowance of what we call Psyche, image and Logos—then such a mindfulness may indeed open up experiences of divinity. But they will also be limited, correspondingly limited and quite predictably limited to certain expected experiences or manifestations. Faces of the divine will come out of a mindfulness that's limited and excludes a lot of Psyche or Logos.

So you get the divinity of this moment, this life, or whatever it is—almost a kind of flatland divinity. Or the divinity as flow, as the process. Or the divinity of oneness, because that can also come out of mindfulness with certain limited Psyche and Logos, as we've talked about already. Or the unfabricated, the divinity of the unfabricated. That's certainly possible if we keep out, at least, the conscious exploration of image and consciously restrict our logos there in relation to soul.

But if we understand fabrication deeply, really deeply, really thoroughly—that whole spectrum of fabrication goes through the unfabricated, so it's beyond the duality of fabricating and unfabricating—we are granted permission to fabricate, if you like. It opens up that possibility. Fabrication is empty. There is no duality, there is no hierarchy there.

But not recognizing, as I said, the play of Eros and not giving it soul-making and fantasy in our lives and not then allowing it and exploring it limits, in quite a narrow track as we described, our experiences and our concepts of divinity. And depending even on how we're picking up our practice and our conception of practice, it might be even limited in terms of how far it goes along that narrow track of what divinity can be. Because certain ways of practicing, as I said, are actually quite unlikely to unfold very far down that track.

But if we acknowledge and we recognize soul-making, as I was saying in the previous talk—we recognize the fact, that fact in our life, the necessity, the inevitability—we explore it, and the Eros Psyche Logos dynamic is allowed to expand and be encouraged, and it's not blocked, then the sense of divinity starts expanding in all kinds of directions. The sense and experience and concept of divinity starts expanding and emerging in all kinds of directions and manifestations.

There's a line, I only know it from gospel music—it's quite a common thing to set to music.

"I'm guessing it comes from a Psalm in the Old Testament: My soul doth magnify the Lord. My soul doth magnify the Lord. Beautiful."

In a way, now understanding the soul-making dynamic—Eros, Psyche, Logos—we can exactly understand, if you like, one possible meaning of that. Yes. Soul, my soul, soul-making doth magnify, doth expand the Divine, the Lord. Yeah? We create and discover, and we create-slash-discover the Lord, the Divine. The soul does that. Why? Because that's what the soul does, and that's what it loves. It loves soul-making.

Now, of course, someone can hear that—yes, it's creating, it's fabricating this divinity. We've already said many times, that whole criticism or objection would be based on this implicit realism. There is something, probably this, that is supposedly not fabricated in someone voicing such an objection. It's always harboring some kind of fundamental realism, even when they say they're not. But we cannot find anything that is not fabricated. There's nothing that is not fabricated. So the objection kind of doesn't really stand. It has no ground.

And we understand through the exploration of emptiness, through the exploration of fabrication, dependent arising, the phenomenological approach—what we're calling our phenomenological approach—that the mind and the way of looking is not separate from perception. Perception is not separate from mind and way of looking.

My soul doth magnify the Lord. The soul is not separate from the Lord. It's not separate from divinity. What we're calling soul, the thing that does soul-making, the process of soul-making, is not separate from the divinity that emerges with it. Understand this. Understand this.

And we go a step further and say that with a deep understanding, a deep—if you like—development of the phenomenological approach and the skill in meditation, the art of meditation, playing with ways of looking, etc., understanding emptiness, understanding dependent origination—one possible way of looking that emerges extremely profound, extremely potent and beautiful is that the mind or awareness or the fabricator, if you like, the mind that fabricates, is not mind. It's anatta. Not only is it unattached, it's empty in itself. It has no inherent existence. It is, in a way, beyond time. It doesn't exist in time. So it's not mine. It's thoroughly empty and it's beyond time.

That mind is operating in me, if you like, in you. That's Buddha nature. That mind, that awareness is Buddha nature. It doesn't belong to me, it's thoroughly empty, and it's beyond time. We could say, in some understandings, what Buddha nature means—in the way I would like to use the word Buddha nature—that's Buddha nature. That's at least one aspect of Buddha nature. Exactly that mind. The divine mind, in other languages. Divine mind. Not mine. Thoroughly empty, and beyond time.

And it's this—we could say in this way of looking, this profound way of looking as one option—it is this Buddha nature and divine mind that fabricates all perceptions. That's what's fabricating that mind. Both physical perceptions and imaginal perceptions and perceptions that combine the two. And those perceptions are empty. And this divine mind is not separate from those perceptions. And that is in us, if you like. That's not quite the right language. We are in it.

We participate in it. That is the root of our mind, the root of our perceptions, the nature of our perception. This is a possible way of looking.

Once one is able to see that awareness is anatta—which is already quite a deep level of emptiness practice—going further and deeper, we discover that mind and awareness is thoroughly empty too, has no inherent existence. And that it is beyond time, not separate from the objects, and those are empty too. So this becomes, with a lot of emptiness practice, as I would conceive it, a possible way of looking.

My soul doth magnify the Lord. God's soul magnifies God. The Buddha nature's soul creates the Buddha nature. Can you get a sense? I know I'm talking about something very deep here, a possibility of a very deep end of practice, but can you even get a sense of the beauty and the potency and the depth and the magic of such a view, of such a way of sensing existence?

The Eros, allowed to do its thing, supported to do its thing, will discover and create divinities—both transcendent and immanent, as we said. Universal, particular, impersonal, personal—actually an infinity, an infinitude of possibilities for the faces of divinity, the experiences of divinity. And they're all available, all potentially available.

Not so much this kind of divinity at the expense of that permanently—a transcendent, unfabricated divinity at the expense of the divinity of immanence, or a divinity that involves no perception, no image, at the expense of the kinds of faces of divinity that come out of the imaginal. Certainly, in the moment of transcending perception and all image and all perception, in that moment of what's called the cessation of perception, at that time it is at the expense of image, sure. But eventually one can just move and have all of this available. This kind of divinity is not at the expense of that kind of divinity permanently. We don't have to choose between these two.

In a way, both the divinity that opens up through the imaginal—the divinities that open up through the imaginal—and divinity of transcendence, in the way that we've been using the term transcendence, the unfabricated, they're both transcendent, but in slightly different ways. So we can talk about two kinds of transcendence.

One is the transcendence of what we've been talking about—the unfabricated. It's beyond concept, beyond attribute, as the Buddha said. It's beyond any perception. It's thoroughly transcendent in every respect.

But there's another kind of transcendence that pertains to the direction of divinity that opens up in the imaginal. And that's the transcendence of the potential space, so to speak, that the eros-psyche-logos dynamic can expand into—the transcendence, or a kind of transcendence, of being infinite, of infinite potentiality. Infinite potentiality of the variety of theophanies, the endless possibilities of soul-making, of psyche, image, therefore perception, and logos, conception of divinity—the endless possibility of creation, discovery.

So this kind of transcendence in this direction is the transcendence of the not yet seen, the not yet sensed, the not yet known.

So here's my beloved other, and I look at them—him, her, it, them—and I see them as either an image or as a multiplicity, as potentially a multiplicity of images. And maybe I'm familiar with this person who has become alive for me as an image, and I can look at them or be with them and sense that kind of simultaneous presence of the different imaginal perceptions of them. And yet still, there is the not yet known that I haven't come to yet. If the eros in relationship to her, him, them is allowed to remain and allowed to grow and do its thing in the soul-making dynamic, there will be other facets, other images. So there's the transcendence of the infinite, of the not yet known, the not yet seen, the not yet sensed.

The eros-psyche-logos dynamic creates that kind of beyond transcendence and actually needs it, as we've said before. It discovers and creates othernesses. And those othernesses remain and are still created and discovered even after a realization of the unfabricated and that other kind of transcendence, if we don't collapse the logos, if we don't put a logos there as a wall, as a limit to the soul-making process.

So as we've said before, and been at pains to really want to stress on this retreat, eros can incline towards the unfabricated transcendent. And eros can also incline to soul-making fabrication, to fabricating in a soul-making way. It can incline towards unfabricating—that whole spectrum we talked about, towards the transcendent and the onenesses and all that. And there's eros in that direction, in relation to that. And there's eros in the direction of fabricating for the sake of soul-making—soul-making fabricating.

But historically, this movement towards transcendence, or the idea of a transcendent God, is so often put in opposition to the movement towards immanence and God-ness being here and manifestation and earth. And so, reading recently, someone—Arthur Lovejoy—believes actually, in a way, a lot of it's... Actually I would say it's just natural to the... Well, once we realize what soul is and what soul does, then it's natural that that would happen. But there's been such a conflict that's been historically common.

He traces it to a kind of double directionality in Plato that he didn't quite fill out. But it's there also in Buddhadharma. In different traditions and streams of the Buddhadharma, you see this inclination one way at the expense of the other. Usually these days it's to the realm of manifestation and objects and this at the expense of that, the transcendent other.

But historically it's been very different. So there's often this opposition between the two inclinations and movements of eros—towards the transcendent and the unfabricating, and towards the soul-making fabricating.

Some traditions, and I would like to think now within Buddhism, and also in other tradition streams—for instance in certain Kabbalistic streams in Jewish mysticism and Hasidism and different traditions—talk about or in different ways just include that double movement, that double movement of the eros. So there's something that goes towards the dissolution, the oneness, into the transcendent, into the unfabricated, and something that brings God, if you like, brings the divine, brings the Buddha nature into manifestation, into the perception of the world and into the embodiment in the world.

A contradiction between these two, I don't think, is necessary. Not at all necessary.

Interestingly, as I said, we don't have to choose one over the other. Interestingly, we could say that each of these two movements has what we might call its near enemy, to use Buddhist language. We talk about the near enemies of the brahmavihāras—the near enemy of mettā is attachment, the near enemy of compassion is pity. So the near enemy of the inclination and eros and movement towards the unfabricated, we could say the near enemy is vibhavatanhā. It's this craving for extinction, for non-being, for disappearance. Turning everything off. As the phrase goes, deep sleep is the poor man's nirvana, the poor man's extinction of perception.

So the near enemy of that movement of eros is craving for non-being, for extinction, disappearance. The near enemy of the soul-making fabrication would be papañca. The near enemy of that movement of eros to soul-making fabrication, to the imaginal creation, would be some kind of combination of what we would call bhavatanhā—identification. It's got a realist basis of self or some object. The reality of self or object is assumed in that kind of grasping at becoming or being this or that—a combination of that and sense desire, when what is perceived in the senses is conceived flatly, one-dimensionally, without the erotic imaginal.

So each has its near enemy. We have vibhavatanhā on one hand and papañca or bhavatanhā and sense desire on the other hand. But we can open up to include, allow and encourage actually this double movement.

We could even say, and we could even see and enter into a mode of conceiving and perceiving, that that very double movement is divine, is the Buddha nature—the very eros towards the unfabricated, the movement towards transcendence, and the movement towards divinizing the world of perceptions, the immanence, the soul-making fabrication. That double movement is divine, is the divinity, is the Buddha nature.

That double movement discovers and creates the divine and the Buddha nature, as we said, but it also embodies the divine and the Buddha nature. So to put it in classical terms—and some of you will know about the distinction between being and becoming —but something here, because of the creativity involved in the soul-making dynamic, in the movement of eros, allows both the being aspect, if you like, the timeless aspect of the divine, and the becoming aspect of divine. God as creative and being created, Buddha nature as both transcendent and timeless, and also becoming in time, created, discovered, manifesting, outpouring in time.

Love doesn't just want to melt into union, into oneness, to dissolve into unity. Love doesn't just want that. God or the Buddha nature doesn't just want you or things to be absorbed into her, his, its essence, whether that essence is conceived timelessly or atemporally. It doesn't just want that.

There's some eros, there's some wanting certainly for that dissolution, that kind of transcendence. But eros, as we said, has this inclination to preserve the otherness, and actually to create more otherness. The idea in some traditions—and again, in Kabbalah and some other traditions—of drawing down the divine influx, so to speak. That's the phrase they use, drawing down the divine influx. Take it metaphorically.

But that drawing down allows a preservation of otherness, of particularities. And particularities that are necessary to the divine. That's part of the drawing down. It's not just making everything into an oceanic oneness. It preserves the necessity of the particularity we've said so many times, even while perceiving an essential oneness. Yes, we know oneness. Yes, it's there. But it doesn't erase in the perception, and certainly doesn't erase or demean in the conception, the necessity of the particularities, the uniqueness, the unique manifestations, the unique expressions of the divinity through you, through me, through this, through that, through this or that perception of self, other, thing, world, action.

So it allows for and encourages the particular theophanies, the particular faces, manifestations, expressions of the divine, of the Buddha nature. If we allow eros, if eros is full and vital, if there is a lot of libido, it brings a lot of liberation—liberation in multiple directions. There's an openness of what liberation means.

If Eros is allowed, and if Eros in relationship to Dharma is allowed—all of this that we've been talking about, and the Dharma is an erotic object for us, a beloved other, if you like—and there can be the soul-making dynamic in relation to the Dharma, then the Eros, Psyche, Logos, and the Dharma, the image, the fantasy, the idea of what the Dharma is, needs to open up. Through allowing Eros, it will need to open up, and as I said, we will at some point need an endless dharma, a dharma that as one of its characteristics is almost axiomatically endless, open-ended, able to morph, to take on different shapes, explore different facets, present different facets for our exploration—a Dharma that can expand.

We touched on some possibilities, I think it was four possibilities for ways that Dharma can be endless in that way. And each of those has many as well, or implies many, an endlessness.

Perhaps some of you with backgrounds in philosophy can see something here and we could have a little fun. You might be able to see how through a kind of phenomenology of Eros or of soul-making we arrive at what a lot of people would call metaphysics. Through the very exploration of Eros and the imaginal, just letting it do its thing, in the natural movement, we arrive at the kinds of concepts and perceptions that are usually labeled metaphysical.

Someone with extensive training in philosophy sent me an email a while ago. She wrote that she had some recent inquiries into her relationship with materiality. She realized this is probably not the most commonly held default position either, but there is usually a mix of wonder and bewilderment, depending on her general mood, that something such as matter even exists at all. "Even philosophically, I do not have a good explanation why in the mutual unfoldment of subject and object and time and space these gross solid forms of measurable matter appear at all. Do you?" she asks.

What she's talking about there—subject and object and time and space—is really getting down in her practice to the most basic conception and perception as one realizes any kind of subject implies any kind of object. The most basic, the most subtle subject—nothing near personality or anything like that, really subtle—just a bare, subtle, refined, perhaps vast awareness or moment of consciousness as a subject, any kind of even very subtle, very refined object of that awareness and a present moment in which it happens.

This is the basic understanding of the mutual dependent arising of those three—subject-object time, this tripod, if you like, at the most basic level of dependent arising. And how out of that the present moment is implied, but the present moment implies not-the-present-moment. It implies past and future. Something, this object, can change, can be other than it is now. All this is implied—I won't explain it now because I've explained it elsewhere before—but this is a basic mutually dependent tripodic structure that we discover when we go deeply into dependent origination.

She's saying, even that, it's like, why should there be measurable matter? Actually, measurement is part of it, because as I said, there's this object in the present in relation to something that it could be other. This implies an other-than-this, and an other-than-this is either in space or time. So time, space, subject and object are kind of woven into each other, mutually implicating, mutually dependent, and measurement is part of that. Things differing, therefore measuring.

But why matter? Why the perception of matter? Often it seems almost unrelated to non-material experiential realities. She has a lot of immaterial experiences as well in her meditations, as if the material is somewhat incidental to some extent. And yet it is a fact of experience one constantly "bumps into," so to say. This position is not necessarily believing in a self being other than materiality, identifying with non-material factors instead. It's rather an acknowledgement of this utter mystery of how different dimensions of being, in fact, overlap and fit together fairly well, most times at least.

Of course, from a different starting point, a non-phenomenological starting point, some people start with the belief in matter and then deduce consciousness and experience from that. There are a lot of problems in that point of view as well. But if we take her phenomenological approach, from what we've been exploring right now, she said, well, what's the explanation for the phenomena of matter, the appearance of matter, of diverse forms of solidity and substantiality, as well as insubstantiality?

From what we've been exploring, I'm just having a bit of fun now, the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic, because of what it does, "explains" it phenomenologically. We would expect diversity of perception, wouldn't we? Just in what it does, it creates, as we've explained so much before, in the perception, in the experience, multifaceted, multidimensional experience.

So that the dimensionality of one aspect, such as substantiality or solidity, will begin to open up. The spectrum of solidity, perceived solidity, will open up, and materiality is one portion of that spectrum of perception.

Why I'm just having a bit of fun here is because historically, metaphysics, as I was saying in the previous talk, explains—is regarded as explaining and deriving from some kind of abstract postulate like the One or God or the Good or whatever—explaining and deriving the many from the one, or diversity or materiality or immaterial levels of existence.

By the way, just in case you get the wrong idea, which people often do with these kinds of things: like the Buddha's teaching of the dependent origination of perceptions of forms, dependent origination of mind, of perception of vedanā, of subject-object time, these metaphysical ideas—if you like, the ideas that come in certain branches of metaphysics—are not kinds of explanations of a temporal process or descriptions of a process of creation unfolding in time. Really they're more, if you like, logical derivations or implications—if you like, the implications of the divine, the logical necessities of what follows from divinity.

So, like the Buddha's teachings of dependent origination, they are not really temporal explanations, explanations of a temporal process. That should be clear as well.

So, for example, if we conceive of the divine as infinite, then, as Sanford Robb explains in a Kabbalistic context, in order for the Ein Sof—which is the, if you like, the most transcendent aspect of the divine; it literally means "that without a limit," the boundless—in order for the infinite to be truly infinite, it must be actual and concrete as well as potential and abstract. You understand? It can't just be transcendent because then it's not infinite. There are other possibilities that it needs to manifest if it's truly infinite. Therefore, its essence as an infinite being necessarily propels it into creating a world. There's a kind of metaphysical explanation there.

Or if we take the divine Buddha-nature or God or whatever as an awareness of—and again, an awareness that's not limited to not knowing itself, so a kind of infinite or unlimited awareness—then that must include, because it's not limited, it must include kind of self-knowing. Actually, even to properly talk about awareness, I think it would include that. Then that self-knowing actually also implies the barest sense or the barest beginnings of a division of subject and object.

As we said before, because of dependent origination, that must involve or include a sense of time and a present moment. This is the most basic sort of structure of conception and perception: barest subject, the barest object, and the barest sense of the present moment. And already involved, already implied in that, because of dependent origination, already implied there is actually an infinity of the not-yet, of becoming, of the generation of otherness. Just in saying that the divine is infinite awareness. It implies this not-yet, this generation of otherness and the et cetera.

Or, again, playing with the metaphysical way around of doing it, so to speak, top-down: if you say the divine is love—"God is love," as you might have heard, or Buddha-nature is love, or whatever—well, love needs a beloved. I need a lover and a beloved. Again, there's this duality, or at least polarity there. It needs an erotic object, an other. It won't collapse that duality of beloved, lover. It needs to preserve the otherness, the erotic tension there. And if we say the divine, the Buddha-nature, is infinite love, then one could say, from a metaphysical sort of direction, then it needs infinite objects of love. And infinite love needs infinite objects of love, and so there is diversity.

Or again, we could bring in our understanding of how the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic works, and it works for the divine. Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic: when there's divine eros, when there's the eros of the Buddha-nature, it will unfold multiplicity, multidimensionality, et cetera, as we've been exploring on the whole retreat.

So, a phenomenology—if you like, an exploration through observation of our own appearance, and through playing of our own appearances of what appears to us—a phenomenology of Eros or soul-making, and the imaginal, which means practicing with it, which means really exploring in practice. Otherwise this is just going to sound—all this is—and if you've just landed into this talk without having listened to all the pre-requisites and the talks that came before, this is going to sound completely and utterly abstract, I imagine.

But a phenomenology in practice of Eros soul-making and the imaginal means, as we said, that we start experiencing the divine in the dimensions of the erotic imaginal. Yes? We start to experience, as we said, "My eros is divine." We start to experience your participation in the divine eros. That my eros is the divine eros. And that the soul is divine, or the soul echoes, or mirrors, or participates in the divinity, in the Buddha-nature.

So these are metaphysical assertions, and they sound like metaphysical assertions. They're also spiritual intuitions. And even more, what I'd like to emphasize is they are phenomenal, phenomenological inevitabilities. In other words, this is exactly the kind of experience that will unfold for us inevitably if we allow the soul-making process—exactly those kind of what sounds like metaphysical assertions, because of the Psyche-Logos dynamic and everything we've explained about that, and with the infinite potential of the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic and endless possibilities and expansion of that, the necessity of discovering, creating otherness, and all that we've explained about that.

What we arrive at then, putting all this together, is something equivalent to the metaphysical explanations, but approached backwards—starting from our appearances, starting from our experience, starting from phenomenology, expanding into a sense of divinity, and then discovering what our eros and what our soul truly is. Through this phenomenological approach, these seemingly opposite explanations actually become almost equivalent or interchangeable.

To say it succinctly: when we recognize the presence of eros in our life and soul-making, when we start to recognize its necessity and inevitability, when we allow it and explore it—giving a place to eros, paying attention to what it does and its movement, what it does in the psyche, what it does in perception—then we notice something like this eros-psyche-logos dynamic interplay, this mutual insemination, mutual expansion, widening, enriching, deepening.

We notice that this whole soul-making process, ignited by eros and driven by eros, creates and discovers—creates slash discovers—different facets, dimensions, perceptions of different experiences. It creates and discovers more in relation to whatever it comes into contact with, and it will draw more and more into that experiential vortex, into that creation-discovery, into that revelation. Every possibility starts to be opened up gradually over time—every possibility of perception, of experience, of conception, of facets, of dimensions of a thing, of a perception.

If there's a spectrum of possibilities, the whole spectrum gets filled out. If there's a range, the whole range unfolds. If there's a corner or direction that isn't yet involved in that soul-making transformation, then that corner will start to be filled and involved. One part of that process, included in all this, is the sense of dimensionality. And part of the sense of dimensionality, along with other aspects, is the sense of divinity.

One of the aspects whose divinity is eventually seen is eros itself. So the sense and the concept and the perception that my eros is the eros of divinity—is divinity's eros, is God's eros, is the Buddha's eros, is the eros of Buddha-nature—becomes one of the available senses, one of the available perceptions of eros.

From a phenomenological point of view, one says: my eros is creating and discovering all these aspects, facets, this whole range of perception—including, for instance, the perception of solidity, materiality, forms. My eros is creating, opening, revealing all those dimensions because of the soul-making process. But because one also has the experience in this unfolding—the experience and sense that one's eros is divinity's eros, is Buddha-nature's eros—one could just as well arrive at, from this same phenomenological perspective, the equivalent statement that divinity's eros is creating and discovering all these facets, all these dimensions, all these experiences, all these concepts, including the sense of solidity, substantiality, materiality, as well as immateriality.

So from the phenomenological perspective, we have arrived at something pretty equivalent to the seemingly abstract, top-down statement of metaphysics: that divine eros, or divine soul, or divine mind, or divine awareness creates and discovers all these facets, all these dimensions, all these experiences for us—materiality and everything else. We've arrived at something that sounds equivalent to the metaphysical explanation, but we've arrived at it starting from phenomena, from phenomenology, starting from just our experience, from what appears to us, observing that and letting that lead us, letting that grow.

Through and in our own experience, our own unfolding, we have come to the same realization that we might read if we picked up some ancient metaphysical text. But because it's through our experience and from our experience—because we're living it in our perception, through our perception—it does not feel abstract. We feel, we sense, by virtue of the way we're arriving at it, that we're participating in this. It's real, it's tangible, it's palpable. It has an effect on the being, and it's happening through us. We're participating in this divine eros, in this beauty, in this magnificence, in this wonder. Not abstract at all. And yet it's the same realization, the same insight that we can articulate. We've just arrived at it from a different direction.

That's why I said—and I'm not sure it's the best metaphor, but I can't think of another one right now—that the usual metaphysical way of going about things is kind of putting the cart before the horse. That which can pull us more convincingly, and more in a way that really makes a difference to our life, is not that we're excluding conception, but that more than conception is the phenomenology—the experience, the exploration, the recognition, the making of delineations, the allowing, the encouraging, the supporting, the inquiry, the investigation in practice.

Again, I'm not really attempting to explain the existence of matter. I don't see a necessity to explain it. What may be better than explaining is exploration—exploration of these things, of experience. What happens when we recognize the necessity of soul-making and we don't take these things as rigid truths, but hold them within a conceptual framework that can accommodate these experiences without regarding them as absolute? There's a whole different kind of metaphysics, or direction into metaphysics, there.

So eros—allowed, unblocked, unfettered, unhindered. The psyche, the logos—allowed, unblocked. That whole complex, the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, is allowed. There's the perception of divinity, and it will, if it's allowed, start to include that double directionality—the double movement towards the transcendent and towards the immanent. The multiple faces and multiple experiences and concepts of divinity will emerge from that. Included in that is the sense of the divinity of eros itself.

All of this could be a kind of explanation as well for the ascent of eros historically within culture and within religious traditions—within both secular and religious cultures. There was, at a certain point in history, this dominance of the transcendent thrust at the expense of—well, at the expense of the constraining of eros. Certainly a constraining of sexual eros and how it was regarded, and the movement towards asceticism at the time of the Buddha, in the Abrahamic religions. And then this historical ascent of eros that can be viewed as a kind of cultural movement of soul-making.

In the Kabbalah, which comes many centuries after the Old Testament, the highest Sefirah—which is like an aspect of God; there are ten Sefirot in the Kabbalah, aspects of the Divine—the highest one is called Keter, meaning "crown." It's higher than the other ones, for example Chochmah and Binah, which translate as wisdom or conception and understanding. This highest one, Keter, has a double meaning: it can mean both Ayin, which is nothingness, but it can also mean will or desire. So the very highest aspect of the divine—again, I'm speaking about the ascent of eros historically—the very highest aspect is desire: the eros of the divine.

In this whole conception of what divinity is and what aspects of divinity are, if you like, the highest - desire is right up there. It's sometimes equated with the transcendent nothingness, the I am. And we've also seen how the sefirot, or faces, or aspects of God are portrayed, or symbolized, or given in the image - they are engaged in sexual union. The different aspects of the divine, of the manifestations of the divine, are portrayed as being in sexual union, or needing to be put back into a sexual embrace, sexual relationship, into lovemaking. That is an image which means that symbol, that image in our language, has many dimensions, many levels of what it symbolizes and resonates. It is basically an image in our language.

So the highest aspect of the divine has the meaning of desire. There's this portrayal of different aspects of the divine being in erotic embrace, needing to be reinstated and resupported to enter into erotic embrace with each other. And there are ways of conceiving, of living and seeing our lives - not just our meditation, our prayer, our ways of looking, but also the embodiment and the action, and if we extend that, including our sexuality, our lovemaking. Seeing, sensing, conceiving our lives as serving and participating in the eros, in the love-making, in the sexual love-making - we could say in the sexual soul-making, the erotic soul-making, not just love-making, but soul-making - between the transcendent divine and the world.

So our lives are implicated in that. Our actions are, our perceptions, our meditative trainings and openings, serving and participating in the eros, the erotic soul-making, the sexual love-making between the transcendent divine and the world, between the divine that's transcendent and the divine that's, so to speak, in and through the world - two faces of the divine. Our lives are involved and implicated in that. We can see that way, we can feel that way, we can think that way, we can live that way.

And again, as we've touched on in the Buddhist tantric traditions, in the Vajrayana, there's the symbol of Yab Yum - it's everywhere. The Buddha, this Buddha or that Buddha, in erotic embrace with his consort. But actually the whole thing is the Buddha. The Buddha is the couple in erotic embrace. And again, there's many levels of implication and symbology there. But it includes something about, as we've touched on before, the eros between, if you like, the transcendently divine mind, the jñāna, or the Buddha nature - at least one aspect of that - on the one hand, and the mandala, which means the appearances, the divine appearances, on the other hand.

So there's this ascent and movement historically. There's this ascent of Eros, the ways we think about it, and its movement towards being placed really centrally in the symbology of the path, in the thinking of the path.

We have been on this retreat thinking, conceiving, thinking and conceiving of eros - which I shouldn't need to say at this point, but eros implies for us soul-making in the imaginal - we've been thinking and conceiving of eros as basic. We just conceive of that as something really basic. But even this - we're playing, we're playing.

Hegel said: A so-called basic proposition or principle of philosophy, if true, is also false. So we're playing with the idea of eros as basic. But eros is not basic. It's not fundamental. It's a dependent origination. It's empty. And you can see in your life how much of a dependent origination eros is. There is actually nothing that is basic. There's nothing that is basically true. So it's the understanding of emptiness, thorough emptiness. There's nothing that's basic, there's nothing that's basically true.

We've been playing with the idea of Eros as something basic, of soul as something basic, even as the divinity of Eros, and the divine Eros as something basic. We've been playing with that. Why? Because it's soul-making, because it's fertile. So that even if we know that there is nothing that's basically true, we know that Eros is not basic, fundamental, we can still say that...

William Blake wrote: Eternity - by which he doesn't mean an infinite stretch, like a really, really, really long time - Eternity, that which is timeless - Eternity is in love with the productions of time. That eros. And we could read that: the eternal, the timeless, the Buddha nature, the divine mind, the divine soul, which is ours in our depths - our minds, our souls are rooted in that, are that. You could say we participate in this Buddha nature, divine mind, divine soul. That eternity is in love with the productions of time.

Talking about the eros again, between that timeless transcendent and the world, the appearances, the productions of time - perception, experience, appearance. And we participate in that eros, in that love. We are that.

The world is that. Eternity is in love with the productions of time. We're not separate from that love. We're not separate from that eros. We're in it. It's in us. It's through us. It's poetry. Seeing that way is poetry, is writing a poetry in our perception.

It does something, it does something to the being, to the experience. Soul-making.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 88

The Problem of Desire

Rob Burbea · 58 min

> In this opening talk from the retreat "Of Hermits and Lovers: The Alchemy of Desire," Rob Burbea addresses the cognitive dissonance many Buddhist practitioners experience regarding desire. He critiques oversimplified teachings that view all desire as problematic, examining how contemporary culture and economic systems complicate our relationship with wanting. Burbea introduces a crucial threefold distinction between craving (unskillful desire that contracts being), clinging (the full range of grasping from gross attachment to subtle reification), and eros (desire for deeper contact, intimacy, and knowing that supports soul-making). He explores how different types of desire lead to different outcomes, emphasizing that while developing skill in releasing craving is important, there exists a sacred dimension of desire—eros—that opens dimensions of existence beyond ordinary experience. This eros, intrinsically connected to the imaginal and soul-making, offers a path toward expanded senses of sacredness and meaning. Burbea challenges practitioners to move beyond the limiting goal of eliminating all desire, instead developing discernment to navigate skillfully between different qualities of wanting in service of awakening and the sacred.

The principal themes for our retreat are desire and soul making, as well as the connection and relationship between desire and soul making. These are themes that by their very nature are inexhaustible, endlessly profound. A lifetime of exploring these themes will not exhaust them. But let's at least try to find a way in and offer some introduction to these themes.

If you're the kind of person that's put yourself in the position to listen to this kind of talk, it's probably obvious to you—you'd probably agree—that looking at our wider culture, the wider Western culture, actually the wider globalized culture now, the world would probably profit from some more investigation, some more discernment, some more wisdom regarding desire. That's a theme you've probably heard many times in Dharma talks and other spiritual teachings.

In a way, actually, we can look at the history of our culture and see that, with regard to desire, there actually have been quite some liberations over several hundred years. But also some more entanglement and more complication with regard to desire. Part of it is due to things like the kind of economic thinking that underpins our societies and politics that absolutely insists on a growth economy. So it therefore insists on propelling and injecting, pumping life into consumerism. Part of it's dependent on that. Part of it's also our modern sense of self—our modernist sense of self is, if you like, based on the exercise of choice and the propping up and the inflation of certain kinds of identities that come through the exercise of choice and consumerism. So all these are complicated factors. There are reasons that give us a whole extra dimension of problem with desire related to all this economy, globalization, and the modern sense of self.

What I want to go into right now is the kinds of problems that we might have and confusions that we might have as Buddhist practitioners or people who are interested in Buddhism or similar kinds of spiritual teachings. In a way, again I'm sure you'd agree with this, we have a set of teachings and practices that actually help us a lot in regard to desire and a lot of the entanglements in desire. But at the same time, we can also be prey to a kind of cognitive dissonance with regard to desire. This is understandable, I think, and it's difficult. It's not easy. So it's not something to judge, just to become aware of. This is what I want to go into as a way of opening our topic up and setting a stage.

Because sometimes as Buddhist practitioners, spiritual practitioners, we can be prey to an oversimplification in our thinking of and conceiving of and relating to desire. Either that, or we are subject to contradictory messages, teachings that are mutually contradictory, that contradict each other, so that we end up confused with regards to desire, to clinging, to craving, attachment, and also with regards to where we're moving in the whole path, what awakening or enlightenment is, and what that does to or with desire, clinging, craving, attachment. So there can be quite some confusion. Sometimes we're not even that conscious that we are confused and that we are harboring a cognitive dissonance, prey to different and conflicting messages.

Sometimes, for example, as I said, we oversimplify. And so we just say, "Desire is a problem because it brings suffering. Desire leads to suffering." And awakening, enlightenment, is imagined or conceived of as some state where there's the absence of desire. One has no desires. And so desire leads to suffering—it's a problem. At awakening, there won't be any desire. So that's the ideal of awakening. Very, very simplistic. What comes out of such a teaching? What comes out of such an interpretation of the teaching? What comes out of such a view? How does it translate into our life? Is it even coherent? Does it make sense? Does it work?

It can be very oversimplified like that in some instances, or a little bit more sophisticated, taking up the teachings and the differentiation that the Buddha made originally between, for instance, wholesome desires. He sometimes made this distinction between wholesome desires, kusala, or skillful desires on the one hand. So, for example, the desire for awakening is a skillful, wholesome desire. And the desire to cultivate, develop, possess path factors—factors that move us along the path: samadhi, mindfulness, compassion, factors of enlightenment that move us towards the end of suffering or the decrease of suffering or the end of craving and desire. This desire for path factors—these are wholesome desires.

Unwholesome desires, akusala, unskillful, would be desires for sense pleasure, or desires to avoid unpleasant senses, unpleasant sense contact, desires—the desire to shore up or solidify or boost the sense of self or the ego. These are regarded as akusala. So that in that kind of distinction-making, in those delineations, then the desire, for example, for jhana, to open to and explore deep states of meditative absorption, is regarded as a wholesome desire.

The desire for the pleasant taste or comfort we might get from chocolate chip cookies is regarded as an unwholesome desire.

So there's a certain sophistication and clarity in this framework. Yet nowadays, many of us—and this is very understandable, as this is not an easy area—have become quite confused about all this. Not always, not everyone, not in every respect, but there can be considerable confusion.

We often think, "I should let go of my desire for jhana. That would be a kindness to myself, to let go of this grasping, this striving." If we tell ourselves, on the other hand, "I won't have that chocolate chip cookie," this is sometimes regarded as an unkindness to ourselves. We've got it exactly backwards from what the Buddha might have said 2,500 years ago.

We struggle with the self's movement in time toward what it wants. We might use words like "aspiration," but we quickly encounter contradictory teachings about becoming—and becoming is not something to be attached to. Becoming is ego, so this movement of the self through time is regarded as ego movement. These teachings don't add up coherently.

This becomes even more pronounced in the realm of romantic and sexual desires, longings, and relationships. It should be obvious to anyone over the age of fourteen that sexuality and romance do not bring the end of suffering. They don't usually even decrease suffering. Yet somehow, in our mishmash of teachings, we recognize that for most people, sexual relationships and romantic relationships—that desire—is important. So it's kind of okay somehow, but we say, "It's okay, but don't be attached." Does this even make sense? Does it work?

"Have that, because for some reason—I'm not quite sure why—it seems important to us, but don't get attached," whatever that means. What does that look like?

Or again, in relation to the world and the senses—sense experience, beauty—we might say, "Oh, enjoy it. It's okay to enjoy it. Just don't get attached." What does that mean? "Let it come, let it go"—this almost oversimplistic teaching. "Let everything come and let it go. Be in the moment. Be with what is. Open to the flow."

What does it look like to try to live life this way? Is it really a complete enough teaching? Is it an accurate teaching for what moves us, what we are moved by, how we live? Is it an honest teaching? If I am telling you to live this way, am I really living this way in regard to all this? Who lives this way? How can I have integrity in relation to such teachings? Are these teachings even enabling me to live with integrity with respect to them? Because they don't form an integral, coherent unit.

Perhaps there's something too simplistic in our interpretation, our understanding, our approach. There's not enough sophistication in the psychology. It's not adequate to our needs.

What gets served by this kind of oversimplification or contradictory teachings? What gets served, and what does not get served? Is there a way to serve what we most want and need to be served somehow in our understanding of all this? Is there a way to approach this that really makes sense in the deepest, fullest way to our whole being—a coherent understanding that opens us?

From a certain perspective, if we take that understanding that awakening or enlightenment is the end of suffering, and we reduce it in a kind of thin and brittle, reductionist way to really emphasize that awakening is the end of suffering, then actually you could say that even the desire for awakening is really essentially the desire for the end of suffering. If that's really what's moving us, then the desire for awakening from this limited point of view—this limited conception—is really just a desire for a radical decrease in our unpleasantness.

and unpleasant sensations. You can look at this a few ways. If you say, well, suffering is the second arrow—if you know that teaching of the Buddha's—it's just the second arrow, but still a kind of unpleasantness. It's the unpleasantness of the second arrow. So by removing that second arrow at full awakening, in a certain system of what awakening means, then I've drastically reduced unpleasantness.

Or if my vision of awakening is not to be reborn, that means really the end of both pleasant and unpleasant sensation, the end of vedanā, the end of perception, the end of experience. So is that how we're going to conceive of what is moving us if we desire awakening? That we're desiring this radical decrease in the unpleasantness? Because conceiving it that way, this is what's moving, this is the desire there.

That's different than—it's not conceiving it as a desire for awakening, as the desire to know and to open to true nature. The true nature of oneself, the true nature of all things. It's not then being conceived as a desire for truth, a desire to open to and know the Buddha nature, to live the Buddha nature, and know that one lives the Buddha nature, to know, to open to the divine, or God, if you're okay with that language.

Some people say, "No, that kind of desire is just a desire for consolation. All this talk about Buddha nature and God and divinity, it's just consolation. That's what you're after, really, is it?" Really, let's look into the psychology, our psychology and what moves us here.

And if the desire for awakening is conceived too narrowly, this desire really essentially for a reduction or an end of unpleasantness, then it's not being conceived as a desire for beauty, to open to, to know, to live in beauty. It's not a desire for mystery.

So what about the desires of a mystic? Is that what a mystic wants? Just the decrease of unpleasantness? And is our desire, deep desire for beauty, or desire for deep beauty, is that just a desire for pleasant sensations?

What of our love of the world? What of our sensuality? What of our love and desire for that which is beyond the world? Beyond the senses? Beyond experience? The transcendent? The unfabricated? What about that desire? Is that really just about eradicating or drastically reducing unpleasantness?

What about our desire for art? To make art? To participate in art, to receive art? What about our desire for scientific knowledge and discovery? Is all that, are all those kind of desires, are they really just delusion? One could look at it that way, and I think some people do sometimes. Is science, for example, only for the purpose of—only non-delusion or not a waste of time when it's for the purpose of reducing suffering? For example, in medical research or in development of technology that makes our life safer or more comfortable or whatever.

Is romantic desire, sexual desire, is that delusion only? Is it only delusion? I mean, certainly delusion can come into all of these movements of desire, but is it only delusion? Is it only the seeking of pleasant sensations? Is it only an expression of love, meaning care, meaning mettā, really? Or a kind of search for security of the self, or a pumping up of the ego in some way, being reassured that one's attractive or desirable or lovable or whatever it is, or some kind of combination of all? Does that kind of combination of all those things, does that sum up the movement of desire in romantic desire and sexual desire?

Or is there something else too there, beyond all of those? More than, alongside even, something that's vital to our being and to our sense of existence, something vital to our psyche.

So we have—I don't think we have really a Dharma language yet, or a Dharma psychology that has words for the kind of desire that is not a desire for an increase in pleasantness, or a decrease in unpleasantness, or a decrease in suffering. The kind of desire that's not just to solidify the self somehow. We don't have a word for that kind of desire that actually is for the sake of, and leading to, and supporting, and involving soul-making.

And so, we don't have a psychology that really has a word for that. So we want to use the word eros, E-R-O-S. It's a word that's familiar. Different people define it a different way, have different kinds of associations with it. I'll come back to it in a few minutes. We want to define it in a very particular way.

Eros as a movement of desire, a kind of desire that involves, supports, opens, stimulates, and is for the sake of soul-making.

Just as in the realm of imagination we made distinctions, so too with desire we can discern different qualities and movements. In imagination, we spoke of what's imaginary—papañca, getting lost in fictions that entangle us and serve no purpose, mere delusion. We distinguished this from what we might call skillful use of imagination, helpful imagination that is creative: planning to build a retreat center, organizing a shopping list, preparing a lecture. One uses imagination in a creative, constructive way.

And then there's a third category we've been calling imaginal—something that doesn't equate to those other two, something else entirely. We need this other word to draw attention to something unique.

Similarly with respect to desire, I would like to distinguish three kinds: craving, clinging, and eros. We will be using these words differently than you've probably heard before. These are our definitions—not claiming they are the right definitions that everyone should adopt, nor necessarily the historical definitions. I simply want to make a clear delineation between three kinds of desire.

What emerges from making this delineation is recognizing that these desires each unfold differently. They each bring us to different places, lead in different directions, have different effects. Our task becomes partly to discern between these three. Can we recognize what's craving and what's eros? Can we navigate between them when possible? Can we transform one into another? Can we recognize clearly what unfolds from each and how, using them appropriately as needed?

Yes, absolutely, part of our path involves developing our skill and capacity to let go of craving—by which I mean the kind of contraction of being around something that does not ease suffering. It contracts the being, does not lead to soul-making. It's a movement intent on either seeking pleasure, decreasing unpleasantness, or solidifying the self somehow, yet actually gives us little. It does not open the being or expand our sense of existence—rather the opposite.

So yes, absolutely, one strand of our path is developing our ability and skill to let go, to drop craving when it arises, or to transform it when possible into something more skillful. For example, with those cookies or that chocolate cake—do I need it? What will it give me? If it's just pleasure or comfort I'm seeking, or that holiday where I imagine two weeks of pleasant sensations and release from unpleasant ones—can I recognize these movements? Do I have the ability, the know-how, the skill to let go?

Or when desires are actually not so much seeking pleasure but are movements of trying to avoid unpleasantness—running away from something, being driven by fear of facing something within ourselves, some difficult emotion. It might emerge as reaching toward that cake, but it's not actually the cake I'm after. I'm seeking something to shield me, numb me from something else.

All this recognition, this noticing and developing skill at letting go, dropping, transforming—this is really important. But the Dharma is much, much more than that. The possibilities of our being, the possibilities of our existence go way beyond just the dropping and letting go of craving in that repetitive, endless movement through life where it arises again and I drop it, it arises again and I drop it.

trying to drop craving and live without craving, and then sometimes just giving into it and then dropping it again, etc. And kind of reaching some kind of status quo that's sort of okay with that. There's so much more beauty, depth, possibility, wonder, magic waiting for us beyond that. Important, but so much more is possible.

So the second kind of desire is what I would want to call clinging. And again, these are not standard usage of these words. I just can't think of other words right now. I just want to make something clear.

So, clinging—by which I mean any pulling towards us at any level of being, even if it's just the subtlest movement of mind to pull something towards us or push it away or pull ourselves towards something, or any pull or push towards an object or an anticipated object or whatever. And there's a huge range of that push-pull, of what we call clinging.

So the most gross—literally clinging to someone who we don't want to leave us, for example, at one end, at the most gross end—and at the most subtle end, even just the momentary clinging perceiving of anything, the momentary experience of anything in the attention. Attention works by actually, if you like, grasping around the object that it's attending to. Even just for a moment, that's a very subtle form of clinging. And even just the sense or the belief, not even conscious, that the thing that I'm paying attention to has an inherent existence independent of the way I'm looking at it, independent of the mind's way of looking. That belief, which is usually not even a conscious belief, that belief is fundamental avijja in the Dharma tradition. It's fundamental delusion and ignorance. And that constitutes a very subtle form of clinging. This reification, this grasping at as real, is, if you like, the most subtle level of what we call clinging.

So there's this huge range of this push-pull. And what one can do in practice is develop different ways of looking, a whole host of ways of looking that one can play with, enter into, move in and out of, and explore their effects on the whole world of perception. And different ways of looking let go of different degrees of clinging, different kinds of clinging, so that one plays moving up and down this range of how much clinging there is in the consciousness, so to speak, at any time.

And one learns from that—apart from the sheer delight of that play—one learns from that that perception, all perception of self, of object, of world, of space and time is dependent on clinging. To the degree that there is clinging, these objects appear and they appear solid and separate, etc. To the degree that I let go of clinging, that whole world of objects, selves, the world and space and time, all the rest of it fades.

So we understand, we begin to understand through this play in meditation with ways of looking, developing that art, we understand the fabricated nature, we understand the fabricating of perception and the fading, the dependent fading of all perception, all perception. So we understand the dependent origination and the dependent fading of all things, and we recognize, we come to understand gradually the radical emptiness of absolutely everything, all things, not just self, but every object, inner or outer element, or whatever aspect of experience, the whole world, space, time.

And in that, there's a possibility of opening to the unfabricated. It develops this art of letting go, of clinging more and more subtle, more and more deep, and there's an opening of the being to the unfabricated, what is not fabricated. And not that one lives in such a state, but one emerges from that with that understanding of emptiness, of going up and down, exploring dependent origination, and it opens up radically the whole sense of existence. Beautiful, precious possibility to know that in life and live with that knowing.

Living with that knowing, living with that opened up sense of existence is not to live without clinging. One actually comes to the insight and recognizes through this whole play with ways of looking, understanding dependent origination, etc. One recognizes a few things that mean that one would never regard it as a goal to live without clinging.

One realizes, first of all, that it's impossible. Clinging is involved, subtle clinging is involved in any perception, any experience whatsoever. So I cannot live without clinging. Even just to pay attention to anything at all is to cling. It's impossible to live without clinging.

Would I want to anyway? Do I not, when I love my family, when I have friendships that are important to me, or I'm with a lover, or in a romantic relationship—these kinds of relationships, the way we understand them these days, the way they are beautiful and meaningful to us these days, they actually involve clinging and attachment. We are not trying to live with some kind of monastic ideal like that or hermit ideal like that in society. And it's not that having that attachment is some kind of second best in terms of awakening.

This understanding of emptiness actually, as I said, opens up the whole sense of existence and liberates ways of looking. So existence becomes the art of ways of looking, the flexibility of ways of looking, the play of ways of looking. We realize, too, that clinging itself is empty. Through all this thorough, radical, deep investigation into dependent origination, we realize that clinging, too, is empty.

And then there is freedom there, freedom to look in different ways, freedom to relate in different ways, including clinging. So we can move in and out of different kinds of clinging. There's freedom there, not trying to live without clinging. Because if I do try and live without clinging, that's impossible, and what would it mean anyway, and would we want to?

But one of the most essential things I want to highlight right now is this: if I'm trying to do that, if I'm oversimplifying, if I'm trying to live without clinging, I will actually miss eros and soul-making. There's a good chance that I will miss eros and soul-making, the soul-making that goes with eros.

We're free, rather, to move and to explore and see what comes from what. So there's craving, there's clinging, and there's eros. And eros, as I said, is intrinsically bound up and intricately bound up with soul-making, the whole movement and dynamic of soul-making. Catherine's going to talk more about soul-making shortly, but let me take a little time right now to define what we mean by eros.

I'll offer two levels of definition. Right now I'll give what we call the small definition of eros, and we'll explain more later how this is bound up with soul-making—and it's really important to understand how.

As a small definition of eros, what is this word and how can we begin to understand it? Eros is a desire, it's a wanting. Eros is the wanting of more contact with, more connection with, more intimacy with, more knowing of, more penetration of, more opening to an erotic object or a beloved other.

Let me say that again, because I'm using these words in a really full way with all the range of their implication. We'll come back to this, and why that's actually intrinsic to the definition you'll see. But just for right now, this small definition of eros is very important: Eros is a desire, a wanting for more contact with, more connection with, more intimacy with, more knowing of, more penetration of, and more opening to an object, an erotic object, let's call it, or a beloved other.

Now, you might not recognize your experience of eros in that, and it actually sounds perhaps quite dry as a definition. It's quite humble, if you like, as a definition. But there's tremendous power. I hope by the end of the retreat, at least, you're going to see just how powerful that definition is, how much emerges from it, how much it implies and sets in motion and implicates.

So can you remember that small definition for now? Eros is the wanting of more contact, more connection with, more intimacy with, more knowing of, more penetration of, more opening to an erotic object, a beloved other.

Eros, you'll notice in that definition, is certainly not just sexual attraction or sexual energy. It includes that—you can hear that in those words—but it's more than that. It includes sexual attraction, sexual energy, but it's much, much more than that.

We're also not equating eros, in our definition, with Freud's usage of eros as the pleasure principle, essentially just the seeking of pleasant sensations by the organism. Yes, pleasure is involved, but it's more than that. Our definition will actually include that, but be broader than that. That's not the principal movement. That's not the principal principle.

I think later in his theorizing, Freud equated eros with the life instinct in contradistinction to thanatos, which is the death instinct. So there's a relationship between our definition of eros and that life force, but we're not equating them.

Notice also that we're not equating eros with love. Some people just say eros just means love, and that's fine. How other people define it is completely fine. I'm not arguing with anyone. I'm just saying we're going to use it in a very particular way.

Neither—and this is subtle but really important—neither are we equating it with the way the Neoplatonists characterized eros as a movement or force for unification, towards a unifying movement towards oneness. Again, there's a real relationship there between that movement and what we're calling eros, but absolutely not—we'll say more about this—we are not reducing eros to that at all.

There was a Scottish psychoanalyst active in the twentieth century called Douglas Fairbairn. He belonged to the British Object Relations School, if you're familiar with that. He defined libido as the wanting contact or wanting connection with an other. So you can hear the similarities there between what he calls libido and what we're calling eros, but there are still really important distinctions between how we're using it and what he described and what he was pointing to, and we'll come back to that.

So notice a couple of other things about this definition of eros, or what we mean just for now. One is that it has a huge range.

Eros really encompasses a huge range. It certainly includes the most intense sexual desire. Absolutely, it includes that. Voracious desire, fierce desire, sexually or whatever. Absolutely, it includes that. And in the realm of the imaginal, when the sexual eros is very strong and intense, sometimes it can open up the image or cast an image or vivify an imaginal scene that involves images that wouldn't actually be possible physically, sexually, because the anatomy just doesn't work that way. Something that's beyond what's physically possible just because the eros and the soul, if you like, is demanding it and needs it for the soul-making. Or it might involve things that you would never, even if they were possible, actually do.

So there's a whole range there, from very, very intense, down to really quite subtle movements of eros that are just kind of pregnant there in the subtle attraction, for instance, between two people or with an image or with something in the world, the subtle delight or magic or magnetism that can be there in the beauty of certain connections in that subtle attraction. The subtle opening and magic that can be there in the contact with an object. And that object can be anything and that subtlety can be really, really very subtle.

So for example, it could be with—I'm looking at a cherry blossom, the cherry blossom on the tree. And there's that beauty there. And I'm present there just with this some kind of subtle magic in the perceiving, in my opening to, in the way my gaze and my being, actually my whole body, penetrates and opens to that vision in this case. And maybe I just want it to continue. I want to continue in that subtle magic. I want to linger there.

So the point is there's a huge range, huge, huge range of eros in terms of intensity and subtlety.

And a little bit implied by what I just said, eros can be in regard to anything at all. There can be an erotic connection, an erotic regard, an erotic relationship with anything at all. Any experience or any element of experience—an external object, an internal object, an intra-psychic image, a perception in the world, of the world, anything, any object, even an idea, an emotion, even a suffering, a dukkha, a sense of divinity. All of this is possible to have an erotic connection with. Eros can be there with regard and in relationship with anything at all.

So we're going to fill out later as we go on just what the relationship is between that wanting more contact, connection, intimacy, knowing, penetration, opening, et cetera, and soul-making. We're really going to explore that and fill it out. But for now, I just want to point out that eros, what it does in a nutshell is it opens up and stimulates an opening of dimensions and facets of existence, of the beloved, of the erotic object. It opens up dimensions and facets beyond what we already know and experience. That's what eros moves towards, that's what it instigates.

That involves—that can involve, most of the time it does involve the imaginal. So in this opening up of dimensions and facets beyond what we already know and experience, it involves the imaginal. There's also a way it can work by the quieting of the imaginal and the quieting, the unfabricating of perception. But for this retreat, we're emphasizing mostly the way that eros involves soul-making and the imaginal.

Now, eros is already in our life. I'm not talking about something that doesn't exist for you, that you have to kind of have this experience that you've never had before. Same with soul-making, in fact. What we want to do is get familiar with it and draw it out by defining it in a way that will enable us to investigate it, to explore it and see what it does, what it opens up, where it takes us, where it takes the being and the sense of existence and how it does that. Also to understand how it does that.

I mean, I've said already, it takes us, it opens up soul-making. Part of soul-making is it opens up, it expands and enriches, widens and deepens our senses of sacredness. To me, that's an inevitable and intrinsic part of soul-making. It's what soul-making does. And one of, for me, the most important aspects, tasks, if you like, results of soul-making.

Eros also, in its movement, in the soul-making movement, will also make possible for us a view of eros itself and desire as sacred. That view becomes possible as something we can enter into, play with, entertain.

So why are we bothering making this delineation of eros? Because, as I said, it's part of our life already, just as soul-making is. Where there is love, where we really love something, where we're devoted to something, where there's meaningfulness to us, there, there, there, there is soul-making for us, and there, there is eros. So we're talking about something that's already in our life that we would do well to understand more.

So an implication from what I just said—it's there when we love the path. And so we have, in other words, an erotic, or we can have an erotic relationship with the path. An erotic relationship with the sense of where the path is heading—to awakening, enlightenment, whatever word you like. And understanding that as a potentially erotic relationship has all kinds of implications. All kinds of implications that we often don't realize.

Far-reaching, profound, radical implications. We'll go into this.

Eros, as I've already intimated, is an intrinsic element of the imaginal, and therefore of imaginal practice. You're certainly not doing this retreat if you're not already involved in imaginal practice and deeply interested in it. So it's part of what we want to understand when we understand imaginal practice and develop that.

And as I've already said, eros potentially instigates and supports soul-making. Part of that soul-making is a widening and deepening and enriching and making more manifold, a multiplication of our senses of sacredness. So beyond, for example, just a sense of the sacred being universal—some kind of universal oneness or whatever—we're making more and more manifold, more and more multifaceted, multidimensional our senses of the sacredness, wider, deeper.

And also, lastly, I'm answering the question: why get interested in eros? Why make the delineation? Why bother? Because of our relationship with sexuality, and I think a need to bring sexuality more actively into the path so that it forms an integrated part of the path. It's coherently woven into the threads and strands that make up our path. It has meaningfulness, it has place. It has a relationship with sacredness or the possibility of sacredness in and through sexuality as a possibility for us.

It's not just defilement or delusion, or just that we have nothing to say about it in relation to our path other than the few ethical considerations which people tend to interpret very widely anyway. Or we just say, well, it's just an expression of love—people showing their care, which what they really mean is metta. And then we acknowledge that, yeah, there's also some craving for pleasant sensations. It's some kind of mixture like that.

There's so much more richness and depth and beauty potentially available for us if we can weave and open up our exploration of sexuality as part of the path. And beyond including that—beyond also just the view that says sexuality is a desire for merging union. That's what it is. That's what the movement is, as well as some craving and some care. It's actually a mystical or regressive, either way, urge for union somehow in our sense of what sexuality can be, and the eros involved there.

Lastly, we're trying to explore eros and make the delineation, trying to understand it, but eros, I think, will always keep some sense of mystery. It will always remain at least partially mysterious, some sense of something that's not been fully fathomed there, finally understood or captured in some conception or understanding or definition or whatever. Eros will always retain that mysteriousness, that beyondness.

Partly, that's because of the soul-making dynamic itself, which we'll explain later as we go in. There's something in the soul-making dynamic and in eros itself which keeps making eros bigger than we have understood at present.

But also, I just want to finish with something I think is important to recognize about what we're trying to do here, and again, what we're trying to serve.

In relation to understanding anything, it's important to understand something about understanding. Our understanding of anything, our concept of it, or the conceptual framework we approach it with—our understanding of anything—is part of what determines, shapes, conditions, fabricates what that thing becomes for us and part of what unfolds for that thing.

So the very concepts that we use, definitions, delineations, understandings of whatever it is—in this case eros—are part of what determine, condition, shape, fabricate what that thing, in this case eros, becomes and what it leads to.

So if we want, if we're seeking a kind of final watertight understanding, as if there's some kind of objective understanding we can have of anything, then this insight into understanding presents us with a conundrum. Because whatever concept I have—and there will always be some concept—it shapes the thing. Is that just a dead end, chasing my tail round and round? Or is there an insight there that we can actually use well?

I think the latter. Because rather than aiming at some kind of objective assessment or truth about what this thing or that thing is—in this case eros—rather, we understand something about understanding. And so we use that insight because we recognize: okay, well, we want to support whatever conception or understanding or conceptual framework will open up more soul-making. We support the conception, the understanding, conceptual framework that opens up more soul-making, that supports more soul-making.

It's that that we're after in our use of concepts, in our use of understanding. Soul-making. Not something called truth or objective truth or neat watertight definitions or cleverness or anything like that. Soul-making. That's what we're after.

CHAPTER 89

Eros and Equanimity in the Movements of Soul

Rob Burbea · 1h29

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea investigates the intricate relationship between eros and equanimity within the soul-making process. He begins by acknowledging the inherent difficulty in defining soul-making, emphasizing that these concepts appropriately resist complete explication due to their poetic and artistic dimensions alongside their psychological mechanisms.
>
> Burbea introduces the "eros-psyche-logos dynamic" as fundamental to soul-making, where eros (desire for deeper connection), psyche (imaginal perception), and logos (conceptual frameworks) mutually fertilize and expand each other. This process naturally wants to flow in four directions: toward the erotic object, toward the self, toward the world (cosmopoiesis), and toward the eros itself. When allowed to move freely in all directions, this creates a natural balance rather than the toppling that might be expected.
>
> The talk addresses common misconceptions about eros and equanimity being mutually exclusive. Instead, Burbea demonstrates how allowing eros to fulfill its natural expansion creates the very balance and equality of perception that characterizes upekkhā (equanimity) in Buddhist practice. He distinguishes between intensity and potency in practice, emphasizing that balanced awareness across the imaginal constellation (self-other-world-eros) creates greater capacity for transformative experience.
> Crucially, Burbea explores the middle way between taking images as real versus dismissing them as unreal - a razor's edge that, once inhabited, opens vast creative possibilities. This non-realist approach to imaginal practice allows for powerful erotic engagement while maintaining the wisdom perspective that prevents imbalance and reification.

You know, we're practicing with and talking about soul-making and soul as almost kinds of fundamental concepts, fundamental orientations, fundamental commitments. But it's actually quite hard, perhaps impossible, to really define soul-making or soul completely, to really fully capture what soul-making is, for example, to pin it down. And I think perhaps that's quite appropriate. It's quite right. There's a truth in that impossibility.

There's something here in the poetry of these concepts. They resist full explication, full capturing. There's a balance between the poetry and the science, if you like, of what soul-making and what these concepts are. We want to understand mechanisms, processes, dynamics, what's involved in soul-making, how it works, but there's also an artistic dimension to all this, a poetic dimension to the words we use, and we've talked about this before. Something in the nature of soul and soul-making makes them actually appropriately hard to define.

Because of that balance between the art and the science of what we're involved in, it doesn't mean, just because things are hard to define, that we should abandon any attempt at making delineations or definitions. Can we approach a definition or start with definitions in ways that are actually helpful, without locking them down, getting too tight, thinking that we've captured something in some watertight definition or truth? Can we use the defining process, the defining movement in ways that are helpful? What for? To serve soul-making. The definitions that we come up with are in the service of soul-making. And for that reason, they need to be relatively light. At least I hold them relatively lightly, relatively loosely. They're serving the movement of soul-making.

So what is this soul-making? We've been circular already. But let's say, what is soul-making when we use that term? Having said what we just said, we could give a relatively abstract definition of soul-making and say that soul-making is a certain relationship with experience—but a certain dynamic relationship with experience because it is a relationship that involves the opening and the expansion of ways of experiencing, ways of knowing, ways of conceiving and imagining and relating to experience. So soul-making is this expansion of my sensing, my conceiving, my perceiving, and an expansion in the way that includes the imaginal. An expansion of the sensing, conceiving, perceiving of both object and subject.

Already there, I couldn't help but use the word imagining. What also makes it hard is that a lot of these concepts we're using kind of imply each other. So there's a circularity of definition. It's okay.

That more abstract definition may well sound really abstract. If you're quite familiar, if you've done a lot of work with soul-making, you'll actually recognize that there's an insight there that captures well in a general principle something fundamental to soul-making. If you have a little less experience, it might just sound way too vague or open or abstract. But you will recognize soul-making in and from your own experience. In your own life, you will recognize the experience of soul-making.

When there is for us a sense of meaningfulness in regard to something or some movement—not so much meaning as it means X or Y, but meaningfulness, the pregnancy of all that's involved there—when there are multiple resonances for us in the soul, when there is beauty. This is also characteristic of soul-making. It has a sense of beauty, a wide range of possible kinds of beauty.

The imaginal images and fantasies—and because there's image and fantasy in the imaginal sense of image and fantasy, that involves, starts to involve other dimensions of the image, other dimensions of what we're perceiving come to be sensed by us.

Reverence is also characteristic of the experience of soul-making. Reverence is from the English word to revere, obviously, which is from the Latin reverere, to be in awe of, to be in awe of and to respect deeply. And this has something to do with the sense, when there is soul-making, of opening to something bigger than us. So it's connected with this opening of other dimensions, connected with the sense that goes with these experiences of the unfathomability of something, the inexhaustibility of an image or the perception that we're having. Inexhaustible in its meaning, meaningfulness, inexhaustible in different ways.

Different kinds of love are also present in soul-making. So soul-making usually, or I'd say always, has some kind of quality of love. And again, it might not be obvious at first. So all these are ways, aspects of soul-making, ways that we recognize soul-making in our experience, at times in our life.

And I would include, what we're going to get to shortly, that soul-making involves eros.

When we ask what does soul mean, and if we try to define soul, we could say soul is a perspective that brings soul-making, that gives a feeling of support and opens a feeling of soulfulness at any time. And you see the circularity of all these definitions.

It's the only way we can do this. It's better to say that soul is not so much a perspective but a set of perspectives—a potentially increasing or open set of perspectives. In other words, there are more and more perspectives that we are open to, perspectives that themselves open soulfulness and support soulfulness in different ways.

So we could say, if we want to avoid talking of soul as if it's a thing or an entity, we could simply regard it as a way of relating, a way of looking. It's an open and expanding, potentially expanding set of perspectives that supports and opens and gives rise to and ignites soul-making and the sense of soulfulness.

If we wanted to talk about soul as an entity, as if it were an entity, then we could say something like: soul is that which relates this way. Which way? That set of perspectives, that opening, open and potentially expanding set of perspectives that support soulfulness. Soul is just that which relates that way—that in the citta, if you like, that relates that way.

And so in this opening set of perspectives, it will include image and fantasy. It will include the realm of imaginal perception and all that this implies and involves. So before you recognize this—the unfathomability, the inexhaustibility, the sense of the autonomy of an image, the mystery, divinity perhaps—comes in the dimensionality that opens up, that we start to recognize more and more in the imaginal experience.

Now, we said yesterday that eros is central in this process of soul-making, in the movement of soul-making. It's a fundamental, indispensable component, if you like, if we talk in that language. So how does that work?

If you recall our small definition—what we were calling the small definition of eros—we said that eros is the desire, the wanting for more contact with, more connection with, more intimacy with, more knowing of, more penetration of, and more opening to something, to what we're calling an erotic object, the beloved other. So there's quite a sort of small, humble, relatively dry-sounding definition.

We could add to that, just noticing there are certain aspects of the experience of eros that we will notice in our experiences. So for example, eros involves—there will be some kind of feeling or sense of juiciness, we could say—of different kinds of love, some kind of love in the experience of eros. There are many different kinds of love. There will be some kind of sense of energization and also of beauty. We could point to these as aspects of eros, as well as just the sense of attraction, of course.

Now, we can nuance that and go into that in all kinds of ways. But let's also point out, in terms of aspects of the experience of eros, a couple of other ones: arousal. Now by arousal, I don't just mean sexual energy or sexual attraction, sexual arousal. It can be that. That's absolutely possible, of course, as one manifestation of eros. It may be that if someone hooks you up to some kind of scientific measuring equipment—measures your, I don't know what they call it, skin galvanization response or whatever it is, and measures of brain waves and such—that they can measure that there's arousal even there with non-sexual eros in the way that we're using it, in the way that we're calling part of our range of what eros means. Certainly that's possible.

But what we can say as part of eros is an arousal of interest. So something in the being is captivated, let's say, in a good sense. Captivated. It's attracted and there is this arousal of interest. Because mind and body, citta and body are always connected, that arousal of interest and the openness that usually goes with eros—this tends to energize, arouse, and energize the energy body.

So we're not necessarily talking about sexual arousal here—that's included—but there will be an arousal of the energy body, let's call it that. The energy body will feel energized. It will feel opened and probably aligned. And this we say is characteristic of imaginal practice too. This may be super remarkable and intense, this opening, alignment, energization of the energy body. It may be very, very subtle. Oftentimes it can be there without feeling at all agitated, and so forth. So it's not an unpeaceful feeling. We'll come back to that. Let's come back to the energy body material.

So arousal as well as attraction, what we could call juiciness or aliveness, some kind of love, energization, beauty—all that. There are also two other aspects we could draw attention to in the experience of eros. One is dynamism and one is what I'd like to call autoeroticism.

Eros is dynamic in the sense—you can hear it—because the wanting, the attraction, there's a dynamic attraction, movement towards, if you like, the object, the erotic object. But eros has a dynamism beyond that, which I need to explain a little bit more in order to explain the fullness of that dynamism. And similarly with the aspect of autoeroticism.

If you recall that small definition of eros, I don't know whether this stood out to you—that word "more": wanting, desiring more contact with, more connection with, more intimacy with. This "more" is extremely significant. Classically, eros was part of a triad—of gods or demigods that were called the Erotes, and there was Eros, and one of them was called Pothos. And Pothos is this infinite longing, always wanting more, always looking, so to speak, to the horizon, to the beyond. There's an infinite yearning that goes with eros, so to speak. So eros is always accompanied by Pothos, and that, in our more dry definition, that's the "more"—more contact.

This wanting more is not to imply that the connection we have and the contact we have is not fulfilling. There's not this kind of poverty there, or thirst in the sense that we don't have a sense of fullness. Part of, and I could actually say one of the aspects of the experience of eros, is delight. There is delight in the present contact, and the "more" in the definition of eros may just be a kind of wanting that delightfulness and the magic of that connection to continue, wanting to linger in that magic, in that beauty, in that opening.

This "more" may not be that obvious in the experience. It may not stand out in the experience. It may be really quite subtle. I'm emphasizing it, though, heuristically—for educational purposes. I want to draw something out here. I want to explain something about the process or the dynamic of soul-making, because it hinges, or it's driven by, propelled by, that word "more." It's extremely important.

So how does this work? What are we talking about here? When there is this Pothos with it, there's this desire for more contact, connection, intimacy, knowing, penetration and opening—as I said, all those words used in as full a sense as possible. This desire for more will set in motion a dynamic that can then unfold in different ways.

Now, one of the ways it can unfold is that if I am open to the imaginal, the realm of the imaginal and the realm of imaginal perception of this beloved other, of this erotic object, whatever it is—if I allow the imaginal aspect of experience to open up, the imaginal dimensions, if I respect that, if I tune and open to that—then what's possible is that the movement there of the psyche with the eros and this desire for more actually starts finding more, discovering more in the beloved other, in the object. It also, we could say, creates more. It creates and discovers more.

What more? More in the imaginal. So that my beloved other—she, he, they, whatever, it, if it's an object—becomes more through the erotic contact, through the erotic connection and sensing and gaze. So that my beloved other starts to reveal to me, through my gaze, through my sensing, any of the senses, other facets, new facets. They become more complicated, more manifold. They have other dimensions, other forms, sides or faces, facets.

So, for example, they become a theophany, or they become a goddess, as well as who they are. I know them, I know their history, I know all their physical being. It's not as if that all disappears, but as well as that obvious physical dimension that we can all kind of generally agree on, there are other dimensions of their being that I start to perceive.

So the process of "more," it kind of thrusts in, penetrates more to reveal more, opens more, discovers and creates more in the erotic beloved. So, she, he, they start to gradually, in steps, show me more faces through the imaginal. I start to perceive their multidimensionality, this image coming through them, this god, goddess, or angel, or whatever it is—and all kinds of specific examples we could give here.

Now, because they are now more complicated, the jewel of their being is more multifaceted, shows me more faces, there's light shining from all of them, or more mystery there. They're, so to speak, bigger as an image, more complex as an imaginal perception, there's more to be attracted to. They're more mysterious, more unfathomable, more inexhaustible. There are more different kinds of shades of light and characters shining out of them. And so the eros is then further inflamed, further amplified through this increase of the image.

You understand? Through this making manifold and dimensionalizing of the image. It doesn't all happen at once. It happens—it can be really a process in steps, or usually is, over time. So the eros is inflamed more, and that, again, has this wanting more in it, and so the process goes around. It inflates, amplifies, expands, widens, deepens, complicates the image even more—the erotic, imaginal other.

As this goes on in the steps, at some point, it kind of knocks on the walls of my concept, my ideation, my belief structure about who this is that I'm encountering now. What a person is, what the soul is, what image is. My conceptual belief system is getting pushed on to expand with the expansion of the imaginal perception. You understand?

And that too then adds multidimensionality—in this case a kind of conceptual multi-dimensionality—and complication and deepening. I cannot, if my conceptual structure and belief system, my conceptual framework of who they are and who I am and what psyche is, all that, is pushed out—I cannot just believe this simple, flat, reductionist, one-dimensional view of who they are and who I am and all that.

So this further creates more attractive depth, complexity, yumminess, and that further inflames the eros.

So gradually and in stages, the whole process cycles on itself, feeds itself, nourishes itself. All these aspects—the eros, the image, and the imaginal dimensions, and the concepts, the ideation—start to mutually inseminate each other, to mutually inflame each other, to mutually deepen, widen, enrich, expand each other.

So you've got the eros, what I'm going to call psyche, and the logos. Let me explain what I mean.

Eros, psyche, logos.

Eros is the eros, as we've explained—this movement. The psyche is really... I can use this word psyche in two ways. I can mean by it the totality of the citta, the psyche. I can also mean—and what I mean in this instance here—I'm using the word psyche to mean the totality of imaginal perception present in the moment.

And then the last word, logos, that I'm using as part of this dynamic—the eros, psyche, logos dynamic. Logos means my concepts, my ideation, my set of beliefs, my conceptual framework.

So these three—eros, psyche, logos—are the movement of eros and that particular kind of desire, the totality of the imaginal perception in the moment, and the ideation wrapped up in all that, the conceptual frame wrapped up in all that. Eros, psyche, logos come together to mutually feed, nourish, support, open, widen, deepen, inseminate, fertilize, ignite each other in what we call the soul-making dynamic.

And a big part of what that does is it widens, deepens, enriches, complicates, makes more manifold and more yummy the erotic object. So they become, for instance, a theophany. They're expressing some kind of angelic dimension or nature that's coming through them, in addition to their being—obviously, I know this person, I know their physical history, their psychological history and all that. But they start to have theophanic or angelic dimensions.

And there's also the movement into cosmopoiesis, which comes back to the imaginal—movement starts spreading beyond just that object, starts spreading to the world. We've talked about this in other retreats, so you should be familiar with that movement of cosmopoiesis.

Now, this eros-psyche-logos dynamic, or this soul-making dynamic, soul-making process, what I've just described could just keep unfolding like that in stages—very rich, very beautiful, very expansive, expanding. Or it can get blocked at any point, and actually from a number of directions.

So, for example, if I have a rigid—I don't know—secular scientific materialist conceptual structure, and that's my logos, and I absolutely refuse to give any validity or reality to the imaginal perception that I might have, then that will cause me to dismiss the imaginal perception and disempower it that way. So it cannot feed back into this whole soul-making enrichment process.

So it could be an idea that's more, if you like, existential. It could be an idea about who this person is. It could be a concept about what our relationship should be—I shouldn't look at them that way, or it needs to fit into this box or whatever it is.

It could be also something—the possibilities are endless—but for example, a person might think, "Well, I've been practicing the Dharma for ages, years and years and years. I know what the Dharma is." And if something happens in my perception which pushes the boundaries and starts to want to expand the walls of how I've boxed in the Dharma, and so I... I'm an authority, perhaps, or I know what the Dharma is, as I said, and then it's actually coming from the ego structure, the hardened ego structure that's creating walls that will not expand. Because I don't want to disrupt or threaten my self-view of knowing what the Dharma is or having it sorted out or being the one with answers or an authority or whatever it is.

So this could come from all different directions. Or it might be that a certain image is refused. So the block can come from the direction of logos in all kinds of ways. It could come from the direction of the psyche—in other words, the image. I refuse that kind of image. It's too weird. It's too, whatever it is, dazzling. It's too dark, whatever it is. And again, many ways that can happen. But a similar sort of arresting or blocking or constriction of this process will happen—of the whole soul-making dynamic and tendency to expand will happen, or can happen, being blocked through the psyche direction, through the imaginal, or the restrictions on image.

And it can be blocked through the restrictions on eros. Perhaps we feel that that energy is too much. We're not okay handling that desire. Perhaps there's been a certain psychological history with desire that we tend to limit how much flows through us, or the way it opens up the bodily energies we're not comfortable with, we don't trust, or the way it opens the heart, all of that.

So the blocks in the eros, psyche, logos dynamic... unhindered, it will just keep tending to expand in stages. There's potentially no limit to it. It's infinite—infinitely deepening, infinitely widening, infinitely complicating, infinitely enriching in potential.

But of course, being human as we are, it can get blocked and does get blocked in all kinds of ways. Hopefully these blocks are sometimes temporary—we recognize them, and then something either shatters and expands, or expands gradually through whatever means. But other times the blocks can be more habitual or longer lasting.

This eros-psyche-logos dynamic is really, really important. It's a fundamental concept that we'll return to again and again. You'll begin to see how this small definition, in the way it opens up this soul-making dynamic, is immensely powerful when we can understand it. You'll see how it applies everywhere in our life—potentially everywhere. Every domain, dimension, aspect and direction of our existence can be brought into and involved in this movement, the furnace, the beauty of this dynamic.

This is truly essential. We'll keep coming back to this and use it as something we can relate everything to—we can relate all our experience to this understanding.

Once we open up that understanding a little and bring it to bear on our experience as it unfolds, we could also say that we have this small definition of eros that we've defined twice now. But in a way, when we use the word "eros," because of its tendency to fertilize, stimulate, inseminate, and ignite that soul-making dynamic—that soul-making process of expansion, opening, and complication—it's almost as if eros already implies and involves soul-making, and thus the imaginal and soul.

So when we use the word "eros," sometimes we'll mean the small definition, and sometimes we'll actually mean this larger definition of the whole eros as it exists in the soul-making dynamic, in the eros-psyche-logos process of expansion and mutual fertilization and feedback and enriching. There's a larger definition of eros with larger implications of what's involved with it. Do you understand?

Something should be obvious that I'll mention: eros is clearly not equivalent with metta. I would say that eros, similar to what I said about soul-making always involving love of some kind, always includes some kind of love. It might not be obvious—we've talked about this before in other talks. Eros, because it is involved with soul-making, always includes some kind of love. Part of our job is to discern and notice what kind of love, how the love is expressing, what's the character and quality of it.

But eros, though it includes love, is in a way more than love and not equivalent with metta. It's more than just metta. Metta is implicit in it. We'll come back to the relationship between eros and metta in a little while, but notice a few other things as well.

As we mentioned the other day, eros is not just, as some people define it following the Neoplatonic tradition, a movement towards union, unification, or oneness. Actually, if we draw out one of the implications of what we've just said about the way eros operates in the soul-making dynamic, eros actually both needs and creates and discovers otherness. Eros implies and involves otherness, two-ness.

Eros needs this polarity of something that it's attracted to—it needs that two-ness. But also, in its whole movement, as we said, it creates and discovers, or creates-discovers, other aspects of the object. It creates more to the object rather than collapsing the object or collapsing into the object in oneness—a sort of melting in white light together or whatever. It actually creates more complication, facets, dimensions.

And it needs that to further stimulate the eros. So it needs this two-ness, this otherness, these facets and dimensions—these othernesses, plural—that are attractive to the eros. It needs them, but it also stimulates the creation and discovery of more and more otherness. And if, as I said, this soul-making dynamic is potentially infinite, it will just keep creating more and more otherness.

There's a kind of tension there. There is the attraction towards, and partly there is an attraction towards melting at times—we'll come back to that. But at the same time, there's a need for otherness and two-ness, retaining the two-ness, retaining the polarity of the two: the subject and the object, the self and the beloved other, connected. I might even know that we're one, but I need to retain the two. The eros needs to retain the two, and it will stimulate further and create and discover more of that otherness, and more and more othernesses in fact.

We'll elaborate this as we go. So intrinsic to, or implicit in, the movement of eros—as it is allowed, to the extent that it's allowed to fertilize the whole soul-making dynamic and be involved in it—is that it does create and discover more to the object, more to actually everything in the end. So it creates-discovers more. It's both a creative process and a revelatory process.

There's a lot we could say about this, but let's just say that for now. Part of what's implicit in what I've just said, implicit in the sense of two-ness and implicit also in the otherness that it creates and discovers and needs, is that there's a beyondness that's part of the erotic connection. Again, it's both a need, a necessity for eros, and also a creation of eros. It will create some beyond what I already know, and it will discover a beyond what I already know and experience, which serves to attract the eros more.

Now, that beyondness is not totally transcendent in the sense that the eros still delights in the appearance that's there and in the connection that's there. So it's not "I want the beyond—who cares about this now that's here, that's present, that's immanent in the appearance." It's not a beyond that's dismissive of the tangibility and presence in the sensual appearance as it is right now in whatever stage of perception or imaginal perception. It delights in that. It includes that.

But there's also, as part of the dimensionality, there's a beyondness as well—shining through, or intuited, or glimpsed. And that's part of the whole package of soul-making, part of the whole constellation of eros, and what eros constellates. Both a beyondness and a presence in the sensory contact, in the imaginal perception, in the appearance. Both are attractive. Both are delighted in. Both captivate the eros.

There's a lot here. We're moving quite quickly, I'm aware of that. We can bring this out more in the groups and the Q&As, and the individual meetings as you start. And I would like you to really start trying to relate this to experience—your experience as it unfolds—as much as you're able, to help digest this and let these ideas and concepts, let the logos, in fact, be really fertile for you for the soul-making process.

If we think about the relationship between eros and equanimity, there's quite a lot to explore and unpack there. These may be words that we don't often think go together—eros and equanimity. What is the relationship? Are they mutually exclusive? How does it work?

Related to all that are questions about balance in practice, equanimity being related to a sense of balance, or rather balance being one of the factors involved in a state of equanimity—equanimity implying a balance of the consciousness, of the citta, of the being. What is the relationship between eros and equanimity, and how might we support our navigation in these kinds of practices so that there can still be a kind of balance there?

Again, there's so much to say here, but let's just say a few things. This soul-making dynamic has, as I said, a natural inclination, when it's not hindered, to just keep cycling on itself—growing, fertilizing itself, inseminating, giving itself the eros, the psyche, logos, the different dimensions, just feeding more and more, giving each other more complication, more expansion, widening, deepening, everything that we've said, more enriching.

Now, that process of expansion, that soul-making expansion, also wants to expand in different directions. So it's not just in the direction of eros, in the direction of psyche, in the direction of logos—which anyway are really three aspects or connected aspects of soul, you could say, rather than three separate things or mechanisms. The eros-psyche-logos dynamic, the soul-making dynamic, also wants to expand in different directions.

By which I mean—and again, this is something to notice in the practice and really, really important for navigation—what sometimes happens, what often happens, is that, let's say we're working with an image, and there's some kind of eros in relationship with that image, as there will be when an image is imaginally alive. Some kind of eros—could be sexual, could be not sexual, whatever. And the soul-making process, the eros-psyche-logos, starts to impregnate and expand and create, discover more to the erotic object, more to the object, to the other.

Oftentimes, what we don't notice in the imaginal constellation—or rather, we each have different tendencies here, but what can be quite common is for some of us not to notice that at the same time, at the very same time, that the object of the imaginal perception is expanding, the subject is similarly expanding. My sense of self is also becoming imaginally infused, imaginally enriched. I also become for myself an erotic object. The image of myself is part of the whole imaginal constellation. It includes self and other. It's not just other.

Oftentimes our gaze is so transfixed by the beauty of the other or the awe or the fear or the weirdness of it, or just in attending to it out of habit, we put the attention on the object. So it's making the attention a little bit bigger to notice what's happening with the imaginal sense of self in this practice right now, in this imaginal constellation, and you will begin to notice that the self too, as I said, is drawn in and impregnated, amplified, complicated, widened, enriched, deepened, in the imaginal perception, in the web of the imaginal perception. It includes not just the object, but also the subject. Not just other, but also self.

And this soul-making dynamic also wants to naturally include the world. Its expansion into the world—in other words, the environment, the world around us, and the fullness of the senses—is just another way of referring to what we've talked about before, the process of cosmopoiesis. That through this beautiful other that I'm with, whatever it is in the image, whoever she, he, they, it are, that becomes imaginally alive, imaginally deep, and there's the eros there. Also the self, and also the world.

This cosmopoiesis is a natural movement, the expansion outwards to include the world. It's like the imaginal perception spills over to imbue, to fertilize the perception of the world. I'm not going to say too much more about cosmopoiesis because we've dwelt on it a lot in past retreats.

So the imaginal constellation includes not just the other, the object, the imaginal object, or this person who I'm perceiving imaginally—in other words, I'm including the imaginal dimensions in my perception of them—not just the other, but also the self and also the world, three aspects, and a fourth aspect, the eros itself.

In other words, our very sense of the eros involved in relationship to the image, the imaginal, the eros with the image, erotic connection with the image, that too begins to be subsumed, to be drawn into, to be imbued by the imaginal erotic gaze. It's subsumed and drawn into the soul-making dynamic and the fertilization by eros-psyche-logos. So that the eros itself that we are experiencing, our eros right now in relationship with this imaginal object, also begins to become imaginally alive. We perceive it imaginally.

It starts to have other dimensions. The eros itself can eventually become a sense of theophany—it is sensed to be sacred, sensed to be divine in different ways. It appears to us gradually as unfathomable, mysterious, inexhaustible in different ways.

This eros-psychologos dynamic, that three-faced soul, also wants to expand in this fourfold way—towards object, towards self, towards world, and towards eros. Self, other, world, eros. It wants to move in all those directions. In a liquid analogy, the waters of soul want to flow in all those directions. Or if you prefer a fire analogy, the fire wants to spread in all those directions—the fire of soul-making, the fire of eros and the erotic imaginal.

Why am I mentioning this? Partly it gives us a clue about navigation in practice. We can check at any moment: am I including all four directions? All I have to do is include it in my attention—just what's happening with the self. Sometimes just including the self-sense, the image of the self, in the attention allows it to be fertilized by image and eros, and it comes alive. Or the world, or the eros itself. So sometimes it's just a matter of attention.

Now we might have, as individuals, certain habits of tendency. Some people's attention tends to be more habitually focused on the self when they're doing imaginal practice—and probably in life as well—and they tend less to be able to keep the awareness open to the object at the same time. Or vice versa: we become so transfixed and captivated by the divinity of the object that we don't pay attention to the self-sense. And if we did, that would start becoming correspondingly divine. It would start to grow in divinity as well.

For example, if you're doing a devotional practice with a tantric deity or yidam, or just an imaginal figure that's divine for you—and there are all kinds of possibilities—let's say you're somehow resting in the lap of the Buddha or Tara or whoever it is, being held by them. They appear to have all the divinity and I'm the human receiving their love and their healing energy, whatever.

If I dwell in that image, just keep dwelling it and letting it do its thing by the way I'm tuning, by the way I'm opening, by the way I'm sensitizing in the practice—opening the energy body, paying attention to the resonances—if I just let it do its thing, it will just be a matter of time before the sense of myself in that image, resting in the lap of the Buddha or being embraced by a divinity or loved by a divinity, starts to feel my divine dimensions.

The divinity in the image, the theophany starts to spread or catch light, so that not just this Buddha or this yidam or whoever it is—this tantric deity, this imaginal figure—is divine, but I am both human and divine at the same time. I'm given dimensionality just through the soul-making process happening.

So sometimes it's just a matter of attention. Other times we have a more long-standing tendency—and there can be different reasons for this—for not being able to open to a sense of, for instance, our self as image. We've rarefied the self, and the other is image, and there's something blocked there in the whole soul-making dynamic.

The dynamic wants to flow into the self. It wants to impregnate the imaginal perception of the self, give it dimensionality, beauty, mystery, unfathomability, inexhaustibility, divinity. But for whatever reason—whether it's habit or other reasons—I'm only allowing it to go and do its work and fill out and come alive in, let's say, one of these directions. For instance, just towards the object and not so much towards the self, and not so much towards the world or the eros.

There's a sense somehow: I have all this eros towards this person that I'm perceiving with such beauty, that they have such beauty and depth of divinity, but I'm feeling myself as just a human, and my eros is just maybe a little bit embarrassing or clumsy, or maybe even still carries remnants of the view that it's defiled or defilement in some way.

Or the block may be towards the world. The person's doing all this practice—I touched on this in the last retreat, the re-enchanting retreat—doing all this practice, good work on their psychological process and all this. But the world in which it takes place just remains a flat world, remains unenchanted because it's unimpregnated by the soul-making movement, the soul-making dynamic. The eros hasn't reached there to bring it imaginally alive.

So it's worth checking a couple of things. One is: is there a long-term tendency to always lean one way? That's interesting to know about oneself. And then: can I practice including the directions of self, other, world and eros where I don't tend to lean habitually?

Or maybe it's just a momentary imbalance, if you like, or non-opening in one of these directions. And what the practice needs in that moment is just: ah yes, I can let it include that. Which oftentimes just means, as I said, just opening the attention there to include. Let's include the self.

So I'm aware of an imaginal constellation here—self and other, maybe self and other and world. And let it spread that way.

My experience teaching and working with people with this practice is that this dynamic is not at all obvious. We often don't realize that the soul-making dynamic can open, wants to open in all these different directions, is even potentially open if we would only notice it. We might feel stuck, or more often we feel out of balance in some way. Sometimes something is very hard to tolerate—the eros is hard to tolerate, or we're toppling over in some way. In other words, there isn't equanimity, there isn't balance.

But can you see, even if we use a physical analogy, that if the flow of the eros is allowed to go in these different directions—towards the other, but also back towards the self and out to the world in all directions and to itself—then the whole movement, like water flowing, balances itself? We're not toppled over towards the object or imploding in ourselves. Playing with this, making adjustments, cultivating awareness, opening up to include all directions, tuning to this—this is crucial if we're interested in allowing the process to open more fully and have its full life and power. Not just efficacy, but also navigating in a way that's actually balanced and sustainable.

Related to this, I'll make another distinction. It's close, but different. Again, something to check, something we might have individual habit patterns around, either just out of habit or for particular reasons.

I was working with someone recently who felt there was a lot of eros with a certain image, but there was too much intensity. It was hard for her to bear. She felt it was just going to blow her fuses—she'd short-circuit or get too excited in a way that would just dissipate and fritter away. What had actually happened was that her attention and consciousness had become captivated, not in such a helpful way, by what was happening in her energy body, specifically around her heart area, with the eros and beauty and opening—this flame there. It was hard for her to bear that flame. She felt it was getting too intense in a way that would explode the process, leaving her with nothing. Not that she thought she was going to go mad, but it felt so powerful that it was actually fragile.

I recognized what was happening and also saw that she hadn't realized she was putting too much focus in one place. Because she was so captivated by the intensity of the feeling in her heart, she was actually giving less attention to the image—the very thing that had started the whole process with its beauty and eros. As the energy built in her energy body, she began giving less attention to the image. The concentrated attention on her heart area was putting it under too much pressure. There wasn't enough spaciousness in the attention to allow the energy to move more widely. Instead of flowing freely, it became like a pressure cooker in her chest.

This opening can happen in two ways. One is opening of the energy body. You should be familiar with this—opening the awareness, letting the energy and currents move how they want to move within the energy body, giving the whole sense of the energy body more space. Because the awareness is bigger, the sense of the energy body will be bigger, and the energy can flow how it wants to flow—in, out, up, down, around, spirals, whatever it wants to do.

Especially when there's intense eros or intense sexual energy, it often gets caught somewhere in the body—maybe around the genitals, maybe around the heart, could be anywhere really—and it needs more space. It needs to be allowed to flow and fill a space or even move in or out of a space as it wants. Sometimes we don't give it enough space with our attention and it constricts, becoming unbearably uncomfortable or intolerable, throwing us out of balance. To have more capacity to hold what wants to move through us—in terms of eros, energy, beauty, opening—what can really help is creating more capacity in the space by opening the awareness. The energy body opens, and we allow it, even help it by imagining it flowing. We've talked about this before on other retreats.

But there's a second way the awareness can open to help. Related to this example and to what I said before about the constellation of self, other, world and eros: recognizing when we have too much attention too tightly bound and myopically focused on one aspect of the energetic experience. In this woman's case, there was tremendous intensity, but because attention was so caught up, it felt like it would just dissipate somehow, discharge or short-circuit.

The solution was to keep aware of the energy, give it more room, but primarily to re-include the imaginal other. Include not just the energy body experience—which is vital to imaginal practice, as we keep stressing—but also don't lose track of the other, of the imaginal object, the erotic object, the beloved other. Then you have a constellation. You have the imaginal other, and attention becomes interested again in their beauty, not at the expense of your experience here, either energetically or imaginally, but not denying them either. There's this openness and inclusion. The energy, instead of being caught up in the physical energetic body in one location, can both spread through the body and through the whole imaginal constellation of self and other and eventually world.

Do you understand? So there's more capacity there, and the whole experience can have more potency. The whole soul-making can be more potent.

Intensity is actually neither here nor there, and this goes for all kinds of meditation practice. Intensity can feel like a big deal—wow, something really important is happening. It may or may not be. What's more important is the potency. In the case I've been describing, there was a lot of intensity, but there wasn't going to be much potency until she opened up that awareness to re-include and balance it with awareness of the imaginal other and the beauty there and the erotic connection there.

Anytime there's a choice between intensity and potency, we want the potency. We want the soul-making to fertilize the soul and open it. Otherwise, I just have an intense experience and then it's over. So what? Nothing's stretched, nothing's changed. Maybe I even get a bit freaked out or scared.

Intensity can be a lovely and organic part of the process, remarkable even. But what we're more interested in is the potency. That potency sometimes will require intensity of experience as part of it, and sometimes it actually doesn't even need to be that intense. We can still have the potency. Sometimes something's gotten too intense because it's not balanced—the awareness is not spread in the directions it needs to balance.

We're talking about balance, about navigating in the practice, developing our art, developing our skill. I should point out that with self, other, world, eros, energy body, imaginal, emotions, and desire, it's not that all these elements need to find some perfect point of static balance where they're always equally balanced in attention.

It's more about understanding, having a conception that these are aspects of the total imaginal experience we can pay attention to within our field. At any time we can lean more or less and emphasize more or less any of those aspects. We can bring them into some relative balance, which doesn't necessarily mean equal balance.

We can move—lean more towards the object or more back towards awareness of the self, the image of the self, or more out towards the world or all equally. More towards the energy body, or more towards the sense of desire itself, or more towards the image. The whole thing is dynamic and fluid, a kind of dance that's really an art, rather than some static ideal or formulaic thing.

We can play with this. All practices involve finding out what the moment needs, what unfolds from different emphases and how I lean. That's part of the beauty and fun and potential of practice.

I should also add that when we're talking about balance and equanimity, developing our skill in letting go, in dropping craving, in easing craving when it arises—just letting go of something, not being compelled to engage or give our attention to anything at all—that skill and capacity to let go is something we want to develop.

For many people doing this work, they will have developed quite a lot of that capacity before they even go into these kinds of practices involving the erotic imaginal and opening to desire. It's not always that things move in that order. Some people are actually open to explore practices of eros and opening to desire at the same time as they're learning practices of letting go and putting down and dropping.

But there is a question here about what to practice when, what order in my life of practice I develop these different approaches. The capacity for cultivating equanimity, for sitting in a really still, equanimous state—whether that's more absorbed in jhāna or more open to the multiplicity of experience—the taste for and accessibility of equanimity in our life and practice is really, really important. It complements what we're exploring now, the kinds of things we're emphasizing on this retreat.

But can you see that if the eros is allowed to do its thing and inseminate the whole soul-making movement, inseminate psyche and logos and re-inseminate eros and spread out that way and spread out in cosmopoiesis and include not just the other but the self and the world and the eros itself, then there's a kind of balance implicit in that? Balance being characteristic of equanimity, there will be equanimity that comes from the eros being allowed to do its thing, not from shutting down the eros.

We tend to think either I'm in a state of desire or eros, or I'm in a state of equanimity. There's a way of going about it like that, but if I actually allow and explore allowing the desire in different ways, then actually I can have an equanimous eros, or at least a balanced eros.

If we allow eros to do its thing and open up in all these dimensions and directions and aspects that it naturally wants to and will open up, then you can also see that there's a kind of equality of things. Not just the other, but the self also, and the world also, and everything in the world is involved in, drawn into, subsumed in, caught up in, imbued by this whole erotic imaginal process, the whole soul-making process and the opening of imaginal perceptions.

In the cosmopoiesis and in that inclusion of all these aspects, there is an equality of all things. Everything becomes imaginally infused, imaginally alive, imaginally perceived. Everything becomes dimensionalized, unfathomable, inexhaustible, mysterious, beautiful.

There is equality of all things. Some of you will know that an equality of all things is one of the ways, particularly in the Mahāyāna tradition, they actually define equanimity—regarding all things as equal. That's also in the Theravādan tradition.

These characteristics of balance and the equality of all, balance in relationship, and the equality of all things that comes to our perception—these are characteristics of equanimity, by definition, in Buddhist usage of that term. And they're also characteristic of the whole soul-making dynamic, the whole movement of eros, when it's allowed to do its thing.

When it's allowed to expand that way, when it's allowed to impregnate that way.

There are certainly differences, of course, between eros and equanimity conceived in a Buddhist way. Equanimity, being one of the brahmaviharas, shares a characteristic that all the brahmaviharas have. Like metta, it actually moves in the direction of lessening fabrication—lessening the perception of the other, lessening the perception of objects, lessening the self-other divide, the subject-object divide. All this—and if you've done dedicated metta practice over a while, you'll see that this fading is characteristic. I and the object of my metta begin to melt into oneness, a oneness of being, a oneness of heart. We are one luminous heart together. This is the way metta goes.

Deep equanimity practice, being the quieting of the push and pull with all experience—I'm talking about equanimity towards phenomena now—leads, because of the quieting of the clinging, the push-pull there, to less fabrication. There's a quieting of the fabrication.

Eros, on the other hand, in distinction to that, actually moves in the direction of more fabrication—more beautiful and skillful fabrication. It's the path of tantra, if you like, of skillful fabrication premised on, based on, involving an understanding of non-realism, an understanding of the emptiness of what is fabricated. I know it's empty, therefore I can fabricate. I see image as image, therefore I fabricate.

So in contrast to the fabrication of papañca, which has a kind of realism to it—I believe this thing is real, I believe whatever the imaginary thing is—the fabrication that comes out of eros when it's allowed to impregnate the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic is not based on realism. So it's this magical, beautiful, skillful soul-making fabrication, in contradistinction to metta and equanimity which tend to quiet the fabrication.

So there are differences there. But this aspect of the presence or absence of realism—to me this is really pivotal. I actually still haven't thought of good words for this. What's a good word for an image or a fantasy when we believe them to be real? I use the word "image," and most of the time when I use the word "image" or "fantasy" in these contexts, I really mean an imaginal image, an imaginal fantasy with everything that's implied by that use of the word "imaginal" in the way that we're using it. What might be a word for the kind of image or fantasy when it really is reified, when it's not soul-making, it's taken as real, and it's kind of one-dimensional? It doesn't have that dimensionality, that seeing image as image.

I realize this is difficult for people—this whole what we're calling the middle way between real and unreal. So it relates to the middle way of emptiness between is and is not. But there's a similar middle way in terms of imaginal practice for me.

I often get nervous when I'm with someone and they're using the language of images, but it seems to be somehow that there's quite a lot of ego in it and quite a lot of realism in it. Sometimes people use the language of divinity and soul, but somehow it's just—I've talked about this before—somehow about me and my process. And the reality of the self is still somehow really central. Even if they're using the language of God's will, this or that, it's all very reified. And the ego is actually getting quite solidified in that process. It's very dramatic, but it lacks that quality of theater, of knowing that it's theater. Personally, it makes me quite nervous, and I've seen some quite difficult and abusive things through that kind of engagement.

In defining soul-making, you may remember from talks from another retreat, I actually included in the definition of soul-making an awareness of seeing image as image. I was very hesitant about that and thinking about, for example—Catherine, I was talking about Mother Teresa, who saw people as her beloved Jesus. So there's an imaginal perception there, and I wonder what her notion of real or not real was with her whole concept of Jesus and Christ and the Catholic doctrine. I'm actually not sure. But I sort of hummed and hawed for quite a while and then just decided to land on the side of including that awareness—this is image, seeing image as image—this awareness of the kind of middle way between real and not real, including that in my definition of what is soul-making and what it means to have an imaginal perception.

There's a problem here, and I realize this is difficult for people. If you say "image is image," or "don't take it as real," then people understandably go to the other extreme and dismiss. It's not real, therefore it's just delusion, or it's worthless, this image, or any sense of divinity I had is not real, therefore it doesn't have its power. It's a tricky one.

I think maybe this comes in stages for some people, and there's a journey towards that. I can just say that for now, when I inhabit what feels to me to be that middle way, that razor's edge between real and not real—either in regard to all things in terms of emptiness or in regard to images and the whole notion of soul and divinity, that this ultra-narrow razor's edge or tightrope—what seems so precarious—actually ends up being incredibly powerful. Incredibly powerful in what it liberates in terms of perception and transformation and dedication.

What appeared—I can't remember if I said this before—what appeared to be really narrow, with no space on either side and very precarious balance, actually opens up. It's not narrow at all when you get inside that understanding and live it and feel it deeply in the core of one's consciousness. This middle way actually opens up a vast playground or dancing hall, and there's so much freedom and power and beauty and room for movement—creative movement and dynamism and energy that can come through there.

I've alluded to this before, but just in terms of this realism question, maybe you already know that kind of power—to some degree at least—because it comes through in our relationship with art. We've touched on this before. A piece of literature, a novel that you're reading—something moves you so much. You know it's not real, but it still has immense power. Or poetry. We talk about poetic truth. We've been through all this before. Or theater. You know it's theater. I'm sitting right there. I know these actors.

Some of them are my friends even. Something about it moves me in a way sometimes more than so-called reality itself, as we tend to think about it. Or in movies, or whatever it is.

So there's a power—you can have a feeling of this power through art, and that's exactly what we're talking about. Or you might know it in your own Dharma practice. To whatever degree you have realized the emptiness of self, to whatever degree, and you know this self is empty, you still can engage yourself, think in terms of yourself, feel yourself, respect yourself, care for yourself, and others' selves—the selves that you care about. So the knowing of the emptiness doesn't make something worthless. It doesn't make yourself worthless. It's not only that you throw something out.

So you may have tasted—I know it's difficult—this what I call the razor's edge or the tightrope of the middle way here, whether it's in regard to emptiness, whether it's in regard to the imaginal. But I think there are other avenues in our experience where we may already have a sense of how to come into relationship and occupy that middle way, how to be balanced there. It's maybe already in our life to a certain degree. But again, I acknowledge it's difficult, or it can be difficult.

The thing about it, though, as I said, is it liberates. And where there is the seeing of emptiness—this neither is nor isn't, neither real nor not real—and seeing image as image, this allows the erotic engagement, allows the power and the potency and the magic of that and the captivation of that and the dynamic of that, without being out of balance. So this, out of everything, is the most powerful thing that allows, so to speak, equanimity in regard to eros, balance, and so forth. It's that balance of the tightrope of the middle way, which turns out, as I said, to be a whole beautiful playing field, a whole dance floor, rather than a thin, precarious tightrope balance.

So the seeing of the non-realism, together with everything that we talked about earlier—the other aspects, balancing them—but the seeing of the non-realist seeing allows more opening, more intensity if intensity is appropriate, if it feels appropriate to what's going on. It allows more trust and allows us to move and navigate and dance with all this.

I actually feel that that sense of the middle way, that sense of theater, is actually right there in the imaginal perception. In other words, I think it's intrinsic to her. And again, it's one of these things that we begin to notice. It's like, oh yeah, if you ask someone who's with an image and it's clearly alive for them as an image in an imaginal way, "Would you say it's real or not real?" and they say, "Well, actually, no, it has some other category. It's palpable image." This sense of theater is endemic, intrinsic to the imaginal experience. And that's why I wanted to include it in what I call soul-making or imaginal experience by definition. I feel it's intrinsic.

Okay, very last thing for now, and I realize it's a lot of information. Hopefully this will be useful to you for some time. Very last thing: with images in general and with imaginal practice, the way we're conceiving it, a lot is about my relationship with. Part of that relationship with means exactly what kinds of awareness and sensitivity and attunement I'm bringing to the engagement with the imaginal, to the erotic connection.

As we talked about, it's like being aware. What's the natural register of this image? What register of substantiality or insubstantiality does it want to exist in, to play out? I can play with that deliberately, but it might also be listening, attuning, sensitizing, respecting something.

With regard to sexual erotic imaginal—where it's clearly sexual and sometimes intensely sexual, or even, from a normal perspective, bizarrely sexual, whatever—you'll notice something else. Again, a lot of this is just stuff to notice, aspects to notice of imaginal experience. You'll notice that when we're entering into imaginal practice, and here's a sexual image, it doesn't tend to escalate in the way that, say, a non-imaginal sexual fantasy tends to escalate.

You're daydreaming and thinking about whatever, then this person appears, and you have a fantasy that tends to head in one particular direction. There's a kind of escalation, a movement toward a certain goal that plays out in the fantasy.

What characterizes images in general—and particularly sexual or erotic imaginal images—is that they are more iconic, more timeless. Rather than escalating with this narrative movement through time toward some grand finale of orgasm or climax, they tend to remain as one thing, something that stays relatively static in time. They don't have this goal orientation.

It's as if the image, when it's truly imaginal, becomes sufficient unto itself. It might depict sexual intercourse or any intimate act, but it tends to exist complete as it is. The image might simply be holding hands, or any other expression of connection, but it doesn't carry that escalatory, propelling movement through time toward some goal. There's something iconic about it. This image in itself reveals theophany—it doesn't need to go anywhere else.

This is something we notice more and more as we begin to trust this quality in relation to sexual images, in relation to strongly erotic imaginal images, and in relation to imaginal experience generally.

Connected with all this is a larger point: in time, we begin to trust the imaginal soul-making process itself more and more. No matter how bizarre, strange, unusual, intense, or even understated an image may be, we develop an increasing sense that there is something bigger than us here. There's a movement bigger than us, an intelligence, an autonomy that extends beyond our individual will.

At the same time as we understand imaginal experience as dependent arising—shaped by our way of looking and the concepts we bring—there's something that, from a certain perspective, is bigger than us and worthy of our trust. We start to trust the imaginal, to trust soul-making, to trust where it leads us and what it brings us, including the beauty it reveals.

This trust also encompasses what appears to us as dark, weird, or bizarre. We've explored all of this territory before.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 90

Faith in Soulmaking (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 30 min

> In this Q&A session from the retreat "Of Hermits and Lovers: The Alchemy of Desire," Rob Burbea addresses practitioners' questions about working with imaginal figures and the nature of erotic relationship in spiritual practice. He explores the concept of being "faithful" to imaginal relationships while remaining open to multiple images, drawing parallels to how religious traditions naturally develop pantheons of spiritual figures over time.
>
> Burbea discusses having an "erotic relationship with the path" itself, explaining how eros infuses all meaningful relationships - whether with people, nature, ideas, or spiritual practices. He clarifies that any relationship involving love, devotion, and meaningfulness contains imaginal and erotic dimensions, even when we don't recognize them as such. The discussion includes practical guidance on distinguishing between craving (which contracts the energy body) and eros (which expands awareness), and how to work skillfully with images that may initially appear as objects of desire.
> Throughout the session, Burbea emphasizes the primacy of sensitivity and experimentation in imaginal practice, cautioning against rigid formulas while offering concrete techniques like expanding energy body awareness, cultivating humility and reverence, and recognizing the infinite meaningfulness of imaginal figures. This teaching offers both newcomers and experienced practitioners insights into the subtle art of soul-making through contemplative relationship.

Before tea, we have half an hour for questions. We have a couple of remote microphones, so we'll pass them to whoever would like to ask something.

Bridget asked about confusion during the guided practice. She had been developing a relationship with one particular image that was proving very fruitful, and wondered whether to take the opportunity to see if something else might arise. At the same time, she felt this would be unfaithful to the evolving relationship.

This is a beautiful question. When you say being open to something else coming up, do you mean another image or character, or something different happening with the same image?

Another image. In a way, there's no right and wrong to all this—we're exploring soul. Let me offer a few perspectives.

First, it's not necessary to change images in terms of what we want to explore. Anytime there's an image, there's eros. That might feel questionable—you might think, "I don't think there is eros here." But there is, in the way we mean by eros. It might not be so noticeable. The guided meditation implies that eros may be really obvious, quite unsubtle, and sexual, but any imaginal relationship I would call erotic. I'll unfold what this means more as we go on.

So there are two aspects to staying with the same image: becoming more attuned and sensitive, and noticing what's actually involved in that relationship. It's absolutely fine and wonderful to stay with it. You might notice more and more about the texture and qualities in that relationship.

It might also be that with an image that's regular for you, the nature of the relationship changes. It's the same image, but the relationship evolves, sometimes in quite surprising ways—like relationships do. So you stay with the image and see what happens. It could be that on the face of it, nothing much new happens, but you're actually noticing more than before. That's option one.

Option two: you stay with the same image and remain faithful to it. This is really beautiful language—we're faithful to that image. In being faithful, you're truly open to that image, open to what you put in and get back, and what the image gives to you. So it evolves; it's dynamic; we don't know what's going to happen.

The third thing is different: I would say, at least the way I've taught it so far, that we're polyamorous imaginally. We're also polymorphously perverse, but we'll return to that later. This means it's not being unfaithful to have many images. The nature of most people's psyche is that there are many images. Just because you have multiple and sometimes contradictory images doesn't mean you're not faithful to one. It's different from how we usually think about faithfulness in relationship.

This is complicated by the ways we tend to think about erotic relationship in the larger sense in most Western culture, but also religious relationship. Typically there's one Buddha or one Jesus. But even in religions, you can see how Jesus comes, then Mary, then different saints. There's a tendency—and we'll explore this more as soul does its thing, as soul-making happens—toward making manifold. More and more images: more separate images, more contradictory ones, more complementary ones. But also one image starts to become more complicated, creating more faces, more aspects.

You see this in institutional religion as a cultural, historical movement. We have Buddha, then Kuan Yin, then Tara—that's what happens historically. You'll see it internally in your own soul-making process as well.

None of these options, to me, constitute being unfaithful. They're all valid, beautiful potential explorations.

So, in a way, I haven't really answered your question. How does that sound?

Last night you mentioned something about having an erotic relationship with the path, and I was just wondering whether you could say more about that.

There's a whole other talk about that, and we might also devote a bit of practice to it in a couple of different ways. But a little bit relates to, in a very general way, what we were talking about with Bridget. What happens—and I think this is in the talk tonight—what happens is that as Eros gets going and as the whole soul-making process gets going, it is very generative, creative and prolific in what gets discovered and created.

In every facet of our life, in every dimension of being, Eros can come and infuse and start to inseminate that thing or that relationship or that aspect of being. And then soul-making happens in relationship to that being, to whatever that aspect is or that thing is. So this could be obviously a person, it could be the path, it could be nature, it could be something in nature, it could be oneself, it could be some aspect of oneself.

In that process, the object comes alive and comes to be more than it was before. And wrapped up in that is meaningfulness, love, dedication, devotion—all these things in relationship to the erotic and imaginatively pregnant object. So that happens in relation to the path.

If I turn around what I just said, I say: where there's love, where there's devotion, where there's meaningfulness, there there is Eros, there there is image happening, there there is fantasy. And often we don't realize that. So we think our life is without images. But our life is infused with images. Where are they? Look where there's meaningfulness, where there's love, where there's dedication, where there's devotion, where there's aliveness. That thing is erotically, imaginatively alive for you.

And it could be something you would never have thought to put the word Eros or imagination with. It could be an idea. It can be something very—your feet. It could be absolutely anything, from the most gross concrete thing to something very subtle to something seemingly abstract. Anything can come alive in this way.

So that's a general point. Do you want more about that specifically now, or do you want to wait?

It was more just the sense of relating to it, because it's not an object, it's not a visual image, it's not something kinesthetic. It's not like an image—relating to the pull, or to the pull of that kind of calling.

Well, I would say it is, but the idea of the path or the truth or something like that is not kinesthetic or visual. It's not like an image, not a being.

Actually, I want to go back to your question because I think it's quite important. When you speak of feeling called by something that doesn't quite have the quality of a being, yet demands something from you - this is very common and very valid.

An image doesn't need to have a discernible form. As I mentioned briefly in the guided meditation, we often think of images as having clear visual characteristics - he looks like this, she looks like that. But an image can be something as vague as what you're describing, and it still constellates as an image. Around that calling, in relationship to it, there's still the fantasy of the self, the movement, the world it happens in, the tradition, the history, the future. Do you understand?

It's perfectly fine if our images aren't clearly delineated visually or in any other sensible way. They can remain vague and that's entirely valid. But there will usually be something in the constellation that is a bit more formed - like the sense of self and what the self's job is in relationship to this calling.

I realize the kind of practice we did in the guided meditation might seem harder to do with something so formless. But you can still feel energetically and heartfully and soulfully what that pull and calling does to you, even if the object isn't quite clear. It's going to do something in your being when you open to it, when you sit with it, when you align with it, when you give yourself to it. Sometimes that's all that needs to happen.

What does that feel like? Sometimes when you let yourself do that, when your being opens - and this relates to the earlier question about images changing - something then shifts in the image and something may become more formed. But it doesn't need to be. It's not necessarily better if it's in technicolor and really clear.

There's a fullness and multi-dimensionality and multi-facetedness to that whole erotic relationship that you can find your way into. You can let it fill out more without demanding that it have a certain form. These things unfold organically. I'm very much not about telling the imaginal world what to do, having an agenda where it should be like this or fix certain aspects of our personality. I incline much more toward being led by something, listening to something and letting that guide - the other way around.

Now, regarding your question about resonances versus interpretation - you're absolutely right that the way of relating to images is much more about resonances than analysis or interpretation. But I understand your wondering whether, especially in early days when this approach is being learned, there might be a place for moving between receptivity and some analysis or interpretation.

Because what I find is if I allow that, it can kick it off again. It can get something moving again.

So if I understand—by early days, you mean early days in your practice? And so something makes sense analytically, or you can see why a certain image would come up, and then that kick-starts what? Then it kick-starts something happening spontaneously.

I'm absolutely fine with this. The thing about soul making is that every dimension of our being is involved, every facet. So for me it absolutely includes the intellectual faculties in all kinds of ways. The only caution I would give is: don't limit. So once I've analyzed it—done, put it in a box—the image will die. The opposite is what we want.

If you have this sense, or grant—let's say grant, play with the idea, entertain the idea—that the image is infinitely meaningful, then whatever analysis comes to you or you come up with at any point never exhausts the image. It doesn't finish it. It's just one facet. It means this, and it might mean its opposite, or it might mean something complementary. It might mean many things. It's not that you necessarily have to find them all out, but there's a kind of superabundant depth to that. Does that make sense?

So fine, absolutely. And especially, again, you're finding what works for you with this. I really encourage experimenting with what works and what gives it life. I would just be cautious about putting things in boxes, because then they die.

I suppose it happens—if an image comes because I've taken something to a sit, so I'm going to look at this, and then there's some apparently completely disconnected image, then at some point there'll be an "oh yes, I can see how this relates back to the question or issue I brought to the sit."

Yes, beautiful. And how about this: the image was always there. What drove the issue was the image. Do you understand? So the image—we're playing with an idea here, partly. We're playing with the idea that image is primary. It's not how we tend to think, at least not in this culture. We tend to think exactly the way you said: I had this issue, I had this thought, and then this image came. Fine, this is a great way of thinking, but also the other way around. You're kind of supporting this view of superabundance and mystery and fullness and primacy of the image—the specific image.

That sort of involvement of the intellect can really be fertile for the whole soul-making process. It kind of gives it more soil and more structure to unfold in and grow.

Yes, Mary?

Two quick little things, really, that have come out of what both Catherine and you have said. One is what Catherine said—that every desire has an object. And I find that problematic. I understand it because that's the psychology of desire, that's how it's spoken about. But I've worked for quite a few years now with Prapto, Prapto Suyadharmo, a Javanese movement teacher, and he always says: not subject-object, but subject-subject. And I think it relates to what you say about allowing an image its autonomy.

There can be many problems when we start thinking about an image, a tree, or a flower as an object. That's something I wanted to share.

The other thing is my difficulty—it's probably just how I image soul, but I don't feel a difference between heart and soul. Heart gets bigger sometimes, but it seems to be the center and the engine of soul for me.

What do you mean by heart, exactly? Well, certainly I feel it in the energy. I feel it here. And sometimes it stretches and can stretch way out there. But any image that has that kind of resonance—this is where I'll feel it. I'll feel it in the body as well, all over the place. And I'll get mentally excited. But that's the center.

Catherine and I were talking about this recently. So there's no reason to change anything there. Again, I would just be quite open. It may be that for you, this is the center or the faculty or the instrument of soul perception. But fine. For me personally, it's not located in any one place, but it does definitely involve the energy body. It has to be involved. But for you, it might be centered here. For someone else, who knows? So, great.

In some of the Sufi traditions, they talk about heart as the center of soul perception. It's not quite what we mean by just openness of heart and sort of emotionality. There are linguistic problems here. There might also be—and I'm not sure, I don't know the answer—there might also be just personal ways we tend to feel this differently, and that's fine. Again, I would just keep open. It might be that it's always going to be that way for you. It might be that it evolves.

In terms of soul—and again, I can't remember what's in the talk tonight, but I might touch on it—so we can talk of soul as a subjective entity, as if it's a subjective thing, like we talk about mind or something like that. We can also talk about soul as just a way of relating, and that takes it out of this "where is it" sort of thing. It's in the relationship. It's a mode of, or actually it's modes, plural, of relating, if that makes sense.

I think probably what you'll find when I speak is I slip between those two ways of talking about it. But again, I'm a little loathe to tie it down to one or the other, if that makes sense.

Sampo, did you have a question? [Question inaudible: something about analysis and interpretation and hesitancy...]

So again, I go back to this thing of there's no right and wrong. It's like surfing or cycling or that kind of thing. In the sense of—like any meditation practice, we could be talking about emptiness practice here, we could be talking about samadhi, we could be talking about metta—there's a creativity and a playfulness and experimentation involved.

You get the sense of like, "Whoops, I've gone down a hole here," or "Whoops, I've fallen off," or "I've hit a brick wall," or whatever it is. Or, "Oh, that's interesting, it feels just right now," or "It's opening nicely." And I wouldn't have thought that my analysis would have done that, because analysis is supposed to be a bad thing. Or vice versa, I'm analyzing and I get all just heady and disconnected here.

So rather than creating a rule, I would just say this is part of the sailing. You're feeling the wind, you're feeling the breeze, the currents of the water, and what kind of catches it, in the moment. There are things we can say, absolutely, that this tends to help and that tends to hinder, but generally I don't think there's such a formula to all of this.

It's asking—that's why I keep going on about sensitivity and all of this. It means in the moment, how's my little boat doing here, you know, with the wind? You understand?

And the second thing, just to reiterate something or put in different words what I said to Linda, there's analysis at different levels. So there's an analysis that might be particular to this image and say a connection or whatever—my psychological history perhaps, or who knows what. But there's also just the analysis in terms of understanding, for instance, the whole process of soul-making and how that happens. So there's a kind of—do you understand?—it's more like a meta-level.

So it's all good if it's good in the moment. Do you understand? I would be wary of giving prefab formulaic answers, really. How does that sound?

Student: Sounds good. And will you be talking more about transforming the craving, clinging desires into more erotic desires instead? Because that's also something that with some images, especially in the guided meditation when you suggested that we just bring an image of our choosing, there might be... well, it's not exactly like a divine image at the moment, but it feels like there might be something coming on. It might just turn out it was something I craved or that was cool or whatever.

Yeah, sure, sure. This is—yeah, I think we'll be talking about it more. I'm pretty sure we will. I actually can't remember what's in the talk, but I'm pretty sure. If not, let's talk about it more.

Basically, yes, we can move. So you can have eros, all that lovely divinity and multidimensionality, and then, whoops, it's just contracted into craving. How do I know? Energy body is one thing, yeah, that tells me. With craving, the energy body contracts—that's one signal.

But similarly, we can stay with something and say, oh, this is—you know, this shouldn't work or this is craving, whatever. And the way of relating to it—and it might have to do with bringing the heart more involved. It might have to do with getting the energy body more involved.

So one way to lean it more towards eros is to really get the whole energy body involved and expand that field. When there's craving, the energy body also contracts, the awareness contracts maybe to one area in the body. Sometimes extremely, you know. Sexually, sometimes what can happen is the awareness contracts to one area of the body. So what can really help is opening that, getting the whole energy body involved.

So what is it to look at this imaginal object—and I use "look" in inverted commas—to look with my energy body? Do you understand? And that leans the whole thing more towards what we're calling erotic.

Humility is another thing. There's a sense—it's related to the autonomy—so I give this being, this imaginal figure, rather than they're an object that I want, or they're an object that's going to do something for me. You understand? So even you can have a spiritual—I can have a god that's basically just trying to do something for me, or that's how I see him, her, etc.

So there's something about humility and reverence as well that leans it towards, or opens it towards the erotic. So there's two things for right now, but hopefully we'll be saying a lot about that. Does that sound okay?

_Student_: Yes, thank you.

Okay, good. So there was the tea bell. Let's just have a couple of moments quiet together.

CHAPTER 91

Clinging, Craving, Eros (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 43 min

> In this Q&A session from the retreat 'Of Hermits and Lovers: The Alchemy of Desire,' Rob Burbea offers nuanced clarifications on the relationships between clinging, craving, and eros—three manifestations of desire central to his soul-making framework. He explains clinging as existing on a vast spectrum, from gross mental obsession to the subtlest movements involved in any perception whatsoever, including the appropriation of experience as 'me' or 'mine' and the assumption of inherent existence (avijjā).
>
> Burbea distinguishes craving from eros by their phenomenological qualities: craving contracts the being and reifies both self and object, while eros tends toward opening, expansion, and the soul-making dynamic he calls 'eros-psyche-logos.' Rather than viewing clinging as inherently unwholesome, he presents it as empty and potentially skillful—part of existence itself that can serve compassion and soul-making when engaged wisely. This perspective draws from Mahāyāna developments that grappled with how perception functions for awakened beings.
>
> Practical guidance emerges throughout: involving the energy body to transform craving into eros, loosening the sense of reality through emptiness practice or imaginal exploration, and asking soul-oriented questions like 'What is soul looking for here?' The session also addresses working with difficult emotions such as anger through imaginal practice, treating even personal patterns as potential lessons from soul. Burbea emphasizes an exploratory spirit—navigating fluidly between fabrication and non-fabrication, trusting the process while maintaining humility and reverence toward something larger than the personal self.

So, does anyone have anything? Ramiro, yes.

A very easy one.

Can you just remind me of the difference you established between craving and clinging?

Yeah, thank you. So can I just recap? I took somewhere or other and made a differentiation, a delineation between what we're calling craving and clinging. In a way, I'm making this up. I wish I was better at making words or whatever. So it's not necessarily the same as the distinction that you might be already familiar with.

Both clinging and craving are manifestations of desire, kinds of desire, along with eros. So you've got three kinds—eros, craving, clinging—at least.

Clinging, I'm just really referring to, is a quite generic term in a way. But really, what I want to say is that it has a huge range to it. I really mean any movement of body or mind towards or away from anything. So anytime we try and push something away from us—now that could be really that the mind is just "get it away from me, I hate this," or very, very subtle, there's no thought involved, it's just a kind of micro-energetic inclination of mind to push something away, or to pull something towards us, or pull ourselves towards a thing. So any kind of push-pull of the consciousness, something like that, is called clinging. And it has a huge, huge range.

You know when you're really in the grip of something, really, your whole mind is kind of rebelling or obsessed with that thing and the thinking is going round and round—that's a kind of intense, strong, gross version of clinging. The gross end of the spectrum. Down at the subtle end, you're really talking about micro-movements of push and pull. Sometimes there's no thinking involved. How do I know it? I see some kind of contraction in the being. It might be very subtly in the energy body. And it might be just actually in the space of the mind, the sense of the awareness kind of contracting a little bit.

At the really subtle end, clinging is involved in any perception. Not everyone in the Dharma would agree with that, but that's how I would present it. Actually, to experience anything in the world, there's some kind of clinging. There's Ramiro, and my mind is doing this a little bit. And that's a kind of grasping movement, just to have you in my attention for a moment. So any experience, in or out, there's some kind of subtle degree of clinging.

And we talk about—so that's a very subtle level of clinging, just that's involved in any perception. Wrapped up in that, and also at the very subtle end, are things like: here I'm sitting, there's the sensation in the arm, sensation in the backside. Without thinking, the default, wrapped up in the default experience of that, these are my sensations. Of course, they're not your sensations. They're not Jill's sensations. So we have this appropriation in regard to any sensations as me or mine. And then we have even subtler, just the idea that it exists independently of the way of looking, that it has inherent existence. That's avijjā, the subtlest level of clinging.

So all that is clinging. Eros is a kind of clinging, in fact, and craving as well. Really the distinction is between craving and eros. The distinction I would make, or one of the distinctions I would make—actually, because there's probably quite a lot involved—is we just recognize that craving tends towards contraction. There's a contraction in the being, and there's a reification of something or other. So the view is contracted. It's a real thing that I want. Real me can get a real thing, or wants to get a real thing, or wants to push a real thing away. And with that, the being basically contracts in all kinds of ways. And this we can feel. It's palpable. So there's a kind of solidity and stuckness, reification, concretization, and dukkha involved.

Whereas eros, which wasn't in your question, tends to open things out. Because it gets involved in the soul-making dynamic—what we call this eros-psyche-logos business—it will tend towards opening things out, opening the being, opening the perception, opening the sense of things.

So you could look at these as two extremes, yes. Very nice.

If we tie this in with emptiness teachings, you could say something like: all perception involves fabrication. Perception is fabricated. Experience is fabricated. Clinging is part of what fabricates experience—some degree of clinging is always on that spectrum. Now, we can fabricate in a way that we call papañca. Do you know this word, papañca? Problematic, crazy-making, all that. That's fabrication in a kind of crazy-making, dukkha-making way. Eros and soul-making is a kind of fabrication, let's say, in a poetic way, in a magical way, in a beautiful way, in a soul-making way. But both are fabrication, as you put it. Very nice. It's kind of like that, if you like.

So you're asking: is clinging classified as an unwholesome factor in my view?

I've just done some other talks where I spent a long while on just this. In probably—I don't know if most or not—but certainly some traditions, and probably the ones that you're familiar with, clinging will be regarded as an unwholesome factor. It's wrapped up in the whole cycle of dependent origination leading to suffering.

Something really interesting happened with the emergence of the Mahāyāna tradition, because if there's this understanding that there needs to be clinging for perception to arise, then the question becomes: how does it work for a Buddha? How does it work for an arahant? And not only that, what kind of a Buddha is he who's just going to die and leave everyone suffering and not be able to be reborn back into the world of perception?

So you could say—you could explain the Mahāyāna tradition, and I'm not saying this is the way to do it—but you could say that's part of what they were trying to answer. How does it all work? What is a Buddha? How does awakening function in relation to this understanding of dependent arising and the fabrication of perception? I don't particularly buy those kind of reductive historical models, but you could frame it that way. And then out of that came all this complex Mahāyāna philosophy, which is either horrific or beautiful to you, depending on your opinion.

So in my view—is what you asked—no, clinging is not unwholesome. Clinging is empty and can be used skillfully or not, beautifully or not, in the service of compassion, in the service of soul-making, or not. It's part of existence. Existence involves clinging. And that's part of what we dance with.

You know, we have this image of fire, and it's a double-edged sword, fire. You can get burned by fire. So it's like that. But fire gives us so much. It's something like that.

Then we have to kind of open up the understanding of: whoa, what are we doing with the Dharma here? Because I thought we were supposed to try and live without clinging somehow—as if that's even possible. I don't really think that's possible. Nor is it probably, I imagine, what anyone in this room actually wants.

I would just ask, maybe I should pose it as a question: if you envisage a life really free of clinging...

What is that? What does it look like? And is it what the being really wants? We can get back to that.

So Natalie's asking, in a similar way, is it possible to transform craving into something more useful? Yes, absolutely. Not necessarily easy all the time, but as you begin to discern more the difference, you find that eros can slip into craving without us sometimes even realizing what's happened. And craving can be transformed into eros, into something more open, more beautiful, more poetry-making, more soul-making.

The big question is how. I'll say two things for now. One is getting the energy body involved. There is this contraction that happens with craving. Here I am with this thing, whatever it is that I'm craving. If I begin to involve my whole body in the perception of that thing—this is a bit of a strange angle here, but one can see with one's whole body, let's say. Bringing the whole energy body into the relationship usually means opening it out from something that's a little bit more contracted. Do you see what I mean?

Everything that's involved in soul-making is involved together. So you might think it's a hopeless tangle when trying to understand things, but actually there's a gift in that, because it means you can wiggle any one bit and the other bits start jiggling. Do you understand? So, for instance, because the energy body tends to open in harmony, you can play with that, and it tends to open the soul-making. That's one thing.

Another thing is realism, concretization or not. Craving involves a real thing. I think this thing is real. I usually think I'm real. In a real world, in real time, all the rest of it. So sometimes what can happen is just some way of loosening, liquefying that reality perception. This can happen in many ways. One is through a little bit of emptiness work. Another is actually by going more into the imaginary.

With this thing, you could say part of the problem with craving is that things have not gotten imaginal enough. This is completely opposite of what we've been taught and what we tend to think. Because the thing has no dimensionality—I just want that thing. I have no dimensionality. It's all so flat and so real and narrow. So it's almost like meditating more on whatever this thing is, whatever it could be, and letting it be more imaginal, letting it have its imaginal dimensions. Then the eros has something to move into, and it can do this eros-psyche dance. It can expand, and that transforms the whole thing. Does that make sense? So there are different ways with this real-not-real quality.

Those are two things for now. But I go back to this general principle that everything in soul-making, everything involved in soul-making, is almost like facets of the same thing. We think there's this and that, and there are all these pieces, but really, you can have so many different ways in that catalyze the process and support it. There can be a lot of creativity, and everything's connected there.

Does that make sense? Yeah?

Could a helpful question be, for example, if I feel some craving is happening, could I ask: What does it mean to me? Or what sense does it have? Or how does it speak to me?

Yes, absolutely. So as a bit like Natalie was asking: Is there a way, when I feel some craving, to loosen it up and help it perhaps move in the direction of soul-making? One way might be asking myself, "What meaning does this have for me?" What was the other phrase you used? "What sense do I have of it?" Yes, absolutely. Or "What is soul looking for?" Very good.

What I would add to that, similar to Linda's question yesterday, is that it might be that one answer to that ignites something, and that's all you need. But it might also be that one answer is too boxed in. So there's a kind of openness in asking. You won't necessarily get some final understanding: "I understand that now. I put it down to this, and this is what it is." Sometimes that will work, but sometimes you have to have more of an openness.

Connected with that sense of allowing openness is what I would call humility and reverence, these words I was talking about. And when you ask that last question —"What is soul wanting here?" or "looking for?"—then listen to that question. It puts the agency almost outside you, or bigger than you. You didn't say "my soul." You didn't say "What am I?" I mean, you could language it like that, but there's a sense of something bigger that I'm receptive to, that I'm humble in relationship to. Do you understand? That attitude is also part of soul-making. That's an aspect of soul-making. So again, you're igniting one piece there, and the whole thing can start to shift. Yeah, absolutely. Beautiful.

Yes, there's someone back there. What's your name, by the way? Thomas, yeah.

So I've been working with an image and noticing the tendency for the subjective pole to dissolve.

Dissolve how? Actually, I'm going to repeat it anyway, so just finish your question.

Okay, so working with emptiness practices, and particularly with the emptiness of self practices, there is an ease in that dissolution into space, and also working with ājīrṇa practices. As you've mentioned before, that has a tendency to somewhat dampen the eros sometimes when the subjective pole dissolves, and then there is an identification with what was previously objective. I'm going to sound too technical, I hope it's making sense. Which is beautiful, because there is an ease and a falling away of dukkha in that moment, because duality is somewhat softened into a not-duality. And then the question comes: to increase that dynamic, to add, to adduce this dynamic, or to increase the whole thing, the creative fabrication of a new self in relation to object? This is something I'm just playing with right now, and I'm a little bit lost—not lost in the sense of... but on the intentional creative fabrication.

Okay, so let's see if I can sum that up. Thomas is saying, if I understand correctly—correct me if I'm wrong—he has found it very fruitful recently exploring a kind of practice that, through some understanding of emptiness, particularly of the self, kind of dissolves the experience, particularly dissolves the sense of self to some degree. And then there's this lovely openness of less fabrication, essentially—less duality, less polarity. And this is really nice. And yet in that space, because there's not so much of the twoness, there isn't so much of the eros. So the question is how to navigate there.

First thing: this sounds wonderful, great, fab. I would put everything that we're talking about on this retreat into a larger context, which relates to Romero's question about —how would you say—unskillful fabrication, what's called skillful or beautiful fabrication, soul-making fabrication, and then there's the path of non-fabrication. Do you understand? All of that is our playground. We tend to say, well, unskillful fabrication—we don't want to be playing there too much. But actually, I'll come back to that because we can qualify that. So you've basically got a choice as a practitioner.

You're gliding around. With time and with development, you can simply incline where you want to go. You might have periods where you're really drawn to the dissolving dimension—emptiness and the fabric of experience. That's great. Go for it. But at some point, and that might be now from your question, you might say, "Okay, that's all very nice. What else is there? What's possible?"

One of the things about emptiness practices is they can, if I go back to a phrase I think I used before, make everything liquid or water. There's that kind of looseness. Samādhi does it as well. Mettā does it as well. All the traditional practices in the Dharma are actually movements into non-fabrication, and part of what they do is they simply liquefy.

So sometimes you go into one of these states, whatever it is you're talking about, and then you just have to kind of back out a little bit, just a little bit. You take the intensity down slightly. It might be at that point that there's a bit more looseness and liquidity in the being, and in that space, images can arise. You can be deliberate about it. What I want to say is: don't be afraid. Don't be afraid of old patterns coming back. Just view it as a playground and see what happens.

I don't want to foist this on you like a religion or a dogma, but I would venture to say that as this whole thing gets underway, we begin to have more of a sense of soul being something bigger than us, so to speak. And then we even get to a point where it's like, "My personal dukkha, my history, my patterns—these also are kind of lessons from soul." It might not be that I'm quite relating to them the right way or seeing them the right way, but even if you take that question and apply it to my patterns, this dukkha, there's something that starts to get re-enchanted. I start to see and experience my patterns in a more soul-making way, and then they take on other dimensions. Do you understand?

So if old patterns come back, no problem. What you want with this emptiness thing is just this facility to say, "Hey, it's fine if dukkha arises, if I get contracted." The whole thing gets very fluid—in and out of dukkha, in and out of contraction, in and out of reification, no problem. I'm not trying to live in some kind of state of dissolvement all the time.

Don't be so afraid of that. And in terms of other images of self coming up, you could play with a Vajrayāna deity, for instance, just identifying with that. You could take anything that has already become imaginal for you and just linger with that in the meditative imaginal practice.

I'm pretty sure I must have said this last night in the talk—I know there was a lot of information there. Sooner or later, the self pole of that whole constellation will start to come alive imaginatively. I'm not making that happen. I'm just dwelling with whatever has become alive for me as an object. It might be the world. It might be whatever it is. And then at some point I begin to notice—I expand my awareness, so to speak, metaphorically—and just check out: "Well, how am I sensing myself now? What's the image of self?" And you will, at some point, notice that the self has become imaginal. It's taken a different form, or the energy body has shifted, or the image of the body, or the whole picture. Do you understand?

You don't have to force this. It's more like you notice this stuff. You're kind of letting it happen and just gently inclining one way or another.

Joel, hi. We've not met before.

Johan, sorry, hi. Okay, sorry. Yeah, thank you, Johan.

So Johan's asking—we're talking about alchemy of desire. And is there an alchemy of anger? And an alchemy of confusion, or delusion even? Then you've got your three main Buddhist kilesas. And this could actually be one view of the tantric path: it's the transformation of the kilesas, that there's treasure in each. So absolutely, yes, no question about it.

The other thing I was going to say to Natalie as well, and this applies here too: when there's an emotion, when there's something like desire or like anger, there's a lot of psychic energy involved. It's just the way we've got hold of it that takes it into the not-so-skillful. But part of playing with this kind of path that we're filling out now is this: let's just play with the idea that there's a treasure here, that there is an alchemy. You know, mercury in alchemy can transform things. So we're just playing with the idea that there's something potentially gold, potentially a treasure in there.

I would say, if you feel comfortable with it, let that anger be there. Feel it in the energy body. You're caring for it. And let it constellate an image. Does that make sense?

Well, the image that came to me is this young man. He's quite... It's hard for it to form an image, or it's hard for me to just sort of dwell on this aspect of that image without leaning into the unskillful anger.

What gives you the sense that it's unskillful?

Oh, I just feel like a contraction.

Oh, okay, yeah. Does an image—there's an image there?

Yeah.

Oh, okay. So the anger didn't start the image. The image had that in it.

Yeah. It has it as one of its aspects.

Yeah, yeah. Would it be possible to just play with the idea of trusting it? It's like, you know, sometimes in practice what you're doing is setting up a playground or a perimeter which is safe in that period. And kind of just seeing what happens if I trust. Because the presence or the absence of trust makes a big difference. What is he doing, this young man in the image?

I think it's just like, you know, metaphorically he wants to slam the door and leave.

Leave. Okay. Yeah, yeah. So it might be that it's not going directly through the anger first thing. This poet has become image for you, and he's probably quite a complex character. There's some mystery to him. It might be going through different aspects of this image, going through different other doorways rather than directly through the anger. That might be helpful.

When you're meditating with this, do you really feel like the energy body's involved?

You do.

And what happens? The energy body fills with anger?

Well, actually... yeah.

Now, is that charge—is that the way his body feels?

I don't quite know.

Okay. So that might be something to play with. It's almost like getting a sense of what his body feels like. Sometimes you can enter an image and become him. And that might actually do something to the feeling inside.

Jill is just sharing two images. One was looking out of the window from the meditation hall and perceiving a kind of corridor of light from the window into the nature. That came up later, and following it brought a sense of mystery and unfathomability.

The second one is actually something she wrote, and is a lovely piece about going through very difficult elements to reach this woman who recites this piece of her past as a soldier. Her lover was killed in battle, and she decides she's not going to wear that sort of armor anymore. She puts on the robes of the contemplative, and so she's become this hermit, this solitary, who receives visitors.

So that piece of writing might be something to revisit and play with imaginally. Does that feel right? Yes.

Yeah, I think what I would say about both of them is they're quite different, but both of them are, I think, potentially rich imaginal images for you. And what I would perhaps emphasize with both of them, particularly because you're quite new to this, is very much beginning with the energy body, actually sensing that corridor of light, that tunnel of light. What is the effect on your energy body? Or when you contemplate this figure and your relationship with her, what happens with the energy body? And very much keep, like we were saying earlier, that whole body sense of the relationship with the image, with the other, with the beloved, with that light, with that mystery.

Beginning there means that the play with the elements of the imaginal becomes a little easier. They somehow open naturally. So rather than just trying to pile on the meaningfulness or the dimensionality, sensing into how it affects the energy body, how it opens the energy body, what it does with the energy body really helps. And then it's actually like the image gives, it gifts new aspects, new qualities, new dimensionalities. You feel like you're kind of co-creating together rather than you trying to impose some kind of thinking on the image.

Both really valuable, and the range of imaginal practices is just huge. But both of them, absolutely, go for it. You recognize the imaginal not so much in what the kind of image is, but in what it does. How do I recognize imagination? It's soul-making. How do I recognize soul-making? By the emotion, by the meaningfulness, by the beauty, by the depth, by the dimensionality—by all these things.

So here could be a king and a wizard and a fairy and a dragon and all that, and one might say, "Oh, it's imaginal." But it could be completely not imaginal if it doesn't do anything. Or here's this room right now. Here's my hat—it could be an imaginal hat. It is, in fact, an imaginal hat. But it doesn't matter what it is or how weird or mythic it seems. It's not in the thing. It's in the relationship.

And so there's this—I almost feel like saying, I don't know. I don't know how to do it either. What this is, is an exploration. What happens if we bring mindfulness, sensitivity, curiosity, energy body awareness, this sophistication and care around the questions about reality—what happens if we bring all this into this practice and see what unfolds? If you can have that kind of spirit, I think it's certainly better than asking me. I'm happy to help, but I don't view this as something I've figured out and am handing down. I view it for myself as an exploration. We are discovering, you are discovering, I'm discovering—not just images, but also how they work, and what the conceptual framework needs to be. To me that's beautiful. So you're absolutely on the right track.

We've talked about the ways you can work with these things. And sometimes an image informs my life, the directions I take, what I decide to do, what I manifest in the world. Sometimes much less so; it's not so obvious. And then eventually it will spread into the world so that the sense of the world itself begins to get more imaginal. That, for me, is where we're going. Some people will start there. But for many people, I think the intra-psychic imaginal starts expanding into the world of relationships, into the world of relationship with the self. That corridor of light could be—we talked about cosmopoiesis—the way that images start to spread through the world, into the world of nature. And that could be one of the doorways into that.

It seems to me we don't know. Sometimes images might be one-offs. They're just one-offs. But they're still somehow significant. They do something. They're part of the whole song. But the image never comes back, and we don't particularly feel called to draw it back. Other images might be around for years, and there's a real relationship there.

All I would add is that, like with a human being—if you think about a relationship with a human being—hopefully we don't just have a one-sided relationship, like "What can this imaginal figure do for me?" If we open up, if we play with that kind of way of entering into a relationship, where the image has a kind of autonomy and there's a two-way quality, then there's a fullness and multi-dimensionality. And yes, some relationships with images could go on for years. Absolutely.

CHAPTER 92

Instructions: Letting Go

Rob Burbea · 27 min

> In this dharma talk from the "Of Hermits and Lovers" retreat, Rob Burbea presents renunciation and letting go as essential threads in an expanded understanding of spiritual practice. Rather than viewing renunciation as the sole approach to desire, he emphasizes the importance of developing fluidity between different practice modalities - sometimes exploring desire with sensitivity, other times skillfully letting go.
>
> Burbea offers four practical approaches to renunciation: returning to nourishing practices like mettā and samādhi when our inner reservoir is depleted; investigating underlying emotions that may be driving surface desires; creating spacious awareness around the dukkha inherent in craving itself, allowing it to arise and naturally subside; and engaging in wise reflection on impermanence, the unsatisfactory nature of phenomena, and our past experiences with desire fulfillment.
> The talk emphasizes developing confidence in our capacity to let go, understanding that this ability grows stronger with practice. Burbea concludes with practical guidance for mindful eating as a laboratory for investigating the relationship between the senses and desire, suggesting mealtimes as opportunities to observe craving, vedanā (feeling-tone), and the mind's constructions around sensory experience. This teaching supports practitioners in cultivating the discernment to know when to explore desire and when to practice renunciation.

So if we want to expand our path, expand our sense of the possibility of what the path can be for us, what can open from the path, then obviously our practice needs to expand and our understanding as well needs to expand. A lot needs to expand, in fact—heart, soul, sensitivity. So it's asking quite a lot, this expansion of practice, asking for a lot of elements or threads to be woven together as part of the development. It's necessary. And that comes, like everything else, almost inevitably, gradually.

Already on the retreat we've introduced two or three threads, at least. We have the practice thread of cultivating this well-being in the energy body just as much as we can at any time. That's a kind of thread of intention that can be there at any time. We call that samādhi—gatheredness, harmonization, well-being. That's one thread. And that brings nourishment, brings deep nourishment to the body and to the mind and to the heart. This just dwelling, resting in this permeated well-being. That's a really important thread of practice.

The second thread is again related to the energy body but it's really using the energy body to be in touch with and to care for what's happening in the emotions. So the energy body as the indicator but also the vessel of care or one of the vessels of care for what's happening emotionally. Really important as a thread in practice.

And then yesterday we introduced the whole thread, the direction of imaginal practice and working with images there. And we talked about the balance with two-ness, between self and other, self and image.

So those three threads already, and they weave together like a rope is made of different threads. They support each other, you can move between them. So part of developing the art of practice is not only developing the art of each thread, but the art of moving, navigating. How do I approach this sitting or this moment or this walking? What's going on? Which thread will I explore? So there's a somewhat improvisatory element involved in that.

Now, add another thread, but it's a thread that you already know, that you're well familiar with—the thread of renunciation. So we're stretching what practice can be, but it relies on the basis of what we probably already know from our Dharma teachings.

So renunciation, letting go. It's all good and well and what we're trying to say is very important and fruitful to play with trusting desire at times. This is part of what this retreat is about. What if I trusted? What if I regard desire in a different way and approach it in a different way? And if you like, follow it—follow it in a sense, not necessarily act it out, but follow it in the psyche, in the being with the sensitivity, for example, in imaginal practice and we'll talk about other possibilities.

So that's great and we really want to offer that and open up that possibility as something that's not commonly offered. It's great and all very good, and you need more volume. And at times we want to just cool down, turn it off, let it go, drop it. Really, really good. Really kind. So to have these options, not to be stuck in any option, and just always bashing away at trying to do the same thing, always on one thread, on one tack of practice. We have this fluidity, this flexibility that we're slowly gathering skill and art in.

So sometimes, either you just discern, this is the wisest thing to do now—drop it, let go, let the desire go, go somewhere else. And other times, you might just deliberately try to explore that mode of dropping and letting go. So there's this fluidity and discernment that we need. We're slowly developing.

I want to remind you of that possibility and stress its importance today. As I said, really a kindness. If you like, the capacity and the ability to let go, to drop desire, is developable. In other words, it's something that with practice, with care, with attention, develops. We get better at it. We get more confident that we can let go of desire if we want to, when we want to. That confidence is really important as well.

Just to offer—and we could talk about this for weeks in fact, but just four possibilities. Probably you know them anyway. So rather than get into a whole extended thing and where this might lead, just four practice possibilities.

So the first is come back to what's nourishing. Come back to a nourishment practice. So what's a nourishment practice? Well something like loving kindness is a nourishment practice.

whether the loving kindness is directed towards yourself or towards another. Let's say, if I'm having a hard time here or I can't let go of something and I think, "I'll give myself loving kindness," maybe that's really helpful. Maybe I give someone else loving kindness. Look, it's got to permeate me on the way out. I'm going to get soaked in that loving kindness as well. So don't always think it has to be you—just loving-kindness mode will be nourishing.

When we talk about samadhi, that's almost by definition a nourishing state. I'm just going to hang out in this field, in this bubble and make it nice and warm and just as comfortable as can be and just dwell in that, let myself rest in that and be nourished by it.

Often we grasp at things and we can't let go because our level of nourishment, the reservoir, is too low. The water is low in the reservoir. You understand? So I'm looking out everywhere: What can I get? What's that? What about him? What about her? What about this? What's for lunch? And there's the anxiety of endless grasping coming from needing more nourishment. You understand? So indirectly taking care of the nourishment takes care of this kind of endless grasping and craving that's part of the human condition.

So, anything that brings any degree of yumminess—metta, samadhi, calmness, the harmonization of energy. What happens is our muscle to let go, just drop it and come back, whether that's the breath or the energy body or the metaphors or however you're doing it, just the more in our life we practice just this thing, and just drop it and come back, drop it, even if it feels completely futile, over time that muscle gets stronger. We get better at just dropping and returning. So to have faith in that—it's very, very simple.

Let me qualify that a little bit now and ask you: what is your tendency, what is your historical tendency in regard to that kind of practice and desire and dropping things? So you might be, historically, you look back at your years of practice and you see, "I tend to drop a lot and come back to my nostrils or whatever it is, or my abdomen or whatever it is." Or you might be the opposite: "I tend to be a very investigative type and I'm always going out exploring what's going on. I don't give much attention to developing the well-being and the nourishment."

So what's your tendency? What's your pattern? And sometimes it's good to just—okay, I realize that's my tendency, let's practice the opposite. Let's learn to lean the other way. You understand? So again, eventually in the service of this flexibility, we have just a multitude of directions possible to us. We can tack in any direction, we're free, we're fluid.

So, in this case, both the exploration of eros and desire, as we're opening it up, and also the letting go and the coming back. Always going the letting go route, as I think I said in the opening talk, as a way of living, it ends up being a little silly. It doesn't kind of cohere as a path of practice. It doesn't make sense. It's not our life and it doesn't fully serve our life. So we need some discernment here. Always going after desire and exploring eros and opening to it and letting it open us will also be somewhat unbalanced, and it will—if I do that, I won't be able to open other doors, for instance, the door of deep emptiness exploration, because that involves letting go of clinging.

Okay, so that's the first one, is just come back to something nourishing. That's the first possibility, just come back, come back, just drop it.

The second one is also a little bit related to nourishment and really it's to do with the possibility that sometimes what's happening when we're chasing after something—"I really need that thing, I really want that thing," or the mind is just distracted that way—what's actually happening is that there's some pain underneath the desire. The desire is not actually the primary thing. I don't really care about those chocolate cookies or whatever it is. What's happening is I feel lonely, or what's happening is there's grief, or there's heartache, or there's boredom. It could be something quite subtle as boredom, and we're disconnected from that heart state, and then we're going after this thing as a way of smoothing over, covering over what's going on. And we hope that somehow—if I can, it's not conscious of course—if I can disconnect enough I'll maybe get better.

No, we need to connect. Come back, come back, have a look at the heart. Something there might need caring for. And caring might just be connecting, which means just touching it, just holding it, just holding it in a caring awareness. That maybe is all it needs.

The connection heals. The kindness in the connection heals. And in being connected, we're more grounded and naturally step out of being chased by our desires. Coming back to what's painful might feel daunting, but the connection itself begins to slowly soothe what's painful. It starts to heal it. Then there isn't this sense of being propelled by some emotion that we're not fully conscious of. Does that make sense?

So the second option is to look at the emotions. If you're troubled by a desire, have a look at the emotions underneath. Give them some caring attention.

The third possibility involves recognizing that when there is craving, that craving is uncomfortable. The craving itself is dukkha—it's not an easeful feeling. There's tension and pressure that we feel when there is craving. You can feel it actually, certainly in the mind, but you can feel it in the body and in the energy body. The craving itself is dukkha.

Sometimes what we're craving—whether it's a cigarette or a drink or whatever it is—it's not even so much the thing that we're craving or the pleasure of it. We're craving the relief from the discomfort, the tension, the pressure of the feeling of craving. So when I get that thing, the balloon of pressure bursts. And it's actually that relief we're seeking. It's a kind of aversion again driving us, similar to the second practice thread. It's an aversion to the underlying emotion, or an aversion to the craving itself. We just want relief from that.

What's possible is getting in touch with that feeling of the discomfort of craving—the pressure, the tension of it. Where do I feel it? Sometimes you can feel it in the whole body, buzzing with that energy. Sometimes it's much more subtle. But it's really helpful to notice that craving is dukkha. Craving not only leads to dukkha—it is dukkha.

And what does this pressure need? All pressure needs is space. So I create more space around that pressure. I let it bubble away, this discomfort, but I give it more space in the awareness. If it's a pressure cooker and we make it bigger, the temperature goes down. That's how pressure cookers work—they create pressure and that heats things up more. So you create more space.

Just let it be. Let it be uncomfortable. It's going to be uncomfortable. Like when you stub your toe, you just have to give it some space for a few seconds, and it does its thing and then peters out.

So what happens here is this craving, this discomfort of craving, the pressure of it—I know it's unpleasant, I just create space around it and let it bubble away. It will rise, get more intense, and then reach a peak. Then it just subsides. And then it's gone, then you're free.

Now it might come back. But every time you go through that whole cycle—because you've given it space and not been dragged into action by it or into following the mind's proliferations—every time you do that, the whole cycle, the whole peak gets less. The intensity and grip of that craving on the whole system gets a little less, gets a little weaker. Make sense?

So that's the third possibility: noticing the discomfort, noticing the pressure and giving it space, just giving it space. Learning to tolerate, developing our capacity to tolerate the discomfort of craving.

This gives us confidence. You go through that cycle and you see, "Wow, this is possible." The strength of the being grows and the confidence of the being grows.

A fourth and last possibility for now is that a little bit of reflection can really be helpful.

So we get caught in wanting this thing or that thing, or this situation to unfold, or that person, or whatever it is. And how many times have we been through this before? How many times has it really satisfied us? Sometimes a little bit of reflection can be really helpful. What is this thing? What is getting this thing really going to give me? Am I really going to be fulfilled getting it? These are all very standard dharma approaches—you should be quite familiar with them.

Sometimes it's a matter of going deeper into what I want. Is this thing what I really want? Do I even really want it? I'm so caught up there, but is that really what I want? What I deeply want? Recognizing it's not what I really deeply want, there can be more ease in letting go.

Sometimes it's remembering how often in the past we've gotten what we wanted, but it ended up being not quite what we had imagined it might be before we got it. Surely. Almost always things turn out differently than what we think. So it's like bringing that wisdom at the starting end instead of at the end end. It's like, "Oh yeah, wait a minute. This relationship, this whatever—forget about it. It's not going to make you completely happy." And if we're exploring desire and opening to that, it's not because we think it's going to make us really happy. There are other reasons.

Lastly, there's just the reflection on impermanence. This thing will change. I will change. What I want will change. This thing will change. Change, change, change. Impermanence. Just reflecting on that. Sometimes beginning to notice impermanence, beginning to look at beginnings and endings. Lunch comes and then it goes—where has it gone? The retreat comes and then it goes. Everything. Interactions. Mind states—"I really want some of that samādhi they keep going on about." It comes and it goes.

All the sense contact, it all comes and goes. Impermanence happens on all time scales. Lives come and go. Death comes. Birth, life, death. Galaxies come and go. Mind states come and go many times over a day. Relationships come and go. Moments come and go—these words right now, how many different sounds, moment to moment.

So sometimes just inclining more towards impermanence—we're not really going to do that too much on this retreat, but it's a possibility—just going into that mode where everything's impermanent, and one lets go more.

Related to that, because everything is impermanent, everything is dukkha, everything cannot ultimately satisfy. So another possibility is going into a mode where whatever comes up, it's just dukkha, it's just unsatisfactory. All it means—it's not a philosophy of life, it's just a kind of gear, a possible thread you can pick up. Half an hour, an hour, ten minutes, whatever comes up—the sensations in the back, dukkha; the sides, dukkha; the sounds, dukkha, unsatisfactory.

I'm not saying that is the reality of things. It's a mode of looking. It's a way of looking. And there's just letting go, letting go. Why? Because things cannot satisfy. Just let go. Let them come, let them go. Very, potentially very beautiful.

This sounds like it might be a recipe for misery, but actually it's the opposite. Something really—I know that many of you in this room understand this—very beautiful opens up in practice, what it can reveal for beings. But that's a more extended possibility.

So we have these threads we're weaving together in terms of expanding the path. We have quite a few threads already. Don't get overwhelmed, but learn to navigate between them. One thread is this business about renunciation, which you can approach in different ways.

In a minute it's lunchtime, and I'd like to offer a thread within a thread. I invite you to take food, taste, smell, and sight as themes for exploring the senses and desire in relation to the senses. Mealtimes can be excellent places to investigate and explore these teachings.

We'll pick this up at several points during the retreat. For the starting, entry-level approach to this practice, we'll work with our theme of renunciation for today. One way of approaching this whole arena of how the senses engage with food is to look at it from the perspective of renunciation practices.

What this might mean is taking at least one, but perhaps several mealtimes, meditatively. There will be a lunch queue, and you may find yourself at a certain position in that queue. What happens in terms of the movement of craving in relation to where you are?

You can stand there in the queue and be aware of craving, if it arises. It might be craving for the lunch itself. It might be craving with a fear component—will there be enough left when I get there? Will all the good food have gone? This too is part of craving. You can simply be aware of that.

Standing in the queue becomes meditation—just opening to these movements of mind and heart. When you have the food and you're selecting it, remain aware of your relationship with taking. Do I fear that I won't have enough and pile the plate high? Am I stingy with myself? There's so much to discover in our relationship with food.

Then there are the smells and sights. This word vedanā—one translation is sensation. The sensations when food is in the mouth, or the smell, will give rise to hopefully mostly pleasant sensations. But this is quite interesting. If you really meditate on the food, on the sensations arising in your mouth, what's actually there?

There are explosions—vivid explosions of taste. Not much else. Gaps between them. What is the mind building up around the whole experience? What does it think food will be? Actually find out. Be close with the sensation.

What happens with unskillful craving is we get caught up with the mind's idea of what an experience is, instead of being at the level of sensation. There's taste, there's smell, there's sight. I invite this practice as a starting point, and we'll develop it further with food as the days go by.

You're probably familiar with this approach. I simply invite that practice—it could be now, could be at some point—but do at least a couple of mealtimes like that. At least a couple, and we'll continue from there.

But enjoy lunch, dear friends. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 93

Opening to Desire and the Imaginal (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 40 min

> In this Q&A session, Rob Burbea responds to practitioners' questions about opening to desire and working with imaginal practice. He addresses how the energy body can contract when images arise, offering guidance on maintaining spaciousness through the 'two-ness' practice of holding both awareness and imagery simultaneously. Burbea explores the relationship between desire and depression, suggesting that some forms of depression may arise from blocked eros or an absence of alive images rather than simply lacking desire. He discusses how reification creates obstacles to the natural flow of soul-making, and how eros seeks to expand and penetrate into the imaginal realm. The talk covers practical concerns about being flooded by difficult imagery when opening awareness, distinguishing between imaginal engagement and overwhelming exposure to world suffering. Burbea emphasizes that imaginal practice requires developing sensitivity to navigate subtle energetic shifts and the natural forks that arise in contemplative practice, whether moving toward samadhi, staying with pure energy, or engaging with images.

I will try and repeat the question so that anyone who's listening can hear it better. And if you'd rather your question isn't recorded, then just let us know and we'll press pause.

Tom is asking about working with the energy body. He's saying there are times when he can establish a relatively spacious energy body that feels very nice, comfortable, pleasant, and really yummy. But there are other times, especially when an image comes, that the attention contracts towards or around the image, and with that the energy body contracts as well.

This is partly why Catherine was doing the two-ness exercise and what we did on the first day. It's like, can I have that and this? It takes practice—we need to develop that ability to have both.

I would guess a lot of this stuff is supported by not just one thing, but many different things. One of them is simply the more you hang out in that energy body space, and the more you take that with you into daily life. Here's the thing: splitting life into formal meditation and the rest of life is a mistake for a start. So you sit, and that's maybe where in the sitting or walking or standing you get your first taste of this nice energy body awareness. When you end the meditation, take that with you.

In other words, end it slowly and see if you can get up off the cushion and walk away with that energy body feeling. Standing in the lunch queue, can I just get it back? Walking meditation in the energy body is really helpful, obviously, because it's mobile and that's more like life.

The more you can get a taste of this, what the energy body becomes is just—it becomes eventually the default hangout. It's this kind of "this is nice," and we want to be here, and it feels good, and there are little micro-adjustments and things. So the more you do it, and the more you spread that doing into different activities, that will help.

Then you can begin doing more of what Catherine introduced on the first day or second day—this kind of doing it in relationship. Now it's hard with a human other. Most people find it hard with a human other because a human other is a whole other world and they're looking at you and maybe they're judging you and who knows what. So it's probably easier with something like a tree or something. You practice extending it like that, and then also with images.

It might work the other way around, though, in the sense that when an image becomes alive as an image—in other words, not just a mental picture and not just a fixation—when it comes alive in that imaginal way, then you might find that your energy body is actually quite expanded. So it's not just the fact of an object and the mind doing that contraction. It's actually the nature of the object and the relationship with it.

I would wonder whether actually it's not quite a uniform experience that you're having. There are differences—when there's a different relationship with the image, there will also be different effects on the energy body. So look out for that as well.

It's not that you need to try and do something with the energy body with the image. First of all, it might not be really a soul image. It might just be whatever mental content. That's fine. Or it might be that just as you hang out more with a certain image, it becomes more infused with the imaginal, and that changes the energy body relationship with it.

Everything that's involved in the imaginal or in a soul-making dynamic feeds everything else. It's connected with everything else. So where you see the problem—like "oh, my energy body's contracted"—is not always the place where you need to go and try and fix it. You can give attention to other aspects of the whole constellation, and that will just naturally fix itself. There are a lot of different ways you can work with that.

Today the practice was to open to the current of desire. I would like to know your thoughts when there is...

heroes like a flame that is not fueled, or if it is rather the case that eros is always alive but part of it has taken hold of an idea or an image, has turned against itself and is counteracting a part of this current of desire. Do you have any thoughts on this and how to work with that lack of desire?

"Yeah, the lack of desire or the... Yeah, lack of feelings."

"Okay, so... You made that noise again, didn't you?"

"Did I make that noise?"

"I was just going to agree with Ramiro about the... If you look at it in terms of life force, certainly if a life force is kind of got to be encapsulated with an inner critic, for example, that's a lot of life force in there. It's not necessarily eros, but it's a lot of life force to hold us down. So I was just agreeing with that point."

"So let me see if I can summarize, if I understood. So I'm a little tired today. So what happens when there's a kind of depression, really, you know. Is it that there's a lack of desire, or is it that somehow the desire has got kind of stuck or worked back on itself in a way that's stifling and closing down something, or something like what Catherine just said? I don't know. I'm interested. To me, it's a really interesting question."

I certainly think, and just relating to what Catherine said, so let's take something like the inner critic. Imagination is involved in the inner critic. It's got this voice or this character or whatever. What the inner critic is not is imaginal, generally speaking. So in our... What's happened there is something's got reified. Actually, more than one thing has got reified. The inner critic has got reified, and I've got reified.

So if we go back to this self-other-world business, both self and other are both reified. They're concretized. I really believe what the inner critic is saying about me. So even if I don't believe the inner critic's a real person or thing or character, I believe what they say, that kind of object, is saying something real about a real subject, me. So the problem is in the reification.

There's a lot to your question, but what happens when there's a reification is it's like... push of the eros. This eros wants to push. It wants to expand. It wants to penetrate. It wants to open. It wants more. It's this pothos with the eros. It has this dynamic quality. When it meets some kind of block, and there can be all kinds of blocks, but one kind of block is reification, concretization, that push meets the block. Something's going to happen.

Either the push of the eros, the life force, is strong enough to break the block. And then it can go through that reification block into the realm of the imaginal. And the imaginal has the capacity to expand deeper, get richer feedback on the eros, make the whole thing really fertile. If the block is stronger than the eros, or just really entrenched, then something can happen. The eros cannot move into depth, cannot move into dimensionality, into the imaginal. It has to do something, and yet could get tied up in a negativity, could just have to go horizontally, all kinds of things.

So there's that possibility, and I guess it could happen in many ways. There might also be, and you also mentioned, what can happen is, I sometimes wonder, I think, I'm certainly not an expert on depression, but I wonder whether depression is actually, like so many things, many different kinds. And one kind of depression is actually the absence of fantasy. The absence of anything, any kind of image, specifically around the self or around one's activity in life or expression, that is not alive as an image, is not permitted or hasn't found its way. And then there's nothing to kind of, the waters of eros or the fire of eros to flow into and galvanize and give life to, which then feeds back into the whole libidinal energy in the whole life.

So yes, sometimes I think depression is an absence of image. Or it's an image that's fixation, to borrow Catherine's word from this morning, and there's a stuckness.

This is a fascinating question. The fear of opening too wide and being flooded by all the painful images we carry - the torture, cruelty, and suffering we've absorbed throughout our lives - feels very real. But I wonder if this kind of flooding actually happens when we're truly open, or when there's repression.

Think of that pressure cooker image again. What you're describing - opening the awareness really wide - is almost by definition an easing of pressure. There's more space, so less constriction. When awareness expands, it creates room rather than intensity.

Jung went through a period around 1913 that he described as nearly psychotic, documented in his Red Book with all its florid, overwhelming imagery. But I wonder how much this was a product of his particular time - before the First World War, when there was enormous collective repression brewing, when the whole psychological framework was built around the dangerous "unconscious" that could erupt and overwhelm consciousness.

We live in different times now. I don't think there's that same kind of pressure building toward flooding for most people. When you're genuinely open in the way you're describing, the tendency is actually toward a kind of beneficial liquidity - more images can flow, but they flow rather than erupting.

Paradoxically, when awareness is really wide and open, it often moves in the direction of quieting imagery altogether, toward what we call non-fabrication. So rather than being flooded, you might find that painful images - the dark, torturous images of world suffering - do arise, but they arise within this vast, spacious awareness that can hold them without being overwhelmed.

The flooding typically happens when we've been holding these images in a pressurized way, when there's been unconscious resistance or repression. True openness creates the very container that can receive whatever arises with grace.

Absolutely. The imaginal is essentially a certain set of ways of relating. I can turn on the news and be flooded with really difficult imagery these days—and that's a reality, let's say. I don't take it imaginatively. I still have to navigate that in my heart and my soul and my house: how am I going to work with this and with my sensitivity and the way I'm impacted and the pain in the world and try to respond to that and take care of it and balance my compassion. So all that has to do with compassion practice. It's really, really important.

When we're talking about the imaginal realm, we're talking about, to some extent, a different kind of relationship with that imagery. Already people are starting to report something that is very common with imaginal practice: an image that the mind at first goes, "Oh, that's horrific, that's violent, or that's dark, or that's weird, or whatever." And in the realm of imaginal practice, it's like, just stay with that. Can I just have a little bit of trust in that image? It's not a flat, literalized image of something that's going on in the world. It's imaginal. What looks dark and disturbing has got its own kind of beauty and its own kind of reason. If I can stay with it and trust it, it opens up in a different way.

So it's almost like mixing camps a little bit in your question. What's the real pain in the world and what's more imaginal things that come out? They're different. Is this making sense?

Absolutely. As I said at some point, what we're doing here is asking a lot. It's kind of saying that to do this kind of practice we're talking about requires that we have skill with our emotions—which means knowing when we're numbing, taking care of it, learning how to soften the heart, open it, take care of it, balance it, be sensitive. It's a lot already, that's a lot—in relationship to our personal history, in relationship to present relationships, in relationship to world pain.

So all that's kind of—we're not talking that much about that on this retreat, partly because we're just kind of saying, let's build on that as if it's already there. But we know this is difficult stuff. So I'm not sure what else to say about that piece right now. Could we talk about it another time, perhaps, if that's okay? But it's a really, really important question.

"I was spending time doing that, and it's very romantic."

"Spending time opening that desire?"

"Well, I suppose, yeah, opening that desire. And then I suppose from it, it wasn't the way that Catherine described, or the other people, the way she described it. It wasn't like, oh, I had..."

"So let me check with you. I was picking up on Catherine's talk last night and the instructions this morning, with opening to desire, and the desire was to just see people happy and flourish. And then what happened seemed to be neither just opening to the energy and having that desire manifest nor something imaginal but it was more like an opening to a realm of happiness—is that a realm of not an individual image but kind of like as if I was walking through that world?"

"Oh, okay. So my question is why is that not imaginal? It's an imaginal realm, an imaginal world of that."

"I suppose I was just checking."

So, yes, absolutely. There's a couple of things there. It's an imaginal realm, an imaginal world. Yes, linger there, enjoy it. When an image opens up, it's asking us for sensitivity. It's asking us to resonate with it. It's asking us to be with it and in it and relate to it.

It might be that then it unfolds some other—you know, it might be that it feeds back on this world and the way you see this world, so to speak. That would be one of the ways that it could kind of infuse or mix with the perception of this world. And then that would be an interesting thing. But there's all kinds of possibilities. It sounds like that's what's opening there.

And so in terms of the instructions, I think I said this morning, it can, once you're open to that, it could go into an image, which sounds like what you're describing, or it could just stay with the energy free of image, and you just have that. And they're both fine choices.

Both experiences point to something beautiful about the nature of practice itself: almost every step along the way presents us with choices, with what I think of as forks in the road. This happens constantly—whether we're exploring emptiness practice, developing samadhi, working with the imaginal, or following desire. Every short while, the path branches, and we learn to sense which direction to take, or sometimes the way simply unfolds naturally.

Someone shared a perfect example of this today in a note. They found themselves in what began as a sexual fantasy, stayed with it, and somehow discovered they had moved into jhana. This is actually quite common, and there are several reasons why this happens.

Much of it relates to the energy involved. Sexual energy can be remarkably similar to piti—that quality of rapture we cultivate in meditation. What typically occurs with sexual fantasies is that we become fixated on the images while remaining disconnected from the broader body experience. We might feel sensation in specific areas, but we're not opening to the full energy body or allowing the sexual energy to spread throughout our being.

But if we approach it differently—if we take that same fantasy or daydream and, instead of fixating on the images, allow the energy of enjoyment to spread, opening to the sexual energy itself—it naturally moves toward a beautiful energy body experience and samadhi. This represents one of those forks I mentioned.

This principle applies to any image that comes alive imaginally. When an image truly awakens in this way, it will always be reflected in the energy body through some kind of harmonization, opening, or pleasurable sensation. This energetic response serves as one of our most reliable indicators that we're moving in the right direction with an image—even when our rational mind protests that what's arising seems weird, dark, violent, or somehow inappropriate.

The energy body offers honest feedback about our imaginal work. At any moment when this energetic aliveness is present, we can choose to let the image go and simply rest with the energy body, or we can continue playing with both the image and the energy together. These choices keep appearing throughout our practice.

As we go deeper, much of our development centers around cultivating sensitivity, responsiveness, and delicacy in navigating these subtle currents. I imagine it might be like hang gliding—learning to ride the air currents with tremendous subtlety, picking up on what's available in each moment. Sometimes these movements are extraordinarily subtle, requiring us to sense a possibility and then gently incline toward it. Other times, it feels more as though the soul itself possesses its own intelligence, guiding and offering the unfolding in ways that surprise us.

Let me turn to someone who hasn't spoken yet. David, was it you who wanted to ask something?

David shared two interconnected questions. First, regarding the instruction to follow the stream of desire—he finds this experience quite dynamic, sometimes very strong, sometimes extremely subtle, but often accompanied by intense and quite enjoyable energy. His second concern relates to physical pain in his shoulders, neck, or back that frequently arises during retreat. Following the suggestion to inquire into the deeper wanting beneath the pain, he received a series of answers that seemed to exist at different levels, with the deepest pointing toward some form of perfectionism.

When you mention that "it's pointing to," David, do you mean the desire itself or the physical pain? And when you speak of getting rid of it, are you referring to the desire, the pain, or both?

But there's not that sense of the eros building or being ignited or kindling in some way. Yeah, so a few things. Sometimes when there's an opening, it's almost like we need to rest there for a while. There's something that needs to integrate or settle or be received. And we can actually push too much, you know, if we're like, "Well, that was nice, but now what? Where's the eros?" There's a way that the psyche needs to actually receive what just happened.

So that would be one possibility. Another thing is - and this is something we'll talk about more - but sometimes the eros is actually in the opening itself. It's not that we open and then the eros comes after. The eros is actually the opening. There's an aliveness, there's a dynamism in the very process of opening that we might not recognize as eros because we have ideas about what eros should look like or feel like.

And the third thing is that sometimes when we've had an opening, there's a kind of natural completion to that movement. It's like the desire has been fulfilled in some way, at least temporarily. And so there isn't more eros there because that particular thread has reached a kind of natural conclusion for now. And then we wait, and usually something else will arise, another desire, another longing, another movement.

But if we're too impatient and we're like, "Well, where's the next thing?" we might actually not allow the space for the next desire to emerge naturally. Does that make sense? So sometimes there's a quality of receptivity, of just being available, that allows the next movement of the soul to show itself.

Yeah? Okay. Someone else?

Yes?

Actually, can I just add one more thing to what I just said? Sometimes when we've had an opening, particularly if it's been quite significant, there can be what we might call a "fear of the depth" or a "fear of the bigness" of what we touched. And so part of us might actually be putting on the brakes a little bit, not allowing the eros to build again because we're a little overwhelmed by what we contacted. And that's completely understandable. So if you sense that might be happening, you could just acknowledge that and maybe ask, "What would allow me to feel safe enough to let this energy move again?" or "What support do I need to be able to open to this aliveness?"

And then there doesn't seem to be much eros present. I would prefer to connect the word eros with the imaginal. It comes and goes—it's not something that's there all the time. When an image reconstellates, then the eros will return in relation with that image. This isn't something to worry about or some state we're trying to sustain.

What you've accomplished in the opening to the current of desire practice, if you've done it in the classical way, is that you've let go of images. There's a fullness of libidinal energy that transforms into something that's not eros and not imaginal. So then you're resting in that state, which is totally understandable and not a problem at all.

Eros is connected with image and fantasy. When there's craving, you can transform that into eros. But you don't need to worry about maintaining eros all the time. Like everything else, it moves in waves, and certain conditions feed it.

I'd suggest two approaches. First, if you want to return to the imaginal, it's a matter of loosening again—perhaps loosening the energy body through some emptiness practice, liquefying the psyche so that images can be reborn. When some issue arises or presents itself, that will reconstellate the whole imaginal realm, and with it, eros.

But also, we can look for eros where it's already present—where we love, where something holds meaning for us. You don't always need to search for an intrapsychic image. You could look around you on this retreat and notice the meaningfulness it holds, the appreciation, the love, the dedication. Eros is connected with all of that—here in the environment, in the world around us.

The third possibility is that eros can be extremely subtle. Rather than wanting more eros and worrying that it's something you lack, what might be needed is greater sensitivity in noticing its much more delicate manifestations. Eros can rage powerfully, or it can be incredibly subtle. This could be quite an interesting exploration.

To me, much of practice is about opening—expanding our capacity and skills, our ability to handle more than we thought possible. When we consider the world, compassion, our own emotions and energies, much of our practice involves this expanding work. It's about developing the capacity for a great deal to move through us and touch us deeply in a way that's truly sustainable.

But there's also a whole dimension of practice evolution where things become much more subtle, with fewer fireworks. This may be calling for greater sensitivity, more attunement to subtleties. We often learn tremendously from these quieter experiences rather than the more dramatic ones. This might be part of what you're encountering as well.

CHAPTER 94

Instructions: Opening to the Current of Desire

Rob Burbea · 30 min

> In this dharma talk from the retreat "Of Hermits and Lovers: The Alchemy of Desire," Rob Burbea presents a radical departure from traditional approaches to desire. Rather than viewing desire solely as the source of dukkha, he introduces a practice called "opening to the current of desire" - a three-step method that transforms our relationship with wanting itself.
>
> The practice involves: first, identifying what we're truly wanting at a deeper level beyond specific objects or people; second, temporarily setting aside conventional dharma teachings about desire being problematic and trusting that there may be soul intelligence within our longing; and third, genuinely opening the energy body to allow the current of desire to move freely. Through detailed examples, Burbea demonstrates how this approach can yield the very thing we seek - not through getting the external object, but through recognizing its essence as already present within our being.
> This teaching challenges practitioners to discern between desire itself and the accompanying feelings of lack, frustration, or grief that often become entangled with it. Burbea emphasizes that this is an internal practice focused on energy transformation rather than external action, though he acknowledges that sometimes desires do call for manifestation in the world. The talk offers a sophisticated exploration of how trust in desire's deeper intelligence can open pathways to abundance, freedom, and fulfillment that transcend conventional subject-object dynamics.

We've got this general idea that we've got threads that we're weaving together—threads that we can actually separate and move between in our practice as we navigate our experience. We've got the thread of what we're calling samadhi in the energy body and cultivating that well-being—really, really helpful. We've got the thread of awareness of our emotions in the energy body, with the energy body, through the energy body—also a really indispensable element of practice, really important in developing the art. Then we've got this whole infinite area of imaginal practice to explore.

On this retreat specifically, we're interested in eros in the imaginal. Of course that involves all imaginal practice. Eros can be very, very strong—obviously sexual—to very, very subtle and not sexual at all. But eros is, I would say, an intrinsic part of the imaginal, and the imaginal involves eros. So in this retreat we're exploring the imaginal with that thread as one of the main emphases, and within that, the exploration of eros. So that's the third thread.

The fourth thread involves the whole investigation into the dynamics of polarity, of two-ness and one-ness as part of what happens both in imaginal practice and just in perception generally. That's a part of desire and eros. And then the last thread so far is what we introduced yesterday—the thread of renunciation, letting go.

So I'd like to add another possibility, another thread that we actually really encourage you to try out and explore. Any of these threads you can use as much or as little as you want, dip in, dip out, and so on. But we would really encourage you to explore at least a little bit what we're going to offer now.

To make a distinction: as I've just said, in imaginal practice, or with imaginal practice, eros is implicit. It's intrinsically woven in. When something is imaginal, when something or other comes alive to us imaginatively, there is eros involved. Where there is eros, if it's left to do its thing, if it's not blocked in some way, it will open up the imaginal. So the imaginal and eros kind of go together.

What I want to introduce now this morning as a possibility is a practice we call opening to the current of desire. And in this practice, the delineation I'd like to make is we actually let go of the image. The image is not so much primary, and we're working more with the energy of desire. So when there's eros, image is implicit and we tend to work in the field or in relationship with an image. This is almost like letting the image go a little bit and focusing more on the energy, as I'll try to explain.

So there's a delineation there. Like all delineations, it falls apart at a certain point—it blurs, the distinctions are not that clear. What's common to these two practices—the imaginal eros and the opening to the current of desire—is that they both involve a trust. Trust is necessary to some degree, even just a little bit, just a grain of trust: trusting in the image, trusting in the imaginal in one case, and actually in both cases, trusting desire and trusting eros.

So we're not letting go, as in the renunciation thread. We're actually opening to desire here, allowing it, trusting it, and seeing what that opens for us, in us, what that opens to us.

There are three steps to this practice. It's actually quite simple. I'll say what they are and then go through some examples and then nuance it a little bit.

The first step: if you notice some dukkha, some dis-ease, some suffering—or even if you just notice a desire—you can work with this. If you notice dukkha, there will be desire wrapped up in it. That's basic Dharma teaching. Where there is dukkha, there is desire wrapped up in it. So if you notice either dukkha or desire, you can ask yourself: What am I wanting here?

Even if I don't actually see a desire at first, if all I notice is dukkha—I feel this or that—actually bring in the question: What am I wanting here? But what am I wanting more deeply? So you have to go really to the deep level of the desire. Rather than this person or that thing, that car, whatever it is, something more abstract, seemingly abstract. What am I really after here? Something seemingly more general.

Here's this thing that I want, this person that I want, this relationship that I want, this event that I want to unfold a certain way, whatever it is. And letting that go—letting that fixated image, that fixation go—and coming to the generality of what it is that I want. It's a deeper level.

It might seem more abstract, but it's actually a deeper level. So here, as I said, the image is not primary. In imaginal practice, we're not saying the image represents my desire for this or the image represents this quality in me or whatever. We have the idea in imaginal practice that we entertain the idea that the image is primary, like we said with Linda the other day. Here we let go of that and we come to something more general, more abstract underneath.

So we're unhooking from the specific object that we feel we want—the specific person, the specific event, the specific fixated image. You're unhooking from that and finding something deeper. What is it that I'm really after here?

The second step is to just, if you like, sweep aside whatever dharma preconceptions you have about desire. We all know desire is a problem, it leads to suffering, it's a defilement, all that. Just temporarily sweep them off the table and just drop in a couple of grains of trust. Maybe this desire, maybe there's a soul intelligence that's stimulating, that's giving birth to this desire. Maybe this desire is a manifestation of a deeper soul intelligence. Maybe there's a treasure here in this desire. Just temporarily, we're playing with that conception, that trust, just a little bit.

Now those first two steps could be done in any order. In other words, you can entertain the idea that there may be something to trust here, there may be a treasure here in the desire. You could do that first, and then you could ask, now what is that deeper desire? What is it that I'm really after here?

The third step is to open to the current of that desire, to really open up the body, open up the field of the body for that energy of desire to move. I'm making this gesture upward as we heard. Yes, oftentimes it is upward, but it might not be. It could be outward, and as Catherine was describing in the talk yesterday, it could go downward. Something is dynamic. Something in desire is dynamic. Desire is a dynamic force. And we feel that energetically in the body. So what is it to really open the body to that current of desire?

Now, I mean really, really open. Everyone in here has heard "open to whatever is going on"—a desire or a pain or a sadness, be with it, accept it—sort of general mindfulness teachings. I mean really open. I don't mean just be aware of it and kind of it's okay that you have this desire right now. I mean really open. Open the being to it so that you can actually let that current move as much as possible—the current, the stream, the energy of desire in the energy body.

What happens when you do that? Something very, very interesting happens, actually. I'll come back to the example that Catherine used last night, but that already gives it away. Something doesn't at first make sense in terms of traditional dharma teachings. What happens is an abundance comes, a sense of abundance comes into the being, is given and made manifest in the being. The state of consciousness and of body transforms. Peace comes, joy comes. The thing that we wanted, that which we really desired, is then palpably and immediately recognized and felt to be here. I have it already, whatever it was that I was after.

We may come back to this on this retreat because there are different ways that that which we're already after, whatever that is, is already present. But this is one of them. Somehow, in the treasure of the desire, it has yielded to my being, and opened to my being, the very thing that I wanted, and I haven't done anything different in the world. He may still not be interested in me, or whatever it is, can't get that job, whatever it is.

So let me give a few examples. I'm a little wary of time, but I want you to understand this. I'll give four examples. I hope that's not too much. The first one is actually in a way the most straightforward. The other ones are nuanced a little bit.

The first one was, I was sitting upstairs when I used to live here, and this is some years ago. Something was going on politically with Gaia House, I can't even remember what it was, and it was troubling me. And so I was sitting in meditation, I was troubled by whatever the situation was, and for some reason it occurred to me to ask myself, what am I really wanting here?

What's going on here? What is the desire for? What I saw was that what came was - again, it's this - I want this problem to go away, or whatever it was politically. I actually can't remember, like I said. But the deeper answer that came was freedom from constraint. What I wanted was freedom from constraint.

You hear the generality of that? It can sound a little abstract, but actually it was very meaningful to me. It's not an image, it's a kind of abstraction, if you like, but a personal one rooted in the being. So I really just let myself open to that, let myself feel that desire, and lo and behold, what came was freedom from constraint. I felt it. Nothing had changed in Gaia House politics - it probably still hasn't changed. Sorry, can we take that bit off? Yeah, I'm a dinosaur.

But there it was - the freedom from constraint was palpable, and the release of that was right there in the moment, in the being, to enjoy, to open to. And I thought, isn't that interesting? So that's a very straightforward example.

Second example: I was working with someone a few weeks ago, and here there wasn't any dukkha. So in my example there was dukkha. In this example there wasn't any dukkha, and she said - she was talking about someone, her lover - "I want to kiss him on the mouth." And there wasn't a problem there. She could kiss him on the mouth or whatever.

But then I was exploring this a little bit and asked, "What comes with that image?" So again, we're not sustaining the image as prime. What comes with that image? What is it that you're really after? Or what do you imagine you'd get through kissing him on the mouth? There's no, absolutely no hint of "what do you imagine you'd get" as we were doing yesterday. It's like there's nothing - it's not dukkha, it's not impermanent, a kiss on the mouth is not... So we've changed gear here, right? We're out of that "it's unsatisfactory" mode. You get that?

What do you imagine you'd get through kissing him on the mouth? And she said, "Joining. I'd get joining."

So I was working with her and thinking, is that deep enough? Is that abstract enough? It turned out it was. It could have gone to another level. I asked again, "What do you get through joining?" - take it to an even deeper level, more general if you like. But actually it turned out to be fine. That was enough, and there the sense of joining came right there, without the kiss. And it wasn't through imagining; it was through the energy. So it was enough, and there was the delight of joining right there in that moment.

Third example: This is from some years ago. I just need to remind myself of the different elements because it's a little bit complicated. I was working with a woman in an interview and she was about to go off to California. She'd met someone there - a guy - and they were about to start a new romance. It had just been long-distance texting and Skype mostly before that. Anyway, there was some contact electronically.

But she came into the interview in a state of anxiety about the whole thing. And she said, "I'm craving."

And I feel that's painful. I feel the contraction of it."

We talked a little about it. She expressed a fear of loss—perhaps she would go out there and it wouldn't work out. So alongside all the loveliness of a new romance was this anxiety, this fear that maybe it wouldn't work out.

The first thing we did was talk in the more standard dharma way about craving and how it relates to dukkha. Craving involves what we might call hype—papañca. When there's craving, the mind goes into hype about how wonderful it's going to be, how great this thing will be when I get there. The same happens with aversion—how terrible this thing is going to be.

So craving involves hype. We discussed how the mind in the grip of craving constructs an artificial distinction between things and times, making them seem so dramatically different. Here and now seems so different from there and then. It's hyped up by the mind through craving.

She expressed this perfectly in her own words: "The adventure begins then when I get to California. Now it's just waiting, it's just limbo." So now was just boring waiting time. Here and now—there and then would be the adventure. Even though there was lots of Skyping and texting, lovely exchanges, the mind was creating and emphasizing this polarity between things and times, events and times.

Do you see it? Is it really that different? This is more standard dharma teaching. Is it really that different—things and times, here and now, there and then, past or future?

In dharma language we could deconstruct it. What do I have here? What is my world here? It's five aggregates: body, feelings, perceptions, mental formations and consciousness. Six sense fields: touch, taste, smell, sight, sound and mind. I have that here, I have that there, I have it pretty much wherever I go. Is it really that different? A little bit different kinds of pleasure, different kinds of unpleasantness. There's a deconstruction of the hype.

Deconstruct it into the elements of existence. Is it really that different? So that's standard dharma teaching. Less hype, less craving. Less craving, less hype. They feed each other.

But then I was interested in working in a different way, seeing what else might open up. I asked her, "What are you wanting? What do you want?"

She said, "Him." It was obvious. And it's hard to see—it's like, what do you mean? Of course it's him. It's hard to see that it's more than that.

As I gently explored whether that question could open up, she began to go deeper. She said, "I love that I can say anything and that I'm listened to." This opened things up. Going deeper into this question of what she was wanting, she said actually there were four things—quite complex, but you can hear the generalities here.

"I want the opening of the heart. I want the expression. I want the connection and being received. And I want to love." Four things.

Can you hear the generalities there? So here the desire is not landing on a limited object.

Then we did this thing: Can you really trust that? Can you really open to that? Just trust it a little bit. Really, really open to it.

Now for her, that current was unfamiliar. The force of it was unfamiliar—a little bit like what Catherine was alluding to last night. The current was deeper and more powerful than who she usually took herself to be.

So can you let it fill the body? Can you really allow it? Can you really feel it?

Her boundaries of self began to dissolve. Now where she was at in her practice, that was quite a new thing. So we worked a little bit with kind of being okay with that. There was the expansion of the sense of being. There was a little bit of fear with that, as I said. We investigated the fear, brought in some compassion, and so on. And that was enough for her for that time. But something was really opening.

Eventually, whether it's gradually or suddenly, we are able to allow that kind of expansion, that kind of dissolution. There's a whole new sense of self, of life force—strength, openness, independence, not dependent on the object of desire being there, fulfilled somehow to a great extent by what we could say the life force opening, the deep desire flowing, not on getting.

This is not so much standard Dharma teaching.

Fourth example, just to revisit the example from last night that Catherine shared in her talk: someone in the group saying, "I want not feeling alive. I want to feel alive," having a fixated image, letting go of that, "I want to feel alive," and then what happened is the aliveness came—in this case came down, that current. Then what happened is it went into an imaginal image.

So there's a little bit of a fork in the road here. In other words, liberating the desire this way can open up the realm of the imaginal, and that can be very fruitful—and you go into the imaginal. Or it opens up the being, and what we want is already here, and there doesn't need to be an image. So it can go either way.

Let me just say a little bit because sometimes what happens—often times what happens, but not always—is that wrapped up in our experience of desire is the feeling of lack, a feeling of frustration, a feeling of perhaps grief or loss, or a presumption of not getting and not being able to get. We just either assume it's a fact or we just assume that.

In other words, desire is wrapped up with elements that make it more complex and more problematic. It's really helpful then to be able to discern sometimes what's wrapped up with my experience of desire and my assuming I won't be able to get. But why? Because it's always been that way for me. Is it actually what I'm feeling—not so much the desire but the lack or the frustration? These are actually different things. They get intertwined. Do you understand?

So sometimes with this practice that we're opening up to, sometimes what we need to do is to care for those other elements first, and need to discern: are they present? What else is present? Is there a sense of lack? Is there a sense of crushedness, impossibility, frustration, grief, whatever? Discern them and actually go to them first and care for them. This—we've talked about at other times—but this kind of heart work is really, really important.

And sometimes we do not need to do that. Sometimes we don't need to do that. So often in these circles, there can be a kind of habit just over years. It's really good practice to do that, but sometimes we don't need to do that. We don't need to be with the difficult first.

Sometimes, as I said, there's a habit of the movement of the mind and the heart to go to the difficult, to the lack, to the frustration, to the grief or whatever. And we can get a little bit stuck in that. We always do that, always do that. And in a way, we never get out of it. So I'm not liberating the desire, I'm just going to that lack and that pain. And it might be tender, it might be lovely, but there's a way sometimes that it just stays there.

I'm just circling endlessly in my sense of lack. This doesn't always happen, but it's a very real possibility. The attention becomes habitually drawn to the lack, to the grief, to the disappointment, to the frustration. What I don't see is that this very attention and this habit of attention is actually keeping the whole pattern of lack and disappointment in place. I don't see that.

Instead, I think this is real, this is the reality. That exploration of working with desire—that feels like I'm creating something artificial. This other way, staying with the lack, this feels like the real thing, the truth. I don't see that my attention is actually fabricating and manufacturing even this sometimes.

This requires really delicate investigation in practice. It takes tremendous courage and care to investigate this territory. So I hope that's sufficient to convey the understanding. There is this option, this thread that's possible in our practice. I'd really like you to try it, if you're drawn to it. Use it extensively if it resonates. If you prefer, just visit it occasionally. You can put it on the shelf for later exploration, whatever feels right. But please try it at least a few times—moving away from the image, into the current of the desire itself, and working with that while trusting the treasure that lies within it.

One final consideration: you'll notice that the desires we have in life, especially the deep desires and those profound currents of longing, are extraordinarily important. They matter deeply to us. Some of them genuinely need acting upon. It can't always be simply a matter of awareness of desire. Sometimes, particularly with imaginal material, something is actually being asked to manifest in the world. What that is may not be obvious or clear, and sometimes it may be nothing at all. I've explored this theme in other retreats.

Both with our deepest longings and with what moves through us imaginatively, sometimes something is truly demanded of us. What that is isn't always apparent. Yet sometimes it's neither appropriate nor possible nor necessary to act on a desire. We can work with the imaginal dimension or with the energy of the desire itself, and no external action is required. Nothing in the outer world needs to change, and taking action isn't the point.

Other times, action absolutely is the point. Something needs to be brought into being. Words need to be spoken. Actions need to be taken. But at other times, it's completely not about outer manifestation. The work is what we might call internal—that's where the real transformation occurs.

In this particular practice we've been exploring, we're emphasizing this internal dimension: the opening to the current of desire itself, rather than the acting upon it. Is this sufficient to make sense of this approach? Does it feel clear enough?

So let's sit together now in the spirit of this exploration.

CHAPTER 95

Visions of the Beyond

Rob Burbea · 1h43

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea invites practitioners to examine fundamental questions about their spiritual path: What do you love about practice? What do you want from it? He explores four distinct approaches to conceiving the path and awakening. First, the traditional Buddhist movement toward the transcendent unfabricated realm through lessening fabrication of perception. Second, the limitation to one-dimensional horizontal seeking when dimensionality is blocked. Third, secular approaches that emphasize coping with existential limitations while refusing metaphysical possibilities. Fourth, tantric and soul-making approaches that recognize infinite possibilities for discovery through the eros-psyche-logos dynamic. Burbea examines how different fantasies of the self on the path emerge - the medical patient seeking healing, the religious devotee following tradition, the scientific researcher driven by curiosity, or the artist creating beauty. He emphasizes that recognizing the role of fantasy and image in our spiritual conception is not diminishing but essential for authentic soul-making practice. The talk challenges practitioners to investigate whether their path conception supports genuine eros or contracts into craving, and whether it opens unlimited dimensions of discovery or remains confined to predetermined goals.

I'd like to start by offering you a few questions to explore. These are admittedly big questions, so you might want to spend time with them now or take them away to contemplate for as long as feels fruitful or interesting.

Let me begin with one question: What do you love about the path? What do you love about your path? What do you love in practice?

When you drop that question in, what comes? What responses arise from your being? What do you love?

You can linger with whatever answers come, responses that arise from your being, and sense their resonances in the heart, in the soul, in the body, in the emotions. Feel their effects on you—the effects of the responses, the effects of the questions. What do you love?

Perhaps there's a whole stream of different responses and answers, aspects that you love. Perhaps it's one particular aspect or thing.

Now let me ask a second question, related but different: What do you want from the path, from practice? What do you want? Where are you going? Where do you hope you're going? Where do you conceive you're going on this path?
