It's okay, perhaps, where there's some agreed-upon goal or aim to strive for. If you're in a football team, for example, or if you listen to how football team managers talk about their players or the players talk about each other, or in a military unit—there, the whole idea of character is something whose development is encouraged. Remember that the word "character" is related to the words "moral" and "ethical." So talk about giving everything for the team, or courage, or "ran his heart out" and all this. Only in these enclosed circles where there's a very specific goal or aim is it understood: if you're in this team, if you're in this military unit, this is what we're trying to do, and therefore we can use ethical language, we can use moral language, we can value people dependent on their development in those moral areas, and we can instruct and reprimand and so forth.

But in those limited contexts, ethical development is only really encouraged or spoken about to the degree of breadth, height, and depth that reflects the conception of the goal. If it's a football team, it's just about the football.

Even prisons, as far as I can tell—and I'm not really in that world—but even prisons, certainly in the UK and the US, don't seem to prioritize moral development. There's punishment, and there's maybe the opportunity to educate oneself in different ways. But the idea of moral development doesn't seem to be on the agenda. I could be wrong here, but there seems to be some kind of taboo around it that relates to this confusion around morality and the reluctance to impose any moral system, even in an educative way, on someone else.

Part of the wider confusion: some people do pass judgment on others' lack of moral sensitivity or moral refinement, evolution, and aspirations. And other people would view that judgment or opinion as snobbish. But as a society, we don't really have anything other than the law to indirectly, and only hopefully, teach and encourage moral values. This is part of the lacuna and paralysis left by postmodernism, or really the drift into postmodernism from the incompleteness and failings of modernity. And all of that is part, of course, of why some people turn to religious fundamentalism. What they fear and abhor is this lack of moral concern, this drift into ungrounded relativism, and the absence of what we could call the nobility and uprightness of moral education.

There are all kinds of other gaps in our moral outlook, specifically with regard to the earth and nature and species, which I want to come back to later.

If you're listening to this talk, you're probably already involved in the wider tradition and context of the Dharma, where we do talk about ethics and values and what's noble, and about developing the citta—developing the mind and the heart and the soul and the sensibility. But in the wider culture, it seems something of a taboo.

In fact, even in the Insight Meditation tradition—one of my teachers was teaching on the West Coast, I think, somewhere in the States. I heard this secondhand, but they gave a Dharma talk one evening and made a comment about how the car park at the retreat center was full of SUVs, with their gas-guzzling and diesel emissions. That was woven into the Dharma talk, and then my teacher received an angry note from a retreatant saying, "I came here to learn to meditate. I didn't come here to be lectured about this," or something to that effect—which I'm sure got an answer in no uncertain terms. But since the Insight Meditation world is an open world where anyone can walk in and walk out, what they think they're walking into or signing up for may be much more limited than what is actually on offer, or part of the deal as I would see it.

So I wonder about this possibility of lifelong development—of sensitivity, of aspiration, of attunement, of consideration with regard to ethics and values and virtues.

And it might still be, of course—and here again may be a very politically incorrect thing to say—but it might also be that there are differences between human beings. Differences in what we talk about as soul style. Maybe the moral character of souls also differs. I realize that's perhaps a very unfashionable thing to say, politically incorrect to say it at the moment.

So it may be that even if we have an idea of what might be involved in opening up this notion of open-ended development through one's life—of the moral sensibility, the moral courage, the moral discernment, and all that—if that's there, and at the same time, like in any other endeavor of training, whether football or music or whatever, we recognize that people also have different capacities. Of course, that gets very dangerous. What does that then imply about things like democracy?

Again, I'm not involved in the Dharma world, so I don't know quite where it's at now and what sort of regulations have come in. But there was, just a few years ago, some concern among Dharma teachers who were involved in that world, and concern from others as well, that mindfulness was being taught in a way that was really uncoupled from its basis and root in sīla, in ethical concern and action. There were some examples of mindfulness for soldiers—in the job of killing people, how can that be done more mindfully and to make that more efficient? People were trumpeting mindfulness as a kind of solution for all kinds of problems, but in a way that was really trying to shave off as much as possible of anything that had to do certainly with Buddhism, but also the wider concerns and teachings such as ethics.

That might be different now; I don't know. But I remember thinking back then, you know, I'd rather somehow we taught about Jesus in schools rather than mindfulness. Of course, that's going to land in a funny way, potentially, but there's a kind of—there are stories there, if we take that example of Jesus. It doesn't have to be Jesus, of course, but stories that illustrate radical goodness and compassion, that teach and touch the being through those kinds of narratives.

But that's not really possible, certainly not with Jesus. Religion, or imposing any kind of religious education like that—again, it doesn't seem very PC, and it would lack credibility these days. Christianity is kind of old hat. In mainstream society, it's lost any of its capacity to shake things up, to be vital, a vital infusion, to stimulate a vital reconsideration. And as I said, we can't actually teach ethics, or it seems like we can't, because there's no agreement on its basis.

But sometimes I wonder, in the sort of dominance of non-religious secular outlooks, if something is also lost ethically.

I really don't want to make generalizations here, but Nietzsche, when he was writing just before the turn of the twentieth century, poking fun at and deconstructing what had become then a sort of empty Christian morality—part of his objection, at least, was that people were just doing what they were told without considering it morally, keeping a moral code that was more about manners and appearances. It was empty of any real vitality or life of consideration deep in the being. And so he poked fun at the vacuousness of that, and with that, the shallow morality, the lack of courage, the lack of independent thinking.

But sometimes I wonder if the objects of ridicule and complaint that he found there in the superficial religiosity that was dominant at that time—and it really was superficial, because by then modernity was well along in its secularizing of things—I wonder sometimes whether those kinds of objections actually apply now less to people who are religious, in the sense that they really have chosen religion and it means something to them. Because religion is now not dominant, one actually has to choose it, to enter into it, to make a connection with it, to actively aspire to something there and find something important—as opposed to it being just given by the culture, by the family, where one simply trembles along in this appearance of propriety.

So I wonder whether actually now the people who have chosen religion may have more among their ranks of those who are actually passionate about morals, who live morality, who live more radically on fire in relation to ethics. And conversely, whether those who have inherited and go along with the atheism and secularism of modernity have among their ranks more of those who share the characteristics that Nietzsche was poking fun at: the shallow morality, the lack of courage, the lack of independent thinking.

Sometimes, just coming across people and the whole way they might relate to moral questions, or even questions of life and death—which of course are not divorced from moral questions—it sounds so flaccid, so flabby, so lacking in depth and passion and integrity and oomph and vitality. There's something just a bit bleh about the whole thing. Or on the other hand, they might be very bold and strident in their rhetoric of secularism, but somehow when you look at the life, it's not very inspiring. It's not very noble. It's not very beautiful.

So somehow it could be that this pervasive secularism has just replaced the pervasive and somewhat lifeless pseudo-religious, superficial religiosity that used to be there. But again, I want to be careful about making generalizations here. This is partly tied into the larger point I hope to make over these talks.

It seems to me, to some extent—or to a large extent—there's this loss of the ideal of moral education. Certainly, even in schools. I don't remember in my secondary school ever being taught anything about moral living or nobility or anything like that. And that loss of the ideal of moral education is part of our wider conundrum, the difficulty of our wider situation.

The word vinaya that some of you will know—the Pali word vinaya—is the word for the monastic discipline, the set of rules, the precepts that the monks and nuns keep specifically. And actually its etymology: vinaya means to lead away from, or lead apart. So it's very much...

Related to our word "education," Vinaya—the monastic discipline—is itself an education. Educare in Latin: ducere means "to lead," and e- means "out of." So they have very similar roots. It's an education. And for the monks, that Vinaya is a part of their larger moral education. So it's there in the tradition, this idea of the possibility of moral education. We seem to have lost it.

Anyway, in these talks, I just want to try a little bit to open up, to have a look at this wider situation. I don't think there are any easy answers, and I certainly don't have any, nor any simple prescriptions. I'm aware—and you've probably heard it already, I feel conscious of it already—that at times I may sound like an old fuddy-duddy. I may sound somewhat judgmental about some of these things. I may even sound conservative, which is somewhat surprising to me. And I may sound elitist. That last one, I can't hide the fact: I unabashedly admit that I am an elitist in all kinds of ways.

But I'm going to take that risk. I do think it important just to start a widening of this conversation. Hopefully others will pick up these larger considerations around ethics, soul and ethics, and the wider global situations. So I'm going to take that risk just in terms of stimulating some conversation.

Actually, maybe the first thing to do before we continue is just to clear a little space with regard to the imaginal, imaginal practice, and ethics. As I remember, much more particularly at the beginning—it doesn't seem to happen much now, but that could be I'm just not hearing from certain people—but certainly at the beginning of my teaching of the imaginal, a number of people voiced concerns. They were attracted to the imaginal but quite ambivalent, voicing concerns about the seemingly problematic ethical implications that might be wrapped up in imaginal practice.

So I'll just take a little time. It's probably not necessary at this point, but I will take a little time anyway to do this. Or it may not be necessary for most of you, but some of you will be in conversations with other people, or someone else might hear something. So it's worth addressing, because the imaginal, for me, is certainly not immoral, and neither is it amoral in the sense that it doesn't have any regard for morality or any connection with morality. It is neither immoral nor amoral.

Someone asked me, really at the beginning of my teaching in the imaginal—she was quite taken with it and had quite a few experiences, but kept struggling with different kinds of ambivalence, one of which was with regard to ethics. She said to me, "Well, you know, a lot of what you say about the imaginal could refer very easily to some kind of fundamentalist religious terrorist or something. So, what about that?"

Let's just pause for a little bit and address some of those concerns and issues. We have these teachings of the nodes of the lattice, the elemental aspects of the imaginal. And we can look at that and say: with regard to elements like duty and trust and other aspects of the imaginal, we could actually discern several crucial differences between a practitioner practicing with the imaginal and, say, a religious fundamentalist terrorist.

This terrorist conceives God as separate from themselves and therefore as an objective reality. In contrast, the way we talk about divinity in the paradigm of soulmaking and the imaginal is not as separate from ourselves—certainly not completely separate from ourselves—and not as objective, because we participate in the creation of the divine. We've talked about this. So that would be one difference, and that's a really significant difference.

We could add more. By engaging, for example, in a terrorist action, that terrorist might believe or think they are participating in "God's plan," but they don't conceive or sense that they are participating in God's being. Do you understand? There's a big, big difference there. "I'm participating in God's plan, who wants the whole world to be this religion and other religions to be eradicated and non-believers to be killed," or whatever it is. And that's "God's plan"—so the story goes, so the belief goes. But they're not participating in God's being. There is also no sense or conception of being involved in creating the sense of divinity. And that is not separate from that. So there are very different ontologies going on.

There is no unfathomability and no meaningfulness or mystery. On the contrary, this terrorist person is certain. They know and are clear about what their duty is: "My duty is to kill these people, blow up such and such," whatever it is. There's a single meaning—not meaningfulness, not this infinity of potential meanings, but a single meaning, or at best a small finite number of very clear meanings, rather than meaningfulness.

And we could continue if we consider the elements. The boundaries of self, other, and divine are not soft-edged and elastic at all. These things have hard boundaries—self and other, divinity.

And there's no concertina of images. There's just a single image, whatever that is, of the divine, of my role, and so forth. And it's regarded as reality—regarded as a reality, rather than the imaginary middle way.

The sense of duty there is not refracted in any way. It's just literalized. The echoing, the mirroring—again, it's all very literalized. So there are many differences there. We can point out more when we just slow down and consider.

Many of you will know Viktor Frankl, who was the founder of logotherapy. You probably know him more from dharma talks, actually, where sometimes I and other teachers have quoted a beautiful passage from his book Man's Search for Meaning, which is partly a chronicle of his time in Auschwitz concentration camp. He was imprisoned as a Jew, survived, and came up with this kind of psychotherapy that he called logotherapy—which is basically, he would say, healing through the making of meaning, giving your life a meaning. So it's a meaning-making therapy.

It got questioned on a number of fronts. One was whether it was actually—he said that, the quote that you probably know is something like, "We who lived through the camps can remember those who were able to choose their own way, to give away their last piece of bread," for example. He said it much more beautifully. And his conclusion was: this is testimony, we bear witness, and they bear testimony to the fact that you can take everything from a person except their right and their capacity to make meaning and to choose their own way. He said that the people in the camps who tended to survive the ordeal and torment and tribulations were people who had some meaning, something worth living for that was meaningful to them. And so he said the camp was the crucible in which he came up with this logotherapy, this idea of meaning-making therapy.

Afterwards, over the years, decades later, it was questioned and attacked on a couple of grounds. One was whether he hadn't actually come up with this theory beforehand rather than in the camps, and whether his report of what he saw wasn't actually true in terms of who survived and who didn't. But secondly, several people pointed out, well, that's actually an amoral therapy. There's no morality there. This meaning-making could be equally applied to, say, the Nazis, who found meaning in exterminating Jews and homosexuals and gypsies and communists and political opponents.

So again, there can be this concern, and it's an understandable concern, that if you put something like the imaginal or soulmaking to the fore, what about ethics? Or if you put meaning-making to the fore, what happens to morality? Does the meaning-making trump the moral? Does it make it irrelevant? If I just find meaning in something, does that mean I can do whatever I want without any regard for morality? If I have some image, does that mean I can then disregard morality?

But again, there's a not-full understanding or not-full consideration of what we would mean by those elements, an inclusion of what we would mean by those elements of the imaginal. So there are twenty-eight elements, or maybe more, depending on how you count them. When they're taken into consideration, you start to see that when I'm following an image, working with an image, inspired by an image, receiving a duty from an image—all those elements together make it very different than this idea that anything goes, for example a Nazi finding meaning in exterminating Jews and homosexuals. That's not going to have those twenty-eight elements illuminated and ignited. It's simply not.

So I don't know about Viktor Frankl, but if we just take it at a sort of simple explanation—all you need to do to find fulfillment in life is find a meaning, make a meaning, and then follow that meaning—just that as a simple strap line would not include the depth and richness and other aspects of, for instance, the imaginal that we've talked about.

So we have concerns as human beings. Obviously we have ethical concerns, and most practitioners, of course, should and will have concerns ethically about their behavior. How to discern what to choose, what to do. How can I trust this desire? I want this —is it okay ethically? Can I trust it? How do I know?

Sometimes I ask people in dharma talks, different dharma talks over time, I might ask, "What do you want? What is it that you really want?" And someone was saying to me that she was listening and moved by the question, just by me asking. In that context, the question went very deep in her. It touched her very deeply, but it brought some agitation and confusion as well, because she wondered: how does one discern? I have this want or this desire or this eros or whatever—how do I discern what is conditioning and what is indoctrination or what is just ego?

We were talking about it, and I suggested that it might be better to look at, rather than trying to discern where it's coming from—oh, can I see that it's coming from ego, or from conditioning or indoctrination—that might be very hard to discern. But what you can look at is the effect. For example, the effect on the sense of soulmaking of different desires, or different answers to that question of what I want.

So if I just drop that question into a meditative space – I can't remember the exact context she was speaking about – and then perhaps I get an answer like, "I want to be rich," for example. But that answer, if I look at the effects, the resonances in the being, rather than trying to find whether it's just conditioning, just ego, or fear, and actually trying to discern where it came from – what's easier to observe and probably more helpful in discerning is the effects on the resonances in the soul, in the being, and the effects on the sense of soul-making.

So, "I want to be rich," if that comes as an answer – she didn't say that, but it's just an example – that may not feel as deep, as soul-making, as opening of the devotional sense, as rich in the soul sense, as beautiful, as moving, as another desire might. So what do I trust in terms of discerning between what may be more petty, more self-concerned, more fear-driven, more just an indoctrination and therefore not so authentic, more just conditioning? It may be that in looking at the effects in the being of the sense of soul-making, I start to get a feel for what are the deeper currents of my soul and my being, what are the deeper soul desires.

And those currents – there will be the encouragement from me, I would say, to trust in that soul-making sense and the fullness and the multidimensionality and the beauty of what that means to the being. And I trust that ethics will be implicit in that, partly because, remember, values, which includes ethical values, are an implicit element of the soul-making dynamic, an implicit element of the imaginal. The imaginal middle way is there, so there's not this tendency to just literalize, concretize, reify in that way. There's also the fullness of intention as one of the elements. And so again, it's not just about me and what I can get. There's a fuller intention there. All of these elements and aspects tend to not just safeguard ethics and preserve it, but actually enrich the ethical soil of what is happening, what is involved, and what's moving in the soul.

And of course there's the energy body as well. We talked about that. We could go through it in a lot more detail than I'm doing right now. We talked about how the energy body can be a guide, or what to trust as well. Again, I don't think the energy body will open up with that same beauty and same harmonization and energization as it will if the ethics aren't there. It's one of the reasons the Buddha said he doesn't teach jhāna with an unskillful object. I can't remember the exact words, but he might also have said he can't teach jhāna with an unskillful object because the mind doesn't tend to settle down, the energy body doesn't tend to open up in the same way when something's really unskillful, when there's craving. When there's craving in that way, as we've talked about, it agitates and closes and contracts the energy body, it ties it in knots. And some things are unskillful ethically – it's all related. So the energy body opening, harmonizing, aligning, being part of the imaginal – it's also a safeguard of the implicit ethics, the implicit beauty of values there.

Still, sometimes people get nervous. It hasn't happened recently – people haven't asked me this for a while – but back a few years ago: "Isn't imaginal Dharma crazy or dangerous? What about ethics? Shouldn't you place ethics first? Shouldn't they be given priority? And then you can have imagery – just safeguard the ethics first, and then have your imaginal, or whatever."

But as I've just said, because values are an element of the image, ethics are included in an image, implicitly or explicitly, and in imaginal practice, and in the duty that comes out of it. Also, I have to say – and this is partly what I want to elaborate on in these talks – placing ethics as primary, as this person wanted or was concerned about, saying, "Why don't you put that first?" – putting ethics as primary is a deceptively simple idea. Because despite the kind of soul-stirring allegiances that ethical talk and talking about those kinds of things can stimulate in us, the actuality of moral life entails all sorts of confusions and difficulties, antinomies – meaning pulls in different directions. I want to care for this ethical value, but at the same time in this particular situation I'm also pulled toward this other ethical value, and my choices offer me a contradiction. I either preserve this one or preserve that one. I either emphasize this one or I emphasize that one. I'm going to elaborate on this, hopefully, as the talks go on.

But that's the actuality of our moral life in all kinds of ways. So placing ethics as primary, as I said, is deceptively simple. It doesn't tell us or instruct us or guide us with regard to these kinds of difficulties, challenges, confusions, antinomies, incompletenesses, and also ultimate impossibilities. I cannot fulfill, I cannot care for this ethical value and that ethical value in this situation. It's actually impossible, because I can only choose one thing. All those complexities and confusions and impossibilities and contradictions and incompletenesses – they are unavoidably part of moral life and choice, especially today. And in a way, that's mirrored in what Hillman would call the polytheistic psyche, the multiplicity of images which also pull our life in different directions toward different imaginal characters and their particular beauties, their particular domains and concerns, and their particular duties as well.

So it's understandable that people, some years ago, voiced these ethical concerns when they first started to hear about imaginal practice. But it's more complex, I think, than those initial concerns really understood.

Just to repeat before we go further: I would say soul-making and imaginal practice are ethically oriented, and not just because values are an element of the imaginal, but also because of aspects like cosmopoiesis and the sensing with soul – sensing self, other, world, eros, all these things more and more conceived and sensed, actually sensed and felt, as sacred, divine, worthy of our reverence.

So as we've explained with the soul-making dynamic, that's part of what happens. Not just because values are an element—they are an element—but when there's the cosmopoiesis, when there's a sensing with soul of the self, of other human beings, of the world around me and the world of nature, even of my desire, then the very way that I sense and conceive and think of those aspects of being, those aspects of existence, my relationship with them becomes very different. It becomes sacralized. It becomes imbued with the sense of holiness, the sense of reverence implicit there. And out of that, we start to have a different relationship. We start to live and choose differently. And of course, it comes with that respect and care, all of which are foundational and implicit in ethics.

There are also other ways, of course—and I've touched on these and will return to them—in which soul-making is ethical, and even, I would say, an expansion of our typical range of ethical practice and perspectives. In those talks I mentioned the other day, The Meditator as Revolutionary and The Necessity of Fantasy, I was speaking about the range of archetypal models that we receive through the Dharma being a little bit limited. The Buddha—not so much an activist, quite given to equanimity and inwardness, and with a kind of danger of letting the world burn, so to speak. The range of archetypal characters of response is quite limited by what we receive through image and story and modelling from teachers and other students in the Dharma world, or certainly in the Insight Meditation world.

So there is a certain unwitting limitation on the scope of what moral care and expression looks like. Through expanding the self-sense and the imaginal sense, being open to more images, receiving imaginal images, we discover how they open up the scope and range of what our moral care and expression may look like—the fantasies of how that might be embodied, how it might express itself, look, and sound.

In addition to all that, it might also be that we can—and I'll come back to this later—talk about soul-making itself being a kind of moral value. Perhaps even a kind of relatively new moral value.

But I want to expand and elaborate and consider a lot of this further, particularly the lacunae, the gaps and holes in the fabric of our conceptual framework of morality nowadays. What are some of the needs there? What's the relationship between soul-making and all that? I want to explore the notion of values and virtues, and something of the psychology and philosophy that might be wrapped up in all of this.

Okay, let's stop there now, just for an introduction. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 189

Rob Burbea · 2h53

> In this profound continuation of his exploration of ethics and soul-making, Rob Burbea critically examines two dominant paradigms of personal development—psychotherapy and Buddhadharma—investigating both their gifts and their potential blind spots regarding moral growth. He observes how psychotherapy, at its best, can free the psyche and open the heart to ethical care, yet at its worst may foster self-preoccupation that contracts ethical sensitivity. Similarly, while traditional Dharma includes sīla explicitly and offers teachings on emptiness and the brahmavihāras, certain framings—such as viewing saṃsāra as ultimately worthless or limiting concern to the Four Noble Truths' focus on suffering—can inadvertently narrow our ethical range.
> Burbea proposes that imaginal practice and what he terms the 'ideational-imaginal' offer crucial expansions to these paradigms. Through examples including a student's encounter with a renunciate monk image and another's relationship with the Black Madonna, he demonstrates how sensing with soul can transform our relationship to ethical questions. The image becomes primary—not just illustrative but foundational to our emotions, choices, and commitments. When we ask 'whose grief is this?' about ecological devastation and recognize it as divine care moving through us, the very organ of the heart gains dimensionality and empowerment.
> The talk addresses urgent contemporary concerns—climate change, species loss, ecocide—arguing that our usual sense of self and world may be inadequate to these challenges. Burbea discusses emerging legal recognitions of personhood for rivers and mountains, noting how these rest on expanded ontologies that indigenous cultures have long held. He suggests that soul-making Dharma, with its emphasis on beauty, sacredness, eternality, and the infinite echoing of images into life, can provide platforms for the expanded ethical sensibility our times demand.

Let me pick up on something I mentioned in the talk the other evening about the fact that it seems to me, at least, that there's almost a lack, if not a kind of taboo, on moral education in our society, especially for people beyond eighteen years old. Even younger than that, it's rare to find an overt emphasis and thrust towards ethical education of human beings in our society.

Of course, there are paradigms and programs, visions and frameworks of personal, psychological, and spiritual development and growth that would pertain to adults, and traditions of that. As part of the whole consideration here, I wonder if we might look at a couple of those paradigms and examine the tremendous gifts they bring, how they support our growth, and how they potentially support our ethical growth, our growth in terms of our relationship with morality. We might also look at some of the potential lacunae, gaps, blind spots, and limits that such paradigms, traditions, and frameworks might have—lacunae and limits regarding the relationship with morality and moral development of the human being, but also, because it's related, how one conceives of and senses oneself, other human beings, and the world.

I don't want to replace such paradigms or declare them wrong. But in shining a light on them, or on certain aspects of them at least, is it possible that something can be added? What might be added to them? Perhaps we can consider some of the usual ways we think about and approach development—psychological, spiritual, and personal development—and where these are limited, and then what might be added, what might be complementary. Not so much replacing what's already there, but extending what's already available.

The two principal possibilities I want to offer through these talks for that sort of addition or extension will be, first, imaginal practice. We want to include imaginal practice as one possibility of potential extension. That includes how we sense the self, others, world, and also our desire—really the whole sensing with soul avenue.

And secondly, and related, something I'm not quite sure what to call, but something like the ideational-imaginal, or the ideological-imaginal, or imaginal ideas. I've touched on this briefly in the last few years, but I want to say a little more about it, particularly regarding the ideas of value and virtue—values and virtues—and their relationship with soul-making. So principally these two: imaginal practice as we've talked about it so far, and then also a kind of extension of imaginal practice into what we might call the ideational-imaginal, or imaginal ideas, or ideological-imaginal.

Now, all these strands or areas are not really separable. It would be nice to go through these talks and do a chunk on this and then a separate chunk on that, but I don't think that's really possible. I'm going to try and separate them a little, but some interweaving is just inevitable, so that's part of the deal.

The two paradigms I would like to consider, very broadly speaking, are psychotherapy and Buddhadharma. Of course, these are two extremely broad categories. We're not talking about one thing when we talk about psychotherapy, nor are we talking about one thing when we talk about Buddhadharma. There are many different kinds.

So in what I say in terms of considering the gifts and the limitations of what might be involved in those paradigms, there's a danger of generalization, and I apologize in advance for that. If I qualify everything, the talks will go on forever. But I hope you get the general drift and the soul's intention behind what I'm saying, and that this can be an inquiry grounded in love and care.

We're not really talking about either of these things as one thing—psychotherapy or Buddhadharma—and certainly there are many different kinds of each. And of course, there will be individual differences among people who are part of a certain sub-tradition of Buddhadharma or a certain kind of psychotherapy. There will be individual differences in how they digest, assimilate, respond to what they take or leave, how they relate to those particular teachings or invitations or trainings.

We can see, very broadly speaking, that psychotherapy at its best has the promise and potential to free a human being up from too much torment of the psyche and of the person—the kind of self-hatred or incapacitating inner critic, and so forth—and to open the heart and, in so doing, develop empathy and emotional skill and capacity of the heart, and also relational skills. All of that is possible. And in that freeing up, in that opening of the heart, in that development of empathy and emotional capacity and relational skill, this can open up and support the capacity and tendency for ethical care. So at its best, that would be a fruit of psychotherapy: it really works on the heart and the relationship and the being and the psyche in a way that makes it more possible to be more open with regard to ethics, to be more sensitive, more caring, more discerning, more courageous—all these things.

At its worst—and again, this is too general a statement—but at its worst, people can be in certain psychotherapies, or relate to certain psychotherapies, sometimes for many years, and it may be hard for them to realize it from the inside, but what can develop is a tendency to actually become a little more self-preoccupied than they were before. It can feed and form an ongoing state of being, of self-preoccupation. The gaze is turned inward, concerned with my process, my growth, my neurosis, my patterns, my family, my this, my that.

And there's a kind of contraction of the being and a lessening of the availability for ethical sensitivity and openness and care. The antennae are not so tuned that way because they're self-preoccupied primarily in certain ways. And perhaps also certain psychotherapies, or certain ways of relating to certain psychotherapies, may breed a kind of attitude of entitlement—that one looks at one's past or family or upbringing and feels, "I never got what I needed." And so one thinks one is justified in compensating for that in one's life and in one's choices and in one's relationship to society. Again, that movement there may not allow so much of an opening and a care for ethics. So that would be at its worst, I suppose—some of what's possible in some kinds of psychotherapeutic paradigms and relationships or trainings.

When it's gifts, we can see that the Dharma would have similar potentials and promises: to free up the psyche from a kind of torment that incapacitates it in terms of its care for others and its ethical care and concern; to release from the inner critic; similarly, to open the heart and the capacities for empathy and the capacities of the heart in general. And there is, in addition, in the Dharma, of course, this emphasis on sīla—sīla, samādhi, paññā. And so the ethics is right there to some extent or other, right from the beginning. It's not ignored. Some psychotherapies will not even mention ethics unless it's a legal matter where the therapist then feels obliged to tell the police something or is torn in some way.

There's also in the Dharma the teachings of the emptiness of self, so at least theoretically there's the possibility of, or there's the restraining of the possibility of, endless self-preoccupation. And of course there's the encouragement and the teachings for the cultivation of brahmavihāras—of loving-kindness, compassion, appreciative joy.

But a few things about practices in general, whether it's the practice of psychotherapy as a client or as a therapist, or the practice of Dharma, is that practices can evolve in unforeseen ways. Once one gets into a practice, it's like sailing a boat—you start dealing with what's coming up in practice and what life throws at you and how practice says to respond to it through the lens of certain teachings or paradigms or frameworks. And the fact is, as one gets into practice and into that vocabulary and that way of looking at things and the techniques and the approaches, it can evolve in unforeseen ways, so that from inside of that practice, inside of that trajectory, we're not always clear—it's not always clear if we're off balance. We're dealing with all this stuff through whatever it is: this stuff coming up, this stuff from my past, this stuff in my family, in my situation, in my work—through certain lenses. And in the very close dealing with it through those lenses, sometimes we can get a little off balance. It's almost like the lenses are a bit like horses' blinkers. They are blinders. They may close our view in certain ways. And in that, we can get off balance in ways that we don't even realize. And the whole practice can evolve in unforeseen ways. And sometimes you step out and you think, "How on earth did I get there? How did I get there?"

In addition to that, it's really important to point out as a general point that any conceptual framework will bring limitations. Any conceptual framework—any idea, any concept, any logos, whether it's a Dharma logos or psychotherapy logos, whatever it is—brings with it automatically its own set of limitations. It sets us up to see and to ponder and to respond and to process things in certain ways. It opens the eyes to certain factors and closes them to others. It opens the consideration in the heart to certain things and closes them to others.

That inherent fact of limitations that go with conceptual framework also goes with the soul-making paradigm. Any conceptual framework. So I don't want to replace psychotherapy or Dharma with soul-making at all—in part just because soul-making Dharma will also have its limitations and its blind spots and its dangers. But it's a really important point of wisdom and maturity that's necessary to emphasize: any conceptual framework, to do with anything, will bring its limitations.

So when we talk about psychotherapy or this psychotherapy or that kind of psychotherapy, or this kind of Dharma or that kind of Dharma, it will bring its limitations. And with that, there's the possibility of limited and inadequate views, responses, capacities—inadequate with respect to the kinds of moral challenges and situations that humanity faces today. So there is that possibility that some of these paradigms and trainings will be, or possibly that all of them will be, limited in some way. It kind of behooves us to have a look: What are the possible limitations? What do I need to look out for? When I see a possible limitation or inadequacy, how can I expand it? What might be possible?

The kinds of things we want to consider—they do not apply to everyone. And again, there's danger of overgeneralizing there. Of course they won't, because as I said, people will be within a certain—two people in the very same paradigm or teaching or training will take it in differently and respond and digest differently.

The second thing I should say, as a sort of caveat to all this, is that certainly from where I sit right now, everything seems to be changing very fast in the Dharma world. Now, I hardly go out anymore because of my illness, so I'm at home, I'm not out there talking to a lot of people. But it seems to me—and maybe it's just my friends and students I do still see and mix with and hear from—but it seems that there are very quick and sometimes surprising changes.

Sometimes I look at people who, for instance, with regard to climate change and species extinction, for years haven't seemed interested in that at all. And then very suddenly, on fire. On fire and deeply, deeply committed, investing a lot of time, energy, taking a lot of risks, working very hard in those areas. Something has happened, perhaps with the explosive growth of the Extinction Rebellion movement, particularly in England, and perhaps other factors. Some of those cases were really surprising to me, and it was a really pleasant surprise. I'm not sure how widespread it is, but certainly it's becoming much more widespread.

And in a way, what that indicates to me is that whatever I might say regarding ethics and Dharma—the need to consider expanding our Dharma to expand our ethical sense and deepen our ethical sensibility—whatever I might say here is only going to be one factor in the mix of what galvanises and supports and allows and opens that kind of expansion.

It might be, for instance, with the Extinction Rebellion movement, which in the UK has really taken off. I'm sure there are many people in our UK society who've never even heard of it, but for others it's really become a thing—mainstream news and so on. And it might be that one of the factors is just the fact that when more people are brought together and there's this kind of safety and support in numbers—something I want to return to—and the kind of platforms and mechanisms are made available, then that kind of ethical stand becomes much more possible. Whereas if one was alone in that, without the supporting structures, then one would be just relying on one's own penetrative ethical alignment and devotion and discrimination, and that's a lot harder.

But anyway, what that very pleasant surprise and the suddenness of all that points to is that whatever I might say in these talks about ethics and Dharma and opening that up is just one piece, one factor.

And the third thing to say, related to what I started this ethics talk saying—that I regard ethics and this whole investigation as endless, potentially endless—a corollary of that is that there's always more growth possible in our relationship with ethics. Always more growth possible.

So if, in trying to open up this subject and elucidate, we look at this tradition or that kind of teaching or this paradigm, and we say, "Oh, that could be limited in this way, that could be limited in that way," that will always be the case. Because limitations will go with any conceptual framework, and there's also this endlessness. However unlimited we get, we can get even more unlimited—even more growth with regard to ethics, even more sensitivity, even more discernment, even more range and depth and height.

So that means, really, whoever—me or anyone else—saying, "Why don't we think about it this way, or we could think about it this way," there will still be more growth possible, and therefore considerations to point out: "What about this? What about that? Is it possible to do this?"

So let's consider a couple of things about psychotherapy.

I was talking a little while ago with a student in the States, and she was reporting to me that she was working with a therapist regularly and for a while. There was some situation—I can't remember exactly how it arose, but it might have had to do with where she was living in relationship to her workplace. At any rate, she was considering buying a second house or property, and she was starting that whole process of looking and investigating and going to see places.

At some point in this process, she became really concerned whether it was the right thing to do for ethical reasons. A second place would mean a lot more driving, and she was concerned about carbon emissions. Also the sort of just having to buy more stuff—more furniture, more clothes—if you've got two places. And she was talking about this dilemma and her feelings about it with her therapist.

Part of her process, woven into this whole consideration and difficulty, was also an image. She was beginning to explore a little bit of the imaginal, and one of the images that came was a monk, this imaginal monk character, who had as part of his mode and calling a movement towards renunciation. She was trying to explain to the therapist her feelings and her unsurenesses, her seriously considering giving up the whole idea of buying a second property and regarding it as an act of renunciation. She felt moved by that, and there was a sense of almost devotion tied in with this imaginal monk character.

The therapist, as she was trying to explain all this, just started shaking her head and tutting, and regarded this whole movement as some kind of denial—that she was in denial about the pain of having to give up this second property idea, the denial kind of wanting to avoid feeling the grief.

So she dismissed the imaginal figure of the monk and the renunciate as not real, as delusional, as a delusional protective mechanism against this grief of not buying a second house. I can't remember exactly how it transpired—perhaps the client had already decided not to buy a second house, or was explaining the process. But basically the therapist heard it through a certain lens: this is a protective mechanism against grief, and all this monk business and the devotion about renunciation is just a kind of unreal, delusional, protective mechanism.

What's then clearly not on the psychotherapist's map at that point is the whole idea and territory of a kind of ethical passion—of the soul's care for virtue, for ethical virtues. Not on her psychological map of what it means to care for the self, of what it means to heal, of what human growth and purpose involves.

This struck my student very strongly, and it really didn't sit very well with her. We talked about it. I don't think this is an isolated case, and I wonder—I think part of my larger point is—do therapists and psychotherapeutic paradigms need to expand their vision and their logos to include the psychological trauma and pain of ecological decline, for example? And the psychological trauma and pain—I'm using those words deliberately, trauma and pain—of not choosing in one's life in line with loving the earth, or in line with what speaks to one's soul more nobly in terms of virtue? So that it may then become part of how people think and feel and choose and what they respect.

Psychological thinking, psychotherapeutic thinking, has a lot of clout in our culture. It has spread from the confines of Freud's couch in Vienna all those years ago to become woven into our normal ways of considering life, human being, self, and our relationship with existence.

Just as childhood trauma and the feeling that "my needs were not met in childhood" have become normalized in the wider culture through psychotherapeutic paradigms—through the normalization of these paradigms and their airing through media and all kinds of phenomena—they have become normal ideas. Childhood trauma wasn't a concept before. "My needs are unmet"—these are very specific contemporary cultural points of view, manifestations, ways of understanding and conceiving and sensing and feeling ourselves in life.

And just as self and self-expression, creativity of the self, the individuality of self—these too, partly through psychotherapeutic thinking, have become very normalized. They're part of what we consider our right to address and to heal and to include, part of what we consider as healthy visioning and sense of one's existence, our normally accepted goals in life.

Or again, human relational intimacy. It wasn't that normal a few hundred years ago to think about human intimate relationships in the way that we do now—the vision we have of them, the hope and the goal. "I want to work towards that kind of relationship, that kind of vision of intimacy." This has all come about partly through various factors, but the way psychotherapeutic thinking spreads out from the counselling room into society means that in the wider culture, certain ideas with corresponding goals and rights become normalized.

So does there need to be an expanding of the psychotherapeutic paradigm to include, as I said, the whole realm of psychic trauma and grief and pain and rage at ecological decline, and also the grief and remorse of not choosing in line with that deep care—either deep care for the earth or deep care for one's ethical sensibilities?

Some of you will be familiar with the term "spiritual bypassing." This is quite a common accusation by psychotherapists, and it definitely has some ground, implying a kind of bypassing of psychological and emotional wounds through spiritual thought and practice. One gets involved in a spiritual practice and then starts having spiritual ideas and a spiritual paradigm and a spiritual outlook and practice. And wonderful as that can be, it can also be a kind of bypassing of what needs looking at in terms of one's psychological patterns and wounding.

What's also important to point out is that often what might also be bypassed are political, social, and environmental wounds and callings. So you can look at spiritual paradigms and say there can be spiritual bypassing of psychological wounds. There can also be political, social, and environmental factors and wounds and callings that are bypassed.

But as much as we talk about spiritual bypassing, is there not also the possibility of—what would we call it?—psychotherapeutic bypassing? That is, concentrating on one's personal psychological healing and wounds from certain perspectives. Everything is always from certain perspectives; I can't get away from that. Whatever I look at, whatever I relate to, whatever I try to heal is looked at through certain perspectives. They're either conscious and considered or they're not. But concentrating on one's personal psychological healing and wounds from certain perspectives may not be addressing or responding fully, or very much at all, to the soul, to the spirit, or to the social and environmental. So yes, you can talk about spiritual bypassing, but we need to add to that the possibility of psychological bypassing.

Not long ago, someone wrote me an email, a student I hadn't been in touch with for a few months. I think the last interview we'd had, there was a lot of anxiety and torment and real difficulty that they were experiencing. They wrote me recently and said, "By the way, a lot of that difficulty I was experiencing—I now realize I was not letting myself open to the magnitude and the depth of my torment and my feelings and my grief and my pain about the wider ecological devastation, climate change, the future even of the next few decades and how that hangs in the balance for humanity and for so many other species, the massive species loss and the toll, the impact that had on the psyche."

And he said, "I was trying so much to look for a personal reason, looking at my past, working in therapy, doing this and that. It was coming into my practice, and I was trying to understand it. I was looking at it through the lens of a certain paradigm, a certain narrow paradigm. And then I realized, actually, this is something else. And in realizing it was something else, I could begin to open to it. I could give it its place and give it its due and begin allowing the heart to feel it, to respond to it, to care for that." He said, "It's a lot, but I feel much better. It's now not sabotaging me in ways that I just could not get a handle on and could not understand."

One more piece here, and it's not small but large—I'll just mention it briefly and I hope to return to it. I mentioned that we have what we might call a pandemic or epidemic of the inner critic in our culture. It partly goes with a culture of individualism, a culture where there's less community, more alienation from society, from each other, from wider social networks, from the earth, from society—and this emphasis on individualism in what I was calling an immature way. One of the flip sides of that, one of the shadow sides, one of the inevitable costs is a rise in the inner critic and the afflictions of that.

Sometimes that's a lot of what people will bring into not just a Dharma context, but a psychotherapeutic context as well. The inner critic—some people call it the superego, which is a word that Freud coined. And I'll just quote from Alasdair MacIntyre again, from After Virtue.

Important was Freud's presentation of the inherited conscience as superego, as an irrational part of ourselves whose commands we need, for the sake of our psychic health, to be freed from. Now, I actually think that's an oversimplification of Freud's views, but it serves for now. What Alasdair MacIntyre is saying is that Freud presented this sense of superego as a kind of irrational part of ourselves that we need, through psychoanalysis, to liberate ourselves from its oppression. It's not really something to be respected so much—and that's where I think MacIntyre is simplifying a little bit—but rather something for us to work through and be liberated from.

MacIntyre continues: Freud, of course, took himself to have made a discovery about morality as such, and not just about what morality had become in late nineteenth century and early twentieth century Europe. Again, this cultural and historical contingency. Freud was dealing with such a limited range of population at a certain time in Europe—northern Europe, in fact—and then generalizing from that subset of the population to make universal truths, not realizing the historical contingency. But actually, the point is more that morality then, in a way, gets relativized as something irrational. Conscience, rather, in a way, gets relativized. And that portion of morality that has to do with conscience gets undermined or put on shaky foundations when it's regarded as just an irrational part of ourselves, something oppressive that we need to get rid of.

What I want to ask, or throw into the mix here, is: now, at this time in our wider culture, what do Dharma practitioners and teachers, or Diamond Heart practitioners and teachers, or psychotherapists—either as those psychotherapists or their clients—believe and disseminate about conscience? It's not a word we hear that much anymore, is it?

We certainly hear "inner critic," and if you're in, for example, the Ridhwan school, they talk about superego. But conscience is not a word we hear much anymore. At least, I don't hear it much.

So in other words, is that word "conscience" getting eclipsed, or put into the bag of our superego, our inner critic? And is there something that's actually necessary in our moral development, our moral capacity and sensibility, that's then getting regarded in ways that make it irrelevant? Do you understand? What does it do to our sense of morality when we lose that word "conscience"? When our only relationship with guilt is afflictive? And when things are just regarded in inner critic terms or superego terms?

Actually, maybe that word "afflictive" doesn't really capture what I'm trying to say. Perhaps a better word would be "immature," in the sense that if our relationship with guilt is immature, it might be trapped—either trapped in the whirlpool of self-recrimination, looking back at the past in a way that's very contracted, very solidified, very painful, not actually very helpful, not productive, and not orienting or leading onward in terms of future action. That would be one kind of immaturity. Or perhaps at other times, there's a kind of shunning of guilt, a refusal to feel it, an avoiding of it—just wanting to get rid of it. So there's nothing seen as positive or redeeming or helpful in guilt. That, too, would be a kind of immature relationship with guilt. Either on the one side or the other, the relationship with guilt can be immature. And maybe—we'll come back to this—maybe there can be other relationships with this whole notion of guilt and conscience that are more helpful.

Let me pause for a moment and recap what we're doing here. We're looking at the whole area of ethics, of course, and trying to open up an interest in the relationship of soul with ethics and ethics with soul. As part of that, we're shining a light, in a really over-generalized way but hopefully a little bit helpful, on some of the paradigms of growth and development that we encounter, that are around at the present time. We're seeing where they might have holes, gaps, blind spots, and in the process wondering what we can add to that. Beginning, as I go on, to add considerations and possibilities in terms of what we know of soul-making practice—sensing with soul up till now—and then perhaps there are others. As I said, when we talk more about values and virtues and other ways of thinking about ethics and so-called personal development, and the growth of our soul, that might augment the range of possibilities and perspectives.

So if we turn now to Dharma, to Buddha-Dharma and that wider tradition, and try to shine a light there... Again, just pausing briefly: it can be hard sometimes, for lots of different reasons, to shine this kind of spotlight on one's own tradition—if one feels one loves a tradition, or is identified with a tradition, with belonging to a certain tradition. It can be hard to critique it, to question it. It can be hard to even spot what's wrong, or admit that there may be something missing.

But maybe if we love a tradition, we have a duty of love to that tradition. And part of that duty is to care for it—like we care for, I don't know, a car or a musical instrument that needs repairing, that has a hole here or there, whatever it is. There's maybe a duty of love if we love a tradition and a body of teaching. That's part of what I was talking about earlier: What is it to be in dialogue with a tradition? Maybe, as Alasdair MacIntyre was saying in those passages we read about when we talked about tradition, for a tradition to be healthy, to be vital, it needs some strands of conflict, of argument, of debate, of dialogue—to keep it healthy. That's part of what a living tradition is. To be someone who is living a tradition, I would say, should be in dialogue with that tradition.

Another reflection here that might be helpful: always to be aware that whatever light we shine on anything, whatever way we look at anything—if that's in the context of a practice and its paradigm—will tend to look at whatever it is, self and the elements of existence, from certain perspectives.

They frame it along certain lines, within a certain scope, in a conceptual framework. They look through certain lenses, shine light from certain directions. And that's part of what makes a body of teaching, or a tradition, or a practice what it is.

If you think in that sense, then there's always going to be shadow. Shadow will always be there. We will never get rid of shadow. And I'm using that word shadow in a very specific way. It's come to mean something quite narrow. I think Jung was the first one to introduce it, and it's come to mean something more and more narrow—just the sort of shunned parts of oneself, the ignored, the unconscious parts that are negative or destructive, usually rooted in some pain in childhood or in one's development.

I want to use it in a much broader sense. Imagine a light shining on an object, any object. That light shining on that object, that whole gestalt of light and object, will cause a shadow. On the opposite side of the object from the light, the side that's not being illuminated, there will be a shadow of that object. And if I turn the light, shine it from a different direction, a different angle, a different perspective, the shadow will be different. It will be shaped differently, or fall in a different area.

So basically, any time we shine a light on anything, any time we look in a certain way, any time we frame our vision and our gaze and our practice and our thinking and our conceiving in certain ways, there will be shadow associated with that. It's just the way consciousness works.

Again, it's not to single out this or that tradition or practice—psychotherapy or Buddhadharma, this kind of therapy or that kind of Dharma—and say, "Oh, that's bad or rubbish or incompetent." A more mature understanding is that whatever practice we do, whatever conceptual framework, whatever tradition we're in, it will have its shadows. And we're never going to get rid of shadows. As long as there is light, there is shadow. You understand?

So, for example, Jung, who coined the term shadow as far as I know, often gets critiqued for not including so much developmental psychology and ego psychology in his whole framework and paradigm. And then, of course, we can look at those who emphasize childhood wounding and the development of the child, and, as we've done already, touch on some of the ways there will be shadow cast from that: missing the socio-political, the economic, the environmental effects; missing soul or spirituality. And spirituality may have the shadow of spiritual bypassing. So wherever we shine the light, there will be a shadow. Whenever there's light, there's shadow.

Another related reflection, and we'll come back to this, is that part of the problem here in discussing ethics—if we put our finger on a central element of the diagnosis of the whole situation—is that all these different traditions, you might say, shine light from different directions. But another way of saying it is that there are different weightings and prioritizings of different values between traditions, practices, and frameworks. In the whole range of different moral values, using that word "moral" really widely, we can emphasize this one or that one, this one above that one, this one to the extent of almost ignoring that one, and vice versa.

So partly what's happening here, and partly what happens in a lot of the superficial and often loud and strident arguments and hecklings in our society, is there's simply a discrepancy between the relative valuing of different moral values between two parties. We'll return to that. But all this is just to say, again, we're not singling out any one tradition for criticism. It's really part of the whole endeavor of looking at morals and moral considerations that these shadows and differences in valuing will be inevitable. As I say, it's part of the duty of love to look at that and to question. It's part of the honesty, part of the integrity, part of the rub of true relationship with the tradition, with the body of teaching that one loves, with the Logos.

So if we turn our gaze just briefly—and again, in too speedy and superficial a way—onto Buddhadharma and the different kinds of Buddhadharma, we can see where some might have gaps, lacunae, limitations with regards to the kinds of openings of morality I think are needed in our day and age.

When we look at traditional Theravāda Buddhadharma, I remember staying at a monastery for a while. It was wonderful in so many respects—the meditation teaching, the opportunity to practice undisturbed in a lovely setting. But one day I was struck. I was helping out in the kitchen, clearing some things, and I asked, "Where do you keep the recycling?" And the answer from the monk was, "We don't recycle here." I was kind of shocked. He said, "This is all just saṃsāra. All this is saṃsāra. Why bother with it?"

That pained me. I felt it was really an inadequate point of view. There were so many wonderful gifts from that monastery and the teachers there, but set in a very traditional context of Theravāda Buddhadharma, where the aim is to get off the wheel of rebirth, to get out of saṃsāra—saṃsāra being phenomenal existence, the experience of life and death, perception, experience, appearances. The whole thrust, the whole movement of meditation practice, is to sever that link, to not be born again. And what one's leaving behind is just saṃsāra. With it comes the sense that it's illusory.

You can see, if we tie that to what we were talking about in the talk on ontology and epistemology—where I laid out four worldviews, four ontological views—one of them was exactly this: only the unfabricated is really real; all this fabrication is not real, it's saṃsāra, it's worthless, and we're trying to get out of it.

And so, again, the shadow side of that is that we end up not caring, or it's possible that there's an attitude of simply a lack of care about this so-called samsaric realm, about the world, about the earth, and about, in this case, something like recycling. This would be an example of a kind of blindness coming out of shining the light in a certain direction.

Now, actually, nowadays that kind of orientation in the context of Buddhadharma is quite relatively uncommon. Not that many people are actually practicing that way—really trying to think in terms of rebirth and ending rebirth and severing that link, with the fabricated realm being, in that sense, illusory and to be relinquished. But rare as that is, and precious as it is for what it offers, it also has this inevitable lacuna in it, this inevitable limit, when it comes to relating to the world.

And then, if we just look briefly at this, we see certain teachings—I don't know if they're more pop teachings or what—where a practitioner has sort of got the idea that they're trying to move towards some kind of awakening that has no desire in it, that the eradication of desire is where they're headed and what they're aspiring to. We don't have to linger here very long, but what would a life like that even be like? How would I relate to the difficulties in the world and to what the world needs without some kind of desire there? So that kind of gross oversimplification of what one thinks one's doing often leaves a lot lacking, leaves a lot missing in terms of the larger life and the larger possibilities of ethical response.

Søren Kierkegaard, the philosopher, wrote a book called Enten-Eller. I'm mentioning this because, in a way, there's something he talks about there that bears a similarity to certain popular notions of mindfulness, or perhaps pop non-dual teachings, Advaita teachings—not really what I would say the fuller teachings there represent.

In this book, there are three characters. There's character A, who recommends what he calls the aesthetic way of life. There's character B, who recommends what he calls the ethical way of life. And then there's a third character called Victor Eremita, who sort of edits and writes notes on the papers, the academic papers, of both.

Alistair MacIntyre writes about this, so I'll read a short passage from him. He says: "The choice between the ethical and the aesthetic"—two styles of life—"is not the choice between good and evil. It is the choice whether or not to choose in terms of good and evil." A subtle difference, but really, really important.

"At the heart of the aesthetic way of life, as Kierkegaard characterizes it, is the attempt to lose the self in the immediacy of present experience."

Doesn't that sound familiar from certain kinds of teachings?

"The paradigm of aesthetic expression is the romantic lover who is immersed in his own passion. By contrast, the paradigm of the ethical is marriage"—a state of commitment and obligation through time in which the present is bound by the past and to the future.

So he says each of the two ways of life is informed by different concepts, incompatible attitudes, and rival premises.

Sometimes, when there's too much emphasis on living in the present and dissolving the self in the present, in the moment and in present experience, being one with what's happening—that sounds very reminiscent of what Kierkegaard's calling the aesthetic way of life. And in its highlighting and emphasizing the present moment, the shadow there is that it misses the future and what's necessary in terms of commitment to the future. Where does that fit in for our soul, for our spirit, for our practice, for our conceptual framework?

This is one style of thinking about practice. It's quite popular. To me, it's a truncation of larger bodies of teaching. But there's something about future commitment that is really important and is missed. So I want to come back later and talk about soul-making and future commitment and how that relates—what their connection is, what's the notion of future commitment in soul-making.

If we look at my own tradition, the Insight Meditation tradition—and again, I want to say that it's changing very rapidly now, or it seems to me that things are changing quite quickly with regard, say, to something like climate change. A little while ago, some years ago, people might mention it, and some teachers and some people involved in Insight Meditation would say, "Well, that's a political issue. Climate change is a political issue and we don't do politics. We try and be apolitical, non-sectarian."

I think this is less common now, but it still bears mentioning and considering, again, if we're thinking about traditions and the life of traditions and what goes on for us in terms of our relationship with ethics and morality, and what goes on in our mind when our tradition and our commitment to a tradition meets the wider moral landscape.

Because one could say to that response that used to be relatively common, "Well, was the Holocaust a political issue or was it an ethical issue?" The Holocaust was perpetrated essentially by Nazis who were democratically elected in 1933. Therefore, you could say, "Well, the whole thing is just political, just a matter of policy—whether they want to exterminate Jews and gypsies and communists." Does that make it just a political issue? Or is it an ethical issue?

Well, that's different than something like climate change and what to do about climate change, because the Holocaust involved intentional murder. The concentration camps and extermination camps involved intentional murder. But actually, only some proportion of concentration camps were deliberate extermination camps, where they actually put people to death deliberately—like in Auschwitz, for example. Others, like Bergen-Belsen and the ghettos where they imprisoned Jews, there was just a level of deprivation and conditions that happened to result in many, many deaths, which the Nazis obviously didn't mind.

Now, that attitude of "well, that's just how it is for these people, and we're not actually deliberately killing them"—but in a way, one's setting up the conditions or not taking care of the conditions so that death becomes relatively inevitable—there's something like that attitude in many corporations' approach to climate change. It's all a kind of collateral damage.

So the notion that something like climate change is a political issue doesn't really fly. It's one of the ways we can squirm out of opening up to, facing up to, a difficult moral situation and what it asks of us.

Or again, in some Buddhist circles, particularly in Insight Meditation, one used to come across this response with regard to something like climate change: "I don't have an opinion"—as if having an opinion about climate change or about what should change or what to do was all part of views and opinions, which are to be transcended, let go of, because they're a fetter. But to say "I don't have an opinion" and to live a life where, for example, one is flying an enormous amount and generating a huge amount of carbon emissions—way more than one person is entitled to—and not speaking about it, that's actually expressing an opinion, even if I'm saying I'm shunning opinions.

Again, what would it be, for example, in apartheid South Africa, or on the US slave plantations, or next to gypsies and homosexuals and Jews being deported or gassed to death, to say, "I don't have an opinion"?

So there's something in the situation with certain issues like climate change or species loss that allows us to distance ourselves, to use mental mechanisms that distance ourselves from any sense of engagement or culpability or moral responsibility. That it's political, that it's a matter of views and opinions. This is happening, thankfully, much less now. But I'm mentioning it partly because these are the kinds of things that can arise in tradition. Whenever there's the light of a tradition, the light of a practice, a conceptual framework, it will bring with it certain shadows and certain directions.

And again, sometimes in certain Buddhist circles, I wonder about the dominant ethos. Remember, the word ethos is related very closely to the word ethics—the flavour, the character, the personality, either of individuals, or prominent individuals, or of the whole sangha, or of the whole flow of a tradition. And so, again, sometimes with all the emphasis on non-harming and gentleness and kindness and softness—particularly nowadays in Western Buddhadharma, some Western Buddhadharma, particularly the Insight Meditation tradition with its emphasis on softness—sometimes one almost gets the sense that in the dominant ethos, the most important thing for a teacher or anyone else is not to offend anyone. That actually almost trumps anything else. And if challenging students or retreatants or people one's communicating with might be deemed by them offensive, then it's important not to challenge people, and one doesn't say something or backs off.

So this ethos of non-offending, which in itself has a certain moral value—but when that moral value trumps the necessity or the possibility of actually challenging people's behaviour or moral outlook or choices, getting them to think about it, it could be said something's gotten out of balance here from a certain perspective.

So again, I remember—I think I shared this already—Suvacho, a colleague, a Gaia House teacher, teaching a retreat at Gaia House and saying at some point to the yogis there, "Some of you—maybe even a lot of you—will be much better off taking in a refugee family into your home rather than coming on retreat." Quite a challenging thing to say, and perhaps it ruffled a few feathers. But sometimes this ethos of gentleness or non-judgmentalism—which again, with all the pain of the pandemic of the inner critic, has become so emphasized in the teachings, and in a way importantly so, rightly so, helpfully so—but sometimes the question is, can they be overdone so that they begin to eclipse other considerations? They trump other considerations.

So there's always this need to be gentle, to be perceived as gentle, so that, for example, protests in the street are not considered gentle. People are shouting, or it's loud, or it's against the law, as all the XR protests were. And that contravenes a sort of unwritten law about gentleness, or the dominant ethos about gentleness. What's in charge here? How conscious are we about it? And how wide is the range of our consideration?

Or non-judgmentalism, as I mentioned. Again, that can have a shadow side when it's overemphasized. There is a difference between discernment on the one hand and judgment on the other, and it involves whether you're judging people or actions or speech or behaviour. But I read a passage the other day—a couple of passages—where the Buddha is really quite judgmental. There's enormous loving-kindness, enormous generosity and compassion coming out of the Buddha. And at times he sounds, or is, extremely judgmental, harsh, critical. The same with Jesus. Such mercy, such compassion, such beautiful love coming out of that heart and that being and that life and that sacrifice.

And at times, it's fire coming out of them now—the fire and the blade of judgment.

Another issue I think to look out for is just how easily—and it's related to what I just said—but how easily within a tradition or in a sangha or community there can be a kind of coalescence, a streamlining into a certain range of common behavior and common views. One is in the tradition, and so one goes along with that, even if one is not quite conscious of going along with it. One gets a little bit swept up in the stream of that tradition and contained within the family affiliation and loyalty of the community, and may not be conscious of it at all. And so one comes to act in certain ways or have certain views—or rather, certain ways of acting become the norm in that tradition and are just unquestionable. It's just what people do. Certain choices, certain ways of doing things and behaviors, certain views. And in that, there can be a loss of the individual's autonomy, making their own decisions about behavior and about views. Certain behaviors and certain views can become very normalized.

So I've talked in the past, I know, and written about, for example, how normal it is—and again, I hope this is beginning to change; there are signs that it might be—but how normal it is in the Insight Meditation tradition to really do lots of flying. This is just an example of a kind of behavior that can get very normalized, because it's what everyone around me is doing, and we kind of think that we're good people because we're Buddhists and we're interested in less suffering and we're spiritual people.

So the issue is not really about flying, and I've talked about that enough. Let's say the issue is really about, for example, how am I relating to my carbon emissions? And one way of thinking about climate ethics is to calculate—and people have done this—how much carbon emissions, even if we shared them equally, in order not to heat the planet over, let's say, 1.5 degrees or 2 degrees. Then you work backwards from that: this is how we need to limit the carbon emissions, and that works out as such and such a quota, so many tons of carbon emissions per person per year. That would be one way of thinking about it. And in a way, that's a very reasonable way of thinking about it. It leaves aside climate justice and who owes what from the past, but just as a start, that's one approach.

So the issue really here is: how and when and why does it become normal for so many of us to blatantly and unthinkingly use up more than our fair share of carbon, and so add to the global warming and the misery that will come from that disproportionately? What's going on there? As I said, in certain traditions—I mean, the Insight Meditation tradition is just a reflection of the wider society, where it's very normal for people to fly loads and loads and not think about this potential way of contemplating climate ethics. Actually, it's only right that I have an equal share to everyone else. And what do I think I'm doing when I just extravagantly consume much more carbon, put into the atmosphere much more carbon?

So again, what gets normalized? In the wider society, absolutely, certainly. Just recently, Extinction Rebellion was planning a disruption of Heathrow Airport in protest of the planned building of a third runway. And it was pulled, retracted, the plan for this disruption. I don't know the ins and outs, but I wonder whether it was just because the public outcry would have been huge, because it's so normal to think, "I am entitled to fly on holiday. I'm entitled to fly somewhere for some pleasure, and maybe several times a year." And if that doesn't happen, it's an unthinkable state of affairs. I don't actually think this, but something gets normalized in the larger culture and also in the Insight Meditation culture, for example. I'm sure it happens in lots of other cultures—corporate cultures and all kinds of things. But something's getting normalized just because it's normal in the subculture, and it's normal in the subculture partly because it's normal in the wider culture.

So again, what's the responsibility of a tradition to really wrestle with—I mean really wrestle, really question—the dominant values in the wider culture when it's necessary to do so? You can pay very easy lip service to anti-consumerism: "Oh, that's greed, it's one of the kilesas," and so forth. But to really do that.

So if we think then about what's a fair share of carbon dioxide as one way of thinking about climate ethics, some of you will have heard of Immanuel Kant's categorical imperative. It's a kind of rational formula that he came up with for an egalitarian ethics—very much in line with what I'm just saying. We have to regard everyone equally. Everyone gets equal respect and equal share, so to speak. But this categorical imperative is a way of thinking about one's action and testing it by the standards of this rational idea, which says that one ought so to act as to be able to will that everyone should act so.

So what that means is, if I want to use up three or four times my fair share of carbon for the year, can I really wish, can I really will that everyone does so? Because I know that if everyone uses three or four times their share, then the whole ship sinks. If I use that measure, that rational measure, Kant's categorical imperative, it puts certain constraints on the choices I have to make. Maybe I do use three times my carbon share this year—somehow I have to justify that, or I have to offset it, and I don't just mean planting trees somewhere. I have to consider whether there are cases where, in the larger scope of taking care of everyone equally, within this equalitarian ethics, it actually is justified, it does make sense.

So how do I decide? If, for example, I really feel that my flying—let's take flying, just because I can't think of anything else right now—that my flying back and forth, many flights a year, if I really think that there's so much good coming out of that, that it's so necessary, then maybe the balance of that good outweighs the harm of putting all that carbon into the atmosphere. How do I decide? It's not that easy.

When I used to talk about this and write about it, it was hard to make prescriptions. But at least what I wanted to feel and to see was that there was a wrestling with these issues, that they weren't just easy. Because as I said, when it gets normalised—when, for example, flying a lot to go on retreat, to teach a retreat, to visit a certain Buddhist tourist site—that last possibility gets much easier. If I'm flying a lot anyway to teach retreats, and I'm not really thinking about it too much, I'm not really wrestling with it, then that other flight to go on holiday or do something even if it looks vaguely Buddhist, it's part of just what gets swept up in the normality. It's just normalised.

What I was hoping for, I think, was a sense of people wrestling with these choices, which I really hear is beginning to happen nowadays, and I'm thankful for that. So again, two poles. One pole would just be the inner critic: "Oh, people will judge me if I fly a lot." And the other pole is just going ahead because it's normalised—I'm not afraid of judgment because the normality in my tradition or my culture is not to be judged, so I just do it. Can there be a middle way where there's actually a wrestling with it, a questioning—how do I decide? If I'm using Kant's categorical imperative, and I'm not suggesting that's the only way of doing things, how do I actually weigh up the relative amounts of suffering or the relative help, whether I fly or I don't fly, whether I take those emissions or I do fly and help whatever that situation is?

And again, swept up, caught up in the homogeneity, the stream of a tradition and its way of thinking and its accepted behaviours—what would it be to actually be more independent and wrestle more independently? Or together, the Sangha together, people within the Sangha actually really wrestling with these questions? There's something for me about the wrestling which shows an aliveness ethically. It shows I'm willing to not be peaceful. I'm willing to put up with the agitation of this and the lack of simplicity of it. Some of these choices are really not simple. There's something about assenting to and opening to and putting up with and confronting and entering into the difficulty, the wrestling. It's not peaceful. It's not simple. It doesn't fit that shrunken range of Buddhist archetypes of peacefulness and simplicity.

You can imagine if that way of thinking—from considering how we divide up a fair share of climate emissions per person, per year, for the whole of humanity, connected with Kant's categorical imperative—became normal. You can imagine saying to someone, "Oh, I'm going off here or there, I'm going for a holiday," and they say, "Really? Wow." Well, you can imagine having some kind of document, some need to justify it. The person asking, "Where's your LEAFSAJ?"

What's a LEAFSAJ? L-E-A-F-S-A-J: "Lethal Emissions in excess of your fair share Allowance Justification." LEAFSAJ. Or your HEAFSAJ: "Harmful Emissions in excess of your fair share Allowance Justification." That actually becomes the normal way of thinking about it. It's like, "Whoa, you're doing what?"

So a lot of this just is a matter of what's normal. Because when we talk about carbon and climate and also species loss—these related issues—the threads of cause and effect are so much more complex. It's not like stabbing someone to death, where it's very clear what's the cause, what's the effect, who's the culprit. With something like climate change and carbon emissions and seven-plus billion people, plus government policy and all that, it's actually quite hard to trace the threads of cause and effect.

But in a way, again, we can very easily let that complexity and the difficulty of tracing cause and effect obfuscate and eclipse our sense of moral responsibility. So it's not too far from that attitude of "I don't mind killing and stealing as long as no one finds out." No one's going to find out because the threads of cause and effect are too complex. These are hard issues, I think—hard to think through, hard to face up to.

I did hear about several—that's what I alluded to earlier—I did hear about several, I don't know what to call them, Buddhist sightseeing trips, really. They get billed as pilgrimages, but... flying to Bhutan or India or wherever to go to some Buddhist temples and such. And so again, what if we took, for example, Kant's categorical imperative or this idea of a fair share of carbon emissions? How would I justify that? What would I say on my HEEF SAG form? What would I say to that family in Bangladesh who have almost no food because of floods and no house? Or to those dying of dengue fever that has expanded its territory with climate change and global warming? Or those whose livelihoods, health, and homes have been destroyed because of years of drought? Already people are in that situation—human beings are in that situation—and in the future, because of these excess emissions. What would I say? To really actually contemplate that conversation. Imagine yourself, imagine myself there with them, or here with them.

If you make it simpler, sometimes it's easier to see. Imagine you're on a ship, I'm on a ship, with ten people or a hundred people even. And I have to, I want to explain to them why I'm allowed to eat more food than them, to shit on the deck, and they're not allowed. And maybe I'm a Dharma teacher and I'm explaining, and I give them a Dharma talk—that would be an interesting thing. My Dharma talk to these ten or a hundred people justifying why I deserve that special allowance, because I do very special work, you know.

Sometimes we have to, because of the complexity of the situation, actually make it a bit smaller and say, hold on, what actually is the difference? It's a difference of scale. But to be in that situation in the boat, in the middle of the ocean, with nothing else around, which is the situation of our planet, and then decide that I can emit more, not care about my waste, use up more resources—what am I really going to say to them? How am I going to justify that?

So again, what's normal? Imagine, if we take a different moral issue—I might slip out easily saying, "Oh yeah, I'm off to wherever it is to see some Buddhist temples, and I'm going to fly there, and then I'm going to fly here," whatever it is. What if I just mentioned to someone, "Oh yeah, well, my slaves are going to help me out with that"? People would be like, "Your what? Your slaves?" It's just—it has become not normal. There's, you know, not to underestimate the power of just what becomes normalized through the body and the flow and the range of a tradition or subculture or wider culture. So if I... Everyone, I think, would object to slaves. And very few people would raise their voice around, say, using up more carbon. Or flying a lot.

I mean, that's partly being a little bit tongue-in-cheek. But if we're just talking now, before we even get on to the soul-making possibilities, just in terms of more mainstream meditative possibilities, it might be interesting to, in stepping up and opening out to the whole range of difficulty and depth and complexity of the moral challenge here, actually engage in certain meditative exercises—for example, to really let these issues go deeper. Because I think what can happen is that they don't really register in the heart and the soul and the being. There's a way they can kind of stay at arm's length. And so we're not really dealing with that.

So, for example, as I was a bit tongue-in-cheek before, but what about imagining a family in Bangladesh or Jakarta or in sub-Saharan Africa who find out that the floods there or the drought and the threat from these floods or drought or whatever to their lives are made worse and more probable through climate change, so that their house and fields and whatever it is become unworkable, uninhabitable? They become a refugee or die, or their relatives or family die. They're cast into abject poverty. Very little hope of getting out of that. And they learn somehow that this is related to something called climate change, and there's the education there. And they also learn that climate change is caused by CO2 emissions, mostly, and most of the CO2 emissions come from rich people. Most of whom, these rich people, know about climate change and its connection with CO2 emissions. And these people in this family in wherever it is—Bangladesh or Jakarta or somewhere in Africa—they hear about that. And they also hear that actually these people don't need to fly. These rich people don't need to fly. But they like to go on holiday or whatever it is because it's a pleasant experience.

Again, what would I actually say to them to justify my choice to fly on holiday, or to eat red meat, or to drive an SUV, or whatever it is? Or even just to choose a slightly cheaper energy company? Or even as a Dharma teacher, if I fly to teach a lot, again with the easy assumption that because I'm a Dharma teacher, my flight and my life and my efforts must be decreasing suffering. Would it be possible to actually have that imaginary conversation in meditation, to really be with the whole emotional range of it and the sensitivity and difficult feelings?

Within that, there's the possibility of cultivating a real sensitivity to discomfort, to when things feel out of alignment, but also when they feel in alignment and when there's a sense of integrity. These experiences are reflected in the heart and the energy body. They actually feel different. This might be an interesting practice—to use the imagination in meditation. Not imaginal practice, but imagination. Put yourself in relationship with those kinds of human beings whom we, in the rich West, don't often come into direct contact with. Actually have that imaginary conversation with all the availability of the heart and the energy body, taking the time, listening to the mind, watching what the mind does, watching what's happening in the body, feeling it, and developing sensitivity to where things lack integrity in ourselves, where there's this kind of squirming, and where they are in integrity and in alignment—the whole range of emotion there.

Part of what ethical practice asks of us, and even more so nowadays with all this complexity and globalization and the situation of climate change and species loss and environmental degradation and destruction, is not just sensitivity in all these kinds of ways—sensitivity empathically, sensitivity to ethics and morals, which is something I'll return to. It also asks us for a great capacity emotionally. Actually, can I tolerate the grief here? Can I tolerate the remorse? Can I be with that? Can I let it be in a crucible so that something redemptive, helpful, onward-leading, ennobling comes out of it? It's asking quite a lot. But that might be an interesting exercise.

Sometimes what can happen is that certain priceless elements within a tradition or a teaching can actually become things we hide behind in certain ways. For example, the Four Noble Truths can become, at times, something of a delusional trope or delusional rhetoric. I'm off on a sightseeing trip to Tibet or Nepal or Bhutan or wherever, and it's kind of Buddhist. As a Buddhist practitioner, I feel myself, or I want to think of myself, as having this commitment to decreasing suffering, my own and the world's. And yet I know, or I should know, that making that choice—what's essentially an unnecessary trip—will increase suffering. How do I square my devotion to and commitment to the paradigm of the Four Noble Truths and decreasing suffering with the suffering that, although difficult to trace, will result from my choosing to go on that particular trip and fly?

What's interesting about that kind of thing is that one goes perhaps on these Buddhist pilgrimages or sightseeing trips, and you can sense from the soul-making perspective what's wrapped up in there—something inchoate as an image. It's potentially an image. Ladakh or Bhutan or Nepal or Tibet carries this whole sense, almost not quite imaginal, but there's the image of Tibetan history, Tibetan Buddhadharma history, and all the color and richness and beauty of that. That's a potentially imaginal image in the psyche. But if I don't have a way of relating to it where it actually becomes authentically imaginal, then the only way I can relate to it is as something concretized and literalized. I need to go there. Without the soul-making paradigm, without an actual imaginal practice understanding how there doesn't need to be literalization, any duty I have to that image has to be literalized. Without that soul-making paradigm, this incipient eros for this fantasy or non-imaginal image of Tibetan Buddhist history has to be concretized.

If one has practiced more with the imaginal and soul-making paradigms, I actually don't need to go there. I'm not going to get actual teachings there, or it's very unlikely I'm going to get actual teachings there that I wouldn't otherwise get if I stayed here and got on the internet or found them in a book or from a teacher here. I'm not going to get actual teachings there that would make a real difference to me or my teaching. I might, but it's pretty rare these days. With imaginal practice, it's actually possible to enter into an erotic-imaginal relationship with that whole region, with that whole lineage, with that whole beauty. And it's just as alive and fecund in my soul and psyche, just as beautiful and rich and onward-leading and opening, just as soul-making—maybe more so than if I went there and actually concretized the whole thing.

What's the difference between a fixated image and an imaginal image? Without the imaginal sensibility, without a sense of what it means for something to be imaginal and how to practice, without the taste for it, things get concretized. And the concretization has a cost—to others and to myself.

As I said, there are possibilities here, and it's really not to say one tradition or practice is better than another. But there are possibilities to expand some of the ways we relate, or fail to relate, ethically. Some of the ways our ethical consideration and behavior fall short, our ethical vision and sensibility fall short—it's possible to expand from different perspectives. One of them is the soul-making paradigm as we've taught it, with image and all that.

If we think about what traditional Buddhadharma—and again, I'm mostly thinking of insight meditation Dharma, though it probably applies to other sub-traditions—what the typical limits on ethics and on ethos there might be, on the character or flavor of practitioners and how the whole thing gets shaped and limited, the whole tenor of that trajectory with regard to activism and the possibilities of activism, specifically activism around climate or species loss and mass extinction. If we analyze it for a few moments, in traditional insight meditation or Buddhadharma, there are certain limits on the ethics and on the ethos, because those two go together, and therefore on the possibility of activism, because there's limited possibility for the sense of different aspects of our existence. And oftentimes these limits are unconscious.

So, for example, with regard to the self, there's this inherited archetype of the peaceful, detached Buddha. This is what an awakening person looks like; this is the flavor, the ethos of their being. They're peaceful, they're simple, they're detached. They don't get upset, they don't shout in the street, they don't break the law.

So in terms of the scope of the ethos, and therefore the ethics of the self, and how it might be supported or not to engage in activism—and maybe even civil disobedience—there's a limit there because of the ethos, which isn't hardly recognized as something that's handed to us and makes an imprint on us. It's not talked about as an image. It's not talked about as an archetype. And because it's not talked about and recognized as such, it has more insidious clout. So in terms of the self, there would be one kind of limitation there.

In terms of other—so we can think about self, other, world, eros, and time, those five categories—in the way that I've just explained, with regard to others and other human beings, again there is perhaps a tendency to not want to create a duality, certainly through judgmentalism. There's no place for an image of war, of battle. We can't have opponents. There's not scope for it in terms of what we're given in terms of image and thinking. That's got to be on its way to hatred; the defilement of hatred is the usual assumption. It's reified.

But can there be the theatre of war? The image, I mean, of war. The image of opponents. The image of battle. It's not reified, but in the theatre of things, it can have that power without it being reified into the defilement of hatred.

Bill McKibben, founder of 350.org and a long-term environmental activist—actually, I think he wrote the first ever book on climate change—at one point, a few years ago, he actually came out and said, "They are the enemy." Who? These big oil corporations, these big fossil fuel corporations. He actually started talking in those terms. Now yes, we can reify that and get into all kinds of problems and defilement, but we can also use that as an image. And the self can be cast as a warrior, for example—theatrically cast, imaginally cast as a warrior in relation to this enemy. So there's a limitation on self, limitation on other, on the sense of self and the sense of other.

The world too. Self, other, world. The world tends to be—if we just speak about Insight Meditation Dharma—tends to just receive the same view of the world as the dominant view in the culture. It's a flat world, so to speak. It's not dimensional. One subscribes to the scientific materialist view, maybe with a few magical notions bound in there or floating around. The world itself is, in many respects, just... it may be beautiful, but it's a kind of irrelevant and purposeless backdrop for the project of my own liberation, my practice.

Again, some of this is not conscious, but because it's the dominant worldview in the culture, it seeps into the subculture and just becomes part of it—unless it's actually questioned, unearthed, reworked, opened up, considered differently.

Self, other, world, eros. My passion, my love, my tears. So again, in traditional Buddhadharma, either they're mine—and that would be an unskillful way of looking at them—or they're not mine, they're anattā, and that would be a skillful way of looking at them. There's no other option. It's just either mine or not mine. My rage, my eros, my love, my grief.

Or in terms of time—self, other, world, eros, time. I'm putting those five together because they kind of go as a bundle of fabrication. They tend to get fabricated together: self and other and world and time and some kind of desire. And so how they get fabricated matters a great deal, as we've touched on in these talks and beforehand. They tend to get fabricated together as a kind of bundle—not always exactly in the same moment, but they're related.

So with the fifth one, with time, again the usual approach in the Insight Meditation tradition would be that we only have the notion of impermanence, that things are impermanent. That's the way we relate to time. Or that we can take practical measures for the future, of course, and those practical measures may either succeed or fail. What's missing there? It's impermanence and working practically for the future, and that future—whatever projects we have for the future, whatever hopes—may either succeed or fail. What's missing there?

There's no eternality. There's no sense of the eternal life.

Let's linger on some of these a little while. In terms of the self, and also the attributes or the range of self-sense and self-expression, again, oftentimes what's missing – so the warrior is missing, but also the kind of place for wrath. We have it in the Tibetan deities; at least you have the image of it, the wrathful deities. But it's still somewhat problematic how that is supposed to translate into one's life. Is there a place for wrath? For righteous indignation, for moral indignation? Does that have a place in our moral life?

Is there a need for that? Is there a maturity in allowing that place? Of course it goes with shadow. Of course it goes with potential dangers and misuse and delusion. But is there a place for that? Oftentimes, again, in the usual range of what we receive as the ethos, and therefore the ethics, of Buddhadharma, that has no place.

Nikolai Hartmann is a philosopher I've mentioned before in other talks, and I'm going to come back to him and talk quite a bit, I think, about some of his work. He pointed out, surveying classical ethics with Aristotle and Plato and the like, that Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics names the virtue of praotēs. At first sight, it seems to mean something like gentleness. So that's a moral value, a moral virtue. But when he looks into it closely, it actually seems to mean equable temper more than gentleness. What it really means is something between violent temper on the one hand, and on the other hand, an incapacity to feel righteous indignation.

So with regard to mildness of temper, with regard to this praotēs, a special merit lies in the view that not only easy excitability to anger, but also complete incapacity to feel wrath, is a moral defect. This is Nikolai Hartmann writing about Aristotle's ethics: "A special merit lies in the view that not only easy excitability to anger" – that's the one we'd all very easily recognize as what he calls a moral defect – "but also complete incapacity to feel wrath is a moral defect. The presupposition of this view is that anger in itself is something valuable, therefore indirectly that in general there is moral value in emotion. It is evident that here a far deeper appreciation of emotion is expressed than we find elsewhere among the ancients." He's talking about the Stoics and people like that.

And of course we can translate that to our contemporary age, just in terms of Buddhadharma, the subculture of Buddhadharma. Even within the Insight Meditation tradition, you see quite a range in the emphasis of different teachings on the importance of emotion and appreciation of emotion – what's the range of importance, what's the range of emotion to which importance and place is given. But here, this incapacity to feel wrath is a moral defect, as much as being too quick to temper and to anger. So again, we're talking about where things get limited, just by virtue of being in tradition, in the run of accepted ways, accepted modes of thinking and regarding.

If we come back to this point about time – I mentioned time as one of the elements there: self, other, world, eros, and time – in terms of this bundle that tends to get fabricated together in both conventional perception and in imaginal perception. Altogether they go together as aspects of fabrication.

Sometimes when I'm talking to people who are trying to work towards solutions with regard to climate change, or they're activists, they use the word "story." We need a new story. We need a new narrative. And it can sound like we're talking about the same thing when we talk about image or fantasy – as if story and narrative are similar words, just interchangeable words for that. But when I listen to them, it's clear that we're actually talking about different things.

Yes, I think we do need a plan, or plans, about what we're going to do about climate change and halting species loss and that kind of thing. We need concrete plans and tools to implement those plans and legislation and all that. But some of these activists and people concerned, with a lot of care and heart – and again, it's not to say this is wrong, it's just to add to it – talk about story and narrative and the need for a wider story and narrative in regard to climate, and particularly how we will face the likely mayhem and catastrophes that many people consider likely in the face of climate and environmental breakdown.

The story and narrative as it's used by some of these activists – because it's a story, it brings a kind of binding to the future. It actually connects with that passage we read from Kierkegaard about not the aesthetic way of life, but the ethical way of life.

Marriage as the paradigm of that ethical life—marriage being a commitment in time to the future, through the past and into the future.

So this idea of a new story, a new narrative, or new stories and new narratives—they seem to bring, and may indeed bring, this binding to the future. But of course, what if that future does not turn out at all as the story hopes or plans? You can have a story for how we're going to build resilience or human community and cohesion, social cohesion, when there's food scarcity or water scarcity, or when disease is rampant and social breakdown occurs. But what if that future does not turn out at all as the story hopes?

An imaginal image, in contrast, in the way we're using that term—because it's eternal and timeless, as we've discussed, that being one of the elements of the imaginal—it seems not to imply a future binding. It's just eternal. So it seems, if it's not quite the aesthetic way of life, it's neither the ethical way of life as Kierkegaard was describing, because it doesn't have this binding to the future.

So it seems that because of the eternality element, the timelessness element... but actually it does bind us. It has a bond with and commitment to life. For example, an image of oneself as an activist or a warrior for the earth, a warrior for species, or whatever it may be—that image needs to be eternal partly because in being eternal it doesn't then depend on what happens. Whatever happens, that soldier will fight. There's a kind of endlessness to the problems we face and to what we need to address and what we need to combat.

So those images I used to share years ago—one of my recurrent images of this solitary soldier fighting. One of the things that's interesting is he's always fighting. And there's a kind of endlessness to him. He rests and then he gets up to fight. And then he rests and he gets up to fight. And there's not an end to that. So there is actually a future bonding—as I said, a bond with a commitment to however that pans out, however that plays out, however that's refracted into life. A commitment to acting, speaking, expressing, fighting, seeding, giving birth in whatever ways are helpful or necessary or part of that whole duty of the image. Ongoingly, no matter what. It doesn't depend on achieving a specific outcome.

So certain movements of activism will go on forever. There won't be an end to them. The revolution, if you use that word, goes on forever. There's always something. And in a way, that part is wrapped up in a more imaginal way of sensing the whole thing. And there's of course the duty there, and the infinite mirroring and echoing as elements of the imaginal.

So that image, in our sense of imaginal image, is slightly different than story and narrative. And it does bring, if one has an image of oneself in that way—as an activist, as a warrior, or whatever it may be, perhaps a midwife, perhaps healing the planet—whatever the image is, it doesn't actually stop. Both the image in itself and also the reality of the situation is not going to stop. But there's duty coming through, refracted from the image into one's life, into one's action, speech, and more.

So if you go back to Kierkegaard and his distinction between the aesthetic way of life that has no commitment to the future and just wants to lose the self in the present moment, merge with the present moment—no self, just this moment—compared with the ethical way of life and its sober commitment to the future, what's missing in that distinction is the psychological awareness of what we might call soulfulness. Each of those modes, what he calls the aesthetic and the ethical, may have that quality. But the main point here in relation to time and the future is this: the allowing of more imaginal dimensions, more imaginal filling out of the ethos and of the possibilities and the ethical sensibility and the sense of self, other, world—in relation to time, we then get this whole other dimension of eternality. That eternality binds us to the future in a more endless way, not so tied to a certain outcome. So there's actually an extra duty there to a certain extent, but there's also a liberation, because we're not so tied to achieving this or that specific outcome. Yes, we want that. Yes, we hope for that. But on the imaginal level at least, it's endless, it's eternal. And there's a duty there, and that duty binds. It's like the duty of marriage, the bond, the commitment to that endless refraction in time of the life of that image, of the duty of that image.

Later, as I mentioned very briefly, I want to come back and talk about values and virtues as a different way of talking, both about ethics and about soul-making. I will hopefully say much more about that later, but just to see something now and to tie it to what we just discussed: if we think about virtues, human virtues and ethics, the development of those virtues becomes one possible way of thinking about the kind of moral education or moral development I was describing. There don't seem to be many programs for personal development beyond eighteen, let alone moral development. Thinking about the virtues is one way of approaching this. We'll come back to that. And that approach is open-ended—unlike the story or the narrative, the sense that we need a new story, a new narrative, that seems to...

Sometimes when I hear these friends and colleagues and other people—activists or people talking—it seems to involve a trajectory in time that will arrive at a certain place. The story or this narrative that one tries to introduce into society ends in time, with the hope that there will be a collective buying into this story and narrative that will steer us all in a better direction.

If we regard the program of development or the invitation to develop human virtues, our moral virtues, as part of the possible development we can have as human beings—what we can cultivate—then that can actually be open-ended. It's never perfected. It's never ever finished. So there's a similarity in terms of the open-endedness that goes with imaginal ways of sensing one's relationship to the whole of ethical issues and with thinking about it in terms of virtues. We'll come back to virtues later.

If we just stay with what we know so far about the soul-making paradigm—and I probably don't need to say this, but I'll mention it anyway, just in case someone raises it as a question—the idea of theatre, or the idea of emptiness of reality, the imaginal middle way and all that, bears no similarity at all with what's recently been coined as post-truth politics and fake news and Donald Trump and others spinning fake news or turning stories on their heads and promulgating all that. It doesn't start with him, of course.

There's a very basic difference. If we say everything is empty or there's no ultimate truth or reality, that doesn't invite what I don't know what to call—this misdemeanor of post-truth politics and fake news. As we said, emptiness doesn't mean all things are ontologically the same, that everything's kind of untrue so therefore anything goes.

How should we put our finger on what's different here? One way is looking at the intention. What determines the choice of speech or action or view if there's no ultimate truth? In so-called post-truth politics, what's determining why a certain politician says this thing or presents a certain view which is clearly not the case and convinces people that it is? What's determining it? Well, it's things like ego and greed and fear. And the ego there, the self, is reified. So in this kind of "it's all whatever, truth has lost its place," actually there's a reification of the self, and certain objects get reified for the purposes of greed or in relationship to greed.

And also some art that's influenced by post-modernism—now thinking of art that's, I don't know what to say, at its worst—again, what's choosing, what's determining the choice of putting this out or presenting this or that? Sometimes it can be ego: the artist wants to be famous, wants to make money, wants to appear clever. And there's a reification of nihilism there, of meaninglessness.

In soul-making, rather, what determines our choice of what we put out there—of speech, of action, of view—if it's not some ultimate truth? Well, it's the sense of soul-making and all that that entails, including the fullness of intention, including beauty, including love, including reverence. All that is there. So if anyone gets nervous with these notions of emptiness and the imaginal middle way and the theatre-like quality and the possibility of using image—"but image isn't real"—it's very clear where the intention is coming from, what determines choices.

If we touch on the Four Noble Truths, again for the sake of asking: are there ways in which certain central paradigms, normalized paradigms, can actually unwittingly become limiting for our relationship with ethics and moral questions?

One area I think is quite enlightening to consider in this regard is litter. It strikes me as quite a good example of something which isn't obviously related as an issue to the Four Noble Truths, for the most part. Caring about removing litter—you can't really say that's going to lead to less suffering, except in some instances. It can't really be looked at convincingly in terms of the Four Noble Truths paradigm. And because the Four Noble Truths is so central and so determinative of the direction, and therefore the gaze and the outlook—the moral outlook and gaze and action or non-action within the Buddha Dharma—there may be limitations coming from that.

Whereas with the soul-making paradigm, we're actually including other ways of looking where the sense of soul-making, the sense of sacredness and beauty, are given weight—as much sometimes as a reduction in suffering. So that something like litter becomes part of a larger, let's call it a moral issue, and what we do about litter becomes part of ethical concern.

In itself, litter—yes, in some instances, of course, it's plastic in the oceans and the impact on marine life. That's becoming really broadcast as a problem just recently, in the last year or two, and more people are cottoning on to that. But there's still a difference in the reason for concern: "This turtle or these seabirds will die, and therefore there's concern for the suffering of those marine animals." There's a difference between that kind of concern and the concern that it's beauty being destroyed, or that it's literally trashing something sacred—the earth and the natural world. You understand? So the Four Noble Truths, when it becomes a normalized paradigm, can limit the range of our concern, of what goes into what we might call ethical concern in terms of how we live and how we relate to the earth.

Air pollution as well. In England and in certain countries, many countries, it's really a big issue, especially with burning diesel, diesel cars. But the focus is often on health—understandably, especially the health of children. That's obviously a real concern. But there's still a difference in the range of care and the actual object of what's cared about. I care for the health of my children—they might get asthma or some organic problem—and that's why I care about air pollution.

Versus, is there not just, from a certain perspective, from my soul, the sensitivity of my soul, there's just something wrong with air smelling that way—smelling of diesel fumes, smelling of coal fumes? There's something sacrosanct that is being tarnished, that is not being respected. Beauty—the beauty of just simple fresh air and the fragrances of life—is not being respected. It's a different concern.

And in England, I don't know if they're still around, but certainly I remember from my childhood the slogan "Keep Britain Tidy," asking people to pick up litter and put things in rubbish bins. I notice a couple of things about that. One, it doesn't say "Keep Britain Beautiful." There's not, in the larger culture, this kind of respect for beauty. Beauty doesn't have the same place, the same kind of depth that it could have—the depth that it does in the soul-making paradigm, for example. And also, this is "Keep Britain Beautiful" as opposed to "Keep the Earth Beautiful." A slightly narrow, nationalistic view there.

So there are ways that—again, we're just talking about the insight meditation tradition right now, mostly, or Buddha-Dharma—there are ways that, with all the gifts and all the bounty and benefits that it can bring, it can also be limited, like any perspective, any tradition, any conceptual framework, any paradigm of practice can be limited, will be limited. And if we expand the scope of Dharma to include more soul-making Dharma ideas and perspectives and paradigms, then with that there's a corresponding expansion in many different ways, many possible different ways, of our ethical range, sensibility, concern, and action.

Let me point out another difference, or a few more differences actually. I used to talk a lot about the image being primary. People used to ask, "What do you mean when you say the image is primary?" So I was talking with someone the other day, and she had a very beautiful image, a very touching image for her, of just the feathery breast of a bird coming into contact with her heart and pressing up against her. There was a tremendous amount of compassion wrapped up in that image—very, very beautiful. And it opened the floodgates of love and some grief in a very healing way.

But she said to me that she realised the grief she had been feeling prior to that image—there was some grief, but she was saying, "Is it this? Is it that? What's the grief?" None of the reasons she was giving, that the mind was giving herself for what the grief was for, none of the explanations the mind was landing on, seemed quite adequate. And then she recognised that actually it was grief at being out of contact with this angel. So it wasn't caused by this or that in the life, or this or that happening, or being lost. There was actually, in the contact with this image, the recognition that the grief that had been there in her heart was grief at being out of contact with an angel.

In other words, the image is primary, and in this case, its absence is the primary cause, if you like, or condition for grief to arise, rather than something in the life. So our emotions, in this view, are coming more from the image. Our actions, our choices are coming more from an image. And sometimes we're not even quite conscious of what the image is. The image is what's primary. The image is what drives us. The image is not primary in time so much as primary in fundamental importance.

Again, we're not stating this as a kind of dogmatic assertion, as in some way finally or ultimately true. It's a way of looking, a way of conceiving. It's a certain logos that we can move in and out of. But actually it has a lot of both explanatory power and also soul-making power when we start to see our lives that way—not just our emotions, our minds, our inspirations, but as I said, our actions, choices, our sensibilities, our love. The image is primary.

I'm mentioning it now partly because this person was also relating to me, over a period of time, a great deal of concern—very beautiful concern—with different social justice issues. And sometimes she would feel herself really in a quandary, torn between: "How should I choose? How should I present this social justice issue? What's my responsibility here? If I do this, then I'm failing on that. If I do that, I'm failing on this." Really trying to do the best that she could in relation to these difficult, ongoing, larger social justice issues.

And an image came to her of the Black Madonna, and this image was very connected with her care, her deep concern and commitment to working on social justice issues. And she started to realise, in working with this image, that her primary duty was to this Black Madonna.

And this Black Madonna, as I said—or let's put it this way—her dedication to social justice, to addressing issues of social justice and voicing them and working towards better solutions and opening them out, her dedication to social justice issues was an echo, was part of the infinite echoing and mirroring in her life of this Black Madonna image.

And in a way, what she came to realize was that her primary duty was to the Black Madonna, and the refraction of that primary duty into her life was the expression of her work on, her care about, these social justice issues. This is rather than the typical way of thinking, which is the other way around—that her primary commitment is to addressing this fact or that fact of a social situation, or this person or that person. In seeing it this way, that the actual primary duty was to the image, in this case the Black Madonna, that in some way encapsulated and echoed and held and illuminated and was related to with care these social justice issues—in realizing that the primary duty was to the Black Madonna, the kind of unhelpful agitation that she was feeling around what to choose in terms of how to act, how to speak, when to say this, what to do in this situation, around very specific things which you don't need to go into, her unhelpful agitation just subsided. Her whole relationship to that whole set of issues and what was coming up in the community context she was having to deal with became much more workable, much simpler. All the depth, all the passion, all the beauty of her involvement and commitment was still there, but without the kind of unhelpful agitation that went with it.

So again, we've been talking really about the ways that imaginal practice as we've discussed it so far can augment and expand and supplement the ways we already have of relating to ethical issues. If we keep going, another one I've already touched on, but I'll say it again because it's so important: Whose grief is it that I feel in my heart for the earth? For what we're doing to the earth—massive, massive changes on geological time scales. Whose grief is it? Whose rage? Whose outrage? Whose indignation? Whose love for the earth? Whose rage at species loss?

If I'm relating to the whole thing in a way where I'm sensing the whole thing with soul—sensing the situation, the plight of the earth, the plight of the species, the plight of humanity, and my heart and my emotions—if I can find a way to sense all that with soul, then what passes through my heart, whether it comes from an image, from an intrapsychic image, or comes more globally from sensing the whole situation with soul, I start to feel that those aspects of that whole situation that I call my emotions, that are my emotions, my heart—they start to be sensed as divine.

Whose grief? Whose rage? Whose love? Yes, it's mine, of course. Yes, it's anattā—it's not mine, of course. Both perspectives valuable. And a third one: it's the Buddha nature's. It's the divinities'. It's God's. It's coming through my heart. My heart, my grief, is an instrument of the divine care. And as such, the divine, the Buddha nature, needs me to feel this grief.

Sometimes that's what it can feel like—that the scope of the problems is so huge, just on a planetary scale, but also on a soul level. It's bigger than how we usually feel ourselves to be. The emotion there is bigger than mine.

Now again, of course there's the possibility of delusion with all that, especially if I take any of those—my rage or grief or eros—and I just rationalize it by calling it divine, and then that makes excuses for me to either indulge in it or sink in it or act out or whatever. Of course there's a possibility of delusional rationalization. But again, if we're talking about authentic sensing with soul, or at least moving more in that direction, the authentic imaginal, then this will be more authentic and genuine.

And it adds the whole dimensionality to the very organ, the very instrument of the heart, and to the very difficult feelings we're going through—whether they're grief or rage or whatever, moral indignation, that kind of passion. It adds the dimensionality and the divinity there, and that gives space, and it gives an anchoring in something beyond. It's enormously liberating and helpful and empowering and soul-making and beautiful.

It's in all these areas—self, other, world, eros, time, and other aspects, beauty. We talked about sacredness. We can expand them all with the help of soul-making dharma paradigms and what they bring in to flesh out and enrich and dimensionalize our sense of ethics and the whole movement of the moral life within us—what we respond to, what we see, what we care for, how we act, how we choose.

So I think there's a case to be made that the usual ways in our contemporary society and cultures that we conceive of and sense the self and also the world—both the self and the world—are not always, but for many of us, not quite adequate to the complexity and the difficulty and the demand of the challenges that we face, especially with regard to things like climate change and species loss and those kinds of huge moral issues. And it might also be, as I was saying, that even within certain subcultures like the Dharma or Insight Meditation tradition, the usual ways of sensing and conceiving of the self and of the world are not quite adequate—not for everyone, but for many people. They need some other ways to open out the sense of self and world, and those ways, those other ways, might become platforms of support for opening up the moral sensibility and the power to act, the capacity to act, the potential.

So it's interesting—if we talk about climate change and species extinction, it's hard to imagine a Hollywood movie about that which would really galvanize things, in terms of speaking to people. It's not really a personal story in that sense. You can get earthquake movies and volcano movies and so forth, and the focus is on the individual hero and maybe his or her family and what they go through, and it gets shrunk down to a personal—I don't know what they call it—action movie or catastrophe movie or whatever. But something like climate change and species loss is much more than a personal story can ever really get hold of. It's not really on that level.

And yet in our society, because of the culture of individualism, that becomes a kind of dominant way that we think about things. It becomes the easiest way for people to get moved and galvanised and relate to something. But the contemporary sense of self may not be adequate. It's not personal in that way.

A worldview that all is one also may not be adequate. Or, say, a certain kind of dharmic practice where the story and the self is atomized into sensations and mind states—that kind of lens also won't be very helpful when I look at the whole issue of climate change. It's too microscopic. It's missing the bigger ethical issues there. I mean, it might be helpful in part in terms of navigating some emotions or getting clear about what the values are, as a stepping stone.

So in all kinds of ways—different self-sense, different world-sense, different emotional sense, sense of the emotions—in many cases these need to be brought in, need to be allowed and included to allow a more appropriate response. Do we need to expand our sense of self, our view of self, beyond what I call the immature individualism of our larger contemporary culture? Do we need an expanded worldview, given more dimension, given a different kind of ontology?

And these things are hard to shift. I don't know quite how they shift. It was interesting—I watched a video of an interview with Polly Higgins, who died recently. A very wonderful woman. She was a lawyer campaigning for many years. She was only forty-nine, I think, when she died. She was campaigning for many years to try and get ecocide—in other words, the destruction of ecosystems—recognised as a crime by the UN and by international law. That was her project as a lawyer. She was a really lovely woman, and she did tremendous work in that area. She died just a few months ago, in fact.

But I was watching this interview, and she was being interviewed by someone who was extremely sympathetic to what she was doing. What struck me was, as the interview went on—it wasn't that long—almost immediately the explanation of why it was important, why getting a law on ecocide was important, sort of slid. It slid from this idea that nature itself needs to be respected, that ecosystems are sacred and need to be respected and need to be given the same rights as we give humans legally, to a different rationalisation. The reasoning underpinning this attempt to get an ecocide law passed became that ecosystems support us—they support humanity, we rely on nature, we rely on the bees pollinating the plants and the flowers so that we can eat, we rely on the water to drink, all of that.

I'm pretty sure that wasn't the only reason, and maybe not even the main reason, why she was campaigning for it. But in the conversation—two sympathetic people who cared about this issue and wanted to support it—the dialogue slipped to a language that made human beings' practical needs for health and livelihood the most important ones. It struck me how it just slid like that, almost naturally.

But this whole movement that she was trying to support, to get a law passed by the UN against ecocide and to actually frame it as a crime that people understood—it raises interesting ontological questions. We can't get away from ontology and metaphysics with all this. And I don't think there's a way of talking about ethics deeply without talking about ontologies, but we'll come back to that.

So this idea about an ecocide law via the UN raises, to me, interesting ontological questions as much as ethical ones. Because if you think about it, such a law and the ideas underpinning it would be different than a law for animal rights, for example. Or choices like vegetarianism because of reasons of compassion for the suffering of individual animals—I don't want to eat meat because that involves that animal suffering when it's slaughtered or how it's kept.

But when we talk about something like ecocide, we're talking about an ecosystem. That's not an individual animal. It's not even a collection of animals. It's not this animal, it's not that tree—it's the system. In a way it has life, I suppose, and you could even talk about it in the way that a system of cells in the body can be alive, even while maybe individual cells are dead or dying. But a system is something different. Caring for an ecosystem, recognising rights for an ecosystem, and then implementing in law rights for an ecosystem because we've recognised morally those rights—this implies a kind of respect and reverence for the order and harmony and integrity of nature's functioning, its life process. And inevitably, such an idea rests on or draws in a kind of cosmology, anthropology, and again, metaphysics.

So grief at species loss, or plummeting numbers—many bird species, for example, or insect species are hugely reduced in numbers, although the species itself is not technically critically endangered yet. But the grief, the heart's response to that—is it a different grief resting on a different sensibility? It's a particular ethical care that is different, though not contradictory to, a care for the suffering or death of an individual animal.

That orca mother carrying around her dead calf for days or weeks in the oceans—it was in the news a little while ago. A lot of clicks on that piece of news, because there's the empathy with that individual orca mother and her calf, the suffering there. But grief at species loss seems to me a different kind of sensibility. Something slightly different is happening in the heart, in the soul, actually. And as I said, it calls forth or involves or demands a different kind of ontology and metaphysics, an expanded ontology and metaphysics for us to actually respect that. So all these issues are tied together. They're not actually that simple.

Now, some of this is already changing. I don't know if you knew this, but a corporation actually, in law—in most countries, or even in international law—has the same status for legal purposes as a person. So a multinational corporation, ExxonMobil or whatever, these large corporations, technically and legally have the same status as a person, the same legal rights as a person. That's been the case for many, many years.

A river, for example, does not have legal personhood for the most part. But this is starting to change – or rather, there are a few instances where it's starting to change. If you just think about what's going on there, it again raises the point I made at the beginning of this talk: what's the relationship between law and ethics? Originally there was supposed to be a very close, tightly-knit congruence there, but in many ways they seem to have drifted apart.

What are the ethics about the law that turns away refugee boats? I mean, it's a law. One can make a link with ethics, but it becomes increasingly tenuous. Or protecting corporate rights over their responsibility to take care of the environment – you can trace an ethical reason. You can rationalize that kind of law ethically, or that kind of limitation on law ethically. But the connection between law and ethics has, I think, become increasingly tenuous, increasingly divorced.

Some of this is starting to change. New Zealand, for instance – the Waikato River was given personhood legally, which is anyway how the indigenous Maori culture views it. They view it as a living being, as a person, because they sense it with soul. In some regards there are going to be differences, of course. And they say, "I am the river, and the river is me. How can the river look after me if I don't look after it?"

Also Mount Taranaki, in New Zealand, and the Whanganui River. Just recently, in the last couple of years. Mount Taranaki and the Whanganui River are both sacred to the indigenous peoples there. And actually earlier than that, in 2014, legal personhood was granted to the Te Urewera Forest and gave the local Maori tribes shared guardianship of that forest as part of their sensibility and their sense of duty and responsibility anyway.

In India, the Ganges and the Yamuna, partly legally stimulated by what happened in New Zealand, I think, because it's all Commonwealth and therefore bound by similar laws – there's some kind of legal structure that binds New Zealand and India as Commonwealth countries. The Ganges and the Yamuna were granted personhood status legally.

So there are the beginnings of changes here. And in Toledo, on Lake Erie, residents were petitioning to sue polluters on behalf of the lake and for that lake to be recognized with legal rights, as a person would be. I'm not sure if the argument in Toledo was again to do with the effects on humans and children's health from polluted lake water. So it's still really great and wonderful, but it's slightly different. Again, ontologically it's slightly different, or actually significantly different.

So there are the beginnings of change here, but really, what do we need? An expanded ontology, epistemology, metaphysics, cosmology, anthropology, self-sense – all of that. And again, not everyone is going to need this. It won't work for everyone. But for many people, that might be a really significant support, that kind of expansion.

Remember that Moscovici quote: questions of epistemology are also questions of social order. And therefore questions of ontology are also questions of social order. And it's increasingly and glaringly obvious now with the tragedies unfolding around us.

So how can we begin to sense and think and feel in different ways, in ways that do expand the ontology, the epistemology, the metaphysics, the cosmology, the anthropology, the sense of existence, the sense of human being, the sense of the life and the being of the earth and nature and the species? Again, I wouldn't say it's the solution. It's one possibility. Sensing the soul is one possibility, one kind of paradigm that can open up that kind of expansion and change. And then on top of that change and expansion in the ontology of all that comes a change in sensibility, and therefore a change in view and action and law and human choices. One possibility.

CHAPTER 190

Rob Burbea · 1h50

> In this third part of his exploration of ethics and soul-making, Rob Burbea delves into what he calls "ideational imaginal" practices - approaching moral values and virtues as having independent existence that can be contemplated and embodied. Drawing extensively from philosopher Nikolai Hartmann's work on ethics, Burbea examines how we perceive moral values through intuitive rather than rational means, and how these values may actually "make the person" rather than being created by individuals or cultures.
> The talk explores the relationship between Buddhist pāramīs (perfections) and classical virtues, noting important differences in their ultimate aims. While traditional Buddhist teachings direct all dharmas toward transcendence of saṃsāra, Burbea suggests that virtues can be valued for their own sake as expressions of human beauty and nobility. He discusses the tension between virtue ethics (doing what is right regardless of outcome) and consequentialist approaches focused on efficacy, using examples like Dietrich Bonhoeffer's resistance to Nazi ideology.
> Burbea proposes that ethical action involves "double intentionality" - care for others combined with care for one's own moral development and the cultivation of a beautiful life. This self-reflexive dimension of virtue parallels the structure of consciousness and eros. The talk emphasizes how devotion to virtue can constitute soul-making practice, contributing to our telos as fully realized human beings called toward lives of profound beauty and meaning.

I said that I would talk about two ways in which soul-making or imaginal practices can augment or expand our consideration of ethics. I briefly touched on how imaginal practice, in the ways that we've taught it so far, can come in and enrich, dimensionalize, give added range and also depth and strength and possibility to our ethical consideration, ethical action, and ethical stance in life.

I mentioned a second possibility in addition to the standard imaginal practice. I mentioned what I think I called the ideational imaginal, or the ideological imaginal, or imaginal ideas. So I'd like to talk a little bit about that, introduce it as a possibility, and there's probably much more that can be explored here.

I've touched on it in the past. I don't think I've used those words before, ideational imaginal. I think I've just mentioned it very briefly over the last few years. For instance, in the possibility of meditating or finding an opening in meditation from some sensible perception, for example, of beauty, or some inner image of something beautiful. I think I gave the example of some beautiful music that was playing in my mind, and sort of traveling from that to a more, if you like, pure essence of beauty in itself that is not so coupled with, hinged on, or related to an instance of beauty—this or that beautiful thing, music or object or whatever it is.

I think I've just mentioned it a couple of times. We haven't really amplified it and I don't remember if anyone's really picked up on it that much, but I want to talk about it a bit now. I want to talk about it in the context of discussing ethics, and particularly in the context of introducing the ideas of moral values and virtues. This is to do with a kind of ethics—sometimes people call it virtue ethics—a kind of approach to ethics that is one possible way of considering sīla, one possible way of considering ethics and how we weigh up what's important, what we prioritize, in our approach.

So, introducing the ideational imaginal in the context of introducing the ideas of moral values and virtues. There's ideational imaginal that doesn't so obviously overlap with this area of ethics, and of course there are ethical considerations that don't necessarily overlap with ideational imaginal. Some—in fact quite a lot—of where I draw my inspiration from in this regard is from the philosopher Nikolai Hartmann, who has a massive tome called Ethics that really touched me when I read it, in the way he opens this out and how he talks about it. I feel there's a lot of relevance to the soul there, and therefore to soul-making.

As we go through some of this material, I want to sometimes draw connections to Buddhadharma, and also to soul-making dharma, and also to draw out some of the implications in thinking of things these ways and approaching them these ways.

I might start with a more general introduction—just the idea of these ideas and the sort of theory of it a little bit. I really hope that you'll immediately see, even though I'm talking in generalities at first, that it won't feel abstract to you, that you can sense immediately in your heart and soul how these things matter to our lives, matter for society, and matter to the soul.

Values and virtues—let's start there. This word value, particularly with regard to moral values, is a word that in English has replaced what used to be the more common word of the good. Bonum in Latin. So we have this word goods. Goods—you're shipping goods here or there, you're paying for the goods, you're selling goods or whatever. So it's related. What's goods and good is a value. Something valuable.

Just for example, health is something valuable. Food, nutrition is something valuable, and property is something valuable. Happiness, consciousness, life—these are all kinds of values, in one sense. When we talk about values, and obviously there are many, many more, most values are valuable because they enable something else that is, if you like, more ultimately valuable. So for example, health is valuable in that it allows one to have the energy to live and to do and to experience this or that, or to do and experience more widely. So health in itself is valuable because it allows us to live and to do and experience.

We could also not stop there. Why is living or doing or experiencing—is it in itself valuable, or is it that doing is valuable and experiencing and doing are sometimes valuable if they're enabling something else, if they serve something else? So one question—we may come back to this, we will come back to this—is what are more ultimate values, if you like?

Just to point out that most values are valuable because they enable something else which is more ultimately valuable.

When we talk about specifically moral values, we mean something morally good, something morally valuable. So justice, for example, is a moral value. Honesty, courage, trustworthiness. We're talking about here in the larger things—institutions, actions, organizations, things in themselves, as well as inner attitude, dispositions, etc. Actually, we'll come back to that in a second.

When we speak of moral values, they pertain specifically to human beings—to our acts, personalities, and dispositions. Morality has to do with humanity. We judge human beings, human institutions, human actions, and human personalities in terms of their moral value, but not objects in themselves. A lamp or a carpet, for instance, possesses no inherent moral dimension.

When moral values become embodied as dispositions of a person—the dominant tendencies that constitute one's character—we use the word virtue. Remember, ethos means character: the essential set of dispositions that define a person. Virtue refers to this constellation of moral qualities that shape our being and guide our actions.

Let me offer two important observations about the nature of moral values. First, moral values often depend on non-moral values in significant ways. Consider the precept not to steal, or its positive expression, the practice of generosity. These moral values depend upon and assume the worth of what might be stolen or given. The moral dimension only has meaning if there exists something of genuine value to be shared or protected. Similarly, the moral imperative not to harm another person assumes the inherent value of well-being, the value of health that enables other valuable activities, or simply that health itself possesses worth.

Second, and this you've likely encountered in Buddhist teachings on sila, the moral value of an action depends fundamentally on intention, just as virtue depends on disposition—not merely on results. The classic example illuminates this clearly: imagine two people who cut into another's flesh with knives, and in both cases, the person dies. One commits murder, perhaps motivated by theft. The other is a surgeon attempting to save a life, but the operation fails tragically. Identical outcome—death by knife—yet morally they couldn't be more different because the intentions were entirely different.

This principle reveals how moral values depend on intention, and virtues depend on disposition, not simply on outcomes. Yet even this raises fascinating complications. Practical wisdom itself—the keen discernment to anticipate the likely results of our actions—is itself a virtue. So while results aren't everything, attention to consequences isn't entirely irrelevant either.

When we speak of virtues as integral parts of one's ethos—those dominant tendencies that shape character—we can identify qualities like empathy, sensitivity, faith, loyalty, and what Hartmann calls different kinds of love: love of one's neighbor, love of the remote person far away in space and time. We might include self-control, courage, humility, wisdom, strength, nobility, gentleness, trustworthiness, generosity, and the capacity for self-sacrifice. The list could extend much further.

Naming, listing, and mapping these virtues proves to be an extraordinarily complex undertaking. Perhaps we'll return to explore that challenge more fully. But even from this limited selection I've mentioned, can you sense the profound effect that would follow from the higher development of these qualities? Can you feel the ethos that would emerge from dedicating oneself to cultivating empathy, sensitivity, the various forms of love, faith, loyalty, courage, generosity, the capacity for self-sacrifice, wisdom, strength, and nobility?

Consider this question: What arises for you when you hear the phrase "a beautiful life"? What range of phenomena would you consider meaningfully worthy of the term "beautiful"? We've explored beauty in other retreats and talks, but does it include the virtues? I used to speak of "beautiful qualities of heart."

Can you sense right now that a life lived with keen sensitivity to moral values—devoted to cultivating and expressing virtue, committed to these qualities, standing by them, making them a genuine priority—might be as beautiful, or perhaps even more beautiful, than other ways we typically consider a life beautiful?

What does it mean to live a beautiful life? And are we called as human beings to the possibility of a beautiful life, of sculpting, of crafting, of making an art of our life into something beautiful? If so, what is the place of virtues—as we're talking about them now—and this sensitivity to moral value? Does the development of all that, the prioritizing of all that, the commitment to all that, have its place in creating beauty in our lives?

Can you get that sense? Or does something else arise for you?

This is complicated territory, and this whole conversation on ethics I realize is very touchy, very sensitive, and one has to be quite careful in wording. I was almost a bit reluctant to even start talking about ethics, as it can be loaded in all kinds of ways.

So what arises for you when we think about the meaning of what is a good life? What does it mean to lead a good life? "I'm living a good life"—what does that mean if we go deeper into the levels of possible meaning, into what that might actually look like and be? What does it mean to live and lead a beautiful life? What might it mean, and what arises for you just when you hear those words or when I put them in connection with this concept of moral values and virtues?

Now some of you who are familiar with your Buddhist lists will immediately perhaps think, "Ah, the ten paramitas," or sometimes what's called the ten perfections. In Theravada Buddhism, sometimes Mahayana Buddhism lists six, and Theravada Buddhism lists ten. Are those paramitas or paramis not virtues? Are we talking about the same thing here?

Yes, there's definite overlap. The ten Theravada Buddhist paramis are generosity, sila itself—ethical care—renunciation, wisdom or better insight, energy (sometimes translated as courage), patience, truthfulness, determination, metta (loving-kindness), and equanimity. In the Mahayana, they are generosity, sila, patience, energy, samadhi—meaning meditative depth and range and skill—and wisdom or better insight.

So there's a definite connection, parallel, overlap here. But there are also some important differences, at least in the way that I would like to open out the subject of virtues and values, and that territory of those lists of paramitas in Buddha Dharma.

Firstly, there are many more than ten. If we open out the consideration of virtues and values, there are more than ten—certainly more than six, more than ten. As I said, listing them, or even identifying all of them, and how you break up the list becomes quite a project, but certainly more than ten.

Second, and also very significant, is that the word parami, paramita, can be translated in two ways, and they're related. One, I think the most common, is perfection. So prajna paramita—the perfection of wisdom—is a translation. Paramita means perfection. It also can mean transcendent or transcending, which I'll come back to.

But if we just stay with this translation, this meaning of paramita as perfection—the Buddha's teaching is that there are ten perfections, ten qualities you can perfect. But the word perfection implies that something, one can reach the end of a certain development. One can complete a process. That possibility is there to reach—"Right, I've completely achieved final excellence with patience or renunciation or whatever it is, truthfulness."

One of the important points I would like to make about the virtues is that they don't have an end. They're infinitely developable. They contain and unfold their own beyonds, their own infinite reaches of depth and flourishing and range. So there's a difference there.

Related to that is a third difference. The Buddha, somewhere in the Pali Canon—I don't know exactly where—says that all Dhammas converge in the deathless. All Dhammas converge in the deathless. Now Dhamma is one of those words that has at least two or three meanings in Buddhist teachings. But one of its meanings is teachings itself. So a dhamma is a teaching—a teaching on generosity, a teaching on the paramitas, a teaching on renunciation, a teaching on equanimity or whatever. It can also mean mental quality.

So again, the quality of patience, the quality of generosity—a kind of disposition, if you like. And so this phrase of the Buddha's, "all dhammas converge in the deathless," could mean that all the paramis and other qualities the Buddha referred to actually serve merely to help you transcend—to help you transcend the realm of fabrication, the realm of the formation of appearances, the realm of perception and experiences, the realm of birth and death of life itself—and transcend that to reach the unfabricated and to end rebirth.

So all dhammas converge in the deathless. They all point towards and lead to their fruition in this transcending and escaping from the realm of form and appearance and experience and perception. That would be one meaning of this "all dhammas converge in the deathless."

In other words, as I've said before, the whole thrust—as I read it—the whole traditional thrust of Pali Canon Buddhism is to get off the wheel of rebirth, of life and death, of birth and death, and to dissolve into, disappear into the unfabricated, beyond all appearance, beyond all experience. And so everything else in the Buddha's teachings, in the Dhamma of the Buddha, serves that end and supports that end and works together. All these factors—the wings of awakening, the paramitas and all that—they serve to support each other in a synergistic way that propels the being and aids their release. To use the Buddha's word: release and escape from samsara, from the wheel of rebirth, into not being reborn again, the end of the rebirth of experience, into the unfabricated.

But that phrase of the Buddha's, "all dhammas converge in the deathless," could actually have another meaning. The deathless there could mean the dharmakaya. So all dhammas converge in the dharmakaya.

Now dharmakaya is a word with a very interesting history in Buddha Dharma. One of its original meanings was really—kaya means a body, like in a way, like a body of water. So a collection of dharmas, dharmakaya. Collection of dharmas means collection of qualities. Now dharmakaya is an aspect of Buddhahood, it's an aspect of Buddha nature. In the first teachings about, or expression of, what actually is a Buddha, what is Buddha nature, dharmakaya meant the collection of the Buddha's qualities—the collection of a Buddha's qualities, the mental qualities, including their virtues, the dispositions of a Buddha.

So "all dhammas converge in the deathless" could mean all dhammas lead to, all paramitas and all teachings and trainings lead to this collection of qualities that adhere in the Buddha mind, in the Buddha being, if you like, in the Buddha nature. But that actually is a more Mahayana idea.

So it's probable that when the Buddha said "all dhammas converge in the deathless," he meant this: they serve to support that traveling towards transcendence, towards release, escape, removal from the realm of fabrication, the realm of appearances, experiences, phenomena, and rebirth, and ending there.

So again, virtues as such, paramitas as such, in that teaching, take a secondary role. They are for the purpose of serving release. And this is one way of saying: What are they for? What's their worth? What's the worth of moral virtues?

But as Nikolai Hartmann points out—I'll read you a little quote from him—in the way he would read it, because it's not at all a life-transcending philosophy that he espouses. In some ways he's very not religious, in other ways I think he is religious without realizing it. "What is morally good is good in itself." It's not for the purpose of something, and certainly not for the purpose of removing oneself from the realm of appearances and experiences, perception and phenomena.

What I want to read to you is this from Nikolai Hartmann: "The useful is never the good in the ethical sense. We say that a thing is good for something, but that is not the moral meaning of the good. The moral meaning of the good reveals itself only when one inquires after that for which anything is good. If one traces the 'for which' back to what is no longer good for anything else but is good in itself, one has reached the good in the other sense, which contains its ethical meaning. The morally good is the good in itself. Therefore, not to be good for something else is of its very essence. According to its nature, it is never the useful."

I might qualify that a little bit and actually say the morally good is useful. It's useful for other people. Sometimes it's useful for ourselves. If I'm kind, maybe people are going to be kind back, or there's more chance that they'll be kind back. If I'm kind, my kindness is often useful to them. And if I'm generous, my generosity is often useful to them, and if I'm generous, maybe some people will be generous back, reciprocally or out of appreciation or whatever it is.

But I would qualify a little bit what he's saying, and say that in its deeper essence—well, there's a dimension, there's a level in which the morally good is not just useful for ourselves or for others. It's not good for something.

It's not useful. It's just good in itself.

And this, in a way, relates very much to what it means to live a beautiful life, to lead a beautiful life. It's something that's good in itself. It has no other purpose than because it's beautiful, because it's good, because it touches the soul in that way.

If we stay with Hartmann a little bit, he has a particular kind of ontology that he developed in his philosophy, which I find quite interesting and very thought-provoking. One question concerns the ontology of moral values. Do they have independent, inherent existence? Or are they, in a way, created by humanity or by a person or by a culture at a certain time? Are they dependent, contingent in that respect?

Now, he was writing mostly in the first half of the 20th century, and that book on ethics, I think, is from the 1920s. But already by that time, there was the awareness in philosophy, in moral philosophy, that ethics—what's considered valuable morally and the whole notion of ethics and what's ethical and what isn't—varies when we look at the history of different cultures and places. What is regarded as morally valuable varies with time, with place, with culture, with person. So it's quite individual as well.

But he makes the point that, yes, agreed, that's obvious, that's a fact historically, but that need not imply that they don't have independent existence, that moral values don't have independent existence. Because he says that what happens in the realm of moral values is that we tend to have movable fashions and a kind of partial blindness that goes with those fashions.

So this is akin to when we talked in this series on ontology and epistemology about ideas, for example, of the disco ball—those things that radiate light from different sides. You can't actually see it all at once, and you can't get the light reflecting from it all at once to your eyes. You have to look at it from a certain vantage point, from a certain angle, so you're only seeing part of it. Or when we talked about the different ways of creating maps—the cartographic and the polar—two different ways of creating maps that give different pictures in two dimensions of a really existing three-dimensional globe, so that the truth of things is somehow hard to grasp all at once. But when we look at it, we look at it partially or with a partial blindness.

So Hartmann talks about what he calls a value firmament—a value constellations in the sky of values. But he says we, at any time, are looking at it as if with a small beam of light, like with a torch. So our torch light can only illuminate certain areas of that value firmament, certain values. And when we do that, others slip from our consciousness. We don't notice them, or we relegate them, or we just don't consider them—we're oblivious to them.

So this is quite an interesting ontology and relates to some of what we said before. He does say values are still subjective in one sense, in that they are values only for human beings. But he says even that doesn't take away from their independent existence, because he points out that geometrical laws, for example, the laws of geometry, or mechanical laws—the laws of objects in motion, like footballs and cannonballs and rockets—or physiological laws, the laws that living organisms are curtailed by and abide by, these only apply for limited categories of beings.

So geometrical laws are for spatial figures: triangles and squares and lines and points and polygons. Mechanical laws are for solid bodies. Physiological laws are for organisms. So it's subjective in that sense. And moral laws, moral values are only for humans. So it's subjective in that sense, that they're for humans. A moral law doesn't apply to a triangle, for example. So it's limited and subjective in that sense—it's for humans. But that doesn't imply, in his thinking, that they are therefore created or they can be done away with. They're just relative to certain kinds of being. All those four kinds of laws that I enumerated are each of them relative to a different kind of being. And he says that they are actually unconditional.

How do we know and perceive values? How do we get our sense of values? For him, it's not a cognitive process. It's not something we think about rationally and ponder and deduce from logic. Immanuel Kant is often labeled as someone who has that kind of idea of morality and the approach to morality, wanting to find a rational solution. But whether that's actually true of Immanuel Kant completely, I don't think so, based on the little that I know. I think it would be an oversimplification.

But Hartmann's point is that we have an intuitive sense and an emotional sense of moral value. It touches something, he would say, in the heart or the intuition. I would also say in the soul as well. And that's how we perceive values and we know values.

He also says—and again, this may be an unfashionable point these days, because of some of what I laid out in the earlier talks on ethics—

But he also says—and again, this may be an unfashionable point these days because of the reasons I laid out in the earlier talks on ethics—that not all persons have an equal capacity to perceive moral values, to know and sense moral values. There are differences there. There are differences in what has been developed. This person has developed that sense, that intuition, that feeling to perceive and know moral values more than this other person. Or this person has been educated in some way, helped, trained to become more sensitive to perceive and know moral values. And there might be just innate differences—aptitudes where this person was simply born with a kind of soul that was sensitive in the realm of moral values or sensitive to certain values. So there are differences there, and that has to be acknowledged. Again, that might be somehow a taboo thing to say, but he says actually it's just like insight into mathematics or the truths of mathematics or mathematical laws.

They are true. They are independent of whether two people, A and B, can both grasp that mathematical law. Perhaps person A has a particular aptitude with mathematics. Perhaps they have particular training with mathematics. And they can read some mathematical equation or formula or postulate or truth, and actually grasp it, understand it, know it, sense it, sense its validity. And person B just doesn't have that mathematical sensibility in their mind, in their soul, or they haven't been educated in that way. So he says it's just like that. It's the same with moral values.

And he says something further that—and this, again, is very interesting, I think, in terms of how I want to link all this up to soul and soul-making. So as you're listening to this, there's partly all its implications for how we consider—implications for our consideration, our approach to ethics—and then there's also our consideration of how it impacts and what it implies for our consideration of souls and soul-making and all that.

A further thing he says is that values make the person. The person doesn't make the value. So again, this is still in the area of talking about their ontological status. Do they have independent existence or are they merely created by the person or by a culture? He says values make the person, not vice versa. And he gives as evidence for that the fact that when we feel guilt, we're actually feeling or sensing our own failure to live up to our values, to live up to our ideal self, if you like. And to him, this implies the a priori nature of values. In other words, they come first. Values make the person.

So a person has these values that exist in the value firmament. These ones are important to them. They have this kind of sensitivity to these values, less so to these values. And that sensitivity, derived from or in relationship to the values, makes the person, shapes the personality, as opposed to the person shaping and creating the values.

So I think that's a very interesting thought. To me, it's a little bit one-sided as an explanation, as a postulate. I'm not entirely convinced by that. And in fact, there's quite a lot in Hartmann that I'm not entirely convinced by, but I still find it very touching and very beautiful and very thought-provoking as a philosopher.

There might be more of a consideration of dependent origination and the various factors that contribute to make the person and contribute to make the values to which they are sensitive. So yes, we could say the person makes the values, absolutely, and the culture makes the values, and the culture makes the person who makes the values, in indirect and direct ways, and reactive ways, and proactive ways, and consonant ways, and dissonant ways—in opposition, in congruence, etc. But we can also say that the values make the person, along with Hartmann.

Or at least we can say, again, if we take one of the principles of soul-making, that we don't have to decide on an ultimate truth here, but we can entertain the idea, entertain the logos, put it in the soul for a while and see what it does if we entertain the idea that values make the person. The values kind of exist in some independent way, at some level where we can't completely grasp all that there is to know about them—their whole range, how they relate to each other, their hierarchy. We can't grasp all that. We get a one-sided, movable sense of them. But we can entertain the idea for a while, not as an ultimate truth, but entertain the idea that they do exist in that way. Not as a final position, but we entertain that. We play with that idea in a way that becomes powerful for the soul.

And I think that idea that values make the person, rather than the other way around—if we lean that way for a while—there could be a lot of soul-making coming out of that. I don't know if you can sense that as I'm mentioning it right now. And it also has many implications for our ethical life, and again how we approach, how we consider ethics, what we deem as important when we approach ethical situations, and the very lens through which we see all that.

But as I said, he was writing in the early twentieth century, and with the rise of modernism and certainly into so-called postmodernism, there was perhaps, I think, generally speaking, a kind of waning of interest in values and moral values as a way of understanding ethics. And especially with postmodernism in the sense of, well, how can you claim that they have independent, objective existence because nothing does?

Everything's culturally conditioned. And alongside this came a corollary waning and lack of interest and lack of esteem for the notion of virtues and that kind of understanding of humanity and approach to ethics.

For myself, I place these ideas about values and virtues into the realm of what I might call religious sensibility, in the larger sense. And so, because that too wanes very much with modernism and post-modernism, part of what occurs is a disennobling—a removal and depletion of the potential for what can serve to nurture and be part of a sense of nobility in human beings. This also is one of the losses of modernism and postmodernism: that whole conception becomes too close to the noble and the religious, and so it goes out of fashion.

I want to read you something from Alasdair MacIntyre in this regard. He's commenting on this development through modernity. He writes in After Virtue: "Without allusion to the place that justice and injustice, courage and cowardice play in human life, very little will be genuinely explicable. It follows that many of the explanatory projects of the modern social sciences—a methodological canon of which is the separation of 'the facts' from all evaluation—are bound to fail."

In other words, this idea that I can separate the facts out from any value, any evaluative statements or lenses I bring to bear on those facts—this is an idea you'll recognize from when we talked about the history of science and classical science. It's an axiomatic principle of the classical scientific method, or even the modern scientific method: one tries to remove any kind of evaluation or evaluative tendency that might distort or subjectivise the so-called objective facts.

With modernity comes the rise of this classical scientific method, and this spreads to domains other than the core sciences of physics, chemistry, and biology—into the modern social sciences. People try to apply that same kind of pared down, austere, supposedly objective scientific method to social sciences like sociology and psychology. But MacIntyre is saying that actually, if you take out notions of justice and injustice, courage and cowardice—in other words, values and virtues—it becomes very difficult to explain anything with just these so-called facts.

He writes: "For the fact that someone was or failed to be courageous or just cannot be recognised as a fact by those who accept that methodological canon based on classical science and its belief in the possibility of total objectivity." Do you understand? So that whole waning of interest and the progressive unesteeming—not completely, but for the most part—of that entire realm of values, moral values and virtues, actually accompanies modernity to a certain extent. Because it's intrinsically evaluative, and that's what we're trying to get rid of.

If we return to this question of how do we perceive values—and again, it's still related to perceiving moral values and still relating to their ontological status—in the English translation of Nikolai Hartman's book, there's a very good introduction by Andreas Kinneging. He writes something worth considering: "It is impossible to observe values empirically." In other words, you can't see a value itself. Only acts, things and events are perceived empirically, perceived with the senses. You can't see a value itself. You can't sense it directly.

"To know the value of what is observed empirically is possible only if one has already comprehended the relevant value in abstracto, in the abstract, and can use that knowledge as a standard to assess what has been realized. Knowledge of values is a priori knowledge"—like knowledge of mathematical and logical beings. In other words, we just have an intuitive knowledge of values. We have a kind of abstract knowledge, an inherent sense of what's good, what's kind.

It's not that we see certain acts—a hundred acts—and then deduce from those different acts some conclusion about generosity. We don't make an inductive conclusion about what constitutes generosity or kindness or courage based on empirical observations of a hundred acts of different people in different situations. Rather, we have an a priori knowledge, an intuitive, instinctive, inbuilt knowledge that corresponds, in the subjective domain, to their objective, independent existence. And it's with this that we measure an empirically observed act—we measure its correspondence with our intuitive sense, whether it tallies, whether it's congruent, whether it chimes with and fits our intuitive a priori sense of this or that value.

And again, to repeat what he said before: not everyone has the same capacity to sense values, and not everyone's capacity is equally well developed. Hartman writes: "There are such things as education and lack of education of the sense of values, talent and lack of talent for the discernment of them. It is here just as it is with mathematical insights. Not everyone is capable of it. Not everyone has the eye, the ethical maturity, the spiritual level for seeing the situation as it is."

Nevertheless, he continues, "the universality, necessity and objectivity of the valuational judgment hold good in abstracto. For this universality does not at all mean that everyone is capable of the valuational insight in question. It only means that whoever is capable of it—that is, whoever spiritually gets hold of its meaning—must necessarily feel and judge thus, and not otherwise."

And just read a little more of this, because he writes—this is Hartman now—he says value blindness is quite a common phenomenon. So a sense of, or rather, a condition of just being insensitive to certain values. In extreme cases, it brings about a complete loss of meaning of life in the world. "He who stolidly passes by men and their fates, he whom the staggering does not stagger, nor the exalted exalt, for him life is in vain, he has no part of it. The world must be meaningless and life senseless to one who has no capacity to perceive the sense of life's relationships, the inexhaustible significance of persons and situations, or correlations and events. The outward emptiness and monotony of his life are the reflex of his inner emptiness and his moral blindness."

The real world in which he exists, the stream of human life which bears him up and carries him along, is not without manifold wealth of content. His poverty amidst abundance is due to his own failure to appreciate life. Hence, for the moral nature of man there is, besides the narrow actuality of action and ought-to-do—so we ought to act in line with certain virtues or moral values—for the moral nature of man, there is a second requirement: to participate in the fullness of life, to be receptive to the significant, to lie open to whatever has meaning and value.

I find that a beautiful passage, and a very important passage. One of the points there is that it's possible to be value-blind. Again, I want to come back to that later. But the sense of seeing values, of perceiving them, of intuiting them, is what he calls, in philosophical terms, a priori. It's an a priori judgment.

One more thing from Hartman, while we're there, if I can find it... So when he considers... He says there's something very interesting about the human capacity for moral action, for moral sensibility, to sense moral values and to bring them to bear and express them in one's life and to choose that way. He's adopting a certain framework of the world, where man—excuse me, let's say human being—in comparison with the whole of the cosmos, is a speck of dust, an ephemeral, a negligible phenomenon.

There's a certain cosmological context in which humanity, in the scope of things of the vast reaches of the universe and the vast spans of time, is really just an insignificant little speck. So the interesting thing about—well, one of the interesting things about ethics and humanity is—again, excuse the gender-biased language, he's writing back then—"Man, a vanishing quantity in the universe, is still in his own way stronger than it. He is the vehicle of a higher principle. He is the creator of a reality which possesses significance and value. He transmits to the real world a higher worth. Nature is bound down to its own laws. Man alone, humanity alone, carries in himself a higher law, whereby he, or more correctly, the law through him, creates in the world, or from non-being, from non-existence, brings forth into being, into existence, that which was prefigured in its ideality"—in other words, these ideals of moral values and virtues.

Despite being insignificant in the context of one's actual existence in the vast spans of space and time in the universe, human beings can do this thing where they can axiologically—in other words ethically, in terms of values—they can do something that's extremely significant. "We may name this rehabilitation of man the miracle of the ethical phenomenon. It is the sublime in him, that which verily lifts him up above his own mere existence in the world."

Yes, physically and in terms of the transience of our existence, we're ephemeral and insignificant and small in the context of the large universe. But there's something amazing that we can do: bring forth from this kind of ideal realm of values, something from non-existence into existence, which, other than through us, cannot come into existence.

I don't know how all this lands, or how it really lands in your soul. I don't mean just whether you kind of agree or not agree—and there are many complications, some of which we'll pick up on and go into later. But I really mean in the soul, in the heart, how does all this land?

I've been talking quite generally now. But as I asked before, can you get a sense—perhaps, I don't know if you share this sense—that devotion to cultivating virtues, to expressing them in one's life, to standing in them and standing by them and standing up for them, a commitment to them, a prioritizing of them, constitute and form and be an essential part, perhaps the essential part, in what we might call a beautiful life?

And as such might be something for which we could say in soul-making Dharma terms, there is a telos—there is a calling to that. Yes, each in our individual particular ways, we create, discover what it is for me or you as a unique individual, our own, with our own soul if you like, what kind of beautiful life there is, what's the flavor of that beautiful life. But can you get—I don't know if you share that sense—of the beauty of this, the nobility of it, the calling of it, the possible logos that might regard that as a telos? This is what we're called towards. We're called towards a beautiful life, living a beautiful life, creating a beautiful life. And the place of virtue in that is central.

If we look into the etymology of that word virtue, I think it's quite interesting. The word itself is virtue, from the Latin virtus, which means manliness. But let's play with that a little bit. I should say humanity—i.e., being fully human in non-gender biased language. So to care for the virtues is to become fully human. The more we care for the virtues, the more fully human we become.

And if I don't, am I actually a human being? I might have DNA and I might have that form and two ears and a nose and eyes and a liver and a spleen and whatever. Am I human just because, you know? So it's related to that word, to being fully human.

Again, we could regard virtue more teleologically if that's helpful—as a movement, something we're called towards. We're called towards our full humanity, and the virtues are perhaps an integral part of that calling.

This relationship to humanity is also connected to the word courage. The Pali term virya, which can be translated as energy, can also be translated as courage, and it too has a relationship with the Latin vir, meaning man. So virtue is related to courage, to being fully human.

Virtuous also means efficacious and potent—that's a rather archaic meaning. And virtual comes from the Latin virtualis, which means effective. This too derives from vir, with its root meaning of man. So when we consider virtue, there's something about our efficacy, our potency—how efficacious our being and action and speech and ethos in the world are. This forms part of what it means to have virtue.

We also have the English word virtuoso, which also comes from the Latin root vir. To me, virtuoso captures the whole sense of virtue when we consider and open up the soul meaning, the soul sense of this area of virtues. Virtuoso implies something important: there's skill and art here. This whole consideration of virtue, of living a virtuous life, of living a beautiful life, of the sensibility and commitment to moral values—there's something of skill and art in that.

In fact, virtue (sometimes spelled with an "i," sometimes with an "r") also means a taste or love for works of fine art, connoisseurship, and the quality of being rare or beautiful. Can you sense how these different etymological components actually feed in organically to fill out a richness and multi-dimensionality, even multi-directionality, of what we mean? All these words are etymologically tied together.

But I don't want to stop there. There's a researcher named Paul Kugler who wrote a short book called The Alchemy of Discourse about twenty years ago. In that book, he explores a piece of research that Jung did early in his career. It's related to archetypes, but it concerns phonetic similarities, phonetic relationships between words that are different from etymological relationships.

Etymology means you can actually trace different words—like virtue and virtuous and virtuoso and virtual—back to a common root and see how meaning develops from that common root through history over time. But Paul Kugler, following Jung's early research (which Jung never really returned to, and as far as I know, no one else has really explored and developed—though I think there's tremendous potential here), suggests that words are connected not just etymologically, but phonetically. In other words, through relationships of similar sound.

Jung's original research is quite interesting. He gives examples of words that are not etymologically related—carnation (the flower), carnal, and carnage, for instance. What Kugler suggests is that, in Jungian terms, the unconscious puts those words together, associates them together. They touch the soul in similar ways, or hearing one word actually ignites for the soul a kind of intuitive, perhaps dim association or sense of those other words through sound. It's not related through etymology, through meaning, but through sound. The words have very different meanings, but there's a relationship through sound that stimulates in the unconscious a kind of archetypal complex through which all those words are related.

He gives another fascinating example with Latin words: liberalitas (generosity), liberatio (from which we get liberation, meaning setting free or deliverance), liberi (children), libet (it is pleasing, or I desire), libido (lustfulness or desire), libation (to pour or make an offering), Libitina (a burial goddess), and library (a case for books). Through their sound commonality, these words—many of which don't seem to have anything to do with each other—point to a common archetypal complex also related to Dionysus: libido and desire and freedom, libation and drinking (since Dionysus is Bacchus, the god of wine), and his relationship with death (Libitina). Curiously, even books fit this pattern—we actually get our word "book" from the word Bacchus.

These words are phonetically related, connected through the deeper currents of sound and meaning that flow through the unconscious.

So these words are phonologically related and they speak to the soul that way - they trigger each other, they're related to each other, they're constellated together, they're ignited together for the soul. I'm partly mentioning that because it seems to me no one else has really picked up on that line of research - just a short book by Kugler. Maybe someone hearing this at some point will like to pursue, in a small way or a larger way, that kind of line of inquiry and exploration in terms of soul-making.

That's why I explained all that. But if we go back to this word virtue, and we talked about the etymology, what about phonetic virtue? Or perhaps archetypally tied to the word virtue - maybe the word vertical. It's a different root, or vertex. They're both from the Latin vertex, which means to turn around, like around a point or a place where planes or lines meet. Or in astronomy, it's a point in the sky towards which a star stream appears to move - the vertex - and vertical, and upright.

And so being upright is the name of Rev Anderson's book, I think, on ethics. And so uprightness and virtue and all that. There's rich, rich meanings and phonetic relationships in that word virtue. Really what I'm after here is the soul - filling out for the soul, amplifying for the soul the range, the meaning, the dimensionality of those words, of that word virtue, both through etymology and through this phonetic correspondence or association for the soul.

And it's interesting - again, something from Alasdair MacIntyre here - when we consider what we actually think virtues are in terms of our anthropology, what's our take on human nature. He makes a very interesting point regarding if we consider human beings as innately kind of selfish beings, then that places the whole idea of virtues, the whole teaching of virtues, in a certain light relative to that selfishness. If we think human beings are naturally, or deep down they are good, their true nature is good, then that casts a different light on what the virtues are.

Leading up to it, he talks about a specific Aristotelian understanding of virtue. But let's leave that for now and just take it from where he leaves that off. He writes, "...one distinctively new way open to understand the virtues once they have been severed from their traditional context in thought and practice is as dispositions related in either of two alternative ways to the psychology of that newly invented social institution, the individual."

Basically he's saying: look, in classical times, in the time of Aristotle, there was a very different understanding of things. The social context, the structure of society was very different, and the whole notion of virtue was bound up with that, in many ways, simpler society. And the idea of the individual was also very different - although the self-sense, as I've pointed out, was very different. This is now - that whole traditional context is gone, and we've got this new prominence of this new notion, a new sense of ourselves as individuals, as selves, in this kind of modern sense that we feel intuitively. It's not just an idea.

So he writes: either the virtues, or some of them, could be understood as expressions of the natural passions of the individual, or they, or some of them, could be understood as dispositions necessary to curb and to limit the destructive effect of some of those natural passions. And then he continues, "It was in the 17th and 18th centuries that morality came generally to be understood as offering a solution to the problems posed by human egoism, and the content of morality came to be largely equated with altruism."

So you don't find that in Aristotle, for example - this idea of morality and altruism somehow being almost synonymous. You've got this idea that human beings are - there's this dangerous human ego, that idea rises to the fore, and with it this idea of morality and altruism. He continues, "For it was in that same period that men came to be thought of as in some dangerous measure egoistic by nature."

I wonder if that's true in the East. I've no idea. But it's interesting - if you read Śāntideva, who wrote in the 8th century in his Bodhicaryāvatāra, the Bodhisattva way of life, or however you want to translate it, it's there a little bit, this kind of intense suspicion of the human tendency of the self-sense in the human being, and of egotism and selfishness, therefore. You don't find it, as far as I know - I don't really find it in the Pali Canon. The Buddha doesn't really talk about self, but not really in this kind of way we've come almost to associate this danger of egotism and selfishness there. And nor, as far as I'm aware, do you read it in Nāgārjuna, who was writing in, let's say, the second century of the Common Era.

So I don't know if it's true in the East, but Alasdair MacIntyre is saying that about the West in the 17th and 18th centuries. And he writes, "And it is only once we think of mankind as by nature dangerously egoistic that altruism becomes at once socially necessary and yet apparently impossible, and if and when it occurs, inexplicable."

So the whole question of what are the virtues: are they natural things that are, if you like, our true nature, that just need to be supported and encouraged and nourished and expressed? Or are they rather qualities and elements of being that we can train and cultivate that actually, as he says, curb and limit our more natural passions, dispositions, which are more selfish and egoistical?

That distinction, or those two possibilities, mirror distinctions I think you can sometimes hear in, or read in Theravadan Dharma, where, for instance, in the Pali Canon, the Buddha often talks about three kilesas as being kind of natural to human beings: greed, aversion, and delusion. And much less does he talk about Buddha nature and your intrinsic goodness and that kind of thing, which we hear in the Mahāyāna and even more so in fact in a sort of modern Western spin on Mahāyāna teachings about Buddha nature. And this is very contemporary.

Again, is it a response, a reaction to the pain, the affliction of self-criticism, inner critic, etc., that we need to kind of promulgate and promote teachings that teach us about our inner goodness, our natural, deep-down inner goodness, versus teachings on original sin, or that basically you're just a fountain of three kilesas, and that's kind of your basic nature, which needs to be trained out of?

That's kind of interesting as to the nature of the virtues and how that relates to our anthropology - basically, our framing and view of what a human being is.

Either way, though, we could see them either way. We could see what the virtues are in relation to human nature in either of those ways. And either way can be supportive of our sīla and our ethical consideration, and can also be soul-making. So from a soul-making Dharma perspective, it actually doesn't matter too much. There'll probably be more of a leaning in time towards this intrinsic nature related to the divinity, etc. But actually it can go either way.

But again, I want to just linger with the sense of - I hope you get the sense that this is an abstraction - how important and how beautiful this notion of the virtues is, and how beautiful they are, and what that has to do with leading a beautiful life and our invitation, our calling to our telos, our destiny, if you like - a possible destiny if we choose it, if we support it - towards a really beautiful life, a profoundly and widely beautiful life.

Plato in his Crito says, "If you cannot live virtuously, there is nothing to be gained by staying alive."

Life itself has no value for you.

And Socrates somewhere said: "A person ought not to consider their chance of living or dying. They ought only to consider on a given occasion whether they are doing right or wrong."

Strong teachings, strong words. Again, I'm sure the Buddha somewhere says, "Better one day lived with sila, with moral virtue and uprightness, than a hundred years lived unethically, without sila."

So can you get a sense of the soul's love of moral values? And perhaps the soul's telos, our telos as human beings, our destiny, our calling—that towards which we are invited, the magnetic pull which we are potentially growing towards. We can just care for that growth.

In the context of talking about ethics, there are all kinds of systems of moral philosophy, all kinds of ways we can consider or approach the whole realm of ethics in our lives—how we think about it, how we look at it, what we consider a priority or important. Of course, we tend to think about efficacy. What's the result of a certain action? What's the result of my kindness or generosity? In regard to situations like climate change, we often tend to think about what's going to make a difference. That's really important, the efficacy.

But in a way, that's only half of ethics. The soul's love of values, love of virtues, the soul's telos, its calling, its invitation to become fully human, to live that beauty—this is perhaps the other half. So you have this balance of efficacy and virtue.

There was a German theologian, a Lutheran theologian called Dietrich Bonhoeffer. He was born near the beginning of the twentieth century and lived in Germany, where he criticized outspokenly the Nazi philosophy and program, what they implemented and their acts. He remained completely outspoken in his criticism. He would not shut up. And he knew what this would cost him—that he would probably pay for it with his life. He could have, along with so many others, kept quiet. But he chose to just keep telling the truth as he saw it, standing in, standing by, standing for moral values, living and creating virtue, committed to it, prioritizing it—more important, as Socrates taught, than life or death.

Was his speaking—almost a lone voice, not quite, but almost a lone voice in Germany—was that ever going to change things? Was his speaking going to topple the Nazi regime? Were they going to say, "Oh yeah, Dietrich, you're right. How stupid we are. We'll change our ways"?

That outspokenness, that courage, that commitment, that firmness, that resolve, that purity, that boldness—it wasn't going to change things. He wasn't an idiot. It was unlikely to change things, and much more likely was that it would cost him his life.

So unlikely it was going to change things, but was it beautiful? His outspokenness, his courage, his speaking out, his standing in and for moral value, the good—was it beautiful? Was it noble? Was it brave? Was it inspiring? Does it remain a model to be respected and honored and aspired to, that he chose and acted and spoke as he did back then, even at the cost of his own life?

And in the end, that's what happened in 1945.

They hung him alive in a basement with six other people and executed him from a meat hook in 1945. But he had done the right thing, no matter what. Sometimes virtue matters more than efficacy.

I think of the Titanic when it was sinking. There weren't enough lifeboats for everyone on the ship, so the rich got priority first—women and children—then the remaining women and children. But there were still women and children and some men left on the ship as it tilted and went down into the icy waters, abandoned, knowing they were going to die. And they started singing hymns—hymns to God, hymns in praise of the divine.

What's the point? But to me there's something beautiful there for the soul, something noble, something of virtue and value for the soul. They were going to die anyway, so what was the point? Yet there's something that transcends mere efficacy.

In my talks on "An Ecology of Love," I've explored how there are different kinds of activism. One type is very focused on practical results—this is crucially important. But there's another kind that has to do with really doing the right thing, standing up for the right thing, saying the right thing. It may not be so focused on efficacy; it's more focused on what we might call the soul sense of things. One participates in an action, stands up for something, takes a risk for something—really for the soul's sake. It's doing the right thing, embracing virtue, even if it doesn't lead to effective outcomes, even if its effects are limited.

Virtue and soul are not always synonymous, but there's a relationship. Just as on the sinking Titanic, there's something one does regardless of the outcome.

These two perspectives on ethics—virtue and efficacy—they're not separate. They're two ends of a spectrum of activism and ethical consideration. But as Alasdair MacIntyre points out, virtue has almost completely dwindled and been eclipsed by the efficacy approach in our modern culture's worldview and anthropology. Yet they're both important pieces of a larger puzzle.

At our current point in history, in our culture and wider society, there's a strong case for the resurrection of virtue as a primary consideration in our relationship with ethics, choice, and action.

Take climate change, for example. Many people involved in climate activism or research—looking directly at current scientific data, facts, and trends—feel like we've already gone off the edge of a cliff. What's the point? Humanity is likely already locked into three or four degrees of temperature rise, almost no matter what we do now. The likelihood of collectively curbing our carbon emissions or addressing these issues seems relatively slim.

Yet we can become too dualistic about climate change or species loss, as if it's simply black and white. Three degrees of warming is much better than eight degrees; two degrees is better than three. There's never a cliff beyond which everything becomes completely pointless. There are gradations of catastrophe. When we look closely at scientific data and larger socioeconomic trends, we can fall into despair and black-and-white thinking. But it's more nuanced—1.5 degrees is definitely better than 2 degrees, which is better than 3 degrees, which is far better than 8 degrees. All will be challenging, but there are degrees of difficulty.

But there's another consideration here regarding "what's the point"—one that has more to do with doing the right thing, with what is virtuous, with resonating with and aligning oneself with what has moral value. In this relationship, even if we are going off the edge of a cliff, even if we're all going down with the Titanic, even in tragic situations where nothing can be redeemed—this virtue ethics, this idea of doing the right thing regardless, introduces another dimension beyond practicality and measurable results.

It invites consideration of what we might call ideal values—and I want to return to that word "ideal." It opens us to divinity, to the ethos of human beauty and potential, to this invitation to the fully human being. It invites that whole other dimension regardless of the actual practical result.

I hope you're listening with your soul and hearing the implications for your soul in all this.

This applies not just to seemingly hopeless cases where our efficacy is very limited, but also where efficacy is uncertain or complex—when the effectiveness of our actions or choices is unclear or appears diluted in the web of conditions and the effects of others' actions and choices. Climate change is again a perfect example.

What's the point of me choosing this or that difficult choice of renouncing whatever it is—eating meat or flying too much or whatever—what's the point of me doing that if all these other people are just going ahead anyway? My flight is going anyway even if I don't get on it. My contribution of emissions in the totality I can't trace, as we outlined in one of the previous talks on ethics. I can't actually trace my exact carbon emissions and what exact result that will have, unlike if I shoot someone with a gun where it's very obviously me that did that.

So exactly these situations where the efficacy of our actions is uncertain, of our choices, or is diluted in the whole complex web of conditions or of the effects of other actions—that might be also where the virtues aspect should be more prominent in our thinking and a guide to our moral choices.

If we just think in terms of efficacy, we think, yeah, the flight's going anyway. I only ate a little section of the butt of that cow, or whatever. The cow is going to be slaughtered anyway, etc. There's a whole other side to this, and that's the virtue perspective.

Now we should point out that while we're focusing on efficacy and virtue, there are other considerations as well. Let's just keep it at those two for now. Too much emphasis on virtue over and above efficacy of action wouldn't be a virtue, right? If I'm so unconcerned and unattuned to what has potential efficacy and I'm just focused on my own sense of virtue, that's going to be not very virtuous. That itself constitutes a kind of failing in terms of virtue. It's not a moral value to do that.

For example, someone might be extremely courageous in some situation—let's say soldiers at war defending something—and a soldier is extremely courageous and doing something gets themselves shot and killed, but not for any good purpose. It doesn't help his fellow soldiers. It doesn't protect anyone else. It doesn't have any effect in the larger scheme of things. They've just done something extremely courageous or brave without any consideration of the relative efficacy and how that weighs up in the larger equation. And if there were other choices where there was some efficacy of an action, then doing that extremely courageous action without efficacy—I don't even know if it qualifies as being courageous. It's not a virtue. Too much emphasis on virtue over and above efficacy is itself not a virtue.

Let's say a couple more things for now. Hartman makes a point that when we act virtuously, when we act in line with a moral value or aligned with or devoted to a moral value, we're actually not concerned with ourselves, so to speak. We're concerned with how that affects another person. So my kindness towards someone else is for that other person. I'm not thinking about me and kindness or generosity. I'm not thinking about me and how it affects me. I'm thinking about them and the effect on them.

But I wonder whether it's that simple, especially when we get conscious of this whole area, or when we've been exposed to certain teachings. I wonder whether ethical actions and intentions can actually be regarded as kind of double intentions, having a double intentionality, contrary to what Nikolai Hartmann says.

So they are aimed at the good of another, or the good for another. My kindness, my generosity, my concern, my justice, my dispensing of justice if I'm in that position, is aimed definitely at the good of another, but also at one's own virtue, at one's own being resonant with and sensitive to one's own sense of virtue, one's own building of virtue, one's own telos as a human being, the demands of one's conscience. So there's a kind of double intentionality—towards the other, but also towards one's own being, towards one's own soul, towards one's heart and the development of one's life and that sense of fullness and the beauty of life.

So that double intentionality is actually, in a way, analogous to consciousness, which is aware of and directed to an object. That's how consciousness functions. It's directed to an object. It's aware of an object. But it's secondarily, if you like, aware of itself. Usually, there's a secondary awareness of awareness for itself. It's awareness of itself. It's not usually amplified to the subject. It can be amplified with practice though, and some of the emptiness teachings we've put out there involve amplifying that, getting a sense of the awareness of awareness.

It just goes naturally with any awareness. I'm aware of the clock, I'm aware of speaking, I'm aware of the words that I'm listening to, but I'm also aware that I'm aware. It's just implicitly bound up. It's part of what makes up awareness. And that sense of that can be amplified.

So it can be amplified with practice, with regard to awareness. But I wonder if awareness of virtues and an aspiration, a passion, a love for growing virtue can also be trained.

So I think, contrary to what Nikolai Hartmann says, there's a double intentionality there. We are concerned with our own soul and our own being. There's a kind of self-reflexive intention. Sometimes people talk about the self-reflexive nature of awareness, which just means that awareness is aware of itself while it is primarily aware of other objects. But that self-reflexive awareness that's intrinsically wrapped up and part of awareness can be amplified, as I say. There's a self-reflexive intention in ethical action as well, when we choose in this way.

So Hartman, let's just quote from Hartman then: "the object of the high-minded or loving person is not to be high-minded or loving, but that the other person to whom something is given or whom he makes glad may have the gift or the gladness."

In his inquiry, he distinguishes between the primary intention toward others' well-being and what seems to be absent - any consideration of our own moral development. "He gives out of love," Hartmann writes, "but not for the sake of being a loving person. He is concerned not at all with his own moral being, but with the being of the other person, and indeed by no means only with that other person's moral, but with his whole being. Bodily as well as mental. That is to say, with conditions that are valuable for that person."

But I wonder if this account is really complete or true. As I've suggested, is there not also a certain kind of joy or delight, a fulfillment, a sense of beauty in exercising virtues? And is this self-reflexive, self-directed strand of being virtuous perhaps akin to the self-reflexive nature of awareness, but also to the auto-eroticism we find in eros?

When we were unpacking the nature of eros, particularly in the Eros Unfettered talks, we explored how auto-eroticism is actually an aspect, a component, a dimension of eros itself. When we have eros for something else, we're also enjoying our own eros. More significantly, we become an erotic object for ourselves - ourself becomes an erotic object for ourself. This is perhaps clearer in sexual eros, where when we're finding another erotically attractive, when we're engaged in intimacy with someone, there's also this finding ourselves erotically attractive. And this is actually a necessary component - not egoistic, but a necessary part of how eros constellates.

So we see these parallels - a kind of self-reflexive intention operating within awareness, within eros, and within ethical action. All of these self-reflexive intentions or attitudes are usually relatively obscure to consciousness. They remain secondary, and we may not even notice them at first. And certainly, if any of them dominate too much over the more natural primary intentions - whether virtuous behavior toward others, awareness directed toward its objects, or eros toward an erotic object - they will create a kind of imbalanced self-centeredness, leaving us unattuned and insensitive to others and to the world.

If in sexual eros or lovemaking I'm more turned on by myself than by my partner, something is clearly out of balance. If I'm generally more aware of the awareness itself than of its objects - apart from specific practices moving in certain directions - that's not very helpful. Similarly, if I'm more concerned with my own moral development than with the actual effects of my kindness on this person, or the impact of my generosity, then something has shifted out of balance.

But still, these remain elements of our lives, of our minds, of our being. Don't we sometimes aim at the image of a beautiful life? Isn't this part of what calls to us? And again, with respect to climate change or species loss - situations where the effects of our choices and actions are largely invisible to us, where it's difficult to see the impact due to the complexity of globalization - isn't this love of virtue, this sense of our human telos toward the beautiful life, even more important than in other ethical situations or trans-actions?

With regard to soul-making and the importance of these considerations for soul, this double intentionality - this self-reflexive intention that forms part and parcel of our engagement with virtues and moral values - relates to our sense of the beauty of those virtues, to the potential for soul-making they contain, and to the eros we have for values themselves. This connection between eros and values is something I want to return to, as it opens yet another dimension of how our ethical life participates in the deepening and beautification of soul.

Rob Burbea · 1h14

> In this fourth installment of his series on ethics and soul-making, Rob Burbea delves deeply into the philosophical foundations of values and virtues. Drawing on Hartmann's phenomenology and Platonic philosophy, he explores how moral values might exist as 'ideal beings' in a realm beyond space and time, similar to mathematical entities like pi or imaginary numbers that govern physical reality without perfectly manifesting in it.
> Burbea examines how values like metta (loving-kindness), justice, and compassion exist as transcendent ideals that call forth human participation and actualization, even though we can never perfectly embody them. He explores the crucial role of human beings as the bridge between the temporal world of physical manifestation and the eternal realm of moral ideals. Through personal examples, including a profound moment before surgery when he aligned himself with metta, he illustrates how values can serve as spiritual anchors that provide meaning and direction.
> The talk addresses the impoverishment that occurs when values lose their dimensionality and transcendent quality, becoming mere social conventions rather than sacred ideals. Burbea connects this philosophical framework to practical concerns around guilt, ethical action in the face of uncertainty (such as climate change), and the cultivation of faith and hope in pursuing ideals we may never see fully realized. This exploration reveals how the ideational and imaginal dimensions of values are essential for soul-making and authentic ethical life.

Let's try to elaborate a bit more on some aspects of the connection or potential relationship of soul-making practices and these ideas of values and virtues, connecting them through this notion of imaginal ideas. Let's try and unpack that a little bit, unfold it, explore it.

There are probably different orders we could go through this. We could approach it from different directions, different orders. But I think I'll start by saying a bit more about the ontology of values, actually taking a certain view of the ontology of values, somewhat similar—in fact, very similar—to Hartmann's.

Now, there are other ontologies we could adopt or take, entertain, with regard to values. In fact, a whole spectrum of ontologies. But I want to dwell on this one, partly because nowadays it's unusual, and it opens things up in a certain way. It's less explored, and hence the soil there may be fresh and fertile and offer new possibilities.

Again, Hartmann made the point that values are not created by a culture or a person. They're not cultural, personal creations. They have a kind of independent existence. They're real existences and exist independently of our desires, of what we want to be the case, and also of our consciousness—so whether we're aware of them or not, they exist. But they exist in a particular way in what might be called the realm or the sphere of ideal being.

That word ideal is important. It's related to the word idea, specifically, but also ideal in the sense of when we have ideals and what's ideal—as in what's the best possibility. So there's a lot wrapped up in that word ideal and idea. There's a long history there. That sphere of ideal being—the realm in which values, for instance, among other entities exist—has its own ordering, its own structure, its own laws.

This notion of a sphere of ideal being goes back to Plato, maybe even before that—I don't know—but as far as we know, it goes back to Plato, who talked about the realm of ideas. And Aristotle as well, with variation, talked significantly about eidos. And the scholastics in the Middle Ages, the Christian scholastics in the Middle Ages, also talked about essentia, essences. So there's a long history, a long pedigree, and it tends to be very out of fashion these days. It went out of fashion, but it had a lot of fruit and implications in the history of Western philosophy and thought and the way we look at the world for many, many years.

Before we get into that just a bit more, again, we could adopt the stances, the perspectives of various other ontologies with all this, and we don't actually need to adopt Hartmann's kind of postulate of an existence completely independent of consciousness. Remember we talked in the past about how it says in the Zohar that we create God as much as God creates us. And this whole notion of participation that we have in the imaginal soul-making teachings—that somehow, mysteriously, soul and its beloved, erotic other, or soul, consciousness and its object, mind and matter, they participate in each other, they co-create each other in a way that transcends or complicates, takes to another level the division between consciousness and object, between subject and object.

But that notion of participation is actually very much one that Plato talked about in explaining ideas. And he said that the things of this world participate in the ideas. So the kind of existence, particular to an idea, is that kind of existence through which everything participating in it is just as it is. That's a quote from Hartmann. In other words, when we resonate with a certain moral value and when we act in alignment with that and inspired by that, we're participating in the moral value and we're participating in that level of being—or when an object in the world that's circular or triangular is participating in that ideal geometrical structure of circularity or triangularness.

That notion of participation was always a bit mysterious to people, what Plato meant by that. And it's still a little mysterious, but that notion of participation is key to this whole idea, this whole notion of the realm of ideal beings, of ideal existence, of ideas.

So values are one subset of ideal beings, ideal existences, or ideas, or eidos. Others might be mathematical entities and laws. This was originally where Plato, probably through Pythagoras, perhaps got the idea of this whole realm of ideal being, and it remained central to Plato's thinking and a kind of basis and model for his whole thinking.

Mathematical entities and laws, mathematical laws like the laws of geometry and entities like pi or other mathematical entities, don't have spatiotemporal existence. They don't exist in space or time. I cannot come across them. I cannot lay my hand on them. They don't exist in the way that we tend to encounter other existences as existences in space or time. My body, this book, whatever exists in a certain space at a certain time or for a certain time. But mathematical entities and laws—you know, a certain mathematical equation doesn't exist in space and time, yet it has an ideal reality, a reality in the realm of ideas, in this realm of ideal being.

It's not impermanent. It doesn't arise and pass. It's not like this mathematical law comes to an end or gets created. But the mathematical entities and laws actually pervade the world of, say, real things—let's say physical things. They manifest in them. Those mathematical entities and laws are actually part of the principles of reality. So this is one area, perhaps the only remaining area, where this whole notion of a sphere or a realm of ideal being, of the existence of certain ideals...

On a more abstract level, this notion remains current among certain thinkers, scientists, mathematicians, and physicists. However, it's not at all popular when we come to ethics and discussing values as possible kinds of ideal being, as species of ideal being within this realm.

I mention mathematics because perhaps you can get a sense, even from what you might know about mathematical principles, of this possibility—that there might indeed be such a stratum of existence as this realm of ideal beings. It's not something that can simply be dismissed or ridiculed as a silly notion.

When people introduce teachings on Plato, they often talk about the ideal horse or the ideal dog existing somewhere in this realm. That approach has always struck me as unhelpful—it almost sets up Plato's entire philosophy for ridicule. But if you sophisticate that understanding a little more, it becomes quite workable and certainly not ridiculous.

Mathematical entities and laws should, for most people, more easily strike one as genuinely interesting. They seem to have this existence in another dimension. They're real. They're not mere creations of human thought. We can't simply get rid of them. As I mentioned, they pervade the world of physical things and manifest within them. They are the principles of that reality.

To quote either König or Hartman: "Things, acts and occurrences in the real world, in the physical world, necessarily comply with the principles of mathematics." When I drop this pen, it moves through the air toward the ground in a trajectory based on mathematical principles. The way it holds together depends on forces governed by mathematical laws—the molecular bonds, the relationship between circumference and diameter. All these mathematical principles shape and govern physical actuality.

But there's a crucial difference when we consider values as species of ideal being. Values differ from other kinds of ideal being, such as mathematical entities, in that values don't automatically shape real things or physical phenomena. They may be realized, they may be actualized in physical existence—we may act on a value, express it, and manifest it—or we may not.

The physical world, what most people call the real world, may not correspond to the ideal world, to the ideal being of a value. Unlike mathematical laws, where correspondence is necessary, physical things must conform to mathematical principles. But as Hartman explains, values are not inviolable determinants to which everything physical is subordinate.

So the notion is that there are real entities existing in this ideal sphere. They're not creations of ourselves, not merely human constructs. But unlike other entities and laws existing in the ideal sphere—mathematical laws, for instance—everything in physical existence doesn't have to conform to them. Values may shape physical reality, or they may not.

Values have a particular mode of being, Hartman says, in relationship to the physical world—a mode of "ought-to-be." They ought to be. Value is what ought to be. There ought to be justice. There ought to be kindness. There ought to be mercy. There ought to be truthfulness.

When the ideal finds itself in opposition to the real—when there isn't justice, for example, in the physical world, so the ideal of justice stands in opposition to what König calls "the real"—when it remains unrealized, the ought-to-be becomes actual. The ideal itself becomes stimulating. The ideal "calls out," as he puts it, to be realized.

So values are not automatic determinants. They're not necessarily present in every case, but there's this quality of ought-to-be that accompanies them.

As we discussed in the last part of our exploration, humankind—human beings—are the point of contact between the physical world, the world of perishable things, of impermanence, of coming and going, birth and death, and the imperishable, timeless realm of moral values, of these ideals. Human beings have access to and contact with the ideal world, particularly that portion concerned with values—that section of the ideal realm.

Human beings have this crucial linchpin function. Everything depends on them. In Hartman's view, human beings are the only beings capable of grasping values, sensing them, and acting upon them. Only they can convert the ought-to-be into physical reality—transform the ought-to-be of the ideal into actual manifestation. Objects and other beings cannot do this.

König writes, really in summary: "The rest of existence is dull and dead to the call of the ideal. Man, humanity, is the guardian of the ought in the world of physical being, in the world of what he calls real being." In human beings only, the ought-to-be is transformed into the ought-to-do.

The ought-to-be that forms the core of moral value in the ideal realm, in its relationship to the physical realm, transforms into the ought-to-do. Humankind—this person, that person, I, you—ought to do this. As he writes, "In man only the ought-to-do is transformed into a moral act."

We've touched on this before, and we've also explored the fact that this knowing of the elements of the sphere of ideal being—this knowing and perceiving of what we might call ideas—is intuitive. It's what philosophers call a priori knowledge. It's not a deduction. I grasp it intuitively, and that goes for values as well as the laws of logic and mathematical laws. They're intuited, and we know something with immediacy and a kind of certainty. We recognize that it's a necessary and general truth.

One difference between Hartmann and Plato concerns the question of what is more substantially real, more true: the realm of ideas, the sphere of ideal being, or the realm of physical being. Plato considered the realm of ideal being and the sphere of ideas as having a more fundamental and truer kind of existence. The instances in the world were reflections or shadows of that truer, more fundamental existence of ideal things, of a realm of ideas.

Hartmann inverts that. He says this "nimbus of loftiness surrounding Platonic ideas" Hartmann rejects. Ideal being for Hartmann is a thinner, floating, insubstantial being—half-being, so to speak—which still lacks the full weight of proper being. He criticized Plato, along with many others, along the lines that if one gives primary reality to the sphere of ideas and to that realm of ideal being, one denigrates and devalues the things of life, the things in the transient world of physical existence.

I don't know whether that's actually true. And certainly whether or not that was Plato's intention—you could read it both ways, and probably different traditions arose out of Plato's thinking with different emphases. But anyway, Hartmann makes that reversal. I'm not sure it follows that if you give primary reality to the realm of ideas over and above the instances and reflections and instantiations of those ideas in physical reality, whether that corresponds to or leads to a denigration, a disinterest, a rejection of the world. But Hartmann thinks it does, along with many other people. That's a main criticism of Plato through the centuries, for this and other reasons in terms of his larger system of ontology.

Hartmann rejects that idea and inverts it. So the realm of ideal being for Hartmann is something that has less reality, but is still real.

In the centuries following Plato and years of neo-Platonism and Christian thought, this realm of ideas was quite central. There's a long thread of development of that whole notion, exploration of it into theology, into philosophy, into all kinds of areas. As it came into different kinds of theology, these ideas, this sphere of ideas, was considered sometimes a part of divinity itself. In other words, they were aspects or attributes of the divine, sometimes even names of God. So in the Islamic tradition and in the Jewish tradition and also in the Christian tradition through Pseudo-Dionysius, they talk about the names of God related to this notion of the ideas.

Or sometimes they are conceived of slightly differently, as if they are almost angelic existences close to the divine. They're the first sort of orbit of being, created being, around the divine—the first kind of rung of an existential hierarchy. There are many different variations, or they're emanations or expressions of the divine. So as this notion of the sphere of ideal being filtered into history, got digested, assimilated, worked on, taken up, pondered upon, reflected upon, it took slightly different forms in the way it was worked into different philosophies and theologies, with great consequence and a lot of fecundity over the years.

Now I want to pause on this question about which is truer, which has the more fundamental kind of existence: the sphere of physical things, of physical reality—which would be the view of most people nowadays and for quite a long time—or the sphere of ideal being.

I'd like to talk a little bit about mathematics. At this retreat, I know some of you are very traumatized by mathematics classes in school or poor mathematics teachers or whatever, but I just want to linger on something as a way of expanding this territory perhaps. So breathe—it won't be terrible, I hope.

There's something in mathematics called an irrational number. It has a very specific definition, but for our purposes, we're going to define it in a slightly imprecise way as a number whose decimal points go on forever. So it's a very loose, imprecise definition—it's not actually the definition of irrational numbers, but it goes with being an irrational number.

You know that number pi that's involved in geometry and circles, with the Greek letter π, is an irrational number. What is it? 3.1415926, and then it just goes on. I don't know the other digits, but those decimal places go on forever. They never stop. And that's bound up with what it means to be an irrational number.

Apparently, the existence of irrational numbers was discovered by a guy called Hippasus. The story goes, he was on a ship with some Pythagoreans, some followers of the philosophy of Pythagoras. Now, they too believed in the kind of divinity of numbers and the fact that numbers were mystically woven into the cosmic fabric, the fabric of the cosmos. So he was on a boat or ship or some kind of maritime vessel with a bunch of Pythagoreans, and on the deck, with the help of geometry and some sticks and stones, he was explaining to them about his discovery of irrational numbers and proving to them how they must exist, for which he got very little thanks.

In fact, they were completely outraged and threw him overboard. So I hope that they were in a small boat on a small pond and that he could swim and just swim to shore and was safe. I don't know. But it so offended their system of philosophy and their sensibility, this idea that a number could be irrational like that, could not be specifiable, its decimal points go on forever. But there are the existence of these irrational numbers.

So pi, as I said, is an example of an irrational number. What is pi, if you remember from school? If you measure the diameter of a circle, then you can say that the circumference of the circle will be of a length of pi times the diameter, or two times the radius times pi. And the area of the circle will be pi r squared. Again, there may or may not be pain associated, but I'm sure you remember this from school.

But pi is an irrational number. So is—and this might have been what Hippasus was showing—the square root of 2. So that, again, if you have a right-angled triangle with its two shorter sides being each one unit in length, then the hypotenuse, according to Pythagoras' theorem, is the square root of 1 squared plus 1 squared. One squared plus one squared is one plus one, which is two, and so the hypotenuse is the square root of 2. The square root of 2 also turns out to be an irrational number—1.414 something or other. It goes on forever.

There are many other numbers like this. Famous numbers, but there are all kinds of numbers like this. There's Euler's number, the natural logarithm. In fact, all square roots of natural numbers other than perfect squares—like 4 and 9, which have square roots of 2 and 3—all other square roots, like the square root of 6 or the square root of 8 or whatever, are also irrational numbers.

So there's this strange class of... I'll explain why I'm talking about this in a second. There's a strange class of numbers called irrational numbers. There's also a whole class of numbers called imaginary numbers. And again, some of you will know this from slightly higher mathematics. They are called i or j—the square root of negative 1. So when you multiply negative 2 times negative 2, you get 4. What that means is two numbers are the square root of 4: negative 2 and positive 2.

What you can't get, usually, in the usual way of thinking, is the square root of, say, negative 4. I can multiply 2 by negative 2, and I'll get negative 4. But if I multiply 2 by 2, or negative 2 by negative 2, I get 4. So the square root of negative 4 seems to not exist. So mathematicians at some point just made an imaginary number called i, which is the square root of negative 1. It's sometimes called complex numbers. So there's a whole other class of numbers that kind of has a strange existence.

But these numbers, as I said, turn out to be fundamentally woven into the governing of the universe in mathematical laws, but also in physical laws. So they govern the geometry of things in terms of the fact that the circumference will have a length of pi times the diameter. The hypotenuse of that triangle, if it's one unit and one unit, will have a length of the square root of two, an irrational number. All kinds of physical laws, especially when we get down to quantum physics, include this imaginary number of the square root of negative one, and numbers like the natural logarithm, Euler's number e.

When we think about this, this is quite interesting. So numbers like pi and i—this imaginary number, imaginary square root of negative 1—and numbers like the natural logarithm e, are fundamentally wrapped up in physical reality. They are, if you like, dimensions of physical reality. They govern physical things and the laws that pertain; they're part of the laws that govern physical things. Yet they never manifest themselves precisely.

Why don't they manifest precisely? Because for an irrational number, imagine this circumference is exactly the length of pi times the—let's say the diameter is 1—is exactly the length of pi. Well, the hypotenuse of that right angle triangle is exactly the square root of 2. So that means if I try to make a triangle with that size hypotenuse, or I try to make a circle with that size circumference, I cannot do that. It cannot exist because the actual length of it is infinitely specifiable.

In other words, I get it to 3.1415 and just a little bit more because it's 3.14159. And then I go to that—it's just a little bit more: 3.14159262. And then this will just go on forever. We'll never reach the exact length there of the circumference. The circumference can never be that exact length. It's always going to be a little bit more, a little bit less, because I can always go to the next decimal point.

So here are these things, here are these entities—pi, i, e.

They're fundamentally wrapped up in physical reality. There are, so to speak, dimensions of physical reality. They govern physical things. They're involved in the laws that govern physical things. Yet they never manifest exactly or precisely.

And if we're talking about abstract imaginary numbers, like this imaginary square root of negative one... it never manifests. How can it manifest? How can I have it? I can have one apple, I can have five apples, I can have eight apples, I can have half an apple, but I can't have i apples. I can't have the square root of negative one apples, or the square root of negative nine apples. It's, in a way, abstract and imaginary. It manifests in this indirect way. It itself doesn't manifest, but it governs manifestation.

Actually, there are also quantum mechanical reasons why a perfect circle can never physically manifest. In other words, that circumference can never exactly be pi times the diameter. This has to do with Heisenberg's uncertainty principle in terms of measuring the actual location of something. If you get down to the atomic level, where actually is that atom? We can't locate it precisely. So if we measure the length of this piece of string or piece of wood, actually it doesn't have a determinate length. It doesn't have an exact length that we can know exactly.

Maybe there are also issues at an even deeper quantum level about the quantum nature of space and time so that even when we consider this atom might not be here or there, or we can't determine exactly what distance it is from something else, but space itself can have a distance—but actually recent quantum theory more and more starts to dispute that.

Why am I going on about all this? Some of you might be wondering. It's certainly not for intellectual titillation. It's certainly not to intimidate or to confuse or to re-traumatize anyone. That's not the point. That's not why I'm going into this. It's not that it's merely kind of, oh, that's interesting. How interesting. Nor is the point to induce in you a kind of genial bafflement at existence, which sometimes seems to be, for some people, the point of emptiness teachings, as if that itself were some kind of achievement or goal, to be sort of puzzled by the mystery of existence. That's not the reason.

But there's something about this parallel with certain mathematical entities, and this notion that there might be a realm of ideal being, a sphere of ideas—eidos, idea—that pertain not just to mathematical entities, but also to things like love, beauty, goodness, and so forth, that can never perfectly manifest. But still, they shape, govern manifestations, they direct manifestations, and they exist, kind of, in this other realm.

So there's a parallel here. Actually, there's another class as well of these kind of abstract or ideal entities. One is these irrational numbers, like we talked about pi and e. One is these imaginary numbers, like the square root of negative one, i. And another is the entity that's called the wave function in quantum mechanics. It's also called Schrödinger's equation. It's actually an equation that's a sort of fluid mathematical entity, if you like, that exists in an abstract, multidimensional mathematical space.

When you square the solution of that equation, you get the probability of finding a particle here or there, or with this velocity or that velocity, or whatever, at a certain time. So the actual existence of it is this fluid mathematical entity that exists in a kind of abstract, multidimensional mathematical space. What kind of existence is that? The mind can hardly get around what it means. It's an ideal kind of existence, very abstract, and yet it bears a direct relationship with the shaping of our physical world and reality and what manifests on the physical plane.

So two points here. One is not only might there be this realm of ideal being, which we can see more clearly and more obviously for most of us in the realm of something like mathematics, but it might also apply to the realm of values. Point one.

Point two is this question of which is more real? Which is more real? Is the law more real that has the number pi in it, even though I can never manifest that number? Is the law more real when it has the imaginary number, even though I can never manifest that imaginary number itself? Is the wave function more real that exists in this kind of ideal, abstract, multidimensional, mathematical space? Is that more real than the physical manifestation? Which is more real? The realm of ideal being, or the realm of physical instantiation of ideal things?

As I mentioned, this realm of ideas was often considered divine, as part of the divine, or very close to the divine. And I wonder whether, with regard to values and virtues as species of ideas, whether they too we might consider them divine, just like Plato's ideas. They have this kind of infinite beyondness to them, yet they are also immanent.

They manifest in shaping and manifesting physical realities. We can have, just as with divinity, this infinite beyondness and imminence, this transcendence and immanence. Just as with divinity, we could have a clear concept of what that divinity is, or a vague and more obscure concept or idea or notion. There can be, just as with divinity, something divine and soul-making in relation to that, or they can become image.

Regarding their not having spatio-temporal being, we could say the same of images. An image doesn't really have spatio-temporal being. It exists, as we say, timelessly with this element of eternality. We could say, as Corbin suggests, that images happen in hierophantic time, in the mundus imaginalis. Perhaps that's the same thing—this quality of eternality.

Koenig observes that ideas or the elements of the sphere of ideal being don't have spatio-temporal being, but they're attached to and carried by spatial and temporal being. So again, there's this notion of participation in the Platonic sense.

We're exploring how we might possibly conceive of what kind of nature, what kind of ontology these values possess. There's something important in this kind of leaning toward such possibilities that opens up profound avenues of understanding.

Let me offer another example in the realm of values as ideal being. Sixteen or seventeen years ago, I had an operation in the hospital. They gave me a general anesthetic, and just as they were about to inject it, they said, "Okay, in about ten seconds you'll start to feel sleepy and then you'll lose consciousness." They were preparing me, which sometimes they don't do, but in this case they did.

I was aware of the possibility—however small—that I might die in the operation, that those seconds might be my last seconds alive. As they told me this, with only about ten seconds until I would lose consciousness, I instinctively and spontaneously said to myself: metta. Metta. And I put my faith in that—that was what I aligned myself with.

I didn't think much about it at the time, but several correspondences made me reflect on it recently. I wasn't practicing metta at that point. It wasn't that I was generating "may I be well" or an intention of loving-kindness toward other beings and myself. That was tangentially implied, but I wasn't actually practicing that. I certainly wasn't making some kind of rebirth wish for myself—you know, hoping that having metta in my consciousness when I died would ensure a good rebirth. I wasn't hoping that somehow metta would magically protect me from death and harm, as the Buddha sometimes describes in his teachings. Nor was I dissolving my being into the feeling of metta.

Looking back, I wonder: could it be that without realizing it at the time, I was orienting myself to, giving myself to, somehow viewing my life and death as given to, as participating in, as devoted to, as in reverence of metta as a kind of idea in the sense we're discussing—as a kind of eidos?

We've talked about the need for anchoring and how human beings need anchoring, especially when things are difficult. We've noted that anchors work best when there's an anchoring in something other. An anchor for a ship floating in water needs to be made not of water, and the anchor itself needs to have contact with something that's not water—something that has more steadiness, that's of a different substance.

For us as human beings, this is profoundly helpful. If there's something we can find to trust that can serve as a spiritual anchor, an anchor for the soul—I'm not speaking of an anchor for attention, like a mantra or breath or body sensations or even metta as an anchor for attention, but something, so to speak, on another plane that we can trust.

Even if our sense of that is vague, something that, like in the example I'm giving, if I knew I was dying in the next minutes, I could give myself to. I would give myself to that, abandon my being to it, see my whole life in the light of that—not hoping it would somehow save my earthly life or cure disease, but something I would want to give myself to, give the gift of my being to.

There are many possibilities here, and obviously we each must find what works for us as an anchor. This isn't a prescriptive formula. But there's something in the notion of the realm of ideal being, and in certain elements of that realm—for instance, values—that might function in this way.

If I'm going out of existence right now, if things get really difficult, what do I trust giving myself to? What do I bow to? What do I trust bowing to? What do I pour my remaining being out to? It's not really for me, even. It's not for anyone specific. It could be love, goodness.

These are vague notions, you know. It could be a notion of a deity—Kuan Yin, God, the cosmos if it has a kind of soul sense, or the earth, or Buddha nature.

As I said, we're not talking about practicing metta or mantra continuously for the sake of an anchor in difficult times or whatever. Obviously that's helpful. There are times when that is helpful. But we're talking more like a devotion of the heart and soul, a devotion of the being—some kind of fundamental statement or orientation from my soul to existence, to being, to the mystery of things, to the cosmos, to the divine, to the Buddha nature, about what I want my life to be and to have been about.

Even—and this is important—given the fact that for anyone orienting this way, giving themselves in this way, aligned in this way, devoted in this way, their actual life will have come up short from that idea and that ideal in so many ways. Of course. But what we're talking about here is getting in touch with a sense of another level of things. And it might be this kind of—what I'm talking about—it may be only a moment here and there. But what may come out of that can give this other dimension of anchoring. And then that gives a different perspective on our life, a different perspective on what happens.

So there's a possible kind of meditative journey there. It's hard to put this stuff into words. There's something mysterious in it, for sure. But it's also hard to articulate, and it's so foreign to our usual way of thinking of things. Because it sounds quite abstract. Sometimes when I try to explain this, I get the sense that the person thinks I'm talking about something material. It's hard to grasp, or it's hard for people to sometimes get a sense of something that's not material, that's timeless.

And this notion of giving myself to that ideality, to that eidos, to that idea—it's not only a kind of actual giving myself to it in life. So my metta and your metta and anyone's metta will never be perfect. It will never be constant. It will never be complete. I will always fall short of the ideal. So this immaterial, timeless, ideal existence that I give myself to—but in ways that giving, like the existence of the eidos, the giving and the existence have other dimensions to them, beyond the actuality in life. It includes the actuality, but the actuality never really measures up.

But this notion of eidos—they're like images. They're not material, they're timeless. And they have this beyond to them. They have other dimensions, and that is what gives them traction as anchors for us.

It doesn't imply that our actions and choices and how they mirror or refract the ideal or the image is irrelevant. So an idea or an eidos is only abstract if how we are in the world and how or whether it instantiates is irrelevant, if we don't pay any mind. Then it's abstract. But there's something here—this ideal being, this strata of existence, these ideas, this ideational, imaginal.

It's something greater than this impermanent phenomenon that I am, or I appear to be. It's something also beyond me. And in the case of that example of the metta, before the operation, that something beyond me is not the fact of all beings, metta to all beings. Sure, that's beyond me. We're talking about it's beyond me in a different way—something deathless and timeless, as I said there, greater than this impermanent mind-body practicing metta and then extinguished by death, for example.

But we're not talking about something that goes on forever. Neither me nor my metta go on forever in time. The deathlessness, the timelessness is of the order of eternality. It's the non-spatiotemporal being of this realm of ideas.

But back then, I didn't really understand, I didn't really have this language for it, but remembering back, oh yeah, beauty was there in that orientation of my being in those seconds before going unconscious. And a vague sense, very vague at the time, of the kind of particular ontological category or kind of being, the kind of truth that such ideas have, that such values have as species of ideal existence. Trust was there. Trusting somehow in that. Little as I could even articulate or conceptualize or delineate what it was at the time that was exactly going on there.

And there was eros in relationship to it, and dimensionality. So you can see how many of the elements in the imaginal—trust, beauty, eros, dimensionality. We're talking about something, we could say it's a kind of imaginal. Ideas become imaginal, or the ideational imaginal—how much it overlaps there.

But we need, I think, this kind of sense of beyondness and of other dimensions, and we need it for our soul. We need it also in our ethical orientations and considerations. There's something that underpins our ethics. That's why someone like Richard Rorty finds it so difficult to talk about ethics—they have very little to say because they absolutely refuse any sense of dimensionality.

Without a kind of beyondness or transcendent element, without this dimensionality shading into divinity, without that aspect or those dimensions in relation to the virtues and values, those virtues and values that we still somehow in our society honor and enact to some extent become perhaps just a pale ghost, almost a charade of what virtues and values can truly be. We still kind of go along with certain values and virtues—perhaps that's the dominant view—but without that dimensionality, without that beyondness, without that transcendence, without that dimensionality shading into divinity, they lose their transformative power.

What happens to eros when it's not allowed dimensionality? We've talked about this before—how if eros is not allowed dimensionality, it has to go horizontal. But right now I want to explore something different: what is the flavor of it when it doesn't have that dimensionality, when it's not allowed those dimensions?

Sometimes people spend enormous amounts of money on weddings, for instance, which is a kind of celebration of love and eros. But how often does it have that real dimensionality to it? There's this celebrating of love, this making a big thing of it, but it might also be limited in these very important and fundamental ways.

Consider the value of determination—the passion of footballers and football teams. But what's that determination in service of? Again, there's a lot of hoopla, a lot of investment in it, but it's not seen in this light that allows its dimensionality to be sensed. We're caught in some kind of in-between place, perhaps.

Or sexual enjoyment—when there's no dimensionality allowed, what does that become? It's a pale ghost.

Or individuality. We tend to celebrate and respect and value that. It's considered a virtue. But why? Without the dimensionality, it's not any kind of manifestation of an echoing or mirroring of divinity through and in my personhood.

Or dynamism, restlessness as values—deep restlessness, dynamism, but without any deep purpose. It becomes just a kind of reactive busyness.

Or peace, in contrast. Without the dimensions of depth or sacredness, it becomes just about relaxation and de-stressing.

All these values—peace, dynamism, individuality, sexual pleasure, love, eros, determination—they all become atrophied or have had their dimensions amputated in many cases. Or perhaps people are still unconsciously responding to a sort of implicit sense of the dimensionality in them. I don't know. But there's potentially a kind of poverty in our life and our society without them, and also poverty when we then come to consider and ponder the realm of ethics.

The notion of values as having ideal existence, as existing in this sphere or realm of ideal being, gives them a certain dimensionality. And again, dimensionality shading into divinity, which we'll return to. This does a tremendous amount for the soul. It's necessary for soul-making, and it's necessary for soul-making in relationship to values and virtues and ethics.

Remember I mentioned working in a dyad and being struck by the sense of participating in the image of myself and my partner in the dyad, and the grace of that, the privilege of that—the privilege of participating in the image which has these higher roots in divinity and eternality. All of that, just a little glimpse, gave a different sense of the relationship to death. So touched, so blessed, so graced, such a privilege to touch and to participate in, to be graced by and to participate in something which has these higher roots in divinity, which has these other divine dimensions.

But might the same be true also of values when we sense them that way? When they're dimensionalized, when we open to the sense of participating in their ideal being, participating in these other dimensions of being, shading into divinity, they give our life meaningfulness. That's what gives our life meaningfulness. That's what touches us. That's what makes a difference.

I'd given the example previously in the talk on dirti practice, I imagine, but it could be with any image. And now I'm saying as well with values: when we sense them in this fuller, richer, more soulful way, there's a privilege and a beauty there, and a grace in being touched by them, in being called by them, in participating in them, in being aligned with them, in sensing them.

Even in sensing them, the soul receives, graced with a sense of meaningfulness and beauty, loftiness, aspiration.

So there's a lot shared here between what we're calling values when we give them—when we allow them to have this ideal level of being, this existence at the level of the realm of ideas, just like images, just like imaginal images. And with all that, there comes the eros, the beyondness of them, the dimensionality shading into divinity. It calls our eros. Our eros also will reciprocally create more of that beyond. Hartman wouldn't like that, I suppose, because he just leaned on the discover side rather than the create side. But we can have an erotic relationship with values. And in a way, they have this unfathomable, inexhaustible dimension.

Just like pi and e, those mathematical examples. And just like images, where our life echoes and mirrors and refracts an image, the image refracts into our life—it won't be 100% identical. There's a kind of unattainability. We cannot attain a perfect instance of living out an image or mirroring an image, or a perfect instance, a complete instance of this value in our life, this or that value. There's a certain impossibility, unfathomability, unattainability, inexhaustibility to values when they have this sense filled out, when we fill out the sense that way, when we perceive them that way.

I'm going to read you a passage by Hartman. It's quite an interesting passage which we could use and take in different directions—also regarding climate change, particularly when the outcome is uncertain or even likely that we're going to fail to avert tragedies. So with regard to action of faith and doing the right thing with respect to climate change, but also in regard to this beyondness of ideas. They have dimensions of beyondness.

And so he writes—again, pardon me for the gender-biased language—"It manifests itself in a capacity to detect what is good and genuine in another's disposition amidst less worthy tendencies, and to seize upon the good, to have faith in it, even to draw it out and develop it by the influence of one's trust. But beyond this, there is still a higher ethos of faith."

So he's actually talking about the value of faith. That's the context of this passage.

"Beyond this, there is still a higher ethos of faith. In the vision of the great moral ideals of life, which the individual person does not actualize, and in the vision of the great upward strivings of humanity, distant goals and vast enterprises require a different kind of faith, a faith which temporal unattainability does not stifle."

The fact that I will not reach that goal, or this goal, this ideal, will not be reached in time or in my lifetime even—in my lifetime even, or even in time—it doesn't dampen the faith. It doesn't dampen the devotion and orientation.

"It inheres," he says, "in the essence of all such outlooks upon life—and these are those which lend its highest meaning to our existence—that the non-actuality of the goal does not prejudice the reality of the undertaking."

So the fact that we may not actualize the goal does not stop us from undertaking that venture and that aspiration and acting on it.

"Herein the potent moral element of not seeing and yet believing"—I think that's a reference to doubting Thomas and Christ—"attains its culminating point."

So I haven't seen the fruition of this. I will not see the fruition of this. It will never be perfect. It will never manifest completely, certainly not in my lifetime, and yet I have the faith, I have the devotion, I have the alignment. I can instigate action. I can devote and commit my being to that ideal.

"For it is the high ideals," he writes, "which man never sees actualized. It is the high ideals which man never sees actualized. To this lofty spirit of faith corresponds hope, a valuational sense of a distinct kind. It is not properly a moral value like faith. It is not a new virtue, but only an accompanying emotional factor, the form of happiness which accords with faith and which anticipates its contents."

So this faith and hope in an ideal context, and in working towards and trying to manifest an ideal, even knowing it won't manifest completely or in my lifetime. There's a lot here that's related to the movement of eros. And eros, remember, will always create more beyonds. The angel is always out ahead.

So especially in the higher ideals, in the higher values, there is a kind of impossibility that goes with them, that pertains to them. The image, or the idea, the ideal, is the impossible. Actually, there's a whole other reason why values have a kind of impossibility to them, related to their antinomies, their oppositions between contradictions, between values. But I don't want to complicate things, so I'll come back to that later. But an image is an impossibility in terms of its manifestation, its full, complete replication, echoing, mirroring in manifest physical reality in our lives. So the image and what we're talking about, these ideas or ideals, are the impossible.

But the impossible is, if you like, the milk, the sustenance, the seed of the possible. It points a direction, it inspires, it emboldens, it roots us, it anchors us. But there's always the beyondness. As we said when we talked about images, the angel is always out ahead. It's moving away from us, but beckoning us, and we're pulled as if by magnetism —we move with it. Our life moves with it.

Now, there are all kinds of implications here, so very much to do with eros and soul-making, of course, but just to touch on one briefly right now, regarding guilt and healing.

Sometimes we feel great dukkha when we have, or we believe we have, acted in ways we don't respect. And it's easy or common then for that to become a kind of quagmire or storm of repetitive papañca and self-judgment, and that whole nexus and difficulty of guilt. In all that though, there is probably something—a value, a moral value—that we are or want to be devoted to. In the middle of all that mess, self-recrimination and self-obsession, there is actually a value that we are or we want to be devoted to.

And that value may become clear to us as an idea, as an ideal, and or as an image. Remember, values are an element of the imaginal. So it may become clear as a value idea itself, or it may become clear as an image or both. So that's quite important. Within all this storm of papañca and guilt, the swirling vortex of that, it's possible—it might be possible, with a little careful discernment and work in meditation—to find, amidst all that, what is the value that we're devoted to. And either it comes in image form, or it comes in this ideal form, in the form of an idea of a value itself.

And having contacted this sense of and clarity about the value, then a couple of things might be really helpful. We can meditate on that value itself in a way that our devotion to it, our love for it are felt deeply. So I get clear what it is and then I feel my love and my devotion to it. I feel it deeply in the heart, in the body, in the soul. So obviously again here the energy body is going to be very important. The sense of alignment, of energization, of harmonization are integral to that sense of devotion and necessary.

And then within all that maelstrom of guilt and self-obsession, etc., we can find the value. We can meditate on it in a way that we feel that devotion and allow that sense of devotion and love for it to align the being, the heart, the body, the energy body, the soul. And dwell there. Stay steady with that alignment and energization. So that something beautiful and positive comes out of the mistake, the shortcoming, the ethical transgression.

But a second piece is important here, related to what I was saying just before. It's important to recognize that both values and images have always some portion of them that is transcendent in the sense of beyond—beyond what we can ever perfectly mirror or manifest. We can never perfectly mirror that image or manifest perfectly that idea. Their beyondness, their transcendent dimension is necessary if they are to remain always erotic objects for us.

So eros needs this beyondness. It needs something to be able to move into. It also creates that something, that beyondness. So we can live and try to speak and act and feel and think in service and devotion to these values and images as much as possible, as much as possible, but that will always fall short of their ideal or imaginal fullness. Accepting this and still striving and devoting oneself in the gaze and in the act is a kind of soul wisdom. And it relates to that passage from Hartmann that we just read.

And the residual dukkha there, from the awareness of their forever beyondness—remember with the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, the sense of the erotic object will always grow and deepen, always the angel out ahead, no matter how much we grow—but that residual dukkha from the awareness of there forever beyond us is just part of our existential situation as souls, as human beings.

Sometimes people have told me, oh, this happened in a relationship with someone and I was like this or I did that or I didn't do this. Some people are just spinning and spinning in guilt about that. And very painful. But is it possible to go right to that dukkha? Right to that painful spinning? And the pain is telling me about my love. It's telling me about my devotion. Find what is this devotion to, and can I feel that devotion, can I let it align me, and also do I realize that I cannot perfectly mirror, echo, replicate that image in my life.

So sometimes people are, for example, in a romantic or sexual relationship, kind of inspired or led by a certain image of themselves as lover, or relating their relationship and how they are to an image, a potential image of lover. But it will fall short. And that doesn't mean that we don't aspire to that, we don't have that magnetic pull, we don't have that devotion. But there's a wisdom in knowing, yeah, I'm never going to completely replicate it.

Okay, I want to say more about this relationship of soul-making and values, virtues, and the ideas-imaginal. Let's stop there for today.

Rob Burbea · 2h06

> In this profound exploration of ethics and soul-making, Rob Burbea examines how moral values can become 'erotic images' that stimulate soul-making dynamics. He discusses how this relationship with values as ideational-imaginal objects brings nobility, strength, and the capacity to choose what is difficult but right. Drawing on philosophers like Nikolai Hartmann and Platonic cosmologies, Burbea explores how crises and conflicts serve as opportunities for moral growth, and how the absence of values paradoxically has value by allowing our moral being to engage and develop. He addresses the necessity of healthy guilt or remorse, the complexity of choosing between competing values, and how soul-making practice can deepen our relationship with virtue. The talk includes guidance on three approaches to meditating with moral values: through imaginal figures, through the essence that remains when figures fade, and through direct meditation on ideational-imaginal values themselves. This practice naturally leads to sensing oneself as participating in divine ideas and experiencing the nobility and grace that comes with this recognition.

So it's possible in life, and even among the complexities and difficulties and the busynesses of life, that we at some point start to feel an erotic attraction. We have eros for values, for moral values, and that eros allows, instigates, stimulates soul-making in relationship to those values. In the dynamic, in the process, in the journey of soul-making, at some point moral values begin to come alive, begin to be swept up into, included, involved in the soul-making dynamic.

As such, either way, the values become for us erotic images. This value, or that value, or values as a whole, moral values as a whole, become erotic images, become ideational images. The ideational, imaginal sense of values can begin to open up. With that, implicit in all this, is the sense of these moral values as ideas, ideals, having ideas pregnant with meaningfulnesses and gracing us with a sense, an expanded sense of meaningfulness. All this is part of what happens as soul-making starts to involve values, as values start to stimulate the soul-making and the eros. They complicate, enrich, deepen, strengthen the relationship with moral values in this sense. Of course that affects our choices in life, affects our perspectives on life, our sensibilities in life, and our choices.

So it becomes easier to choose that which is not easy—to make this ethical choice, this sacrifice, this renunciation, this involvement in activism or protest. We're not so limited that we are pushed and constrained to choose just what is easy or what we think makes us happy. We can talk more about the joy of this kind of relationship. Joy for me is a richer word, is a more soulful and spiritual word than just happiness. And part of that whole relationship is the capacity to be challenged and the willingness to be challenged, even the desire to be challenged by and through the calling and the beyondness of this sense—a capacity, a willingness to be stretched, to stretch oneself. Aspiration grows. Nobility, dignity comes with all this.

A capacity, an ability, a strength to abide and choose independent of the dominant view, the common view of those around us in the wider society or in our particular subcultures or sub-traditions. Beauty in all of this, devotion and meaningfulness can all come once the values in this sense start being incorporated, worked on, fermented in the soul-making dynamics. And that will, of course, like working with any image, working with the ideational imaginal in this sense, start to include the perceptions of self, other, world, and the eros itself—our love, our passion for the values themselves. All those aspects—self, other, world, eros—start to become imaginal, start to gain all this dimensionality.

So there's a lot of power in this, in the best sense, a lot of enriching and deepening. And strength comes, and capacity and willingness comes, as I said.

A little while ago I was on a panel about climate change responses in religious groups. One of the other panelists was George Marshall, who some of you will know. He's based in Oxford and does research in sociology and psychology on messages about climate change—how they impact people, and what basically works to make a difference, to engage people, and what doesn't work.

While we were on this panel, one of the things that struck me in what he was sharing was that he'd spoken to Islamic communities and asked them about their response to the challenge of climate change. What struck me was that they said, in terms of how they want to respond to the challenge of climate change, that they want it to be a jihad—a holy war. Take away all the craziness that goes with that word, unfortunately. Jihad means holy war, holy engagement in a noble struggle. So they didn't want to just remember to put the recycling out or something like that. They wanted something that was really genuinely a stretch for them. They want to feel like they're engaged in that way.

So there is both a certain soul stance of the religious orientation and sensibility that actually wants that beyondness, wants that stretch. It's related to all this business about dimensionality and beyondness and meaningfulness. But there is also, as I said, once the soul-making starts involving the values, once the values become erotic objects, then also the willingness and the capacity to stretch and be stretched are there. And the strength to undertake all that starts to come. As I said, we can start more and more to stand in our values, for our values, stand by our values.

I remember being part of a Dharma group talking about climate change and trying to make different creative responses to it—the Dharma Action Network for Climate Engagement. One evening we were in a group and a couple of the people were saying that they were a little aversive to protests and engaging in protests around inaction against climate change and for action against climate change. The sense that they had of protests and why they were a bit aversive and disinclined was that for them a protest seemed to be a negative thing, protesting against this or that. They didn't like that negative connotation, which had to do with anger.

But actually, the etymology of that word protest—protest means pro is for, and test is related to testify or testament. From its Latin roots and through the French, it originally meant something much more positive.

Protest, I testify for something, I bear witness to something. I make a declaration, a testament for, pro something. And that was the original meaning. It had a much more positive connotation.

Implicit in that bearing witness for something, or to something—I bear witness to something—only as a consequence of that particular orientation and commitment is one bearing witness against something else. So I bear witness for, I take a stand, I testify for the need and the importance of immediate prioritizing of action on species loss or climate change or whatever it is. And as a consequence, I'm bearing witness against inaction—the laissez-faire, the empty words.

So all this moral strength, moral courage can come when the relationship with values opens up. And we said the importance of anchoring, and the anchoring needing to have another dimension, a beyond to it. And so when there's difficulty—whether difficulty in terms of personal renunciation, difficult choices in one's life because they're the right thing to do, because they're ethical, but there is cost involved—or whether it's the difficulty of being in a protest or an action of some kind, an activist action of some kind, we need that strength, we need that steadiness, we need that anchoring. We need that courage and that largeness of soul.

Or when it's difficulty in terms of—as many people are increasingly, I hear many people who are doing research—predicting that species loss and climate change is happening so quickly that there will be all kinds of breakdowns in terms of social structure and our larger structures of civilization in the not-too-distant future. I don't know if that's the case or not, or to what extent it's the case. But then there's difficulty on a massive scale, not just personal difficulty, not just difficulty in this situation, but a much wider social difficulty.

But it's interesting—the word crisis is at its root from a Greek word, I think, which means decision. So crises are often decision points, points of decision, moments, times of the necessity of decision, this way or that way. And crises, difficult as they are, challenging as they are, costly as they are, can often also be doorways, opportunities. In fact, that word—as I've mentioned, I think, several times in different talks—opportunity is, its root porta, which is door. So a crisis is a time for a decision, but it can also be door, opening a door that goes through this door or that door, and a door to what? It's opportunity to practice in the deepest, fullest, widest, and sometimes most challenging sense of the word.

And you can see this relationship between crises and opportunity—not that we wish crises, not that we want them to come—you can see this relationship in its extreme form again, Dietrich Bonhoeffer, as I mentioned in the talk. Very extreme crisis situation, and it brought out such courage and such moral integrity and steadfastness. Or, as mentioned also in a previous talk, Viktor Frankl reporting on those among the starving concentration camp inmates at Auschwitz—those few who would give away their last piece of bread. An intense crisis situation. And it brings out something so profound in humanity, something so beautiful in the soul.

In that desert, in that ravaged landscape of flower blooms. And we can enjoy and be touched by its fragrance, its perfume, its color, its beauty, years and years later. And it makes a difference to us.

So it might be crises at different levels, as I said—personal, or in the middle of a difficult situation like a protest or an action when it gets a bit hairy, or much wider with climate change and species extinction, the possibility of social collapse, societal collapse, the collapse of certain structures that we've become very used to in our civilization. These might also—they present themselves as crises, but they can also offer doorways.

So in the midst of the most difficult situation is the possibility of the most beautiful soul expression, the most beautiful soul allegiance, the most beautiful and deep and touching and far-reaching soul stances.

So, again, I want to quote from Nikolai Hartmann, who points out, quite interestingly, that—I have to preface this because he uses the word reality and I think we should better use the word real and reality. He uses the word for—we can, because I'm confused about ontology there with different systems of ontology—we can substitute the word actuality. So, in other words, when a value is actualized, we talk about the reality of that value, when it's actually present, manifested, chosen.

So, the value of that actuality of a value is immediately evident. In other words, when there's kindness there, when there's justice there, clearly it's valuable. We know that. We feel it as a value wherever that is the case.

However, he continues, the non-actuality of values also has a value. In other words, the absence of a value, the blocking of a value, the pervasive blindness to a value that may be around us—the non-actuality of values also has a value. This becomes perceptible as soon as we consider that active intended realization is possible only where a value is non-existent. And that in addition to that, it is active intended realization in which the higher moral species of value is realized, is actualized.

In other words, in a situation where there is no justice, to work towards pointing that out and supporting the possibility and the actuality of justice to come there—that

That initial absence of justice was a value in that it enabled the values of sensibility, choice, action, and actualization. All of these—sensibility, choice, and actualization—together make a moral value. In other words, that active engagement, that doing, that choosing by a human being is itself valuable.

This reveals a strange fact: the absence of a value has value because it allows our moral being to engage, to work, to grow. Hence, the value of attaining something in the world stands in opposition to the value of attempting the effort, even if the goal is not attained or not even attainable. Again, we return to that quality of beyondness and to this question of intention being central, as the Buddha pointed out in his teachings on karma and sīla.

So strangely, crises, absences, immoral situations—situations of immorality—are potentially valuable because they allow us to exercise our moral being, through which we grow, through which the soul grows. This echoes teachings from the Zohar, which offers a curious observation: "There is no good so perfect as that which issues out of evil." This poetic line can be interpreted in multiple ways, but perhaps it relates to this point about crisis as opportunity and the non-actuality of a value having value.

There may be a relationship here with our emphasis in the soul-making dharma on being with dukkha, working with it, having this crucible-like relationship that allows soul-making. Sometimes the profundity of the soul-making that emerges from dukkha is truly worth the effort. Whether the best kind of soul-making always comes from dukkha, I wouldn't necessarily claim, but there's something significant here.

Adin Steinsaltz, commenting perhaps on that Zohar passage, writes that it is only in a world on the brink of disaster—one where the potential for evil, suffering and ignorance is always at hand—that such values as kindness, compassion, courage and wisdom can be actualized. A paradise, a Garden of Eden world, he suggests, would afford little or no opportunity for the exercise of values and for the development of character.

Nikolai Hartmann offers another perspective on conflict and situations in life—not just wars or arguments, but the complexity of different choices, different parties wanting different things, values pulling in different directions. He writes that we can speak in a certain sense of conflict as a value. In the domain of knowledge, problems correspond to this principle. As in knowledge, a problem is a basic value, although it is the opposite of insight.

We want the insight, but a problem—difficult and troublesome as it may be—is actually a basic value because it's an opportunity, a doorway into insight. It's something we must work and wrestle with, digest and assimilate. Out of that compost, something beautiful can grow.

So as in the realm of knowledge, a problem is a basic value, although it is the opposite of insight. Similarly, in ethical life, conflict is basic, although it means incompleteness, disharmony, indeed a lack of indubitable value. Yet conflict is that which keeps discernment and the feeling of value alive and opens up new vistas.

As much as we might want simplicity and peace, thinking we'd prefer everything to be perfect and uncomplicated, there's something strange about this realm of saṃsāra. Conflict keeps discernment and the feeling of value alive and opens up new vistas, partly because of the complexity of our lives and situations, especially in this age of globalization.

Hartmann continues: "Moral life is, in general, life in the midst of conflicts. It is concentration upon them, a constructive solution of them through the commitment of the person." He uses strong language for what happens when we avoid this reality: "All ignoring of it is a sin, an irrevocable injury to ethical being, even to that of one's own personality."

To withdraw, to put on blinders and ignore the complexity of a situation—the conflicts inherent in it, the obscurities, the incompleteness, the differing demands within oneself and between people—is to injure our soul. We somehow wound our ethical being when we choose to ignore conflict and complexity for the sake of simplicity and peace.

As all this works together, there's nothing that really comes first, reflecting the nature of the dependent arising of things.

They're all pieces that feed each other. The values becoming erotic and caught up in the soul-making dynamic, the dimensionality, the beyondness, the meaningfulness, the willingness and capacity to be challenged, stretched, to aspire, the strength, the courage, the devotion. Crisis as opportunity, conflict and absence of value—also as the ground, if you like, of our moral being, the soil out of which our soul grows, our moral being grows. All these factors can feed each other.

And with that expanding, enriching, deepening, widening of our soul's relationship to values in this sense, there will come, in the dimensionality, in the sense of beyondness, there can come a sense of the divinity of values, the divinity of these ideas as I touched on in the last part—that possibility.

It's interesting, going back to Plato, when he writes about virtue. I was reading an article by Julia Annas, and she points out, she traces through his works over many years different positions that Plato took, or presented, with regard to the relationship of virtues and divinity. It's quite interesting in that we see similar positions in different traditions of Buddha Dharma.

One, in the Phaedo for instance, there's a teaching there, a thrust to the teaching there, that is really about the practitioner, the philosopher, dying to the world, detaching themselves from the everyday concerns and the everyday desires and beliefs. True virtue there does not actually deal with the concerns or the events or the matters of everyday life, but actually true virtue, she writes, consists in an escape or purification from them. Socrates in Plato's text of the Theaetetus says, "Human life must unavoidably contain evil, so we should try to flee from here to there, to the divine realm, away from life, ending rebirth. So we should try to flee from here to there as quickly as we can. And flight is becoming like God to the extent that we can. And becoming like God is becoming just and pious with wisdom."

So there's one teaching here, one thrust through the writings of Plato, that's this very world-escaping, ending-rebirth kind of thrust in which virtue has its place either as a stepping stone to this escape from the world, this removal from the world, or virtue is identified with being exactly that removal from the world. So there is this kind of going hand in hand of the movement of transcendence and the opening to what is transcendent to the world that goes hand in hand in that particular thread of Plato's teachings—that transcending and opening to what is transcendent to our world goes hand in hand with this kind of regard for our world and the affairs of humanity as insignificant.

In later dialogues of Plato, a different position is presented. The idea of the individual's becoming like God is framed as the divine has, if you like, operates with goodness and as goodness and wants goodness, so that when we see aright, when we act and choose and sense in line with goodness, we're actually putting ourselves, so to speak, in the service of, or we become part of the unfolding of the divine goodness and the unfolding and the enactment of the divine's intention for goodness in the world. So you get that in the Philebus and the Timaeus and sometimes in the Laws.

"The work of the divine reason is to organize things for good," Annas writes, "since the divine is good and seeks to spread goodness in the way it orders things. Becoming like God thus comes to be construed as aspiring to identify with the goodness-producing works of the divine, which makes it less surprising that this is a characterization of virtue. Virtue continues to be seen as imposing rational order on potentially refractory materials, like our desires and our obstinateness. But this is connected with the divine."

So one is a world-transcending movement, which regards virtue as either a stepping stone to that transcendence and escaping and disregarding the world, or identifies virtue with that very escaping and disregarding the world. And then in the later dialogues, there's more a sense of virtue, our virtue being, if you like, almost an identification with or an instrument of the divine virtue.

Can you hear already there's parallels between the sort of classical Pali Canon thrust, which I mentioned, I think, near the beginning of the talks on ethics—to end rebirth, to transcend, to be removed from the world, and whatever care we take with paramis and other dhammas and cultivation of sila is really secondary. It serves the purpose of a springboard or an enabling of that transcendence; that's the primary purpose of them. Versus other interpretations or spins that you get in Mahayana Buddhism, for example, where it's possible that the Bodhisattva or the Buddha, certainly a Buddha, certainly, but also Bodhisattva or practitioner, through the Buddha nature, is expressing, manifesting, radiating, if you like, the Dharmakaya, the body of beautiful qualities, of virtues of the Buddha in this world.

Of course, if we practice soul-making in relation to all this, and as we've said, in the context of soul-making Dharma teachings, in a way both of those options can open up for us. But we would certainly expect the second option to open up. Why? Because as something gets involved in the soul-making dynamic, as something becomes an erotic, imaginal object for us—in this case, the ideational imaginal, or through an imaginal figure, the values become erotically imaginal for us—then the self-sense is subsumed into that, becomes imaginal, the world-sense, all of it. Our eros itself, our passion itself becomes imaginal. And in that, it gains, all that gains dimensionality and divinity.

So again, with the soul-making dynamic, there's a possibility for us to see our virtues—the virtues that our life enacts, plays out, our sensibility to them, our choosing them, our courage to enact them in body, speech and mind—is actually the experience in this world of the Buddha nature's virtues, of the Dharmakaya, of God's goodness, of the attributes of God. We would expect that perception to become available, that conception to become available as something we can entertain. It's just a sense and an idea that arises naturally through practice. And with all that, other possibilities start to offer themselves, become available.

Again, I want to read you a passage from, I think it's from Hartman. Here he writes—he's talking about how we sense values—and he says, "Grasping a moral value is sensing it, or more precisely, being gripped by it."

Grasping a moral value is sensing it, or more precisely, being gripped by it. I was struck, reading that, by how interesting I found his choice to put it in the passive voice. We are gripped by a moral value. For us to grasp the moral value is for us to be gripped by it. The ideal moral value, the ideational-imaginal moral value, has some agency on our psyche—just as we speak about with images. They have autonomy and agency. That's one of the elements, isn't it?

This being gripped by a value, by the angelic quality of a value, by its autonomy and its independence—this being gripped by is the crucial thing for effecting change. Perhaps the strength of that grip and the number of people who are gripped in that way is significant in terms of developing a current, a wave, a momentum for political or social change.

Again, we relate this to the elements of the imaginal when we speak about autonomy of image and of self. We never lose our own autonomy, and I think it's important to realize we can grasp a moral value. It grips us, but there's still an element where we remain free to choose in that direction or not, to be in service to that moral value or not.

Is it the case that there is no free will here? That the moral value utterly determines my will and I have no choice but to realize it? Or do I retain some autonomy, some freedom of will? This is a related question, a whole question of freedom of will. But we can begin to sense more and more this autonomy and agency of the imaginal as potential.

All this, again, is part of the enriching and deepening, dimensionalizing and divinizing of our sense and concept of this ideational imaginal, of the moral values.

It's interesting to consider: is it the case that the higher values and virtues, the ones that are more redolent of divinity, are in a way more easily disturbed? They're weaker. Hartman would say they're weaker—they're higher, but they're weaker. They're less popular, less commonly realized. But at the same time, they also seem to be the ones that elicit the most profound dedication and sacrifice in the relatively fewer people who are devoted to their actualization. Those values that seem more noble, more divine, give rise to the most profound dedication and sacrifice in those who are sensitive to them. Could this fact be significant when we speak of potential systemic or political change, social change?

Think about figures like Martin Luther King, Gandhi, and Mandela—three almost iconic figures, completely devoted to justice, or at least a huge part of what they did was this devotion to justice. They were powerfully influential figures. But I wonder whether they had something about their person as well, about their own ethos. They were rarely explicit about it or trumpeted it, but it was there. Something of their ethos had something of the spiritual and the holy and the noble in it. They had what Hartman calls radiant virtue—this radiancy of being that bestows a spiritual light on those around one.

Did they exude or transmit or communicate in their being and in their rhetoric something more than merely the values of justice? They're talking about justice, they're working for justice, but there's something else going on here. In contrast, there are other situations where there's a need for social justice, other social justice movements where the higher imagination, the sense of higher values, has somehow not been ignited. That higher imagination, the imaginal, hasn't been captured there.

Many issues contribute to this predicament, partly because they might lack a person who, in their being and in their speaking, communicates that, exudes that radiant virtue. But is it possible that with the values, when there's a sense of more divinity, there's a deeper and fuller, more intense devotion to and dedication and willingness to sacrifice for those values?

This can come through the value itself, or it can come through a person who, in a way, is a channel—whose being, as we discussed when we spoke about the self, is a refraction of a daemon that embodies that value, or a reflection of that. They're refracting an angel, or they're refracting an idea, an ideal, in this sense that we may know.

With the sense of divinity somehow present around that issue, it becomes part of what people are actually dedicated to. It's more than just the plain issue of, say, social justice, in whatever context it is. It includes that, of course. It never removes itself from that and completely transcends that.

But it has other dimensions because other, even higher values are wrapped up in it, exerting an attraction on the soul and a loyalty in the soul that is sensitive to them—devotion, dedication.

So with all this dimensionality, this sense of divinity opening up in regard to values, there is also the possibility of the sense of divinity in the values themselves being opened up. And then that has an effect, again, on choices, on stances, on sensibilities, on capacities.

This dimensionality is actually, in certain ways, part of different teachings and different cosmologies. There are some Islamic cosmologies that present a kind of three-tier picture of the universe, if you like. I want to read you a passage from Henri Corbin, who is writing about the works of a Shiite philosopher, Qadi Sa'eed Qummi, but it describes a certain cosmology. What he's describing is actually quite a common cosmology, again, coming out of the original Platonic ideas and Platonic maps and notions and cosmologies and through the Neoplatonic and into Christianity and Islam and Judaism and all kinds of other philosophies.

He says there are three categories of universe. First, there's the phenomenal world, a realm where things are perceptible to the senses. So that's the world that everyone would agree on. But then there is the supersensible world, the world of the soul or angel souls, commonly designated malakut, the place of the mundus imaginalis, the world of the imaginal, whose organ of perception is cognitive imagination. And then thirdly, there is the intelligible world of the pure intelligences or angel intelligences, whose organ of perception is the intuitive intellect.

That three-tiered cosmology was, as I said, very, very common. The second two tiers are alien to our normal, dominant Western outlook. The second of those—the world of the soul or angel souls, the place of the mundus imaginalis—is, of course, one way of framing what we've been talking about a lot with the soul-making teachings. And now when we talk about the ideational imaginal, one way we can think about it is as corresponding to this third tier, this third level of cosmology.

It's such a strange concept and language, it almost doesn't resonate for most people, I would imagine, in the modern Western world: the intelligible world of the pure intelligences or angel intelligences, whose organ of perception is the intuitive intellect. So our intuitive intellect can perceive these ideas, these ideals, this ideational imaginal. And these intelligences or angel intelligences that exist there are also said to be—and they are unified with their object of intellection.

This is all strange language. What it means is that the angel or the intelligence, the mind, if you like, the consciousness in that realm is united with its object. And so, for example, the intelligence that knows and meditates on in that realm, let's say, justice or kindness, is itself one with the kindness. There's a unity of subject and object postulated there.

Interestingly, I'll just read a bit more because I find it very interesting. Our philosopher—he means this Qadi Sa'eed Qummi—relates these three categories of universe to three categories of space and three of time. There is the obscure, dense time of the sensible world, so our usual sense of time. There is the subtle time of the imaginal world, of the malakut, of the mundus imaginalis, and then there is the even more subtle time, the absolutely subtle time of the world of the intelligence, the world of the ideational imaginal.

It's quite involved—he says a bit more—but all of them come from, all these worlds open up from the energy which is sometimes designated as nafas al-rahman, the breath of the merciful one. The breath of the merciful one, Allah, is what opens up and keeps in existence these levels of world. Sometimes it's called that, the breath of the most merciful; sometimes it's called the primordial cloud, amma.

And then he writes: Having established this initial schema, our philosopher is now in a position to conceive the reality of events and forms, which, while not ceasing to be events and forms, possess a time and a space that are in no way those of the sensible world to which we are accustomed exclusively to relate our notions of event and form.

In other words, we usually think of event and form as being in our world, and we say this happened on June the 14th at this time over there, and this form—I saw this form or this event happened or whatever. But with this scheme, there's then the possibility of events and forms that happen at other levels, in other times, in another time frame, if you like, another dimension of time, another kind of space than what we're used to in our sensible world.

So again, there's this dimensionalizing that doesn't—there's not just a duality between form and formless. There are different levels of formation.

Actually, I'll just read a bit more, because: There exists between these three categories of universe a certain number of essential relationships in that each higher universe is the cause of the one below it, and contains, in a manner more subtle and elevated, the totality of universes below it.

So, in some way, the mundus imaginalis contains and corresponds—has correspondences between the mundus imaginalis and our world, that everyone would agree on, the world of sensible physical phenomena.

Moreover, he continues, while thus containing and enveloping the totality of the universes below it, each higher universe is also the esoteric aspect, the hidden aspect of this totality, its hidden inner aspect or centre.

So the esoteric, hidden aspect of this world is the world of angels, of the imaginal. As we say, we look at this beautiful flower on my desk, and it's gorgeous in its form and color, etc., in its materiality, and it's also refracting, reflecting, echoing, mirroring, expressing, corresponding to something on another level in the mundus imaginalis, as is myself and yourself. Daemon refracted. We echo, mirror, refract, reflect, express, manifest something in the angelic realm. And the whole world is like that.

There's a complication here that I think is important, and I won't go into now in that —well, two things actually to say. One is that in the particular cosmology he's talking about, it's almost like each person has or creates their own universe. So the mundus imaginalis has this objectivity to it, and yet my mundus imaginalis is different than yours, and correspondingly with the others.

So there's a personal nature to this cosmology. It's almost as if different universes are opening up with each person at their center. And yet there's still an objectivity there. That's the first point.

The second point is that usually, or often, what goes with that kind of three-tier cosmology is a hierarchy. And some of the dangers we talked about and what that can do in terms of attitudes to the material phenomenal world. I'm not sure that danger is automatically implied or consequent, but it might be there or not there, even if there is postulated a hierarchy. In other words, the level of the ideas, the intelligences and the objects of intellection is higher than the mundus imaginalis, which is higher in hierarchy than the phenomenal, sensible, physical world.

Even if that hierarchy is there, it may or may not lead to denigration. It may actually increase the veneration, the devotion to the sense of beauty of the phenomenal physical world. By giving it that dimensionality, by giving it that rootedness, by giving it that beyondness and mystery, all that. Or it may not.

We're also free to entertain a conception that doesn't hierarchize, if that's a verb, doesn't place those three levels in any kind of hierarchy. So it's almost like we can regard—what we're trying to open up now is the ideational, imaginal—we regard that whole realm or sphere of ideas, ideals, as not necessarily higher than the world of images, the mundus imaginalis. We could regard them as non-hierarchical realms that open up for perception, for experience, or we can regard them hierarchically. That's part of our freedom of conception, freedom to entertain different conceptions.

But where there is soul-making in relation to values... where the soul-making dynamic, as I said, starts to open, starts to subsume and draw into its process the whole realm of the ideas, of values, and values as ideas, ideals. Where there's eros of values, something like these kinds of senses of the values, of the moral values as divine ideas. I use those words, as I said, interchangeably, as they have been in history.

Something like those senses, something like that will emerge out of the sense of dimensionalizing. Some kind of sense of their autonomy, some kind of sense of their agency, their pull, their demand, their call, our duty to them, etc. All that will open up. The possibilities are the particulars of the possibility, the way it opens up for each soul, or different times in practice, etc., in life. That might vary, but something like this, I think, will be inevitable once the values are caught up for us in the soul-making dynamic, once we have a soul-making and erotic relationship with them.

And then we can sense ourselves in our meditations, in our life, in our being, in our sensibility, in our acts and choices and stands as participating in that divine sphere realm of ideas. And in participate, we participate in this or that value. Like this or that moral value. And there's a nobility that comes with that. There's a grace and a privilege. It gives our life a sense of beauty, nobility, along with everything else.

Nobility is a word we may come back to because Nikolai Hartmann uses it in a particular way and that's not the way I'm using it right now. So we may come back to that, what he means by that, because it's quite interesting. But I mean more that the participation in values in this way, the sense of participation, comes with the soul-making participation being an element of the imaginal, an element also then of the ideational imaginal. And it brings with it, among other gifts, among other graces, a sense of nobility.

Noble is also a word, of course, that we have in the Dharma tradition. Noble truths and noble ones, etc. Arya is the Pali. And I don't know, there is some relationship between Arya and Aryan and somehow the peoples that traveled over to India, emigrated from India, from Iran. And perhaps it might have had some ethnic or even racist implications as they were purer or better, I don't know. And in our culture, in English, nobility also has a kind of class association with it. But I mean it more in its soul sense, in the nobility of a being, of a soul, of a disposition, of an ethos.

And to me that's very much part of the territory that opens up for us and the flavor of soul that opens up in our self-sense as we allow the soul and encourage the soul to engage with higher values, moral values in these ways.

I remember teaching quite a few years ago with a teacher, a colleague, and she was giving a talk and I was obviously there present. Some part of it, she started talking about this word noble, as in noble truths and noble ones, etc., that the Buddha used quite a lot in his teaching in the Pali Canon. And she said, "I just can't relate to that word." And she seemed quite embarrassed about it, or embarrassed even about talking about it, or imagining that it might be something that had anything to do with herself, or that she might grow into. I can't remember what the larger point she was making was.

But I was struck by that, because for me it's a very beautiful word. It captures quite well certain qualities of soul, and directions and alignments and devotions of soul and ethos. And I think where there is soul-making, it will bring a sense of nobility. And where there is this kind of soul-making relationship with the virtues and with moral values, with the ideation of moral values, it will bring that, inevitably. It will weave it in.

So all this asks quite a lot of us, as is often the case with soul-making teachings.

And as I mentioned earlier, there's often—not always, and the relationship is complex, so I don't want to oversimplify—but there's often a correlation between how entangled we are in the pain of the inner critic or anxiety about what others think of us. There's frequently an inverse relationship between the strength of this self-anxiety and inner criticism, and our capacity for virtue and for developing sensitivity to moral values, especially the more elevated ones.

I remember seeing a television advertisement for some car. Like most car commercials, it featured someone driving, presenting that person and their driving experience in an almost fantastical way—as if this particular car would transform you into someone wonderful, make your life extraordinary, allow you to experience yourself in this elevated manner simply through owning it. The soundtrack included the line "dance like no one is watching," which I believe was from a popular song.

The entire tenor and thrust of this advertisement centered around a woman driving alone, emphasizing themes of independence and freedom—freedom to be herself. The marketing strategy relied on the allure of individual self-expression, assuming that our attraction to this concept would, by association, create desire for the car itself.

But "dance like no one is watching" is actually about self-acceptance and relief from anxiety—specifically, relief from worrying about others' judgments. If the advertisement had presented this more truthfully, it would have acknowledged the real question: why do I care if someone's watching? It's because I'm concerned about their opinions, anxious about their judgments of me.

This self-anxiety is, at most, a lesser concern than authentic individual self-expression. The latter sounds more noble, appears to be a worthier value. But the advertisement was conflating these two very different things. This conflation reflects our problematic conception of and relationship with individuality—individuality as a diminished value in our broader society, precisely because we lack a deeper, richer understanding of what true individuality might be.

Wrapped up in our current understanding is social anxiety, the inner critic, the persistent concern: do they think I'm okay? What will others think of me? As I mentioned, there's a relationship between this anxiety over self-appearance and a diminished capacity for virtue. It's a reciprocal dynamic: the more self-anxiety and inner criticism we carry, the less we tend to care for virtues in their full breadth and height.

When the inner critic gains a strong grip, it can actually prevent ethical sensitivity from developing. But the reverse is equally true. When we begin cultivating this ideational, imaginal sense of values—when we develop a soul-making relationship with virtue, giving attention to these qualities so they can grow within our soul—the self-anxiety often diminishes naturally.

This happens partly because the self becomes subsumed into the soul-making process, and we begin to sense ourselves as image. Social self-anxiety is related to not sensing the self as image, to lacking a sense of dimensionality, divinity, archetypal or imaginal roots and origins to the self.

Catherine shared that Ruth King, an African-American Dharma teacher, had observed that many Westerners seem to have very little roots at all—virtually no sense of grounding. There are complex social and historical reasons for this phenomenon. She was speaking particularly about white people in the United States, though this might extend to Europe as well.

But there's the possibility of cultivating an entirely different kind of root system—roots in sensing oneself as connected to the divine, having imaginal origins and foundations. Without this deeper rooting, we have no anchor. We're blown about by every wind, desperately vulnerable and fragile in the face of others' opinions.

We live within a culture that promotes an impoverished, shrunken, narrow and shallow form of individuality. It has no roots, or very poor roots planted in depleted soil —flimsy, dry earth that cannot sustain genuine growth. But we can open up and deepen those roots, which gives us tremendous strength and capacity.

There's this reciprocal relationship where causality flows in both directions—an inverse correlation between care for ethics and self-anxiety. Part of what emerges from that strength, from that deeper rooting, from the involvement of values in the soul-making dynamic and the corresponding recognition of self as imaginal, is what allows us to experience what we might call healthy guilt, or what I prefer to term remorse. I use "remorse" to distinguish it from guilt, which, as I pointed out in earlier talks, is usually unhelpful.

Nikolai Hartman makes this point quite emphatically—that healthy guilt and remorse are actually necessary for our moral being. So again, let me share a passage where he articulates what's demanded of us in our relationship to values, in our exploration of morals, for cultivating a wide, deep, rich and beautiful relationship with moral being. He also illuminates what might grow from soul-making that includes and involves moral values.

He writes: "There is a will to responsibility, even to guilt, as regards one's own conduct. There is a repugnance to the presumption of exculpation, of being rid of guilt, as implying a repudiation of guilt. It is not as if one wanted guilt as such; one would be glad not to have it. But once we are laden with it, we cannot allow it to be taken away without denying our selfhood, our personhood. A guilty man has a right to carry his guilt."

He must refuse deliverance from without. To retain his guilt is valuable for him despite its oppressive load. It signifies for him the retention of his personality, of his personhood, the preservation and recognition of his freedom—his moral freedom, his freedom of will. With his guilt, he would lose a greater moral good: his manhood. In other words, if he lost his guilt in that way, if he just ignored it or zapped it, he would actually lose something else. He would lose his personhood.

"In taking upon himself his own deed and his guilt, in asserting his responsibility, in his sincere willingness to carry it, there is a moral pride in the free deed which speaks out. It is the majestic right to manhood"—let's say personhood. "It is the majestic right to personhood, the foundation upon which all moral being and non-being rest. To surrender it is moral meanness, betokening incapacity to be free."

He continues: "The presumption in washing away guilt, in discharging it, the admission of 'mitigating circumstances,' is at bottom a moral disenfranchisement and a degradation of the man."

So it's a strong teaching there. And again, it's difficult for us in our culture of inner critic and the pain that causes—the pandemic of that. It's difficult for us to recognize the place and the necessity, perhaps, of guilt or remorse. I admit that I acted poorly there, that I chose not in line with my highest aspirations.

He also makes the point that "a conflict of values inheres in the concept of guilt is not to be overlooked." Basically he's saying guilt is an interesting phenomenon, because "guilt is and remains a disvalue in man. No one, so long as he is guiltless, could wish for it. But the astonishing thing is that when a man has once burdened himself with it and bears it, it gains the character of a value which contradicts the value of innocence."

So there's something—no one would want guilt. It's a disvalue, something we don't want. But once it's there and we can open to it in this way—what I prefer to call remorse—once we accept it, hold it, work with it, and take on its lessons, are taught by it, it actually has the character of a value. We become more mature; our moral being grows through it.

So is there a necessity for the self, for the soul, for a certain kind of relationship with guilt or remorse? Might it also be a necessity in our relationship with such difficult and fundamental issues—issues that question our fundamental orientations, priorities, and perspectives on almost everything, but fundamentally on the world and on humanity's place in the world? Is there a necessity for remorse and guilt in our relationship with issues like climate change and species extinction?

Just as there is—and many people have pointed out—a necessity for grief. And some people, myself included, would say there's a necessity for anger, righteous indignation. Maybe there's a necessity for guilt.

I remember Catherine leading a guided meditation on one of our soul-making retreats. She had seven stages, I think. We had to choose something to become image for us—maybe it was on Sensing with Soul. Something in the world that we would then... She was guiding us through ways we could support the possibility of sensing that thing with soul. I chose an apple tree in my garden.

One of the stages she went through—I can't remember how she worded it—had to do with either asking forgiveness for or feeling remorse for how we have looked on that thing in the past without soul, and so not seen its holiness, not conceived of or sensed its divinity, its dimensionality. That particular strand at that point really touched me in what she was guiding us through.

Even with this apple tree, which I very much enjoyed and loved, I could feel pregnant in that stage my own and also humanity's impoverished, shrunken, narrowed, and shallowed relationship with nature, with the things of the world—and allowing my heart and my soul to be touched by it. It felt very beautiful, very important.

But in relation to issues like climate change and species extinction—massive, massive issues, fundamental issues in so many ways—might grief, anger, and also guilt, in the sense that Hartman is talking about, remorse, be part of healing? Part of allowing us greater strength, greater uprightness, greater capacity for courage, for action, and a greater capacity of heart to hold all this, the depths of emotions?

If we think about the actuality of our lives and their complexity, whether in a much wider social or global sense or just even in a personal sense, sometimes the structure of situations creates or presents to us choices between what basically, if we look at them in terms of values, are choices between different values. If I do this, I'm prioritizing and validating and choosing in line with this value, but I'm neglecting this one and transgressing, if you like, a commitment to that other value.

Opposing values present themselves to us and we have to choose. So it might be just in a very personal situation where it's a matter of truthfulness to a beloved one, but one knows that truth will hurt them. Notice I didn't say harm, which is one of the Buddha's stipulations about right speech—that it's not harmful. But hurt is not harm.

That a person might find this truth that I'm sharing or telling them about, or whatever, they might find that hurtful, may not be harming to them. It might just hurt. Life hurts sometimes. Truth hurts sometimes. But it might be that kind of choice. What's my loyalty to in that kind of situation? The truthfulness or the non-hurting? The kindness? The compassion?

There's not a formulaic answer to that. Each situation is different. Each situation is new, has a different subtle particularity and nuance to it.

Or it might be in a wider social situation. So, for example, with the Extinction Rebellion actions, they disrupt, to a certain extent, the business-as-usual functioning of at least portions of a city or society for a certain amount of time. It blocks traffic. Some people can't get to work. Some people are trying to go here or there. They're delayed. Or if you want to disrupt Heathrow's functioning in protest at the building of a third runway, it will disrupt and it will upset a lot of people.

And so one has an allegiance to a certain extent to not wanting to cause upset, not wanting to inconvenience. And on the other hand, one has an allegiance to the need for action and waking up with regards to climate change and species extinction. And so these two values are in opposition. And myself and some friends as well, when we were considering getting involved in Extinction Rebellion actions, this was part of what came up. Certainly it came up for me and I think for others as well. I'm not sure about upsetting people. I'm not sure is it ethical to do that? Let alone the possibility of a kind of backlash for upsetting people.

So there's no real escape from this in life, this fact that we will be culpable in one way or another in situations. Even when we're choosing a certain value, we are often culpable because there's another value in the situation that in choosing whatever we choose, we're neglecting the other one. So that happens often.

Let me read a passage by Hartman on that very point. So he's talking about this kind of thing, these kinds of situations: "It is inherent in the essence of such moral conflicts that in them value stands against value and that it is not possible to escape from them without being guilty."

Here it is not the values as such in their pure ideality which are in conflict. That's something we'll come back to. But he says, the conflict arises from the structure of the situation. This makes it impossible to satisfy both at the same time.

Important point, important for our moral maturity, also our moral intelligence. We have to realize this is the case. If I'm trying to wend a line, to travel a path where I'm guilt-free, maybe that's a pie-in-the-sky delusion. I will be confronted very often in life, in small ways and in large ways, with situations where I have to choose one thing over another. Not to choose is a sin, in Hartman's words. It's a withdrawing of my soul's engagement with life, with the sphere of morality. It's a refusal to participate in life, in values. It's a refusal to grow my soul.

But to engage and think I can be guilt-free is also just lacking in a kind of mature understanding of the nature of our life, the nature of samsara, if you like, the nature of moral situations.

So, it's asking quite a lot. We can be given quite a lot through the soul-making process and dynamic, as I said, as it starts to subsume and involve values, but this is asking quite a lot, as does all deep and wide practice, and certainly soul-making practices.

And is part of what's necessary also the kind of training in regard to our heart and our emotional capacity and our emotional awarenesses we put so much emphasis on in the Soul-Making Dharma? Is that also a kind of necessary prerequisite or at least part and parcel of our ethical training? So the ethos and emotional training are linked.

So as I said, our capacity to feel certain emotions and difficult emotions, like guilt, like grief, like anger. And sometimes, particularly with grief, it can be heartbreaking. Do I have, is the heart big enough? Have I made my heart big enough? Have I somehow opened the capacity of the heart that it can hold all that? Am I able to discern and disentangle the different strands of emotion that might arise as what feels like just an overwhelming and confusing emotional complex?

Can I see, oh, there's this emotion, there's that emotion. Can I just see, ah, there's a few different things in there. And can I focus on perhaps each one in turn as well as on the whole complex? Do I have clarity as well as capacity?

This development of emotional skill takes real dedication to cultivate. Do I have the ability to prioritize certain emotions, for example? Can I focus on my love for a particular value and prioritize that? Can I stay steady with this strand of emotion, dwelling in that deeper current of devotion and alignment, that love for this or that value, as we discussed earlier regarding guilt?

All these aspects of what we might call training of the heart—our emotional awareness and skills—may well be necessary prerequisites for our further growth in terms of our ethos, our relationship with ethics. And all this takes tremendous sensitivity.

The soul's sensitivity to values and virtues is something that, as Hartman noted, varies among individuals. Not everyone has equal sensitivity to moral values, to the range of values, or to certain higher values. But we can care for our soul's sensitivity to values and virtues. We can nourish it and seek to support its growth—its widening, deepening, and heightening.

Our sensitivity to values and virtues allows our participation in them to flourish. The degree of our soul's sensitivity is the degree to which our participation in them is supported. It begins with sensitivity—with the soul being stirred, feeling resonance and beauty. Through the natural eros present there, we are drawn into participation in these values.

This soul sensitivity to values and virtues, in their breadth, height, and depth, is itself a virtue. Sensitivity to virtues is itself a virtue. When we survey the world around us, we might notice that some sensitivities appear much rarer than others. The sensitivity to not killing, for instance—while there are many forms of killing in the world—represents a fairly common ethical sensitivity. Not stealing, similarly. But other sensitivities seem far more rare, much less commonly encountered.

Consider, for example, that moment in the Polly Higgins interview when something shifted in the flow of conversation—the perspective that valued the earth in and for itself, not merely as support for human survival and prosperity. That value in itself seems far rarer. Are there indeed higher and more rarely sensed values? I believe there are.

How much of this rarity regarding certain values and sensitivity to them results from historical conditioning and the partiality of moral vision in any culture? How much is trainable, and how much is innate to particular souls? These are fascinating questions to consider as we explore what it might mean to reopen avenues of moral education that seem to have vanished from our culture.

Caring for and valuing the ethical rights of the earth, of species, of ecosystems—this involves a different ontology altogether. In terms of ethics and ethical sensibility, this may be more rare and relatively unusual. Several factors may contribute to this rarity: the dilution of our perception, the dispersal of effects from our personal actions and choices within the vast web of others' choices, and the decline in recognizing virtue itself as important alongside efficacy in ethical life, especially when situations become complex or appear hopeless.

Related to this is the rarity of a metaphysics that supports recognizing the earth, an ecosystem, or a species as valuable in itself—over and above the sum of its individual members' suffering. Why do some people seem more aware, steadfast in their commitment, and attuned to certain moral principles than others?

I was struck by Greta Thunberg when I first read about her solitary vigil outside the Parliament building in Stockholm. Her lonely determination, her steadfastness, her will impressed me deeply. The article mentioned that she had Asperger's, placing her on what's called the autistic spectrum. This led me to wonder about something: one characteristic of Asperger's, as I understand it, is that someone with this condition may not be as relationally empathic or sensitive, not as attuned to or impacted by what another person is feeling or expressing through facial expressions, gestures, or emotional tone. They don't pick up on these social cues as readily or feel such sensitivity to them.

Setting aside the pathological implications of the term "Asperger's," someone who leans more toward principles and abstractions might, in the absence of such pulls from others' opinions and emotional cues, be able to remain more steadfast and clear. They can keep their sight fixed on principles and what might seem like abstractions—virtues and values—that exert a felt demand of duty stronger than the emotions of people directly in front of them, who might be angry about blocked traffic or upset by challenging statements about what humanity needs to renounce.

For most people without Asperger's, while there remains some sensitivity to the impact and demands of abstract principles like values, they are more impacted by, sensitive to, and swayed by other persons' emotions. They feel more empathy toward other people. This suggests that for some individuals, the path into soul-making with regard to values—this whole approach to ethics—may lead more naturally through relationship with an imaginal figure who is a person. Through this relationship, they implicitly connect with the values embodied by that figure.

Remember that values constitute an element of the imaginal. This way into soul-making—through an imaginal figure with its implicit or explicit values—may prove more powerful in affecting moral allegiances, choices, and behavior in actual life.

So there may be differences among people in whether one gravitates more easily toward principles, ideas, ideals, values, and virtues, or toward people—imaginal or actual. This difference may have implications for the possibilities and particular path of moral training and moral development.

Consider how much of Jesus's moral power and influence comes from the stories in the Gospels rather than from Christian dogmatics or theology. There's something deeply touching in the personhood revealed through those stories of Jesus, which for many people carries the moral power and influence of the Christian message.

But there exists this possibility for everyone—though perhaps with personal predispositions—that relationship with what may seem to others like abstractions—values, virtues, beauty, ideals—can be genuinely soul-making, as we've been exploring.

Is there, then, a kind of pull in opposite directions between ethical ideas on one hand and relational empathy on the other, between principles and personal sensitivities? It's not simple, of course. One could imagine someone with very little empathy for persons yet maintaining allegiance to some principle or order. This still needs directing in the right way.

But for most people, there's probably this double possibility—both through the imaginal and through the ideational imaginal. As part of the complexity of our moral life, there's often a call, a tug from both directions. So there emerges a kind of fluid and sensitive balance, a conversation of allegiances to principles and to immediate empathy.

Consider again the example of participating in an Extinction Rebellion action while people around you grow upset. Maybe both these capacities—principled commitment and empathic sensitivity—are part of a good life, a beautiful life. They're both virtues.

Obviously, if we were completely without empathy or sensitivity to others, to whoever stands before us and how they're feeling, that would not be virtue but dis-virtue. But this possibility to widen, extend, and heighten our sensitivity to values, to grow in our relationship with moral values by deepening our commitment and prioritizing of them—this is both possible and deeply beautiful.

Let me read another passage where Hartman describes a kind of maturity and depth of relationship with moral values. He writes about the wise person:

"To the wise man, the domination of values in their ideality—the domination, in Platonic phrase, of moral ideas—is something natural. In this sense, Plato was right when he joined this virtue to the beholding of ideas, and indeed in such a way that a man returning from the vision of ideas sees in their light everything which appears to him in life. The wise man carries into all the relations of life the standards of value which he possesses in his spiritual taste."

So you meditate, you have that direct encounter with what might seem an abstract notion—this ideational, imaginal moral value. One carries that back into life where it colors and shapes our perspective, our perceptions of our lives and relationships. It orients us.

"He saturates his outlook upon life with them. This domination of values does not come to him by way of reflection or through knowledge of commandments, but is an immediate, intuitive, emotionally-toned domination, which from the centre of moral perception penetrates all unobserved and impulsive excitations, and is therefore already alive in them."

There's something very beautiful in this description. It's not something we arrive at through logical deduction. We're not simply obeying commandments or following the five precepts. Rather, there's something immediate, intuitive, emotionally toned. Something in our heart and soul is touched, comes into contact with the ideational imaginal of a moral value. This spreads out into our life, our sensibility, our perceptions, our choices and actions.

With all these possibilities and relationships, Hartman writes something crucial: "Man, as the product of conditions, is neither good nor bad, however much disposition, upbringing and milieu may smooth or make difficult the way to moral goodness. He can only become one or the other, become good or bad, insofar as he enters the conflicts of life and makes decisions in their midst."

And then there's a third possibility, which is meditation on these ideas or ideals that we've been discussing directly - not through an imaginal figure first, but approaching them straight on. We can take the idea of justice, or compassion, or courage, or beauty, or truth, and work with these directly as meditation objects.

This requires a different kind of approach than we might typically think of when we consider meditation. We're not working with the breath, or with a visual form, but with something more subtle - with the very essence of a moral quality or value. Yet this can be profoundly nourishing and transformative for the soul.

We begin by bringing the concept to mind - let's say justice. But we're not approaching this intellectually, analytically, trying to define it or think about it. Rather, we're opening to it imaginally, allowing ourselves to sense into what justice feels like, what its essence is. We might sense into its qualities - perhaps there's something of equilibrium, of rightness, of restoration, of fierce clarity.

As we open to this ideational imaginal object, we can feel our whole being - heart, body, energy body, soul - beginning to resonate with this quality. We might feel our posture naturally adjusting, our breath changing, our energy reorganizing itself in relationship to this value. There's something happening at the level of being, not just thinking.

And as with the other forms of meditation we've explored, eros can arise - a deep love for this value, a longing to embody it more fully, to serve it, to let it shape our life more completely. This eros then becomes part of what feeds and sustains the meditation, creating what we might call a virtuous circle of aspiration and realization.

Through this kind of practice, these moral values begin to work on us, to shape us, to become part of the fabric of our being. They're no longer abstract concepts but living realities that inform our perception, our choices, our way of being in the world. This is how we participate in that "building of moral being" that Hartman spoke of - not through mere intellectual understanding, but through this deeper soul-work of imaginally engaging with the highest human values.

Actually, a sense of justice, or the idea of justice, or beauty—if we say that. Okay, it's not strictly a moral value, but it almost is for me. But anyway, one can get a sense of, in meditating on that, get a sense of that idea.

I'll come back to that in a second, but in any of these ways—any of those three ways—in meditation, in just being sensitive to, in developing and allowing our sensitivity to, our allowing ourselves to be touched by these values, in feeling our devotion to these values, and in the choices of our actions, of our speech, of our thought, of what we cultivate—all of that, the meditation, the sensitivity, the feeling of our devotion, our actions, our choices, all of that feeds our virtue. It grows the virtues in our soul and grows our soul. It's part of our soul-making. And it starts to seep out, to extend to our whole life.

And in all of those ways—the meditation, the sensitivity, the devotion, the feeling of the devotion to the choices, the cultivation—it's possible to sense or conceive the self and the soul, as I said, as participating in that. If we use that phrase from the Korban passage, the angel or intelligence whose object of intellection is one with it. We sense ourselves participating in these divine ideas—the divine, ideational, imaginal of the values. And there's a privilege, a grace, a beauty in that, a strength, there's meaningfulness in that. We can actually sense it and we can conceive it, this kind of participation in that level of being.

In the third possibility, just in that little list there, so it's possible to take an idea—it might be a certain kind of, as I said, it might be justice, it might be beauty, it might be a certain kind of love. So we may come back to one of the kind of loves that Hartman talks about: love of the remote, love of those in the distant future and the noble soul. One can orient towards that kind of love, or the idea of that kind of love.

And, you know, it might start with reflecting on how I am with that in my life, and sensing my life, and sensing perhaps, maybe I do orient that way, or I don't, and what would open that up, what would make that beautiful for me? Or as I said, I see it in my life, I sense, I'm already touched by that value. I'm already devoted to that value. I can see it in the kinds of choices and sacrifices I make. So again, allowing oneself one's story into it, and then it can kind of crystallize down to the purer idea, the purer ideal. And that can become a meditation object, and we can become kind of absorbed in that sense.

So I'm not talking about a lot of thinking at this point. It's really a kind of a space with the essence of this ideational-imaginal in it.

But in that process, in that meditative process that's possible there, it's, again, at some point it will be inevitable that we will notice, just as in meditation on an imaginal figure, an imaginal other, that self and the world become involved, become implicated, become infected in that meditation, in that opening up of the soul-making sense. So that there starts to be a corresponding sense or image, sense of the self and of the world that is part of the larger picture, larger dynamic, larger actuality of meditating on that ideational, imaginal object.

And the same principles of meditation apply. Here's that beloved other. In this case, it's an idea—moral value, as idea, as essence. But as we meditate, as we meditate and get absorbed in it and feel it with our whole energy body, etc., and that sensitivity and the attunement, the resonances, we start to notice, we will at some point start to notice that self and world are also become caught up. The soul-making sense expands to our sense of self and world. And that's actually, again, part of the deepening and the stabilizing of that kind of meditation.

And there may be, if you do pursue this kind of thing, there may be too, at certain points, a kind of quantum leap. So at first, as I said, it might start—one's actually sort of kind of reflecting on that value or kind of just holding it a little bit in mind and there's thoughts around and then maybe, as I said, a sense of one's life and what the status of one's relationship and orientation is with regard to that ideal.

But as one practices with it, it might then take a kind of quantum leap to another level where there's a sense of another realm. One really feels, "Oh, I'm in another realm here." There's a kind of beatitude there. The pure essence of the idea. And that kind of quantum leap—may or may not, it might be gradual—but there's the possibility of a quantum leap and the possibility of, let's say there's a gradation of possibility in this kind of meditation.

So sometimes you get these quantum leaps in a kind of jhanic meditation, suddenly—I mean really, now I'm in the third jhana, it's really a different realm. It really feels I'm in a different realm here. And so something similar may happen. We enter the sphere, the realm of ideal being, the realm of the ideational, imaginal. And in that, as I said, there is great beauty. There is a beatitude.

So those are possibilities to explore, and certainly in meditation, but also in the wider range of what I've been saying here. So if you want, you can explore that. Perhaps some of you will even develop these ideas and these possibilities and these connections more than I have as time goes on.

Again, with soul-making, there's the opening, the complexifying, the enriching, the extension of the reach, the drawing in of more and more areas of our being, of existence, of our lives, the creation and discovery of different, more and more erotic objects for us, erotic others. And so endless possibilities. That goes with the soul-making dynamic.

So that's here, and it can open out, and perhaps, as I said, some of you will also get likewise interested in this as a certain kind of area of potential opening and exploration for soul-making.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 193

Rob Burbea · 1h08

> In this sixth installment of his series on ethics and soul-making, Rob Burbea delves into the fundamental question of moral ontology: do ethical values exist objectively or are they merely cultural constructs? Drawing on philosopher Nikolai Hartmann's assertion that moral values exist as objective realities in an ideal realm - similar to mathematical truths like pi or the square root of negative numbers - Burbea explores how we might approach ethics with greater philosophical sophistication.
> The talk examines the relationship between free will and moral responsibility, noting that without some notion of free will, the entire foundation of ethics collapses. Burbea discusses how practitioners can work skillfully with guilt - sometimes opening it through seeing conditions, other times maintaining a sense of responsibility that serves moral development. He introduces Hartmann's conception of 'the good' as always choosing the higher value in any given situation, while acknowledging the complex value conflicts we inevitably encounter.
> A key insight emerges around the complexity of individual virtues: even classical virtues like self-control (sophrosone) or gentleness (praotes) require counterweights to remain healthy. Altruism without healthy self-regard becomes tyrannical; loyalty without justice becomes blind. This points toward virtue as synthesis rather than singular qualities, suggesting an ultimate unity of values that remains tantalizingly beyond complete rational comprehension yet available to contemplative insight.

I'd like to discuss some of the complexities involved in the whole arena of moral values and that kind of consideration of ethics, along with some values and areas that are often not brought to light or talked about. But before getting onto that, let's rummage around just a little bit more in our consideration of the ontology of all of this, partly recapping what we've already said, probably adding a little bit that's new, before moving on.

Reflecting just now, it may be obvious at this point—I don't feel like I have any answers to all these questions that arise in this area. Certainly not any easy answers. And at this point, I'm not sure even how much I'm adding that's original to what's already out there. But as I said, I do want to perhaps shed some light or open up certain areas that are often less considered when we think about ethics or we approach our moral life. And perhaps someone else or others will pick up some of these threads, some of this material, and take it forward, develop it at some point.

Let me begin again with a little recap about the ontology. With the heritage of modernity and postmodernity, many people—perhaps most people in contemporary culture—have either a conscious position or an aspect of their position vis-à-vis ethics that moral values are subjective. They're contingent; they depend on and arise out of culture, place, and the conditions of history here or there. That would be the dominant view, or at least a significant factor, a significant strand of most people's views nowadays.

I do wonder sometimes, though, if one has a long-standing Dharma practice and has heard lots of teachings where moral values and ethics are not seen as culturally contingent so much—what happens in the psyche there between the pull of the contemporary view of modernity toward regarding them as subjective and contingent, and the Dharma view of laws of the cosmos and of the psyche? What happens to a Dharma practitioner in the contemporary world inwardly in regard to all this?

In contrast to that contemporary view, Nikolai Hartmann asserts and posits that moral values are objective. He certainly admits that historically, in different places, at different times, in different cultures, and also in different persons, the range of values—of what he calls the moral firmament, the whole edifice or structure of the totality of values—that range is limited in the consciousness, in the moral consciousness of a certain culture or a certain person at any time. And that is limited and contingent depending on the culture. But just because our torch beam shines only on a small portion of that firmament at any time, it doesn't actually mean that the firmament itself is subjective. That's his position, and to me it's a very interesting position.

What he offers as proof—the fact of guilt, the fact of an intuitive sense of ethics—to me I'm not sure that they constitute enough evidence to be called proof, strictly speaking. But that's his position, and it's certainly tenable and valid and interesting and powerful.

He also, interestingly, talks about not just the objectivity of values, but the objectivity of the hierarchy of values. So here's the collection of values—these are objective—but also their absolute scale, their arrangement on a hierarchy he would regard as objective.

Let me read a passage where he says that: "Thus much can be said for certain. The rudiments of an absolute scale of values, or this hierarchy of values—which is a higher value, which is a lower value, and where they stand on this sort of ladder—the rudiments of an absolute scale of values are contained in all moral feeling for values. It is clear, even to a very primitive moral sense, that honourableness takes precedence over outward advantage—that honourableness is the higher value than outward advantage. That doing one's duty goes before pleasure." So certainly outward advantage and pleasure have value, but honourableness and doing one's duty have higher value. "The same holds good as a whole of the more obvious gradations in the scale, for instance, in the general preference for moral worth before goods values." In other words, getting rich is not as high on the scale as acting morally, choosing morally.

"In any case," he continues, "so far as a feeling for the values themselves reaches, a sense of their relative importance usually accompanies it." In other words, intuitively we actually have this feeling of the relative importance of values. "The closer the values are in grade—the closer they are in that hierarchy—the less clearly can we discern the order of their preference. Thus the inner situation approaches a conflict of values which actually exists objectively only where values of equal rank stand against each other." So we'll come back to that last point.

And he talks about, in his words, "an astonishing infallibility, a strength of conviction in the sense of relative grade," or intuitive sense of where things stand on this hierarchy, "is enough to justify the old belief in a moral organ"—someone called Hemsterhuis coined the phrase—"an order of the heart, from Pascal, or a logic of the heart, as Scheler said." So these philosophers are talking about the organ, the instrument of moral sense in a human being.

"It is a unique kind of order with its own laws which cannot be proved intellectually, but which equally scorns every intellectual argument brought against it. This is well enough known in the phenomenon of conscience, as in the unerring imputation of guilt, in the sense of responsibility and in the consciousness of guilt, but no less in the infallibility of the prohibitive shrinking from a deed beforehand."

"Certainly this sense of grade varies," he continues, "both in scope and in discrimination, exactly as does the sense of each value. There is also such a thing as blindness to the rank of value, just as there is blindness to material things. And there is perhaps even a perverted or a quite dead valuation of sense. But this is no objection to the certainty and real a priori of the sense of rank, where and insofar as it is present. Exactly the same is true of all genuine a priori"—for example, mathematical truths are a priori truths.

Its universal validity is independent of how many people have the insight. Even if only one person—or no one—actually possesses it, the fact remains that whoever is capable of such insight necessarily has it just as it is in itself and not otherwise.

So there is, according to Hartmann, the objective nature and truth of values, and also their hierarchy. What he offers as proof seems very suggestive to me, pointing toward the objective existence of this hierarchy. But strictly speaking, from a logical standpoint, it doesn't really constitute proof in my mind. The fact of guilt and conscience, the sense of responsibility and consciousness of guilt, the shrinking from doing what we think is wrong beforehand—these constitute important evidence, but fall somewhat short of definitive proof.

If we want to lean more toward the idea of cultural contingency and relativity of values—as many contemporary people do, especially in the wake of postmodern philosophy—we encounter a different problem: Where do we find someone or some group of people who don't have culture? What we witness, what we encounter, are always cultures. We come across nothing else. We encounter ethical or unethical behavior always within the context of human cultures.

As Alasdair MacIntyre points out, human being qua animal—that is, considered purely as animal—prior to or without any particular culture, is a myth. This is myth in the poor sense of the word, in the worst sense. Sometimes people hold this myth of wanting to reduce their understanding of human being to the animality of humanity, as if that were more basic, more true, more real than any cultural accretions or distortions or influences. But that's a myth in the sense that it draws life from a proposition for which there is no evidence. It's not possible to actually encounter such a being.

MacIntyre continues: "Our biological nature certainly places constraints on all cultural possibility. But man who has nothing but a biological nature is a creature of whom we know nothing. It is only man with practical intelligence"—and that, as we have seen, is intelligence informed by virtues, in this case virtues embedded in culture as part of how he defines them—"it's intelligence informed by virtues whom we actively meet in history."

So the proof from the other side—that moral values are only culturally conditioned—is also an impossibility.

But we also spoke briefly about mathematics as a possibly similar set of ontological structures that can exist in ideal form, in the realm of ideas, and that moral values might have a similar ontological status. We discussed the mathematical number pi, an irrational number that can never be precisely instantiated in the world of physical actuality. And the number i, the imaginary square root of negative one—an imaginary, abstract mathematical construct. These manifest, as does pi, indirectly and very cogently in the way they shape and form manifest physical actuality, but we don't actually encounter them directly.

The same applies to a whole host of other mathematical laws, equations, entities—and also to the quantum Schrödinger wave function, a fluid abstract mathematical entity existing in abstract multidimensional mathematical space that bears a very close relationship with what actually manifests at a certain time and in a certain space. But in itself, we can't even really wrap our usual discursive minds around what it actually is, where it might exist, and what exactly constitutes its ontological reality.

So moral values may have a similar ideal existence—an existence in the realm of ideal forms or ideas. Again, this isn't conclusive, but the fact of the demand for some kind of ontological positioning or categorization of things like mathematical laws and mathematical entities—the fact that most people who reflect on these things feel some need to give them a different reality status than the usual things of physical actuality—opens the door to possibility and legitimacy in other realms too.

There are similarities in the area of logical rules, and possibly also in the realm of moral values as ideal realities. There are differences, which we've talked about briefly, but this doesn't constitute proof so much as it opens a window of possibility, a window of potential legitimization.

In regard to soul-making practice, we have this principle carved out through hard work, careful consideration, and meditative exploration: we can move flexibly, fluidly, agilely, and carefully—with deep attunement and practical significance—between different logoi, different conceptions. In this case, we can move between different ontological frameworks regarding the realm of moral values.

So at times we can lean into entertaining that logos, that conception of moral values having their own kind of real existence in the realm of ideal forms, ideal essences—the sphere of ideas. We can entertain this, place that conception in the soul, in consciousness, for a period of time, for a period of practice, and see what happens. See what unfolds in our meditation, in our outlook on life, in our perspective on different situations, in our sense of our existence and our journey.

Certainly there is the meditative possibility of meditating on these ideal forms—meditating on a certain moral value at the level of an ideal form, in the realm of ideas. When we engage in that meditation and explore that possibility, we're not talking about meditating on a rational definition. We're not defining kindness as this or justice as that, then meditating on that rational definition or mulling it over. That might have its place—logically arriving at a rational definition can be helpful for some people—but we're really talking about something that goes beyond discursive thought.

That process of pondering logically and rationally and arriving at a rational definition may have its place, but it can never capture the idea in its fullness, in its transcendent essence—for various reasons, some of which I'll explore more as we continue.

Yet it might have its place.

Nor is that kind of meditation—meditation on an idea—really meditation on an instance, on a particular instance of justice that we may have read about, remembered, or imagined. Again, and perhaps even more so than with rational definitions or pondering, an instance—the memory of an instance, the imagination of an instance, the hearing or reading about an instance of justice or kindness or whatever value we're contemplating, whether faithfulness, loyalty, truthfulness—the instance could serve as an entry point to these more transcendent realms, transcendent of the instance, of the particulars of any given instance, this or that particular instantiation of beauty, this or that manifestation of justice.

So an instance could, in meditation, be a starting point and entry point, a springboard if you like, to this other level of the essence of the ideational. But I also want to say that I don't subscribe to the view that the ideational imaginable—as I've mentioned before—or the realm of ideas is necessarily a better kind of meditation or level of meditation than meditation on an instance or an image. We don't have to subscribe to the hierarchy that existed in the metaphysics and cosmology of ancient and medieval times, between the world of physical actuality, the imaginal actuality, and then the higher level of ideational existences, the realm of ideas.

We could, at times, move into that understanding, or some people may subscribe to that hierarchy. Of course, everyone's free to do that. But there's no a priori reason why we have to subscribe to that hierarchy of idea over image. Both can be available as ways in, as important resonances and meditations with regard to our ethical life, and also just with regard to our soul. Both may be helpful in building our moral being, as Hartman says, and in soul-making.

There's also one other reflection—again, one we've touched on before—the possible idea, the possible logos and concept that the very shifting of cultural emphases and perspectives and the shift of the scope, the range of each culture's beam of light, their torchlight within the whole range of values in the vast firmament, that this very shifting could be seen as, could be conceived as part of the world soul's soul-making. It's a movement of soul that's much bigger than an individual and that moves through history, in history, with history, is history.

And in a way, as it shifts—these cultural emphases and perspectives and their scopes, their individual ranges—what gets expressed is what can't be expressed or made manifest all at once. It is actually impossible, just as in some of those mathematical analogies—it's impossible to capture or to manifest and express at the same time, all at once, the whole range of values. It's impossible to live them out. It's impossible even, perhaps, to see them all and hold them all in consciousness at once. Perhaps we'll come back to that later.

But that's an idea that then takes in the notion of cultural relativity and contingency, but casts it in a different light, gives it a different basis, even in conception.

And in this old debate between subjectivity and objectivity—does the mind create the values, or are they objective and the mind just receives them, witnesses them, notices them?—again, there is another level that's possible to us in our sense of it, in our conception of it, which has a non-separation between soul and world, between soul and its objects, its beloved objects, between soul and, in this case, moral values. They are not really separate. They participate in each other. And that's part of the sacredness and mystery.

So the whole dichotomy between subject and object has some mysterious, more mysterious kind of transcendence or synthesis, coincidence of the elements of that dichotomy at another level. And we can, again, get a taste of that in our practice, in our sense of soul-making, and we can entertain it as an idea.

Also in regard to ontology and this whole question of what is real, what is true, we need to consider the whole question of free will versus determinism. This is obviously a really important question. Without a notion of free will, the whole subject of morality just goes away. It has nothing to stand on. We can't talk about morality and what's ethical and what isn't if everything is determined.

If everything is determined—whether physically, because we do this because we're programmed or hardwired that way from biological evolution, or because we trace it to the way neurons work, or whatever physiological impulses, or social determinism, where these conditions in the society, in the culture, in the upbringing caused this act to ensue—and there's no room then for anything but that determinism, if that's the case and there's no space for free will, the notion of free will, then the whole contemplation of something called morality just has nothing to stand on. There's no basis for it.

So this is really quite interesting, and again, we have this question: which is real, which is true?

We can have, again as Hartman outlines—and we've touched on this a couple of times at different points—this whole area about guilt. And we can obviously have two views regarding guilt. We've explained how Hartman is, in a way, a sort of champion of guilt. He won't give it up as something important to our moral growth, our moral being, to our soul. It's wrapped up with our sense of personhood and autonomy. And it's a corollary of free will. If I have free will and I chose something morally questionable, then I am culpable and I have guilt in relation to that. So that's one view, as Hartman outlines it and we've mentioned a couple of times.

The other leaning here would be just to open things up and see more in terms of conditions. And there's an assuaging of guilt there and the dissolving of suffering where there has been this tight grip of guilt and the kind of self-contraction and self-obsession that often goes with that, and the contraction and spinning only around a view of the past, kind of stuck in a whirlpool, a vortex, looking at the past, looking at the self. It's all very contracted. Nothing can come—just like in a whirlpool, it's almost like nothing can come out of that whirlpool at its worst.

And so I've talked and written about working with that kind of contraction of guilt in other chapters, and seeing the freeze and unending blame in other places and talks. It's really skillful, really helpful to be able to open out and see in terms of conditions and less in terms of self. But actually both are important.

And there's a way of opening the guilt out when it's just gotten too problematic. It's actually not helpful at all. It's not doing what Hartman thinks, or what Hartman claims—I think helpfully—that it can. It's not helpful.

It's unhealthy guilt. It's doing nothing helpful in terms of our orientation and our attitude towards future behavior. It's completely wrapped up in looking at the past. It's not serving our moving forward in a richer, deeper, more ethically upright, more sensitive, more careful and attuned orientation to the future and future choices and our future taking responsibility.

So actually both are possible. There is a way that we can—we need to think in terms of self. The Buddhists go on and on about no-self, but actually self is important. And even if you read carefully the Buddhist passages, there's lots of teachings that have to do with self, that rest on self-view. And there are the teachings of hiri and ottapa—shame, in terms of what others think of us, and in terms of our conscience. There are teachings around self and plenty of other teachings that have to do with self.

So we can't throw the baby out with the bathwater and lose a sense of responsibility. And for that it's the self that needs to be responsible. So do I buy into that as an ultimate truth? No. It's a certain truth that I can move into and out of, and sometimes it's really helpful. And at the same time, or at different times, I can see less in terms of self, or in terms of not-self, or just in terms of conditions.

So there's the kind of balancing of them, but there's also, even more skillfully and helpfully, the teaching that we can move flexibly between these two views. Sometimes I can look, and it's important to look, in terms of self. I was talking with someone the other day—so many people practicing Buddha Dharma or other related traditions in Advaita—I think the whole movement is towards dissolving the self, dissolving the self-sense, and liberation is living in this dissolved self-sense.

And I would say, no, that's only a relative truth. Self is so thoroughly empty that we can pick it up again, knowing that it's empty, and we can put it down. We can be liberated to such an extent that self and the arising of self is not a problem. We don't have to be stuck in some kind of no-self view or trying to attain some kind of ongoing state of no-self. We're so free from self. We're so free in relationship to self that it can come up, it can arise, and we can put it down, both.

So extending that into its moral implications—responsibility and free will and the determination by conditions in the environment, in the history, in the upbringing, biological, and so forth. To only—even just reflect for a moment—to take only one of those positions: there is always free will and there's always responsibility, or everything is determined. To take only one of those, you can feel how brittle it is. And just a little bit of reflection—to me it just sounds silly. Either of those options just sounds silly. Really silly. Silly in that they don't really reflect truth, and silly in terms of what it then implies in terms of how we live and how we consider ourselves and how we judge and discern morally and consider other people.

So the flexibility of view again. And as always, why? Why this view now? Why that perspective at a different time? As I said, it might be sometimes that I'm so caught up in a tight whirlpool and vortex that's not constructive at all. It's just suffering, and I need to ease that suffering, I need to loosen something. So I adopt a certain view of, for instance, reflecting on conditions, and I can do that very carefully, as I've outlined elsewhere, develop skill that way. Or, at other times, I can feel, painful as it is, that I want to keep my sense of guilt and responsibility here. I want to look in terms of self. Because, as Hartman says, that's part of building my moral being. And it might serve soul-making.

So, as always, the question is, why? What's the intention? What am I trying to serve or support or open when I adopt one possible way of looking over another in the range of flexibility of ways of looking?

Let me read you one passage from Hartman because he says something that struck me as very interesting when I read it with regard to free will and this whole question and its ontology. So he writes: "Freedom"—so he's talking about free will—"freedom is the rising of initiative above the blind happenings of the world." So a human being can take an initiative and not just be determined by the kind of random or purposeless movement of atoms or wider social forces. "Freedom is the rising of initiative above the blind happenings of the world. As such, this is a value. It lifts a human being out of the connections of nature in which he is rooted. It allows him to tear himself away, to rise into the second realm."

He means the second realm ontologically. Lack of freedom is total determination from outside—the serfdom of a human being under the universal course of events.

This is the bit I found particularly interesting: "The profound struggle of human thought to attain a metaphysical proof of freedom of the will is a witness to its worth." In other words, so much intellectual energy has been expended throughout history trying to prove that human beings have free will. None have succeeded so far, but consider how much humanity has tried. And that effort, he suggests, is itself a witness to its worth.

"However desperate the problem may look—the problem of trying to prove that freedom of will exists—however violently all psychological theories deny it" (and he was probably thinking particularly of Freud, as he was writing around that time), "man cannot and dare not permit himself to be robbed of it. He struggles with all his might to retain his belief in it. He has even a deep consciousness that he is free."

So we feel somehow that we are free. "He feels that even if he be not free, he ought to be. For he ought to be a moral being, a person." So for Hartmann, personhood and moral being go together. Without moral being, we're not really persons. "The will to be unfree, or even to renounce without a struggle the consciousness of freedom, would be a renunciation of his selfhood."

So again, there's perhaps the impossibility of proof of that kind of metaphysical idea, that kind of anthropological idea that we have free will. But there's something in the fact of our humanity's struggle and striving to try and prove it—our wanting to retain that sense and that notion of free will. That itself tells us something. So again we see the distinction between orientations towards truth and reality and proof about truth and reality, and orientations that have more to do with soulmaking and what the soul needs. Of course they overlap.

But extending that a little bit, could we not say the same thing with respect to ideational forms—these ideas, for example, of independently existing moral values? There has been, I think, a failure to furnish proof of independently existing moral values, that they're not just culturally contingent. So far, there's been a failure, philosophically, throughout the history of humanity. But the failure doesn't prove that they don't exist. It just says, well, so far we haven't found conclusive proof.

Again, we could adopt a position of the viability of different logoi, different ideas and notions, different conceptual frameworks about ontology, and we can enter into different conceptions. For example, a conception of a realm of ideas, sphere of ideal existence—and we can also even entertain the idea of a moral absolute, which I'll come to later, some kind of synthesis of all moral values. I'll come back to that later. And so we can enter that and receive the perceptions that follow, that come out of such a conception.

And we can do that, as I say, flexibly, temporarily, lightly, experimentally. All that is available to us, I think, as human beings, as thinking beings, as meditators, as soulmakers.

One of the things Hartmann ponders—and it's partly a legacy from the history of philosophy—so he ponders, like all moral philosophers do, the nature of the good or the nature of goodness. And that phrase "the good," I think I mentioned earlier, is part of the heritage from Plato and perhaps even before: the good.

Surveying different moral philosophies over the course of history, he says oftentimes what different systems of morality do is they take one value, whatever it is depending on the system, and they say that is the highest good, that's the fundamental good, and then they try to derive other values from that or place them in relation to that.

So he writes: "All recognized moral systems speak of the good as of something known, but by it they always mean only one certain special value which they hold to be the only one and the highest. And according as they regard pleasure, happiness, collective unity, justice, love, and so on to be 'the good,' the various types of morality are distinguished." Even this diversity itself shows that in reality none of these values is the good.

Now, historically there was another solution to this which came from Plato, which is the idea of the good. So in the realm, in the sphere of ideal existence, there's a sort of absolute synthesis of all the values, and that is the good.

And so he writes about this: "But if, like Plato, one sets over against such limitations of content"—in other words, some specific views about this or that value being the good—"one sets over against that an idea of the good and places it above the virtues, even then one doesn't get a definition of its content." One still doesn't know what exactly that is—the good. It sounds so abstract. "The idea remains empty."

He mentions also Leibniz and a concept of perfection, and he says that comes perhaps a little nearer to this goal of what we're trying to get a sense of—the good. Again, remember we talked about pāramīs, and one of the translations of pāramīs, the Pali word, is perfections. And I pointed out that would be a problem, because in a way these virtues and values are not perfectible in instance and in physical actuality and manifestation.

But the idea of a perfection that's out of reach to manifestation, that can never itself be completely manifest, may work as a translation of pāramī. And he says it has something to do with what Leibniz is talking about.

So there is historically, I think, starting with Plato, this idea of the good. Over and above any virtues, there's the good, which isn't a virtue itself. It's this kind of mysterious, absolute synthesis of all virtue that is the origin or the pinnacle, and it exists at a different level.

Hartmann dismisses any kind of belief that we can think our way to some premature synthesis of what that might be—what such an absolute might be—through dialectical philosophical reasoning or whatever. He says that's a kind of pipe dream.

Whether or not there might be a sense of that in a more meditative consciousness is, to me, a different question.

At any rate, Hartman defines goodness and the good in a different way, which I found quite interesting. He writes: "In all morally positive conduct, there is found a trend not only towards values, but towards what is always the higher value." So that to him is the good. It's situational. There's a choice between different values, and what constitutes goodness, or constitutes an instantiation of goodness, is the choice and the preference and the alignment with, based on sensitivity to, what's the higher value.

So to choose something, for example, to choose my own comfort rather than my kindness to another, or convenience or pleasure rather than some kind of altruistic expression, or to choose my security at a certain level—whether it's financial or some kind of existential security—over truthfulness or justice, these would be examples of choosing what's lower: comfort, convenience, pleasure, a certain level of security over what's higher or more noble. That wouldn't constitute goodness.

But if I choose the altruistic, if I choose the higher, the more noble, if I choose justice, truthfulness over my comfort, my convenience, my pleasure, my security, then I'm choosing the higher value. There's a trend going towards the higher value. And that is goodness. So the good is that higher value in any situation, and goodness itself is my capacity to feel that and to orient towards that and to choose that.

Sometimes those kinds of choices are very simple, very obvious. It's clear in a certain situation what the different relative heights are, and there's nothing except our own fears and self-contraction that's preventing a manifestation of goodness, preventing this sensibility to orientation and choice of what's a higher value.

But actually in life, our free will meets and has to negotiate, has to choose between various kinds of value conflicts. So we come across situations that are complex, either in the structure of a situation, or actually there's something even deeper—there are conflicts between different values themselves.

We've given some examples of different situations where the setup of the situation means that I have to choose between an allegiance to this value over an allegiance to that value. And I might feel torn and have to accept the guilt that comes with choosing one and neglecting to choose, neglecting to support and give life to the other value. Some of those are really simple and kind of everyday encountered situations. But others are really quite profound and difficult.

I'm thinking, for instance, of Nelson Mandela and the risks that he took for the sake of justice—risking his life, certainly, when the sense was it was probable that he would lose his life, or certainly face a long, long time in prison. And risking that, along with his obligation to his family, his moral obligation to be there for his family, for his wife and his children. That's a moral value, as a father, as a husband. That value came into conflict with the claims of his conscience regarding justice and a wider sphere of love to encompass the non-white South Africans, not just his family.

Now, if the situation in South Africa at that time had been such that there were two democratic parties vying for office and one could simply stand in allegiance to justice—racial justice or ethnic justice, social justice—simply by walking to the polling station and casting a ballot, and one had a sense that the success of the party that wasn't trying to institutionalize racism was very possible, that would have been a very different situation. The situation then would not have presented an opposition, a choice between being a father, being there for my children as they grow up, supporting them with the livelihood that I earn, with love, with contact, and the wider set of virtues demanded by my conscience with regard to wider social justice.

So there was something very, very difficult and pressing—and that's an understatement—in the structure of that situation. But there are countless examples where our life presents us with situations where something in the structure brings these two values together and I have to choose between them, or several values, and I have to choose between them. And it's given by the situation. It's not inherently a problem in the values themselves.

But as we go into this—and this is one of the things I was trying to say—it's not often that the complexity of values is reflected upon so openly or carefully. This is one of the things that Hartman stresses, and I want to pick up on this a little bit. There's a complexity not just from situations that we encounter in our life, but also among and between values themselves and inner value itself. They are more complex than we might at first realize.

At some point Hartman, in his big tome on ethics, talks about some of the classical virtues—the virtues that, for example, Aristotle would write about. There are some Greek words here—you don't have to remember them, and I'm not even sure if I'm pronouncing them correctly, but the point is a more general one.

He writes: "In juxtaposition to sophrosyne stands akolasia and anaisthesia." He's talking about the virtue of sophrosyne, and he says that actually, you have to consider these other two disvalues as being important constituent elements, somehow, of this value of sophrosyne.

"Only in contrast to the former, to akolasia, is it properly self-controlled." So sophrosyne usually gets translated as self-control. He's saying that actually, it's only in regard to akolasia, which is something like being completely out of control, that we understand what self-control means.

"In contrast to the latter, to anaisthesia, sophrosyne is the fully developed capacity to react emotionally, to live in the affections." So there's something in this virtue of sophrosyne that's not just self-control. It's self-control, but within a fully developed capacity to react emotionally and to live in the affections. In other words, we have to draw into this consideration of this one virtue, sophrosyne, self-control, another virtue —aisthesis, as opposed to anaisthesia.

And then he talks about another one: "Seen against orgilotes, praotes is mildness." So he's talking about the virtue of praotes, the classical virtue of praotes, which often is translated as mildness or gentleness.

But seen against Aorgesia, it is the capacity to be righteously indignant. So this gentleness, when measured against Orgilotes, can indeed be called gentleness or mildness. Yet when measured against Aorgesia, it reveals itself as the capacity to be righteously indignant.

This brings us to several crucial points. First, what does this imply about our full ethical response to situations like climate change and species extinction? Second, what does it suggest about the sometimes one-sided prioritization of gentleness or equanimity that we often encounter in Buddhist traditions? Certainly in the classical texts, and to varying degrees in contemporary interpretations, there's an emphasis on equanimity —what we might call sophrosone, self-control and equanimity—without the supportive counterweight of a fully developed capacity to react emotionally, to live in the affections, this esthesia.

The more pertinent point right now is that virtues considered singly may be problematic. We must actually examine constellations and syntheses—perhaps virtues need counterweights.

Consider altruism, or what Hartmann calls brotherly love, a virtue that burst into historical consciousness with the emergence of Christianity. It was emphasized strongly by Jesus in his teachings: "Who is near me? What do they need? Put them before me. If a centurion asks you to walk with him half a mile, walk with him ten miles." This turning of the other cheek represented an eruption into human consciousness of brotherly love and altruism toward those around us. Yet this can become almost tyrannical and dangerously unbalanced without a counterweight—perhaps a healthy egoism, a healthy sense of self.

Or consider loyalty—loyalty to one's community, teacher, or country that operates beyond considerations of justice. This would be deeply problematic. Similarly, a loyalty to truthfulness that remains insensitive to other values and their demands for allegiance becomes tyrannical.

There exists a potential tyranny of individual values. The consciousness or soul, in its fervor, love, and particular direction of soul-making, can elevate one value while neglecting others, establishing it as the dominant thrust at the expense of a fuller moral vision.

This consideration led Aristotle to propose that perhaps a virtue is actually a synthesis of different values rather than a single value. Returning to those Greek terms: sophrosone, proper self-control, is actually a synthesis that includes not only self-control but also the fully developed capacity to react emotionally and live in the affections. Similarly, priotes is gentleness, but it includes the virtue of righteous indignation. Mildness, yes, but also the capacity to be righteously indignant when circumstances demand it.

Aristotle suggested that maybe virtue is actually synthesis itself, and any of these seemingly individual virtues are potentially problematic when isolated.

Let me read a passage from Hartmann about this: "In this sense, it may be said that every moral value has a point in it, not indeed in itself, but for human beings, where it becomes a danger. There is a limit beyond which its dominance in consciousness ceases to be of value."

Imagine taking any single virtue—altruism, loyalty, truthfulness, even courage. If it lacks balance, if it has no counterweight, if it dominates consciousness and moral sensibility too completely, problems arise and it actually stops being a value, becoming instead a disvalue.

Hartmann continues: "Only a sense of justice which is at the same time loving. Only a brotherly love which also considers the far distant. Only a pride which would likewise be humble could be valid as an ideal of moral conduct."

Every value reaches true fulfillment only in its synthesis with others, and ultimately, only in its synthesis with all. There's an intuitive sense that some possible synthesis exists in the ideational realm—a synthesis of all these virtues that seem to need each other despite sometimes pulling in different directions. Yet this intuitive understanding of synthesis remains out of reach, elusive.

"Every single value first attains its own full character through its axiological counterweight in the synthesis." (Axiological simply means pertaining to values.) "Even in itself, it is incomplete. It is even threatened in its valuational character without its counterweight. Whether this consists in a single specific countervalue or in a larger series of values makes no difference. The synthesis may have any degree of complexity."

When we reflect on this deeply, it becomes quite fascinating. We may have various responses in our souls. One response might be almost dismissive: "Well, everyone knows that."

"Yeah, well, you know, moderation in all things." And there's a kind of flaccidity of the mind, of the heart, of the soul in relation to this complexity and also in relation to values. "Yeah, yeah, sure, yeah." You can hear the lack of vigor, the lack of vitality, the lack of attunement and readiness and poise and energization and wrestling with this problematic. But that's one response. "Too much of anything is not a good thing." But it just becomes a kind of truism. And really all it's doing is not disturbing us. All we're doing is adopting a posture or a kind of non-posture of flaccidity, of non-vigor, of non-vitality, non-keenness in our moral sensibility, so as to remain undisturbed, so as to remain a little bit asleep. The soul not on fire, not churning with the difficulties of the challenges of the soul, making the process of the eros, of the breaking of vessels, of the questioning.

But that would be one response. Maybe it's most people's response, I'm not sure.

Another response to all that complexity and this sort of pulling in different directions of different values would be the kind of postmodern insistence on and relishing of our finitude, our fragmentation—stressing the futility of trying to understand values or trying to propose any kind of higher anchoring of the moral values and of our ethical sense. Ah, see? But again, one question I would have, if that's the kind of outlook with regard to this particular problem, is why? Why are you relishing that picture of our fragmentation, our existential fragmentation, our impossibility, our finitude, the futility of nobility? Why do you emphasize that? What's going on there psychologically?

Another possible reaction or stance in relation to this problematic is with some even dimly intuited sense of a beyond of values—the beyond of the realm of ideas, of the sphere of ideal existence. Impossible as it is to instantiate, as we said with the mathematical analogies, exactly, fully, completely, just as images are impossible to fully, completely instantiate, but also impossible as it might be to come up with a kind of logically coherent, discursive, rational definition of what that synthesis in the beyond might be.

So yes, our finitude, yes, our fragmentation, but there can be with that finitude not a kind of futility or flaccidity, not this hanging on to a certain limitation and blocking of our opening in nobility, but a finitude that gazes also to the horizon, looking at the horizon, almost groping, feeling what might be beyond that horizon, over the horizon.

And there are other possible reactions as well. Let's pause there for now before I go into some more about the complexities and antinomies, oppositions, contradictions between values.

CHAPTER 194

Rob Burbea · 1h20

> In this seventh part of his exploration of ethics and soul-making, Rob Burbea delves into the complex reality of moral antinomies - situations where genuine values conflict irreconcilably. Drawing on philosopher Nikolai Hartmann's work, he examines how virtues like kindness and loyalty have obvious opposites, but more problematically, how values like acceptance and decisive action, or love of the nearest versus love of the remote, can pull us in contradictory directions.
> Burbea challenges the classical view held by Plato, Aristotle, and Aquinas that virtues cannot truly conflict, arguing instead that such conflicts are inevitable and even necessary for moral development. He explores practical examples from meditation practice, noting how qualities like bright samādhi and tender-heartedness might be antinomical, and considers how the Buddha's own choices - like leaving his family to seek awakening - illustrate these impossible moral dilemmas.
> The talk addresses critiques of mystical traditions' moral claims while proposing that apparent moral failures might reflect the complex, polytheistic nature of the psyche rather than simple ethical deficiency. Burbea suggests that recognizing these antinomies doesn't lead to moral relativism but rather to a more mature engagement with ethical complexity, where we must choose according to our deepest sense of values while accepting the inevitable guilt of neglecting other legitimate claims. This acceptance of moral complexity becomes itself a virtue essential for soul-making.

Let's go into this issue of the complexity of values and the conflict between different values, the oppositions. Let's go into that a little bit more.

In a way it's obvious that every value stands in oppositional relation with its opposite, with a disvalue. These are obvious oppositions. So, for example, kindness as a value is in oppositional relation with unkindness, which we call a disvalue – an absence of a value, something that has negative moral weight. Or loyalty with disloyalty, honesty with dishonesty, and courage with cowardice. Those kinds of oppositions are obvious.

Although they present challenges – the choice towards a value may ask a lot of us in different situations – still, that opposition is relatively straightforward and not complicated, not essentially problematic or theoretically problematic.

But there are others, and we've already touched on them or thrown them out as examples at different stages of the talk. There are other oppositions, other conflicting duties and allegiances and relationships between different values that are more problematic. Hartmann uses this word – I'm not sure what the German is, but in English it translates as "antinomy," or "antinomies" in the plural. It's philosophical jargon for this kind of oppositional relationship. "Anti" means against, as we know, and "nomi" is from nomos, which means law. So two laws that pull in opposite directions – antinomos, antinomy, antinomies.

As I said, we've touched on a few of these, mentioned some in passing, some in a little more detail.

There is, which I've already mentioned, the antinomy – the curious antinomy – between the actualization of a value and its non-actualization. Obviously, when a value is actualized, that actualization is valuable. But there's also value in its non-actualization, because its non-actualization, its non-presence, its non-existence allows us, in our being, in our moral orientation and moral will and what we bring of our soul to a situation – that non-actualization of a value in a situation allows us to rise up morally, to discern, to cultivate our sensitivity, to choose, to gather our soul, and to grow morally through our intention, through our will.

So this curious oppositional relationship between the actualization of values and their non-actualization – in a way both are valuable.

If we look at this even more closely, when we have the non-actualization or only partial actualization of values, we have there the values beyond us. The beyondness is what's not completely actualizing, what's not completely manifest. And that's valuable for our soul-making purpose. The eros needs those beyonds. It creates those beyonds. It discovers those beyonds. It needs those beyonds. And those beyonds are part of this non-actualization. Those beyondness are also part of the dimensions, the unfathomability and the divinity and mystery of a value. And as such, they are valuable to us because of that soul sense that they give.

So there's an oppositional relationship between the values beyond us, so to speak, and their manifestation on the other hand.

There's also then the value of our moving towards something – as I said before, our engaging of our moral capacity, moral sensitivities, moral will, a whole organ of ethical sensibility and choice. There's a value in our moving towards something, our striving to actualize a value, and there's a value in our achieving it, our having actualized something when there's no more striving there.

There's an antinomy perhaps between acceptance – the value, the virtue of acceptance on one hand – and the value, the virtue of decisive action or effort towards a goal.

There's an interesting antinomy between, as Hartmann points out, what he calls the grade and the range. So I have to explain what those mean. The grade is another word he uses for the height of a moral value. One can pursue single-mindedly and devotedly a single moral value. One can be absolutely devoted to one moral value and accentuate one's efforts towards that, one's sensibility towards that, one's cultivation of that value, whatever that is. And in a way, there's value in that. There's value in that single-pointedness, in that effort, in that singling out and streamlining of one's being and one's will and effort towards that one particular value.

Hartmann points out that many of the extraordinary achievements of not just individual human beings, but also the cultures or traditions that they found, follow from that kind of singleness of moral vision, singleness of moral emphasis – really being able to develop one virtue to a great extent, often at the expense of other values, a wider range. So this is grade versus range. There's an antinomy there, because there's also a value in encompassing, being sensitive to, taking care of a broad range of values. It's depth versus breadth, something like that.

Related to this, there are antinomies between simplicity and complexity. We can even talk about some of these in relation to aesthetics and art. Both simplicity and complexity have value. Unity and uniformity have a value, but also diversity has a value – again, whether we're talking about a single person and their ethos, or a community or structure or institution.

The perception of unity—the capacity to see oneness and not focus so much on differences—has great value. But so does, conversely and simultaneously, the perception of diversity, what we might call discernment or differentiation. Constancy has value, as does stability. Whether we speak of a person's ethos, an institution, or a community or tradition, constancy and stability possess undeniable worth. On the other hand, change and dynamism also carry value. These are opposing, antinomical values.

There is value in harmony, and there is value in conflict. We can speak of harmony within oneself—not being pulled in different directions in a way that creates disharmony—or harmony within a community. Yet we've already touched upon the value of conflict in various ways and areas.

Let me read again a short passage from Hartman about this. He cites Heraclitus, the pre-Socratic philosopher, on what Heraclitus called the cosmic war—polemos in Greek. What Heraclitus called the cosmic war and regarded as the father and king of all things exists also in ethical actuality. That element of restlessness and flux which carries all things, that inexhaustible productivity of new and ever new relations, situations and demands with their endlessly new conflicts and puzzles—this is what constitutes the infiniteness of content in ethical being, its wealth, its eternal freshness and abundance. It is no exaggeration to speak in this sense of conflict as a value.

Hartman gave that example we discussed before of a parallel in the domain of knowledge or research or theoretical understanding or insight, where a problem itself becomes a value. He continues: "Conflict is that from which decision, intention, action are born. But the values of intention are the ethical ones. Conflict is that which keeps discernment and the feeling of value alive and opens up new vistas."

So again, there's this antinomy between the value of harmony and the value of conflict. I'm moving through these quite quickly, though they all bear considerable meditation and reflection. They differ from one another—some are obviously related, some are antinomical in slightly different ways. For those interested in this exploration, you can take these themes and delve into much greater detail and richness.

There exists also an antinomy between our duty to ourselves as individuals and our duty to the community, whether a small community or the larger society. All kinds of fascinating tensions and pulls can arise from this antinomy.

There's also an antinomy between what Hartman calls "love of the nearest"—those closest to us—and "love of the remote." This particular phrase comes from Hartman's friend and philosophical predecessor Max Scheler, who also wrote extensively about ethics. This phrase "the remote" is quite interesting to me, as it highlights certain issues around the complexity of ethics and the difficulties we encounter.

Love of the remote involves devotion to and service of those in the distant future, those far away whom we will never meet. It particularly encompasses those we regard as—and this language is somewhat problematic—the best types, those on whom we pin our hopes for humanity, for a tradition, for certain deep understandings, or for extraordinary development of soul, insight, heart, or courage.

Some people dedicate their work now to future beings they will never meet, never knowing if their efforts succeed, if their contributions land, if they're received, assimilated, digested, and used as platforms for support and inspiration. In this devotion, this love of the remote, there necessarily arises some degree of pulling away from, or neglect of, the love of the nearest—those around us. Perhaps I'm not as available as I could be as a friend, not as present for everyday socializing, less available to family or children, because my soul's eye holds a sense of duty and dedication to those I may never meet, whose fruits I may never see ripen, whose harvest I will never enjoy because it exists after I die.

Is there an antinomy between love of the nearest and love of the remote? Hartman would say yes, and I tend to agree. Perhaps there's a similar antinomy between the love one has for family and children—the devotion to caring for them, making them happy, being interested in their lives—and the value of universal mettā?

There are others, many others. This represents a truly rich and important area for exploration, both in terms of the general principles implicated and in the specific details. As I've mentioned, I've simply rattled through a whole list here, and there are many more worth reflecting upon, investigating, feeling into, becoming sensitive to.

I'm not certain whether Hartman was the first to point out this fact of antinomies between moral values.

I'm not sure. But certainly going back to Plato, his consideration of virtues and ethics was founded on the idea that a virtue cannot be in conflict with another virtue. This was almost axiomatic to his entire philosophy. There cannot be "rival goods at war with each other," to quote Alasdair MacIntyre's phrase describing Plato's position. Aristotle, his somewhat student, somewhat successor, somewhat foil, held the same view—that virtue cannot be in conflict with virtue. Later, Thomas Aquinas in the Middle Ages took a similar stance. While there are differences between Plato, Aristotle and Aquinas, they shared this view that there cannot be real conflict between one virtue and another. Virtues cannot pull in different directions.

Furthermore, they believed that all virtues require each other. This returns us to what we mentioned about Aristotle and his idea of synthesis. Sometimes he calls it the mean—like an average between virtues—where one virtue actually needs a counterweight in another virtue so that the true virtue is some kind of synthesis of two lesser or incomplete virtues. All virtues require each other in that system.

In some understandings of the Dharma, there's a similar principle. All the wings of awakening that the Buddha spoke of—all thirty-seven wings of awakening—work synergistically and may, to some extent, require each other. This was quite a common ancient view, probably present in the Buddha's teachings, certainly in Plato and Aristotle, and in many ways in Thomas Aquinas.

Alasdair MacIntyre reflects on this and writes that Aristotle's moral psychology led him to misread Sophocles—and really the whole genre of tragic theater, which was a significant artistic direction and manifestation in Greek and Hellenistic times. Because of his moral psychology, Aristotle simply couldn't understand tragic drama. It made no sense to him, or very limited sense.

"For the conflicts of tragedy," MacIntyre writes, "certainly may in part take the form that they do because of the flaws in this or that character. But what constitute those individuals' tragic opposition and conflict is the conflict of good with good embodied in their encounter prior to and independent of any individual characteristics."

In other words, it's not really that this person is flawed in this way or that person is flawed in that way. The tragedy is rather that this person is pulled between two antinomical values, torn by their sense that their allegiance belongs to two opposite directions. They are in a way torn apart, forced to choose by a situation or by the deeper structure of the antinomies between certain values.

MacIntyre continues: "And to this aspect of tragedy, Aristotle is and has to be blind. The absence of this view of the centrality of opposition and conflict in human life conceals from Aristotle also one important source of human learning about and one important milieu of human practice of the virtues."

This is a point I want to emphasize. This is part of our life—these inevitable, unavoidable conflicts that arise either from the structure of the situation or from the deeper nature of the complexity of virtue itself. Remember that quote when we were discussing traditions and the necessity of conflict and argument within traditions? John Anderson urged us not to ask of a social institution "what end or purpose does it serve," but rather "of what conflicts is it the scene?"

So in a way, Aristotle is missing something of the complexity—and also the reality—of our moral life. Perhaps this is even more so in a modern society where there is wider divergence in our very sense of life and what it's for. There isn't a unified idea that life is for this, that this is how it serves, this is what it serves, this is the direction. We cannot unite all our soul's energies and our intellect and our ethical aspiration into that one stream which everyone agrees upon.

There is that view that a synthesis is possible and virtue cannot really conflict with virtue. But again, I would ask: even if one might have that sort of integrated view over time, where values work together, might it still be that on one occasion, or simultaneously, or in one situation, we're pulled in different directions?

I'm reminded of something that came up in response to a question on the last retreat. I remember a period when I lived in the States, shortly after the jhānas were really opening for me quite a lot. I had been on a solitary retreat and was practicing a great deal at home afterward while working. What I noticed was that there were days when the samādhi went really well, and the mind and being had this kind of jewel-like radiance to them—very bright, very sharp, very clear. There was a pristine, beautiful radiance to it.

On other days, that was less present. The samādhi was there, but not to that pristine depth and fullness. But what was sometimes there instead was a kind of tender-heartedness—a real soft pliability, availability of heart, tenderness, tears in a good sense, being easily moved in a beautiful way.

What I noticed was that on the days when the samādhi was really bright and radiant—when the mind was like a jewel—on those days there was less of this tender-heartedness. And vice versa: on the days where there was tender-heartedness, there was less of this jewel-like, bright, almost diamond-like radiance of the mind.

Are these antinomical values?

This quality I'm calling tenderness of heart, and that bright samadhi mind-heart—they didn't seem able to exist in their fullness at the same time. The being, the consciousness, would move toward one or the other on any given day.

Now, within the Dharma, you do encounter teachings about balancing different qualities. In the teachings on the seven factors of awakening, for instance, there are three energizing qualities: dhamma vicaya (investigation of Dharma or investigation of mental qualities), viriya (persistence, effort, determination), and pīti (rapture). Then you have three pacifying qualities—calming in their affect and effect: passaddhi (tranquility), samādhi (which we could translate as concentration), and upekkhā (equanimity).

The Buddha gives teachings that say: pay attention to this balance. Where am I right now with the seven factors of awakening? When he presents this teaching in the fourth foundation of mindfulness as one of the framework lenses, he says to notice the balance. What do I need—more of these energizing qualities or more of the pacifying ones right now—in regard to dispelling the hindrances and cultivating the whole movement toward awakening?

So you get that guidance partially, but I don't know if this quality of tenderness of heart—which isn't quite compassion itself, but perhaps more akin to empathy—is antinomical with the brightness and adamantine quality of samādhi. This quality of tenderness isn't really highlighted in the Pali Canon teachings. So is there an antinomy between a value that many people nowadays, certainly those in meditation traditions, would place great importance on, and other spiritual qualities? Might there be a kind of inevitability to our having to negotiate, to choose, to deal with these complexities, these conflicts, these antinomies, these impossibilities?

In Mahāyāna teaching, the Buddha nature is said to have three bodies, three kāyas. Though there are infinite hermeneutic possibilities here, let me give them some narrow interpretations for the sake of the point I'm making. A Buddha has three kāyas—three bodies of their being, of their essence, of what a Buddha is: the rūpakāya (the body of physical manifestation), the saṃbhogakāya (sometimes translated as the bliss body or enjoyment body, also akin to an imaginal body with its associated imaginal realm), and the dharmakāya.

We've touched on this word dharmakāya before, and it has had a wide range of translations in the Mahāyāna tradition—very fertile, with hermeneutic possibilities opening in all directions. One translation, perhaps one of the earlier ones, is "body of teachings" or "body of dhammas"—meaning body of attributes, mental qualities, or virtues. Kāya means body, as in body of water, but here body of dhammas, dharmakāya.

The Mahāyāna Buddha is a transcendent entity far beyond anything we encounter in typical human lives. So one translation of dharmakāya is as a body of qualities, a body of virtues, which actually cannot manifest all at once because of their antinomical values—because they embody antinomical values. This points to a kind of beyond, a synthesis, an absolute that synthesizes in a way beyond our grasp, beyond our ken, beyond our completely discerning or understanding mind.

How can a Buddha, who in Mahāyāna teaching has mysterious qualities—for instance, being able to see thoroughly the emptiness of something while simultaneously perceiving its form—embody such paradoxes? There could be a parallel here between the notion of dharmakāya as part of Buddha nature—as a body of qualities including antinomical values and virtues that cannot all instantiate at once in human beings—and this transcendent absolute.

As I mentioned, you find teachings in the Abrahamic religions about the names and attributes of God. They speak of balancing mercy with judgment, judgment with mercy, and so forth. But certain attributes cannot manifest simultaneously.

When we consider this fact of conflicts, complexities, counterweights needed, antinomical relations between different values, and the unavoidability of this, it might prompt us toward considering the possibility of some kind of absolute—one we cannot know rationally or see directly, but can perhaps intuit, can have a sense of its beyondness. It is transcendent.

Perhaps we might construe the Buddha mind in its ineffable transcendence, in its forever beyondness—what a Mahāyāna Buddha truly is—as embodying in the kāya that kind of transcendent absolute, that transcendent synthesis of which we can only get partial glimpses.

Remember the analogy with maps: neither the Mercator projection nor the polar projection can capture in two dimensions the reality of the three-dimensional globe. Something gets distorted, something gets shrunk, something gets expanded. This is one solution, one way of thinking about it, one way of tying it in with Buddha Dharma and notions of Buddhahood—that beyondness we aspire to or hold as inspiration. That of Buddhahood, that of the dharmakāya.

Listen to what John Findlay says about absolutes: "The absolute is not to be conceived as something which instantiates or exemplifies the highest values, since instantiation is necessarily one-sided and imperfect, and since the highest values also lie in different directions and cannot be instantiated altogether"—a point often stressed by Nikolai Hartmann.

The contemplative traditions, he suggests, have indeed converged on certain ethical insights and the transcendence of self-centeredness, yet this convergence itself may be more constructed than discovered. As Kripal observes, it becomes remarkably easy to curate a selective anthology of mystical exemplars who conform to our contemporary moral sensibilities, while conveniently overlooking or dismissing those whose conduct challenges our assumptions about the inherent goodness of spiritual realization.

This circular reasoning—declaring mysticism inherently moral and then cherry-picking evidence to support this declaration—reveals something profound about our relationship to spiritual ideals. We are, perhaps unconsciously, engaged in what Kripal calls a "creative revisioning and reforming of the past" rather than an honest reckoning with the historical record in all its complexity and moral ambiguity.

The traditions themselves, as Kripal unflinchingly notes, have often served as "elaborate and sacralized techniques for dissociating consciousness"—methods that, rather than fostering genuine integration and ethical maturity, have frequently enabled spiritual bypassing, authoritarianism, and the very dualistic thinking they purport to transcend. The shadow side includes patriarchy, sexual repression, rigid hierarchies, and what he terms "transcendentalism"—that flight from embodied existence which we've been examining throughout these talks.

Yet there's something crucial that Kripal himself may be missing in his otherwise penetrating analysis. His conclusion—that "there is no shared ocean of emancipation in the history of religions"—may itself reflect the very postmodern skepticism that, while valuable as a corrective, can become its own form of dogma. When he speaks of privileging "the ethical over the mystical" and insisting on "human wholeness as human holiness," he's making what is essentially a mystical claim about the nature of authentic spirituality.

What if the question isn't whether there exists some metaphysical ocean of liberation that all traditions access, but whether there might be something in human consciousness itself—call it Buddha nature, call it the imaginal, call it the creative principle—that tends toward both transcendence and integration when properly cultivated? The ethical convergence that Ferrer notes, even if partially constructed through our interpretive lens, might point to something real about human potential rather than mere wishful thinking.

This brings us back to our central theme: the relationship between the absolute and the relative, between transcendent ideals and embodied existence. Perhaps the very tension Kripal identifies—between mystical aspiration and ethical grounding—is itself pointing toward a more sophisticated understanding of awakening, one that neither dismisses the transcendent dimension nor allows it to become a refuge from the complexities of human existence.

The Dharmakaya, in this light, is not some metaphysical absolute existing independent of our experience, but neither is it merely a projection of our desires. It might be understood as that dimension of consciousness which, when touched, naturally expresses itself through wisdom and compassion—not because we've constructed it that way, but because that's how consciousness moves when freed from the contractions of ego and the distortions of spiritual materialism.

Indeed, from many of our own modern perspectives, the waters of the past are barely potable, barely drinkable, as what most contemplative traditions have meant by emancipation or salvation is not at all what we would wish to imply by those terms today. It is, after all, frightfully easy to be emancipated from the world, or to become one with a deity or ontological absolute, and leave all the world's grossly unjust social structures and practices—racism, gender injustice, homophobia, religious bigotry, colonialism, caste, class division, environmental degradation—comfortably in place.

This is a long passage, but I think there are important considerations here for the very reason I was discussing ethics in the first place. Yet it may be, given all that he has said, that Kripal is missing something of Nikolai Hartmann's insights about the nature of the realm of values, or what Hartmann calls the firmament of values. One key point is that humanity is only capable at any time of shining a light and illuminating a certain narrow radius of this vast firmament—we can only discern, see, sense, focus on and emphasize a limited range of all the values that exist. Secondly, there are antinomies between values—inherent contradictions and opposing pulls.

In a way, though I'm not certain this applies to Kripal, it could be that he's operating from a somewhat naive or oversimplistic view of values. Not in much of what he has said, but it could be that lurking beneath is that kind of narrowness and naivety. Because one might interpret things differently—that it is not that emancipation, liberation, or awakening fails to bring moral purity automatically. Rather, our idea of morality may not take into account the moral antinomies that Hartmann draws attention to.

Awakening could, I would say should, bring with it a moral devotion. Moral devotion is both part of the road to awakening and should issue from it as well. But such moral devotion and faithfulness can never be devoted simultaneously to the totality of moral archetypes, or to all the figures of what we might call the moral zodiac—those imaginal figures embodying different values, different moral orientations.

There is either a soul element or a cultural conditioning element, or both, involved in determining one's moral orientation, one's moral compass and bearing. And whatever that bearing is, that orientation will likewise be evaluated by others who do not share it—those looking in different directions, evaluating different values differently. If no one is aware of the complexity and multi-directionality of this moral value firmament, then we have only one way of talking about what is moral, one standard, one true north. In that case, Kripal's conclusion becomes inevitable—that there is no morality issuing from mysticism, no connection between mystical insight or awakening and morals. But this might be based on assumptions that are not fully explored.

Regarding ethics and morality, something in us often wants simple, unitary answers—if not to the complex particularities of ethical life and actual situations, then at least to the theoretical understanding and scope of values. We want simplicity. But partly due to the transcendent range of values relative to our human capacity at any given time, and partly due to the antinomical structure existing between values, that simplicity may not be possible.

There are also considerations about the nature of the soul and psyche. James Hillman speaks of a polytheistic psyche, a polytheistic psychology. Each individual being has a range of moral allegiances that differ according to the ethos of the imaginal figures that call to us, that speak to us, to which we have duties. If we have duty to just one or few imaginal figures as central archetypes—a calling to, rapport with, duty to those few—then over a lifetime, a person will display corresponding moral lacunae, gaps, neglects, and transgressions in their behavior.

This is not at all to condone the instances we have all read about or encountered of gross, inappropriate behavior by some teachers and so-called liberated beings. It is simply to suggest that this whole consideration may be more complex in ways that Kripal does not consider.

If we recognize that we have a polytheistic psyche, as I have discussed before, I am pulled in different directions with different senses of duty that I cannot possibly execute simultaneously. I cannot possibly fulfill all those duties in my life, certainly not at the same time. I have spoken before about the calling or claim that the god of music has on me—I cannot fulfill that while simultaneously being a Dharma teacher, among many other duties.

This is part of our existential finitude and fragmentation. But to me it has a noble tragedy and beauty. It retains a sense of beyondness, as opposed to a finitude and fragmentation that tends to flatten and render the sense of beyondness, nobility, and beauty—how these can flourish and grow.

I find all this fascinating. You can hear the different tendencies in how different people think about this, how they seek solutions. It is certainly theoretically possible, if one wishes or if it feels soul-making at any moment, to retain the notion of some transcendent synthesis among these antinomies. I cannot quite understand how it would manifest, but it is possible to retain that—to have an even prayerful, meditative, contemplative, intuitive glimpse or sense of that—while simultaneously recognizing the impossibility of instantiation in certain situations due to their structure, due to these antinomies, these inherent, polarły opposite, differing directional pulls between values. And to recognize the impossibility due to the structure of our psyche being, as Hillman would say, polytheistic in nature—polydevotional.

Polytheistically devotional. Polytheistically called. Different angels pulling us in different conflicting directions, demanding different things of us. It's not actually possible for this human life to perfectly, adequately encompass all that, hold it all together at the same time.

So there's something really important in all this, I feel. Again, it matters what our attitude to it is. That attitude would also be part of what would constitute a virtue. It's one thing to be conscious of these different impossibilities. It's another then to let them touch the soul and the mind and the heart in ways that are ennobling, in ways that are vitalizing—difficult as that might be, challenging as that might be, complicating as that might be. There's something, I think, necessary for the soul there, to some extent. But attitude matters, and attitude to this very situation is, or is not, virtuous.

Let me read another passage from Hartman. He's talking about the antinomy between love of the nearest and love of the remote, and he criticizes Nietzsche actually, who in his devotion for love of the remote, kind of poo-pooed and neglected—also in his life, I think—love of the nearest, to some extent. And he also makes the point that it sometimes falls to the founder, the discoverer, the adventurer, the one who opens up new territory first. It sometimes falls to them, or goes with that role, unfortunately, to be a little one-pointed and therefore neglectful.

We talked about this in Hartman's antinomy of grade and range—this concentrating on one ideal value and the development of that and the manifestation of that to the neglect of others, and sometimes putting others down. So he criticizes Nietzsche for that. He's talking about this antinomy between love of the nearest and love of the remotest, criticizing Nietzsche for praising love of the remotest at the expense of almost total neglect of love of the nearest.

But there's a general point about antinomies. Hartman writes, "The fact of their antinomy does not release us from the task of blending two values. In itself, love of the nearest, for example, is right and must not be discarded." So I cannot completely... I have to give some care, some attention for those that are near me—my circle of immediate friends, the people I run into every day, my family, etc. I have to have... I cannot discard, as Hartman said, that value.

"If precedent should be given to a higher value, the lower at most should be restricted in its domination." In other words, we don't totally neglect it, totally disregard it. We just restrict it at most. "The conflict, the antinomy, leads to a reciprocal restoration of both values. In every synthesis, the conflict must on principle be retained."

So retaining that conflict means retaining the sense of the conflict, retaining the sense of being pulled in different directions. I'm sure there's some mythical figure that was pulled in different directions—I can't remember who that was. So there's a tension here. There's an inevitable challenge, an inevitable tension, an inevitable difficulty of choice that we encounter regularly and in different ways and in all kinds of levels of ethical life and all kinds of gradations of difficulty in our life.

And we want, we need to keep that conflict. We can't just choose completely in favor of one versus the other. But neither is it this flaccid, dull and a bit soul-dead kind of middle-of-the-road tendency. I've got to live with and have the capacity for and the maturity for holding and navigating this conflict, holding this tension.

When we talked about eros, this is a very different kind of tension, but we talked about eros needing to maintain the two—not collapse into oneness. Merge. A tension needs to be retained with eros, an erotic tension between the soul and its beloved soul. And there's a different kind of tension here, but again, for our soul's growth, for the building of our moral being as Hartman has it, for our creativity and discovery, that tension needs to be maintained to some degree.

So often we want simple answers, as I said, and a simple code of ethics. And when you start to go into it in more detail, things are more complex. Things are not so easy. Not so facilely unifiable.

Again, passage from Hartman: "Goodness consists in selecting values according to their relative height."

from among the diversity which is always met with in any given circumstance.

So remember we said that was his definition of goodness - it's like the tendency to choose the higher. And this selection of the higher, the relatively higher among different values, is a selection, he says, which cannot be made semel, which just means just once in a lifetime. You cannot just say, "Okay, I've made that decision now, and that's done." It cannot be made purely theoretically either, he says, once and for all, but must be made anew each time from the very foundation, out of an ever-living sense of value.

There can be no diagram to assist us in this, no help from precepts or rules of life. It is selection not by way of contemplative deliberation - he means not by way of rational thinking - but through the intuitive element in our impulse towards the higher, an element which is always generated in our actions, our dispositions, desires and behavior, or, on the other hand, is sometimes lacking.

So we are forced to live ethical complexity. And that's hard. It's hard.

We do have precepts. We have commandments. And an interesting point is that they often refer to a kind of simplifying, and that's why a lot of people can find the precepts or the commandments very helpful as codes of life. But they are simplifying. In the Jewish tradition, you have Ten Commandments and then volumes and volumes of small print, if you like, regarding the nuances and different situations that come in the Talmudic commentaries - encyclopedic volumes. The commandments themselves are very simple.

But this kind of simplicity is only possible for what Hartman would call the lowest values - lowest in the sense that they form the basis, they form the minimum. So, much as we would like, or sometimes we would like to just think, "I'm just keeping the precepts, that's it, that takes care of things." And in a way, as I said at the start of this talk, they function for the sake of simplicity. Those precepts and the whole movement of sīla in Buddhadharma were originally taught because they simplify our life and purify us from the negative consequences of contravening those precepts, which would obviate and obstruct our path to liberation.

But actually, they're a minimum. And those commandments are a minimum. The Ten Commandments - or the last five commandments, which deal with human beings' relationship with each other - those last five are a kind of minimum. But as a minimum they form the basis, they form the kind of minimal allegiance we must have. And is it enough? Is it complete? Is it too simple?

So again, I'll read you - I'm reading a lot of Hartman, but he's talking about justice, though the point is similar. He's previously said that Socrates and Plato put justice as the highest moral value, but he says actually among the virtues proper, justice is to be classed not as the highest but rather as the lowest.

"This is seen in the fact that injustice that ought to be puts forth not the maximum of moral demand but quite evidently the minimum. Its claim upon a person's conduct is purely negative: not to do injustice, to commit no transgression, not to encroach upon another's liberty, not to injure another or anything that belongs to him."

And same in the last five of the Ten Commandments: not to murder, not to steal, not to commit adultery, not to bear false witness or covet what is not yours.

And he says, "If that is the whole meaning of morality, its tendency is merely conservative, not constructive. The one concern is the protection, the conservation of the lower, the elementary goods" - in other words, life, property, family, etc. If that is the whole of justice, then it is only a means to those goods values. If that's the whole of ethics, then it's only a means to those kinds of things.

But that, he says, doesn't exhaust the essence of justice. Because, in the first place, behind those goods values is hidden something of positive moral value: the sphere of personal freedom. Justice merges into respect for this, he says, but beyond it there arises something still greater.

"The higher spiritual, the communal and cultural values, one and all, can flourish only where body, life, property, personal freedom of actions and the like are secured. There only is scope found for the higher purposes."

So in other words, we need these basics - body, life, property, personal freedom of action to a certain extent - and where they are there, then on that basis the higher purposes of life, the more beautiful reaches of ethics are based. But they bring with them complications.

"Justice, then," he continues, "makes room in the sphere of actuality for the higher values. The more diversified moral life cannot begin till the simple conditions are supplied. Justice is the moral tendency to supply these conditions. It is the prerequisite of all further realizations of value. Justice is the minimum of morality that paves the way for all the higher forms."

And when we get into those higher forms, again, that's where a lot of the complexity comes in. And a lot of these antinomical relations come in.

We encounter these moral complexities and must grapple with them directly. We must choose. When a situation forces a choice upon us—when we are presented with genuine alternatives—we can attempt to avoid that choice, but such avoidance is not virtuous. It represents a kind of moral cowardice.

When we find ourselves in situations where either the structural nature of circumstances or the actual antinomial relationship between values demands a response, we inevitably choose one side of a pair of conflicting values over another. This cannot be avoided. As Hartmann observes, someone in such a situation cannot avoid making a decision. Every attempt to remain neutral only makes the difficulty worse, for in doing so, one violates both values.

To refuse to make a choice—to do nothing, to withdraw, to shrink back from the situation—means that when two values stand in opposition, we end up manifesting neither. We thereby violate both values. The attempt not to commit oneself is fundamentally moral cowardice, reflecting a lack of responsibility and unwillingness to assume it. Often this stems from moral immaturity or fear of others' opinions.

How frequently are we paralyzed by concern for what others might think? But there is also the deeper fear of consequences—the recognition that in devotion to one value, we must relatively neglect another, potentially valuable response.

What should a person do when confronted with serious conflict fraught with responsibility? Hartmann suggests we must decide according to our best conscience—according to our own living sense of the relative height of the respective values—and accept the consequences, both external and inward, including the guilt involved in violating one value. We ought to carry this guilt and, in doing so, become stronger, learning to bear it with dignity.

Real moral life is not such that one can stand guiltless within it. Each person must, step by step through life, settle conflicts that are theoretically insoluble—conflicts that cannot be resolved to satisfy both demands of antithetical moral values. That each person must navigate these dilemmas through their own free sense of values and creative energy should be regarded as a feature of the highest spiritual significance, representing complete humanity and genuine freedom.

Yet we must not make this into a comfortable theory, as the vulgar mind does with permissible lies, imagining that one incurs no guilt in offending against clearly discerned values. Only unavoidable guilt can preserve us from moral decay.

So even a Buddha must choose. Even an awakened being confronts situations where one value receives emphasis and care while an opposing or conflicting value is necessarily neglected. Both possess legitimacy, both have valid claims, but choice remains inevitable, and consequences follow.

Perhaps when Siddhartha Gautama, at twenty-nine, left his family—his very young son and wife—to strive for awakening, he was choosing the value of spiritual liberation over the virtue of being a loving, responsible husband and father. The possibility of awakening that he intuited took precedence over conventional familial duties.

Sometimes we long for a once-and-for-all answer to resolve these complexities. We desire simple codes, rational frameworks for navigating moral terrain. We want clarity, simplicity, guiltlessness. But these comforts may not be available to us.

There are additional elements to consider in all this, which I will explore when we meet again.

CHAPTER 195

Sīla and Soul (Part 8)

Rob Burbea · 1h54

> In this nuanced exploration of ethics and soul-making, Rob Burbea navigates the delicate territory where universal moral values intersect with individual soul callings. He examines how life inevitably presents us with antinomical choices between competing values, requiring us to develop our unique moral personalities while maintaining fidelity to foundational ethical principles.
> Burbea introduces three potentially controversial but soul-relevant concepts: Hartman's notion of 'nobility' as the pursuit of uncommon values that pioneer new ethical territory; the transformation of hatred arising from blocked soul-making into imaginal engagement; and 'love of the remote' (Fernliebe) - a duty to future generations and higher human potential that may require sacrificing immediate concerns for the nearest.
> Throughout, he emphasizes that while universal values like the basic precepts form an unconditional foundation, the soul's particular callings and the development of one's 'ideal personality' constitute genuine moral duties. Drawing on MacIntyre's concept of narrative unity, he frames the moral life as an open-ended quest where virtues find meaning within each person's unique journey toward understanding goodness. This teaching challenges conventional approaches to Buddhist ethics by incorporating the necessity of individual moral genius and the soul's duty to its own authentic development.

So we've been saying that inevitably in our lives we're going to find ourselves in situations where the structure of the situation demands a choice, a moral choice on our part between two values, or of one value out of maybe more than two. At other times, it's not so much a specific situation as general directions in life where we need to choose, preferentially, one value that's perhaps in an antinomical and oppositional relationship with another value.

This doesn't arise only from the structure of the situation. It arises from the complexity of individual values and virtues implicating and involving others, needing counterweights, and values themselves being in antinomical relationships. Life asks us to do this. It presents us with these situations. Sometimes the choices are relatively simple, but when there's this antinomical relationship between values, it's not always so simple.

We can try to avoid this, but that's hardly a solution—not very ennobling, not very helpful for our soul or the growth of our moral being. And so we incur a certain guilt with the responsibility that comes as we make those choices in life, as we navigate our path through situations and in the general directions of our life.

One factor to consider here is why one person, given a choice between two values, chooses to prioritize and invest in and care for and express and manifest one value, while another person chooses a different value. There's a consideration of personal differences here that I think is really crucial—a difference in souls, in soul styles, in soul callings. This must come into a mature consideration of ethics.

There are moral duties that we have to the collective. I have a moral duty to the groups around me, the communities, the larger society. And I have, you have, each person has likewise a moral duty to one's own individual soul. There can be a tension here between them, and it's not always easy.

No one can flower fully as an individual. No one's soul can flower fully without drawing sustenance and all kinds of support from the basis of the collective, from what's around them. The individual rises up out of that to whatever extent they rise up. But likewise, the collective, the community, the society is dependent on the individuals. Actually, a really healthy community has individuated individuals. It's not a collection of replicas of unindividuated individuals.

To the extent that the individuals that make up a community or society are true to themselves, listening to their callings, their soul's promptings and callings, caring for their duty to themselves and allowing that to shape the flourishing of their being, the full flowering of their being, to that extent a community is strong, is robust. So there's a kind of reciprocal dependency and reciprocal need between the collective and the individual. And in terms of the moral duties, there's a kind of tension there.

But how does the personal—what Hartman would call the personality or soul style, the individual duties of a soul, soul duties that are individual—how does that come in, flow in, and influence and affect this whole discussion of ethics, especially where there's choices to be made between values, as there always will be?

Some of what I want to explore a little bit here or open out may sound to some people perhaps a little provocative, maybe controversial, maybe contentious. I'm not sure—maybe not at all to some people, maybe so to others. I'm certainly not seeking to provoke or to be controversial for the sake of it. I get absolutely no kick out of that kind of thing.

But I do think it's important to try to open up this area, which is tricky, delicate, needs careful consideration. Can we begin, just begin right now, to open this up, open up the whole field for a kind of wider, deeper discussion? Some more careful considerations regarding ethics and soul, especially as some of the things I want to go into now are areas that are not usually considered when we consider ethics.

But they are pertinent, and particularly they're pertinent if we're interested in soul-making. Axiomatic to soul-making is the principle of the necessity of my uniqueness and my particularities and my individual soul—not at the exclusion of everything else, but that's a part of it. So these areas that I want to talk about are pertinent when we talk about sīla and soul, ethics and soul. I hope I'll do my best not to be clumsy. I'm sure inevitably I'll be a little clumsy in how I phrase things and treading in this delicate territory, but I'll do my best.

There is this whole range of values, whole range of possible choices that we have, either in terms of the larger currents of our life or in specific situations. We need to make choices. To not make a choice is also a choice, but not ennobling, not soul-making. We need to make choices. And part of what comes into making our choices, part of what forms and shapes and directs and inspires different choices by different individuals, is those personal soul styles, personal inclinations or callings or duties of the soul.

Hartman points out—and this really is important to say—that the universal values, in other words, not the personal values, but those basic precepts that we get in Buddha Dharma, or the basic sort of last five of the Ten Commandments, and that kind of thing, the universal values such as justice—they need to form the basis, and in a way they have unconditional precedence. They are chiseled in stone. They form a platform, a foundation, on top of which, on the basis of which, the more differentiated personal values can be built and raised.

Everyone has an obligation to these basic universal values and to the precepts organized around them. But on top of that foundation, all kinds of choices present themselves in terms of the variegated emphases on different values that one can have, the differences that can exist between human beings. But that foundation remains essential.

Now, in a way, this sounds like a relatively simple formula in the abstract. And sometimes it is very simple. You choose this, I choose that. You prefer this, I prefer that. I prefer developing this, I prefer investing in that. As long as we're both maintaining the universal values, keeping a care for them, then all's well and good. So sometimes it's that simple, but sometimes it's not. It's a little more tricky, a little more nebulous and ambiguous.

We draw into our evaluation of others and self sometimes what's just indoctrination or fashion or the dominant view of the culture. It's not necessarily such an open-eyed, unblinkered view of the moral landscape.

Some souls, as I see different people, read about different people, know different people, may have a kind of soul calling to express or manifest what might be quite extraordinary virtues—not so commonly found virtues. A kind of boldness that's out of the ordinary, a moral courage that's out of the ordinary, for instance, to speak the truth, to stand up in truth despite threats and possible dangers. In their soul style, they might express and manifest what Hartman called this radiant virtue—the German strahlende Tugend. I asked Kirsten and she said that's not a good translation, but I didn't ask her what a better one would be. She said it would be difficult to find words.

But this radiant virtue—there's something in the being, it's like sunshine, spiritual sunshine just pouring out of them, radiating to those nearby. Sometimes it communicates non-verbally and indirectly, sometimes through direct interactions. That's not a common virtue. It's an uncommon virtue.

Or a person may have a capacity for a kind of radical generosity—how they are with money, how they are with their possessions. A kind of magnanimity, a largeness of soul, a big spirit, a big heart. An adventurousness of spirit that's quite rare. Some people may have those kinds of more extraordinary virtues, and that's their soul style, that's their soul shape, that's what they're called to manifest in this life. It's part of their ethos, their soul, their personality.

And sometimes what I notice is that this manifestation, this soul style, may come in a package where other virtues are relatively neglected. We've touched on this before, or even contravened, or at least not developed so much. For example, they may not be gentle of speech. They may be at times quite harsh, even insensitive, judgmental. Or they just seem to live in a way that keeps quite different sexual mores. They may be quite promiscuous, and other people might be looking and judging that promiscuity. Maybe that goes with the kind of liberality and freedom of soul.

Oftentimes, those particular neglects of whichever virtues are relatively speaking neglected may be judged by others in the society, in the wider society. But those others may be relatively or even completely insensitive or blind to the particular set of virtues that this person is expressing. They're blind to the radiant virtue. They're blind to the radical generosity. They're blind to the moral courage. Or they don't value it so much. They evaluate it differently.

And the others who are judging this person—I'm thinking of several people now—might also be blind or insensitive to the very idea of duty to one's soul, to one's daimon, to one's angel, to what Hartman calls the ideal personality.

So this is tricky. The universal values must be a foundation, must be a common universal foundation. But on top of this, there's this space, this amplitude for personal variation and disposition and inclination and the callings of the soul. It sounds simple, but it can be very tricky here. Because what exactly are those universal foundations? Where are the boundaries?

Consider Bob Marley, whose being exuded magnanimity, largeness of spirit, radical generosity, and openness. He radiated spiritual sunshine and beneficence, embodying boldness, adventurousness, and courage while bestowing his creative gifts artistically to humanity. Yet some criticized his sexual promiscuity and infidelity to his various partners.

This raises profound questions: In the particular personal, relational, marital, community and wider social context of Jamaica at that time, where exactly lay the boundary of universal values regarding sexual behavior or monogamy? This complexity illustrates how tricky these considerations become.

We encounter multiple tensions here: the need for faithfulness to individual soul callings and the virtues that grasp us, alongside duties to both collective well-being and universal values. Yet these universal values don't always have clearly demarcated edges. Moreover, people with certain kinds of spirit often face judgment from those blind to particular virtues or to the duty each soul has toward its own unique callings.

I tread carefully here, offering this as something to consider rather than providing definitive answers. These tensions arise from different pulls and demands—duties drawing us in various directions.

Hartman speaks of developing personality toward what he calls the ideal personality. Each person possesses this ideal existing in the realm of ideals. Though we never completely manifest or express it fully, it constitutes, in some ways, our more real essence than what we actually demonstrate. This ideal resembles what we've discussed as the angel out ahead or the daemon refracted.

In Hartman's language, developing our personality toward this ideal—listening faithfully to its callings, shapings, and promptings—constitutes virtue itself. Can we include this in our sense of values: the value of our individual personality, of listening to and caring for those unique soul callings and our soul's growth?

This developmental process includes each individual's unique weighing and differential emphasis between different values. How I weigh competing, oppositional values in situations differs from how you or another person might weigh them. This differential weighing becomes part of shaping our being, part of soul-making.

While goodness involves choosing the higher value, this principle alone doesn't provide sufficient clarity about what to do, nor does it offer a complete picture of what's involved in the choices presented to us as souls. Yes, we choose higher, but combined with this principle, we have the possibility to choose in different ways as part of developing our souls.

This faithfulness to our own soul's particularities and individualities—because our ideal personality itself constitutes virtue—creates an ought and duty to this unique, irreplaceable, once-in-a-cosmos soul. This unique, irreplaceable personality represents a moral demand, a moral value, perhaps a very high one. However, its value plummets if we contravene universal values in pursuing it.

This duty to the unique and irreplaceable once-in-a-cosmos soul that you are proves difficult to find in teachings—certainly in Buddha Dharma or in various emptiness teachings or oneness teachings. Generally, they lack this recognition. It's quite unusual even in moral philosophy to acknowledge this duty to what Hartman calls ideal personality, to our individual soul. Though I'm no expert in the range of moral philosophy, aside perhaps from Max Scheler, I'm uncertain where else such considerations appear among moral philosophers, who tend toward different approaches.

So within the realm of this consideration of what constitutes an individual calling and our duty to that calling, I want to explore three particular and somewhat unusual manifestations. Again, for the sake of opening out what is less commonly examined, and for the sake of understanding what has quite a lot to do with soul in particular ways.

The first is the virtue of nobility, as Hartman uses that word. I tend to use it in a slightly different way, but that's not important here. I want to talk about what he calls the noble—a possible kind of virtue or value, or rather orientation to value, that is rarer but may have its place when we consider the callings of individual souls.

For him, the noble is the opposite of the common. This has nothing to do with social class or money, nothing to do with aristocracy in the usual sense, nothing to do with ethnic or racial divisions. It is simply the opposite of the common, what he calls noble.

Because in a way, he writes, goodness can sometimes be commonplace. There is such a thing as hackneyed virtue, ignoble contentment, narrow-minded virtue and righteousness.

Now, he's not saying that all goodness is like that—that would be neither accurate nor kind. And even when there is hackneyed virtue, it doesn't make it bad; it's just common, just what everyone does or most people do.

This nobility he speaks of is actually not everyone's concern. Goodness—what it means to be good, to practice being good, to invest in goodness, to care for goodness—that's everyone's concern. Nobility is something particular to some souls. It is uncommon. It is always uncommon to few, he says. Its opposite is the common, the usual, ordinary, the well-worn track upon which both goodness and badness can be found.

By its very nature, the noble is not everybody's concern. So even among the good—those who are good or who care for goodness—there are the noble and the not so noble. He says it consists in nothing but an aristocracy of disposition.

What is he talking about? In any culture, there is a generally accepted morality—in most cultures at least, certainly throughout history, perhaps less so nowadays. We've discussed this historical fact of shifting moralities between cultures, different times and places in history, different communities. But this search for what is not yet in the range of accepted morality—this is a noble search.

Some people are sensitive to groping for, intuiting at the edge of, grasping and being grasped by a value or set of values that are out of the ordinary for their context, for their social context and its accepted morality. There's the prevailing view and whatever that morality encompasses. It can be extended upwards into higher reaches of the development of certain values—one way of grasping what's out of the common range. But it can also move laterally, not just upwards toward higher values or more extreme reaches of a certain value, but into different values that are not even on the radar of an accepted morality.

He says it is to this also—as well as to the height of moral values and extending the highest—to this wider range, this moving into new territory, this sensing or opening up of a novel ethical sensibility, that the searching glance of nobility is directed. Progress in selecting values, even within the range of goodness, is itself a function of the noble. For nobility of character is the pursuit of the uncommon.

What he's describing are pioneers in any given time and place, whose antennae, whose soul receptors are sensitive to what is uncommon, what is beyond the scope of usual sensibility. In opening up that sensibility, they break new ground. But in time, that new ground comes to be shared with the larger part of society. Those perspectives, sensibilities, and priorities come to be shared more widely. What was cutting-edge new territory becomes relatively common. Then the process must start again, historically. Now this range is common, and some people will be sensitive to newer values, to the uncommon.

The content of nobility changes, although its direction toward the uncommon remains the same, he writes. And he continues: in the historic process of the displacement of values from area to area within the whole range of the scope of the firmament of values...

In the historic process of the displacement of values, the essence of nobility is the perpetual anticipation, the searching and testing, the moving forward which transforms the ethos of an epoch. Its content at any given moment must therefore be the moral claim of the uncommon. Without the noble, the process must need stagnate, and since to stand still is an impossibility, become retrogressive. On the grand scale, nobility is the onward-striving life of the historical ethos. In the individual is the spirit of the pioneer.

Again, I don't know where this lands in you. Some of this sounds so elitist, and it's a certain view of history, but to me, there's something worth considering here. I just want to open out some territory for our consideration. It doesn't mean we have to buy these ideas wholesale, but there is something here, rarely considered in moral philosophy, that has importance for our considerations of soul-making.

He says that as regards its content, the higher development of the human type always depends on the actual tendency—not perhaps the conscious aims—of the noble. It necessarily clashes with the interest of those who are accounted "good," and is always to some extent aloof from the community at large and stands in open opposition to the universality of their standards. So again, we get this sense of people who would judge this prioritizing of virtues to which they are blind. There's a kind of clash between the normally respected members of society and those with this noble character—a clash of interests and moral values and vision and sensibilities. And so there's a kind of separation.

An improvement in the standard is made possible by concentration of energy upon a narrower sphere. Again, there's this principle we touched on before: how progress is often made, new territory is stretched into, by focusing and getting interested in something particular and really heightening our focus, our work in that direction. Hence the necessary remoteness of the selecting group from the general public.

He writes quite strongly: "The noble man hates all compromise as to values, even those that are wise and beneficent." Can you get the sense of the kind of soul character he's describing? A pioneer who is at odds with the entrenched, ordinary, common, respectable way of being. They are reaching out, listening to some kind of sense of something else that is possible—some extension that's possible. And there is in that character a kind of dislike of compromise. They tend to be very uncompromising.

"His salvation lies in another direction, in the exclusive fostering of the value which he thinks should be preferred, even at the expense of all others." This kind of character can often seem to others a bit out of balance. They're pressing on into the future, into unexplored territory. As such, they can be leaning forward into that in a way that others would regard as being out of balance. Perhaps it's part of the soul style.

Is it always a demand for the soul to be balanced? You get a lot of that in some interpretations of Jungian psychology—it's all about wholeness and balance. And yet there is a place for a lack of balance. Perhaps there's a place for this, perhaps there's a soul style that goes with that. And yes, it comes with costs.

This is an unusual consideration, an unusual way of thinking, perhaps controversial, but it might be relevant to certain souls. It might be relevant to the duty that certain souls have—the particular duties in the realm of values. They always go together, duty and value.

The expanding into new territory of valuational sensibility and the ethical side... we've talked about values being an intrinsic part of soul-making as one of the elements of the imaginal, and everything we're discussing about ethics and how they relate to values and how our relationship with values and virtues can be made soul-making. Some people have suggested something like this to me: that soul-making itself is a kind of value. We're valuing, we value soul-making. As such, that might be what Hartman would call a noble virtue, or one of the new virtues for our time—a relatively new value.

We value something because it's soulful. We value soul-making. We value that whole ethos and sensibility and sensitivity to existence, to self, other, world, to the elements of our psychology, to the cosmos. And that in our time, that might be an expansion into newer territory in terms of a new virtue, a new value. Soul-making itself.

The second area I'd like to consider—again, quite tricky territory, but we'll see how we do—is hatred. Hatred. I want to see if it's possible to shine a little light again from the point of view of soul and what it might have to do with soul—hatred and soul.

We value soul-making, that whole ethos and sensibility toward existence—toward self, other, world, toward the elements of our psychology, toward the cosmos. In our time, this might represent an expansion into newer territory, a new virtue, a new value that soul-making offers.

The second area I'd like to consider—though it's quite tricky territory—is hatred. I want to see if it's possible to shine a little light from the perspective of soul and what it might have to do with soul: hatred and soul.

So what do we mean by hatred? If you look it up in the dictionary, it simply says something like "intense dislike," which is good enough for our purposes. Different schools approach the psychology of hatred in various ways, defining it in more specific terms. But let's say this: intense dislike, and so to speak, making almost an enemy out of something.

It could manifest in a cold way—some people include in their definition of hatred that it has a coldness different from anger, which is hot. But I include both. So it can be cold, withdrawn and out of relationship, or it can be hot, ranting, whatever.

We should also say that hatred does not necessarily include ill will. Ill will means to wish harm on someone. So you can intensely dislike something, you can hate something without wishing a person or persons harm. It's not the same either as cruelty, which is inflicting harm and enjoying it—either inflicting harm or enjoying a harm that someone else is suffering. Those are, if you like, a whole step further from what I'm talking about here by hatred.

So we have intense dislike that doesn't necessarily include ill will or cruelty. Let's see if we put this in a soul-making context, bringing together these elements and shining light from the perspective of soul-making teachings. Perhaps there's something worthwhile to consider here that can help open things up.

I've said several times that perhaps a really fundamental axiom of soul-making dharma is: soul loves soul-making, soul wants soul-making. It sounds so simple—soul wants soul-making. And in a way, it might be possible to use that axiom very basically, taking it as a first principle and seeing what follows from it.

So rather than saying human beings want attachment, or human beings want pleasure, or human beings want biological survival—whatever the primary drives might be—what if we say, actually, soul wants soul-making? Just entertain the idea that this is the primary drive. Our primary drive as human beings is toward soul-making, and this gets diverted, subverted in different ways. What might ensue? What might this imply when we consider our psychology and our needs as human beings, how we consider developmental psychology and all kinds of things?

Soul wants soul-making, which implies eros, because eros is an indispensable element of soul-making. And soul-making also involves, with the eros, that the self, other, world, and even our eros itself become imaginal. Soul-making also asks that the sense of self, other, world in our life mirror those imaginal things. So there has to be some refracting, some mirroring, some reflecting. And with the eros, there's always this beyond—always something to reach into, to grope into, to feel into, to sense into, to create, to discover into. There's always the angel out ahead.

Now, soul wants soul-making, but because of avijjā, because of the basic delusional reification of self, other, world, and elements of our psyche and psychology and being—for instance, eros—because of this delusional reification, because of cultural indoctrination, because of limited patterns or limitations on the movement and growth, the expansion of eros, of psyche, of logos, and also of emotional, heart, life, and energy in general, the soul often moves in a direction that is not soul-making.

Many people would contest this idea that the basic drive is toward soul-making, saying something like: before all this soul-making stuff, before eros for soul-making which is like icing on the cake, souls, beings, egos want to live. They want biological survival. They want to feel well. They want pleasurable sensations—the pleasure principle and all that.

But we're not clinging to this as dogmatic ultimate truth, this idea that what souls want most fundamentally is soul-making. It's illuminating, I think, and opens up different perspectives and avenues in our life. And you can look throughout history, even today in the West, at countless numbers of human beings who choose soul-making over and before pleasure, over and before even health, and sometimes even physical survival. Sometimes making choices in the service of something that's soul-making, despite the material cost, the hedonic cost—meaning it's painful, it's unpleasant—and despite physical cost.

There are countless examples that bear witness to this prioritizing of soul-making over any of these other drives that are usually considered more primary. Something can trump all those. A person can say, "It doesn't matter if I die. I sacrifice my health. I sacrifice my material well-being, my pleasure."

Let's play with this principle: soul wants soul-making as the fundamental drive, with everything that's involved in soul-making. Now, sometimes what happens is that soul-making is blocked. It's not possible, or it's blocked by some inner or outer obstacles. It's not possible for the sense of self, other, world and eros to become imaginal.

Either one has only literalized the desire, so there's desire present, but it's craving rather than eros, and nothing is imaginable for whatever reason—or in the blocking, one literalizes desire. This can go both ways. The literalized desire blocks the soul-making, or when soul-making is blocked in some other way, then the desire is still there and can only get literalized because it cannot get transformed and dimensionalized by the soul-making process.

Then a few different things can happen. One is we can try to have whatever it is—the object that we want. Hatred often arises when there's something we want but cannot have. Without eros being allowed to instigate the soul-making dynamic and allow things to become imaginal, to have dimensions and depths, this desire is merely craving, not eros. It has to move on a one-dimensional plane, flatly in the flat world, into a kind of greed for more and more things, or into consumerism.

Another possibility when soul-making is blocked and desire remains is a kind of collapse, a despair. The being collapses—you can see it in a person's body language and demeanor at a certain time, or as a more general trend throughout their whole life, because there's been a kind of habitual collapse of the whole soul, or a large portion of the soul. This happens because the eros, the libido, are not allowed to grow and extend things. Sometimes with that despair and collapse, there's a withdrawal—what some psychologists call a schizoid withdrawal. One retreats from relationship with the other or others.

What happens then to the eros or desire? A third possibility is that hatred ensues.

When we're frustrated in our desires, in the desires of our soul, we either reify something and move toward greed or craving on a flat level, collapse in despair inwardly in this withdrawal from relationship, or something gets transformed into hatred—or some combination of those three.

The hatred is particularly interesting because it often comes from a feeling or perception of powerlessness—the powerlessness of self in its desire with regard to something for the self, or its desire for something with regard to another, or its desire in the world, and not being able to have that. When this is intense, there's a feeling of powerlessness.

I want to focus on certain kinds of hatred—very particular manifestations of hatred. You can see this link with powerlessness, if you weren't already aware of it. Powerlessness and hatred often go together. If you find yourself in a really difficult contraction of hatred, one of the first things to do when working with it is to look for and ask: In what ways do I feel powerless? What is the particular kind of powerlessness I feel?

For example, sometimes someone who's a secularist—and I use that word in the sense of opposition to religious fundamentalism—may hate religious fundamentalists when they feel powerless in relation to them, either because they feel powerless regarding a group of terrorists or because they're living in a community or country with oppressive religious law. They might hate that because there's powerlessness in it.

Conversely, many religious fundamentalists hate secularists when they feel powerless in relationship to them. They may feel powerless with respect to the sweeping power of capitalist and modernist views, what they would regard as modernist immorality and amorality.

Hatred and powerlessness usually go together. The hatred often comes out of or from a feeling of powerlessness. This is quite important to be aware of and to explore.

But I want to talk about quite specific kinds of hatred—more narrow ones that don't just involve powerlessness, but powerlessness in relation to what may be soul-making. Where the soul wants soul-making and somehow it's blocked. And maybe it doesn't even realize that what it wants is soul-making. That's partly why I'm saying all this.

Actually, on the theme of power, there's a lot of energy, a lot of libido, a lot of life force tied up in hatred. It can feel completely frozen, completely contracted and imprisoned and not very powerful, but actually, because there's so much energy tied up in it, there's potentially a lot of power in it. So there's a possibility of liberating that power and energy.

Again, it depends on what we do with that power. It comes from a feeling of powerlessness, but it actually has in it the potential of tremendous power. That power can go in the soul-making direction—can kick-start, galvanize, instigate, open up, and give energy to the direction of soul-making, to things becoming images, to the imaginal sense of self, other, world, and eros.

Or it can get stuck in that withdrawal and despair. Actually, that tightness there, that contraction, has a lot of power. It takes quite a lot to keep the soul bound up like that, to keep the being contracted and withdrawn like that.

Or this potential power can move in the direction of literalized action—perhaps action to destroy the object of hatred, or to work towards what is actually desired.

There's potentially a lot of power in hatred. It feels, once we get under the sort of obvious feelings of hatred, then there's a sense of powerlessness, and underneath that is the potential of liberating power. And the question is: what will we do with that power? Where will it go?

So hatred comes out of, usually, a feeling or a perception of powerlessness of the self in relation to its desire for something regarding self or the world.

Now, an interesting thing about hatred—and this is the particular kind of hatred I want to talk about—is that oftentimes certain kinds of hatred arise for what is quite close or similar. So it's very common, for example, for people within a certain religious tradition to end up hating, intensely disliking, or opposing someone in the same tradition whose teachings are in some ways very similar—making a kind of enemy or polemic out of them. This happens in the realm of philosophy, in psychological schools, or whatever. This is quite interesting.

Why is it that certain kinds of hatred arise much more towards some expression or manifestation that's actually not too far from one's own position? If we think, for example, it's unlikely that someone in the Insight Meditation tradition would start hating the proponents of indigenous belief from Papua New Guinea or something like that—it's too dissimilar. But within that range of what is quite similar, let's say the Insight Meditation tradition or Tibetan Buddha Dharma, it can be intense and polemic.

The Insight Meditation tradition tends not to speak these things, but they simmer along there in the background, and you can hear them come out. You've probably heard it seep out of this voice at times. The Tibetans are much more open about it and engage in what I think is probably a much healthier open polemic that's quite cutting and intense at times.

So why the similarity? Is it something to do with the relationship between eros and hatred? Are there certain souls who might have a lot of soulfulness, a lot of disposition towards soul-making, towards image, towards eros, that may be in some ways liable to or prone to this kind of hatred for something that's actually quite similar?

What's the connection here possibly? Eros delineates. We talked about this when we went into detail in previous retreats. What does eros do? It complexifies, it creates distinctions, it creates and discovers more and more faces in what it loves and carves its relationship with those particulars. Making those distinctions, discovering and creating those delineations, those different faces—this is part of the whole process. Certainly one can get attached to those.

But there's something probably more primary even than the attachment: the fear of the dissolving of the objects of eros that have been created, discovered through this process of fine delineation, of subtle discernment, discrimination, subtle kind of differentiation into different aspects. When another teaching or tradition or school of thought is quite close, it perhaps presents more of a danger to one's own objects of eros—what one has delineated and what one loves in terms of what's opening up for oneself.

Where there's less similarity, where the difference is huge, it's strangely less likely that hatred arises. Somehow the object of my eros, that which I love, that which I'm discovering and creating here in terms of thought and the direction of my eros and the whole sense of soul—carving that out in terms of self, other, world—if that's blocked somewhere or crowded out by something that's similar, but in the similarity tends to be heard or seen in a way that washes over all differences, then the hatred might arise. It's more likely to arise.

This is interesting. Is there a relationship between eros and hatred? Hatred in Pali, in Sanskrit, the word is dvesha. The root there is from dva, which means "two," "to make two." And of course, creating duality is part of eros as well. This is why eros can be dangerous, a double-edged sword, if you like. Is there some connection here—the need to differentiate, and the actual differentiation that comes with eros, and the tendency or the danger of hatred there?

Thinking also of James Hillman at this point, who said somewhere, "You have to hate something." If you read some of his books, and more and more in interviews, but it comes across in writings as well, he's quite polemic. What he would have openly called a hatred of different schools of psychology. Notice that his hatred was for psychologists—he was a psychologist hating different or varying schools of psychology.

For instance, there was a teacher of his at the Jung Institute called Marie-Louise von Franz, and she presented a certain picture of puerpyschology and other things which affronted Hillman's own soul sensibility and the kind of careful differentiations that his soul-making process made, that his eros and the eros of his intellect and sensibility made. So he, in a way, hated her teachings. He also hated what he regarded as the dominant psychology at the time when he was beginning to write—the dominant ego psychology or behavioral psychology.

So, in a way, the preponderance of these dominant paradigms, and the power wielded by Marie-Louise von Franz as an authority in the Jungian school alongside the established psychological frameworks, perhaps made him feel a relative lack of power. The danger, as I said, was that what he wanted to find out for himself, discover, create space for, and present—both to his soul and to the soul of the world and to others—these faces were in danger of getting covered over. In that situation, there was a feeling of relative powerlessness.

But what was interesting in that case, and part of what I want to convey, is that he was able to mobilize a power for himself in actuality by writing and speaking, and also by working with and supporting others whose work he sympathized with. In doing all this—beginning to write and speak and carve out this vision, this soul vision and soul sensibility, and present it as something different and differentiable to the world—he in a way became image for himself. His eros, all of it, was allowed to come into the soul-making process. Even the other can become a kind of imaginal other, in terms of the other as object of hatred, whether it's a school or a person embodying that school.

This is not actually, as I said, ill will or harm. But it can become imaginal and not reified. So faced with that potential obliteration and covering over, the loss of what his soul-making process was revealing and creating—the differentiations, the aspects of divinity, the aspects of soul—faced with the danger of that and the relative powerlessness or perception of powerlessness in that wider situation, he was able to act and move in a way that the whole landscape of that environment and all the constituents of that landscape in the world of psychology became actually imaginal for him. He himself became an imaginal character in that landscape.

Remember, the erotic imaginal always has these beyonds to it. So you get something similar with the warrior always fighting as image. There's not an end to this. It's not necessarily an end to some of these battles. Some revolutionaries actually need a constant revolution. The soul would not be satisfied with arriving at some kind of finished utopia. There's this beyond there.

Faced with this kind of situation—the desire, the frustrated desire, the incipient movement of eros, and the sensed powerlessness and danger with respect to what it wants—it could be anything that the soul wants. But getting what one wants, or what one thinks one wants, in some of these situations, may not actually be soul-making. That's a point to bear in mind.

One way out of all this, one way to dissolve the hatred, is to really let go in terms of what's taught in some of the classical Buddha Dharma teachings. Another is when the self actually manages to get some power and no longer feels so powerless—when there's a decrease of the sense of powerlessness, and the sense of the self that's desired, whatever the other is that's desired, and the sense of the world that one's in that's desired are achieved materially or literally. That would be another way out of that hatred. But another is for something to become image—for self, other, world, eros to become image, or some combination of all these avenues.

It's worth bearing in mind that sometimes, as I said, getting what one wants—the literal achievement of what one desires—may or may not be soul-making. If the self, other, world, and eros don't open up to the imaginal, with this open-endedness and beyondness, the forever beyondness there, then that process may not be soul-making.

We've talked about this before on previous retreats: the need for boundaries, because boundaries make two. There's a boundary between this and that, between number one and number two. So boundaries, limits, actually form part of the crucible of soul-making. Sometimes, as I said, getting what one wants, if one's not careful, is not actually soul-making. If I get what I want, there has to be something more that I haven't got that I want. There's the extension into the beyonds of the eros, the angel out ahead, always moving ahead, the infinite growth of those beyonds. So there's still a boundary between what I have and what I don't have that can potentially allow more—allow a soul-making process.

I can end the hatred by getting what I want, but it might not be soul-making. What's the fundamental desire there? Is it to get what I want, or is it actually the soul-making? If I've sold it short by just getting what I want, I've flattened it.

So hatred will stay as poisonous hatred—and it really can be very poisonous and very imprisoning, toxic in the way it seeps out to other people as well—when self, other, world, and eros cannot become image. It can be transformed, it can dissolve when we let go, when we really fully let go in the usual dharmic sense, or when we get some power in terms of what we want, or when things become image and are really allowed to become imaginal.

I was struck—I don't know if you saw it—there was a video someone sent me sometime in the last three years.

And it was, I think, someone had posted on Facebook or something. It was a kind of selfie video that this young woman had taken. I think she was Swedish, but I can't remember. And she had boarded a plane—a regular airline flight to Afghanistan or somewhere—which contained an Afghani man that was being deported, probably facing great threat to his life back in Afghanistan.

She boarded this plane and took a selfie of herself standing up and refusing to sit down when they asked everyone to sit down so they could take off. She filmed it on her camera. She disrupted the flight and she and the Afghani man were removed. But I was so touched by seeing this video. I don't know if you saw it—I think it was quite popular.

She was in a situation where there was potentially a great deal of powerlessness, a sense of powerlessness. Yet she actually did something quite brave and extraordinary. I thought it very beautiful in the kind of grace with which she did it and the largeness of soul with which she did it. But it was self-empowering in the sense that instead of just feeling powerless in terms of that terrible situation, she did something which was self-empowering.

By empowering herself that way, I don't know if she would have gotten contracted into hate, but there was certainly much less chance. There was the dissolving of any chance of hatred through the self-empowering. And hatred often goes with this kind of hardness of heart, something really brittle and contracted there.

Part of what was really touching to me seeing this was just how vulnerable she could be at the same time. She was very strong, standing up, being very firm with those who were shouting at her and criticizing her and calling her names. She was very strong, very upright, very bold, very courageous, very clear, and at the same time very vulnerable. So she was crying and there was a richness of soul there. There was a breadth of soul. There wasn't any hardness there at all.

And it was interesting too—again, we're talking about ethics in terms of some of what people who didn't like what she was doing, some of the other passengers on the flight complained about the inconvenience. "What about, you know, there are children on the plane," they said. "You're upsetting the children." And again, you can hear there the sort of opposition of different value systems—I would say actually values of different heights in this hierarchy of values.

You know, inconvenience: how high a value, how important a value is convenience? And there's so often this trope of "upsetting the children" as if that's something that's kind of become something almost sacred in some people's outlook in our culture, so that those values like that become somehow more important or eclipse the value of care, of kindness, of compassion, of saving someone's life, of standing up to injustice.

And again, so we have to be very careful with hatred. I'm just talking there about certain manifestations of hatred that come out of—actually, at their root, there's a blocked soul-making. There's some soul-making and some direction of eros and image and soulfulness that wants to be allowed to flourish, wants to be given space to carve out a pathway for a soul, and it's blocked, and hatred can come out of that.

Sometimes we're just so in the hatred, we don't actually quite realize the different levels of what's going on, even the level of the powerlessness, etc. In some of those instances it's worth—it's not easy, but it's worth perhaps approaching it with this lens, to do with power and powerlessness and soul-making and what the soul might want there that's getting blocked and are there ways for it to open up the situation imaginally, etc.

So again, tricky territory, difficult, potentially contentious, but really important to consider if we want to bring in the reflections about soul and considerations of soul into our considerations and reflections on ethics and morality and also psychology more generally.

Okay, the third—again, example of a kind of unusual area that's unusual to consider, an area of ethical values that's unusual to consider, but that also might have something to do with what's a personal calling for some souls—is one I've mentioned before in one of the earlier talks in the talks on ethics. It's this love of the remote.

So I want to say something about that. I think it was coined by Nietzsche as an idea, but I'm not entirely sure. So what is this love of the remote? I've actually mentioned it earlier, but I want to go into it again.

There is for us a kind of bond with those that are nearest to us in the community. We have an obligation to them, etc. We feel that bond. We rub shoulders with them. We feel moral duty and concern in relation to them. Love of the remote has—one of its aspects is a love for, an obligation for, a moral duty, or it's a sense of love, a sense of obligation, a sense of moral duty to the future, if you like, to the following generation or following generations. That's one aspect of it.

I'll qualify a bit more in a moment.

So Hartman writes about this, and he says, "The responsibility which arises therefrom"—the responsibility which arises from this, the responsibility of this responsibility to the future, this particular kind of responsibility to the future—"signifies a solidarity of a newer and greater kind than that of justice, brotherly love, and faith. Like these, it is a bond, a fellowship, a pledge, a joint responsibility of person for person." But it's different, he says.

"In it, the man of today feels himself one with the man of the faraway future, though the latter will have forgotten him and cannot be of help to him. The temporal direction of cause and effect is not reversible. The influence of man on man, solidarity itself, is only one-sided. Only he who lived previously can be of service to him who lives afterwards. The successor bears no retrospective obligation. Instead, there falls to him a new obligation towards the generations coming after him. Solidarity is directed forward only. Its form is progress, not coexistence. Still, it is a bond which is great not only in extent, but great in the quality of its task."

So there's perhaps some overlap here with what he calls nobility. And again, we're talking about something that not everyone will resonate with. Not everyone will feel a soul calling and a duty in this direction.

He continues, "That it is a bond of a more fragile kind, that it is taken so much less earnestly by the living than is the solidarity of justice or love. This is not due to its own nature. It is due to the moral immaturity of the living, to their not having wakened to their greatest task. It is their lack of thorough self-conquest which transcends the sphere of the now and the near."

So again, it's quite strong language. But he's saying sometimes we get so preoccupied or so limited in our sense of the scope of our obligations that we forget that we might have a greater obligation to the sort of progress of humanity, if you like.

In German it's called Fernsterliebe, and it was, in fact, Nietzsche who coined the term. It's very characteristic of Nietzsche and something that he was perhaps the first person to promote—the first person to cotton on to and sense really keenly. He had an imbalanced relationship with it because he neglected its antinomical value in the love of the nearest. So Hartmann criticizes him for that, which I think is a good point.

But then I'm going to read another passage. He says, "Love of the remotest at first really requires an overcoming of one's commitment to the nearest." So this is interesting, and we're talking about values that have antinomical relationships.

"It is the same overcoming which generally inheres in the nature of a future intention. Everything which is dear and entrusted to man attaches to the immediate environment, usually. Here, an attachment of love to the remote is demanded." Somehow I have to feel this attachment, this moral obligation to the remote, the far future.

"Hence not only natural inclination but also genuine moral habit must be overcome," he says. "A valuable commitment, not acquired without moral struggle, is to retire into the background and give way to another ethos."

So we may have worked hard to practice love of the nearest, to practice altruism. And in a way, at a certain stage, maybe something else has to come in. And that love of the nearest has to kind of, relatively speaking, diminish in our hierarchy of priorities for some.

"So it's the conquering of a product of previous self-conquest. Love of the nearest, or altruism, went counter to self-love, to egoism. It was a tremendous extension of the sphere of life, efficiency, evaluation, participation. Now even this widened sphere is seen to be too narrow, to be a drag on the intention of love. Love of the nearest does not go beyond one's contemporary. Its effect does not endure. It dies with its object. It is not adapted to the continuation of its object, but to his present existence. Love of the remotest seeks a different measure of efficiency, an efficacy which will last."

Now, I should qualify what he means here, because he doesn't mean that some of you have heard of the need to consider the next seven generations in our choices now. That to me is absolutely critical when we're talking about things like species loss and climate change. We really need to bring that kind of thinking, this care for the future, this care for the next seven generations, seventy generations. In terms of the totality, everyone in those generations we need to care for. That's, to me, a given and just common ethical sense—well, it should be common ethical sense.

But he's actually talking about something different here. It's not obvious from the language of "love the remote," but he writes, "In love of the nearest, the energy of striving, as it has no choice, reconciles itself with whoever is accidentally at hand." It's just the practicing of kindness and concern and empathy and support to whoever's around one. It has nothing to do with whether that person is worthy or not, just as when we teach metta.

It's unconditional in that regard. So it's not interested in assessing whether someone is worthy or unworthy of that kindness, that love of the nearest.

With love of the remotest, though, it's different. And this is where it might sound somewhat contentious to some people. The energy of striving, he writes, "shall serve not the nearest, but the best, whom it will bring to further fruition. Herein, a selection of persons from the point of view of values is introduced, a selection which on its side does not refer to the given person at all, but to the type of man."

So there's this interest—in this kind of love that Nietzsche was promulgating and that Hartmann's picking up on, and I think Max Scheler as well—there's this interest in those in the far future, but specifically those who are the most morally ready people, the most morally capable, what he calls "the best" in the future. So it's quite elitist and quite selective. And it does consider worth. It does evaluate in terms of values and virtues and moral capacity and sensibility.

This is probably not at all fashionable in many circles nowadays, given our current way of thinking in society. It's worth noting that in the Pali Canon, it mentions several times that the Buddha, when he was going to give a Dharma talk, would use his psychic powers, his siddhis, to survey the audience and find who was nearest to awakening. Not those who were already Arahants, not those who were at the beginning, but he would get a sense of where everyone was at with his psychic powers. And he would aim his talk, pitch his talk at those who were nearest to awakening. Not at the beginners, not at those far away, but those who were nearest to awakening. Again, he's aiming at the best. He's aiming at a certain capacity.

How rare that is for us to think that way these days. For many of us, it contravenes another kind of ethical law—this love of the nearest, which often goes with a concern for who's weakest, who's more the beginner, who's more in need. So there is this antinomy between these two valuational pools and duties. Hartmann criticized Nietzsche for being too one-sided and neglecting the love of the nearest. But there's this antinomy, this tension there.

Because it puts one out of relationship a little bit, or less in relationship with those around one, and the demands and the more immediate and obvious contacts that we have with those around us, this is a hard value, a hard virtue. And Hartmann writes, "The way of the creative spirit is hard."

There's something in this of the creative, because again, we're forging into new territory, giving a gift to those in the remote future who may be able to understand something that's not necessarily easily understandable now, who may be able to sense and who may have a capacity that's not readily available now. For the sake of some larger process of humanity, perhaps, and also because some people's souls are called to do that.

But this way of the creative spirit is hard. There's a creative spirit in this. And he says it is "as hard towards oneself as towards another. It's tough. It doesn't set much store by either. Both are means"—either oneself or another, regarding oneself as a means.

So in this kind of hard work, there's a tough love. One's hard on oneself. One's not soft and mollycoddling, giving in to what one needs, even though one might be isolated in that venture, in that endeavor, in that work.

"To be a means," he writes, "is what is hard for any man. All that is sensitive in him protests. Here that apriorism of sympathy must be silenced"—so even sympathy for oneself. "Another apriorism, which is also fraught with value, rises up against it: a prophetic sense of the ethical potentiality in man, his latent capacity, the future value which transcends his own person and his own environment."

I don't know if you can get a sense of the loneliness of that—the isolation, struggle, potential to be misunderstood.

There's maybe an overlap here in the realm of aesthetics. As I said, for me sometimes I'm not even sure I make a distinction between aesthetic sensibility and moral sensibility. I class them all together sometimes. But I'm reminded—if there's a similarity or overlap, I don't know—but I'm reminded of Beethoven in his late period, in his last years. He'd gone deaf quite a bit before that, but he was able to write quite brilliant music with no real loss to the quality, extraordinary quality of his music, even though he was deaf.

But in his late period, he opened out a whole new way of composing, a whole new way of thinking about music. And his contemporaries thought he'd gone mad, actually. They couldn't make head or tail of this new music—the late string quartets or some of the late piano pieces. And it wasn't that they thought, "Oh, he's gone deaf," because they knew he could write when he was deaf.

They thought he'd gone mad. They thought he'd just lost it. But he knew what he was doing, and something I think Mahler said as well, of his symphonies, when no one really listened to his music—both Beethoven and Mahler said, these are for other generations. They're for future generations.

So there's a solitude in that. There's a hard task in there, a hard duty, when your attachment, when your love, when your care is for those in the future, and the fruit of which, the thanks for which, you will never know. You won't even know if it will land. You won't know if it will be received. And in the isolation of that, there can be difficulty.

As I said, this is something Hartmann picks up on. It's a strange venture, this one, because we really don't know the future. When there's the love of the nearest, I'm dealing with these people around. I can see what they need. I can feel it. I know I'm addressing something real. There's a chance that it will... It's obvious to me that we're talking about real needs and they're reasonable needs. It's a reasonable outpouring of my love and my care and my concern.

But when there's love of the remotest, I don't know. I don't know what its actual effect will be. Maybe there won't be anything, and all this sacrifice is in vain. And not only is it in vain, but in so doing, in sacrificing, I'm actually sinning—to use Hartmann's word—against my contemporaries and those around me.

So in this respect, he says, love of the remotest is worse than any other virtue, but especially so in its damage to brotherly love, which is always sure of its immediate objects, and which, even when it does not achieve them, is sure that they are reasonable.

There's something about this—and I'll just read it again, another paragraph from Hartmann. Again, this really may not resonate with some of you, I'm sure it won't, but some of you will hear the kind of soulfulness in this, and the kind of beauty of this. And it may be for some of you that this kind of love is part, again, part of your personal soul calling. The way your personal, the way your personality, your ideal personality, your soul weighs up preferentially between different values.

This is love of the remotest nature: "Excels brotherly love and every other virtue, on certain accounts. Greatness of moral spirit, intensity of spiritual energy, which is required in the taking upon oneself of what is inherently uncertain. The venture is great. Only a deep and mighty faith, permeating a person's whole being, is equal to it. It is a faith of a unique kind, different from trust between man and man—a faith which reaches out to the whole of things and can do no other than stake all it has. It is faith on the grand scale, faith in a higher order, which determines the cosmic meaning of man. When it becomes active and carries out its schemes, its work is of historic importance."

And this energy is harmonious with a similar feeling, what he calls hope, when it is raised to its highest power—the basic feeling of ethical idealism, which bears all things and gladly suffers for an idea, with a capital I, so that transcendent moral value. Bears all things and gladly suffers for that sole sense of the values in their transcendent dimensionality, divinity, beyondness. It's love for them, never despairing. Hope—the peculiar assurance which takes hold of one who risks all on a single issue.

So again, sometimes we might find ourselves engaged in something we talk about our duty, our moral duty to our fellow human beings. Sometimes we're limited in our sense of scope of who our moral duty is. It's interesting reading moral philosophers how often they neglect the natural world and our moral duty to the natural world and our moral duty to animals. It's all very anthropocentric.

And then there's also the potential limiting just to the love of the nearest—just those who are around me now. And not so much the vision opening to this love of the remotest. And in a way we could also add, and maybe it's actually akin to, maybe it's a different name for the same thing—our duty to the angels.

Sometimes angels want something. They always want something from us. And sometimes what they want is quite hard. It's a big ask. And sometimes we're engaged in a work that it may seem it doesn't have any bearing on or effect on our contemporary life. No one else seems to value it. It seems like it won't have any impact. But there may be a duty to the angels. And maybe the angels are the face of the remote.

The face of those souls in the far future who will have capacity.

As I said, these are three or four potentially controversial ideas, but also potentially very relevant to our considerations of both soul-making and ethics. They speak to the way in which the needs of individual souls—that realm of ethics pertaining to individual souls and their need to find their particular callings, their particular duties, to manifest and realize their ideal personality in Hartmann's words—how all that mixes with and becomes part of the bigger vision of ethics.

Regarding personhood, personality, and soul, Alistair MacIntyre, in his book After Virtue, talks about this from quite a different perspective—not using our language or Hartmann's language, but from his own philosophical vantage point. He explores the potential for a kind of narrative unity for a life, for a human life. There's some sense of weaving together, creating, discovering—these are my words now—a kind of soul story, narrative unity in which our identity, our particular soul, the face of our soul, is bound. This has something to do with what Hartmann would call the ideal personality, though MacIntyre uses different language.

He writes: "In what does the unity of an individual life consist?" One reason he asks this is because one of his tentative conclusions was that it's only when there's a kind of unity of a life that all the virtues make sense and find their place within that unity. Whether we need to necessarily believe that, or whether we can also have what Hillman calls a polytheistic psyche, remains an open question. Even a polytheistic psyche can have a certain unity at another level. But for MacIntyre, this idea of unity is something which makes sense of virtues. Without a sense of unity to the movement and direction of one's life, all these potentially competing values can't be assessed, judged, or placed in relative order of duty and importance for the individual.

His answer is that "its unity is the unity of a narrative embodied in a single life. To ask 'What is the good for me?'—in other words, what is the morally good for me—is to ask how best I might live out that unity and bring it to completion. The unity of a human life is the unity of a narrative quest."

A quest for what? He identifies two key features of a medieval conception of a quest that need to be recalled. First, without some at least partly determinate conception of the final telos, the final goal, there could not be any beginning to a quest. Some conception of the good is required. Second, the medieval conception of a quest is not at all that of a search for something already adequately characterized, as miners search for gold or geologists for oil. It is in the course of the quest, and only through encountering and coping with the various particular harms, dangers, temptations and distractions which provide any quest with its episodes and incidents, that the goal of the quest is finally to be understood. A quest is always an education, both as to the character of that which is sought and in self-knowledge.

His provisional conclusion about the good life is that "it is the life spent in seeking for the good life." This quest intuits partially what it's looking for. It has some sense of what's good and valuable, some sense of its final telos, and is also in its process an education, both as regards the goal and as regards the self. The virtues necessary for the seeking are those which enable us to understand what more and what else the good life is.

This offers another way of thinking about the place of personality, personhood, self, and uniqueness in our moral explorations. This quest involves search, involves eros regarding values, involves stretch, involves questioning, and is potentially—as I read what MacIntyre has written—open-ended, as the whole soul-making process is. Perhaps our exploration of morality is inevitably, or should be inevitably, inherently open-ended. We will never finish with this area.

So one idea of what unifies a human life and gives it that stamp, that mark, that face of our unique soul is our unique quest for goodness—for moral goodness, for understanding values and moving towards those values, moral and aesthetic and all that, which speak to us, which touch us, which are necessary. As I've mentioned, this might vary from person to person to a certain extent, and it might be open-ended. I think it should be open-ended.

These are some perspectives and ideas to ponder, to think about, to reflect on. Some of them, as I said, are not easy, not simple. Some of them are relatively rare in what usually gets considered in discussions of ethics and soul-making.

Let's stop there for today.

CHAPTER 196

Sīla and Soul (Part 9)

Rob Burbea · 1h10

> In this ninth part of his series on ethics and soul-making, Rob Burbea examines different approaches to moral philosophy, contrasting utilitarian ethics with virtue ethics. He explores how soul-making practice relates to traditional Buddhist emphasis on reducing dukkha, questioning whether the drive to end suffering is the only motivation behind ethical action. Drawing on philosopher Nicolai Hartmann's hierarchy of values, Burbea discusses how higher values like beauty and species preservation may be 'useless' in utilitarian terms yet essential for meaning and fulfillment. Using examples from climate activism and species extinction, he argues that both foundational values (basic human needs) and higher values (aesthetic, spiritual concerns) are needed to address contemporary crises. The talk challenges practitioners to consider what truly motivates their ethical choices beyond suffering reduction, suggesting that soul-making itself may be ultimately 'useless' yet profoundly meaningful.

I'm pretty sure I said at the beginning of this talk that there are many possible approaches to ethics, many different perspectives we can bring to bear on that whole domain of our existence. There are different systems of moral philosophy.

For example, there's utilitarianism, which some of you will know originated with Jeremy Bentham and John Stuart Mill. In that kind of approach, the goodness or what is good is what has utility—in other words, what is useful. That's how you measure and adjudicate actions and behavior. So behavior and actions are chosen for the usefulness of their consequences. You have an eye to the likely consequence of an action, and you measure its usefulness. Usefulness in that system, utility in that system, is usually thought of as maximizing pleasure over pain for the greatest number of people—maximizing pleasure, minimizing pain, maximizing happiness (whatever exactly that means), and maximizing well-being of the greatest possible number of people. Note also, as in so many moral systems of thought, the anthropocentrism there: it is usually focused just on people and not other species.

There are variations within utilitarianism, different variations of that kind of approach. And like all approaches, it will have its particular strengths and weaknesses and its particular difficulties that it encounters. You could hear when I was describing this how exactly do you measure happiness? What exactly do you mean by well-being? How do you try and assess these things? Also, what is the radius of concern in terms of which "greatest number of people" where and when?

For example, some of these Extinction Rebellion actions involve blocking roads or bridges. The traffic stops and people are held up who are part of the traffic, trying to get somewhere, go to work, or this or that. So there's a kind of inconvenience for some people, and for a certain number of people, there's an inconvenience and maybe financial loss, who knows what. Some people were critical: "Oh, you're being selfish by blocking the traffic that way. You're being self-indulgent," etc.

But widening the concern: there are these people in the traffic jam who have been inconvenienced, who may experience some loss of profit or some hassle or whatever, a decrease in their happiness for some time. One could widen that sphere to the whole of society, or the whole of humanity, or the whole of humanity including future generations, or including not just all that, but all species. And then when you start weighing it up that way from a utilitarian perspective, if there's some chance that that kind of action has an effect globally on government policy and corporate policy, then the net increase in likely well-being and happiness may be justified, may be measured to make it worthwhile. But you run into all kinds of difficulties in terms of measurement.

We have been approaching and discussing ethics and questions about ethics from, I guess, mostly what people would call the perspective of virtue ethics, where the emphasis is less on the consequence and more on the subject, the moral subject, the person themselves and their virtues and values and what they're investing in and what they're energizing and what they're working towards and what they're sensitive to.

Here, in that perspective, there's this shift of emphasis. Moral values, as values, are not regarded as dependent on or proportional to their worth. Their value is not proportional to, as John Finnis says in summarizing Hartman's approach, the amount or degree of the lower values they actualize or aim at. They're of a different, higher, better order than the lower values.

He gives an example: the value of active justice in a moral agent—a person working towards or implementing a situation of justice between two parties, people or communities or whatever. The value of that active justice is much higher than the goods value of the apportionments they affect. In other words, someone comes in—let's say it's a judge or someone else—and reapportions money or property or whatever according to measures of justice. However little or great the goods value of the money or the property they redistribute justly, the moral value of the justice stands above that. It's much higher. It's on a completely different level.

So it's a different emphasis. But I also said that we can think sometimes—and most people often nowadays, what's more popular, I think—in terms of the efficacy of one's actions, the consequences and what will work. When we approach something like climate change, species loss, these almost overwhelming problems and issues, crises we face, we think: yes, we need something that's efficacious, we need something that's going to make a difference. And of course, that's the case.

So there are two possible ways in: the way of emphasizing virtue or considering virtues and values, and the way of considering efficacy. I pointed out earlier that if there's too much of an emphasis on virtue, or only an emphasis on virtue, disregarding a consideration of the efficacy of our actions, then that over-emphasis on virtue is itself not a virtue. It's what you might call a disvalue. It's not a value, it's a disvalue. One has been, in a way, so narrowly concerned with virtue and neglectful of the efficacy.

So this whole approach of virtue ethics is one angle, one approach, and like all these things, we can have flexibility in how we approach at different times, or even the relative weight of consideration between, let's say, virtue ethics and considerations of efficacy. We don't always have to approach a situation—a moral situation, a moral crisis, a social or environmental situation—thinking predominantly about virtue.

But it can be part of our moral equipment, part of our moral calibration, our moral instrument. And we can move in and out of that.

Virtue ethics does lend itself, I hope it's clear by now, to a connection with soul-making in some of the ways that I've explored. But even when we consider soul-making, the intention for soul-making in life is not always going to be primary, and neither should it always be primary. There are other issues, there are other concerns, there are other demands in life. So we move in and out in our lives as practitioners, as soul-making practitioners, we move in and out of emphasizing or prioritizing an intention for soul-making. And that's appropriate. Flexibility—flexibility of way of looking, flexibility of approach, perspective—is really crucial.

When we consider values and virtues, there's this whole possibility of delineating and sensing a kind of hierarchy of values. There are higher values and lower values. To some extent that's possible to discern—where things stand, where two values might stand relative to each other on that hierarchy and what Hartman calls the scale of values. In his way of thinking, goodness is the inclination, the tendency to choose the higher values.

Sometimes this is obvious. It's obvious that this value is higher than that value among moral values. It's obvious that moral values are higher than goods values in that way of thinking. It's really a kind of sensibility—that sensibility to existence. In that sensibility to existence, that soul sensitivity, that sensibility to existence, moral values are higher than goods values. Some of those distinctions are obvious, some are much less obvious.

But I think it's important to realize that the rank, or what Hartman calls the grade—the place on the hierarchy of values—is not necessarily inherent in the value only. To some extent it is, but we also have these other considerations. For example, the fact that we might need to consider a virtue or a value as a complex of other virtues and values. With this notion of a counterweight needed, we're really talking about balances and spectra rather than single, cut-and-dried, black-and-white virtues. This already complicates the issue.

The second reason that the rank or grade or height of a value is not necessarily inherent just in the value itself is that when we consider it with more psychological breadth and sophistication, subtlety of discernment and awareness, we begin to realize that the citta, the soul, approaches the actualization or intention toward a virtue with all kinds of factors and perspectives. The mind, the heart, the being, the soul brings much to its moral intentions and to its working toward a value or the actualization of a virtue.

For example, it might be that wrapped up in the citta at that time is fear. One is actually intending a certain action, maybe even intending a virtue or a value, but it's coming out of fear. As such, it's more narrow-minded or reactive. Or it might be working against fear—one needs to overcome a certain fear to get behind that value and cultivate that virtue and instantiate it. We might say that when it comes out of fear, when it's prompted by fear and that kind of narrow contraction, perhaps it has less value, less height, than when there's no fear and it's a freer choice, a freer moral choice. It's coming more from the moral sensibility rather than from fear and reactivity.

Maybe—some people might say—it's even higher when one has to overcome fear in oneself. I'm afraid of the consequences. If I speak up courageously, I'm afraid of the consequences. I'm afraid of getting arrested, of getting a criminal record, of what people think, of getting ostracized. Perhaps that can be considered a higher value or virtue.

Sometimes our virtuous behavior and intentions come out of a narrow-mindedness. There's a kind of brittleness there, a narrow attachment to some code that's been handed down to us. Sometimes it comes out of habit—the almost mechanical churning of habit in consciousness. Sometimes a value takes much exertion to actualize, or asks a big stretch of the soul, of the being, or of the body even.

The whole way of looking at self, other, world, and our very intention, our will, our desire, our eros ethically—all this can vary hugely. We might say that there's a higher virtue when those ways of looking are richer, deeper, wider, more noble, more ensouled. All these other factors come in, and we might say that the height or grade of a value or a virtue depends also on those factors. What else is going on in the whole being? The totality—it's a function. If you like, the height, to a certain extent, is a function of that whole complex of intentions and ways of looking and factors, forces in the psyche.

With any virtuous intention or moral action, there can be a flat, ego-level version—a version based on some kind of fixated image, what we might call in our soul-making language an impoverished image. This version of virtue may look the same on the surface. Or it could be much more soulful, much richer, multidimensional, infused with a sense of divinity. There's a spectrum here—not black and white, but a whole range of possibilities.

Once we begin to attune and discern in this way, we recognize that this is quite a complex territory when it comes to judging the heights of values and virtues. Some care is needed in that assessment.

When we talk about climate change, and even more so about species extinction—the massive extinction occurring right now at the hands of human beings—I wonder whether this particular care for species extinction represents an example of a higher value. It's not the same as caring for the suffering of one animal or even a group of animals. It's something different, as I've touched on before. It's actually not just about suffering.

Let me return to this question: What's the relationship between care about suffering and our ethics and soul-making? What's the relationship in that nexus between reduction of suffering, care, ethics, and soul-making?

I remember some years ago reading something George Marshall used to publish, where he criticized many of the media messages trying to promote concern for climate change that featured polar bears. The earth is heating up, the ice is melting, the polar bears will suffer and may disappear. He was quite vociferous in attacking this kind of approach because, he argued, it doesn't actually work for most people in terms of galvanizing a response to climate change. You get the cute polar bear, but polar bears live in the North Pole. Most people don't really encounter polar bears in their lives. Most people would look at an advertisement like that and think, somewhere in the psyche, "Well, it's not really my concern or my children's concern." Most people are concerned about themselves and their children.

There's some truth in that observation. But perhaps the plight of the polar bear and the possible extinction or decimation of that species—I'm not talking about the suffering of individual polar bears, but the species itself—perhaps the sensibility to that concern, the sensitivity to the tragedy of species loss and the crime of ecocide and species extinction, those crimes against life itself—maybe that kind of sensitivity is actually a higher virtue. It correlates with a higher value.

As we've said, along with Hartman, some people may have a greater capacity, a greater talent for those kinds of virtues, or perhaps for higher virtues in general, just as some people have more talent for mathematical ideas, or aesthetic or musical talent, or art. You can have a talent for values.

The question becomes: Can that be trained? Can we encourage this extension of moral sensibility in ourselves, in each other, in society, in schools? Can we support growth in the education of our moral capacity and sensibility, our sensitivity?

As I mentioned with Polly Higgins, there was also recently the UN Executive Director for the Convention on Biological Diversity—I've forgotten her name—who said that biological diversity, species diversity, the thriving of many different species, is necessary to maintain the natural life support systems on which humanity depends. She added that with biodiversity, unlike climate change where people might feel the impact in their everyday lives, the effects are not so immediately clear. But by the time you feel what is happening, it's too late for us. It will be too late when the bees stop pollinating because there aren't enough bees, and we suffer in our agriculture.

I've touched on this before, but to me it's an important consideration: Is there something here that asks for a different order, a different height of moral sensibility?

What if scientists discovered that a certain species was actually "useless"—that it didn't really provide anything essential for the ecosystem, that the ecosystem could function fine without it, and we could get on fine without it, and other species could manage without it? Perhaps it's merely beautiful, merely graceful, merely miraculous. Perhaps it's not even beautiful by conventional standards.

You know, is a haddock beautiful? We have a narrow sensibility when it comes to beauty, often. Polar bears tend to be—despite being potentially very dangerous animals—furry and cuddly and warm in our imagination. A haddock is cold and slippery and wet, and to most people's eyes, not particularly beautiful.

But then, if there was this useless species, would it then be okay, ethically, if our actions made it forever extinct? There's some other level here that I think is important, some other level of sensibility to make.

And, you know, is this an elitist sort of request, an elitist demand, an elitist aspiration? Yeah, maybe it is. I said right at the beginning, you know, I may sound like an elitist, I probably am an elitist. The whole movement towards awakening is a very elitist movement. It's not like everyone's really going to take that up, even in terms of how many Dharma people really take up seriously a real movement to deep, deep awakening and insight. So it's only a small portion of even Dharma people.

Soul-making asks so much of us in terms of our skills and the aspects of our being, the demands, the stretches, the know-how, the art of it. Samadhi, you know, even though I was a musician, it's elitist. Not everyone can do that or train that way to take that to a high level of art.

Again, I recall Hartmann's notion of the noble and his kind of insistence that it's through the noble few, those who stretch the sensibility, that humanity evolves spiritually—through their leading, their opening the doors through which more and more people then follow after them, are kind of converted or infected with that sensibility, that moral sensibility.

Of course, in that kind of care or respect for or sacred place given to species and ecosystems, we're saying it's a high value. It's not really a new value because indigenous cultures would be totally rooted in that. So it might be its resurrection is relatively new for our time. But still, there may be a big ask in this, and George Marshall may be right to a certain extent, that it's only some people who are going to be really moved by the plight of, let's say, the polar bear.

But still, if we talk about our life and our soul and the deeper and wider needs of the earth, of humanity, certainly of the species, there's this heightening of our moral sensibilities. And as I said, a species loss is not the same as concern for the suffering of individual animals. There's something else, there's some other sensibility.

And all this, what we've been talking about, begs the question to a certain extent of what then is the relationship of these ways of thinking about ethics and the whole thrust and intention, primary thrust and intention of the Dharma to reduce suffering.

So, you know, happily, our attraction to and need for moral values is often satisfied to a certain extent at least by our attention to and need for and pursuit of a reduction in suffering, a reduction in dukkha. But in most cases, it might not be enough to notice that there are, in fact, two directions of our desire there.

So keep the precepts, for example, as an ethical investment and commitment reduces some suffering. But again, there may be, as I said, two directions or two strata of our intention here.

So the love of higher moral values, the love, the attraction and the eros for a higher ethos or an ethos that encompasses the higher, that cares about the higher. The beauty of sacrifice, the images and archetypes and values bound up in a fuller and more powerful devotion to ethics, may well not overlap with the idea or the thrust, the intention for decreasing suffering, other than as a promise of reward, of a future rebirth or heaven or whatever you might believe.

Or if there are gifts and rewards from a devotion like that, a kind of deep, high, wide, very attuned moral sensibility and commitment. There are rewards from such a devotion in some cases. They are relatively subtle: the openness of heart, the seeing, the dependent arising of the perception of self-other-world. These are all relatively subtle gifts, if you like, rewards from that kind of devotion.

So there's some reduction of, certainly only some reduction of personal suffering. Maybe we can say in the larger picture, there's a reduction of suffering. But we're really talking about two strands of intention: the reduction of suffering and the love of moral values, and particularly of the higher moral values. And they may overlap to a certain extent, but they are also not completely the same.

And again, the question is, what do we love and what do we want? What are we devoted to? The decrease of suffering or the beauty and soul attraction of moral values? So as I said, they're not exactly and always the same thing. There's not a complete overlap between the two.

And we've said, because values are an element of sensing the soul, one of the 28 elements we've delineated so far, there is an overlap with soul-making. Many people, and I've said this before, many people, perhaps most people would assume at first that an overlap with decreasing suffering would be more likely to be the case—the overlap between the concern for morals and the reduction of suffering. And they would harbor some kind of suspicion of prioritization of soul-making intentions.

But, as we said, soul-making intentions implicitly or explicitly include a devotion to values, or rather to some or other values from the pantheon, the zodiac of values.

So I mentioned the Buddha and his choice to leave his family and generally considering his zest and devotion to know the end of suffering, to not be reborn, to teach others, perhaps his mystical hunger, his hunger to know the mystical. You don't really hear that one so much in the Pali Canon. And that devotion, that intention, trumped his sense of his moral responsibility to be there for his wife and his young son. So he basically abandoned them.

In this antinomy, in this conflict of values, he chose one. Now, you could argue that in his life he always chose what would maximally lessen the suffering for the totality in all time, which is, as we started this part of the talk, that's a version of utilitarianism. And that's how he was thinking. He was, you know, if I become a Buddha, I'll probably help more people than if I stay at home and become a world monarch and keep with my family. And so many people would kind of construe it that way. He chose that because in the totality of things, it would reduce more suffering and increase more happiness for more people over time than if he stayed at home and did other stuff, ruled a kingdom, etc.

But actually that seems to me, if I'm honest, and if we look and feel into it a little more carefully, a bit of a psychologically naive view. Maybe that's heretical. If you feel into the psychology there, is that really what's going on—that he was sort of weighing up, calculating probable amounts of suffering and pain that could be avoided, pleasure that could be increased? Or was his drive, his love, his devotion, his determination, his desire, his choice coming out of a richer psychology that had also to do with his soul, what was beautiful to him, what called him?

To say all this another way, or approach it from a slightly different direction, take metta, for example. It's regarded as a value in Buddha Dharma, but as a value it's subordinate to and dependent on the higher and, in a way, more fundamental, more central value given to reducing suffering—actually, the direction of ending suffering. Metta is one component, one element in that path that prioritizes the end of suffering. And its primary purpose is for that: ending rebirth. So metta is a value in that system of thought because it reduces suffering and leads to the end of suffering, which is its primary value.

Now, probably—to use philosophical jargon—on the margins of the text, sort of briefly alluded to with the perfume, if we were to deconstruct it, there'll be many messages, even in the Pali canon, attesting to the independent value of metta and sila. Primarily, they're given as stepping stones. Their function is to reduce suffering and actually, or primarily, as stepping stones on the path to ending suffering, to not being reborn. But the beauty of metta and the beauty of sila are probably there already—they can't help seeping out and being there, sort of at the edges of the main point of the teachings.

So there's a certain way we think about the Dharma in terms of reducing suffering. Of course, the Mahayana extends that to include all beings. But there are also other factors, and I think it is important to be a little more psychologically sophisticated, a little fuller in our gaze at the psychology of all this. What's really going on? What really are we loving and wanting? What's really motivating us with all this?

Again, if I just look around me right now, it's interesting. So this question about ethics, the emphasis in Buddha Dharma on reducing suffering and that principle way of conceiving what we're doing—look around me right now, and certainly in Devon, where I live, there's very suddenly, really, a lot of Dharma people suddenly involved in, for example, Extinction Rebellion and actions on the streets against inaction. And more widely in the UK as well, something—suddenly there's been quite a dramatic change, almost black and white, among Dharma folks. Maybe in other countries it's starting, or there are the potential seeds, the potential rumblings of that. Maybe in the US something's starting. But certainly around here, it's a dramatic quantum leap, a sudden shift.

I think only some of that—I don't know what proportion, but only some proportion probably—is because of soul-making Dharma teachings. Somehow other conditions have come together for this sudden ignition of the wildfire in the Dharma community. Is it the last IPCC report that was much more stark in its warnings, much more grave, much more demanding in insinuating that rapid action needs to happen? Is it that most of these Dharma people who are getting involved now are actually looking at it through the lens of reducing suffering in the world and for others? Is it just that there's a kind of critical mass of enough people and something starts snowballing? And if three of your friends are talking about this thing and are being involved and sharing with you how it's touched them and how wonderful it was and how they actually survived an action fine, and how they're even thinking of maybe being arrestable or whatever, that has an effect on the people around them. So it's less a few lone voices crying in the wilderness.

So I don't know what all those conditions are. I think, like I said, the soul-making dharma is just one small piece that's relevant for some people. The question more for this fire of commitment and action and engagement that's struck up—the question is really, can it stay steady? Can it be mature?

Remember on one of the retreats, one of the series of talks we talked about the fire, mastering the fire and the way different soul fires burn, the way Eros burns in souls differently and at different times and depending on different conditions. And to have a fire that just flares up and then goes out may not be so helpful as something that's sustainable. You don't want something that gets snuffed out at the next little wind.

It may be, as I said, that for many of those people it's really just a utilitarian consideration—a weighing up of what's the net amount of suffering here—and that's what's galvanizing their response. That's what's framing their perspective and their conceiving of the whole issue and whether to get involved or not. And the commitment and the action and the engagement is supported by a whole web of other conditions.

But again, if we stay with this question of the relationship, the nexus between reducing suffering and soul-making and ethics and values—as I've said before, when talking about Buddha Dharma, talking about awakening, there's a kind of petering out of the whole notion of the cycle of rebirth. There are fewer and fewer people who actually—they may believe in rebirth, but that's actually at the core of their being. What they're aiming for is to end their rebirth. That's become, I think, in Western Dharma—certainly in the people I meet, get a sense from and hear from—rarer and rarer.

So that opens up the question: what are we actually aiming for when we're talking about the goal of the path and awakening, if it's not ending rebirth? It might be just this utilitarian working towards a reduction of suffering—maybe just my suffering, maybe much wider in the more Mahayana sense of all beings. But there's something else. There are other factors, as we've been saying.

And there's something about meaningfulness. As we said, that's an element of soul-making. It's an element of the imaginal. It's an element of sensing the soul. And when we take the consideration of meaningfulness and extend it to our whole life, it becomes deeply interesting to us. What gives us meaningfulness? Is it only a kind of utilitarian reduction of suffering? Yes, that has its place, absolutely. But there are other strata and factors that are part of our psyche, and we need to be more consciously aware of these when we look at what's going on for us and what renders life fruitful, fulfilling, meaningful.

Here's a quote from Predrag Čićovacki—I think I mentioned him before in another series of talks. He wrote a book about Hartmann that I found quite good. He says: "One of the central claims of Hartmann's entire philosophical opus is that it is precisely useless values that bestow meaning upon life. By uselessness he means neither fruitless-ness nor meaninglessness. Uselessness only refers to the absence of any tangible purpose or visible end. It is on such useless values that we depend when we attempt to bestow meaning on our strivings and struggles."

He would also include in that—I'm pretty sure, and I certainly do—art as something ultimately useless. Beauty is totally wrapped up in the domain of the useless values. For me, there's almost no boundary between aesthetic concerns, the love of beauty, the care for beauty, and moral concerns.

So there are values that are, in a way, useless. They don't serve an obvious function in our life. They're not easily brought under a utilitarian framework. And these are often the higher values. The higher values are often useless. An aesthetic sensibility, for example, is kind of useless from a certain perspective. But as I said in the last part, these higher values need to rest on the lower values as a foundation. They depend on the lower. Without them, they are hollow.

So a care for higher values, a care for aesthetics that doesn't care for justice or kindness, that completely neglects those—this causes a collapse in the whole value of the aesthetic care.

Let me read again a few things from Hartmann here. The more elementary values, the lower values, the more negative commandments go with them—the prohibitions: thou shalt not steal, not murder, etc. When they're transgressed, the seriousness of that transgression of a lower value is much more serious than the omission or transgression of a higher value. So not to engage in a care for aesthetics, not to cultivate what Hartmann calls one's ideal personality, not to attune to that or listen to the duties of that—if a person neglects to do that or leaves that out of their aspirations, then the transgression is not as serious as killing or stealing.

He says you can't really command higher values, but you can make commandments for the lower values in the form of prohibitions. "Only brotherly love can be commanded of the higher values," he says, "and that, not in the strict sense." So "love your neighbor as yourself"—it's not really a commandment; it's a kind of aspiration. And personal love, what he calls personal love, which is the love of another in a way that—in our language—sees them as image, in his language, it's a love of another that senses and cares for and is attuned to their ideal personality, the soul essence, the image. Personal love cannot be commanded at all.

But genuine morality, he says, is built from below up. "Its essence is not the ideal self-existence of values, but their actualization in life." In other words, we have to act on these. "Only upon the actualization of the lower does the actualization of a higher value rest solidly." These are just different words for saying what we just said. Without that, as I said, they're hollow. If there's a transgression of lower values while one cares for higher values, something's off. It strikes one as off. In transgressing against a lower value, it has more consequences.

It has consequences on a wider range of our existence. When we transgress against a lower value, the consequences affect not just ourselves but ripple outward. The consequences of one person not caring about this or that particular higher value are much more limited.

So the higher value, Hartmann writes, has a narrower field of activity, contains less palpable substance. Its existence for itself is more pronounced. What's the purpose of that higher value? It exists for itself - this concern with beauty, this concern even with my ideal personality. Yes, if I can actualize, if I can follow my soul's calling, if I can listen for the angel out ahead and do my duty, that will bestow gifts on the world. But in a way, it's just for itself. It's for the beauty of itself, for the soul-making itself.

Its existence for itself is more pronounced in the higher value. It stands and falls for itself alone. When it suffers injury, it injures little else, only what stands above it in order of rank. The basis beneath it remains intact. This becomes most evident in extreme cases like that of the dispensing of spiritual value - the sort of radiant virtue that I was talking about, which is altogether useless and has nothing further dependent upon it, or writing beautiful music, whatever it is. It's useless. Nothing else is dependent on it, or very little. It is similar with love of the remotest, personal love, and all the values of the individual personality, all these higher kinds of values.

The higher values possess their superiority in the conferring of meaning upon life and in its fulfillment. Those are the ones that really give this sense of meaningfulness and fulfillment in our life. For the meaning of the moral life, Hartmann writes, is no more to be found in the lower values than its foundations are to be found in the higher.

If we have only a concern for the lower values, then there can be a kind of impoverishment of our whole life. Our whole ethical life is impoverished by that limitation. We're just concerned with lower values, and it can be, as Jesus criticized, kind of low. There isn't this high nobility. There isn't this love of value and aspiration. Something's not stretching into the beyonds with the Eros, with the soul-making there.

So the higher values have beyondness, as we talked about. They have dimensionality. There's a sense of unfathomability there, mystery, irreducibility. And all this supports them, allows them to become erotically imaginal objects for us, beloved erotic imaginal objects. And to give, as I said, a sense of meaningfulness and fulfillment in our life.

Somewhere Hartmann wrote also something like: the aims of our life, of our moral life, should be placed so high that we can only just discern them. But their foundations should be laid as firmly as possible.

When we consider climate change and species extinction, mass species extinction, those two things are threatening the foundations - they're real threats to the foundations of many people's lives, certainly many animals' lives and many species' lives. But they also threaten the foundations of existence itself: that people have water to drink that's not undrinkable because the sea has risen and the salt water has gotten into the water; that people don't live in climates where it's actually too hot to cool the body at certain times of the year; that there's enough rain but not flooding. The foundations are threatened through this kind of unfolding and the lack of care with regard to climate change and species extinction.

These are issues of foundations, and thus they are issues that pertain to the lower moral values. "Thou shalt not kill"? Well, watch your climate emissions, or watch our climate emissions, or take care that the governments make sure that the governments and the corporations act - because we're not going to solve this just on the back of our individual efforts at lowering our personal emissions. Something much more systemic needs to happen. But yes, those issues touch on the foundations of human being - what human beings need for life: water, air, climate, food.

But they also - there's something in those issues that implicates, involves, touches on, asks for our sensitivity to the highest values and virtues. More and more now people are realizing that climate change, and to a lesser extent species extinction, does and will have a big impact on the foundations, the material foundations of human existence, for many, many people, and eventually for everyone. As such, it touches on, it implicates the foundational, the lower moral values and virtues and commandments. But there's also something here that touches on the highest values, that calls in, that asks for an extension in range, in height of our moral sensitivity.

If it's only a perspective of foundations, then some things in tackling climate change are just completely okay. The idea that many people have touted - and some people think will be an inevitable solution because humanity is being too slow at reducing emissions - is the possibility of geoengineering: putting certain particles into the atmosphere, spraying particles of some chemical into the high atmosphere so they will reflect back a large proportion of the sunlight. The Earth will cool instead of experiencing the warming caused by carbon emissions. So you actually keep the same amount of carbon, or even put more carbon in, and reduce the temperature of the Earth.

Allegedly the problems, it will only solve part of the problems – the problems of global warming by cooling the temperature. One of the side effects of that, apparently, is that it would make the sky white. So if there's enough of these particles in the atmosphere, the sky would no longer be blue, it would be white.

If we're only thinking from the perspective of foundations of human life and material needs and therefore the foundational or lower values, then that's okay. Because what difference does it make? Blue sky, white sky? Or if with noise pollution and light pollution, it's becoming difficult to find places in the world that are not full of the sound of mostly combustion engines burning fossil fuels. But noise and light pollution would be okay from that perspective of just addressing the foundational, just thinking about in terms of reducing suffering, just thinking in terms of the lower values, just sensing it on that level and addressing the foundations, the material foundations of human existence.

Noise and light pollution would be okay as long as we can't measure any effect on health, or pleasure, however we measure that, or GDP. So something, to me, something would be missing there. I don't know how it sounds to you, but it doesn't sound okay to me. My heart hurts as I'm saying this. To me, to my soul, something else is needed.

Something else is calling – a deepening, a widening, an ensouling of our ways of looking, of our view, our sense, our conception of ourselves, our anthropology, our sense of our individual self, our sense of our communities, but also our anthropology, our sense of what human beings are and what their place is in the cosmos. And a sense of each other and a sense of individual things and beings in the natural world, and a sense of the whole world. All this, something else is called, and that has to do with higher values.

They are necessary, they're implicated, as I said, in our concern for all this, when we look at the whole problem. It's a multi-level problem.

Some people, as I mentioned the other day, have said to me, "Ah, soul-making time – it's really what humanity needs right now. It's the new frontier," or, you know, in this time of sort of post-post-modernism, it's got all the aspects that are needed for taking us forward out of the sort of quagmire or stagnation that came with post-modernism and where we are now in our whole vision of ourselves and philosophy and all that stuff. And that maybe in that sense, in being a new frontier, it's what Hartmann would call one of the noble values of our time. And in his sense of word, remember, the nobility in his meaning is those that look for the new.

But nobility in his language looks for the new not only – it's got its antennae out for new sensibility to new unfamiliar values with respect to a certain culture, time and place – its prime motivation is not just to address the crises, for example the ecological crises it finds itself in.

So people say stuff like that, sometimes some people say stuff like that, but I certainly think that soul-making is not the fix of all modern problems. And whether it's noble in Hartmann's sense, I don't know. I'm not sure. People sometimes say, well, everything that involves soul-making practice – the flexibility and openness conceptually in terms of logos – that sort of is a way to move forward out of the limitations of postmodern philosophy which just, if you like, shoots down negatively different conceptions.

Actually there's a practical possibility of having some flexibility, some openness, and then the actual practical capacity to move between different conceptions, that and the kind of attunement that it asks for, the kind of reverence that it brings, the sensing the soul of the world, the re-enchantment of self, of the world – all these are necessary and new. I don't know. I'm not sure.

So certainly for some people, for sure, for some people, soul-making practice will kind of support and encourage and draw out and grow the virtues, the moral virtues. And for some people, it will – it already has – legitimized and supported their, for instance, their activism, their engagement. It's supported a growth in their care, and the sensing the soul that kind of underpins that will contribute, does contribute to material help with regard to these crises, and that's great and it's necessary and it's really important.

But, you know, on another level, soul-making perhaps is ultimately useless, we could say. What's it for? Yes, there are these fruits, and that's necessary, wonderful, and really important. But the soul loves soul-making. Period. Period.

What's soul-making for? Soul-making is for soul-making. Soul-making is the purpose of soul-making. In that sense, it's useless. It has nothing else that it's in the service of, primarily, or as its main reason. There are gifts, there are offshoots, there are bestowals, and it provides support for all kinds of things, including a reduction in suffering of self and others. But like all the highest values, so like beauty and art and all that, essentially it's useless, but in the best sense of the word.

Somehow it crowns our lives, blesses and anoints our lives and our deaths, our whole sense of existence. That is perhaps ultimately what it's for and ultimately what we care about and what bestows meaningfulness in life, fulfillment in life, beauty. It's what we love.

Orienting to This Jhāna Retreat

Rob Burbea · 1h29

> In this opening talk of a three-week jhāna retreat, Rob Burbea establishes the foundational view and approach essential for samādhi practice. He emphasizes that jhānas depend on happiness rather than rigid concentration, introducing the crucial concept of finding one's "playground at the edge" - working skillfully at the boundary of current capacity rather than forcing progress.
> Burbea addresses the retreat's open schedule format, stressing the importance of personal responsibility in practice while maintaining non-brittle samādhi that remains open to sounds and community. He explores how to work skillfully with hindrances as "the dark, rich underbelly of jhāna practice," viewing them as life afflictions that offer their own gold when approached with wisdom.
> Key teachings include the significance of mudita (appreciative joy) as the foundation for jhānic happiness, the balance between malleability and firm resolve in practice, and placing difficult emotions in the larger context of the spiritual path. The talk concludes with Sari and Kirsten offering reflections on the five precepts and noble silence as essential elements of the retreat container. This comprehensive orientation provides practitioners with both the practical framework and heart qualities necessary for deep samādhi exploration.

Welcome, everybody—a really warm welcome to each and every one of you. I know some of you, and there are some I don't know and haven't met yet. I'm really looking forward to that, and especially welcome to you if you're new to Gaia House. So welcome to the retreat, welcome to Gaia House, to everyone.

I'm really happy to be here, happy to be able to do this. More than happy—I've actually been quite excited for a little while, so I'm really glad.

Let me please introduce Sari. Some of you will know her, but many of you might not. Sari is with us, and at the end, as you can see, is Kirsten, who some of you already know. You'll notice Robert is not here—I'll explain what's happening there in a moment.

I have wanted to teach a group jhāna retreat for, I think, about sixteen years. I've done a lot of teaching of jhānas individually, one-to-one, but finally some very strange conditions have come together to actually allow this to manifest. In a way, for many reasons, it's a kind of small miracle that this is happening.

So yes, many reasons make it a small real miracle that we have this time together and this opportunity and this chance for something that I think is such a beautiful realm of possibility for human beings and for meditation practice—such a treasure trove. So it's a really, really precious thing for me to be able to teach it, and I hope by the end you'll realize also how precious it really is.

It's partly a miracle because it's quite complicated for me health-wise at the moment. There's a lot I need to do just to be able to be here. I have many medical appointments over the time we have together, and there's a lot of practical stuff—just getting my medicines and gear. I don't need to go into all of that.

Originally, I asked Robert to come and assist us, and he said he'd love to but needed to check with his employers. They came back and said they wouldn't be able to tell him until—I can't remember when. So we said, let's just gamble; it'll be fine. It turned out they said no, he couldn't have that time off.

So Robert will join us later, and then Kirsten—who actually had this whole idea in the first place, so we have her to thank for the entire retreat—very kindly stepped in to take Robert's place. The retreat was her idea originally, arising from a strange set of circumstances. Kirsten had been planning to sit the retreat and have this time to nourish her practice, but she very kindly stepped in until Robert arrives in five or six days. At that point, Kirsten will be relieved of her teaching duties and be able to give herself to her practice, and Robert will step in. We'll obviously let you know, though you may not notice because you might be so deep in practice.

Another part of the small miracle is that Sari has a family and a lovely little baby boy, a toddler named Eliel. Because of his young age, she could only be here if he could be here, and that meant her partner, Hönger, needed to be here as well. So they are here as a family, and you will see them wandering in and out. You will probably see and hear Eliel playing in the Gaia House grounds—it's his playground, right? So that's part of the conditions that allowed this retreat, and I think it's actually a lovely, really delightful thing.

Please do ask the teachers—seriously. A lot about this practice is very individual. It can sound formulaic or technical, but there may be reasons why exactly that sort of approach at some point might be really helpful, and actually not so helpful for the same person at different times. But generally, he's going to be around. You'll see him, you'll hear him, and it's a delight.

Tonight I have quite a lot I want to get through, so I hope you all had a good rest and are feeling bright and refreshed. I want to say mostly things about orienting to this retreat and what that involves, and things to bear in mind during the retreat.

Originally, part of what allowed this retreat to come about—I can't remember exactly—was that Gaia House was going to shut down for a period for some major building renovation works. Somehow Kirsten had this idea, and then they asked me if I would do this while that was going on. Of course, I thought, "So Gaia House is going to be a building site, and you want me to teach a jhāna retreat?" And I said, "Sure."

Because, and I really want to emphasize this, it's okay to have noise. Right from the beginning, we approach this with a different attitude. We're not coming in here putting the blinkers on, putting the earplugs in, thinking everything is bothering us and we need to shut everything out. No, there's an attitude of openness and inclusivity. We do not want our jhānas, our samādhi, to be brittle. You know what brittle means? It means something that shatters very easily. We want our practice to be soft, pliant, open, open-hearted.

One of my teachers, Ajahn Jeff, some of you will know him, when he moved to Thailand to become a monk—he'd hardly meditated before—he was in a monastery that had just moved. In fact, they were building a new site for it. So where he learned to meditate initially was a building site. And it was just like, no one was like, "Oh, that's a terrible problem." It's fine. What's the problem? So we need a different attitude to all this that's much more about openness, not brittleness. And so Eliel, Sari's son, that's all part of it.

When someone asked the Buddha—or in the context of his teaching, I can't remember exactly, he said it a few times—what does jhāna depend on? What does samādhi depend on? He said, "It depends on happiness. Jhāna depends on happiness." Now he could have answered all kinds of things, and many of us would expect him to answer, "It depends on staying, really nailing your mind to something, and then you'll get to jhāna." That's the way most people think about it. Or "It depends on getting away from people who make noise and being in maybe a sensory deprivation tank," whatever the Pali for that is. But he didn't say that. He said, "Dependent on happiness." So that's interesting. That's really interesting to reflect on.

I have a sense that many of the things I will say tonight—it's possible that you may not realize just how significant they are. I know I haven't met some of you yet and I'm already insulting you, but somehow we have to get the view right. We have to get the view right. The view is the platform and the whole relationship right. So if I say something like that, or the Buddha said, "Jhānas depend on happiness," that should set you thinking. I see some of you writing it down—it's important. Now I have to take that with me through the retreat because that has implications on a moment-to-moment level, on a micro-moment level, about your choices, about your attitude, about how you're relating to whatever it is you're paying attention to at the moment—the breath or whatever it is.

Do you understand? So what I'm saying tonight—what does it have to do with the relationship with practice and how important that is, and the relationship with this practice, and the relationship with the goal, and the whole conceptual framework? This is absolutely key.

So how are we going to listen? How are you going to listen to Dharma talks? Can you listen on your toes? Do you know what I mean by that? I mean just what I said. If something comes out like "jhānas depend on happiness," I can kind of let that wash over me, or maybe it barely registers. Or actually, that sets me thinking—maybe I should reflect on that and recalibrate and do something about it. So that's what I mean by listening on your toes. Does it make sense? I mean, obviously sometimes I'm going to unpack things and elaborate and explain, but sometimes a bit more work from the listener, a bit more activeness from the listener, is really helpful.

Okay, let's start with just a couple of practical things. The daily schedule, as some of you might have noticed, is pretty open. There's not a lot on there. I don't know if you've seen it, but it sort of says breakfast, lunch, dinner, I think. So what we're going to do is—what that means is this hall is open twenty-four hours a day for the duration of the retreat, and you can sit in here at any time for as long as you want.

Generally speaking, once you get into the rhythm, you might, for instance, be doing a walking period, and then it's twenty minutes before lunch, and you know you have to have lunch at a certain time because you're on lunch wash-up. So you can still come in here for twenty minutes, just whenever it is. If you have the time, though, and I'll explain this more as we go on, you probably want to give a sitting a bit more time to see what happens—a bit more than twenty minutes, forty, forty-five minutes, an hour or something—see what happens. But the basic approach is an open schedule.

People will be coming and going whenever, okay? Except—if I get this right, where is the schedule? Ah, thank you, Kirsten—except 6:45 to breakfast, everyone needs to be in here. You can arrive early for that sitting—5:45, 6:00, whenever. But once we hit 6:45, you can't come in or leave. It's basically a group sit. We want everyone here at that time just to cohere together as a community.

And the other designated time is 9:00 p.m.—same principle. Again, you can arrive early, you can stay much later, well into the night if you want. But during that core period, let's say 9:00 to 9:30, you wouldn't arrive or leave. Does that make sense?

For the teachings, we're aiming to have a block from 4:00 to 5:30 every day. That's the plan. But we may need to adjust this—either just slightly, starting at 3:45 or 4:30, or we might change it quite drastically, shifting everything to the morning. So you need to keep your eye on the notice board and just see what's posted.

If nothing changes, it's 4:00 to 5:30 as scheduled. But this flexibility is partly dependent on some new medications I'm adjusting to, and I'm not sure yet how that will affect things. So we'll work with what arises. The key is to check the board—any changes won't be posted until after 2:30 for that day's schedule.

This open schedule means the onus of responsibility falls on you. It's on you to find a structure—both temporal and in your practice—that works for you. The responsibility is yours to be responsive and sensitive to your practice, to the needs and ebbs and flows, the ups and downs. What is needed right now? Do I need to go out and do some walking? Do I need to sit longer with whatever is happening? Do I need to actually go for a walk, open my mind, touch the beauty and be touched by beauty? Do I need a cup of tea? All of that awareness is yours to cultivate.

Having an open schedule also means that people will naturally be coming and leaving at various times. So there are two responsibilities here. The job of the person coming or going is to try and be relatively quiet as you set up your cushion or pack up and leave. And the job of the person who's already here, when someone arrives or departs, is to be spacious with that.

This is actually part of the practice. We're not cultivating brittle jhānas. We're not developing brittle samādhi, you understand? It's beautiful—someone's coming to practice. How wonderful, right?

This point is really, really important. Don't underestimate how easily jhāna practice can get derailed into a kind of narrow tunnel of irritation, especially when you start setting rigid goals around your meditation. So the person already here has the job of openness, warmth, welcoming, non-brittle jhānas. The person coming or going has the job of being relatively sensitive—people are practicing here.

When teachings are happening and I'm talking about something that's not quite where you're at yet, you can listen and take notes if you want, but don't feel like you have to rush to get there. Don't feel like you're missing out or behind. This is really important—there's no race here, no competition. The jhanas are not a ladder you need to climb as quickly as possible.

Instead, listen with curiosity and appreciation. Think of it as getting a preview of where your practice might naturally unfold over time. But keep most of your actual practice energy in your current playground. This approach prevents forcing, prevents that brittle quality I mentioned earlier, and allows for a much more organic and sustainable development.

Similarly, when I'm talking about territory you've already explored, don't dismiss it. There's always deeper understanding available. The jhanas aren't just checkboxes to tick off—they're rich, nuanced states with many layers of refinement possible. So even if you feel confident about the first jhana, when we spend time discussing it, see if you can discover something new, some subtlety you hadn't noticed before.

This approach requires a certain kind of patience and trust. Trust that your practice will unfold at exactly the right pace for you. Trust that spending quality time at your edge, really getting to know that territory intimately, is far more valuable than rushing through multiple states superficially.

I've seen too many practitioners get caught up in jhana collecting—trying to experience as many different states as possible as quickly as possible. This usually leads to frustration, forcing, and ultimately a less fulfilling practice. Instead, I want to encourage you to become connoisseurs of your current edge, to really savor and explore whatever territory is naturally available to you right now.

This patience and thoroughness will actually serve your overall development much better in the long run. When you really understand one jhana deeply—its qualities, how to enter it reliably, how to sustain it, how to emerge from it gracefully—that understanding creates a solid foundation for everything that follows.

Does it mean you take notes about what might be relevant for you in four days or two weeks time? It's a little tricky. But basically you're going to get a lot of material, some of which is not relevant for you now. You can listen to the recordings later, or you could make notes. You can always ask, of course. But I don't know any other way of doing it, or any other way of doing it in a way that I would feel is fruitful. So everyone's going to have that issue at some point.

If you've done jhana practice before, as I know some of you have, and you think—or you have a sense—that your playground is second jhana, or sixth jhana, it doesn't matter, whatever it is—please, in the next few days, if you have a sense that you've really mastered all the rest and know where you're at, please check with one of us and get it confirmed. People mean very different things by jhanas and different things by mastery and where they're at. I will explain why I feel this is important, but just come and check.

We might say, "Great, okay, yeah, second jhana—about there. This is what you need to do now. This is your playground." Or it might work both ways. You might feel like you only know second jhana, or that your playground is sixth jhana, and actually we might think, "Well, actually in terms of the kind of level we're talking about, or mastery, I reckon around second is your playground." So just come and have that kind of dialogue with us.

Or it might be the other way around. You think one thing, we say, "Wow, no, that's cool. You've got that mastered. You can go on beyond where you think you are." Does that sound okay?

Just check, because this idea of playground is really important to how things are going to ferment in a way that's going to be fruitful, how the seeds are going to get planted so that they really bear lovely, nourishing, lifelong nourishing fruit. So that's why I'm emphasizing this playground business, and I'll come back to it.

You're mostly in your playground until you get mastery of that level, and we'll explain what we mean by mastery. You might do—let's say it was the third—you'll still spend a little time in the first and the second, if the third is your playground. And occasionally the mind will just open to something beyond it, and great, have a little fun occasionally. But mostly this is your playground. This is where it's delineated.

We're not going to teach like, "Okay, let's say it's the fifth jhana. Then every time I sit down, I have to go breath, one, two, three, four, and then the fifth." You can just dive right in. So most of your time is in your playground. And even if you think you're at a certain level, there should still be really quite helpful teachings pertaining to what seem to pertain to levels that are below where you're at. So everything we have to say about really basic practice—working with the breath or metta, whatever it is—that should still be useful to you, even if you've gone beyond that.

The way I see jhanas is they're potentially lifelong explorations. There's so much gift available there, so much profundity of resource and beauty, so much subtlety to explore. So much to explore that you don't find written. It's not in the suttas. It's not in a lot of other material you find written. There are all kinds of possibilities here. So I'd like us—I want to invite you to have that really long view. And part of that long view is this playground business.

If you've been on retreat at Gaia House before or lived here, you might know that you can get to Newton Abbot that way, up towards Denbury on the lanes—it's south. You might also know that you can get to Newton Abbot that way, north. You can also get to Newton Abbot that way, east. And you can also get to Newton Abbot that way, west. It's just the way the lanes work around here.

Why am I saying that? Partly because I would say—first I thought, if you can get to the first jhana, then they're all open to you. But actually, I'd like to even modify that statement and say, if you can get pīti, if pīti can arise, if this well-being, this lovely well-being can arise, then the whole territory is open to you. The whole territory of the jhanas is open to you.

What that means, practically speaking, is what's really significant is how do we get that pīti to arise? Or how do we allow that pīti to arise—which is a better way of putting it.

The lovely news is that piti is just like Newton Abbot—though only in some respects. If you've been there, you might be relieved to hear that! What I mean is it doesn't really matter how that piti arises. Anything goes.

Any kind of concentration practice you might have heard of—or haven't heard of—could work. It might be an insight practice. It might be something else entirely. It might even be something that you describe to someone and they respond, "What the hell has that got to do with concentration?" If it gives rise to that piti, if it allows that piti to open, it's wonderful.

We'll give more details about what I'm saying now. There are all these different possibilities, and in the first few days of the retreat, I'm going to put out quite a few different options for what I call a base practice or springboard practice. This might be breath or metta or insight practices, or different ways of working with the breath, energy body, and so on—practices to work toward getting into the jhanas or springboarding into piti.

This means that for the first five, six, seven days of the retreat, there's quite a lot of teaching. There'll still be one session a day, hopefully, but quite a lot of material because I want to make sure that if someone finds one route to Newton Abbot doesn't work, they have another way. If you're not sure—if you've tried different approaches and you're uncertain—then you can try a few things. This is really important.

Among all that, there will be all kinds of other helpful information and teaching, but it will be more dense in terms of content in the first week or so.

Insight ways of looking can also give rise to piti. By insight ways of looking, I mean very specifically the practices I've written about in my book, Seeing That Frees. If you don't know what that means or aren't familiar with it, just forget it for now. We won't be giving extensive teachings about that, but I'm mentioning it now.

Insight can be used as an occasional unblocker—something that unblocks the energy, that unblocks contraction and clinging and allows well-being and piti and samadhi. That's one way of using insight practice. Some people use it as their main approach, the primary thing that opens up samadhi and well-being and piti. Insight practices unfabricate—they lessen fabrication, and that's very key. We'll explain that more later. If you're not familiar with what insight and ways of looking mean, just leave it aside for now.

Here's something important: if you already know that practice X, whatever practice X is, reliably and easily takes you into jhana or gives rise to piti that's stable and workable, stick with it. There's no reason to change. You already have something that takes you to Newton Abbot, so you're good. If you're not sure, then try some of what we'll be gradually offering in the next few days. But really, we want to settle on one base practice, one springboard practice.

The talks on this retreat will focus mostly on technique in the broader sense—the art of jhana practice, the art of samadhi. I'll also speak about view, relationship, and framework—how we're seeing these practices, which is so crucial. I'm talking almost entirely about that.

There will be no big new philosophical conceptual frameworks that blow your sense of existence. Unless some of you don't already know how I would put the jhanas into a framework and how I would see insight—in which case it might be surprising because it's quite different. But generally speaking, I'm not going to bring up really radical questions that get you agitated and turn everything upside down. This is mostly about the art of jhana practice.

What does that mean? It partly means that, in relation to what I've said earlier, you're responsible for your inspiration on this retreat. You're responsible for your sense of inspiration.

Because I'm not going to be telling any stories, there's no poems, there's none of all that. The Buddha said jhanas are dependent on happiness. Jhanas are dependent on happiness. Of course, jhanas give rise to happiness—tremendous happiness. Really, if you've not experienced the jhanic realms, happiness, I think we can safely say that you will not have tasted something like that before. It's really, really extraordinary, something really remarkable that opens for a human being.

Jhanas bring happiness, but they also depend on happiness. You're responsible for your inspiration. You're responsible for your happiness as the basis of your jhana practice, without stories, without poems, without interesting philosophy. So how are we going to do that? Where does that kind of base happiness come from? I'll say a little bit now, I'll say a little bit later.

Appreciation. So much about this practice is really about taking care of your heart at every level and every direction. What does it mean to take care of your heart? And again, you may not realize just how significant some of this is. If you haven't practiced this way before, if you're used to very different ways of thinking of retreat, thinking what it means to be practicing, you may not realize just how significant this is.

What does it mean to be here in these days together in community in a beautiful place in the countryside and to make sure every day that the heart is encouraged to feel appreciation and to reverberate with appreciation? For your fellow meditators, for the Dharma, for the Buddha, for the beautiful nature, for the coordinators at Gaia House who set this up, for other helpers—I'll introduce them later—all the conditions that came together.

What does it mean to take care of appreciation, to be on retreat, orienting and supporting the heart to be in an appreciative mode? This is way more significant than most people would realize.

Gratitude is all part of the same thing. Taking care of inclining the mind and the heart to gratitude, to seeing what there is to be grateful for and to feeling that gratitude every day. You can do it formally, you can do it informally, it could just be woven into your natural way of being. It becomes that beautiful.

Beauty is so important. The heart, the eyes, the senses are open to beauty. Connection with each other, with nature. Openness—generally openness of being, openness of heart, love of the Dharma. These are the kind of things that nourish, that will allow that base level of happiness on which the jhanas can then be built or opened, whatever metaphor we want to use.

In a word, mudita is the Pali word. Oftentimes it gets translated as sympathetic joy. I would prefer the translation appreciative joy or spiritual joy. It's not just the joy in someone else's happiness. It is that, and it's all those things I just talked about as well. That's what mudita means in its broader sense, and that's, I think, how the Buddha meant it.

All that while at the same time your primary focus and your primary intention is spending most of your time doing jhana practice, working on that in formal practice. So yes, connection with nature, but if you then feel moved by the great Devon God of mud and rain to create a great mud sculpture outside to express your connection—no, not on this retreat. Another time, great. It might be really soul making. It's another time. Most of your time is in formal practice doing work toward the jhanas. But the heart is open and you're taking care of that nourishment. You understand?

Similarly with connection with each other—it's a silent retreat, as I'll speak about. So most of the time it's formal practice. Can I feel, can I have that openness? Can I have that connection with nature, with each other without having to act on it disruptively?

Openheartedness in a nutshell—the openness of heart, of soul, of being—easily outweighs, easily trumps focus or concentration in terms of its significance for jhana practice. Openness of heart, openness of being.

And it's not to say focus and concentration aren't important, but just their relative importance. If you're familiar with soul-making dharma practice, one way of adding to what we just said is that part of what makes you happy here, while you're on retreat, is that you have a fantasy of the retreat. If you're not familiar with soul-making, just forget about this. It doesn't matter. I'm not going to explain. I'm just throwing it out very briefly. Just don't worry about it.

You need a fantasy in the good sense of the retreat. You need a fantasy of yourself as a practitioner - juicy, soul-making, beautiful image, fantasy of yourself. Something that's operating in the background. A fantasy of the tradition. These teachings, these jhana teachings have been going for thousands of years, passed on from teacher to student. Thousands of years. There's a tradition of these arts, these beauties, these treasures being passed on. Fantasy of all that. Fantasy of the whole tradition. It's all part of it. That's part of your happiness and nourishment.

But on this retreat it doesn't become so dominant that you then go into a whole big imaginal practice about all that. Maybe occasionally if you need to recalibrate your whole practice - if you've gotten into a real rut or whatever it is, or you've gotten really tight - but generally not. So these fantasies operate in the background. They're almost subliminal. That's what I mean when I use the word fantasy as opposed to image. They're almost subliminal. They're just kind of really nourishing and supporting our whole being, lubricating our whole sense of what we're doing, giving moisture there, giving beauty and depth.

So if you don't know what that means because you're not familiar with it, just forget about it. It doesn't matter.

But you're going to have to, because of the schedule, because of the teachings, because we're not going to be at the front a lot, we're not going to be doing every twenty minutes piping up and saying, "Can you feel your body?" or whatever - you have to generate and sustain the energy without the teachers leading a lot of meditations and with the open schedule. You have to generate the energy and sustain it.

What's really helpful also is to open your intention. Open your intention. Why are you here? What's it serving? Who are you serving? You're sitting, you're walking, you're standing, you're showing up consistently in the hall. People see you out there doing the walking meditation in the walking room. That's a tremendous gift to each other. It's so supportive when someone sees you showing up again and again and again. Inspiration. It communicates commitment. It helps. You're helping each other by doing that.

What's my intention? Open the intention beyond just me and my practice and how I feel. Why am I here? What am I serving? Who am I serving?

Don't assume you are irrelevant. How common it is - one of the pathologies in Western culture, mixed with its opposites often - is to just not realize how relevant we are, how we make a difference. Yes, you as an individual, your presence, your character, your soul, your vibe. Don't assume you're irrelevant. Don't assume you don't make a difference. Don't assume that in silence you don't make a difference.

So open up the intention. This is really important.

And again, it could be just a natural part. It could be something very brief. It could be something you do formally again and again. And then of course the intention for all beings. Why are you here? Who are you doing this for? Who are you serving? What are you serving?

Again, your happiness and your equanimity. You set a goal. I heard about these jhanas. I want to get them. And then it doesn't go so well. And then we need equanimity with that. That's the whole thing. We're going to talk about it. Part of what gives us equanimity is I'm not just doing this for myself. I'm showing up when it is going really not well and it sucks and it's raining again in Devon and whatever it is. And I'm doing this for other people. That's part of what keeps you steady through the ups and downs. You understand? Open up the intention.

Does everyone know what the word inertia means? Watch out for inertia. How often, especially for many of you who have been practicing for years, if not decades, how easily we can kind of just do what we usually do. And we kind of avoid the effort or the discomfort or the disturbance of trying something new in practice sometimes.

So there's even a default way of working with the breath. I just always do it this way. Or a default way of breathing. It's unconscious. I just always breathe. I don't really pay attention to how I breathe. And it's a bit uncomfortable to try and play with the breath and make it different. Or which practice we do. I tend to stay away from metta or whatever it is. Or as I mentioned earlier, there can be inertia about how we listen to Dharma talks. So I maybe always go into this kind of letting it just wash right through.

So maybe if you're used to that, it might be to ask: what would it be to listen on your toes and really listen with a discerning mind? What does that imply? And what's the exact difference?

How is that different from what I've just heard compared to what I'm used to hearing or what I think I know?

So, jhanas—one of the fruits of jhanas is malleability of mind. Malleability, everyone knows what that means? It means shapeability. Actually, one of the most significant fruits of jhana practice—we'll talk about this—is malleability. Malleability of consciousness, perception, mind.

Like so many things, jhanas lead to malleability, and guess what? Malleability leads to jhanas. In other words, it's a condition for jhanas. So malleability is the opposite of inertia. You've got to get in there and try different things. In your playground: "Oh, I've never played on that whirly swing before." Well, get on it and give it a go. That might mean something very subtle about what you're doing, or it might mean a different practice, or whatever it is. Jhanas lead to malleability; malleability leads to jhanas. You won't access jhanas unless you're willing to be malleable and you play and you play and get into trying different things. You've got to be, in a way, practicing on your toes—ready, responsive. We talk a lot about this.

So malleability on one hand. At the same time with it, we want firm, clear, simple intention or resolve. So it's a kind of complement to malleability. In other words, we are here to do jhana practice. I'm very clear. That's my priority. That's what I'm here for. And that's clear. It's very simple. It's complex what it involves, but the intention is simple and it's a resolve and it's firm. It's clear, simple, and firm.

Again, this is immensely significant. It doesn't sound like a big deal. It will make or break your practice depending on this intention, if you're not taking care of that.

When I say jhana practice—again, I'll elaborate on a lot of what I'm talking about here—I mean including the hindrances, including working with the difficulties. So when I say jhana practice, I mean also working with the difficulties, the yucky stuff, the sludge and slogging your way through it. I mean also, when I say jhana practice, the whole relationship with practice, the whole view of the self doing the practice and trying to do the practice. I mean the whole relationship with goals and effort, the whole conceptual framework of all that, the self as meditator. All that is included in what I call jhana practice, not just the lovely bits about how to move from the second to the third jhana.

So malleability and clear, simple, firm resolve in doing jhana practice. What that means, practically speaking, is it's too much to then add, "Oh great, three weeks at Gaia House. Metta has always been easy and familiar to me. And when I've tried breath practice, I always get this kind of constriction in my throat. So maybe I'll use this retreat to see if I can clear up that constriction." No. I mean, it may happen, it may not happen, but don't make it an intention.

Go with—as I said before, or to say what I said before in a different way—go with whatever practice is easiest for the well-being, the pīti, to arise. Listen to what I'm saying. I'm not saying go with whatever practice you feel you can stick with the object the longest. Go with whatever practice is the easiest for the well-being to arise.

So I'm not trying to fix this constriction in my neck. I'm also not going to... "Oh, three weeks, I can also develop my yoga practice and get into that, or perfect my lotus pose, or kick my caffeine habit." All of these may be really good things, but once we start expanding the intention that way, it actually, in a subtle way, starts to fray something.

Okay. So I mentioned the hindrances. And I really want to stress this point—I'll say it over and over. I am including that in jhana practice. By jhana practice, I mean a very big picture, including the times when it's really not going well and those particular difficulties and how we relate to them and how we work with them. They are—sometimes I call them—they are the dark, rich underbelly of jhana practice. The hindrances, the stuff we really don't like. They have their own gold. They deliver their own gold if I work with them the right way.

And I would dare to say, if you spent a whole three weeks and you never made it to any jhana at all, but you got wise in relation to the hindrances—and I'll explain what I mean by that—this retreat would still be worth its weight in gold.

These hindrances are not confined to our meditation cushions—they are life afflictions that permeate our entire existence. To truly understand how to work with them, to develop wisdom in relationship to them, offers tremendous benefit that extends far beyond our formal practice.

This difficult side of practice, these hindrances, carries just as much value as the loveliness of the jhanas. I am not speaking lightly when I say this—I mean it with complete conviction. When we can open up wisdom in relationship to the hindrances, when we can relate to them with skill, the transformation is profound.

Let me clarify what I mean by wisdom in this context, and I will return to this point repeatedly. Wisdom means, first, that we stop believing the hindrances. We no longer accept as truth the stories they weave. Second, it means we become comfortable with the arising of hindrances without taking them as commentary on our worth, our value as practitioners, or our spiritual capacity. We learn not to believe them and not to take them personally.

If you can move toward these two stances—not believing the hindrances and not taking them personally—this represents an absolutely magnificent transformation. It may not sound glamorous or spectacular, but in terms of what it delivers for your life, the impact is enormous.

All of this forms part of our framework here. And everything I am sharing implies something specific about your practice—about your intention, your view, your attitude. This understanding must translate into moment-to-moment differences in how you hold your stances, perspectives, relationships, attitudes, and heart qualities.

Do not let this remain mere conceptual understanding. Stay alert, stay engaged. You must translate these teachings into lived experience. What does it mean in this very moment to transform your entire view of what we are doing here?

Who among you has not heard teachings on the hindrances before? Who has not heard ten such talks? A hundred? What we seek is actual change, genuine transformation. And we will explore the hindrances more deeply as we proceed.

Now let me broaden our discussion beyond the hindrances to address emotions generally, particularly difficult emotions, within the context of this jhana retreat. Context is crucial here—I want to establish the larger framework of the entire spiritual path and locate this retreat within that expansive view.

I feel this is fundamentally important, and I hold this conviction strongly: Our entire spiritual journey—the movement, opening, learning, and development we cultivate throughout the path—must include a deepening of psychological awareness. Certainly in relationship to ourselves, but equally in relationship to others. This represents a vast subject, and to me, this psychological dimension constitutes an essential aspect of the path.

This is particularly true in our contemporary context, much more so than during the Buddha's lifetime. We inhabit different psychological landscapes. Our entire sense of self has evolved. This implies that liberation itself takes on different meanings in our time. While I will not pursue this tangent now, we can explore it further another time.

The implication for us today is that liberation must encompass a certain depth, breadth, capacity, sophistication, and sensitivity regarding what we might call psychological awareness of self and other.

The path as I understand and teach it must include emotional discernment as a fundamental component. This means developing emotional capacity—a heart that is vast and capable of holding immense range and variety. The awakened being possesses tremendous subtlety in emotional discernment and skillfulness in working with emotions.

The path must also include emotional healing. We are engaged in healing, we have experienced healing, we understand this process, and we develop capacity for working with healing in ourselves and others.

In our emotional work, we cultivate flexibility of view. We become perfectly comfortable regarding emotions as real entities with genuine causes, relating to them and caring for them as substantial realities. Simultaneously, we are equally comfortable understanding them as thoroughly empty, unreal, uncaused by anything ultimately real. This represents a range of skillful perspectives.

We develop proficiency in many different approaches and viewpoints regarding emotions. This, to me, forms the larger context for understanding emotions within the entirety of the spiritual path.

Now we're on a three-week, twenty-three day jhāna retreat. We're setting this retreat in context within that much larger framework where we want all of that range I just described regarding emotions.

For these three weeks, our first choice with regard to difficult emotions—with regard to joy and peace we'll discuss more as we continue, but with regard to difficult emotions—our first choice is simplifying, psychologically simplifying and letting them quieten, or encouraging them to quieten.

If someone did only this, if this were their sole relationship with emotions for their entire spiritual path, I wouldn't be okay with that. I really wouldn't. But if someone doesn't know how to do this and cannot move into this capacity, I'm also not comfortable with that.

When we allow difficult emotions to quiet, when we simplify all their complexity—and that complexity can be beautiful and very important at times—but on this retreat, this is what we're doing. This is our primary, our first-choice way of working, of relating.

When we simplify and quieten them this way, there's still care present. We're not being harsh or dismissive or brutal in any way. There's still care there.

So it's the first choice, not always the only choice. There are other options and second choices. It's a temporary preference set within a much bigger context. Do you understand?

Some of you, I know, have been working very hard recently as activists in different areas. Some of you in regard to climate change and all kinds of issues—Extinction Rebellion and such—climate change, species extinction, whatever it may be. And you may be, I don't know where you're at now. It's all very recent, all very much alive and in our faces. You may still be feeling that passion and that burning. And there may be grief. I don't know. There may be some grief around all that. It's present, affecting many people. I certainly feel it.

That passion and that grief are really important.

Some of you, certainly in this country and maybe in others, might be feeling grief, maybe even upset at the recent election here. You may or may not.

Some of you, and again I don't know, some of you may be feeling grief in relation to me and my situation—my health and probably dying, and so forth.

And of course there may be other things affecting your heart right now that feel difficult to bear—this sense of loss, of things falling apart, whatever it might be.

I want for you—related to what I said before—I want for you that you have a really very wide and deep range of approaches for your soul. I want that for your souls. So that you're able to open to grief and really open, but you're able to hold it and hold it well, hold it in a way that heals. I want that for you.

And I also want that you can decide sometimes not to pick it up and instead go for the positive, the joyful, the jhānic direction—the quietening of emotions, which happens in jhāna via joy anyway. You go through the bubbliness and the joy, and then things start to quiet.

So here on this retreat, although I want all this for you, here on this retreat, as I said, the latter approach is primary—the quieting.

This is a big deal.

There's no danger—I think if you're not sure—there's no danger of not being able to find the grief later. It's important to say this. If you have three weeks where you make a certain direction of choice, tend to make a certain direction of choice—not pushing it away, not shutting it down, just not so much going there—there's no danger that you won't be able to find it later on, if it's authentic grief or whatever, after the retreat.

There's no danger that you're going to get locked into some kind of mode of relationship with your emotions or your heart, locked into this mode of not feeling certain emotions. No danger at all. For three weeks you can practice this malleability. There's no danger of those things.

Again, we want the gift of flexibility, of range.

I don't know right now. Let's take a few minutes, shall we? I want to follow this up just for a few moments.

If there is something affecting your heart, something to do with loss—anything, it could be in relation to nature, it could be in relation to social situations, could be a personal relationship or whatever, a loss or impending loss—if there's some sense that something is falling apart or potentially falling apart, some grief, some overwhelm, if there's something like that, let's take a moment. Maybe come into a meditation posture just for a few moments together. I want to do something.

So it doesn't matter what it is. It also doesn't matter if there's nothing in particular, but it may be, as I said, that your heart is impacted, finding it hard to bear what human beings are doing to the earth, to our ecosystem, the planet that keeps us alive and sustains our civilization, what we are doing to the other species.

It may be there's a personal loss or the possibility of a personal loss—some relationship, someone you care about or love. There has been that loss. It may be that you're feeling grief or dismay or anger at some of what's going on, or what goes under the heading of political, but it's not really political—it's ethical. The rise of nationalism, racism, seeming corporate stranglehold on democracy, simply the prevalence of stupidity.

Just in your meditation posture, let the uprightness and the firmness of your posture help you. These are big deals. Big movements, big changes, asking a lot of us. Let your posture help you. Open, grounded, upright.

Bring whatever it is or whichever ones of those, bring them to mind, just bring them lightly to mind. You don't need to get into the whole story, just get a sense of what is happening, what might be happening and how it affects your heart, how it affects your soul.

Let your attention and awareness include your whole body, the whole space of your whole body. That's your base, that whole space. Open up the awareness. You're letting that whole space be in touch with these challenges, these difficulties, these happenings, these developments—upright, open.

Just notice how your heart is right now. Whole body. Keep that whole body space open. Keep opening the whole body. Don't let it shrink. It will shrink. Keep opening it. And feel your heart in response, or how it responds to these situations, whatever it is. Let there be a little spaciousness, a little softness around your heart's response, whole body.

But then, not so much emphasizing the spaciousness or the softness. Let that be there. But rather, how do I want to work? How do I want to live in response to this loss, this falling apart, whatever it is? How do I want to manifest in relationship to it?

I'm not talking about the practical details—I'm going to do this, I'm going to sign up for that, I'm going to get a job doing this. I mean just the quality of being, the stance of being, the relationship, the resolve. Heart, soul, being. Whole body.

What am I devoted to? With all this that I'm potentially facing, that we are potentially facing, what am I devoted to? It doesn't matter about the details. Can I get a sense of it in a way that makes a difference to my sense right now?

It might be the Buddha. It might be the Dharma. Maybe you use the rupa at the front of the hall of the Buddha there. It might be a certain image that you've worked with. That's what you're devoted to. It might be something a bit more abstract, like goodness or beauty or love. Get a sense of what you're devoted to.

So you're holding your body, your heart, the difficulty, and the sense of devotion. Can you sense that devotion in the body and in the way it shapes the body, in the way it energizes the body, in the way the body forms itself around it, in the way the body aligns with that devotion? Connecting body, devotion, heart, soul, body.

Can you get a sense of how the sense of devotion actually energizes the body right now in a stillness? There's a sense of resolve there. Can you feel it in the body space? We're not going into practical details. I resolve to do this every day.

I resolve.

More the energetic sense of resolve, of devotion. Can you feel in the sense of devotion, in the body, in the sense of resolve, can you feel that there's strength there? Can you feel it in the body? There's uprightness there.

I'm not suppressing anything here, but in this alignment of the heart and the mind, the soul, the being, the body, with what we're devoted to in relation to what is difficult, the resolve and the devotion, the energization, the uprightness—this becomes a kind of minimum base of happiness, a minimum base.

There's well-being in this state. There's equanimity here, well-being, uprightness, energy. In relation to what we said, certainly with regard to jhāna work, this kind of basis of strength, of stability, of very base level of happiness. And it transfers to our life, for our work, whatever we're doing. It expands our capacity to serve. Of course, the jhānas do as well.

You can just gently come out of that now. Do you get a sense of what I'm talking about here? Does it make energetic sense?

So that was very quick. There's one possibility with difficult emotions and so many other skills. But this kind of thing is important, given that some of you have come from a lot of busyness in activism or whatever it is right now and other things that are going on.

I also want to say a very warm welcome. It's really lovely to sit with you here. I'm so delighted that after nearly two years, this can happen. I'm really very touched and grateful and appreciative that Rob, after sixteen years wanting to teach this, finally has three weeks to do so. Really delighted to be here with you.

So here we are, landing together. What I would really like to speak about is how we create this container together. It's so lovely for me to sit in this hall and already have a sense of being welcomed in this vessel of Gaia House. The support it gives—something feels really welcomed. Can you sense this? I'm just arriving here.

I'm also really appreciating what Rob alluded to—that we all are participating in this. We are all contributing, we are all participating to enhance, to make this vessel even more beautiful. We all need, we are all needed in this. We are all active ingredients, important ingredients, needed ingredients, welcomed and appreciated ingredients. I really want to welcome you all into this.

I think one very beautiful ingredient is all those shared intentions of non-harming, this shared celebration of our moral sensibility, our ethical consideration. I think this is something uniquely human. This is something that makes us human. So really inviting the exploration, the examination of this territory of moral sensibility is a way to celebrate our humanness. It's a way to celebrate what is precious in the human heart.

Traditionally, of course, as you all know, these moral sensibilities, this intention of non-harming, is expressed in the five precepts. I want to just name them, to bring them into the room, to make them part of our mandala here.

And of course, you all are aware that these precepts are somehow just headlines or gateways to actually very powerful, very, very unfathomable explorations of what it may mean to be alive. And as Rob said before, when we were speaking shortly in the teacher wing, they are a great foundation for samādhi. Where we can appreciate our heart, we can appreciate each other, and where we give this precious gift of safety—safety to each other.

And thus they are. Listen. Step into it. Really see if you can step into this beautiful intention, or this beautiful pathway of the intention they actually evoke.

We together undertake the training to not intentionally harm or kill another human being. Let it resonate with the beauty of this intention, this point of reverence.

We together here undertake the training to not take what has not been freely given, and to respect each other's property and respect all that is given to us.

We undertake the training to not harm another with expressions of our sexuality. This doesn't mean make my sexuality wrong—it's not a moral statement. But we give each other the freedom not to look at each other in this way, so that we can be at ease with each other.

We undertake the training to not intentionally hurt ourselves and others with our words. And of course this might be mostly internal speaking. We pay attention—how do we speak in our practice to ourselves and to each other?

And we undertake the training—or no, we actually make the resolve. It's not a training so much. We take the resolve to not take any substances that cloud our mind, because we really want to explore the depth of what is possible for this human consciousness. We want to explore, we want to inhabit, we want to really know it deeply—what is possible here. And of course, this doesn't mean that you stop taking any medication. Of course, look after yourself.

So how does this ring with you? And when Rob was speaking, and I was just sitting here a little bit, first of all, to see already this appreciation in your faces. I don't think it's a project. Rob came in just with so much appreciation to be here with us and with him. And then also maybe having this sense for a moment to appreciate each other in our intention, in our precious gift that people can actually feel safe around us. This precious gift of the intention of non-harming.

And delighting to be welcomed in a community where this is a shared intention. But also I think really, really important to delight in the goodness of your own intention. To delight that your heart actually feels really moved to incline itself in this way.

Thank you. I'm really looking forward to practice with you. May you all have a wonderful retreat with delight and joy.

Hi, everyone. It's really lovely to sit here together, and I felt so much appreciation listening to Rob and being here together, starting and embarking on this journey together. A really warm welcome from my side as well.

And at the same time, with appreciation, I can feel a sense of little bit of wobbliness sitting for the first time on this side in the hall of Gaia House instead of that side with you. But seeing all your friendly faces brings so much encouragement, and I feel a sense of support and friendliness and heartfulness in the hall. So I'm very much looking forward to our time together, journeying through the territory of jhānas and all the exploration and sharing and learning together.

And I was just wishing to say a few words about silence. Silence that is such an essential part of this retreat container, and also so much supporting what we are doing here together as we are exploring the mind. And as we are creating conditions for the samādhi, for the silence of the mind also to deepen.

And hopefully the silence can be also at the same time a resource for us that is really deeply nourishing our heart and mind—can be almost like a companion on the journey for us, hopefully. And this is also something that we are cultivating and creating and nourishing together, the kind of part of the container, that we can be offering ourselves the silence and offering each other the silence, the gift of silence.

This can really help ourselves and each other in becoming more sensitive. It's really so supportive. And hopefully, we can still enjoy each other and feel each other's support as it was talked about. That we can support each other in the silence and feel a sense of community.

It would be so much more difficult to do this retreat by ourselves at home. So we were thinking there would be a practical way to support our exploration, a practice of supporting silence.

We are offering this possibility and very much encouraging you to hopefully make use of it. We will be bringing here a basket where you are invited and encouraged to bring and leave your mobile phones for the duration of the retreat. You can bring your phone, mark it with your name, and we will take care of it—you will surely get it back at the end of the retreat. This can actually be part of this ritual of simplifying and renunciation and letting go, and also contribute to creating the conditions that can support ourselves and each other to make the most of this journey.

This basket will be available right after this session, and certainly until tomorrow morning. You are very welcome to bring your little technological friends there and leave them with us.

I am really, really happy and grateful to be sharing this journey together and to meet you in the interviews. I wish you all a very fruitful retreat.

We have already been sitting for a little while. I would like to do a guided meditation, but I think we probably need to move a little bit. So why don't we take two minutes and just move your body however you feel like you need—whatever's going to be good, because we will probably be sitting a little bit longer. Just shake, wiggle, stretch—whatever your body needs.

CHAPTER 198

An Introduction to the Jhānas

Rob Burbea · 1h10

> In this foundational talk from his retreat series on practicing the jhānas, Rob Burbea provides an accessible yet comprehensive introduction to these profound meditative states. He begins by clarifying key terminology - distinguishing between samādhi as an umbrella term for harmonious well-being, samatha as tranquility, and jhānas as specific states within samādhi. Drawing directly from the Buddha's classical descriptions, he reads passages detailing the four form jhānas and four formless jhānas, emphasizing their extraordinary nature as "breathtakingly beautiful" experiences that should inspire genuine excitement.
> Burbea's teaching approach emphasizes mastery over achievement, encouraging practitioners to develop deep familiarity with each jhāna through what he calls "marinating" - sustained practice that allows these states to transform one's being at the cellular level. He challenges common misconceptions about jhāna practice, questioning whether rigid definitions around factors like sensory withdrawal or unshakeable concentration truly matter, and instead advocating for intelligent discernment of what's essential versus secondary. The talk explores how different conceptions of insight shape our approach to jhāna practice, arguing that if we seek liberation including sensitivity, responsiveness, and understanding of emptiness, we must cultivate these same qualities within our samādhi practice. This sets the foundation for viewing jhānas not merely as concentration exercises, but as "perception attainments" that open us to the profound beauties and magical dimensions of existence.

So we're not too pushed for time, but I don't want to be too long. I want to talk about just an introduction to the jhanas and a little bit of an overview. Again, a sort of "What are we doing here? Why are we doing it? What are we talking about? What's the area we're talking about?"

To start with a bit of vocabulary, there's this word jhanas, and I'll talk about that of course, but there's also this word samadhi, which many of you will know. There's also a word samatha. Samatha tends to mean calm or tranquility. Samadhi is more of an umbrella term, at least that's how I use it. I think that's how it was originally used in the text. Jhanas are a kind of subset of samadhi, if you like.

Samadhi is actually quite hard to define, but it's something like a state of harmonious well-being of mind and body. Mind and body are gathered, coherent, harmonious in some state of well-being. Actually, even that's not quite accurate. You can think, oh, in the formless jhanas, is there bodily well-being? Well, there is kind of. You can still have pain somewhere, but it's not really overtaking. So it's hard to get an exact definition. But I use it as a kind of umbrella state.

There are lots of insight states we could talk about, for example, that are still states of samadhi. Because of the insight, because of the letting go, there's a kind of harmonization, a cohesion, a unification of mind and body and awareness and bodily experience. All that cohered, unified, harmonized in some sense of well-being. There are lots of different flavors of well-being as we'll talk about. That's what I mean by samadhi. The eight jhanas are a subset of that.

The Buddha described, he talked a lot about the jhanas—a lot, a lot, a lot. Way more than he talked about mindfulness, interestingly. So I'm going to read you quite briefly the Buddha's description. He's talking to a bunch of monks: "What, monks, is right concentration?" This is the Buddha talking.

"There is the case where a monk, quite withdrawn from sensuality, withdrawn from unskillful qualities—it's actually withdrawn from sensual desire, withdrawn from unskillful qualities, the Pali—enters and remains in the first jhana: rapture and happiness born from that withdrawal, accompanied by directed thought and evaluation, accompanied by thought. He permeates and pervades, suffuses and fills this very body with the rapture and happiness born from withdrawal. There is nothing of his entire body unpervaded by rapture and pleasure born from withdrawal."

So he describes it kind of technically, the jhana, then he gives a simile:

"Just as if a skilled bathman or bathman's apprentice would pour bath powder into a brass basin and knead it together..." So in those days they had bath houses, and that's where you would go to have a bath and a wash. There would be someone there who mixes soap powder with water to make your personal bar of soap for your bath. This person, this bathman, has this soap powder and water, and it's kind of a skill to get it mixed right so that it's not just a liquid mess, but that it's got enough moisture in it that you can give it a good rubbing. So there's some skill in that.

"So this bathman, the bathman's apprentice, pour bath powder, soap powder, into a brass basin, knead it together, sprinkling it again and again with water so that his ball of bath powder, saturated, moisture-laden, permeated within and without, would nevertheless not drip. Even so, the monk permeates this very body with the rapture and happiness born of withdrawal. There's nothing, no part of the body untouched," et cetera.

So that's the first jhana. Basically you've got rapture—and we'll talk about this, piti—this really nice physical feeling that is not coming from sensual contact. I'll talk much more about this. And you've got happiness, and the mind is, that feeling is pervading the body, and the mind is really settling down there and feeding on it and getting into it and really alive to that. That's the first jhana.

Second jhana: "With the stilling of directed thought and evaluation, with the stilling of thought, he enters and remains in the second jhana: rapture and happiness born of tranquility, unification of awareness, free from directed thought and evaluation. And with confidence, with this internal assurance, he permeates and pervades, suffuses and fills this very body with the rapture and happiness born of composure. Nothing in the body remains untouched."

Looking at this beautiful image of the lake with spring water, we must remember this comes from a hot country where such coolness is deeply appealing. The Buddha describes a lake with spring water welling up from within—having no inflow from east, west, north, or south. The skies periodically supply abundant showers, and the cool fountain of water rising from within permeates and pervades, suffuses and fills the entire lake with cool waters. No part remains untouched by these cool waters. Just so, the practitioner permeates this very body with the rapture and happiness born of composure, leaving nothing of the body untouched.

In the third jhana, with the fading of rapture—the fading of piti—the practitioner remains in equanimity, mindful and alert. This mindfulness differs from our usual understanding of the term. There's physical sensitivity to happiness as one enters and remains in the third jhana. The noble ones declare of such a practitioner: "Equanimous and mindful, he has a happy abiding"—a joyful abiding. The body becomes permeated and pervaded, suffused and filled with pleasure divested of rapture, divested of piti, so nothing of the entire body remains untouched by this happiness free from rapture.

The simile here speaks of a lotus pond containing blue, white, or red lotuses. Some of these lotuses, born and growing in water, remain completely immersed, their petals never rising above the surface. They flourish while staying submerged, permeated and pervaded, suffused and filled with cool water from roots to tips. Nothing of these lotuses remains untouched by cool water. Similarly, the practitioner permeates the body with happiness divested of rapture, leaving no part untouched by this pleasure.

In the fourth jhana, with the abandoning of both happiness and stress—this refined happiness and any remaining stress—one enters and remains in the fourth jhana: purity of equanimity and mindfulness, neither pleasure nor pain. The practitioner sits permeating the body with pure, bright awareness so nothing of the entire body remains untouched by this pure, bright awareness.

The simile describes someone sitting wrapped from head to foot in white cloth, with no part of the body left uncovered. Just so, the practitioner sits permeating the body with pure, bright awareness, leaving nothing untouched by this luminous consciousness.

These constitute the four form jhanas. Beyond these lie four formless jhanas, which we'll explore in much greater detail later. For now, I'll briefly share the Buddha's descriptions.

After the fourth jhana comes complete transcendence of perceptions of physical form, the disappearance of perceptions of resistance—of solidity—and the ceasing to heed perceptions of diversity, of manifoldness. One enters and remains in the sphere of infinite space: the fifth jhana.

In the sixth jhana, with complete transcendence of infinite space, consciousness becomes the focus as one enters the realm of infinite consciousness. The instruction emphasizes sticking with this theme, developing it, pursuing it, establishing oneself firmly within it.

The seventh jhana brings the realm of nothingness. Here, space itself has collapsed, leaving not emptiness within space, but pure nothingness itself.

The eighth jhana is called the sphere, realm, or base of neither perception nor non-perception. Here, there's not even nothing—we reach the very limit of perception's possibilities. This state transcends even the perception of nothingness itself.

These are the eight jhanas as the Buddha described them. Some descriptions remain quite brief, and we'll need to fill them out as we proceed.

Teaching, I find, is deeply contextual. What I emphasize depends on who sits before me, what I sense you need, your background, and what you may have encountered elsewhere. When discussing jhanas, I address assumptions you might carry from other teachings—assumptions that may not prove helpful.

I'll be teaching from my direct experience with jhanas and years of guiding others through them. I'll focus on what seems most significant: what opens this treasure? What treasures lie here? What makes a truly liberating difference?

I'll contradict myself frequently. I might say these eight jhanas must be very clear and discrete, with quantum jumps between them. Later, I might describe the whole journey as one continuous spectrum without sharp divisions.

So don't get too hung up on that. I might say that some of us—some of you, maybe most of you, and maybe most people—really need to forget the whole question that goes on: "Do I have it now? Is this it? Am I in a jhana or am I out of a jhana?" Focus rather on enjoying, on just really maximizing your enjoyment and getting the most enjoyment in the moment, developing what needs to develop to enable you to enjoy it more. Just drop that whole question: "Is this it? Where's the edge here? Do I have it?" Don't dwell on where that sharp definition is.

So I might say that. And then I might—and I will—also say something like: when we talk about jhanas as we're teaching it, we really mean something breathtakingly nice, breathtakingly beautiful, really a revelation. If you've not experienced the second jhana or even the third jhana, it's really a revelation. You might have had all kinds of happiness in your life, been very content, all kinds of wonderful things that you rejoiced in, lots of peaceful times and nice holidays and relaxing moments. We're talking about something of a whole different order. We're really talking about "wow, wow"—something very, very beautiful, something really exciting. And you should be excited. I like people to be excited about practice. It's a good sign, a healthy sign.

I can think of quite a few instances over the years where someone's come to me—they've been exposed to jhana teachings elsewhere or whatever—and they come into an interview and say, "I think I broke through to the sixth jhana yesterday." And I thought, "Oh, how was it?" And they say, "Yeah, it was nice." And I'm like, "No, that can't be. It absolutely can't be."

Now, either they're kind of faking a Buddhist equanimity—"I'm not supposed to be attached, so I'll just say it's nice," but secretly thinking "wow." But in this person's case, I genuinely think it just wasn't that big a deal. That's not what we're talking about.

So actually those definitions do become quite important. We're really talking about something—yes, it's really something else, you know? When there isn't the excitement, when there isn't that sense of "wow," it's not going to make a difference to your life. This person was describing something that might have been a relatively new experience, but there was nothing in that experience—or having that experience—that was going to make much difference to her ability to let go, to her life, to her sense of existence, to her sense of herself and world. It was just, "Oh okay, that was the sixth jhana, tick."

I'm really interested in all this making a difference.

So I might say, "Look, it's important that we're talking about this territory," and I might say, "Forget about all that and don't worry about the definitions."

I'm going to contradict myself a lot, and I reserve that right. I might also say, on the one hand, "It's not about just focusing more intensely or nailing your mind, your attention to something for hours and then expecting something to happen. It's not about prioritizing the intensity or the steadiness of focus." And I might also say to the same person at a different time, or to another person, "More intensity—just more intensity to the focus. Energize that focus."

Most people, I think it's the first one—too hung up. I'll explain this as we go along today and other days. It's too much thinking in the wrong way about what we're trying to do. We're prioritizing the wrong things. The priorities we're making may not be that helpful, not that fruitful.

So why all this contradiction? Well, because the nature of all things is that we can look at them in different ways. That's partly what it means to say they're empty. You can look at it like this and it's true, and you can look at it like that and it's true, and those can sometimes even be opposites.

But partly also just because different people at different times—or the same person at different times—sometimes need to hear this, and sometimes need to hear that, regarding the same issue. It might be opposite. It's always the case with teaching. Always the case.

That's partly why it's interesting teaching a group. In a Q&A I might say something, but someone sitting next to that person might need to hear exactly the opposite.

Yesterday I used this word "mastery."

Yesterday I used this word "mastery." I just sort of threw it out there. It's a traditional word—I can't remember what the Pali means—but let me say what I mean by it. I said we're aiming, or I would like us to aim or to think about, kind of mastering each jhana.

What I mean by that has several different components. I mean a really thorough familiarity with all the jhanas, but if we're talking about any particular jhana—to say I mastered the second jhana or whatever—it means a really thorough familiarity and intimacy with all of its aspects.

A jhana actually can manifest differently. It has different aspects, different flavors and tones within it, which if I just dip in and dip out, I don't get to see. Oh, sometimes it's like this and it has that quality and that quality, and these different ranges of depths. So different levels within each jhana. You can divide certain jhanas into different levels, and they're almost discrete manifestations as well. I mean a thorough familiarity with all that.

I mean also by mastery—I'm including in that meaning—really a whole set of skills, a whole kind of artistry that's involved with regard to that jhana in terms of working with it.

I mean also, thirdly, that one can enter it at will. One doesn't need to go—let's say it's the third jhana we're talking about—you don't need to go number one, number two, number three, or breath, number one, number two, number three. You can actually just remember it. The cells and the citta just remember it, and you just have a subtle intention, and it comes back—or a second jhana, whatever it is. I'm just intending for it to come up, and there it comes.

So with a lot of practice, that's what I mean by mastery—that's included. You can go directly from nothing to any jhana, just with a subtle intention. It's not so much—it doesn't need to be so much like a big effort. It's probably more like a fader switch, more like a dimmer switch. But that's partly what I mean.

It doesn't need to be preceded by its preceding jhanas, doesn't need to be preceded by its base practice, whatever base practice, springboard practice of metta or breath or whatever you're doing.

I also mean that you can access and sustain that jhana pretty much in any posture and when you're going for a walk. It means you're doing a loop around here for an hour in the lanes and you can be doing that pretty much in the fourth jhana or whatever it is, if we're talking about mastery of the fourth jhana.

I also mean that a jhana—as part of mastery again—that you can really sustain it and remain in it. I'm going to come back to this. There's a word I want to use: marinate. You need to marinate. I'm going to come back to this. This is really, really important.

We need to sit in a jhana a long time. It's doing a lot of work on the cells, on the being, on the citta. It's fine to go through for two seconds onto the next one. That's all fine. But the real work happens when we really just get in and sit there for a long time and really let that change our habits—our mental habits and our energetic habits. It's doing something different to mind and body, and that takes time, and it takes putting myself in it and staying there for a while.

Mastery also means navigating. I can move from that jhana to any of the other jhanas that I already know, and I don't have to go sequentially. So let's say I'm working on my mastery of the third—then I can go from the third to the first, or from the first to the third, or whatever. So that includes what I call leapfrogging. I can leapfrog. This is partly what I mean.

Mastery might also mean that I can modulate. So again, if you go back to this idea that a jhana isn't really one thing, it's a territory, it's a realm. And like a lot of realms, it has different, as I said, flavors, aspects, regions, levels. And I can modulate, move between those different levels and actually eventually also bring in other qualities to mix with—like mixing cocktails. I can add a bit of this and a bit of that and get an even nicer cocktail or a different cocktail.

In that process of learning to master it, it probably will be the case that what I originally thought was, say, the first jhana—after I've gone through all that mastery process, by the time I've finished, the first jhana actually feels quite a bit different and I understand something different.

Ajahn Geoff used to say to me, "Stick Post-it labels on them at first." You know those sticky labels? They just come off. Don't erect a whole sign that says "that's the first jhana." Okay, I think this is the first jhana, but let's just put a Post-it label now and we'll go through this process and then they'll change over time as you work on them. They also change retrospectively.

Once I get used to the third jhana, the first jhana is transformed indirectly by my repeated experience in the third jhana. So we have to be somewhat easy and loose with the labels.

This mastery applies to all eight jhanas. As I said yesterday, we are where we are. Each person is where you are. What we're really interested in is your playground at your edge—because that's the big picture. Eventually I want mastery of all that. But we are where we are, and the way I'm going to get mastery is by playing in that playground that's on my edge. That's what's going to give me mastery of that playground. At a certain point, when I get that mastery, the playground just shifts—either by itself or I just have to shift it slightly—and then I'm in a new playground. That's my work, that's my play, that's my digestion. This is the way I would like you to think about this approach.

The Buddha has a sutta—I can't remember what it's called, but it might be called the Stupid Cow Sutta or something like that, the Foolish Cow. Very briefly, he describes a foolish, inexperienced mountain cow who's happily eating pasture in a field and looks up and sees another field over there. The cow thinks, "Oh, I bet the grass is nice over there. Let me go down there and eat some of that nice-looking grass." But because this cow is foolish and inexperienced, it tries to do that without being very sure of its footing, even where it's standing. The cow gets stuck in some ditch between the fields, can't get to where it was planning to go—that other nicer-looking pasture—and can't get back to where it was happily eating before. It's just stuck in this ditch. "Just so, monks," the idea is: wait until you master a place before moving on.

And now a contradiction. Sometimes there's really a kind of magic involved in all this. Sometimes you'll find—just try it. Just try something. You think, "I couldn't possibly get..." Just try it. Sometimes the mind will just do something that you think, "Wow, that's amazing." So yes, mostly this idea about mastery and playgrounds. And sometimes, for some people at different times, it's like: just try something that feels beyond you.

Once you really get into all this—if you have the patience, and really what it boils down to is the love and the desire, the eros—and you do develop this kind of mastery, then it really begins to feel like the jhanas are almost like dimensions of being. They're beautiful, amazing dimensions of being. Treasures, treasure realms, enchanted realms. They're there and they're available for us.

This becomes part of one's life and part of one's sense of what existence is and what the cosmos includes. They certainly give a sense of dimensionality to our own being, but they also become almost cosmic in a way. One gets to feel that there are realms that are already there. They already exist.

They really feel like realms that are already there, as if they just exist, like a realm exists. This begins to become obvious around the third jhana. It's much less obvious in the first or second jhana, but after the third jhana, you really feel this is like an enchanted, paradisiacal realm that's just there. I get the blessedness of being able to enter that and hang out in that and come out of that. It's only that we need to find them. They're there.

Or they're like radio stations—like frequencies. You get these presets, right? You can put in Radio 1 or whatever it is. It's just like that. Or the old style where you actually tune with the big knob and the little knob that was the fine tuner.

They're like radio stations. They're in the air anyway.

So it begins to be something like, I'm huffing and puffing to make this jhana happen. It's like they're there. And what we're doing is tuning to something that's already there. So we can have this sense of them, is what I'm saying.

Or I used to feel like it was a bit like a wardrobe. So it's like you've got your wardrobe of clothes and they're all just lined up there. And you can reach in, okay, today I want to wear my pink glitter onesie outfit. And it's right there. And I can just pull it and use it. They're all kind of just available. So we begin to have this sense of them.

If you come to me at the end of a retreat and say, oh, it's fantastic, I never had any jhana before, and I got to the eighth jhana, I'll say, oh, what a shame. Because, I mean, it would be good, obviously, but actually, there would be no way that you would have gotten into the way we're talking about with this playground and this kind of mastery.

And this is my opinion, my emphasis. This is what's really going to make a difference. This is what's really going to be a treasure that affects the being. Going too quickly through, we're not actually getting that treasure in the maximum value. It's a bit like a tourist going on holiday and you go and on your mobile phone you take the photo of whatever it is and then you send it on Facebook to your friends and they like and you like what they sent you. It's all like, okay, been there, done that, but it's not the same as really being there and living it.

So they're not kind of achievement badges. We really want something such a profound treasure. We want it to work on the being. So we have to linger. We have to live there. We have to, as I say, marinate. Absorb, not just get absorbed, but almost absorb the jhana itself into our being. Get to know it intimately so that the cells, the mind, the habit patterns of mind, and energy are affected.

In that way, it makes a really long-term difference to one's life, a long-term difference. I remember talking to someone reporting after another jhana retreat that they did, and it was their first time, and they say I had a great time and they just whipped through all of them. But it won't be—and this is a while later now and I can tell—this person, it hasn't become a profound resource. So they had a good time those ten days or whatever it was. Nothing has altered in their sense of existence. Nothing has altered from that jhana practice in their sense of existence of self and world.

Maybe they didn't want anything to be altered in their sense, because sometimes we get quite attached to our sense of how we think the world and the self. We're attached to a certain view, philosophy, whatever it is. This person had a good time, but so what?

So marinate means a long time and many times in one jhana. It's part of the mastery.

Some of you may not be aware of this. Some of you will be very aware of it or a little less so. There's all kinds of opinions and arguments out there in the Dharma world about how to demarcate. Is this jhana? Is that jhana? What did the Buddha mean? How do we define it? Some of you will be oblivious to all that. Some of you will be exposed to that. All kinds of opinions. Do I have it? Is this it? Different teachers saying different things, writing different things.

Who are you going to trust? And why? How are you going to, if you are exposed to that difference of opinion, who are you going to trust and why are you going to trust or which version, which definition are you going to trust? And more importantly, why?

Or if I change that question: what matters here?

What's important?

So we come to all this charged opinion about this stuff. What actually matters here?

One could say, well, if your experience matches the Buddha's descriptions—as I just very briefly rushed through and read out—if there is an extraordinary opening to well-being or different kinds of well-being, if there's a really deep sense of different kinds of beauty, if there's a really profound sense of resource that's coming from that, if the practice of whatever it is you're doing brings in an integrated way insight and freedom and it makes sense as part of the path in an integrated way, then if we need to make definitions and demarcations, that would seem pretty good to call that a jhāna, right? If it's all that. And I can still improve its quality. I can still say, okay, that's a jhāna, but I can still work on improving it.

So sometimes with all these opinions and what we bring to these questions, I have another question, which is: can I be more intelligent than I am being in relation to these questions? Some of you have not even been exposed to all this stuff yet, so why is he going on about that? But some of you will be. Can I bring more intelligence to these questions? I'll say what I mean by intelligence in a moment, but I mean more than scholarship.

So we're here, I'm teaching this, I'm giving a certain emphasis and a certain range. I would say, as I already said, I teach jhānas—or the jhānas that we're talking about here—as really breathtakingly extraordinary experiences. They lead naturally onwards. There's a way organically that one jhāna will just ripen and mature into the next, just like what the Buddha described. And one has that sense as one's going: oh, wow. Here I am two and a half thousand years later, 2500 years later, and my experience—I can really get the sense of what he's talking about there.

If there is a kind of strong and deep building of confidence through these practices and love of the path, if those are fruits too that you can feel, if freedom comes out of it and a capacity more and more to let go, to be okay with more and more, if transformation comes, if insight that liberates comes and the insight that comes is congruent and integrated into the path—all that, it's like that's the package that I want to encourage.

But also that there is, and again, here's that word again, responsiveness and intelligence. That's part of the deal too. Some jhānas, when some people describe them, are completely unresponsive states, where it's supposed to be so deeply absorbed one actually doesn't know where one's been and one can't make any changes or responsiveness within that state. I'm going to come back to this. Why would I want something like that? It might sound better—because it sounds better, doesn't it? Is it? Can we bring intelligence and boldness to our questioning? Something sounds better. A lot of people are saying maybe it's better. Is it better?

So by intelligence, I mean a certain boldness. I also mean—I don't mean, I mean much more than scholarship. Well, I go back to the Buddha and this Pali word means that. That's all good, but I mean more than that. I mean a wisdom to discern what is essential. Right now we're talking about jhānas, but this actually applies to the whole of the path. Can I develop a wisdom to discern what is essential? What is important? What's important to know? What's important to understand? What's important to develop? What is secondary?

Oftentimes this faculty is not very developed in meditators. People get emphasized, or in my opinion, I find a lot of students emphasizing what's kind of mistaking what's secondary for what's primary, emphasizing what's not so important.

Then what I said yesterday about listening on your toes—do you remember that? Everything that I'm saying, this should set you recalibrating, rethinking, reorienting. What does that mean? Please don't just be passive about it. This is actually quite a big deal. Do I have that wisdom to discern what's essential? What's secondary?

Do I have a nose for it? Do I have a nose, an intuition and intelligence? Can I develop a nose for it? Because sometimes these arguments I've encountered feel like quibbling over what's insignificant, what's secondary.

In the Anapanasati Sutta, it says parimukham. The meditator sits down at the base of the tree with the breath and puts their attention parimukham—around the mouth. The Buddha indicates this is the place to pay attention. Yet people argue about this. Does it really matter? Is it really important? Does it make a difference?

Does it make a difference if I keep the breath as my primary object? Some people say absolutely—you can't let go of the primary object. If you're doing jhana, you need to keep the breath, the primary object. We'll see actually that you can do it both ways. We'll come back to that.

Some people say it's only jhana if the senses close, if you can't hear anything. Well, the Buddha didn't say that. And does it matter? It sounds better, perhaps. If I make the definition "it's only jhana when the senses close," that sounds like a superior attainment. Most people would say it sounds better. I don't know if it actually is.

What I want to say is this: can we bring discernment and intelligence to these questions? Which are important and which are not? What's important? What's secondary? What fruits will I get from pursuing questions that are actually not that significant? I want to taste the fruit, be nourished by the juicy flesh of the fruit, and not worry about the pips and the pith of the apple.

These questions relate to our conception and emphasis. What is the main point of jhana practice? If you read certain texts or listen to different teachers, either explicitly or implicitly, you'll hear various views about what the main point is.

For some teachers, the emphasis is really changing the habit of papañca—mental proliferation. The primary purpose of jhana practice is to change and actually eradicate that habit of papañca. The whole thing is a movement to simplicity, developing a mind that's simple, that doesn't get complicated and embroiled in papañca. That's one view, sometimes explicitly stated, sometimes you discern it by listening to the totality of someone's teaching.

Another perspective: the point of jhana practice is developing a kind of power in the mind that, like a laser beam, allows attention to dissect phenomena. In dissecting them, that's what insight is—I examine things with incredible precision, seeing down to the finest details. The point of jhana practice is to develop this laser-like attention.

There might be combinations here as well.

Someone might say no. What we're developing in jhana is the ability to sustain unwaveringly the focus on something—to hold the mind or attention on something without wavering. The assumption there is that automatically holding the attention on something will reveal the reality of that thing, will reveal the way things are. If I can just stare at this thing long enough, it will reveal its nature, reveal the way it really is.

Sometimes this isn't explicitly said. You have to hang out with the whole totality of a person's teaching or a certain drift of teaching. That's the assumption. That's how it fits in with the whole path.

But is that true? If I stare at an atom—or let's say an electron—long enough, just staring at it will not reveal the nature of the electron or anything else, any more than if I stare at an egg long enough. I have to do stuff with something. And certainly in quantum physics, it's only when I start doing different things that I start to encounter what's most interesting about the true nature of the electron. I start to realize, oh, it's actually dependent on how I look—whether I look and what I do and what's around it. So it's not just staring at something.

Again, why am I saying all this? Because so much we arrive at situations like this with the idea that it's really about how long can I stay steady with my attention on something. I don't want to say that's unimportant, but I just want to shake up the sense of what we're doing and what's priority here and what may be important and may be less.

Another context might be someone saying very rarely, stage by stage, you go through eight jhanas and then you go to the next stage, which is the experience of the unfabricated. That's quite rare, but it's there.

For me, I would say, as I said last night, there are resources that come with the practice of jhanas that really enable, really help us to let go. We say let go, let go, let go. But once I'm this rich in this beauty, once I have these treasures available to me, it becomes much easier to let go. I don't need the food to be nice. I don't need this or that. I have—who cares? I have so much abundant well-being, oh my cup runneth over, so much overflowing delight and pleasure and happiness. I can let go of all kinds of things then. So that's one of the functions, this deep resource as I would see it. I can let go of clinging to things.

I also secondly begin to understand the whole process of fabrication of perception—how the mind can fabricate less and fabricate more. And in moving through the jhanas I begin to understand that. That's also one of the reasons, one of the points.

And a third reason is the mystical openings, the kiss of the mystic. For me, that's a really important point and reason. I want my sense of existence, my sense of world, of self, of other to open up. And it will be in the impress and the opening of these beautiful realms and experience. That's a point for me. That's one of the main points.

Jhanas alone will not liberate one totally. They won't bring you to the end of dukkha. And I think probably most Dharma teachers would agree on that. There may be someone who disagrees, but I don't know. But I definitely say most people agree on that. Jhanas alone will not liberate totally.

But I want to say, nor will insight alone. Nor will insight alone. Nor will both jhanas and insight, the combination...

Okay, let's end there. No, we need the combination. We need the combination. If we're really talking about big, wide, deep liberation, we need the combination of insight and samadhi. And as I said last night, we need the psychological work. We're a whole different species now than we were in the Buddha's day.

Yes, of course, there's much that remains the same, but the whole way we feel ourselves, our aspirations and what we consider normal in human relationship—with ourselves and others—and what we want from life has fundamentally shifted. I won't elaborate on this now, but there's an entire range of psychological work that, if we're speaking of liberation in our current context—for you and me—needs to include all of this.

So yes, samadhi; yes, insight; yes, psychological work; and yes, the cultivation of virtues and beautiful qualities—metta, generosity, compassion, all of that. Those four together, let's say.

So why the jhanas and why the mastery? Because it's part of that mix. That's one reason. And the jhanas, when they're mastered, will give more insight in relation to fabrication. They'll provide more resources. We open ourselves more to the mystic impress and the kiss of the mystic.

But there's something I really want to emphasize—perhaps a style or approach that I want to highlight. When I reflect on what I truly emphasize when I teach jhanas, apart from what I've just said, I would emphasize sensitivity: subtle discernment of different qualities of being, different qualities of heart, of energy, different frequencies of vibration and energy. Sensitivity, subtle discernment, refinement, attunement. These are the qualities I would really like to emphasize, to bring into the picture of how I would like to teach and what I would like to communicate and transmit.

All those qualities—sensitivity, attunement, subtle discernment, refinement—are beautiful, beautiful capacities of the soul. These, combined with this framework I would like to offer about the jhanas, allow jhana practice to fit very easily and congruently, in a very natural and integrated way, into emptiness practices. They simply work together. We're speaking of the same thing.

Sensitivity, attunement, refinement, subtle discernment—we need all of this in emptiness practices and the way they deepen. In soul-making dharma practices, we need sensitivity, subtle discernment, refinement, attunement, all of that. In emotional work, whether with ourselves or with another person, again we need sensitivity, refinement, attunement, subtle discernment. In healing as well—healing the emotions, healing the heart—those capacities are very much part of what I would regard as integral to healing. In relational skill: sensitivity, subtle discernment, refinement.

You see how these same developments are actually part of jhana, emptiness, soul-making, emotional work, healing, and relational understanding. There's something very integrated here.

But more than that, all this opens the jhanas themselves—in this approach and what I'd like to emphasize—to something concerning the beauty of existence. If you ask me what's the point of jhanas, it's something about opening more and more to the beauties of existence, inner and outer. There's something, as I mentioned earlier, of magic here. And that's what I would encourage: you start to feel yourself as something of a magician, a magician in these realms, a magician who can conjure these realms or who has access to these realms.

There's something of magic in the whole endeavor, and there's certainly something of art. This is the kind of flavor, orientation, scope, feeling, attitude, view that I would really encourage.

Those are some of the reasons why. Related to all this, you can see that a person's emphasis or definition of jhana practice depends on their idea of what insight is. If I have the idea that insight is a kind of drilling down through the strata or layers of rock of illusion or construction, then what do I need? I need a sharp tool, a laser beam. Then my conception of jhana practice aligns with that idea of what insight is doing—I view jhana practice as the development of super intense, super sustained focus. What I tend to emphasize then in teaching jhanas is intensity, sharpness, concentration, focus.

If I think of insight as seeing clearly—meaning seeing in more detail—then again I tend to emphasize something similar in teaching jhanas. Maybe I need to see in detail, for my insight, the process of aggregates in time. Perhaps that's what I regard insight as:

if I can see the momentary arising and passing of the five aggregates in time, that's insight. And so my jhana practice needs to set me up like a magnifying glass, very fine, so I can see that.

If that's what I think insight is, if that's what I think ultimate reality is, you see, we're working backwards here and it makes an implication on what we think a jhana is and then what we tend to emphasize within the jhana practice.

Or again, as I said before, if I think I can just stare at something long enough, the truth of it will be seen because I'm just staring at it plainly. If I think plain staring reveals reality, if that's what I think reality is—something that is revealed through plain staring, plain looking. Or I'm sharpening my mind, so I just zip through eight jhanas back and forth and then do some insight practice. I've sharpened my sword so I can kind of atomize things.

There's a relationship here between the way the goal is seen, the way insight is conceived of, the way jhana is conceived of, and then what we come to emphasize within jhana practice. That's why I said, but if I want a liberation that actually does have sensitivity in it and attunement and relational skill and psychological awareness and wants to understand something about emptiness as something very different to do with ways of looking and fabrication, then I'm going to have to think about jhanas in a very different way. Or rather, it's better, it's more congruent to think about them in a certain way.

I'm rushing through a bit, but this makes sense, right?

So it's true. You can pick up certain phrases where the Buddha says in suttas, "with his mind imperturbable" or "with the jhanas you can cut through a mountain" and all that. They're not that common. But they get extracted and then repeated over and over. And dependent on what you've been exposed to, you come to believe that's what's important—imperturbability, the unwaveringness.

Do you understand? And actually, the Buddha just said it in a little phrase once or twice in the whole Pali Canon. And somehow over history, it comes to get repeated by teachers. And that's what we think. Or no thought. We tend to think that's the most important thing.

I remember after I'd finished a year retreat and I went for a dharma yatra in France and they said, "Well, will you come and tell the people about your year retreat." And I said, "Sure." I think I just answered questions or something. I can't remember. But the first question was, "A year. Wow. Did you ever experience a time when the mind stopped thinking?" It was the first question. As if that was the most important thing.

And how much we, in our meditation, measure it by how much thinking there is. Is it going well, is it not? So these things are insidious, these meta-level views, and they get into the nuts and bolts of how I'm regarding this moment in the meditation. This moment, I'm thinking. Who cares if you're thinking? Does it really matter? Is the thinking making you miserable or is it the view about the thinking that's making you miserable? Is that thinking even getting in the way of samadhi and well-being and bliss and ecstasy?

These things are really, really important and insidious. Again, what does it mean to be bold? What does it mean to be intelligent? What does it mean to question these things?

So what happens if we start with the goal, start with the idea—now people will construe that differently—where we're going, what awakening is, but start with the idea: insight. Insight means understanding something about the emptiness of things. I'm rushing through this now, but there are only ways of looking. There's no way independently of a way of looking that something really is. There's no privileged way of looking. There's just ways of looking. Things are empty. Insight is the practice of ways of looking that liberate and ways of looking that fabricate less. I'm intending to talk about this in a lot more detail. I'm just going quickly now because I'm rushed.

What that means is that what we practice and what we're left with at the end of practice is malleability. Malleability of perception, malleability of view, malleability of way of looking. This is a goal and a starting point in practice.

More than agility, more than the ability to move quickly between the jhanas, we're actually learning to shape the view and let the view and the experience of things be shaped through a whole range, feeling the impact on perception.

The Buddha called the jhanas perception attainements. But we very rarely hear that because what historically gets emphasized is no thought, imperturbability, laser-like focus. Actually, just as commonly, he called them perception attainments. And what on earth is a perception attainment?

This I would like to emphasize: perception attainment. We're training certain perceptions, and to think of it that way more than "I'm training my concentration." Again, I'm going to contradict myself and say train your concentration, but what if we think about it as we're training certain perceptions? That has a significance regarding emptiness that I will come to.

So we're developing these resources. We're cultivating virtues. We're developing our psychological and emotional skills. And we're training certain perception attainments.

If I want my awakening, my liberation to include—and some people don't care, but if you want it to include—the beauties of sensitivity, attunement, deep intelligence, responsiveness, pliability, malleability, discernment, subtlety, how do we need to think about the jhanas and what we emphasize and how we practice them? If you decide that you don't care about all that, then that's fine. You can think about them differently.

Yes, definitely, we do want to increase and develop our focus and our concentration. But we also, and oftentimes more importantly, are interested in this development of deep, profound resources of training the perceptions, the relation of that with emptiness understanding, and the development of all these lovely capacities and capabilities of attunement, sensitivity, subtlety of awareness, beauty, magic, art.

We haven't talked about walking meditation yet. Again, I'll be very brief because you're all in different places with different histories.

If you're familiar with energy body, walking meditation is with energy body awareness. If you're already familiar with jhana, then you can start here: I'm at one end of my walking meditation path. I stand as long as it takes to get whatever it is—the piti or the well-being, the happiness. And I just hang out there. If it's nice, I'll hang out. I won't even walk. I'm just standing and I'm in that. That's quite an advanced stage already, if you can just get there.

If I do that, then I walk and I'm concentrating in the whole body space on the piti, on the pleasure. I don't care about my feet. I don't care about the sensations. I'm walking back and forth with the pleasure. That's what I'm concentrating on. If you're there already—most of you won't be—this is the approach.

If you know energy body already, same thing. I stand, feel my contact, and then open the space and just feel—what's the texture, what's the vibration of the energy body? Then I walk back and forth with that. I have to find the pace of walking that enables me to sustain that and get into that experience. So it might be really fast. It might be really slow. It might be in between. It might change as I'm doing the practice.

If at any point I want to stop and stand and just get it back again, I stop and stand and get it back again. I might spend five minutes at the end of the path. It doesn't matter. What helps me get that energy body awareness and helps me get into it and in touch with it?

Do you understand? If you're still not quite sure what the energy body is, then see if you can just walk up and down with a whole body awareness—just the sensations in the whole body.

In other words, in terms of our choices, the least preferable is focusing just on the sensations in your feet. It's fine, it's good, and if that's what you want to do or can do, that's great. But there's a kind of movement here with maturation. Does this make sense?

Now, one last thing: the rhythm in the day of formal practice—sitting, walking, standing. We're going to say much more about this later, but basically, again, it's up to you. What feels like it's helpful right now?

So if you're sitting and it feels good and you feel into it, sit longer. You don't have to sit for forty-five minutes. You could sit just as long as it feels like it's productive and fruitful and you're having a good time. If then you begin to not have such a good time, see if you can just work with it, play your edges, see if you can expand it. Basically, you're following what feels fruitful.

If you're out walking and you're just really into it and it's going really well, just stay walking longer—or standing, or whatever. There's a kind of rhythm that's individual and variable, and you're responsive to it. You have to be sensitive and responsive.

And then there's this—we talked about going for walks, and if you do yoga or qigong or whatever—there's also time to just chill out, have a cup of tea. The day needs to breathe. In this kind of practice, the day needs to breathe. So when we do sit, walk, sit, walk, sit, walk, it may not be that helpful. It might be helpful for other practices, but in this kind of practice, the day needs to breathe. We need to be responsive to different rhythms at different times. What's really working right now? What's supporting right now?

If this is the first time you've not had a fixed schedule, then set yourself a fixed schedule if you're really feeling at sea. Just go with that. But as time goes by, you'll begin to be more fluid and more responsive.

Let's just sit for one minute together.

Thank you, everyone. Enjoy tea. There's no need to rush because it's only you or whoever is doing the clearing up, so take whatever time you need. The whole thing just rolls—we're on an open schedule. The hall is open all the time, so enjoy tea.

See you tomorrow.

CHAPTER 199

A Hidden Treasure: The Relationship with the Hindrances

Rob Burbea · 1h03

> In this profound teaching from the "Practising the Jhānas" series, Rob Burbea reveals the hindrances (nīvaraṇa) as hidden treasures rather than mere obstacles. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) and Majjhima Nikāya teachings, he explains how the Buddha defined jhāna not through unwavering concentration but through "the abandoning of the hindrances." Burbea offers practical antidotes for each hindrance—from expanding energy body awareness for sloth-torpor (thīna-middha) to working skillfully with sexual desire by transforming its energy into pīti. He emphasizes that hindrances exist on subtle spectra and will arise even in deep samādhi states, requiring ongoing refinement of attention and relationship. The teaching explores how hindrances are fabricated (saṅkhāra) rather than solid realities, offering multiple ways of viewing them—sometimes as purification processes, sometimes as constructions to be seen through. Burbea's approach cultivates a non-personal relationship with these mental states, recognizing them as universal aspects of human experience rather than personal failures. This wisdom extends beyond meditation into daily life, transforming our relationship with emotions and reactive patterns. The teaching concludes with insights into how jhāna practice naturally filters away papañca (mental proliferation), gradually revealing hindrances in their purer forms.

Actually, what I want to do is talk about the hindrances, but let me address a couple of things first.

As I mentioned yesterday, teaching this retreat is quite challenging. There's so much I want to communicate—so much that feels important to communicate—because you're all in different places with different needs. I mentioned walking practice yesterday, and Derek just mentioned metta. I see a few people are doing metta as their basic practice, and you seem comfortable walking with that practice.

What I want to say about metta—and I'll talk about this more tomorrow—is that I want to introduce doing metta with energy body awareness. This means that whether I have phrases, visualizations, or whatever approach I'm using, I maintain this whole-body space awareness and never lose that sensitivity. So when I walk back and forth, I'm walking in that kind of awareness with the metta, however I'm practicing it. I'll elaborate on this tomorrow.

The second thing I want to clarify: I was quite rushed in the latter part of yesterday's talk, so I want to ensure something was clear. When I was discussing why we practice jhana and how we conceive of our reasons for doing jhana practice—and therefore what we emphasize—I don't want to replace other emphases or what other teachers might stress, like simplifying, laser-beam focus, or unwavering mind. I don't want to replace those reasons, but rather add to them.

All those emphases are important and can be highlighted at different times. I simply want to add something that's not often discussed but seems really important to me: these qualities of sensitivity, attunement, and refinement. I'm adding this to the possible reasons we're practicing and the possible emphases, allowing them to become more prominent or even the most prominent emphasis. I didn't mean we're discarding everything else—it's more a question of emphasis.

Now, what I want to talk about are the hindrances. There are several important points here.

Sometimes in the suttas, it's almost like a definition: with the abandoning of the hindrances, the first jhana arises. It's almost as if part of the definition of jhana is the absence of hindrances. It doesn't say "with unwavering concentration on this or that"—it says "with the abandoning of the hindrances." This is quite interesting and important, with clear implications for how we think about what we're doing here.

Part of what I want to say about the hindrances is this: it might sound like working with hindrances applies only pre-jhana, and it certainly does apply then—right from day one of anyone's meditation practice. But not just then. Even once the jhanas, all eight jhanas perhaps, are accessible and become regular visitors or explorations—even once all that is up and running wonderfully—the hindrances will still arise at times. Absolutely.

What I want to add, and what's much less commonly discussed and acknowledged, is that they can arise very subtly. Subtle versions of them can arise in jhana as well. I use that word loosely, avoiding the silliness of an overly sharp definition of what is and isn't jhana. The point is about subtlety: even within jhana, subtle hindrances can be present. There's a sutta in the Majjhima Nikaya where the Buddha is teaching super advanced meditators—people doing all this remarkable work with psychic powers and such—and he's still discussing what subtle hindrances arise in that depth of samadhi.

So we need to understand that the hindrances are part of the deal. They're part of the deal when jhana feels like a million miles away. They're part of the deal once we have extensive experience in the jhanas—they'll keep coming and going. They're actually part of the deal in subtle ways, even in jhana, and therefore part of the work, part of the play, part of the whole. So when I say "jhana practice," I mean including the hindrances and all of that.

First, I want to say something about insight in relation to the hindrances. But let me quickly run through some antidotes to the hindrances, since much of this is probably familiar to you.

Before that, let's be clear about what "antidote" means: it's something we apply with a certain goal in mind. We want to eliminate something, like an antidote to an illness.

Let's hope to get rid of this illness.

Now, there are ways of practicing insight meditation where, when a hindrance comes up, the view is: "It's fine. It's just here. I just watch it. I do the same with a hindrance as I do with a non-hindrance or anything else. I'm just watching it. It's not better or worse. It's okay."

When you're doing jhana practice, that's not the attitude. We want antidotes and we want to work against the hindrances. This is primarily—even in the Satipatthana Sutta—the instruction of the Buddha. He's talking about what feeds the hindrances and what starves the hindrances. And we're clearly really interested in what starves the hindrances.

There's been a slight kind of tilting over the years in modern mindfulness teaching, but that other approach is still a valid way of working at times. But in samadhi practice, no—we've got a different relationship, a different attitude.

Again, watch out for the inertia, watch out for the habit. If you have a habit of just, "Oh, it's just a hindrance. I'll just sit it out. I'll just watch it. It's okay. It's fine"—we want to shake up that inertia a little bit, galvanize it.

They are going to come. There is no way they're not going to come. If you come into an interview and report to me that you just didn't have any hindrances, I'd say you're not paying attention—because at least the subtle ones are going to come, no matter how much practice you've done. And usually, as I'll explain later, the not-so-subtle ones as well.

So, rattling through the antidotes. The two most common hindrances are probably—they're given usually in a certain order, but let's start with the two most common, which are sloth and torpor, and restlessness and worry.

I'm just going to throw out a bunch of antidotes. And if you think of one that I've forgotten that's actually really helpful, just shout it out. We'll put them all in a pot for everyone to use.

So sloth and torpor—getting sleepy is the extreme, the mind dull, the head nodding. But like all of these hindrances, it has a range: dullness, fogginess, sleepiness, lack of energy.

Expanding the awareness to the whole body. There's a reason why I say that over and over and over. It's so, so, so important. It will affect the mind. It's impossible—if you're really expanding the awareness and really filling it with attention—it's actually quite hard to be nodding. There's something about it that's the opposite movement. So expanding the awareness of the whole body and really filling it, again and again and again.

The in-breath has been mentioned as part of a couple of the guided meditations. The in-breath is naturally energizing. The out-breath is naturally relaxing. So if I need more energy, a bit more attention to the in-breath and a bit more attention to the energization of the in-breath is going to energize things.

A long breath—or longer breath or very long breath—will also energize. It will energize the body. You can think of it as oxygen or whatever, but if you think in energy terms, there's just more energy there, and that will energize the mind. So move to a long breath, if you're working with the breath, of course.

If you're working, let's say, with metta, then what's going to help? Could it be that going back in the categories to the easiest person might actually lighten things up, bring a bit of brightness just because the metta comes easily? Or might it be that going to the difficult person—because they're difficult and the challenge of it keeps you awake? Or might it be that expanding to all beings, partly because of the spatial expansion, which I'll come back to in a second?

So the question is: do I need to shift categories if I'm doing metta? And which way?

And it's not like it's always going to be this one that's going to help. So I have to have that willingness to respond and experiment.

More pegs. We talked about pegs in the counting. Bringing back those pegs really gives the mind something to focus on, keeps it busy. It literally keeps it up from sagging. With the numbers in the counting, they're like pegs. With the metta practice, if you're using phrases, the phrases are like pegs.

What can often be really helpful in the metta practice—so let's say your first two phrases are "may you be happy, may you be peaceful"—if the mind needs a bit more pegs, if it needs more energy, if it's getting lost, try "may you be happy, may you be happy, may you be peaceful, may you be peaceful." Each one twice. First one I'm not quite there, the second one I'm a bit more there. Small things like this can make a lot of difference.

You can also imagine your whole body filled with a bright white light, just like the sun. Really, really useful. Again, when the mind gets tired, it gets dark and foggy.

You can also open up the awareness very, very wide. So much wider than the energy body size, which is just a little bit bigger than the physical body. You can open it up to the size of this room—it's a lovely huge room—or even wider to the sky outside.

When we get tired, the mind shrinks. It's actually what we do when we curl up and go to sleep. The mind pulls in on itself in a way. So opening up that awareness—open your eyes, open up the awareness to have a sense of the whole room—you're encouraging the mind in the opposite direction from where it contracts as it falls asleep or gets tired. Tired mind is a small mind.

You can also sometimes just sweep through the body, paying attention to whatever sensations you feel there. Again, experiment. Is it more helpful right now with this hindrance to sweep really fast? Sometimes it is when we're tired. Just move the attention quite quickly. Maybe it's more helpful going up, or maybe down, or maybe both. Or maybe it might be helpful really slowly, really getting into the sensation. Again, you have to experiment.

Those are some antidotes for sloth and torpor. We really want to use these.

With restlessness—it's actually restlessness and worry, which refers to worry about ethical misdeeds that I'm worried I've done or someone's going to find out this or that, but we'll leave that aside for now—a lot of the remedies are interestingly quite similar.

More pegs can really help. If you're working with the breath, the long breath tends to really help with restlessness. Or it could be like we just did—there's a way, you find just a way of breathing or a way of construing the breath that just feels soothing. Maybe there's a place on your back and it's almost like someone just soothingly stroking your back, and that addresses the restlessness, it soothes the restlessness. So again, we can shape the breath with our imagination, the breath energy, and that can have a real effect on our energy.

Again, expanding the awareness to the whole body is useful for opposite hindrances. And again, the sweeping of the attention can be really helpful when there's restlessness.

One particular thing: if there's a lot of restlessness that is not so much mental but physical—in other words, it's not a lot of thought proliferation, but the body feels restless and the mind won't settle down with that—then what can be really helpful is a really large awareness, as large as you can open it out. But within that, you have a job to do. The job is you let go of your primary base object and you become aware of the sensations of restlessness—the actual prickly kinds of feelings that arise and pass in the body.

In this big awareness, your job is completely allowing them. There'll be moment-to-moment arising, passing, unpleasant sensations, and you're completely welcoming them. So actually, technically what we're doing then is switching to what I would call a particular insight way of looking. But if you stay with that for a while, actually, for reasons I'll talk about later, it can settle the whole thing down.

The whole system settles down because we're in a very different relationship with the restlessness. When restlessness comes up, we have aversion to the restlessness. It's unpleasant, the very sense of restlessness, and that aversion to the restlessness feeds the whole thing. So when you go wide like that and come into a mode of completely allowing, completely welcoming, you're almost by definition quieting the aversion. We're practicing a non-aversive relationship. Do you understand? And it's that combination—the allowing and the spaciousness—that will really help you.

Stick with it, again and again. Actually, I remember playing with this years ago at home—restless, restless, sitting up doing that practice—and actually ending up sitting for three hours because that very approach just allowed everything to calm down completely. So all these techniques are quite powerful if we find the right way to work with them.

Now, the third hindrance: sense desire. It's usually listed first, but let me address it third. Let's talk about one particular kind of sense desire—sexual desire. Okay, there's desire for someone, whoever it is. You could go take a cold shower or whatever, but I'd like to offer this as a real possibility, especially as one develops more in meditation experience.

Often what happens is there's sexual desire and it goes to an image of having sexual contact in some way with this person or whatever it is. That's the bit that's not so helpful for samādhi. But the desire itself and the energy—there's a way of working with it.

For instance, here's the desire, and we've gone to the image already. Is it possible to feel the energy of sexual arousal? So I've got desire, I've got an image there—probably not in the imaginal sense, but an image there—and I've got sexual energy or arousal. Of course they're related. We could say you've got three things.

Of those three, if I can focus on and open to the energy—most people, the desire comes up, then the image comes up, then the feeling, and I'm lost in the image. I'm lost in chasing this sexual fantasy, embroiled in it. If I can focus more on the energy and actually open to it, allow that actual energy in the space of the energy body—actually, it feels good if it's not too tight. I open to it and I enjoy it.

It's actually quite close to pīti. It's quite close to that kind of good feeling. Oftentimes when people first experience pīti, they say, "Oh, it's like an orgasm" or similar. It doesn't have to be that intense, but there's a similarity there.

So what you're really doing is approaching this more energetically, feeling it, opening to it, and kind of riding it in a way that allows it to shape into something that's a more pure energy, which is actually very conducive and helpful to where we're going—or similar to where we're going anyway. Does that make sense?

I wouldn't necessarily give that guidance to complete beginners, but you have had a lot of experience. So if that's the kind of desire coming up, that's one way of working with it. It can be very similar to pīti if I can filter things out and emphasize and open in the right way.

What about desire for food? Anyone have suggestions? Sitting here and you can't think of anything but lunch or tea—does that come up for anyone? Okay, not a problem.

Now, ill will and aversion. I split this hindrance into two parts. Ill will means actually getting really upset with someone, so much so that I wish them harm. For this, metta is the obvious antidote. Switch from whatever your base practice is—if breath is your base practice, just switch to metta. I need to deal with this ill will absolutely, because when that's there, it's really going to get in the way.

But there's another possibility within that category. When I have ill will toward someone or aversion toward someone—I just don't like them and the mind is in that kind of nasty state—what I can do is first think, "I'll give metta to that person," which is great. That might really help.

But there's a second possibility, which is to actually bring the attention back to myself without trying to change the ill will or how terrible this person is or those kinds of thoughts and feelings.

Bring the attention back to myself and actually notice and feel the dukkha of that ill will here. It's in my heart. There's a taste in my mouth. It's a flavor in my energy body and my consciousness. It's dukkha. It's painful. So I'm not trying to change the ill will. I just come back and feel what's happening. Don't judge. Just what does it feel like? Oh, it's dukkha. And feel the pain of it. I just have to let my consciousness touch the pain there.

If I'm doing that, if I'm just letting it touch it, then what can happen is when I touch that pain, when I come into contact, it turns into compassion for myself. Self-compassion. You think, "Yeah, but my problem's with the other person." It doesn't matter. Once there's self-compassion, there's compassion. It's a new energy in the system and it will soften everything. So my self-compassion starts changing my relationship with this other person. Do you understand? That's really useful as well.

What can also happen and what you will notice happening over the course of the retreat is that we get aversive at certain noises—the heating, or the birds in the rooks, which are a lot quieter than they used to be ten or fifteen years ago for some reason. It's like, "Oh those crows are so loud," or whatever it is. I'm trying to meditate and they're bothering me. Or this person—every time they get up, their bones creak, like my bones creak, or their breathing. Aversion at noise, which could include aversion at a person or another sentient being or whatever it is. This is going to be really common.

I have to remember the big picture, the goal. Where am I going in practice? I'm certainly not going towards more aversion. I'm going towards less aversion. That's what I want. It's not even jhana as my primary goal. It's less aversion, less kilesa, freedom from the defilements. Just to remind myself, I want to get to a place where there's less aversion, I'm less bothered by noise. I'm more open, there's more love, etc.

So again, what does that imply about how I should practice the jhanas? And what kind of way I'm holding and my view of the whole thing? Is it possible? Can I find a way of practicing the jhanas that is not so bothered—that kind of includes sounds and coming and going and noises? Not bothered, but not throwing out the baby with the bath water and saying, "Oh, I don't need to make an effort then." There's some attitude, view, or stance here that's really possible.

Sometimes what you can actually do is deliberately let the primary object go and open up more to sound and a sense of really including that. And that very action—again, I'm doing the opposite thing of aversion. I'm opening to sound and including it. I'm not saying that's other than what I'm trying to do. I'm opening to sound and including it. Then that starts changing the way I feel about the sound and inside. Then within that, keeping that openness, I can reintroduce the primary object. I've got it in a much bigger space and a much bigger attitude, a much bigger orientation.

Technically, we'll get to this when we talk about the second jhana, but actually, technically, if in any moment you could just quite significantly turn down any aversion in the mind, you would come very close to the second jhana. Sukha would arise. Happiness would arise. With a lot of practice—well, actually, maybe this is one of those things: just try. Just try. Some people say, "Okay, just turn down the aversion."

What do you mean turn down? I don't know how to do that. Just try. Just try to turn down the aversion because turning down the aversion can then directly give rise to happiness, give rise to sukha.

Working with Doubt

Okay, last one: doubt. We can doubt the teacher, we can doubt the teachings, and we can doubt ourselves. There's probably lots of other stuff, but those are the three common ones.

So what's the difference between questioning and doubt? Doubt often involves an absence of questioning, in fact, or an absence of letting questions blossom and grow into an inquiry that's actually helpful. Doubt tends to paralyze. We get stuck in a kind of confusion. We're not actually questioning anything. The mind is just shuttling back and forth or going around in a circle.

Sometimes underneath all that, there's actually a question or two or three that need to get clarified and formulated and perhaps asked to oneself or to a teacher. But we haven't let the question form yet. And we're just stuck in this kind of unclear shuttling back and forth.

So is there a question there? Once we've got a question, it's no longer paralyzing. Even formulating it clearly will help. We'll feel unparalyzed. And then formulating and asking and engaging will be really helpful. But doubt paralyzes.

Just one thing to bear in mind is timing here. When am I going to wrestle with this either question or doubt? Outside of the meditation is the answer. In other words, yeah, there's something I'm really not sure about. I'm confused. I have a question. I can't proceed until I have an answer. This is my meditation time, so I'm just going to put that aside, but I promise you, mind, that I will get to this question and I will think about it,

I'll ponder it, I'll inquire, I'll ask someone later. So you make a deal with the mind. It's like, we're going to get to this. I'm not ignoring it, but it happens outside of the formal practice.

The Practice of Exchanging Happiness

How many people have heard of the practice of exchanging the happiness of self and other? Few of you. There's, again, a huge, huge practice, infinite possibilities. I think there's quite a large section about it in the book I wrote, Seeing That Frees. So at some point you can visit that.

I want to say it's a really, really beautiful practice. It's one of the most gorgeous explorations you can do as a meditator and full of creative possibilities and lovely, luscious possibilities of transformation.

In a nutshell: Here I am, pretty miserable from some hindrance attack or whatever, and I say to myself, you know what? I'll take this. I will take this because somewhere, someone else, maybe someone I know, maybe someone I don't know and will never know, somewhere else, correspondingly by magic, I'm taking their dukkha and they can have the happiness.

So again, technically you could say, well, what am I doing there? Instead of the automatic natural aversion to the hindrances, I'm actually saying, come, come, I take this, but it has heart in it. It has this: I'm willing to take this suffering right now. I'm opening myself to suffer for the sake of the release from suffering of someone else somewhere.

So it's a kind of magical thinking. It doesn't matter—using your imagination. There's all kinds of variations on that with emptiness and stuff, but that's the nutshell of it. It's a very beautiful thing.

Often what happens with the hindrances around is there's no heart as well. Everything's got squeezed miserable and there's no heart. So one possibility is bringing the heart in that very beautiful way.

So you could do that with physical discomfort as well. I can take this pain right now. I will take this pain right now.

I'm willing to take this pain for the sake of someone else's ease, someone else's well-being.

I'm moving pretty quickly here—is this pace okay for everyone? We need to get clear about several important aspects of the hindrances.

One crucial point is that there are subtle hindrances as well as the obvious ones. Most people are familiar with really gross hindrances—these are generally what we're taught about when we first hear about the five hindrances on insight retreats. But the hindrances also manifest very, very subtly.

There's a sutta in the Majjhima Nikaya where the Buddha discusses subtle hindrances specifically. He lists things like elation and inertia, fear, slight over-efforting, slight under-efforting—very, very slight forms. Desire, if it's not handled well. Perception of multiplicity and paying too much attention to different things. There's a whole list there.

The point is there's a complete range of subtlety. In a way, there's always something to play with and work with, something that can be tweaked a little bit. Of course, sometimes in jhana practice all of this settles and we're not actually aware of any hindrances—and that's fine. You don't have to go looking for them at that point. You just get into the enjoyment of it.

As you move deeper into jhana territory, you start to realize the more subtle hindrances that might be present at times—ones you don't initially notice. It's not that we're always looking for hindrances in jhana practice. We're actually inclining more toward what's pleasant and easeful and enjoyable. But they will arise subtly.

Are you okay for a bit more? Do you have the energy?

Let me point out something else that I want to return to throughout the retreat and emphasize quite a lot. It's something that becomes clearer through jhana practice than through insight and mindfulness practice alone—a very common micro-negativity of the mind.

You might be sitting there with a very nice energy body, with pīti, with whatever qualities are present. You might be quite used to it by that point, but it's still quite pleasant. Most people would give their right arms for what you're experiencing in that moment. But you've experienced this before, and the other day it was better than today. You know it can be a bit better.

In this very subtle way, the mind inclines toward what's wrong, what's not quite as good as it should be. Part of this is natural—it's part of the shaping process. It's like the potter with clay on the wheel, noticing where it needs adjustment and applying gentle pressure.

But when this has a flavor of negativity, when it carries that negative quality—we're talking about something that can get incredibly subtle. It's the glass half-empty rather than half-full perspective, but on a really, really subtle level. In this moment, there's something in the way I'm seeing and relating to this actually lovely experience, and I'm somehow spinning it with negativity, seeing it through a negative lens.

This is incredibly common. We might call it a really deep, almost base-level kilesa—a defilement of aversion in the mind. You'll notice this more and more as practice develops, and it's actually really important to address and work with.

The good news is that we notice this much more clearly in jhana practice. You might think you'd notice it more in mindfulness and insight practice, but you actually observe it much more in jhana practice. You get much closer to it, see it operating on much subtler levels, and you're able to do something about it.

What I want to emphasize right now—and I'll repeat this—is that we simply notice it. Expect it, notice it, then find the pleasure and get into enjoying it. Find what's nice and get into enjoying it. We make a micro-movement, a micro-shift of relationship and attitude. We're talking about countering a micro-subtle defilement with an equally subtle shift.

In a way, we could construe this pattern as a subtle hindrance in itself.

In terms of subtle hindrances, there are also two forms called sinking and drifting. I don't know where these terms originate...

I don't know if they're originally in the Buddha. I've never come across them in the Buddha, but I picked them up from, I think it was Kamalashila, I can't remember, but they're around now in Dharma culture.

So drifting and sinking, what does that mean? Drifting is a sort of subtle version of restlessness. Really what it means is the mind is still alive. You're still mindful. You're nowhere near jumping out of your skin or obsessed with worrying. The mind is present, everything's good, it's kind of with its object, but there's just a bit more tendency for it to drift off the object. Sometimes it manifests as a bit more thoughts and images in the mind and a little more tendency for the mind to get pulled off into them. So again, we're talking about something quite subtle.

Sinking is the subtle version of sloth and torpor. Again, nowhere near nodding or falling asleep. It's just a little bit of dullness comes in, a little bit of—it's not quite so present, so alive, so bright, so sharp.

These are interesting hindrances because oftentimes what they're most related to is effort levels. Again, we're back to this question, this issue of effort levels and the fact that I cannot avoid that issue. I cannot avoid that parameter of practice. As you get deeper and deeper in samadhi, a tiny bit too much effort, just a little bit too much effort, a little bit too little effort makes proportionately more of a difference and more of an impact. In other words, again, the deeper we go, the more sensitive the whole system is and a bit too much effort, a bit less effort actually gets in the way or has more of an effect at a deeper level.

So with these subtle hindrances, sinking and drifting, one of the things that's really worth paying attention to is just the effort levels and seeing: what is it just to back off the intensity? Or perhaps to move from, in my directionality, perhaps from more of a probing to more of a receiving?

What I wanted to say is either sinking or both sinking and drifting can arise from either too much effort—very slightly—or too little effort, paradoxically sounding. We don't know. What do you have to do? You have to just get in there and play. Play with that subtle effort: bit more, bit less, bit more intense, bit less intense, bit more probing, bit more receiving, bit more delicate, whatever it is.

Sometimes one of the ways I like to think about this is, for example, with the drifting —why is there more thought? Why does the mind go off? We're squeezing the mind too tight, and in a completely incommensurate image, it's a bit like squeezing a banana skin and the banana comes shooting out. Maybe that's not the greatest analogy. But again, going back to what we said before, the whole body can reveal the effort, even just the size of the attention can also affect this. So there's lots of things to try, but one main point to take is the spectrum.

When we're talking about hindrances, we're really talking about a spectrum, despite what the Buddha said: "With the abandonment of the hindrance, with seclusion from the hindrances arises the first jhana." Yes, that's true. And at another level, we're talking about a whole spectrum here that's not going to go away in one form or another.

Sometimes, even in jhana—again, using that word in a slightly loose way—you can be here with the happiness, here's the brightness, the luminosity and the happiness, and it's as if at the edges of that happiness and brightness, there's like a whole little pack of little terrier dogs yapping away. And it's not that they're in the middle causing mayhem or really loud, but you're just aware of them there.

Are you in the jhana? Are you out of the jhana? It's an irrelevant question. Where's the intelligence here? The question is: what do I need to do at that point? What needs to happen? What do I need to pay attention to?

Let's say here's this luminous happiness right there. Here are these little terriers yapping. I'm just going to get more into that happiness and illuminate it, open my body to it, open my mind to it. We'll talk about all this. Now, it might be that in doing that, the terriers nicely quiet down and fall asleep, but it might be they stay there and actually that's as good as it's going to get right now.

Okay, so I've got this really nice, lovely, yummy, juicy happiness, which the person who gave their right arm for would now give their left arm as well for. The terriers are there. It's not a problem. Just get into it and enjoy it. Don't worry about this in and out business. It's just how not to consume the mind with questions that are not relevant.

But also, sometimes the terriers are yapping, and I'm kind of into it. Let me go to the terriers, see what they need, and see if I can do something that encourages them to do something else. It's not like there's always a formula, but one formula is: it's okay. This is the deal right now. This is as good as it's going to get. Make sense?

Sometimes there are hindrances in different forms. Sometimes a hindrance arises—is it a hindrance? No, it's just that the energy body feels a little constricted or blocked. I'm not obsessed with this. I'm not thinking about that. I'm not lost in desire or doubt or any of that. It just feels a little bit blocked.

So we could call that a subtle hindrance if you want. Or it's just that the energy body kind of won't settle down or the citta won't really settle down. It's not even from gross distraction or thought. It's just something like a little agitation in the energy of the citta or the body.

That's a bit like the yapping terriers. Sometimes—and again, this is something that may be relevant for some of you now, or will be for some of you later—sometimes it's amazing if you have quite a lot of experience in and out of jhāna: you can just dive underneath something. Here it's blocked or it doesn't feel right, something's not settled. Like I said, it's a bit like the radio frequencies or the wardrobe. The jhānas are there anyway and you can kind of just point the mind to a level that's actually really peaceful.

Now, it might not be pristinely, wonderfully, radiantly, overwhelmingly peaceful, but there's something that you recognize: well, that's the kind of peace that belongs to the third jhāna, let's say. I recognize that peacefulness. And you point the mind—you just dive underneath a little bit. It's there. And then I'm tuning to that. I'm not getting caught up. Yes, this part of the body doesn't feel quite connected or feels a bit constricted or the mind's not so settled. I'm just pointing to that. I dive into it.

And then what's my work there? I've dived in. Now I'm in touch with that peacefulness. Now what? Now I need to work with that, get into it, enjoy it, open to it, focus on it, etc. We'll talk about more of that.

So it's not really that the jhāna is quite there, but something of a doorway to that, something of a trail of that jhāna is there and you can pick it up and just kind of point the mind there and dive into it with practice, with time. Once you get that trail opening, then you work on staying there and stabilizing and absorbing into that, et cetera.

As I said, with jhāna practice, we really want this attitude of working with, working against, if you like, the hindrances. We really want this idea of antidote, but we also really want this idea of patience. So there's a battle. I'm patient while I'm working with. It's really important. I'm playing with and experimenting with all that. And I can use all my ingenuity and creativity in how I relate to hindrances or what might help. And at the same time, I have a firm resolve. I'm not just going to give up now. I'm not just going to get up and walk away or just sit through it and say, "Oh, whatever, who cares?"

So there's this combination of working actively, of being creative and ingenious, and a firm resolve and patience altogether. It's not that we want to get kind of locked into a grim battle for hours on end with some hindrance or another. At a certain point, it's like: all right, you win the battle. You're not going to win the war, but you win this battle. I'm going for a walk or I'm going for a cup of tea or something. Part of that is also just taking the pressure off and opening the mind. If I go for a walk, it's like the beauty, the air, the light, the spaciousness. I hope by the end of this retreat that everyone knows the beauty of rain, because you get a lot of practice with that.

There's no reason that so-called bad weather shouldn't affect your sense of beauty.

In a way, what we're doing is emphasizing the cultivation of well-being rather than fighting the hindrances. We're doing both, but it's a certain way of thinking about the balance.

For those of you who have accumulated more experience, after you've practiced across different jhanas, you sometimes develop a sense of what's possible in any given moment. Maybe you're working in the fourth jhana, that's your playground, but there are hindrances present and you find yourself stuck in the first or second jhana. You just get a sense: "No, I can stay with this and shape it, and it will deepen." Other times you sense: "This is as good as it's going to get right now." After a while, you develop this intuitive feel. That takes practice.

Still, that's great. That's really good. Even if there's just a subtle hindrance blocking you from going as deep as you've gone before—no problem. You take what you can get, what's accessible, and develop a sense of what's possible in any particular situation.

To finish, let me share some insights about the hindrances themselves.

First, the hindrances exist on spectra. They're not simply on or off switches. Each hindrance has a spectrum ranging from really gross manifestations to increasingly subtle ones. Understanding this is crucial territory for practice.

This has several implications. The hindrances will be regular visitors, coming and going. If I hold the view that they shouldn't arise, or that they won't appear after a certain amount of practice, or that once I reach a particular jhana they'll disappear—that's the opposite of insight. That's delusion. True insight recognizes their spectral nature, which means in one form or another, at some level of grossness or subtlety, they will continue arising.

Second, the process isn't linear. Yes, the hindrances will come and go, and they'll continue appearing even after you develop access to whatever jhana becomes part of your practice. You might have a much harder time with hindrances later in a retreat than you did earlier. You might feel: "I've reached this jhana, everything was going so well," and then suddenly find yourself in what feels like a hell realm.

I've said this in many other talks, but if someone comes to me describing their samadhi practice as this smooth, uninterrupted ascent day by day into the heavenly realms—a linear graph of continuous progress—either they're not being truthful or they're really not paying attention. The actual trajectory looks more like this: up and down, with an overall trend perhaps, but full of peaks and valleys. Just because we've had wonderful experiences for five days with new territories opening up doesn't mean we won't fall into a hindrance hole tomorrow.

Third, we want to cultivate a relationship with the hindrances where we're not taking them personally. They're simply aspects of being human until, apparently, one becomes an arahant—fully enlightened. When I say "not taking it personally," I mean not thinking: "Oh, I'm a bad meditator," or worse, "I'm a bad person because I keep experiencing aversion or desire or greed."

The hindrances are facts of human existence. Their arising doesn't reflect on my capability as a meditator or my worthiness as a human being. This understanding is crucial. Jhana practice offers the gift of helping us see, over time, that these experiences aren't personal. We want to actively encourage this perspective of not taking the hindrances personally.

Fourth, we want to increasingly believe less and less in the stories the hindrances create. Over time, we become less convinced by their narratives. What happens is a hindrance arises and spins a story—convincing us that it's actually about this person, that they are the problem rather than recognizing it as our own hindrance pattern. Or it weaves stories about ourselves...

And then, and oftentimes it spins this whole parpancha thing—that whole proliferation.

Actually what's happening is a seed of a hindrance arose, which is what happens for human beings: hindrances just keep coming up. Defilement seeds, kilesa seeds—greed, aversion, delusion—in one form or another, manifest as the hindrances. They're little seeds. And then without wisdom and mindfulness, those seeds become huge trees, forests, jungles. Jungles, better.

We want to get in there and prevent what allows them to become jungle. Partly what allows them to become a jungle—those seeds—is believing them. Believing what they tell us. Believing the perceptions. Believing the stories that they spin.

This is so crucial. As I said, if nothing else happened on the retreat—you didn't have a millisecond of an ounce of a nice feeling—but that's what happened on the retreat, that would be really, really good. That would make a huge difference in your life. Huge difference.

And the fifth insight piece is that we get to view the hindrances in relation to what I just said. We actually view the hindrances—yeah, they're really unpleasant—but in a way they're kind of like gold dust or gold ore. There's something really precious here. I just need to find the right relationship with it. I can turn it into treasure if I find the right relationship with it in terms of view and wisdom.

So they're really like gold dust, like something unrefined and filled with all kinds of not so great stuff. But actually there's a treasure there.

Because as I said, hindrances will come up in life. It's not just something in meditation we think about. What about that creative project? What about that service project? What about your work? What about coming up in long-term relationship? Same things arise, the same hindrances arise, and they will hinder. Nivarana is the Pali—it literally means something that's an obstacle, gets in the way of a going forward. They will do that in all of those other realms of our life. It's not just something about meditation.

If I can get wise to them, if I can learn how to view them in a way that they lose their power—they might still arise as seeds, but they lose their power—that's absolutely huge and absolutely precious.

Part of that is also I begin to understand something about emotions as well. This is really interesting: something that seemed like it's this emotion that I'm feeling, I actually see, oh, sometimes it's actually just a seed of a hindrance. And the mind has spun that into a story, and a certain emotion has arisen. But actually, in its root, it was just this hindrance, or mostly this hindrance, sometimes. So there's something about understanding the hindrances that is actually really important in understanding our emotional life.

The fact that they're spectra—there's a range—this is part of this development of subtlety, because I recognize they're going to get more subtle. My attention has to get more subtle to even pick up on subtle hindrances and then work with them.

When we talked yesterday about how I would say it's so important—this development of subtlety and refinement and discrimination—that also happens in regard to the hindrances. So in terms of our overall trajectory, this recognition and working with the subtlety of the spectrum of the hindrance is also part of that whole development of subtlety.

Yes, it's much nicer attuning and discerning to subtle differences of this kind of exquisite peacefulness versus that kind of exquisite peacefulness. But in terms of developing the whole subtlety again, which is so important for our emotional life and all the rest of it, that's important too. It's all subtlety. It's all discrimination. It's all attunement.

In terms of not taking hindrances personally and not believing them—can you hear that? That's about letting go. It's about having insight into what they are. I see what you are and I let go. I'm no longer dragged along by this story or this identification. There's a letting go.

This is insight.

One last thing. If you engage deeply with jhana practice over time, you may begin to notice what appears to be a kind of backlash. It's as if your practice is going really well—perhaps even opening into new territory. You enter a new opening, a new state, some wonderful development happens. You rest in this for a while, whether that's a few hours, half a day, or several days. And then all hell breaks loose.

Sometimes it can seem as though the very opening itself caused this backlash, as if there was some kind of reaction to the breakthrough. This isn't something to expect every time, but there does seem to be this pattern for many practitioners.

This phenomenon raises important questions. Should we expect it? Remember—don't take it personally. The path isn't linear. But is there some kind of catharsis happening here, some form of purification?

I know people who hold exactly this view—that jhana practice allows a kind of karmic purification of our sankaras and emotions. While I don't want to rule this out entirely, I would approach it more cautiously. I prefer to hold both views: yes and no.

If I step back from this question, what we're really after is range. Remember when I said I want you to have range? We want this range in relationship to our emotions—range in the ways of working with them, in the ways of viewing them. I would like you to have a really expansive range. "I can work with emotions in many different ways. I can view emotions in many different ways. And I have access to a whole spectrum of emotional experience."

However, with sustained jhana practice over time—if we allow this practice to give rise to insight—we begin more and more to recognize the fabricated nature of emotions. Yes, an emotion is a real thing. It arises by itself. It's there, and we must deal with that reality. But over time, it becomes almost undeniable that an emotion is a fabrication. Without us doing something—usually unconsciously—it cannot arise as that particular emotion. It cannot get fabricated, cannot get constructed.

So in the Buddha's words, we see a hindrance as a hindrance, not necessarily as an emotion. We recognize what's there. It's a fabrication, or in other language, it's actually empty. An emotion is empty.

But remember what I said on the first night—I can see an emotion as empty and I can see it as real. I'm not parking in either view exclusively. I have the possibility to shift between perspectives. To me, this flexibility is absolutely crucial.

Often people park in one view and that becomes their fixed position. For me, it would be catastrophic and tragic to only ever view emotions as fabrications. I would never want to be limited to just that perspective.

But when both views become available, then the view of catharsis—"Yes, something is purifying here, I may not even know what, but I sit through it as a purification"—becomes one possible stance and relationship. Or the view that it's not catharsis at all, that emotions are fabrications requiring investigation—this too becomes available. Both perspectives coexist.

Yet as we practice jhanas more and more, we begin to see a hindrance as a hindrance, as the Buddha might say. What happens is not linear—it's very much up and down—but there is a movement over time with jhana practice.

What might initially manifest as papañca—extreme agitation, complete lostness in story, believing everything, self-view and all that—actually begins to manifest less as papañca and more as pure hindrance. Over time, there's a kind of sifting away, a filtering out of the more papañca-generating elements of the mind. What remains is simply the hindrance itself.

And it becomes—it's still quite strong, I might be really quite restless in the body, but there's no story attached to it. There's no lostness. So what was usually papancha becomes more just—I'm just dealing with the hindrance now.

And then over time, even the hindrances themselves tend to become more and more subtle, though they're still there. So there is, over a long time of jhana practice, this movement of shaving away the gross, getting down to the hindrances and then even more subtle. But they stay—they're part of the deal. And we need to be okay with that, really up for that.

I was going to take some questions, but I think we already had a couple and it's probably enough now. So let's just sit for a minute together.

Thank you, everyone. Enjoy tea. Enjoy your evening practice. And I think there are a few interviews this evening, so just check that that's not you if you haven't already. See you tomorrow.

CHAPTER 200

Focusing on One Point (Intensity, Directionality, Subtlety) (Instructions)

Rob Burbea · 29 min

> In this instructional session on jhāna practice, Rob Burbea provides comprehensive guidance for developing samādhi through single-point concentration techniques. He explores working with classic meditation objects such as breath sensations at the upper lip or nostril area, and the rising and falling of the abdomen, while maintaining background awareness of the whole body.
> Burbea emphasizes that developing concentration is not simply about unwavering focus, but requires cultivating three essential qualities of attention: subtlety (allowing both object and awareness to become increasingly refined), directionality (experimenting with both projecting attention toward and receiving sensations), and intensity (skillfully modulating the energy of awareness). He explains how these qualities work together as samādhi deepens, with particular attention to how the natural process of subtilization leads toward the pleasant energy-body experiences characteristic of the jhānas.
> This teaching offers practical guidance for meditators working to establish a reliable foundation practice for jhāna development, emphasizing quality of attention over mere duration of focus. Burbea's instructions help practitioners understand how single-point concentration naturally expands and evolves as concentration deepens, bridging toward the whole-body pleasant experiences that define the jhānic states.

Teaching this retreat is a big stretch for me because of everything that's going on with my health and what that needs, what that requires. I had a meeting with a nurse this morning. As I said at the beginning, in a way that impacts the unfolding of the teaching. I have to be at the hospital at this time and all that stuff. Things are getting squashed together in one long session that otherwise I would have paced over morning, evening, and afternoon. So that's just part of the deal, which, it's not perfect, but it is what it is.

In my experience, retreats are often most fruitful for some weird reason when the conditions aren't perfect. The other thing about the teachings, and I said this again at the beginning, is that everyone needs different things at different times. So I feel quite concerned or anxious to make sure you all have what you need, but it's actually an impossible situation. We're just unfolding things. For some person, something that's said on day five, it would be like, "Well, I wish I'd heard that on day one." So I don't quite know how else to do a group retreat. That's part of the territory here, part of the challenge here. But hopefully it still works and is helpful.

I want to divide the teaching today into three sections, and maybe four depending on how we do for time: instructions, a guided meditation, and a shorter talk.

Let's start with some instructions. Again, a bit of context that I was going to say later, but I'll say it now. Jhānas, by definition—you could say all the jhānas, but certainly we can say the first four jhānas—include, or even I would say what's really primary in them, is that the whole body, as I said when I ran through those descriptions that the Buddha gave, really feels very, very nice. Different kinds of nice. In a way, that's what characterizes each jhāna: the kind of nice that the whole body space feels.

So by definition, axiomatically, a really pleasant feeling, nice, lovely energy body experience is part of where we're going. Actually, you could say this is true in any of the jhānas—even the eighth—because the absence of any sensation at all in the formless jhānas is actually very pleasant in its acquired taste kind of way. The first four jhānas all involve a really nice energy body experience.

All the practices that we're doing are going towards that. That's what they're aiming for, just by virtue of the fact that we're aiming for jhānas. Which base practice or springboard practice—whether it's working with the breath like this, whether it's working with the breath like that, whether it's mettā, whether it's something else—they're all intended in that direction. That's what we're trying to get them to do.

For most people, the first port of call in the niceness will be what we call pīti and this pleasantness that I'll talk about as we go on. But basically what you want at this point is to be narrowing down into one practice, one base or springboard practice that you feel is the one that feels best for you and the most reliable or easiest for well-being to arise from—physical well-being, mental well-being. We keep that practice all through, even after you've got eight jhānas, because even when you know eight jhānas, there are going to be times when you need to go right back to your base practice and use that. So that's your thing in terms of jhāna practice. Later we can add to it and have others, but basically at this point, a lot of you—unless you're already well into the jhānas and know what works and you already know your base practice—you're still trying to find that and narrow it down: "Okay, that's the one for me."

Now, within that, because jhānas are by definition different kinds of really lovely states of the energy body, different flavors of really lovely states of the energy body, we can think backwards from where we're going. We're going to some kind of lovely state in the energy body. I can get there in two ways. We're back to the whole Newtown Abbot thing, kind of.

Either I say, "Oh, if that's part of where I'm going, why don't I start with that anyway?" Start with the energy body experience and just help it in creative, responsive, sensitive ways to become nicer and nicer. I'm starting with something that's very close to where I'm headed anyway. That's one way of going about things.

Another way is, for instance, taking one spot like at the upper lip or the tip of the nose or the abdomen and just paying attention to the sensations there and really, really paying attention. In time, other factors develop, one of which is the pīti, which can then be spread into the whole body. So this spot that doesn't look much like where we're going at some point expands to a whole energy body experience.

Not better, not worse—they're just different. Different people find different things work better. That's what we're doing: either the direct route or the more indirect route. The more indirect route is more common, but that's just how it is.

And why do I spend so proportionately more time teaching about the energy body? It's probably partly because there are more possibilities there. It's more unusual, so people need to hear about it. Most of you have probably spent a long time paying attention to the breath at the nose or the upper lip or the abdomen. The energy body is more unusual and there are more possibilities there—probably an infinite amount of possibilities in terms of how creative it becomes, how playful it becomes, how imaginative it becomes.

I find over many years of teaching that for a lot of people who've had very little development or opening or joy from paying attention at one point, opening up to the whole body is often a revelation and things really start to move then. As I said though, it's not the case with everyone at all. So we really want to find what works for you. This is so, so important.

Now, for the first section of today's teaching, I want to talk about taking a narrower spot. Classic spots, rather than the whole body, are the upper lip—somewhere between the top of the lip and the beginning of the nose, so that whole area there—or the tip of the nose just inside the nostrils, anywhere around there. It really doesn't matter. The question is: when I pay attention to that location, where can I most clearly feel the sensations of the breath as they come in and out?

There will be sensations of the breath—the friction really of the breath moving across the skin or the tiny hairs there. There will be sensations of temperature: the in-breath is slightly cooler than the out-breath because the body has warmed the out-breath. You must have heard this a million times.

Another classic spot is somewhere down in the abdomen. What you're paying attention to then is naturally when we breathe in, there's the expansion—really the rising of the abdomen as you inhale—and the falling back of the abdomen as you breathe out. It's that sensation of the movement of the abdomen, those sensations that go with that movement, rising and falling, that you're paying attention to. People feel it in different places or it could be a slightly larger area. It doesn't matter. But what you're really paying attention to is more gross physical sensations at first than what we're talking about with the energy body.

So those are the two classic places. Instead of primarily having this wider space of the whole energy body, we've got a narrower space—a narrower spot.

If I think of the word concentration and automatically think of a narrow focus, this is just prejudice and indoctrination. It does not necessarily mean that at all. It cannot possibly mean that in Buddha Dharma. Fifth jhāna is infinite space—I'm concentrating on infinite space. That's the exact opposite of a precise point. So concentration cannot mean narrowness. It might be helpful for some people at some time to choose a small point, and then it goes through a whole process. But that's not what concentration can mean. It's not like concentrated laundry detergent where I've got this much in this amount of space—it's a complete misconstrual. So maybe helpful to work with a small focus, maybe not helpful, but it does not mean what samādhi means at all.

So there's a small focus and it may be very helpful, but you've heard so much about working with the breath this way, I just want to throw out three or four things.

Even though we have a narrow spatial focus, I would suggest it will be very helpful to have a background awareness of the whole body. Some of you are far away—can you see my hand? Can you focus on my hand, even if it's not that clear? Can you focus on my hand and still have a background awareness of the whole room behind me, what's also in your visual field? Can you switch those so what's in the background is more in your foreground psychologically? That's all I'm talking about.

When there's a small focus, it's really helpful to have the whole body sense just lightly in the background. Not fifty-fifty, maybe ten percent or five percent. So primarily I'm really getting into this one spot wherever it is, but I'm always maintaining this whole body background awareness.

Why? Partly because when I have a bigger space that way, it's a bit like a table. If a table has one leg and it's a narrow leg, it's hard for it to balance. With three or four legs spread out, it's much easier. So something spread out helps to balance the concentration. That's one of the reasons why sometimes the energy body works better.

Rather than thinking of developing concentration, samadhi, or jhana as simply staring really hard at something with unwavering intensity—believing that enough force and steadiness will bring jhana—we need to understand that this approach falls short. Without openness of heart, even excellent stability with an object won't lead to jhana. You might develop strong concentration skills, which is helpful, but jhana requires something more.

Instead of this forceful approach, I want to emphasize three qualities of attention. You could summarize this as prioritizing quality of attention over quantity. By quantity, I mean how long you've stayed with the breath without getting lost in thoughts, sounds, or other distractions. Often we fall into this quantitative mindset, with part of our mind constantly checking: "Have I had a thought yet? How long has it been? Have I been distracted?" We might find ourselves counting breaths and monitoring our performance.

While duration isn't unimportant, can we reorder our priorities? I believe quality of attention matters far more. This means asking: "In this moment, with this particular part of this breath, what's the quality of my attention?" What do we mean by quality? Many things are involved, but today I'll focus on three: intensity, directionality, and subtlety. Let me explore these in reverse order.

As I mentioned yesterday, we tend to think about jhanas and samadhi in certain ways. But undeniably, deepening in samadhi—and certainly progressing through the eight jhanas—represents a movement toward increasing subtlety.

I cannot get away from that. Each jhana is more subtle than the last one. Each jhana is more refined than the last one. The whole deepening of samadhi, even before you reach jhana, needs to be a deepening into more and more subtlety.

It's not the case—and you might sometimes hear this—that each jhana finds the mind more unwavering than the last one, as if that were the primary thing happening. This simply isn't true. You could have fifth jhana where you're not quite used to it yet and you're wobbling out of it, while having a second jhana that's much more stable for you. Or perhaps the breath is much more stable and you're just learning the second jhana, and it wobbles out.

Again, let's clarify our conceptual framework. What's actually happening here? What's important? Therefore, what do I need to emphasize, work with, and pay attention to?

So subtlety is a key element. As you practice with the breath—whatever way of working with the breath or wherever you're paying attention—as practice continues and the mind settles down and the body settles down, the breath becomes more subtle. It should become more subtle.

This applies to other practices as well. If you're practicing metta or compassion, sometimes when you start practicing compassion, there are all these tears and it's up and down and you feel the world's suffering intensely. This expansive opening of the heart is important and necessary. But as the practice settles down and deepens, actually the compassion gets more subtle, and the metta gets more subtle—less fiery or intense in its emotional quality. The whole thing becomes more refined. Likewise with the breath or whatever object you're working with.

So there's this natural movement into subtlety. The object is actually perceived more and more subtly. As I mentioned, we can interfere with this process either by holding certain ideas or by doing something physically, like repeatedly doing ujjayi breathing. There are many ways we can block this natural process of subtilization.

When the object becomes naturally more subtle—and for the samadhi to develop (which already means some samadhi is developing, as this cannot happen without it)—then the attention, the quality of the attention, has to get correspondingly subtle. If the object—whether breath or metta—is going down in subtlety, then the attention has to match it in subtlety. The attention needs to become more delicate.

This process of matching, of following the subtlety down, where the attention quality matches the object quality—this process is one of the most central things happening as samadhi develops. And as I said, the jhanas themselves, the eight jhanas, are a spectrum of increasing subtlety and increasing refinement.

Let me address directionality—I'm not sure if that's the right word, but something like this. Let's say you're working with the breath at the upper lip and nose. Very easily as human beings, we can construe the attention in a particular way—having a sense of the attention here somewhere, oftentimes in the head, going toward the object. Whether it's a visual object or these sensations, there's this sense of attention moving toward them, probing them in an investigative way—not attacking them, but going toward them.

But we can also construe—and by construe I don't mean just as an idea, but as an actual sense, a perception—we can sense ourselves receiving the breath. In one way, of course, the body is receiving the breath as air comes in. But the mind can also feel like the sensations are being received.

This is something we can play with—the directionality of attention. And this is something you can actually experiment with. All this boils down to what's helpful right now. It's not the case that one of these directions is always going to be better than another. The whole thing is a dance. The whole thing is like riding a bicycle. You wouldn't say it's always good to lean to the left on a bicycle.

No, it's good in certain situations to lean to the left. In other situations, it's good to lean the other way or right in the middle or whatever it is.

So all this, again, it's stuff for you to play with moment to moment, to have this sense of—you're the artist, you're the improviser, you're the person with your hands on the clay, on the wheel. You understand?

So we have subtlety, directionality. The other one is intensity. This is kind of a hard one, but I think it's really important. It's like, can you get a sense—let's say pay attention to X—but can you get a sense of actually dialing up or down the intensity, the energy of your attention?

You might think of it like that probing gets more. That's one way of thinking about it. But it might also be just like a lamp going up or a sense of energy. It's dialing up. There's more energy. I'm really present. I'm really alive there.

But again, you might think, oh, well, more is better. Not always. It's an interesting thing.

If we take all these factors together and you think about subtlety—what allows a subtle attention? Sometimes it's a delicacy of attention that allows us to go into subtlety and not so much intensity.

So if you think about—and I know there are some fantastic chefs in the room—let's say someone's cooked this amazing meal and it's exquisite and you're tasting it. Each mouthful kind of reveals—you know, sometimes when you put food into your mouth, the flavors reveal themselves not all at the same time. Have you had that? Sometimes some of them are mixed at the same time.

What kind of mode of attention do you go into if it's really exquisite? And especially the chefs there want to know what you think. There's a kind of delicate poise in relation to the taste attention, to the gustatory attention. This is delicacy. I can't go in there ramming. You understand? It's not the right kind of attention that will reveal those subtle, exquisite qualities, if it's one of those really subtle dishes.

Or listening, when you listen for something, a sound that's faint amid background noise. There's a quality there. You're not squeezing something. You're not squinting. You're not pressuring something. It's more like there's a kind of poise and you're attentive in a way that your antennae pick up something.

If you just pay attention to how you pay attention in these kinds of situations, we might learn something about what I'm talking about here.

What's also interesting is that when the breath becomes, for example, if the breath is the object or the metta is the object—as the object becomes more delicate and subtle, it can actually become more delightful. The delightfulness of the object often goes with the delicacy. But I would certainly say that the delightfulness of the attention increases with the delicacy of the attention.

In other words, I think as human beings, we like paying attention in a delicate way. We actually like that. It feels good. As that begins to happen more and more, part of the job here is to enjoy that. It might be very, very not a big deal, but that's part of—can I get intimate also with this delight? Can I include it? Can I enjoy it?

Which is, again, a very different thing. Am I still thinking? How long have I gone since my last distraction?

Okay, that's the first block of today's teachings. A smaller point. When you're using a smaller point like that, there are a few things to bear in mind. There are a few things you can play with.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 6/6). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

There's more to explore, but this foundation is sufficient for now. I mentioned earlier that we're moving toward making this whole body space pleasant in different ways. Yet we can still work skillfully with something that doesn't initially appear to match that description—we can use a small point. For some practitioners, this focused approach works best.

As you settle into this one small point, you'll notice it tends to expand naturally. This expansion is actually one of the signs that the practice is deepening. You might find that this upper lip area begins to feel as large as your entire head. This is completely normal—it's part of the natural progression. The point grows organically, and in many ways, this expansion is part of the whole process moving toward awareness of the entire energy body.

I wanted to mention this natural evolution so you know what to expect and can work with these changes rather than being surprised by them.

I think that covers what I wanted to share about this particular aspect of the practice. Let me pause here and move on to the next teaching.

CHAPTER 201

Q & A

Rob Burbea · 12 min

> In this Q&A session from the 'Practising the Jhānas' retreat, Rob Burbea addresses key questions about developing jhāna practice. He explores the essential qualities of sensitivity, attunement, responsiveness, and refinement - explaining how practitioners can notice subtle emotional and energetic changes during mettā practice and other meditative states. Burbea discusses the art of working with increasingly subtle meditation objects, such as when the breath becomes barely perceptible, and how attention must correspondingly become more refined to match the object's subtlety.
> A significant portion addresses working with physical pain during jhāna practice, particularly when pīti (rapture) is present. Burbea offers practical guidance on spreading pleasurable sensations to areas of discomfort, using adhiṭṭhāna (resolve) skillfully, and knowing when to take breaks. He emphasizes how insight practices like anattā (not-self) contemplation and allowing/letting-be approaches can support the arising of pīti through the release of clinging.
> Throughout the discussion, Burbea highlights how the entire jhāna spectrum represents a movement into increasing subtlety - from the first jhāna through to the formless attainments. This understanding of progressive refinement is presented as more crucial to samādhi development than counting breaths or maintaining rigid postures. The session offers both newcomers and experienced practitioners practical wisdom for navigating the delicate balance between effort and receptivity in concentration practice.

Danny asked about expanding on the different words: sensitivity, attunement, responsiveness, and refinement.

Let me use the example we were discussing with Jason. Here's metta practice: I'm practicing metta and noticing the different flavors emotionally and in the energy body at different times. Here's happiness, here's peace, here's something that I don't even have a word for, but it just has a certain kind of emotional quality.

Sensitivity is noticing all that and feeling it.

Refinement is the recognition that these are probably quite subtle things. They're not big or in your face—I mean, they can be, but as the whole thing deepens, things tend to get more refined, meaning more subtle. They're not big explosions necessarily. Part of what I would want to include in pretty much all practices is that willingness to pay attention, an ability to pay attention and be sensitive to what is refined, and also knowing the possibility that things can get more and more refined—not necessarily more intense, though they can also get more intense.

Responsiveness really is just that. For instance, going back to Jason's example: I'm saying "may you be happy," then I say "may you be peaceful." I notice that when I say "may you be peaceful," there's a little something there—maybe happy was just okay, nothing particularly happened, but when I said "may you be peaceful," there was a little response. Maybe it was a feeling of peace or something, and I actually felt that in the energy body and in the heart. So I'm sensitive to it. It's maybe quite refined, but I'm responding to it by noticing it. Then maybe my response is to repeat that phrase a few times, and then I'm riding the thermals, as I mentioned.

That's responsiveness. But there are all kinds of responsiveness. Even at a macro level—I've been sitting, working with this hindrance, and it's just time for a cup of tea. That's responsive. I'm making a responsive decision. In terms of how gross or refined responsiveness can be, it goes over the whole range.

Attunement would be this: going back to the example, I've just said "peaceful" and there's that energy or emotional feeling to it. I'm kind of listening to that and feeling it. Of everything that's going on, I'm singling in on that. I'm not losing the whole background of my whole body sense, but I'm tuning my receiver to that particular wavelength. I'm just kind of resonating with the vibe and feeling it.

That's attunement. And as I do that, as I said today, the very activity of attuning amplifies that particular wavelength, or tends to. It's like when you tune a receiver—there's all this static or other radio stations, and you're just finding that one. You're dialing in, and there's that one. I'm tuning. It's literally like that. I'm tuning to it. And then it's like, okay, now I'm enjoying this radio station. I'm really feeling it. The feeling it and the enjoying it is part of the attuning, as well as the focusing on. It's all part of the attuning.

A question came up about subtle objects. What happens when an object gets subtle? Let's say the breath gets subtle. It's very common on retreats for people to say, after a while, "The breath just gets—I can't feel it anymore," or "I'm paying attention to the rise and fall, but I can't feel it anymore." It's become a subtle object.

And in a way, we could say yes, it's inviting the attention to become more subtle. But sometimes what happens is the object becomes so subtle and we don't let the attention become correspondingly subtle. We just say, "I can't feel it," and then we space out or lose it or get frustrated and declare that it doesn't work.

But what we can do instead is recognize: "Ah, the object is getting more subtle. Great. How interesting." And then comes the art of just letting the attention correspondingly match the subtlety level of the object.

This process—I would say this subtilizing, if we make it a verb—is more central to what's really going on as samadhi deepens than something like counting breaths. This process of subtilizing is what allows things to open up moment to moment in a sitting.

But if we look at the whole scale of what the jhanas are, they are movements into more and more subtlety. The nothingness of the seventh jhana is an incredibly subtle state. The neither-perception-nor-non-perception of the eighth is unbelievably refined. Even the peacefulness of the third jhana is less subtle than the seventh, and so on—the whole spectrum is actually a movement into greater subtlety. Understanding this has a lot to do with what we're discussing about perception attainments and the whole view of practice.

But at a moment-to-moment meditative level, when the object gets more subtle, it's like asking: "How can I let the attention get more subtle? How can I let it settle down like that? What do I need to do?"

Let me address Marco's question about dealing with pain when pīti arises. There are unfortunately several different options here, and I'll talk more about this later, but let me say something now.

It might be that you're sitting, pīti arises, and then at some point pain arises somewhere in the body. What you can do is get more into the pīti and keep the pain at bay. I would really recommend that as the first thing you do. It's almost like your priority is the pīti—enjoying it, absorbing into it, getting more into it.

Sometimes what helps is not just concentrating on where there's pīti, but seeing if you can spread the pīti into where there's pain. Sometimes what was painful actually becomes pleasurable as you spread it. What I think you're still working on is really learning the absorption into the pīti, so we don't want to get too distracted by getting into the whole pain situation at this point.

But there's also perception at play here. What was unpleasant can be perceived as pleasant—something quite amazing. Sometimes see if you can spread the pīti there, just imagine it going there, or decide to see the pain as pīti. There are several things you can play with.

At some point this might work once or twice for some minutes, but then you can't do it anymore. On this retreat, at this point, that's the time to get up. You're out of batteries, and it's time to get up and have a cup of tea, go for a walk, or do some walking meditation. You could stand up and continue meditating if that's pain-free.

Marco is asking about something from his experience on the last retreat—sometimes he sat with real firm resolve, adhiṭṭhāna, sitting through the pain, being there. It was difficult, but when he came back after taking a break, that's when the most pīti built up and broke through. So he's wondering if maybe he should do that for the sake of the pīti breaking through later.

This brings up something I want to talk about, maybe starting tomorrow. Pīti arises in two ways. One is this kind of just keep showing up with intensity and working until it erupts through.

And the other way is, no, here's a little bit of pīti and we're coaxing it, we're building it, we're adding to it more. So they're just different ways of working, really.

But I'm partly wanting to ask you, what were you doing in those times when you were really just with your firm resolve? What actually were you doing with the mind at that point? Because you could sit with pain and actually just end up a contracted, miserable, crumpled mess if the relationship is wrong with it. So you were probably doing something. You must have been in some mode of way of looking or relationship with that then that was part of the effect. The resolve will build energy and energy is related to pīti so it can erupt that way. But there need to be other factors there as well that have to do with the way of looking and relating. So do you remember what they were?

Very good. So when I asked him that, Marco says it's a combination of the allowing, letting be practice—insight way of looking—and the anattā, not-self practice, both of which I would regard as insight ways of looking. And what they do is when you're doing those, so you're not just building adhiṭṭhāna and energy by staying still, you're actually opening the energy body and opening and letting go of clinging, and that's having a big effect as well. When I say openness of heart, openness of being, I also mean just openness from release of clinging. So all this.

Pīti also comes from release of clinging. But a lot of factors, a lot of things need to come together for the moment of pīti to arise. But can you see how that would be significant? Because if you'd sat there just gritting your teeth, it wouldn't have given rise to pīti later. Does it make sense?

So as to what to do, in your case here, do both. I don't think it matters. But again, know what your playground is in terms of what exactly you're trying to achieve at this point. What are you trying to learn? What are you trying to gain mastery of? And that might be—I'm not sure—but it might be really absorbing into the first jhāna. And so if that is, what do I need to do? How do I need to relate right now and practice right now? But I have a sense that's what I'm trying to, that's my playground. Does that make sense? Does that sound relevant?

I think we probably need to stop now. Let's have some quiet together.

CHAPTER 202

Attitude, Effort, Achievement, and View

Rob Burbea · 1h10

> In this dharma talk from his jhāna retreat series, Rob Burbea examines the fundamental importance of view (diṭṭhi) and attitude in meditation practice. He begins by exploring the etymology of samādhi—noting its original meaning as 'agreement' or 'harmony' rather than mere concentration—and how this understanding transforms our approach to practice. Burbea addresses common obstacles in jhāna development, particularly the tendency toward excessive pressure and achievement-oriented thinking that creates suffering rather than the harmonization samādhi actually represents.
> The talk covers practical aspects of effort regulation, from gross to extremely subtle levels, emphasizing quality of attention over quantity. Burbea discusses the art of working toward goals without rigid timetables, and how expanding our view of what we're developing—beyond just concentration to include patience, resolve, mindfulness, and the letting go of self-judgment—creates greater stability in practice. He offers the radical reframe of understanding jhānas as 'perception attainments' rather than states to achieve, connecting this perspective to the deepest teachings on emptiness and the fabricated nature of all experience. This conceptual shift, he suggests, integrates jhāna practice completely with insight into the fundamental nature of reality.

I would like to talk now about effort and achievement, attitude and view. Much of what I'm going to say will maintain its relevance and should be applicable whatever level you're at, whatever stage of development you are through the jhānas. As I said, the effort aspect never goes away—it just becomes more subtle. But the attitude and the whole view are so important, and this should apply to any level we're discussing.

I meant to mention this the other night, but I'll include it now. It's interesting to look up the word samādhi in a Pali dictionary and then a Sanskrit dictionary, because it's actually a Sanskrit word, and see some of its historical uses.

Samādhi almost always gets translated as concentration, and I hope you can sense right now that I feel this is a rather impoverished translation. There are problems that come with that translation—a kind of implicit and then repeated and then entrenched indoctrination. We tend to think of it as meaning something quite rigid and forceful.

If you look up what the word actually means, it means agreement, or like a reconciliation—when a group of people agree on something or two people become reconciled. Or harmony, like harmony in a village or something like that. That's one of its principal meanings. What does that imply about that word? What does it imply about your view? What does it imply about your conception? What does it imply about what you emphasize? I won't elaborate further, but again, this is the invitation, the reminder to think on your feet, to listen actively.

Effort is a constant question. We can talk about it at a very gross level, at a macro level, a micro level, and at extremely subtle levels. I want to explore effort, attitude, and view together.

Sometimes what happens—often what happens—when a person loves the path and loves practice and really has a good desire and eros for all this, is that in the course of a retreat, in the course of practice, it becomes very easy to put too much pressure on ourselves. Too much pressure on the practice, too much pressure on ourselves. Sometimes there are people who would do better with a bit more pressure—they're just a bit casual, thinking "it's cool, things come and go, whatever"—and could actually benefit from turning the heat up a little bit, working harder, spending more time on the cushion. But very commonly, especially in this kind of retreat, somewhere along the line it gets a bit too pressured. We put too much pressure on, and a lot of that is unconscious.

So how can we take pressure off, if that's the case, in different ways?

One thing I want to reiterate: the body needs to be relatively comfortable, certainly at this point in your journey in jhāna practice for most of you. We don't want to put too much pressure on the body by thinking it's better to stay cross-legged for hours and hours, sitting through the pain, and so forth.

The first many years of my vipassanā practice were mostly spent looking at, being with, tolerating, and working with physical pain as best as I could. Sitting after sitting, hour after hour, month and year after year of retreat. I would say that developed a lot. I look back at that younger practitioner and think there was quite something to just putting up with all that and being willing to do all that. A lot got developed in terms of patience and will and resolve. I'm not sure how much insight—some insight, but I wouldn't say that was the primary thing.

At one point, my teacher Yanai Posner said—I can't remember the context, whether we were discussing this or a retreat I was attending—"It's great, and it's great that you're able to do that, but your practice might be getting a little narrow." Because if you asked me about the exploration of emotions and all kinds of other areas, or samādhi, it was mostly just being with the pain.

As I mentioned, Christina Feldman suggested, "Why don't you try alternating postures?" It was at that point that something opened. The pressure was taken off the body and the samādhi could really develop.

So first: pressure off the body. Another way is through the view of what we're doing and the idea of what we're doing. This is so much of what I want to talk about.

Sometimes, of course, we think, "I'm going to a jhāna retreat. I want to develop the jhānas. I want to develop my concentration." Sometimes we have to reflect—or maybe oftentimes we have to reflect—on the bigger picture of what we're developing here.

I mean, what you are developing just by trying to keep your attention at the tip of your nose—when you think "I'm failing because I got distracted in thought again"—this becomes a view that generates a whole cascade of emotion and papancha and dukkha. This arises from too narrow a view of what you're actually trying to develop.

So, as I said, if I include the fact that the hindrances and their arising hold all kinds of potential for insight, that becomes part of enlarging the scope of my view, my picture of what I'm trying to do. This makes a huge difference. When the hindrances are present, I'm not upset. It's not a failure. I don't judge myself as a failure as a meditator or whatever. I'm developing sensitivity and all this. And maybe that's more important than focus and concentration. I'm developing all these resources, as we said.

A lot of this is not black and white. Sometimes another problem with view is that we make everything so black and white. But where is the black and white when it comes to the resources we're developing—wellbeing, patience, or whatever it is? I am developing concentration, but even that's not black and white. Patience, as I said, resolve, responsiveness, discipline—all of this is in the big picture of what's being developed. When it's not going well in terms of how well I'm sticking to these sensations, I need to open that view. Or at the beginning of a sitting, I really need to have a sense of the bigger picture of what I'm doing, what's being developed here. This makes a big difference.

I'm developing mindfulness, of course. Every time the mind wanders off, it's mindfulness that notices the mind has wandered off. So it's a moment of mindfulness, and I have to see that. That's also part of what I'm developing. Don't let the view get too narrow. Because like we said with the table analogy, too narrow is not enough base and things will capsize very, very easily. The wind blows a little bit, things get a little difficult, and we get very dejected if something falls over.

Hopefully I'm also developing—or over time letting go of—judgment. So every time the mind wanders, I judge less. And not only am I developing concentration, but maybe I'm taking care of working on that too, just as an integral woven-in factor. All of these things are really, really important.

For some people, the development of patience, the letting go of self-judgment, the development of discipline, the development of resolve—all this is actually going to be more important, more significant for your liberation, the healing of your heart and your life, than attaining some jhana. I really mean this. For some people, it's like, "Yeah, jhana, great, but what about this? What about that self-judgment? What about whatever it is?"

I mentioned yesterday this kind of micro habit. Remember this subtle pattern of "oh, it's not quite as good as it was" or "yes, it could be better." That's also in the bigger picture of what's being developed. The influence of that kind of subtle, micro-level aversion or negative viewing—its influence on our lives is huge. And so if that's part of our bigger picture of what we're developing, that also expands the container of what we're doing, the view of what we're doing, and hence the stability of our vessel.

So one more thing about that micro habit. Can I learn to let go of that micro habit of "it's not good enough" and still work and play in the moment? They're not contradictions. How can we have a direction that we're working or playing towards and yet not have that negative "not quite good enough" attitude, or not let that kind of thing run the show, cast its pallor and its flavor over the whole of the proceedings?

When is that a hindrance? When someone says, "it could be better"—when is that a hindrance? And when is it actually just a wise discernment that's part of this opportunism? When is letting go of this "it could be better" attitude a skillful shift in attitude? And when is it just laziness and inertia? "That's okay. I'm just putting up with something," but it's coming out of laziness and inertia. This is a really subtle question, really subtle inquiry.

Doing a jhana retreat or practicing jhana long-term, developing that—it's going to really develop our steadiness, our capacity to stay steady long-term with whatever we're committed to, whatever we care deeply about in life, the projects we want to see through, the service we want to give, because we have more capacity, more resource. We're also training this moment-to-moment steadiness, of course, but it takes a lot of steadiness to just keep showing up and keep intending to do samadhi practice.

So the steadiness you need to show up and to keep putting your mind in a certain direction—you're actually cultivating the kind of steadiness it takes to be there for your long-term intentions and stay steady with them, your goals and projects and what you really care about and want to manifest in your life in a way that works towards that.

And where does the tightness come in? Maybe that's a better way of approaching it—knowing that if you love this practice deeply, you will encounter suffering. If you don't care enough to suffer, you probably won't experience much difficulty at all. But when you truly care about this path, you're going to meet suffering. The Buddha spoke directly about this reality.

So steadiness—that capacity for unwavering presence—is certainly a fruit of jhana practice, but it's also a cause, part of the very conditions that support the cultivation itself. This understanding needs to be held within the larger picture, because when our view becomes too narrow, we find ourselves miserable far more often, caught in self-judgment and constriction.

Now, let's talk about taking the pressure off. The beginning moments of sitting often present interesting opportunities. Sometimes you settle right in, immediately engaging with the work or play of practice—just diving in with "let's go!" But sometimes there's value in simply arriving and hanging out for a while, just sitting with light mindfulness. What you're actually doing in these moments is relaxing, checking that you're not holding too much tension around the whole endeavor.

For some practitioners, especially dedicated meditators, simply adopting the meditation posture can automatically trigger a whole constellation of views and tightness. These associations—with entering the meditation hall, sitting on the cushion in a particular posture—can carry subtle or not-so-subtle psychological baggage. In these moments, it can be genuinely fruitful to simply hang out, relax, look around. This is taking the pressure off.

Often in this relaxed settling, the energy body is allowed to become more harmonious naturally, organically, because the pressure we bring—frequently unconscious pressure—actually constricts the energy body in ways that don't serve our practice. The squeezing effect of this tension works against the very ease and flow we're trying to cultivate.

As I mentioned in the opening, sometimes it's helpful to open our intention: Why am I here? Practice can become so centered on "me and my practice and my achievement and my progress," then spiraling into comparisons with others. Can I actually keep opening this up, so that I'm not doing this solely for myself—perhaps not even primarily for myself? This kind of shift can be extraordinarily significant, genuinely pivotal in terms of its effects on practice.

Consider this: whether you're on a three-week jhana retreat, a weeklong retreat, a month, or even a year-long practice period, we often—consciously or semi-consciously—develop timetables of achievement. "I figure by the end of the second week, I'll be accessing the jhanas." Or with longer retreats, "Surely by the three-month mark..." These timetables are genuinely unhelpful. What they excel at producing is suffering.

If you want to suffer, give yourself a timetable for achieving what you hope to accomplish, what you're certain you'll accomplish, or even what you're intending to accomplish by specific deadlines. This becomes a form of hindrance. Let it go. Instead, simply work and play—whichever resonates more deeply with you.

But what does it mean to work toward something? So often in spiritual contexts, there's tremendous pain around the very idea of goals, achievement, or attaining this or that state. This becomes especially acute for Western practitioners, leading them to simply discard the whole framework. Then we receive teachings of "nowhere to go, nothing to do"—as if it's either rigid goal-orientation or complete aimlessness.

But our lives aren't actually like that. There are places to go in life, meaningful work to accomplish, things we genuinely care about. We need goals and direction. We need to engage and manifest what matters to our souls. The question becomes: How do I relate to working toward what I love, what feels genuinely important, playing in that creative space, while simultaneously releasing timetables and not becoming tight around the process?

This is an art—having a goal and working toward it while remaining aware of where tightness arises. Perhaps that's the more skillful way to frame it: the tightness will come if you truly love this practice. You will encounter suffering on this retreat in precisely this way, if you care deeply enough. If you don't care sufficiently, you probably won't suffer much. But authentic caring inevitably meets suffering—and the Buddha spoke directly to this truth.

It's the distress of the contemplative, he calls it. If you're not experiencing this distress, something is wrong. Something, I would say, is wrong in your larger view and your attitude.

So this suffering will come. Then part of the art is recognizing—ah, there it is. And noticing, even at really subtle levels, what's feeding it? What view is feeding it? What way of going about things is feeding it? This awareness is part of the art.

Related to this achievement orientation is another familiar question: "Is this it? Have I got it? Is this the first jhana? Am I in it? Have I achieved it? Have I got it?" This is, of course, connected to the question I've discussed several times: What qualifies as a jhana? Have I got it? Is this it? The answer depends on how I define it, right?

So again, this question of what actually qualifies as the first jhana, what qualifies as any particular jhana, what qualifies as jhana at all—it's often posed in ways that could be more intelligent, more fruitful. Oftentimes it's not.

What is important? What's important? Don't lose sight of this. Let your questions and your emphases and your attitudes and your practices—let everything come from what is important. What do I want? Where am I actually trying to get to?

It's interesting when you think about the tension and tizzy and fuss around what is and what isn't a jhana, either internally for a person or in terms of polemic and argument. If you consider something like mindfulness or another factor on the Eightfold Path, do we have the same kind of fuss about that? Or the seven factors of awakening? Most people, with all those other practices, don't get caught up this way.

What is mindfulness? Is this mindfulness? Is it not mindfulness? It's not so black and white. Metta is an even better example because we were talking about it before. Yes, we have to acknowledge it's helpful to define metta. What are we talking about? We're not talking about conditional love—"if you don't love me back, I'm going to jump out the window." That's not metta.

So it's good to define what metta is: it's unconditional, it's non-attached, it's universal, it's wishing for well-being. This is helpful. But the practice of metta—sometimes it's stronger, sometimes it's weaker. As we were just saying, it has all kinds of sub-emotions or flavors. It's a complex of many differences. Sometimes there's no emotion there; it's just an intention. All that is metta.

Sometimes, at different times, it's more or less purified of its near enemy, attached love. It's a spectrum, and all of that is included, and all of it counts as metta. It should.

Why are we thinking about jhana—first jhana, third jhana, whatever it is—as something fundamentally different? Why has this one word become so charged? As I said, I simply put this question: is it possible to think and relate to all this with a little more intelligence?

Sometimes it's better to just drop that question if you find yourself fretting about it. This fretting can be completely non-verbal—you might be anxious about whether you're "in" or "out" without even thinking those words. Just get into the practice. Just enjoy it. Work with it, play with it, seek to maximize your enjoyment.

Again, regarding view and attitude and emphasis: did I say yesterday "quality over quantity"? Yes, I did. So oftentimes—mostly, I would say—it helps to prioritize the quality of attention over the quantity of attention. By quantity I mean how long you can sustain attention before getting distracted. Duration is still important, this ability to sustain and hold attention on something. But I would say most people do much better putting that secondary in importance to quality.

What do we mean by quality? Wholeheartedness is part of quality. How wholeheartedly, in this moment, can I open to and give myself to whatever I'm paying attention to? Can I become intimate with it, interested in it? This is one of those things—it's really important on a micro level in practice, and it's also really important in life. The capacity, the ability, the willingness to be wholehearted—sometimes that's what's missing in a person, not just in their concentration practice, but in their life as well.

How wholehearted can I be in this moment with this thing, with this person, with this passion, with this issue, with whatever it is? This is crucial.

Quality means wholeheartedness, but also some of the things we talked about yesterday—this modulation of intensity. Quality doesn't just mean keeping the intensity at eleven all the time. It means responsive tuning of the attention's intensity. I'm actually not sure I can explain what I mean by intensity, but I can feel it.

I encourage you to experiment with this, play with it. Get a sense of shifting gears, of turning the dial up and down on the intensity of attention. Because again, back to this issue of inertia—sometimes I'm paying attention, I'm paying attention. "Okay, there's nothing to talk about. I'm paying attention." Are you with your breath? "Yeah, I'm paying attention to my breath." But the inertia there lies in not taking the trouble to actually play with this, to explore what it feels like when attention is intense versus when you back off the intensity. Sometimes we just haven't explored this because of inertia. We think of attention, of mindfulness, as just one thing.

Delicacy and lightness of attention are all related—we talked about this yesterday. The relative spaciousness is also part of quality. What kind of spaciousness of attention helps? Back to when we talked about peripheral awareness earlier today—which mode works best? This is all part of quality, being willing to play with the relative spaciousness of attention.

Just to throw out another element: sometimes, at certain points, there's really a place for a kind of poetic or even imaginal sensibility in relation to whatever you're paying attention to—the breath, for example. We tend to have most beginners on most retreats pay attention to bare sensations: "Don't imagine, don't think anything." Then when we introduce the energy body, we say it's okay to imagine—it's not really about sensation, or it's a different kind of sensation.

But what if it's neither just sensation nor just energy body work? What would it be like sometimes on this kind of retreat? It's like adding a spice to the meal. What is it to breathe the breath of the All-Merciful?

Allah. What is it to breathe God's breath? Now I just hold that view lightly in relation to the breath. What happens?

Of course, that might not work for you at all—there's no formula here. The point is about the ways of sensing whatever it is you're sensing, whatever it is you're concentrating on, and sensing it with more poetic or imaginal sensibility. The breath of the beloved, the breath of the divine, the breath of Buddha nature. These are just examples. Or the breath tinged somehow with breathing mercy, breathing in and out compassion—whatever it is.

For some of you familiar with imaginal practice—I'm not going to explain it here—it may be that the whole sense of self becomes imaginal at that point. That may be okay. Again, we return to intention. What's my primary intention here on this retreat?

We don't really want to get into a whole imaginal exploration, but it's almost like titrating how much of that imaginal sense or poetic sensibility is in the mix of what's going on. Just a little bit of this spice can ignite something. There's a humdrum quality, nothing's really happening—and a little bit of that can change the whole relationship.

Why? Go back to what I said before. What's most primary in pīti arising? Openheartedness. Openness of being. That's actually what makes the most difference.

Years ago, Kirsten and I went to visit a friend who's a scholar in Berlin. He was teaching me Sanskrit, and he gave me these texts from caves in Afghanistan—Buddhist caves containing Sanskrit versions of the Ānāpānasati Sutta, the Buddha's mindfulness of breathing. But they had all kinds of things like imagining breathing a blue breath, with color and imagery woven throughout. I lost them, unfortunately—they weren't the originals—but that sort of thing is in the tradition.

So a little bit of this, a little titration, a drop of this essential oil can spark something—a dash of spice in the meal. But it's all very delicate, very subtle. Sometimes when people talk about tonglen, breathing in and out compassion, their practice becomes very heavy, very clunky and gross. I'm talking about something much more subtle here. It's really like a little drop of something into a mixture.

Okay, back to this—I probably won't belabor it much after this talk. But again, so easily we come from our past, from our indoctrination, thinking about what we're doing here: developing focus, developing concentration, or somehow trying to be in a state where there isn't thought. Then we measure the whole thing by how long we've been on this object, how much thought is arising, and so forth.

Could that view be part of our inertia? Could we have inertia around that very view?

As I said, some of those things that get emphasized are actually, if you look at the whole totality of what the Buddha said about all this, just a phrase here and there. Somehow they've gotten extracted, repeated, emphasized, indoctrinated.

What would it be to emphasize at times—or instead, or even primarily—this idea of actually seeking to cultivate and maximize pleasure and enjoyment? The exploration of subtlety. The exploration of these whole territories—just exploration and love of exploration, love of what opens. What would it be if those were the primary intentions and emphases, rather than focus, concentration, being thought-free?

Earlier I said that some people might do really well to drop the whole jhāna framework—if you've done enough, depending on your experience. Some people at certain points in their practice might benefit from dropping the whole jhāna framework, the whole conceptual structure of jhānas, for a while.

Maybe just think about insight practice and samādhi practice. And the intention with samādhi practice is not so much focus and concentration, but as I said, this well-being—cultivation of well-being, pleasure, enjoyment.

Go back to what samādhi means: harmonization, agreement, reconciliation. What does that suggest? What does it feel like?

In dropping the whole jhana framework, we're also letting go of this persistent question that can plague practitioners: "Is this it now? Have I got it?" Sometimes that very question creates a subtle overexcitement in the moment, or a grasping, or a snatching. The Buddha actually says in the suttas when he describes the jhanas: "without snatching at the first jhana, without snatching at the pīti." But this snatching arises from a certain attitude, from a certain view, from a certain mind state. It's something that happens in the moment that emerges from our view. Do you see how important view is?

In dropping all that systematic framework of the jhanas, we encounter less self-judgment because the self doesn't have this whole scale, this ladder by which to grade itself and measure its progress. We release the entire achievement mentality. Many of these views actually work against the samadhi deepening and against the jhana coming together or opening.

So sometimes, for some people at certain stages of their practice, it's beneficial to drop the whole framework of eight jhanas and simply split the practice in two: insight practice and samadhi practice. Samadhi is about having a really good time. Actually, insight is as well—the way I teach it—it's just slightly different how you go about it.

In insight practice, it should be really nice. It should open up into a really good time, because in insight practice what we're doing is letting go of clinging in the moment. It's clinging that causes dukkha. An insight way of looking—in my definition—is something that releases clinging. It therefore should bring relief and release, and it feels nice.

But what we're primarily interested in when we're doing insight practice is that whole process: Where's the clinging? How do I let go of it? What ways of looking work to release clinging? And what happens to my sense of self, world, dukkha, and reality when I let go of the clinging? All of that—it's definitely a good time, but it's a certain kind of good time.

Samadhi practice is more about this: here's this lovely quality that's arisen—and there can be many different ones. Let me really nuzzle into it, or open myself into it. Let me really get into that. And I'm less concerned with these other questions, primarily about clinging and reality and all that. So they're both—you understand—they're both nice.

If a person lets go of the jhana framework for a while, they can begin to notice gradually the different shades in their experience. Just thinking about samadhi and these lovely qualities and enjoying them, slowly, slowly I begin to discern between these different shades and qualities and frequencies. Then at some point you can reintroduce the jhana framework in relation to that—with post-it notes.

Other people, as I said, really need to discern more. It's the time in their practice where they need to make more discriminations, more discernments between "this is this kind of pleasure, this is this kind of realm, and this is that." How is it different? What are the different territories? What are the sub-territories there?

Let's return to this question: What's my playground? What does it mean to develop mastery? If we don't discern among all these territories, the fruit we get out of it will be much, much less. I know meditators who can get well-being and they can sit in that well-being for hours—and they've been sitting in the same well-being for about twenty years. Not without interruption, you know, but twenty years of their practice, because they didn't want to discern when they could have discerned, when it first came up, between say pīti and happiness, or the different shades of happiness.

What happened was that over time, all these qualities got mixed together. It was a nice soup, but it was just a soup. Here at Gaia House years ago—I don't know if it was during your time as a coordinator—but they used to have leftover soups. Basically, all the leftover lunches at the end of the week would get mixed into a pot, heated up, and that would be the meal. Of course, it didn't taste of anything. It just tasted of nothing, really. People would still be very appreciative, but it was nice without being able to differentiate any flavors in there.

If we don't discriminate, the real danger is you're left with a soup of niceness that never really develops. It never develops and brings the liberation and the opening of certain territories.

So again, I contradict myself. Different people have different needs at different times.

With regard to effort as well, in relation to everything we're saying, sometimes less effort is more productive. I'm actually backing off—that's implicit in much of what I've said. Sometimes even a slight over-efforting can disturb things in different ways. Sometimes that disturbance can be extremely gross when the effort is too much. We'll maybe talk about that sometime soon. And sometimes the disturbance can be just really, really subtle. But over-effort has an impact.

If we go back to this analogy of a potter crafting a vase or a pot on a wheel—sometimes with the hands, you're going to press with more pressure and sometimes with less pressure. That's what's appropriate to what I'm trying to shape right then. In a way, the hands are always pressing. If the hands on the clay is the analogy of attention, the attention is always there, but how it's pressing affects what arises. How much pressure affects the shape that's created. And that's responsive and variable and improvised.

It might also be that—again, stretching the analogy a little bit—the size could vary. I could have my whole span of hands shaping this big vase, or focus on this particular area where it curves, or maybe there's a certain area where I just want a little place where it narrows and I just put my fingers there. So again, the size, the pressure—all of this is going to shape what arises, and all of it's improvised, responsive, sensitive, variable.

The Buddha gives several images. He talks a lot about right effort, balanced effort. You probably know these similes, but I'll mention them again. He talks about trying to hold a quail, which is a very small bird, in your hands. Too loose, it flies away. Too tight, and you're going to crush it. Or another analogy he gave to a musician, a lute player: it's like tuning the strings. Too tight, you snap the string. Too loose, you can't play anything—you can, but it's going to sound not very good.

So there's always this question, and it's not a fight. I've said this before. It's always a kind of sensitive, responsive question: what's the effort?

If we talk about effort, as I mentioned a while ago, we can talk about a kind of micro level of effort, which means in this moment, what does the intensity need? What does the delicacy need? All that. But also the view in this moment.

So let's talk about view. What I really want to communicate is that whatever view you have about the big picture of practice and where you're going inevitably filters down—or its implications filter down—to your micro moment-to-moment decisions in practice and navigations and what you do. We want to see this and understand this and understand the power of views.

So part of the micro level effort thing is also the sensitivity and the playing with: what view am I having right now about what I'm doing, what I'm emphasizing? My attitudes.

And there's a macro level—the question of effort on a macro level. That means: do I get up and just go for a walk now? Is it enough? Do I need a rest? How many hours a day am I engaging in formal practice? Is it too much? Am I squeezing too much? Or actually, could I do more?

The halls are open really 24-7, and the walking room as well. So you might have—everyone else is on breakfast wash-up, and you could do a number of things there, but you could come and either sit or walk. Sometimes we just get into habit: I'm used to being on retreat and I sit this much. Actually, it might be that more would be helpful.

So this whole macro level of effort: do I need to back off?

Do I need to do more?

And again, the larger view is part of the macro level as well. In my description of what mastery involves, I mentioned that at a certain point it also involves being able to walk around in a jhāna—or at least practicing doing that.

This is an interesting practice because when you reach that point, you might decide to walk around for twenty minutes or an hour while maintaining the jhāna. You might find yourself thinking, "Wow, that was great. I was really there, present in this state of wellbeing, right with the energy body. That was my primary focus, and the feet were able to just find their way."

Then you come back with the expectation: "This sitting is going to be amazing now." And it might be—it really might. I'm not speaking cautiously about this in the way you usually hear on insight retreats. I'm not saying "be careful of that." Rather, I'm pointing out that we don't always know, because it's an energy question.

The fact that you've been in jhāna might indeed create a different kind of springboard for your next sitting or formal walking period. But it also might be that having done that actually takes a lot of energy. You might come back and realize, "Oh, I'm a bit tired now," or find that the mind doesn't quite have the energy.

It's still worth experimenting with when you reach that point—being able to do that and practice it. But it's fascinating: jhānas bring energy unquestionably, but they also take energy. It's a lot of work. You're putting in tremendous effort again and again, working and playing in these ways.

This is part of the whole art of being on retreat and the whole art of practice—getting wise and sensitive to energy levels. It's not always possible to predict when there's going to be a dip or when you're actually tired from the work you've done and need rest. Sometimes the mind truly needs to rest from these kinds of efforts.

Here's another interesting phenomenon you might encounter once you've had considerable experience with different jhānas. Sometimes you're in a jhāna and lose it a little, or space out for just a few moments. When you bring the mind back after those moments of spacing out, it returns at a deeper level.

This offers two conclusions or ponderings. First, maybe spacing out isn't necessarily always a disaster. If I'm too quick with self-judgment, perhaps I should pause and see what unfolds rather than immediately assuming the worst.

Second, if this deepening happens, might it indicate that I was subtly over-efforting in the first place without realizing it? When I spaced out, perhaps what actually happened was a loosening—the effort relaxed, and it was that relaxation that allowed the deepening. I don't know for certain, but this seems very worth contemplating.

It might be an indication that should inform my practice. Perhaps I should try going back in with a little more looseness in terms of effort, a little less pressure on the effort pedal.

This probably applies more once you've had different experiences with jhāna, though it might also apply to working with energy body experiences. Sometimes what can creep in is an expectation to be able to access this or that experience, jhāna, or quality of energy. In a way, this expectation is actually good—it's fine and beneficial. It's part of practice maturing when one can have reasonable expectations of certain experiences arising and being able to enter them.

But easily this expectation can become a kind of subtle demand for this or that to arise, or to be as good as usual, or as wonderful as yesterday. There's a subtle stance that might not involve any thought—just a quiet demand or expectation.

Again, this calls for a slight, subtle shift of view. Rather than operating from demand, why not think about picking up on, noticing, becoming sensitive to, and then attuning to whatever frequencies are actually present in the mix—in the energy body, in the emotional landscape, in whatever loveliness is there? This creates an entirely different orientation.

So it might be a slightly different mix today than yesterday. But the question becomes: what is actually here? What can I attune to, rather than making a demand?

The very tuning to frequencies in the energy body mix, the very tuning to frequencies in the mix of the citta, will amplify that frequency. I have to notice it first, which takes sensitivity. I have to be willing to tune into it—that's the responsiveness—and then I have to attune to it. The attuning itself will amplify. This is fundamentally different. I'm not demanding; I'm seeing what's here, what's possible here, what actually is here, and then attuning. This differs entirely from demanding something. That demand, as I said, can be exceedingly subtle.

Returning to what I said about piti, which actually applies to the different factors among the primary factors in the first four jhanas—perhaps all the jhanas—in the meditation, part of this work and play we've discussed, part of this maximizing pleasure, this licking the honey out of the cup, you could say in soul-making terms, there's actually an eros for that quality. But it's eros in the small definition—this wanting more contact, wanting more intimacy, wanting to penetrate, wanting to open. For those familiar with soul-making dharma, you recognize this as eros, but eros in the small definition because we're not yet letting it expand into too much image or into the whole bigger dynamic where it expands to psyche and logos and everything.

Outside the meditation, you can have eros with the fantasy, with the image—eros in the bigger definition, eros that is allowed to stimulate psyche and logos and the whole soul-making dynamic. If that doesn't make sense, forget about it. It doesn't matter. What matters is right now, in the moment-to-moment meditation, it's the seeking of the pleasure, the enjoying it, the getting into it. Get into it.

In the larger view, outside of the meditation and actually in meditation both, the view of the self on the path is absolutely crucial. What's my view of myself as a practitioner, as someone walking the path? I've known people over the years with all kinds of actually deep experiences in meditation, and something's not right in their view of the self on the path, their view of self as practitioner. Very little liberation comes from it. The whole way their psychology is construing or holding the self as meditator and this experience, that experience—understanding ideas about emptiness, having even experienced certain fadings. Something's not working. Some connection is jammed the wrong way.

Sometimes in relation to jhana—and I don't know if I've said this in a talk before, though I've certainly said it in interviews—we can get so tight around the achievement-oriented aspects and then self-judging. One way I take the pressure off is to say something like this: What we're doing here with the jhana business and the piti and the pleasure and all these different wavelengths of pleasure is something akin to this—you're tired and your back hurts, and at home there's a sofa with lots of cushions on it. You're just arranging these cushions so that they feel as good as they can feel. "Oh no, if I shift this one, that's better. That's better." That's what you're doing. Are you going to get into a big self-judgment thing about that?

That's essentially what we're doing. This is one way of thinking about it, taking the pressure off in the view. It's something we're just like, "Okay, here's this body experience. Here's this mind experience. Here's this energy body. What will help make it feel good?" It's just not a big deal. You play with that until it feels good, or to maximize how good it feels.

At another level, coming back to the eros dimension, the view of the self on the path—we do want that, or it's possible that it can become a real sense of blessedness, of gift, humility, desire, love. Image of the tradition, image of the Buddha, image of teachers, image of self on path—all this becomes imaginal in the fully soul-making sense of the word. It will still, as the Buddha said, have pain at times. There will still be distress, frustration, disappointment, tightness—the distress of the contemplative, he calls it. But that can be there, and it's part of the cut of eros. It's part of the bigger soul-making fantasy.

But for those of you who know about soul-making fantasy, I'm not going to explain all that now. We need to have a sense of the self on the path, an image, a construal of the self as practitioner on the path in a way that's nourishing, in a way that really makes sense, that holds us well through all the ups and downs.

So all this that we're touching on today, all this is relevant to and even causes the different and various difficulties we encounter in practice. Again, we tend to have such a narrow view of what we need to do, but all this business is oftentimes actually causal of the difficulties and more causal than what we tend to think of as the problem.

Take inability to access jhāna. Again, I can think of one meditator—there's actually a few—meditating for decades, decades, decades, decades, lots of retreats, etc. She wants to develop her samādhi, which means for her concentration and focus. "My concentration is so bad," which almost everyone says. "My mind wanders and my thoughts come." Again, she's measuring in terms of exactly what he said. Maybe not put those things as priority. How much thought comes? Is my mind wandering? But she is measuring that way.

She says, "I need to really get into this before I can do any other kind of practice. I really need to develop my focus. I really need to develop my concentration." Now actually knowing her fairly well as a student, she actually needs, I would say, much more important than she needs to develop her focus and keep her mind steady on something and all that. Actually what needs to happen is an inquiry and exploration or a development in practice of being able to give herself fully to something. That's a very different thing.

What is it to really show up? I give myself, now there's a kind of—I give myself, I really care about this. There's a kind of macro and there's this micro level, like when I did the sunbathing thing. Opening, surrendering. The issue, I would say, is more with that. It's not about keeping the mind steady and her ability to do that. The reason she can't do that is because there's something in her that is holding back energetically, heartfully, in terms of her soul, in her life as well, in terms of opening and surrendering.

And so there's very rarely any kind of buildup of energy in the being. Something's just blocking it. Something won't open to it. Energy is not permitted to gather. And actually those are the primary issues. Those are the primary causes of inability to deepen in samādhi, access that. But just seeing in a very different way, so it's a different view.

But you can also see, one can also see, and we've talked about it, you see some of these very same issues manifesting in her life. It's not like, "Oh, that's just a problem of focus and concentration." It's this kind of issue about allowing energy to gather, about being wholehearted, about really giving herself, getting behind something, about really opening, actually manifest in her life too and cause all kinds of, let's say, limitations. So a shift in view, a shift in understanding, then a shift in emphasis of what am I actually practicing in? What would make a difference? What's important?

Again, sometimes, oftentimes human beings, it's the body isn't open. The energy body as a sort of habit is not so open. Most people wouldn't—it's not obvious when you look, I mean, you get people with really hunched over kind of contracted postures. I'm not talking about that. I'm talking about something much more subtle that's just palpable, but not obvious to, let's say, most people.

And sometimes this has to do with trust. Sometimes it has to do with, and it's related to just also, sometimes you see, oh, the person might also, for instance, it's very hard for them to feel something like devotion. All these things are related. And it's about the concentration—it's maybe not about the concentration. It's about something else, about the heart and the soul and how the heart and the soul over time shapes or limits a certain kind of typical stance or typical way that the energy body is.

Energy body always moves. It's always opening, closing. But there can be sort of—typically it's just a little bit closed. So certain things just are not possible. And again, maybe to learn to practice trusting in the opening. Trusting and surrendering. Just slowly, slowly learning how to do that.

Practice with the energy, cultivating this capacity. Or, as I mentioned earlier, sometimes what occurs is that people develop quite a tightness or overexcitement, which might be very subtle, that creeps in right when there's actually tremendous focus, deep concentration, and plenty of pīti that may be right on the edge of the first jhāna—if we even speak of edges.

But what I want to emphasize is they're thinking too much about edges. This very view is creating problems—there's a black and white "over there." If I can just get over there, even if "over there" is metaphorically two inches away, that will be the jhāna. But it's not. Again, this could be a verbal thought or a non-verbal thought. This black and white view is allowing tension to creep in, an impulse to snatch and grasp, which causes problems, creates tightness.

What about instead just getting into it? Getting into what is there that is lovely and enjoying that, not worrying about where the boundary is. Relishing, really relishing what's here versus the idea of attaining something and then measuring whether I've attained it. What I'm interested in is simply relishing that honey.

Last thing—we're doing well for time today. The Buddha sometimes talked about or described the jhānas as perception attainments. What we are doing, I would say, in the most fruitful, the truest, the most ontologically valid and most liberating way of conceiving this, is that we're playing with perception. In that playing with perception, certain perception attainments will be opened.

This way of viewing, I would say, is much more significant than thinking we're practicing unwavering attention, or practicing an intensity of laser beam intention that dissects or magnifies things—like looking at things through a magnifying glass—or that we're simplifying, or even that we're playing with energy.

I do talk a lot about energy when I teach. Sometimes, as I said, it seems helpful for many people. Some people really don't resonate with it at all—they don't get a sense of it. We can relate all this to qigong and such; it makes sense to talk about energy. But very often we can get locked into a certain view that we're really doing something here with the energy or with the energy body or with the body or with the chakras or whatever it is. We think we're getting the energy body to this or that state, and that becomes locked as a view: "I'm working on this contraction, I'm opening the energy here."

Sometimes that's really helpful as a view. We can talk in energetic terms about some of these examples of difficulties and how they relate to life. But sometimes a person has had enough of that kind of thinking, and it's not the final truth of what's going on. It's just a certain way of conceiving it, a way of construing it, a way of perceiving it.

This idea of perception attainment and the idea of playing with perception—that's the most radical shift of conceptual framework and the most important shift of conceptual framework you could make. Really understand what that means and use that in a way that's actually fruitful rather than just a casual "yeah, yeah, yeah." It has everything to do with a radical and deep understanding of emptiness.

The jhānas, what we're doing in the jhānas—I didn't explain this; I rushed through it at that point in the talk, but I'll come back to it. If I start to understand the jhānas as playing with perception, and perception attainments are opened through our playing with perception, this integrates completely into our understanding of the deep emptiness of all things.

That's the most important thing in the Dharma, I would say. The most important thing in the Dharma is perception—understanding perception and playing with perception. You can construe the whole Dharma as actually being primarily interested in that: playing with perception. Everything, even things that sound like they have nothing to do with that, you can understand the whole Dharma as basically an exploration of playing with perception and then taking certain conclusions and certain liberations from that.

What do I mean by perception? Perception—saññā is the Pali word, and often it gets translated as something like labeling. That's not at all what I mean when I say perception. By perception, I do not mean labeling: "green," "Sarah," "cushion"—which is not a cushion, it's a bench.

By perception, I mean it's an equivalent term for experience, or better, appearance. So I use these three terms interchangeably—phenomenon, experience, perception, appearance. Perception attainment is not a labeling attainment.

If I were to label Sari "banana" and Kirsten "pomegranate" and Julian "kiwi," I'm not playing with labels here. I'm playing with the fabrication of experience, the fabrication of appearance. Energy is a fabricated perception, fabricated appearance. It's not energy. It's a certain fabrication of appearance, experience. This kind of energy is this kind of fabrication, this kind of conjuring, this kind of weaving and sculpting of appearance and experience.

The first jhana is this kind of weaving, conjuring, fabricating of experience, appearance, perception. The eighth jhana is—actually, that's a bad example. We'll come back to that later. Papañca involves certain fabricating of experience. Just the normal everyday consciousness is a certain fabrication of perception, experience, appearance.

Life is the fabrication of perception, experience, appearance. Meditation is the exploration of the fabrication of perception, experience, appearance. Skill and art in meditation is skill and art in the fabrication and the various fabrications and what they lead to. And do they lead where we want to go? If I want it to lead to unfabricating or skillful fabricating or this kind of liberation or this kind of state or that kind of quality or that kind of energy or that kind of jhana—perception attainments.

And that has everything to do with emptiness, which basically is the fabrication of experience, the fabrication of the sense of existence at different times. So the jhanas are completely woven into the whole sense of what's most important in the path. It's most a way of conceiving the whole of the Dharma.

Seeing it that way with that kind of view is very different than other ways we can conceive of what we're trying to do here. And as I said, for some of you—I do talk a lot about energy and some of you are very happy with that language, but some can sometimes get too attached, as if it's a real thing.

What would happen if you're one of these people—what would happen to just re-think the whole thing? Rethink your practice, rethink energy, rethink jhana, rethink dharma in terms of perception? Which, as I said, doesn't mean labeling.

It's 5:45. Would you like to end now, or are there some questions that it might feel helpful to ask? Does it feel like there might be—just get a sense of who might feel like they might want to ask. Why don't we take just a few questions? This will be part three, and then yeah, let's see how that goes.

CHAPTER 203

Mettā Practice, and a few things about Pīti (Instructions)

Rob Burbea · 26 min

> In this instructional talk from the 'Practising the Jhānas' retreat, Rob Burbea provides essential guidance for practitioners using mettā (loving-kindness) as their foundation practice for entering jhāna states. He emphasizes the crucial distinction between practicing mettā for cultivating love versus practicing it specifically for samādhi and jhāna development, explaining how this difference in intention fundamentally shapes the meditation experience.
> Burbea offers detailed instructions on developing sensitivity, attunement, and responsiveness in mettā practice—qualities that bridge jhāna practice with brahmavihāra cultivation. He explores the skillful use of phrases, timing, and energy body awareness, comparing the practice to 'riding thermals' where practitioners learn to recognize and work with the arising conditions moment by moment.
> The second portion focuses on pīti (rapture/ecstasy), which Burbea defines as pleasant physical sensations arising from non-sensual sources. He outlines the various ways pīti can manifest—from tingling and warmth to lightness and electric-like vibrations—and explains how it can arise through concentration, energy body work, open-heartedness, or even appreciation of natural beauty. Crucially, he introduces three key techniques for working with pīti once it arises: spreading it throughout the body, using focused 'probing' attention to penetrate its center, and employing open 'sunbathing' receptivity. These complementary modes of attention help cultivate and deepen the jhānic factors while emphasizing the importance of fully enjoying and surrendering to the pleasant experiences that arise in meditation.

So, which is my particular style of neurosis—my preferred neurosis—but I really fret a lot about wanting you all to have exactly what you need, exactly when you need it. Each of you, rather. And of course that's completely impossible. So we'll just do the best we can.

Today I'd like to divide things into two parts. The first part consists of two pieces of instructions, and the second part is a talk about view, effort, attitude, and achievement.

Two Parts of Instructions

The first instruction concerns using mettā practice as your base practice for moving deeper into samādhi and jhāna, or as a foundation for karuṇā (compassion) practice, muditā, or similar practices.

The first thing to understand is that when you're doing mettā practice with the intention of jhāna, that's a different intention than doing mettā practice for the purpose of cultivating mettā itself. This sounds obvious and perhaps not so consequential, but it's actually quite significant.

Of course, when you use mettā as your base practice—as your springboard practice towards jhāna—and that's your intention, you're going to be cultivating mettā. How can you not be? Even if you're practicing with breath or some other method toward jhāna, the jhānas naturally have mettā in them. They are naturally filled, imbued, pervaded by mettā. I won't elaborate on that further.

But if mettā is your base practice, then at some point there will likely be a fork in the path. You'll need to ask: Is it the love that I'm primarily cultivating now, or is it the sense of well-being, pīti, and happiness? There are grey areas in the middle, and you can mix these two approaches. But there is a kind of fork, and right from the beginning—or at some point fairly early on—you probably want to clarify your actual intention. Does this make sense?

Since you're on this retreat, as I mentioned on the opening evening, your intention is jhāna practice. That's your primary intention, which means that simply bearing this in the back of your mind has all kinds of effects and navigates your practice without you even being conscious of it. This is powerful. Intentions are extremely powerful things. Intentions create our worlds, and that's not hyperbole. So you want to be conscious about this and firm and clear about what you're doing.

At a certain point, for example, let's say you're practicing mettā and there's love, there's feeling, there are all kinds of shades of different feelings—which I'll discuss in a moment. But what you're looking for primarily is the pīti, the well-being. When that arises and comes up steadily and frequently, then that becomes your primary focus. The mettā is just a springboard.

Key Qualities in Practice

The way I teach mettā emphasizes the qualities and intentions of sensitivity, attunement, responsiveness, and receptiveness—these are all key. Why do I emphasize these qualities in jhāna practice? When we practice jhānas emphasizing these qualities and recognizing their importance, notice how much overlap and significance jhāna practice has for our emptiness practice, our soul-making practice, our emotional practice, and—I forgot to mention—our brahmavihāra practice. In the way I teach mettā, these are central qualities we're practicing.

There are different kinds of sensitivity and responsiveness. For example, with mettā practice using phrases like "may you be happy" or "may you be peaceful"—as we discussed before when talking about pegs—I might ask: Do I need more pegs here? Do I need to repeat that first phrase a second time, perhaps even a third time, before moving on? I'm being sensitive, attuned, and responsive to the situation, responding by adding more pegs. Sometimes this isn't necessary, but that's a relatively gross level of responsiveness to what I notice about my mind state and heart state.

Another aspect is how "loud," so to speak, I say the phrases internally. Sometimes the mind needs something really loud and clear.

"May you be happy," I might whisper, soft as a prayer. Other times the same phrase needs to boom through my being with crystalline clarity. I remain attuned: What does this moment require? Where should the volume be?

I also sense how sparse or dense the phrases need to be. Sometimes I find myself thinking, "May you be happy," and immediately needing another phrase because silence would invite distraction. The unsettled mind requires constant engagement, something to concentrate upon.

But once the mind has settled and the heart has opened, revealing those lovely heart frequencies, "May you be happy" can unfold into spacious silence. I rest in that resonance, feeling the heart vibrate with the emotional reverberations of the phrase itself. I cannot predict when the next phrase will arise—I simply remain sensitive to what the moment asks.

The whole practice becomes like riding thermals. When a warm updraft appears, I don't need to flap my wings. I glide, feeling how it supports me. When that thermal dissipates, I sense where to find the next one, perhaps flapping briefly to get there. But first I must learn to feel the thermal, to know what it means to ride it.

This sensitivity, receptivity, attunement, and responsiveness—this is what I'm pointing toward. I want to be fully aware of the effects and feelings in the energy bodies. As we discussed yesterday, the entire energy body participates in metta practice.

When I say a particular phrase—"May you be happy"—I open to the whole energy body's response. Then I move to the next phrase: "May you be peaceful." Suddenly I notice this phrase carries a distinct flavor, a deeper effect. I've caught a thermal with these very words. The phrase generates its own updraft in the citta-body system.

Without sensitivity in the energy body and heart, I would miss this entirely. So much of meditation involves this quality of opportunism—sensing which door stands open, which thermal awaits, what carries juice in this moment. I feel it fully, then work skillfully with what arises.

Beyond recognizing that certain phrases feel more alive than others, I develop sensitivity to individual words. Do I need the complete phrase, or can I simply drop in the word "happy"? This responsiveness reveals itself through practice.

As the energy body and heart become more sensitive, I notice that "happy" creates a different effect than "peaceful." These aren't static responses—the word "happy" doesn't always produce identical results. I attune to the precise emotional tones, subtleties, and frequencies arising in each moment.

The entire practice becomes an attunement to different frequencies, colors, vibrations in the energy body and heart. As I grow sensitive to these qualities—riding them, appreciating them, enjoying them all—despite their differences, I naturally begin radiating them outward. Here, I offer silently, you have some of this lovely happiness and peace.

Metta deepens through this process because metta isn't a single emotion—it's a complex of emotions, a symphony of the heart. As I radiate these qualities to others, I simultaneously bathe in them myself. I must ensure I'm truly enjoying this gift, not losing it in the act of giving it away.

If my intention remains focused on samadhi, all of this unfolds beautifully. But as I mentioned earlier, what truly captures my interest is the arising of piti.

So sometimes it's hard to distinguish what's happening—it gets a little mixed up—but actually we're interested in discrimination. I should qualify this, and this is one of those places where I'm going to contradict myself: some of us need to be really interested in discrimination, and some of us need to let go of discrimination for a while. But basically we're interested in discrimination.

If my priority is toward jhana, then I'm actually more interested in the piti—this real pleasure feeling, this well-being. I'll come back and talk about that in a moment. That's what I want to allow to dominate, more than the metta feelings. And that's what I'm writing about. Of course, it might be happiness and you're going for the second jhana, but that's it for metta for now. Is that enough to be going with?

The second thing I want to talk about—and I wasn't going to address it today—but from what I hear and from people I've spoken to in notes and conversations, saying a little bit now feels necessary. For many of you, you will need something like this. And in a way, what I'm going to say now will make what I say later today make sense over a larger area.

What I want to talk about now is piti, very briefly. I will say much more in the next few days.

So what is piti? The Pali word, P-I-T-I. Ecstasy, rapture, pleasant feeling, well-being. Technically, I would define it as pleasant physical sensations or pleasant physical feeling that arise from a non-sensual source. In other words, it's not like a pleasant taste in the mouth or someone touching you nicely. These are pleasant sensations arising from a non-sensual source.

I will talk more about this, as I said, but there are many manifestations. There's a big range in terms of how that can manifest—how intensely, what kind of experiences are involved, what kind of flavors. It can be a kind of tingling all through the body as rapture or ecstasy, a kind of almost electric-like vibration that's very pleasant. It could be just a sense of lightness. It can be a mixture of all these, and there can be a kind of warmth with it. But the key thing is that it's pleasant. The range of that pleasantness, both in terms of types of manifestation and also how pleasant it is, is quite extraordinary. I'll come back to all this—I'm just touching on this now to put a few things in place that some of you will need.

So piti was like Newton Abbot, remember? Or Newton Abbot is like piti. It arises anyhow—it can arise any which way. The important thing is for you to really learn how it arises for you. Is it going to be one way? Is it going to be many ways? Eventually it's just an intention.

So it may arise from really just sticking the attention at the tip of the nose or the upper lip and keeping it there, working with these other elements we talked about yesterday—the effort and the delicacy and the intensity. It may well arise. It may erupt into the body at some point from basically the focus and concentration, the intensity of energy.

It may arise from playing with the energy body, as we've done with the breath, and as we will touch on, you can also do it without the breath. So it arises from coaxing the energy body to be as nice, as comfortable, to have as much well-being as possible, and slowly, slowly, that just shapes and warms up into more and more piti.

It might arise from an insight way of looking. It might arise—someone was saying yesterday, and it's quite common for some people—from the nada sound. I'm not even going to explain that meditation. If you don't know what it is, it doesn't matter.

It may arise just from open-heartedness. Again, how often do we think of all this as arising from something called concentration, which means an intense focus and keeping my mind on something? People say to me so commonly: "I was standing outside, looking at a tree, appreciating, opening myself to the beauty of something in nature, and piti arose right there. I wasn't really concentrating on the tree—let me look at the bark."

Then you think, "Oh, but isn't that sense contact? The tree's sense contact?" Actually, your nostrils are sensation, sense contact. It's not the pleasantness of that sense contact of the tree.

So we have openness of being as the fundamental ground from which pīti arises most naturally. The person is simply present in nature or with whatever arises. The heart is open, the being is open, and the energy body is open, allowing pīti to emerge organically. In fact, with this quality of openness, pīti becomes something that is simply there—a natural condition you can tune into rather than something you must manufacture through effort.

Once pīti does arise, however, then we have what I could call work to do. I know some people resist the word "work," so perhaps we could say we have play to do. Though some don't like that word either. If neither appeals to you, then we simply have doing to do. And if you're uncomfortable with doing in meditation, you might want to examine whether this is the right retreat for you, as there may be some conceptual issues that need investigation.

Let me share just a small portion of what this work-play involves. I'll elaborate more later, but I want to give you a taste now.

Again, you're all in different places in your practice. The primary question right now is: where is my playground? Some of you might be exploring the fourth jhāna, others are still working with the energy body, and still others are developing concentration. It doesn't matter where you are. What matters is that you can discern your particular playground—what we've been calling your playground at your edge.

This is how we're teaching jhāna on this retreat, and there's a specific reason for this approach. I don't have time to repeat everything we've covered, but the essential question is: Can you identify your playground and spend most of your time there? Can you really marinate in it—whether it's the second jhāna or whatever level you're working with? This means spending substantial time there: hours, again and again, as much as possible.

Can you develop mastery? And what does mastery involve? The shorthand is simply: why bother? Because I believe this is how we extract the most fruit from this practice—more than any other approach. This is just my opinion, drawn from having worked through all of this myself.

So what does this work-play actually involve? Let me offer just a glimpse for now—three activities to explore.

First, see if you can spread that pīti or sense of well-being. As the Buddha described in his teachings, can the whole body be suffused, saturated, drenched, steeped with this quality? If you're in the second jhāna, it's happiness. If the third jhāna, it's a beautiful peacefulness. If the first jhāna, it's pīti.

So when pīti arises and sustains for more than a few minutes—if it doesn't sustain that long, it's not quite ready for this kind of work yet—then one exploration is to see if it can spread. Can the entire body space be contained within the pīti, touched by it, pervaded by it?

For now, I'll say it's perfectly fine if this doesn't happen. It's okay if the spreading doesn't occur. I'll add to and refine all of this as we continue. I just want to give you a small taste right now.

So the first element is seeing if the pīti can spread, if you can get your whole body involved, touched, and delighting in it.

The second and third elements involve what I call two modes of attention.

Let's say the pīti comes up and has spread throughout the body. I can then ask myself, "Where is it strongest?" Perhaps it's strongest around my throat. I might not even have a clear sense or image of my throat at that point, but it's somewhere in that region. I can kind of get that. I may have a sense of my throat, I might not, but somewhere around there.

So the first mode is like an arrow going into a bullseye. Right in the center of where it's most pleasant, I want to probe it with my attention, with a narrow focus. I really want to penetrate it, get inside it. Dive into it. You understand? Very spatially one-pointed.

But as I'm doing that, yes, I'm concentrating on it. Yes, I'm focusing on it. But I want to relish it. I want to maximize my enjoyment moment after moment. Where's the enjoyment here? Am I letting myself enjoy it? Can I enjoy it? Like nuzzling into it. Or putting your tongue in a little cup of honey and just wanting to lick every last bit of honey out of it.

I'm not kidding. Don't underestimate how much we prevent ourselves from enjoying at all kinds of levels through all kinds of indoctrination and psychological conditioning. But concentrate, yes—probe and really enjoy. Enjoy again and again and again. Find the enjoyment there.

The second mode of attention is complementary. Rather than being narrow and probing, it's open and receptive. It's more like—oh yes, just like you're sunbathing and your body is soaking up the sun, and you're opening, you're opening yourself, you're abandoning yourself. Or like you're in a really perfect temperature shower with the perfect water flow and just... yes.

So opening, receiving, surrendering. "Abandoning" is even not too strong a word. Abandon yourself to it. Surrender. Open your body to it. Open your being to it. Again, with the intention and emphasis to enjoy it to the maximum. How can I really drink the most enjoyment from this?

So there are two modes of attention, and we can alternate in a very relaxed, improvised way between this more probing narrow approach and the open surrendered sunbathing quality. There's no formula. Just move back and forth. The very moving back and forth is a bit like the bathman with the soap in the Buddha's analogy—you're working something. Part of how it works is through this going back and forth with the attention.

Not really fast, though. Not all nervous. And don't worry about, "Oh, is now the right moment?" It's hard to tell in advance. "If I move now, is that going to help?" Just be relaxed and play and move. In time, sometimes you do get a sense of these things. But the movement itself is shaping something. It's forming something. It's allowing something to coalesce and build.

So you could do any of these three things: spreading it or seeing if it will spread, and then these two modes of attention. You could do the "see if it will spread" first. I'm not going to talk much about that now other than to say it's fine if it doesn't. Just see if it will spread, imagine it spreading.

If it doesn't spread, no big deal—I'll return to that topic later. For now, let's say it's perfectly okay if it doesn't expand beyond its initial location. Even if the pīti remains localized—perhaps just around your heart area while your legs feel completely normal—you can still practice both the probing and the sunbathing with this smaller area of sensation. There's absolutely no problem with working in a more confined space.

You can alternate between these approaches, or you could try the alternating method first and then see if the pīti spreads afterward. The sequence doesn't really matter—follow what feels natural to you in the moment.

Does this make enough sense? I wanted to offer these possibilities because I suspect this will be relevant for some of you right now in your practice.

So that brings us to the end of part one of tonight's instructions. We've covered the fundamental approaches to working with pīti: the probing attention that investigates and plays with the energy, and the sunbathing attention that simply receives and allows. We've also touched on the possibility of encouraging the pīti to spread, though without any pressure or expectation.

These are the basic tools. In the remaining parts, we'll explore how to deepen and refine this work, how to navigate challenges that might arise, and how to integrate these experiences into the broader path of awakening. But for now, you have enough to begin this beautiful exploration of pīti as a doorway into deeper states of consciousness.

CHAPTER 204

Developing Pīti, Developing Focus, Developing Wellbeing

Rob Burbea · 1h28

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Rob Burbea examines the cultivation of pīti (rapture) as central to the first jhāna. He outlines two primary approaches: concentrated attention on a single object like the breath, and direct work with the energy body to coax and develop well-being. Burbea defines pīti as pleasant feeling felt physically but whose origin is non-sensual, manifesting in various ways from subtle warmth to waves of bliss.
> The talk addresses practical challenges including working with bodily constrictions, spreading pīti throughout the body, and handling overly intense experiences. Burbea emphasizes that pīti is fundamentally a way of perceiving the body—a "perception attainment" that demonstrates the malleability of experience. He discusses the relationship between the five factors of the first jhāna (vitakka, vicāra, ekaggatā, pīti, and sukha), showing how practitioners can work both forward through concentration and backward from available pleasant states.
> Crucially, Burbea frames jhāna practice as training in the flexibility of perception, which mirrors the awakened understanding of emptiness. This approach challenges common misconceptions about equanimity being the ultimate goal, instead pointing toward the liberating recognition that all perceptions are fabricated and therefore malleable through skilled attention and view.

What I want to talk about now is pīti. Broadly speaking, we could say there are two approaches or two avenues by which a practitioner works and plays so that eventually pīti arises. These two are not so black and white—the distinction between them is not so clear-cut, and neither are they mutually exclusive. A person usually has predominantly one way or predominantly another.

The first approach involves working with the energy body and finding and encouraging any sense of wellbeing in the energy body space. As I said, coaxing it, tending to it. If it's an ember and I'm trying to get a campfire going, what do I need to do to nurture this ember? What do I need to put around it? Do I need to blow on it? Do I need to shelter it from the wind? Whatever it is, what do I need to do to get this ember to turn into a fire, a campfire? In a way, what we're starting with is the energy body experience, and in any way I can, I get that experience and massage it, support it, shape it, encourage it, ignite it to move towards more and more pleasantness until there's pīti.

The second way is to choose something—choose an object—and just concentrate repeatedly on that object. If the concentration gets more steady and the energy accumulates there, then at some point pīti evolves in the experience, in the energy body.

What is pīti? I define it as pleasant feeling that's felt physically, but whose origin is non-sensual. For a meditator, this can come up in all kinds of ways. There are all kinds of flavors and manifestations of pīti. The whole body can feel like it's tingling, or parts of the body can feel like tingling. It can actually feel like an orgasm—some people say it feels just like that. It can feel like something much more subtle, like a kind of pleasant warmth or a pleasant lightness, as if one's almost floating. It can feel like waves of pleasant bliss or rapture or ecstasy going through the body. There are many, many manifestations it can have.

One of the interesting things about how pīti manifests is that it evolves over time, and it evolves in a couple of ways. One way is that as you get into, let's say, the third jhāna, the repeated experience of the third jhāna affects the way pīti comes up for you from then on. The third jhāna is very peaceful, incredibly beautifully serene and tranquil. It's almost like that does something to the whole energy body, or it does something to the whole citta. Thereafter, usually, a person's pīti is much calmer than it might have been in the beginning. So there's a kind of retroactive effect that deeper jhānas can have on the experience of the first jhāna, which is characterized by pīti.

What can also happen—and it's very individual—is this: one's meditating, let's say concentrating on the upper lip at the tip of the nose, concentrating, concentrating. Then I notice at times when concentration seems to develop, I notice what are almost like lightning bolts through the body of extreme pleasure. But it's gone—gone in two seconds or a second. Or it might be like a wave of bliss or ecstasy, or just a wave of pleasant feeling washing through the body. But again, it's gone in a couple of seconds.

This is, in a way, good. It's pīti. It's definitely pīti. It's great. Things are happening. Wonderful. When that happens, open to it, enjoy it. If you're still really working with the object and you're not ready to leave the main object, then you still stay with—if I follow my example—the breath. This pleasant experience remains in your background awareness. You're certainly opening to it and enjoying it, but you're not going, "Oh, let's focus on that." It's not ready yet.

It's not steady enough. It's just a passing thing. What we want, and what might happen from the beginning or might happen more with time, is a more steady pīti—something that's around for at least two or three minutes without disappearing. Once it's steady, and if you're sure this is definitely pleasant, then you're ready to work with it. I'll talk more about how to work with it as this retreat progresses, building on what we covered yesterday.

So we need to wait until it's relatively steady, temporarily steady. We want it to be steady, but actually, to be really clear, we want pīti and sukha. I remember, countless times over the years in interviews here, someone has come in and, in the course of whatever we were talking about during their retreat, reported that they were practicing—usually in Asia somewhere—and had experienced pīti and sukha, which means happiness from meditation. They reported it in the interview and were asked if it was pleasant and if they enjoyed it, and they said yes. Then they were actually shamed for having it.

The teacher, from what they told me, was quite severe, and somehow they felt shamed and quite hurt and traumatized by that interaction years later. Something in their practice and their whole relationship with practice had gotten quite twisted because of that. There was often, and this might be quite surprising, quite a lot of grief around it. Something that had touched their being quite deeply, that they were open about sharing—a lovely thing, not just difficult dukkha—was dismissed, and they ended up feeling ashamed about it.

So just to be really clear: we want pīti, we want sukha. It's a good thing.

How does it arise? How can we think of its arising? One way we can think of it is through two broad approaches.

If we're thinking about concentration—keeping the mind steady on the upper lip, the lower nostrils, and so on—as the mind keeps staying there, what's not happening is the mind squandering and dissipating energy through thought, through distraction. The mind is collecting its energy. In electronics, there's something called a capacitor—an electronic component that gathers electric charge. One way you can think about what pīti is, from the concentration point of view, is that you're simply not squandering energy. You're not dissipating it, and it begins to gather.

But it's not just nailing your mind to an object. You're also going to need the refinement, the subtilizing of the object if you're using the concentration approach. So pīti won't arise just from staring at something. It also needs this quality of attention and the subtlety of the object and attention in order for pīti to arise through the concentration route.

Pīti can also arise just from gathering energy, as in practices like qigong. You're actually gathering energy, and the qi and the pīti are very close—they're very close. Are they separate? Are they different things? Are they not different things? I'd say it's on a spectrum. As we gather the qi and begin to feel it more positively, we can call it pīti. It becomes pīti.

With insight ways of looking, there's a letting go, a release of clinging, and in that release, we fabricate less. There's less fabrication of the bodily perception.

Samādhi—I'll come back to this; it's such an important point that I'm going to return to as the retreat goes on. What samādhi really is, or perhaps the most fruitful, most helpful way of conceiving what samādhi is: as we deepen in samādhi, there is less fabrication of perception, less fabrication of self, less fabrication of dukkha definitely, less fabrication of self, less fabrication of bodily perception, and less fabrication of any perception at all. That's what the whole spectrum of the jhānas is—you can understand it in one framework. And that's the most important way of understanding it. This way of understanding will unlock all kinds of other doors in terms of the whole of Dharma practice and liberation.

So how does pīti arise? It arises through insight, through ways of looking that let go of clinging, therefore fabricating less, therefore less fabrication of body. Pīti—perceiving the body as pīti—is a less fabricated perception of the body. Or we could say another way is through the energy body, working with the energy body to shape it, to fabricate it so that there's pleasure and pīti there. Or, as I said before, it's just an openness of being, an openness of heart, and that allows pīti to flow. It's like pīti wants to be there, wants to come, and it's just the openness.

Once it's there, then we have work and play to do: I need to consolidate this, stabilize it, and absorb into it so that it can become the first jhāna—if pīti is what we're talking about, as opposed to happiness or something else that's central to other jhānas.

It's interesting—and none of this is again without exceptions—but it tends to be the case that when I'm using the concentration method and PT comes, it tends to erupt very suddenly and quite intensely. I'm concentrating, concentrating, and okay, I can definitely feel like I'm in a deeper state of concentration. But when the PT comes, it kind of bursts through into the body, into consciousness. Or one might even find oneself already in a jhāna with everything there, not just the PT.

The other way—working with what I described as this ember that we try to kindle like a fire, working with the energy body—that tends to be, though not always, more gradual. The PT builds more steadily. So there's a more gradual movement into the full PT experience.

How many people have heard the term "access concentration"? Quite a lot of you. I don't use that term myself. The Buddha never used it—it's not a phrase the Buddha ever used. It comes, I think, from the Visuddhimagga, which is a commentarial text from about five hundred years after the Buddha, a text we may or may not come back to. I don't tend to use it because the Buddha never used it.

What does it mean? Well, it's kind of like when you can feel sometimes, if you're concentrating—let's say on the breath—there's a sort of quantum shift where you just feel like, "Oh, now the mind is really settled and really getting to settle on its object." Usually the breath is subtler at that point, for example. Usually things feel more harmonized. So you're not in jhāna yet—there's probably no pīti if you're using the concentration method—but it's just a kind of marking point of "Yeah, okay, we've settled a little bit."

You can use it if you like. I don't tend to find it that helpful really, but it's fine. Sometimes I think it's more the case that each jhāna has its own particular access concentration once you do a lot of jhāna practice, but it really doesn't matter. If it's helpful for you in terms of getting a sense of where you're at, go for it. But I don't tend to use it. It doesn't matter. I'm happy to talk about it with you though.

With the breath at one point, if it's that method, there can be these kind of quantum shifts at different points. So for example, I think I mentioned it already—let's say again, just to follow my example, the breath at the nose, at the upper lip. At some point, as it starts to go well, that area starts to feel larger and begins to feel like it's actually about the size of my whole head, or about the size of my whole body. This is a good development. This is a good thing. And that movement there is part of—it's on its way. It's, let's say, part of or an element of the whole movement towards whole-body PT, or paralleling that, or something like that.

Another analogy you could use instead of the capacitor analogy is like when you hold a magnifying glass and catch the sun's rays, focusing them on some dry leaves or something—it's going to make those leaves ignite, right? It's gathering the energy of the mind. That's a way we can think of it. It's gathering the energy of the mind until it ignites in PT.

But as I said, it needs not just that—it needs part of the gathering, part of the energizing to be the quality of the attention, more important than the quantity. We've talked about this now three times. Quality more important than quantity. Quantity is still important, but secondary. And quality, as we've already said, includes lots of different factors.

Andy asked a question yesterday. I want to see—I think I lost the piece of paper—but let me see if I answer it now in the flow of what I'm saying. And if not, we can come back to it.

So I talked about subtilizing—the sort of encouraging of making things subtle or allowing things to get subtle. When we're talking about concentration at one point, then the object—in this case the breath sensations at that one point—needs to get, or will get as part of the deepening concentration, more and more subtle. The attention needs to become correspondingly subtle. If I can even encourage all that to become more and more subtle, that's great. I certainly need to encourage the attention to get more and more subtle. So the object itself becomes more subtle and the attention becomes more subtle. I encourage that.

If I'm going by the other way—the sort of coaxing of the whole energy body experience gradually—then my experience of the different frequencies in the energy body will maybe include both subtle and gross frequencies. We want to be open to all of that. I want to be sensitive to both subtle and gross experiences.

But the experience of the energy body as a whole on its way to the first jhāna—unlike the experience of the breath which gets more and more subtle at one point—the experience of the energy body doesn't get more subtle on its way to the first jhāna. You're actually building more, so it's less subtle. You understand? There might be lots of different frequencies at first, but I'm actually building—it's getting less subtle. So don't confuse this.

However, as you go through all the jhānas, there is, as I said, a spectrum of subtlety over eight jhānas. The third jhāna is way more subtle than the first. The second jhāna is actually more subtle than the first, the third jhāna is more subtle than the second, the fourth is more subtle, et cetera. It's a spectrum of increasing subtlety.

So as I said, the eighth jhana is almost unspeakably subtle, unspeakably refined. There are different kinds of ways this word "subtle" applies. Does that answer your question, Andy?

So let's stay with this idea of subtle just for a moment. Sometimes I remember very early in my practice, in a very different tradition, hearing about the subtle breath and thinking, "What's that? That sounds interesting."

Partly what it means is simply this subtilized breath—this breath that has become subtle through the calming, or that one encourages to become subtle. In the Anapanasati Sutta, the discourse on mindfulness of breathing, the first instruction is that the practitioner breathes long and knows they're breathing long, just as a turner—probably some kind of woodworker—turns something deliberately because someone is paying them to do that, and they know what they're doing.

This is oftentimes read passively, like "I know I'm doing a long one," as opposed to "No, now I need to do a long one, therefore I will do a long one, and I know I'm doing a long one." To me, it's more active: I will deliberately breathe long. Then the second instruction is I will deliberately breathe short. The shorter breath is already a calming, a subtilizing, generally speaking. So there's this natural movement toward the subtilizing of the breath, the calming of the breath, and the encouragement of that.

However, there's another possible meaning of this phrase "subtle breath." Sometimes you can notice that the breath can feel quite gross or stuck somewhere—you're sort of yanking it or heaving it to smooth through a constriction in the throat or something. Sometimes finding a way of breathing that's helpful and smooths it out is really beneficial, but sometimes, if I don't get too obsessed—and I'm using that word "obsessed" in a very subtle way, because we can get very subtly obsessed in meditation—then here's this breath that's actually a bit stuck somewhere, a bit rough, a bit gross, a bit uneven.

And actually, at the same time somehow, it's almost like there's another breath or another level of breath that's way more subtle and is already smooth—very, very subtle. But I need to be not so obsessed and a bit more spacious, a bit more receptive, my antennae a bit more receptive and subtle to even notice it.

I can sometimes find that breath and forget about the one that feels rough. It's almost like they're going on at the same time in some kind of way. As I concentrate on the subtler one, as I find it and attune to it—as we said yesterday, what happens when I attune to it? It amplifies it. It gets amplified. The other one just kind of fades away. I'm not worried about it anymore. It amplifies the subtle breath in my consciousness. That becomes what I'm concentrating on.

Again: sensitivity, receptivity, and opportunistic attunement. "Oh, there's something here that I hadn't realized." And then opportunistically, the door opens—let's just gently go with that. Find that. Go with that.

Sometimes this relates to another level of something I've already mentioned, which is in a way even more subtle and applies probably much more usually when you've already experienced quite a lot of jhanas. Again, the mind won't settle down. The energy body doesn't feel right. It's just not quite happening. But if I don't get too sucked into that problem—just spacious, gentle attunement—there's a level of the mind, let's call it, there's a dimension of the being, better to say, that's actually already peaceful, already imbued with a certain jhanic quality.

This is probably much more obvious once you're very familiar with that jhanic quality. The mind just won't settle down in this sitting or today or whatever it is, but with just a little spaciousness, opportunistically, my antennae are up and then there's something akin to the beginnings of the peace, the kind of peace that's characteristic of the third jhana. I'm just going to dive there. And in diving there, I attune to it, and in attuning to it, it amplifies, and the other stuff just kind of dissolves.

That becomes, that takes over my experience.

So this business of finding the second kind of subtle breath is akin to that. It's just the same thing at a different scale perhaps. And then we also mentioned that if you're going to use the imaginal poetic sense of the object, that that's really quite a subtle thing. It's really just a couple of drops of this magic essential oil or whatever it is that you're dropping in. Really quite subtle.

Okay, so there are two emphases, as I said, broadly speaking: concentration versus this kind of tending to, coaxing sensitivity to the energy body and developing that. Whichever way... how do I say this? At some point, whichever way you've gone into your jhāna or pīti or happiness or whatever it is, sometimes the emphasis is more needed—more concentration, more focus needed, more effort needed. For some people that's often the case: more effort, more concentration. For other people or other times, or even once pīti has arisen—and I'll go into this today and tomorrow—what do I need to do now that pīti has arisen? It might be more focus, more concentration, maybe on the original object, but then on the pīti itself. And that's what I'm doing.

Other times it's actually, as I said yesterday—don't underestimate the significance of this or the importance or how crucial it can be—other times the emphasis and the intention needs to be more on more surrender, more opening, more abandoning. So you can move emphasis, and you will, and I'll come back to this. It's not that you get locked into one emphasis, but what's needed right now. And then generally, as I said, as a practitioner, as a human being over time, what do I need? Sometimes, as I said yesterday, sometimes a person needs more focus, more focus, more focus. It's not what you need. You need a bit more of the other, or maybe really to experience that, to gently develop in opening, surrendering, abandoning. Through that there's the deepening, the sort of progression, the consolidating of all that through this balance, this play.

I don't know if you've noticed already on this retreat or other retreats, but if your intention is focus, concentration—if that's your emphasis and if that's your conceptual framework of what you're doing, if that's your view of what we're doing here, focusing, concentrating—that very intention or emphasis has obviously a lot of good results, but it also has some negative results. So when there's noise or some disturbance—birds or whoever it is, someone in the meditation hall—with that intention and that emphasis, it's much more likely that the noise creates aversion. Has anyone noticed this? The intention—intentions set up the flavor of perceptions. If that wasn't my intention, I would not have aversion at that point. The aversion scuppers the possibility of jhāna. It takes away the possibility of jhāna.

So that's quite interesting. It's not that one shouldn't practice that way. It's just something to know. If I'm practicing this way, or rather, more broadly speaking, if I have this intention, it will have these consequences on my perception. It will likely have these consequences, whatever that intention is. We could speak lots on that.

So it's not that one shouldn't, but one should realize, oh, that's going to be part of my territory if I'm going for the concentration thing. Is it a little less likely that there's aversion if one's going the other way with the whole body and the coaxing of the well-being? If that's the conceptual framework, if that's the intention, if that's the emphasis? Because then really, as we played earlier today, any approach is available. So here's aversion—we can just put into the energy body some mettā. Whereas if I go to mettā once I'm focusing on the breath, I'm actually doing a whole different practice. Or I can relax the aversion with an insight way of looking, different insight ways of looking. And the whole thing becomes much more workable. And with the subsidence of aversion, there is the arising of happiness. With the subsidence of aversion there is the arising of happiness.

So it's not to say choose this one or that one, but it's to be wise to causes and conditions. And intentions are causes and conditions and they have effects, all kinds of effects—effects that we don't often anticipate or realize.

So focus and concentration are really important. Another way of considering those terms or what's happening with samādhi is words like collectedness or integrity. Remember that—I think I said it yesterday—the meaning of samādhi originally in Sanskrit was, maybe it still had that meaning for hundreds of years later, but it was more like agreement and harmony. Samādhi as integrity, meaning the elements of my being are in agreement, in harmony. There's an integrity to my being and a collectedness of energy, mind and desire. A collectedness and integrity of energy, mind and desire.

Now when I put it like that, that to me has a lot more implications for my life and my work and my personality and how I am in relationship.

Countless people in our culture struggle with concentration—ADHD is supposedly epidemic, and mobile phones, screen time, too many WhatsApps and Facebooks certainly contribute to this fragmentation. But I know countless people who are perfectly capable of concentrating very well on their work, in relationship with someone, in a creative project. They've never spent ten seconds on meditation because they don't know the first thing about it.

When we conceive samadhi differently—as collectedness, integrity of energy, mind and desire—these qualities become broadly relevant to life, to how I'm living, how I manifest my personhood. When there's that collectedness, integrity of mind, energy, desire, body, there's power. I don't mean power over—I mean power. The being has power. The person has power.

You can sense it in a person. You can see it over their life. Does this person have soul power—the power you sense in them, the power they feel or don't even recognize? Is it growing? Is it lessening? These questions become much more relevant than "How can I keep my concentration on something?" which for most people, beyond a certain point of basic human ability to focus, is hardly relevant.

But collectedness, integrity, soul power—these are important things. Then you start to relate that to daily life: yes, that little bit of alcohol affects concentration temporarily, but more significantly, it affects something about my personhood and my capacity to really cohere and show up with soul power, with the integrity of my being—body, mind, energy, desire—as a habit of showing up coherently, with energy collected and integrity intact.

Or consider people who have the radio just on, or the TV on, consuming a lot of television or radio. It's doing something to your soul. That's far more significant than how concentrated you can be in meditation.

Think of samadhi in these broader ways. I've talked about wholeheartedness and how significant that is for my life, personhood, relationships, work, the service I want to do. When there's not this capacity and practice of being really wholehearted, really gathered like that, one dissipates energy, dissipates mind, dissipates one's being habitually, probably in very small ways.

Over time, you get a sense that something in the being has gotten flaccid. The very personality is different. There's something flabby and flaccid in the soul, in the being. Sometimes you can sense this in people—there's just not much sensitivity there.

From this perspective, focus and concentration take on different significance. If we think about collectedness, integrity—this is very, very significant for the being.

Let's return to the energy body way of working. What's extremely common—it will happen every day to some degree, many times a day—is that something in the energy body doesn't feel comfortable. There's some constriction or block somewhere that feels located in the energy body. This is a really normal part of human experience.

The energy body isn't static. It blocks, unblocks, constricts. Yes, we can have very habitual constrictions, but even without these, there's a coming and going of constriction in the energy body in different places.

In meditation, what do we do with this? The constriction, the blockage won't feel good—it's the opposite of pīti. One approach: don't forget to open up the awareness, stretch it over that whole body space, a little bigger than the anatomical body. When there's constriction or something we don't like, attention shrinks. Opening it out again does something. There's mutual dependence here—constriction somewhere actually shrinks the awareness. Opening up the awareness can sometimes open up the constriction. That's the first thing.

Second: if you're working with the energy body through the breath, imagine the breath energy going right through, flowing smoothly right through that constriction. Just imagine that.

Or imagine a current of energy just flowing right through. So it could be with the breath, could be not with the breath. Use your imagination. It might want to flow through that. Let's say the constriction is in my throat. It might want to flow through the throat and up out the top of my head, or right down through the bottom of my body. Does it want to flow up? Does it want to flow down? Feel what feels like it's helpful.

Again, you're just using the imagination to shape, to fabricate, to open the energy body experience. Let's say I have a constriction in my throat. I can imagine the breath coming in and out, not from the mouth and the nose, but coming in and out directly from the throat or the back of the throat, the back of the neck. And I just imagine that. Does that help? Maybe it wants to go out the sides this way. That imagination can unlock something.

If you're practicing metta and you've got this constriction in the throat or anywhere where there's a constriction, what if you play with imagining the very place where there's the constriction as the center of the radiation of the metta? The metta is radiating from the last place you would think of, because it feels the worst and the tightest and the least like love. But just imagine it's coming from there and see what that does.

Another possibility—let's say, for example, I feel a constriction in my mid-belly somewhere. Let's say I feel a constriction around my heart, but my lower belly feels actually quite nice, or has some well-being there, or the other way around—doesn't matter. There's a place where it feels good, relatively good, and there's a place where it doesn't feel good. One of the things you can do is just imagine those places as connected. There's some kind of energy tube or something that just connects them. I'm not moving anything around. I'm not yanking. I'm just connecting them in my imagination—the place that feels good and the place that doesn't feel so good. And just see what happens. I'm just connecting two places in my imagination very, very lightly.

There's also the possibility of bringing an insight way of looking that you are already familiar with and looking at that very sense of constriction, that very sense of blockage, with that insight way of looking. In the context of samatha practice, jhana practice, maybe that's—unless the insight way of looking is your primary way of working—maybe that would be a kind of last resort. But those are extremely powerful practices. And so to look at this blockage that way, through that lens of that way of looking, will basically dissolve it, as long as you're not pushing it too much with "come on, dissolve, dissolve, dissolve."

Another thing to say, which is really important in the context of jhana and samatha practice, is: okay, here's this constriction, here's this block. I don't always have to focus on it. I can work to keep my attention where it's pleasant, where it feels pleasant, where there's pīti perhaps, or where it even feels just okay.

This is crucial. The tendency will be to get dragged into—either get dragged into where there's a difficult feeling, constriction or blockage, or to get dragged completely outside and start daydreaming. But if I can keep my attention—let's say in that example, my belly feels good and my heart area doesn't—keep it in the belly. Don't get sucked into the difficult area. Or my knees are aching—don't get sucked into that. Just stay with where it's pleasant and focus there and enjoy that.

When I say "where," that might be a bodily location. It might be that the body has dissolved a bit and it's just a kind of spatial location—somewhere around there in space. But it also might be—I don't know if "where" is obviously the right word—but it also might be a frequency. This is similar to what I said before. Here's this discomfort, here's this constriction, this blockage. In energetic terms, it's a certain kind of frequency. Can I find another frequency that's not so much a spatial location as a kind of mental location, and then get into that, find it, dive underneath, get into that? Again, with more experience of different frequencies, certainly with more jhana experience, that becomes just a more and more common possibility. It's much more accessible.

Most insight meditators, most vipassana meditators, are trained either deliberately or just by default that when there's something difficult in the body, when there's dukkha, when there's constriction, when something doesn't feel good, when there's a contraction, the attention goes there. And we're encouraged to do that mostly in the way we teach insight meditation. It can become a kind of default: well, that's what we do. As soon as something's difficult, that's where the mind goes. It's not even a choice I make.

One realizes, oh, it's just a habit. I pay attention to what's difficult, where there's constriction, where there's contraction, where there's dukkha. It might also be the case that insight meditation attracts certain psychological types and inclinations. It might be, but it's also a kind of training that happens both directly and indirectly.

The willingness to do that—the willingness to go where it's difficult and to feel it and to open to it and to work with it—this is invaluable. It's such a precious thing. But willingness is not enough. I need to also recognize that the kind of mindfulness I bring matters. Because I can bring an attention there, I can bring a kind of mindfulness there, and it just makes it worse. I'm being a good meditator and I'm having the willingness, which is great, and a good intention, but my mindfulness has just a bit of aversion in it and it's making it worse. Or I can be with it in a way that just doesn't do anything to it. Or I can be with it where the attention, the mindfulness, has skillful qualities in it.

Mindfulness is never one thing. There's no such thing as pure mindfulness. Mindfulness always has views, conceptions, some kind of relationship with the object—a little bit of aversion, a lot of aversion, a little bit of greed. If we're talking really, really subtle, there's no such thing as pure mindfulness. What makes or breaks, what determines what happens, is what's with the mindfulness.

So it's great that we're willing to do that as insight meditators. We're all practiced in that, hopefully. Great that we're willing, but it also really matters: can I have the skill to bring what's actually a helpful mindfulness there, a helpful attention?

So that's all great. But now we also want—as I said to you, what we want is range. Range, range, range. Choice, freedom of choice. So sure, I can go where it's difficult. I'm willing to do that. I'm not afraid to do that. If it's a very little bit difficult, if it's difficult in this way or that way, if it's really, really difficult, I'm willing to go there. I'm able to work with it as time goes on and I get more practice. I'm able to work with it all kinds of ways, lots of ways.

But also I'm willing and able not to go there. I put the mind here where it's pleasant. I won't go there. I'm training the mind to stay with the pleasant. So when we open up to jhana practice, this actually becomes quite an important skill and quite something that one's working against the grain if one has done a lot of insight practice.

With training, we can have much more range and much more freedom of choice about what we do in regard to the difficulty. Remember when I first taught this here twelve, thirteen years ago—a summer retreat—and there were people that said, "But that's not proper meditation. That's not proper meditation. The best meditation is to be with what is. And so if it hurts, then I need to be with what is. And even if it doesn't hurt here, somehow the hurt is more what is than the place that doesn't hurt."

But despite that, or as well as that, again we have to ask about ontology, about reality here. Is it really what is? What am I believing about what is? Or is it a fabricated perception? The answer is yes. And I have to understand that not just intellectually—I have to actually get in there and work with things and play with things until I know in my heart, deep down in my mind, in my life, I know this is a fabricated perception and I know how to fabricate it differently. At least at times I have that capacity.

So we want to train to open up that range. And we want to understand there's so much about the nature of reality that's involved in all this jhana work. What does that have to do with insight? It has everything to do with insight. Is it really as real as you think it is? What is real? What is reality?

These are fundamentally important questions, and we get locked into certain views—sometimes views that emerge from our very Dharma listening and training and thinking.

So there will be times of discomfort and pain. As we said at the beginning of the retreat, you really want to not go there too much. I'll talk more about this tomorrow, in fact. But it's also possible to deliberately perceive the unpleasant as pleasant. Here's this pain in my knee, sitting in meditation, and I can deliberately play with the perception.

There's that key phrase: play with perception.

I can play with perception and perceive the unpleasant as pleasant. I might perceive this pain in the knee as pīti, with training. That's totally possible. I decide to perceive it as happiness. So the texture of my knee becomes happiness. My knee becomes happiness. I decide to see it with training as stillness, as a luminous stillness. My knee becomes—the pain has gone, the knee has gone, and what is there is a luminous, beautiful stillness.

Training, training through playing with perception.

So one way of doing that is you just spread the pīti and the pīti spreads over the difficult area—there's one option. Another is this more direct way where I'm actually looking at something and because I have enough familiarity with pīti and because I'm not locked into a view of the reality of this thing as "it's a painful knee." So there's familiarity with pīti and there's the absence of a locked-in view about reality, and then one just sees it as pīti and one therefore experiences it as pīti or happiness or stillness or whatever.

What did the Buddha say? Perception attainments. The jhānas are perception attainments.

What's the best way of thinking about this? Playing with perception. We're playing with perception. This is, as I said already, way more significant than the whole question of, "Is this a jhāna or is this not a jhāna? Did I achieve the third jhāna or the third jhāna?" So-and-so defines it. And that seems so relevant and so important...

What I'm just talking about now, this ability—not just the ability, the possibility, the recognition and the experience of the possibility of doing this with, for example, a pain in the knee—that's way more significant than whether I have achieved correctly the first jhāna or the third jhāna. It's way more significant.

Magic. We use that word: magic.

So this whole business about the question of reality, about emptiness—which has to do with what is the reality of things—about ways of looking, about fabrication, about perception. Again, that's the key word: about playing with perception. This is absolutely fundamental to liberating insight. It's fundamental to the whole Dharma. It's fundamental to liberating insight. And it's way more important, as I said, than third jhāna, fourth—you know, whatever it is. Did I get it? Did I not?

So, pīti arises, and the Buddha says, don't snatch at it, and don't snatch at the first jhāna. So what does that mean? I've already said it in the insight ways of looking. Here it's arising, however it's arising, and I'm just letting it arise. And if I've got another object, like the nose sensations that I'm concentrating on, I'm just letting it arise, kind of at the side of my awareness. I'm aware that it's arising, because I've got that whole body background, right? I'm aware it's arising. Part of me is enjoying it and opening to it, but I'm still focused on my one thing. And then when it's ready—it means when it's kind of strong enough that it's definitely pleasant, let's just say that. But when it's sustained enough, then very gently, as described with insight ways of looking, very gently I can make that my primary object: the pīti.

And then we go back to what I said yesterday, these modes of attention where I really nuzzle into it, really go penetrate into it or really, really open myself to it, for example.

And I also said yesterday, so another job that we have to do, another work or play mission that we have to do is spreading the pīti. As the Buddha said in the first jhāna, it's spread. No spot of the body untouched, completely suffused, saturated, etc.

So how do we get it to spread? I mean, sometimes it will be spread already and that's great and then you don't have to do anything. But let me run through a list of possibilities.

One approach is when the pīti is localized—perhaps just in my face or head region—awareness sometimes actually shrinks because the pīti can be quite captivating. To help it spread, simply open up the awareness again, expanding it to encompass the whole energy body. Just this opening of attention to the whole energy body naturally allows the pīti to spread, like gas filling a space. Think of it like expanding a balloon—when you make the balloon of attention bigger, the gas will naturally fill that larger space.

Another possibility is mixing the breath with the pīti. You can imagine and begin to feel like you're breathing pīti, or that the breath energy is massaging and moving the pīti through the body. When you breathe in through the heart center, for instance, these currents of energy flow down through your body. The breath can massage the pīti through the rest of the body if it's concentrated just around your chest or elsewhere. This is all very playful and experimental—mixing the breath with pīti or getting the breath energy to help move the pīti to different places in the body.

Thirdly, you can simply imagine that it's spread. The power of imagination can be quite amazing. Just imagine the pīti filling the whole body, and you might find that this becomes your actual experience. Feel it and enjoy it.

You can also imagine the pīti mixed with white golden light, as if the pīti is white golden light itself. You can both feel it and see it. Imagine that white golden light filling the whole energy body space, and as you visualize this, it brings the pīti with it.

Another approach involves connecting different areas. If the pīti is around your face, head and throat—which is very common—but you don't feel anything in your belly, simply maintain awareness of both places: where there is pīti and where there isn't. Connect them with an imaginary tube. You're not forcing anything or imagining movement, just putting two places in the body space in connection with each other. See what happens.

Moving lightly and playfully between those two modes of attention—the penetrating narrow focus and the more receptive openness—might itself work the pīti and allow it to spread through the body space. This relatively slow movement between attention modes can be quite effective.

Eventually, every time you experience pīti, it becomes automatically spread throughout the whole body. There's so much in jhāna practice about the citta and the bodily experience simply getting used to something until it becomes completely normal. After a while, every time you have pīti, it's just automatic—never confined to one place, but always spread. While there are exceptions, this tends to become quite common.

Finally, sometimes the pīti simply won't spread despite all these approaches. Don't worry about it. Just enjoy it where it is and fully engage with it there. If it's just around your throat and head, and you've tried these various methods without success, simply get into it and enjoy it. Don't trouble yourself about it. This is actually really important.

Also, don't become overly concerned with the Buddha's description of "not one spot of the body" untouched. You don't need to mentally check each body part—"How's my little toe on the left side?" You don't need to get so consumed with anatomical precision. It's really more about sensing this whole space. Even if you still have a sense of separate toes, that doesn't matter, but you certainly don't have to. It's more like sensing the whole energy body space and allowing or gently encouraging the pīti to fill that entire space through these different approaches.

There is a movement in jhana anyway for the kind of dissolving of the form of the body. Now, people are different. For some people it happens—maybe this is, I'm not sure, percentage-wise—but for me, certainly it happens in the first jhana. That's part of the characteristic of the first jhana, that the sense of the body just becomes a bit like what we said in those little games we played. It just becomes a sort of amorphous body of white light filled with piti. There's not such a sense of, "I could kind of find my toes and all the rest of it in there," but people are different though.

But anyway, there's a movement towards the dissolving of the bodily form, which means we don't have to worry too much about whether the piti is in my foot or whatever like that. It's more just a sense of, yes, it's really filling this whole space, this whole experience, the experience of the body.

Again, back to this perception thing. Really, one way of conceiving what happens in the jhanas is: in the first jhana, the bodily experience, the bodily perception becomes piti. My experience of my body is a body of piti, is a space of piti. In the second jhana, the body becomes sukha. The first four jhanas are called rupa jhanas, which means form or body jhanas. The body becomes happiness. And if you're still working with the breath, which is in a way an element of the body, the breath becomes happiness—breathing happiness into a body of happiness. In the third jhana, it becomes this kind of peacefulness. In the fourth, this kind of luminous stillness, and so on.

So the energetic space, the energy body space becomes that. The body becomes that. So there's a gradual—at some point, it's different—there's a gradual dissolving of the detailed sense of the form of the body. The body dissolves, we could say.

Okay, sometimes what happens for people—and again, individuals have a lot of different conditions and things over time—but sometimes what happens is there's too much, there feels like there's too much piti, or the piti feels too intense to bear. It's so strong or so pleasant.

There's one thing that's more important than anything else here: usually when that's the case, what needs to happen is more opening. It's the opposite. If I feel this is too much to bear, it's too strong, I can't handle this, then actually there's some contraction of the being, some aversion, some slight holding or pushing away, like I'm trying to push back the waters a little bit. It could be very, very subtle.

The thing, the primary thing we need to do when it feels or when you think this is too strong is: open. Open the space of the energy body, open to the flow of the piti. Oftentimes piti has a flow to it. Oftentimes it's an upward flow up the body. More opening, open even more, put your opening dial on eleven, one hundred and fifty percent—more opening, more surrender, more abandoning. It's the opposite of what you feel like doing when it feels like too much. You have to go to the counterintuitive energetic response.

Sometimes talking to people in interviews, piti can be a bit like—an analogy can be like water flowing down a mountainside, like making a river down a mountainside. And where it starts initially, sometimes it can be really fast, and then it encounters rocks as it goes down. And where it encounters rocks, you get all this whitewater, right? Rapids and froth and stuff.

Two things here. If I then put more rocks in the way, because I don't like it, because I don't want it to be quite so intense, what am I going to get? I mean, unless I actually put a dam there, but let's say you can't, and you just put some more rocks—what am I going to get? I'm getting more whitewater, right? I'm going to get more froth. I need to do the opposite. I don't put rocks—I open, surrender, abandon. Really like, okay, how much can I really open my body? It's almost like just opening up the chest, opening up, just completely letting it flow through.

And oftentimes it wants to flow right through, right up out the top of the head. Just open, open, open. There's usually at that point a subtle, or sometimes not so subtle, some degree of aversion and contraction, and that's causing the problem.

What it's also doing is slowing down the progress of this river, because this mountain river, as it goes down the mountain, as it winds its way, it's naturally going to find its way to calmer waters. As piti evolves—I've already said this in a way indirectly—as piti evolves, it naturally gets calmer.

So there are phases of practice when it just feels like this really is a bit much. It's too intense. But it's on its way. It's just a phase. What we want is: okay, well, how can I just help that phase do its thing? Aversion, contraction is not helping it do its thing. It's the opposite. I need to open, open, let it flow.

You might have to put up with what feels super intense. Again, someone else would give their right and left arms for this kind of level of pleasure. But that's why we have to open, open, open. Then it can just go through its process and naturally calm down.

Sometimes even the very opening in that moment makes it actually feel better, because the contraction is what starts to make us wonder, "I'm not even sure this is pleasant anymore." It's partly the aversion that's coloring the experience. So open, surrender, abandon. Really, what does it mean to do that? Find ways to embody this letting go.

And then look—find the pleasure in it, find the pleasure in it, find the pleasure in it. So two things: open, abandon, surrender, and find the pleasure. This will usually take care of it. It should help in that moment, absolutely, and it should also help the process unfold more freely without getting stuck in a particular place.

Sometimes a person finds that either the pīti is so strong that they're thinking, "I'm not sure it's actually pleasant," or it's not quite strong enough. When someone says, "I'm not sure it's pleasant," again we can play with perception. You can actually just decide to see it as pleasant. Just decide to see it as pleasant. Play with that perception.

We're back to this idea of malleability again, of playing with perception. In samādhi, in jhāna, the whole system becomes so sensitive, so responsive to these micro-shifts in ways of looking, in view, in effort levels.

Sometimes again, pīti is very strong, perhaps even over several days, or sukha, happiness, is strong. And the person might wonder: "Should I move the body? There's so much energy. Should I move it somehow? Should I dance? I just feel like dancing. There's joy and there's pīti and I want to dance."

The question is: Should I do that? Or when there's a lot of sukha and they find themselves just laughing and laughing and laughing out loud—should I not dance and not laugh so much and actually let something gather?

Generally speaking, I would probably lean toward no, let it gather. Let it gather. Because again, going back to what I said earlier, most of us as human beings actually haven't really allowed energy to gather, haven't really allowed happiness to gather. We don't know what it is to have the energy body filled this way with happiness and allow that to gather and intensify and do its alchemical work.

However, sometimes it is really helpful for someone to dance or move, for a number of reasons. Sometimes if you look at their life and their character, there's actually a habit of holding the body. The body's a little rigid or there's a certain inhibition around movement. Or regarding laughing, there's a person who actually doesn't laugh much. You'll never find them giggling. Something might be funny and they'll respond a little bit, but they don't really give themselves to laughter.

Why is that? Maybe sometimes it's a slight emotional holding, a personality thing. There's a slight rigidity or lack of fluidity. And so sometimes for a person, even if it's not the greatest weather, they need to go out into the fields and dance in the rain—if it needs to move wild, do that.

The danger, though, is that we squander the energy that's building. We squander the pīti and we squander the happiness that's building, and then it can never really mature into jhāna. So it can be a tricky question, but you can experiment with both if you feel this is relevant. For many people, it won't be relevant.

In the analogy I used before, if the capacitor doesn't gather enough energy, it never really allows you to access jhāna. We want to learn to allow and tolerate these energies to expand, to flow, to fill the being and do their work inside.

Again, staying with the theme of sometimes really strong pīti—what can happen for some people, a minority, is that the pīti becomes very strong or the energy gets very strong and the physical body starts shaking, tremoring, jerking, or moving involuntarily. This is quite an important point.

Now, some people hold the view, "Oh, that's catharsis, you're releasing something," and so on. Speaking as someone who got trapped in all that for quite some years, I feel this is really important. It's crucial to have the right view here and the right approach.

When the energy is properly allowed to move without encountering blocks or constrictions, then the physical body does not need to move so much or at all. This energy might want to fly upward, sideways, or in any direction - whatever feels right. What does it want to do? Simply let it do that. Imagine it doing what it wants to do, and it will naturally follow that movement. When the inner energy flows freely, the physical body doesn't need to compensate with outer movement.

Often this kind of physical agitation happens when there's even slight over-efforting. It's certainly more likely to occur if there's too much force applied. For certain energy body types, over-effort is quite likely to trigger these movements, while other people have different constitutions and can exert considerable effort without experiencing anything similar. But with particular types, as I mentioned, slight over-efforting can have massive impacts.

This slight over-efforting can create subtle effects in meditation - all kinds of delicate influences - but it can also produce quite dramatic manifestations. Sometimes this whole phenomenon of involuntary movement isn't catharsis or purification at all; it's simply that the effort is excessive. Nothing is being cleansed or released. The effort is too much and creates too much energetic pressure on the entire system, creating these effects.

What does this imply? Perhaps I need to experiment with the intensity. What does it mean to ease back on the intensity pedal? What does it mean to be slightly less tight in my approach, or to allow my energy body to be less constricted in meditation? This might involve cultivating a slightly more spacious attention, moving into a more receptive mode rather than a probing one. All these adjustments affect the quality of effort and involve subtly reducing the force applied.

And they will have an effect on all that shaking business.

Sometimes someone who's done a lot of insight meditation may have experienced other states of deep equanimity or vastness of awareness and then comes to jhana practice. They hear about piti and first jhana and second jhana with all this bubbly happiness and kind of think, "Well, why should I bother with piti? If equanimity is possible, as I know equanimity, why should I bother with piti?" They might think, "Well, equanimity is the point of practice, right? Why would I bother with piti and with sukha, the first or second jhana or whatever, because equanimity is where we're going."

Equanimity is not the goal. It's absolutely not the goal, nor should equanimity be mistaken for awakening. It's really, really important. Equanimity is not the goal. It's an important part of the mix of the range of what's available to a being, but it's not the goal and certainly not equivalent to awakening. Awakening does not equate to equanimity.

Awakening is, if we want to sum it up, realizing emptiness—realizing the emptiness of everything. And the implication from that is that we can then look at things in very different ways. Why? Because a thing is empty of existing independently of the way the mind looks at it. Therefore, one realizes that, and it liberates the possibility of a whole flexibility of ways of looking, which one can also train in and develop—that playing. You can play all these different ways, play all these perceptions. That's what awakening is. Awakening is not equanimity.

Therefore, practicing the malleability of the mind, the malleability of mind state, the malleability of perception, playing with perception—when we're doing that, we're actually practicing a path that resembles the goal, that resembles what awakening is. Because an awakened person knows the emptiness of absolutely everything, and all they're left with—and they know—all there is, is the possibility and the flexibility of different ways of looking. So by practicing that, you're actually practicing a way of conceiving of the path and practicing the path that looks like what awakening looks like, as opposed to just trying to practice equanimity—trying to be equanimous in relation to everything all the time. That's not what awakening is. And that's not even a healthy psychology, I would say.

There are also some who say, "Why should I bother with piti? Why should I bother with sukha?" Sometimes there are psychological tendencies, patterns, habits. Piti and sukha are quite—in a way they're agitating. In a way they're disturbing. They're not that peaceful. They open up things. They're exciting. They move around and they do stuff. Sometimes it's not even a particular dharma thought or one uses a dharma thought, but the reason one's using it is just because one's psychology doesn't want to be disturbed. "I just want everything to be calm. I want the emotions to be controlled and within a certain limit. I want to either present or feel only a certain range." And that can become—or it can be—a habit or a pattern. That's all that my being knows. It's all my being allows is that range. And therefore all this kind of welling up of stuff—don't like it.

What's actually going on there? We can conceive piti as energy, so that when the energy body is unblocked—either through just the openness of heart, the openness of being, or when the energy body is unblocked because of the insight way of looking that is releasing clinging, and clinging causes contraction. So with the release of clinging, there's a release of contraction. So the energy body is naturally unblocked. When the energy body is unblocked, then naturally a human energy body system—because when it's unblocked—will naturally experience a pleasant flow of energy. We'll naturally experience piti.

So we can also conceive of piti as energy in the sense that, in a concentration mode, I'm not dissipating energy through distraction. The mind is not going here and there, thinking about this or that, getting caught up in this and that, this sound, that sound. Therefore the energy naturally gathers, like an electronic capacitor.

So we can conceive of piti as energy, but as I've said several times now, a better, more fruitful, truer, much more helpful way—and a way that's much more integrated with the rest of the Dharma—is to conceive of piti as a way of perceiving the body. It's not energy really. It's not to do with unblocking your chakras or energy channels. It's not to do with gathering energy. Piti is a way of perceiving the body. It's a perception of body. It's a perceptual skill. It's a perception attainment, as the Buddha might say. It's a magician's art. Piti is a way of perceiving the body.

Again, you may or may not quite realize just how significant this is, but I want to at least plant the seeds.

Last couple of things. Piti is central to the first jhana. It's the most important factor in the first jhana. The first jhana has five factors—I'm going to talk about this tomorrow. The first jhana has five factors: vitakka vicara, which when I read through the Buddha's list, I translated as thinking. We'll come back to that; it's a slightly controversial translation. But anyway, it has five factors: vitakka vicara—some of you have probably heard "initial and sustained application"—ekagata, a kind of one-pointedness (also a misleading translation), and the two other factors, piti and sukha. Piti we've talked about, and sukha means happiness. Those are the five factors of the first jhana.

Usually these are conceived, either consciously or unconsciously, with a causal direction through them. In other words, you work at your vitakka and vicara, you work at your initial and sustained application to the meditation object. Over time you get one-pointed or absorbed, ekagata, and piti and sukha arise as a result. So there's a movement from concentration factors to the arising of piti and sukha.

That's great. Sometimes we can work backwards. Here are these five factors—what's available right now? Sometimes people say, "Every time I think of this person, happiness arises." It's one of the factors of the first jhana. It's not even the primary factor—piti is the primary factor. But every time I think of this person, happiness arises. If you're skillful, if you don't snatch at it, you just linger with the happiness, and lo and behold piti is right there with it. Then you don't snatch at that, and the piti builds.

There are five factors. What's available? I can go in starting on any one really. I'm working backwards. This principle of working backwards—where am I trying to get to rather than deciding in advance what needs to be emphasized and therefore what's relevant? Which factor do I emphasize right now as a way into the first jhana? I can conceive forwardly in terms of causal connections there, or I can conceive backwards. I've got five factors. Let's see which of those I can access, ignite a little bit, stimulate, and from that, the rest of the five factors ignite.

In a way, working with the whole energy body from the beginning is an example of working backwards to a certain extent, because all four of the first four jhanas—what's called the rupa jhanas, rupa means body or form—all four of them involve, as we said with the Buddha's examples, leaving no spot of the body untouched by happiness or delight or pleasure, suffusing, saturating, drenching, steeping the whole body. All four of the first four jhanas involve the whole body, energy body awareness.

Each jhana simply carries a different flavor, a different predominant quality to that energy body awareness. When we begin with energy body awareness, we're also applying this backward-working principle—starting with the whole rather than a single point, since the practice will eventually encompass the whole anyway. Do you understand?

Let me return to something I mentioned at the very beginning: there are broadly speaking two approaches. Either you choose a small point, a specific object, and concentrate on it with intensity, delicacy, and directionality—essentially practicing steady focus on something stable—or you begin with the whole energy body and gather the pleasantness there.

But let me interject something important. Even if you're new to the second jhana, happiness is actually quite a subtle object. It can be intensely bubbly and energetic, but as things settle, it becomes quite refined and delicate. Even if your primary mode has been working with the energy body without thinking of it as concentration, you'll still need to practice concentration at times. Sometimes you'll need to learn how to remain steady and focused on this subtle object of happiness.

Your intention and emphasis will shift naturally. Sometimes you'll emphasize concentration; other times you'll focus more on spreading and enjoying, or on perception play as we discussed. At any point in jhana practice, your emphasis can appropriately shift. Sometimes when you say "I'm just practicing concentration now," it's not all you're doing—you're seeing concentration as one possible emphasis within a whole mandala of possibilities.

Does this make sense? The two broad approaches—concentration versus coaxing well-being through perception play—appear separate but aren't really. We move between them, and there are gray areas. We should move fluidly between them, recognizing that at any point in jhana practice, both will be relevant. They're not mutually exclusive.

I think we should stop here rather than take questions today. Let's have a bit of quiet together.

Thank you, everyone. Time for tea—enjoy it. There are some interviews tonight, so please check the board if you haven't today. Otherwise, enjoy your tea.

CHAPTER 205

Insight Ways of Looking, Other Energy Body Possibilities, and Summarized Instructions

Rob Burbea · 49 min

> Rob Burbea presents the final teachings on springboard practices for jhāna cultivation, focusing on two main approaches. First, he explains 'insight ways of looking'—a method of actively applying insights (like not-self) as lenses to view experience, which naturally releases clinging and opens the energy body, potentially leading to pīti and jhānic states. This approach differs from passive mindfulness by deliberately using understanding to transform present-moment experience.
>
> The second part explores energy body practices independent of breath awareness. Through guided exercises involving kinesthetic imagination—such as visualizing lines of energy, points of focus, and luminous qualities—Burbea demonstrates how subtle mental formations can shape bodily experience and generate well-being. These techniques show the fabricated nature of perception and offer alternative pathways to samādhi.
> The talk concludes with essential summary instructions for those preferring simpler approaches: choosing a reliable base practice that most easily generates pleasant feelings, identifying one's 'learning edge playground' for sustained practice, and basic concentration guidelines including hindrance management and refinement through intensity, delicacy, and directionality. Burbea emphasizes that teachings serve both present practitioners and future students who may access these materials when ready for deeper understanding.

I want to start today with what's really the last section about base or springboard practices—two pieces around base or springboard practices. You're certainly welcome to ask more and bring these topics to interviews, of course, but this will be the final bit about that from me at the front, so to speak.

There are two parts to it. The first part has to do with insight ways of looking. In a way, I mentioned this right at the beginning in the opening talk, and Marco also brought this up in his question yesterday. So what do I mean by this? I'm going to be very brief here, because this won't be really relevant for many of you.

Insight Ways of Looking

What does "insight ways of looking" mean? Usually we have—or perhaps a very common way of thinking about insight practice or insight meditation is—basically, one is mindful, paying attention, and paying attention as carefully as one can and as continuously as one can. In that careful and continuous mindful attention of watching one's experience, at some point one realizes something, one has an insight, one gets something. So that's one way of understanding what insight meditation is, and also what insight is. That's great.

There's a second way, which is perhaps less common but that I tend to emphasize quite a lot, which is more about taking an insight and using it as a lens—looking in certain ways, a way of looking. For example, if one realizes that body sensations are not self—maybe one has had that experience, maybe one hasn't—one takes that understanding and then starts looking at experience, at body sensations, and seeing them deliberately, over and over again, as not self. They're just happening, they're not me, they're not mine.

So it's more active, it's more deliberate. I'm not being mindful, waiting for insight to come. I'm looking at something in a certain way. There are lots of these possibilities.

What's key about them is that what I would call an insight way of looking brings letting go. And it brings letting go now, in this moment. In other words, here's this pain in my back, my knee, whatever it is. When I look at it with an insight way of looking, it's not just "Oh, that's interesting, it's not self." It makes a difference to the experience. The suffering begins to lessen or dissolve. The actual experience itself of the pain, or whatever it is, begins to change.

What defines an insight way of looking, then, is that there is letting go—it brings letting go in the moment. Another way of saying letting go is that it releases clinging in the moment. So this painful sensation—there's clinging in the sense of aversion, I want to get rid of it. There's also clinging in the sense that it's me or mine; I'm assuming this unconsciously without even thinking it. The insight way of looking dissolves those right in the moment. It lessens clinging, it attenuates clinging. So there's letting go and attenuation of clinging—two ways of saying the same thing.

Energy Body and Fabrication

Now we could say that when we cling as human beings, our energy body contracts. How do we know we're clinging to something? One of the ways is you can feel it in the energy body. There's some kind of contraction somewhere in the space of the energy body.

When we look with an insight way of looking—which organically, by definition, has in it the capacity and the mode of letting go of clinging—then one of the things that happens is that the energy body undoes. There is an undoing of a certain amount of contraction in the energy body. That's what happens, that's one of the things that happen when we look with an insight way of looking, sustainedly, deliberately.

What also happens with an insight way of looking, as I said, is that the phenomenon itself begins to change. As I get skillful in a certain insight way of looking, the phenomenon that I'm looking at with this insight way of looking begins to fade. Here's this pain, it's very intense. I keep looking at it—to follow the example—I keep looking at it as not self, not me, not mine, it's just happening.

If I slowly do that, the pain, the unpleasantness starts to get less unpleasant and even less unpleasant, until it becomes neutral sensation. If I keep looking at it that way, in the insight way of looking, actually the sensation begins to fade. There's no sensation there anymore. There's a space there, for example. Maybe it even goes via some pleasant sensation. In other words, what was unpleasant turns pleasant, then maybe turns neutral, or the other way around. But eventually there will just be a space. There will be the fading of that perception, the fading of that phenomenon, the fading of that experience, appearance, phenomenon, perception.

We say it's less fabricated, because what's central to an insight way of looking is that it fabricates less.

Less dukkha, less self, less object. Whether we look at it like we're undoing contractions in the energy body, or whether we say we're fabricating less solidity in the body—in the perception of the body—an insight way of looking does either of those, whichever way we're looking at it, and pīti will arise.

Pīti will arise as a less fabricated perception, or other jhānas. So an insight way of looking can open up the jhānic sense. Does this make sense? That was a very brief explanation.

When I go back to what I said in the opening talk, what I mean by insight ways of looking is insight practices—and sorry for this awkward phrasing—but I mean something quite specific. I describe them, for instance, in my book Seeing That Frees. So you might have done lots of insight practice retreats or whatever, you might have had insights into impermanence, but I really mean something quite particular.

If you're not familiar with all that, just leave all this. It's just an option that you can save for another time. If you are familiar with it though, what you can do is take one of those practices that you feel comfortable with, one of these insight ways of looking, and start using it. Start using it sustainably, just as sustainably as you would use concentration on the breath or whatever.

What you will notice is that as you engage with that way of practice, the energy body starts to feel good for the reasons I've just outlined. Either you can conceive it as getting its knots unknotted, getting uncontracted, or—more accurately and sophisticatedly conceived—the whole bodily perception is being fabricated less.

As you keep practicing the insight way of looking, the body starts to feel good, the energy body starts to feel good, with some kind, some flavor of well-being there. As the Buddha said, you don't snatch at that. So you're doing your insight way of looking, staying in touch with the energy body, noticing how it feels. Then at a certain point, yes, it's nice now.

You don't just snatch at that nice feeling—the pīti, or it could be a different flavor of nice feeling—but you keep doing your insight way of looking, letting the nice feeling build, noticing it as well. Maybe then your attention is balanced between continuing the insight way of looking and the nice feeling. At a certain point, just gently, you can maneuver your emphasis and attention so that the primary thing you're engaged with, the primary thing you're doing, is enjoying the well-being in the energy body, enjoying the pīti.

Is this making sense? So you may keep with the way of looking for a bit, but then at some point, if you're switching to samatha practice—and again, samatha is about the intention. That's what differentiates practice: the background intention. The samatha intention has this quality: "I really want to get into this enjoyment. I really just want to absorb and bathe and enjoy to the max." That's a samatha intention.

So at some point, what really shifts is your intention there—to focus on maximizing the enjoyment, getting really intimate with it, playing with those two modes of attention that we talked about yesterday, spreading it as well.

These kinds of practices are immensely powerful. They may take you well beyond pīti, in fact, and well beyond the first jhāna. They may take you into different formless jhānas, the last four jhānas. Where they take you depends partly on which insight way of looking you're practicing, partly on your previous experience. If there are certain realms that you've visited a lot, you've kind of got a groove in the mind and it might tend there. But it's partly dependent on which insight way of looking.

Again, what is your playground? What is your learning edge playground? If your learning edge playground is the first jhāna and you play with insight ways of looking and it takes you into the fifth or sixth jhāna, okay, that's maybe not what we want at this point because you've decided that the first jhāna or the third jhāna or whatever it is your playground, and that's shooting you way beyond it.

But it might be that as you do the insight way of looking, as things fade, you can kind of pick up on the point where actually it's just well-being now. It hasn't overshot into this huge empty space or whatever it is. Does that make sense?

Okay, so that's one other possibility for a springboard or base practice: insight ways of looking. It's probably quite rare as a way of doing samatha, but so what? It might be your main thing. There's a second way I want to come back to using it—not so much as a main practice—and I'll return to that a little later today.

The second possibility or group of possibilities I want to talk about today involves working a little bit more with the energy body. So again, responding to that question, I would view the energy body as a whole collection of possibilities. I'm just throwing out a bunch of possibilities. I'd count it as one sort of base practice.

But what I want to emphasize today is that so far we've mostly explored the energy body with the breath—the breath as something that stimulates, opens, energizes, massages, and shapes the energy body. What I want to do today is practice with the energy body without the breath, because that's also a possibility. We could make that a separate category, or you could simply include it within the broader energy body practice—it's neither here nor there.

So let's play a game, a meditative game. I'll review everything at the end so you can take notes then. For now, let's just take a few minutes to explore together.

Take that time—it's so worth it to just take a little time to settle into the posture. This posture has openness in it, so you need to be able to feel the openness in the posture. What do you need to do? It might be a micro-change in the posture. What do you need to do to actually feel it as open? To feel it as receptive? To feel it as soft?

At the same time, the posture expresses and manifests the citta qualities—the heart qualities, the mind qualities—of uprightness, wakefulness, alertness, resolve, energization. There's this complement there. Find a posture that expresses this coincidentia oppositorum, this amalgam of opposites. Find that.

Settle into the posture, which really means not just settle down, but open out. Open out the awareness. Settle out into the posture. Fill out the posture with that awareness. Fill it out.

Opening the awareness to the space of the whole body, the whole body space, opening to the sense of the energy body, the feel of the energy body right now. Doesn't matter what your breath is doing—just opening, opening to that whole space. Keep opening it.

You're just there, alive with the presence that's sensitive to the vibration, the texture, the feel, the energy, the tone or tones of that whole space. Keep opening. It's not that you open further and further; it's that you open again and again.

Just a little bit bigger than the physical body. That whole space, the whole energy body filled with bright awareness, bright presence, bright sensitivity. See if you can turn up the brightness right now—the brightness of your attention. How does it feel? How does that whole space feel right now?

Sometimes, as we just open to that whole space, we begin to notice that actually it's already a little bit pleasant. Maybe it's a lot pleasant, maybe it's just a little bit pleasant. There's some well-being somewhere or lightly pervading the whole space.

If that's the case, notice it, enjoy it, open to it—without snatching at it. Let it fill the space if it can. Just opening up the awareness to that space of the energy body again and again, and tuning to any sense of well-being or pleasantness that's there. Opening yourself to it. Opening your body to it. Feeling it.

That was game number one. No problem if there wasn't pleasantness there. Sometimes there might be. If there isn't, and you're working with the energy body, it's just a matter of staying with it, noticing what is there, maybe introducing some breathing or the metta or whatever it is.

Game number two has four little parts to it. Same thing—whole body awareness, stretch it out again. Get so used to opening up again and again; you're going to do that a gazillion times in your life. Again and again, open. Let that bright presence fill the whole space.

Within that whole space, let two points—while you're still aware of the feeling, the tone of the whole space—let two points in particular become more prominent, or focus on them while maintaining awareness of the whole space as well.

One point somewhere in the middle of your head, or the area where your head used to be. Another point somewhere either down in the middle of the body around the solar plexus, or even a little lower, just below the belly button, somewhere around there. You've just got these two points.

And simultaneously, you're kind of prioritizing a focus on both of them with the whole body. What does that do, this bi-focus, this double focus, with the background attention to the whole body?

What does it do if you imagine a line of energy or a line of light, say white golden light, between those two points with the whole body awareness included, but that becomes prominent—this line of energy connecting these two points. How does that feel?

Let that go. Find again, stretching out the awareness again and again, fill that whole space with presence, with sensitivity.

How about imagining three lines of energy? So these three lines meet somewhere in the lower belly, right in the middle of that kind of area. It really doesn't matter if your anatomy is not at all clear to you right now. It's fine if it isn't.

Three lines of golden white light energy or just a kinesthetic imagination of energy. One of them goes from that point in the lower belly around there right up the center of the body and out through the top of the head. Right out through the top of the head. And the other two go down, one goes down each leg and either out your knees or out your feet.

The important thing is the kinesthetic imagination. It's fine if it helps to be visual as well, but really what does it feel like to imagine lines of energy constituting, constellating the body—the body shaped around these lines of energy. How does that feel? What do you notice?

Open the whole space, open the awareness to the whole space. And within that, these three lines of energy.

You can let that go. And again, opening up the awareness, stretching it over the whole body space, inhabiting, really filling that whole body space with this bright presence, bright awareness, bright attention.

And now two lines—imagine two lines. Again, one down the vertical center of the body. And another perpendicular to it, at right angles, ninety degrees, across it, across, say, perhaps a little lower than the shoulders, like where the nipples are. It really doesn't have to be exact. It's not about that. Nor is it about seeing clearly what these lines of energy look like. It's just a way of shaping the energy. Just a light imagination. Two lines there.

Now you tell me, or rather don't tell me, but just see—what feels better? If these lines of energy go out of the body, out, let's say, through the bottom, through the perineum, and out through the top of the head, and out through the sides, or if they stay within the body. Bright, white, golden lines of energy, but more important, the kinesthetic sense, the kinesthetic imaginations. Whole body awareness. What do you notice?

Last one of this—let that go. Again, whole body spreaded, and imagine your energy body, your whole body in other words, that whole space, your energy body, is a golden white cloud of golden white light. So its edges are not particularly defined, it's more cloud-like. It's filled with this bright, bright luminous light, gold and white. Again, stretch out the awareness. How does that feel? What do you notice?

You can let that go.

The third little game or exercise is, again, whole body, whole space. And if I say to you, imagine your body—imagine your whole body as radiant and empty. Empty in the Dharma sense, whatever that means to you. In other words, whatever level of understanding you have of emptiness or what that means to you, just plug that in. Imagine your body, your whole body as radiant and empty. Whole body awareness, whole space. Your body radiant and empty, luminous but empty. Whatever that word means to you, dharmically.

You can let that one go.

Last one, just for fun.

Same thing, whole body awareness, whole body space, whole energy body, filling out that space. This time we actually want to keep some sense of the shape of your body, of your anatomy. So you really want to stay, in this game, you really want to stay sensitive to how that whole body space feels, like where you're sitting right now.

But if I add this, can you imagine an energy body, colored blue, a lovely blue, in the shape of your body, that flies out from your body? Flying, it can fly. You remain sensitive to everything you're feeling in that space. But imagine this lovely light, luminous blue energy body flying out. Maybe it does these very free flying maneuvers somewhere in front of your body.

How does that feel in the energy body space? Does it loop the loops? What does it want to do? How does it feel? Really stay connected with the feeling in your space, your energy body space.

When you're ready, connected to your energy body space, you can open your eyes.

So, what have we got here in this little group? We've got just a few little games but really essentially what we're doing is going to the energy body experience and sometimes, without doing anything with the breath or metta or anything else, we notice there's already some pleasantness there and it might already be enough pleasantness to work with, enough to kind of coax and gather it into piti and well-being and focus on it. Don't need anything.

But it also might be we just play a little bit with the imagination and that starts to shape and fabricate the experience in certain ways. If it is already pleasant, then, like I said, maybe you can get into that. Definitely as you get more and more experienced...

Let me run through what I did. The first one is just open to the energy body. Forget about your breath, forget about metta, just open to the energy body, the whole space. See how it feels, without putting any pressure on it. There might be more there already than you commonly realize.

The second one is primarily a kinesthetic imagination. If the visuals help it, great. But primarily it's kinesthetic, in other words, the sort of inner tactile sense, energetic sense. What I actually started with was giving two points, two separate, spatially separate points within the energy body. It's almost like your mind is paying attention to two things at once, predominantly and equally, rather than just one point. Sometimes, if something does, it just opens things up. And it can also allow things to become more stable, because again, there's more of a base, a wider base.

Then there's also the possibility of using the kinesthetic imagination which may be helped by the visual imagination and imagining certain lines of energy. Really you can just play with whatever. So it might be a vertical line. It might be this vertical line with lines going down the legs. It might be other lines intersecting in different ways. It might just be this kind of slightly amorphous luminous cloud of energy. But the imagination shapes the energy. And then that becomes an experience. It's no longer imagination. I'm actually experiencing this thing. And for samadhi, that can become useful.

The other two are probably less common. You can imagine your body as radiant and empty, even if you're not quite sure what empty means, or you're using it as fairly fundamental. When you tried that, was that interesting?

Partly this is the point. Look, all this stuff is not necessarily so far away. You just do this little game for thirty seconds or something, and stuff starts to happen. And how much the whole thing is conditioned, the whole thing is fabricated.

The experience of the body is fabricated by the mind, and that's fabricated by what I put in the mind, or what ideas, or what views, or what ways of looking, or what imagination. And even when I don't quite know exactly what I'm talking about, or thinking, or what it means, there's a magic in all this. There can be.

And how about the flying one? Yeah, some people like that. Good. You know, these are just little trigger practices, stimuli. That's how I'm using this—to get a sense of how sensitive a system the energy body is. And by energy body I mean the experience. It's so sensitive, so conditioned and fabricated by the littlest thing, by the smallest thing, by the subtlest thing.

So basically what I'm saying is you can either go to the energy body directly, and it might already be ready to work with, or you can play with the energy body in ways that don't really include metta or breath. But metta or breath, of course, will also shape the energy body.

I've never taught a group jhāna retreat before. All the jhāna retreat teaching I did was one-to-one. In a one-to-one interview, the person comes in and they report an experience. And out of everything from my experience and my teaching that I know about jhānas, I just select exactly what I feel they need right now to frame what just happened to them and give them the next thing to work on. And they take that away and usually I see them either three days later or a week later or whatever it is. Then again they come in with something and I'll give them a piece. In that way they don't get overwhelmed at all in terms of information overload.

When it comes to teaching a group retreat, I have to think differently, and I do, actually. Almost every group, a little different for some retreats, but in these kinds of retreats, I think very differently.

I remember being very young and being invited to birthday parties in the neighborhood. This must have been a very alien sort of ritual to both of my parents, but for me it just became a thing. You would go, you would get birthday cake with the candles and all that, and you'd have a slice of birthday cake. Then when you went home—I don't know, do they have this in the States?—you'd get a going home present, which is usually another piece of cake.

I think of this as like there's a big slab of birthday cake that's a going home present for you. So I'm inviting you to think of it that way if you're feeling like, ah, this is way too much.

I'm sitting here teaching to you now. I'm giving you something that I hope will be useful for you now. And certainly in interviews, that's exactly what I'm doing. But I'm also speaking to you—I'm also speaking to another you, the you that's alive and still wants to practice in a year's time. And another you, the you that's still alive and wants to practice jhānas in five years' time or ten years' time. So I'm actually speaking to multiple yous. And between you, you can eat all that birthday cake.

I'm also—and for me this is actually really important—I'm speaking to people who are not in this room. All this is being recorded, if Nathan's doing his job right. And I've been very conscious of that for years. So I feel like I'm speaking to people I will probably never meet. I'll never know them, I'll never even know that they listened.

They may be somewhere, for all kinds of reasons, they're not able to come. It's not even just a matter of timing. Maybe they can't afford to come on retreat. Maybe they have a health situation that prevents something like that. Maybe they have family obligations or work, whatever it is. So when I teach most group retreats, I'm actually thinking of other people that neither you nor I—I mean you might meet some of them, I might meet a few of them—but there's people that we will never meet and they matter to me a lot. Not more than you of course, but they matter to me a lot, especially the people who would not be able to come and who are out there really nowadays with the Dharma and the internet in the middle of nowhere. They have very little sangha and they have very little direct teacher access and they can listen to this stuff on the web.

So I'm also, in a way, speaking to you, your future selves and these people. Maybe when you have more time and when you can take more time with this material. When actually a little later on, however later on, things will make more sense, some things will make more sense, when you will actually be able to realize—because of what's come in between, partly you've understood emptiness more, or something else, you've done other practices, or something in your conception has opened, or your practice has deepened—when actually you'll be able to realize more of the significance of some of the things that are being talked about.

You'll also maybe realize how it fits together. Sometimes it might just be, that and that and this, and what the hell's that got to do with other Dharma I've heard, and emptiness and all the rest of it. And also maybe sometimes where you will literally hear things that you're not hearing now. You think, well, I was in the room when they said that and I've just heard it now on the sixth time I'm listening or whatever.

So it could be you in the future with your daily home practice, off retreat and just giving yourself a period of time when you're really getting into jhāna practice. It could be you in some time when you've decided to do a three-year jhāna retreat just on jhānas. And why not if you want to? That would be a beautiful thing to do. And my hope is that the material in this retreat will serve you all through those three years.

You basically have what you need. That's how I'm thinking about it. I know that some of you are finding this no problem, but I also know that some of you are struggling with all this material. The way I get my head around it is to open the view—open it time-wise, people-wise, in every direction.

Someone said to me once, a year or two ago: "I hate it when you talk about sensitivity, Rob. And that word 'subtle'—it really winds me up!" [Laughter] With this person, I think the Pali was pushing against a self-view they held, that they weren't sensitive and couldn't access subtlety. I'll come back to that in a moment.

But first, let's get clear about the simplest big picture understanding you need. We've talked about a base practice or springboard practice, right? The criterion—the most preferable criterion we're adopting—for what should be my base or springboard practice is whatever makes pīti easiest to arise and most reliably. That's it. I choose my base practice based on whatever practice gives rise most reliably and most easily to pīti. Actually, let's not even say pīti—to feeling good in this space, to the body feeling good. Let's just say that. That's one large principle if you're feeling a bit lost.

The second large principle regarding the instructions—a simple global take on them—involves this idea of a learning edge playground. What is that? I want to find what my learning edge playground is and marinate in it. I want to hang out there. That's the place where I spend ninety percent of my time, if I can.

This marinating includes working, playing, and tweaking. It doesn't mean just hanging out there in some kind of stupor or non-responsive, non-attuned, non-active way. So what's my learning edge playground? I need to marinate there, which includes working, playing, and tweaking. I need to work, play, and tweak until I have mastered all the... what do you call the things in a playground—the slide and all those... the collective word? Equipment. All the equipment. That's somehow not a very romantic word, but I've mastered all the equipment in that particular playground.

I want to marinate there and master it, both of which require working, playing, and tweaking. If, as you're listening to this, you can already do A, B, and C of what I've listed regarding mastery—what's involved in mastery—but you can't do D, whatever that is, then D is exactly what you need to be working and playing with. That's where you want to fill out your sense of what mastery involves at that level.

If you can already do all the elements involved in mastery at a certain level—let's say with the first jhāna—then either it should be the case that naturally, organically, by that point, the second jhāna has already appeared just naturally, inevitably. That's usually what happens. It's already evolved to the next jhāna organically—the second jhāna from the first.

If that's not the case, if you've really developed all the mastery but it's still not happening, then it needs a little bit of wizardry, trickery—subtle little things you can try that just nudge and encourage it, that encourage that sapling, that sprout to come, the bud to unfold and show itself. That's what you need to bring to interviews, or if not, we'll obviously address it in the teachings.

When we talk about playground, it could be any jhāna. But your playground could also still be the base springboard practice. It doesn't matter. What matters is understanding these basic orienting principles.

Does that make sense? That's the big picture for orienting to these instructions.

I started to say before—if very little of this energy business makes sense, or this talk about sensitivity and subtlety feels foreign, or perhaps like that person I mentioned who said, "I really don't like all this talk about energy and attunement and subtlety and sensitivity"—if that's the case, and if you're not even sure which base practice, which springboard practice actually feels best, then just choose one.

Actually, I don't think this applies to anyone at this point in this room, but I'll say it anyway: just choose one. For example, just choose the breath at the nostrils or in the abdomen.

And if you don't like all this talk about sensitivity and energy, then just concentrate on that point. Concentrate on the feelings and sensations at that point. When the mind gets distracted, come back to it and concentrate on it again. And when the mind gets distracted again, return and concentrate without judging, without any to-do—just come back again and again and again. Return a googolplex times. You know what a googolplex is? It's ten to the ten to the ten—anyway, it's a lot. Just over and over and over. It's really basic instruction. Just do that.

To which we'll add two more pieces of instruction. One is: when a hindrance arises, do not sit there putting up with it. Do something about it. From that list we gave, just do something about the hindrance.

The second piece of instruction: can I learn to refine my concentration a little bit? This means playing with those three things I mentioned—intensity, delicacy, and directionality. In other words, play with those, learn to move the sliders up and down, turn the dials up and down.

So if you don't like any of this other stuff, just do that. Do that and trust in it, and it will deliver its fruit.

Okay, so maybe we'll stop there. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 206

Q & A

Rob Burbea · 20 min

> In this Q&A session from the 'Practising the Jhānas' retreat, Rob Burbea addresses key questions about jhāna meditation practice. He clarifies that both pīti (rapture) and sukha (happiness) are present in the first and second jhānas, contrary to some interpretations suggesting one is primary over the other. Drawing from experiential understanding rather than strict canonical interpretation, he explains pīti as predominantly physical pleasure and sukha as happiness with many wavelengths.
> Burbea explores the jhānic factor of ekaggatā (one-pointedness), explaining how according to Abhidhamma, it's present in every moment of consciousness but becomes particularly developed in jhānic states through increased absorption. He addresses practical questions about navigating between different meditation states, including how to work with experiences that include imaginal elements like 'the breath of God' while maintaining jhānic focus.
> The discussion covers energy management in intensive practice, the role of supportive images in accessing different types of pīti, and how to maintain alertness with increasingly subtle meditation objects. Burbea emphasizes the importance of recognizing primary versus secondary factors in any meditative state and adapts his guidance to individual practitioners' experiences and intentions, whether focusing on jhāna development or other contemplative approaches.

Yeah, so Karen's asking about the interpretation of piti being primary in the first jhana and sukha being primary in the second jhana, and also about the translation of those words.

As far as I know, that's not in the Pali Canon—that piti is primary and sukha is secondary. As far as I know, they're both factors of both the first and second jhana. I guess I'm just speaking from experience, also from how I was taught originally by one of my teachers. So I'm speaking from the way experience tends to mature. I think even for people who are not told what to wait for or don't even know what they're supposed to be looking for, it would just tend to mature that way.

As for the translations, yeah, it's interesting reading. Sometimes you get delight or pleasure or joy or all kinds of different translations. So I'm just speaking from experience about piti as predominantly felt physical pleasure, although it's a perception, and sukha is predominantly happiness, but it has a lot of wavelengths.

Boaz is asking, in terms of this word ekaggata, the way I translate it, what makes it special as a jhanic factor versus a factor that might be present in any insight practice?

Actually, in the Abhidhamma, which is very—I don't know what you call it—various sort of black and white definitions about factors of consciousness in Theravada Buddhism... Actually, Mahayana also has their own version. They say ekaggata is a factor that's present in every state of consciousness. So not even just in meditation or just in jhana. The mind always has one thing prominent to some degree.

So it's a question of how much is one thing prominent. Then you would tend to think, okay, well, the ekaggata of the eighth jhana must be better than the ekaggata of the first jhana, but not necessarily. It can vary. I would say it can vary, but basically it's just a factor. It's a fact of being conscious, of having a perception that there's one thing that's kind of more prominent in the perception.

So it's not particular to samadhi or jhana practice. It gets developed more in jhana practice. It becomes a kind of important... it becomes developed in a jhanic state or a samadhi state. But it's something that's there anyway, in any moment of consciousness. It means that it gets stronger and stronger or you make it stronger and stronger. So a jhanic state is very absorbed. There's really just one thing. It's like you're really into that thing more and more.

So the question is, I've been told to sort of stay in the first jhana as much as possible, but other states are coming up. And is it okay to go there? Should I go there and just trust them or not? And I want to go there. They're much nicer. Can you describe what they are? What's going on? What kind of?

Very settled. Okay. So you're describing a place where it is sort of like white velvet and very settled, and like the breath of God is there and very lovely.

Yeah. So, you know, again, it's about context. So you could, if we're looking at things from a jhana lens, of everything you just said, we sort of map that onto a jhana territory—which are the significant nimittas there and which are the less significant nimittas?

If we're doing imaginal practice, soul-making practice, then actually it's the breath of God that's the most significant thing there. And the fact that it's velvety is great and the fact that it's serene is great, but actually it's the breath of God that's most significant.

If you're doing jhana practice, then actually what's most significant is the serenity there. So it might be, from what you're saying—we'd have a longer conversation—it might be that the serenity there is something akin to something in the third jhana. It's much more kind of subtle and exquisite and lovely that way. It might be, we'd have to have a slightly longer conversation.

But if you want to go into that and explore it, it's almost like that needs to become the primary jhana factor—the serenity. And it might be that the sense of the breath of God and the white velvet support it for a while, but after a while, they'll become kind of secondary. You realize, oh, it's a territory that is characterized primarily by that kind of serenity. You recognize its particular bandwidths and those other factors become secondary.

But it depends what you want. If you want jhanas, then it depends what we emphasize, what we pull out of that mix of what's most important.

It's funny, I only know you really from imaginal practice, so I don't know what else you've done in terms of insight practice and all that. But it could be, like I said today, that for you, there has been a training where the mind goes a lot towards a kind of serenity, and doesn't really like all this bubbly stuff.

So again, either you decide, actually, I'm not really into the jhana practice—I want to make this an imaginal space. My request would be not on this retreat, but you can come back to that. You'll have plenty of access to all these kinds of things at other times.

If you do want it to be jhana, then the question becomes: which first? Which should I develop first? Or should I even develop these things in parallel? So demarcate, really get used to: okay, this state is definitely different than this one. I prefer that one, but I'm actually interested in mastering them both and being able to hang out with them both and finding them both lovely. Either you decide, I'm going to do this first and that second, or that first and this second, or I'm going to do them kind of in parallel.

Does that sound okay?

To me, there's nothing wrong with experiencing the breath of God there. It's just that if that becomes primary, technically speaking, it takes you in a slightly different direction, which is gorgeous and beautiful, incredibly fruitful, but it's slightly different than what we're doing. So it can be there as a support for a while, but at some point, you have to hone in on what's the primary factor in any state.

This is one of the things—it's hard doing a retreat over Zoom. What you need to do is come to an interview and describe in a bit more detail, and we could map the jhanas onto those. That will tell you what to make more primary in each state if you want to develop the jhanas. And then exactly the order in which you develop your mastery of those, if that's what you want, is partly dependent on your history and things like that.

This is one of the situations where you would need to have a bit of a map because there's actually an infinite amount of lovely states that a human being can find themselves in—infinite. When you start including soul-making stuff, it becomes completely infinite. It really depends. Certain honings or certain magnetism to this, or priority of this, will direct you in certain ways. If you ask me, is it better or worse? It's not really about that. It's just, what do we want to do right now?

I can't see who that is at the back. Is it Sabra? Is there a reason I haven't listed out the eight jhanas? I did in one of the first two talks, but very quickly. The way I'm thinking about it is, we're focusing mostly on pīti in the first jhana, and then I'll give more detail about each jhana. That's just one way of going about it. Probably because that's where most people will be.

I read them very quickly. Why would you want that? To give you a sense of whether you're slipping into something else right now?

It's interesting. I guess we could have done it that way. I would usually do that in an interview with someone, like I described, but it might be that it would take quite a lot of description from me for you to really get an accurate sense of is that it, or where is it? I'm not sure. Maybe one time—well, I probably won't get the chance—but that would be another way of doing it. But I think it would take really quite a lot of description because there's a lot of states.

When I talked about some people who have done a lot of insight meditation getting into a state of equanimity, I said I actually have to explain a few things about equanimity, because the Buddha talked about...

These different shades of equanimity require considerable explanation. The Buddha spoke of equanimity based on singleness, equanimity based on multiplicity, and equanimity in relation to the eight worldly conditions. Then there's equanimity as an almost jhanic state—sometimes based on multiplicity, sometimes on singleness. Without extensive description, it would be difficult for you to accurately locate yourself on this map of states.

In individual teaching, this approach is quite common for me. I listen carefully, pick up the signals, and ask clarifying questions. But teaching a group to practice jhana this way—with this whole emphasis on mastery and marinating—presents unique challenges. The subtle distinctions require careful explanation: "It's something like what you may have experienced, but actually it's quite different." Without that precision, I'm not sure what the purpose would be in simply listing states.

This whole practice demands tremendous energy—much more than you might expect. Even when you've established the pleasant feeling and are doing this subtle work of sustaining it, the practice simultaneously delivers enormous energy while requiring great energetic investment. It's a fascinating paradox.

When you find yourself getting tired, the question becomes: Do I need to return to the base practice, or is there a way to minutely adjust how I'm working that makes it more sustainable? There isn't always a black-and-white answer. Generally, if fatigue arises, it's either time to rest or perhaps time for the base practice.

But as your practice develops, you discover more options. You might be playing in the second jhana and feel tiredness arising, so you shift to the seventh jhana and return refreshed with abundant energy. Or you might be working in the fourth jhana, feel your energy flagging, and return to the first jhana to restore vitality—or even go back to simple breath awareness.

This practice isn't formulaic in that way. That's part of what I mean by the improvisational quality. Sometimes you can stay exactly where you are—with whatever pleasant feeling you're working with—and find a way to access more energy right there. Sometimes you need to shift to something different. The key is learning to feel your way into what's needed in each moment.

Nicole raises an excellent question about images that sometimes accompany different types of pleasant feelings—perhaps a snowflake or other visual forms that seem to support and even trigger specific pleasant feelings. Can we work with these images, or should we drop them as quickly as possible?

This phenomenon is actually quite common, and I'd say it's entirely a matter of intention. Images can remain present in the background, and as long as they're helpful—supporting the pleasant feeling and helping you access it more readily—they're perfectly fine. You can play with the balance: how much to emphasize the pleasant feeling versus how much to let the image fade. Sometimes an image might be quite primary initially, serving as a kind of launching pad, but the pleasant feeling must ultimately become the primary focus.

Eventually, you won't need these visual supports as much. As I mentioned, the pleasant feeling will simply arise when you remember it. What you're all discovering is an arsenal of little techniques for navigating these different stages. You'll learn various tricks for moving from first to second jhana, some from instruction and many through your own exploration.

After some time, you may find you no longer need these transitional supports. Other images might accompany your jhana practice for extended periods, providing ongoing support while remaining mostly in the background—occasionally moving more into the foreground when you need to amplify the experience.

Does that clarity help with your practice?

As we deepen our practice and progress through the jhanas, we learn to pay attention to increasingly subtle objects. We develop the capacity to sustain our attention on these more refined states. This is part of the art—at every level, your attention must be trained anew for each new degree of subtlety.

There's an art to remaining truly awake with something that becomes subtler and calmer. When the pīti becomes more relaxing and soft, your attention needs to change accordingly. Perhaps it requires a more subtle quality of awareness—a gentler way of enjoying that smoothness. You must discover the right stance to take with these refined states.

This might also signal that another state is beginning to emerge, where pīti is no longer the primary object. A different kind of body energy may be presenting itself. The question becomes: what does it mean to stay present with that? How can you remain fully alert with something so subtle?

All the principles we've discussed about subtle work and play apply here. When we talked about the hindrances, we noted that sleepiness represents a kind of closing down—comfortable, yes, but ultimately a shutting off of awareness. You might need to open yourself more fully, asking: "How can I enjoy this to the maximum?"

The key questions become: Is it more sustaining that's needed? More opening? More maximizing of enjoyment? Again, this returns to our fundamental inquiry of what needs emphasizing in this moment—finding what actually helps among all the possibilities.

It might be less about the drowsiness itself and more about opening and discovering the full enjoyment available. The state may be enjoyable, but perhaps you're not maximizing that enjoyment or opening to it in quite the right way. This incomplete opening is what tends to tip the experience toward sleepiness rather than deeper absorption.

Let's take just a little quiet time together now.

CHAPTER 207

The First Jhāna, and Playing and Working in (and out of) any Jhāna

Rob Burbea · 1h30

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Rob Burbea provides detailed instruction on the first jhāna and the art of working skillfully within any jhānic state. He begins by examining the Buddha's soap simile and the five jhāna factors (jhānāṅga), offering fresh perspectives on commonly mistranslated terms like vitakka and vichāra, and ekaggatā (often rendered as 'one-pointedness' but better understood as 'one thing prominent'). Burbea emphasizes that pīti (rapture/delight) is the primary factor to focus on in the first jhāna, not mere concentration techniques.
> The talk introduces the practical framework of 'SASSIE' - Suffusion, Absorption, Sustaining (both attention and the primary factor), and Enjoyment - as guidelines for deepening jhānic practice. Burbea addresses common obstacles like difficulty allowing full enjoyment due to psychological or religious conditioning, and provides guidance on transitioning between formal sitting practice and daily activities while maintaining jhānic qualities. He emphasizes the importance of 'marinating' in states rather than quickly moving through them, and discusses the development of mastery through patient, playful engagement with these refined states of consciousness. The teaching balances technical precision with practical accessibility, making these profound meditative states approachable for sincere practitioners.

So today I was planning to talk about the first jhāna and then tomorrow discuss playing and working in any jhāna—but also out of any jhāna, or playing and working in and out of any jhāna. But then I decided to combine these two themes since they interrelate: the first jhāna as well as playing and working in and out of jhāna in general as one talk.

After this, the teachings will get a lot less dense. There should be much more breathing room in terms of how much material is coming at you. This is slightly complicated by the fact that I have a hospital appointment tomorrow, and I have no idea how long that will take. I hope it won't be complicated—that I can go there, come back and finish the second part of the talk if I don't finish today. Maybe we'll finish today. Maybe we'll have to get bumped until the day after tomorrow. Maybe I can come tomorrow. Let's see how we do.

So, first jhāna and playing and working in and out of any jhāna.

For the first jhāna, the Buddha starts with a simile: just as a skilled bath man or his assistant, kneading the soap powder which he has sprinkled with water, forms from it in a metal dish a soft lump so that the ball of soap powder becomes one oily mass bound with oil so that nothing escapes—so this practitioner suffuses, drenches, fills and irradiates their body so that no spot remains untouched.

Fills and irradiates their body with what? With the pīti and sukha born of detachment. Detachment from what? Detachment from the hindrances. That's what detachment means in this case. With this pīti and sukha, born of detachment from the hindrances—sometimes called seclusion from the hindrances, or withdrawal from the hindrances—she so suffuses, drenches, fills and irradiates her body that there is no spot in her entire body that is untouched by this delight, by this pīti and sukha born of detachment.

So the soap simile is really a simile for what we do with the pīti and sukha: suffuse, saturate, steep, drench, irradiate, pervade, permeate—all these words. We do that with the pīti and sukha.

Pīti and sukha translate best, I think, as happiness. In the first jhāna, the pīti is the primary quality. I'm going to come back to this. The sukha is there and one is definitely not unhappy. One is conscious that one is happy, very happy, but actually even the consciousness that one is happy might be a little bit in the background. One is more taken by, captivated by, and should be concentrating on the pīti. The pīti is what is foremost in consciousness.

The Buddha describes the jhānas through similes like this, and at other times in terms of their factors—what are called jhāna factors, jhānaṅga in Pāli. So pīti and sukha, these two Pāli words, are two of the five factors of the first jhāna.

Another factor is ekaggatā, and actually it's a factor of every jhāna—ekaggatā in Pāli. This usually gets translated as one-pointedness. I've already touched on this. It absolutely cannot mean putting the mind in a small spatial point. Now, you might do that. In fact, you probably will do that at times in a jhāna if you're playing with this probing, receiving, open, directed shifting of the modes of attention. But it cannot mean one-pointedness in a spatial sense because it's a factor of the fifth jhāna, which is infinite space. You realize there's a complete contradiction if you take it as a spatial point.

So what does it mean? Eka means "one," agra (with ta as just a suffix) means something like a mountain peak or a prominence. Of course, some mountains are quite pointy like that. But what's best translated is something like "one thing is prominent"—eka-prominentness. One thing is prominent.

What is that one thing that becomes prominent? People argue about this. Is it the original meditation object? Is it the breath? Is it the body that becomes prominent, the sense of the body? Or is it the pīti?

I would say that in jhāna what happens is they all get mixed together. I'm breathing pīti. If you're still with the breath, if the breath is still there, or the body has become pīti, or it's just the pīti that's prominent. I would say the pīti is what's prominent. In a way, it's the most significant factor of the first jhāna. Let's say that. So pīti is the thing that's most prominent to consciousness. It's not that other things, other aspects, other dimensions of the jhāna won't come into consciousness—they will. But the most prominent thing, and what should be the most prominent thing, is the pīti.

So pīti and sukha, two factors. Ekaggatā, a third factor. I'm not saying these in the order they're usually presented. Then there are two more factors which get to—in Pali—vitakka and vicāra.

Now most of you, if you've heard these terms before, any translation, will have heard the translations "initial and sustained application." Who's heard that before? Really, really common. Certainly what I was taught for many years. One of my original meditation teachers—I was originally taught by a group of teachers—one of them was a professor of Pali, is a professor of Pali. So not a professor of Buddhism, not even a professor of Theravadan Buddhism, but a professor of Pali. That's his thing.

He said that's not what it meant at the time of the Buddha. At that time, that's not how those words were used. Vitakka and vicāra just meant something like thinking. In English, do we have a kind of double verb? You always say this and this. No, but I mean, as a phrase, it doesn't matter. So it was a stock phrase in Pali, and it just meant thinking originally.

About 500 years after the Buddha, in Sri Lanka, a monk called Buddhaghosa wrote a book called the Visuddhimagga, which translates as "the path of purification." In some Theravadan countries, it's regarded as a Bible. They really revere this book. And in some countries, much, much less so. The story goes that actually it was a compilation—what he did was interview lots of meditation masters, take what they had—I heard this obviously secondhand, I wasn't there—take what they gave him, throw out what he didn't like, although he himself was not much of a meditator, throw out what he didn't like, burn what he threw out, and keep the rest. I don't know if that's true, but I've heard that.

Anyway, I think, if the history is right, he translates it in Abhidhamma, which is a kind of technical, psychological bureaucracy of Theravadan Buddhism, also translates it as "initial and sustained application." But at the time of the Buddha, that's not how those words were used.

These are okay translations, actually, to a certain extent. At a certain point in your practice, if you keep those translations, it should occur to you this doesn't really make sense once you get into the other jhānas. But it's okay. And at a certain point, they stop making much sense. But to a certain extent, it's really okay.

So initial application means bringing my mind to whatever it is, the breath. I bring the mind. Initial application. Sustained application means, in the sense, I stay there and I probe it and I become intimate with it. That's usually the explanation that's given on Vipassana retreats and on, I guess, quite a lot of jhāna retreats.

One of my main teachers, Ajahn Geoff, translates them as "directed thought and evaluative thought." It's a very different translation. And what he means really is attending to whatever the object is and thinking about it. So this is in the first jhāna—thinking about the breath, thinking about the energy body, thinking about the well-being or the pleasure. What would help right now?

What would be helpful? How should I shift my emphasis? How should I view the breath? What way of looking should I play with?

He relates the word vichara, the second of those terms, to dhammavichaya, which—some of you will know—is the second factor of the seven factors of awakening: investigation. So there's a kind of investigative thinking about what's going on in the first jhana. At least, I would say, at least sometimes.

So we have, for these two terms, three possibilities: the most popular translation and interpretation of initial and sustained application; the second, which is simply thinking; and the third, directed and evaluative thinking, which really means this kind of creative questioning—what's helping right now? How should I play with this?

Which shall we choose? What are we going to do here? Do you want to know what I think? I think forget about it. Forget about those terms anyway. Just throw them out.

Of course you're going to apply initial and sustained application—of course you are. Just don't worry about it. If you're thinking about the meditation, great. We've talked about that. If you're working with pīti, great. It's fine. I think all this argument and tussle about these terms actually isn't that helpful. Again, what's actually important here?

I could say that at times the first jhana can include thinking about how the meditation is going, what's helpful, and so forth. But it's not the kind of thinking where you tell yourself, "I suck at this. I bet everyone else in here is in the eighth jhana. I should just go home." Not that kind of thinking.

If there's thinking, it's about what's happening—a very subtle kind of responsive, intelligent, connected thinking about the practice. People ask me as a jazz musician, "Do you think when you play? You're improvising—do you think?" Well, yeah, but it's a different kind of thought. I'm not pondering long sentences. Or consider a painter really in the flow with their art—are they thinking or not thinking? Well, there may well be a certain thought, absolutely, as part of the flow.

We'll come back to this later when we talk about deeper jhanas, because one question we have is: what is a thought anyway? We'll return to that.

So for what it's worth, my two cents on this is: forget about it. Just get into it. Get into it, and this whole question of "what does that mean?" will take care of itself. Just get into the pīti, in this case. Enjoy it. Get intimate with it as much as you can—the fullness of connection with it, spreading it, really opening to enjoying it, seeing how much you can enjoy it. If you just do that—don't worry about whether there's thinking—just get into it more, and it becomes a non-question.

Even in the second jhana, as you move to the second jhana, one of the factors is the dropping away of thinking. So it's a kind of factor of absence, if you like. But if I'm checking—"Am I thinking? Have there been any thoughts yet?"—or if I'm measuring how long I've not been thinking, or whether there's been thinking, or if I'm trying not to think—this I would say is not such intelligent practice for a number of reasons. One of which is that I'm putting my emphasis on the least significant factor, the least helpful factor of the second jhana.

I'm going to come back to this obviously when we talk about the second jhana.

I think I've said already—it seems from my experience teaching that if you can get to the first jhana, then actually all the jhanas are available to you with a lot of work. So if you can get to the first jhana, you can master—in the sense that I mean it—you can master all the jhanas.

It will take a long time and a lot of work and a lot of dedication, but it's possible if that's the sort of thing that you want. I actually would like to revise that statement. I mentioned this briefly before, but I want to say instead: if pīti can arise, you can do all that. If pīti can arise, there's no reason you can't attain the first jhāna and then have access to all the jhānas.

So actually, the arising of pīti should give you tremendous confidence. It's saying the road is clear—it's open. All you have to do is walk. Yes, it might be hard at times. It's a long way. You're going to need a lot of ingenuity and dedication. But the path is open. There's nothing in the way for you. That road is available.

Who's heard another Pali word: nimitta? Do you understand by nimitta something in the context of jhāna practice—something like the appearance of a visual, luminous form with some detail in it that you can then concentrate on that will take you into jhāna?

Again, the Buddha never used that word in this way. He uses the word nimitta, but never in that context. This understanding comes from the Visuddhimagga and later texts. In English, it's often translated as "counterpart sign," at least in the older translations.

In the Pali Canon—meaning in the words of the Buddha—he does use that word, but more as "object of perception." Any object of perception in meditation is a nimitta. Sometimes he uses it in a way that would translate as something like "theme"—a theme of meditation.

In the Mahāyāna teachings, it's the same word in Sanskrit, but it has the additional meaning of "ground" or "base," connected with emptiness teachings and teachings about groundlessness. So it has quite a different emphasis in Mahāyāna teachings.

We can use that word—I don't mind using it, and I don't mind if you want to use it—but I would like to use it in a slightly different way: as "sign." That's usually how nimitta is translated—it means sign. And it's a sign that the samādhi is deepening. Any sign that samādhi is deepening.

So the arising of pīti is a sign that samādhi is deepening. The arising of sukha, of happiness, is a sign that samādhi is deepening. The arising of a really otherworldly, pristine, pure, luminous stillness is also a sign. The arising of the perception of space as a very clear perception is a sign at different levels that the samādhi is deepening.

Some people also get, for instance, while meditating at some point it's almost like a white-golden light—this is very common—like white-golden suffused light or a kind of cloud of light in the mind. Sometimes a person's not sure if they're meditating and they wonder, "Did the sun just come out?" because everything's just become very bright. This too, that white light, is also a sign that the samādhi is deepening.

But the primary nimitta—again, the most important thing to put the attention on and the most important thing around which the whole practice converges—in the first jhāna, the primary nimitta is the pīti, if you want to use that word. In the second jhāna, the primary factor is the sukha, the happiness. We'll come back to that.

So in the first jhāna, pīti has arisen through one way or another, however it has arisen. In order then to consolidate it and move into an absorption in it, which is the first jhāna, what needs to be there and what do we need to do? These are some of the things I want to address. What kind of work, what kind of play?

How strong does the pīti have to be? I think I've touched on this already. There's a huge range in terms of the intensity of the pīti that's possible—a massive range—but it does need to be strong enough. It does need to be strong enough that it's definitely pleasurable before I can start working with it and trying to take that pīti and mold it, shape it, allow it to open and take me into the first jhāna. It needs to be strong enough, which doesn't necessarily mean "blow your head off."

It also needs to sustain long enough. I think I mentioned this yesterday. So it needs to be around for, let's say, two or three minutes at least without going away. Two or three minutes, strong enough that it's definitely pleasant—then it's ready. Then I can decide to take that as my primary object and really get into it and work and play, and there's the possibility that this moves into the first jhāna.

In the first four jhanas—called rupa jhanas, which translates as "form jhanas"—something fascinating unfolds. Rupa has various meanings, but here we can understand it as "form." What's happening as we progress through one, two, three, four, is that our perception of the body becomes increasingly subtle.

The happiness of the second jhana might be super intense—perhaps a happiness we've never experienced, more joy than we've known in our entire life. Yet as an object of meditation, it's still more refined than the piti. Piti is, relatively speaking, gross—a coarse object, like rough cloth compared to really fine silk. This distinction between intensity and refinement is crucial to understand.

In the third jhana, the particular kind of peacefulness that arises is extraordinarily subtle. That's part of its beauty. It's more subtle than the happiness of the second jhana. As we pervade, saturate, and suffuse ourselves with these experiences, something remarkable occurs: these primary factors—the piti, the sukha—become the body itself.

What is my body now? I no longer sense organs and solidity in the usual way. The ordinary solidity we normally experience—hard bones, organs, and so forth—is more gross than the refinement of the piti, which is itself more gross than the sense of solidity in the happiness state. Can we even call it "solidity" at that point? There's a spectrum here of increasing refinement or subtlety in our perception of the body.

Having drenched, suffused, and saturated myself completely, my body has become piti. My body and breath have become happiness, and there's this spectrum of ever-greater refinement. When we reach the fifth jhana, any sense of form or body disappears entirely—it's just space. In a way, that's ultra-refined, almost nothing at all.

Piti is important in many ways. I want to emphasize how crucial it is to keep it around, maintain our access to it, and continue considering it lovely and resourceful, even when our playground has become the seventh or eighth jhana. Sometimes we enter those formless jhanas when that's our focus, then want to return—to skip back from the eighth to the third or fourth. But we can't find the body vibration of stillness characteristic of the fourth jhana, or the peacefulness of the third.

The whole perception has become so ultra-refined from the deeper formless jhanas that we cannot locate what we need to enter the third or fourth jhana—we need that particular vibration, that specific bandwidth of refinement. What really helps is going all the way back to piti, the first one, getting that established again. Then the third or fourth becomes more accessible.

What I'm sharing today isn't just about the first jhana—it's about working and playing in general. Much of this will be relevant whatever stage you're at, will remain relevant years from now.

Sometimes piti is an acquired taste. We might not be sure how keen we are on it initially. This is definitely possible, actually with any jhana. We might fall in love immediately, feeling its loveliness as a resource, becoming super excited about it. Or it might take time to appreciate.

An interesting phenomenon occurs with the majority of people when they start working on the third jhana—that very peaceful, exquisite serenity that's one of its main characteristics. When they return to the first jhana and all that piti, it feels so coarse. One becomes a bit of a jhana snob: "I don't want anything to do with that." Relatively speaking, it is quite gross compared to the third jhana.

Still, in the context of whole jhana practice, we want to keep it. We might need to rediscover our enjoyment, re-feel it as enjoyable and pleasurable. It's quite interesting.

Sometimes—and this is actually quite common—if a practitioner has done extensive insight meditation practice, the order in which they experience jhanas is not one, two, three, four. Most insight meditation teaching follows a pattern: be mindful, things arise, watch them, let them go, watch them, let them go. In this aware, mindful letting go, what are we cultivating? A kind of equanimity.

After many years of insight meditation practice and retreats, one develops a groove in the citta toward equanimity. Maybe not a jhanic state of equanimity, but some kind—I'll need to explain different types of equanimity later. Basically, equanimity becomes a common resting place for the mind trained in insight meditation.

Then what happens? One attends a jhana retreat wanting to learn the jhanas...

But what might happen is the mind just goes straight to something resembling the fourth jhana, or one of the formless states—though these might be quasi-formless states where the senses remain open. These are states that feel like infinite space or infinite consciousness, but they're actually not those jhanas. The senses are still somewhat engaged—I'll explain the difference later—but there's something akin to the fourth, fifth, or sixth jhana.

It becomes quite difficult for that person to access piti, because again, piti is too agitated, and the mind has developed this groove toward equanimity. So they find themselves in some state that may not be the fourth jhana exactly, but close enough that—and this is the sort of thing I usually work out in an interview with someone—maybe it's skillful if we start with the fourth jhana. We take that stillness you've cultivated and really hone it, making it very consolidated, very bright, very powerful. Master that, and then go backwards.

So the order of mastery doesn't necessarily happen one, two, three, four. I feel like I've expressed that somewhat clumsily, but does that make sense?

Many of you have done extensive insight practice as well, and this dynamic is quite interesting. There can be this genuine habit toward equanimity—sometimes this habit is both entrenched enough and powerful enough that you keep finding yourself in territory closer to the fourth jhana.

Sometimes a person skips the second jhana, which is characterized by abundant happiness. There may be various psychological reasons for this, or perhaps there's some resistance to piti. We touched on this yesterday.

Regarding the arupa jhanas, the formless jhanas, the progression doesn't necessarily follow five, six, seven, eight either. For me, if I remember correctly, the sixth was easier than the fifth, and I found myself learning them both simultaneously. Certain minds, depending on their inclinations, experience, and training, will find different formless jhanas easier than others. Perhaps it's acceptable to follow the order in which things naturally open up for you.

But I retain my vision of where we're going with this. Imagine a sort of checklist grid for mastery of each of the eight jhanas. Can I really dwell and sustain? Can I marinate? Can I access it at will? Can I move fluidly between states? Eventually, I want to look at that grid for each of the eight jhanas and all those mastery skills and have them all accomplished. The order in which that completion happens perhaps doesn't matter so much. You understand?

So it depends on the individual. I haven't heard this particular pattern from anyone on this retreat, but I encounter it quite commonly as a teacher. Past tendencies and experience in meditation very much affect what opens up when and in what order.

But we do want this differentiation. It's absolutely crucial. This is this, and that is that. This is the second jhana, and that's the third jhana. This is the first jhana, and that's the second. This is piti, and that's sukha—whatever the distinction may be. This differentiation is part of cultivating and developing sensitivity.

Without that differentiation, as I mentioned, something will grind to a soupy, undifferentiated halt at some point. It will be pleasant, but the possibility of really deepening insight will be limited.

Each jhana to the next represents a kind of quantum leap—it's as if I'm in a different realm entirely. Mostly, this is the actual experience. Do you know what a quantum leap means? It means there's nothing in between. Here's one state, and here's another state, and there isn't anything bridging them. I'm simply here, and then suddenly I'm there. A quantum leap.

Mostly, that's the experience of moving between jhanas.

They're discrete, quantumly differentiated states. But sometimes it will seem to you as much more of a spectrum—no, actually it is a continuum. Sometimes it will be experienced that way, and we can also view it that way. But I would say it's really important to have this discrete sense of quantum leap, quantum leaps between states.

One really large point, which I mentioned in one of the first two talks: rather than "Am I in or out of a jhāna?" can I just be thinking about jhāna practice? It's quite a different shift. So that means, for instance, the hindrances are part of jhāna practice. The place when I'm not sure whether I'm in or out—it doesn't really matter. The place where I said those terriers were yapping, maybe they do feel distant, they're on the edge of consciousness—it's still jhāna practice.

If I have that view, it's going to be much more fruitful, much more intelligent. So I have this view of a big picture of jhāna practice, which includes a huge range of territory of experience—not just these sharply defined so-called eight jhānas, but the whole territory: the grey areas, the "I'm clearly in a hell realm now," whatever. Even the way I walk around outside between formal sittings—it's jhāna practice because I'm walking around in a different way than I would if I was doing a Mahāsi retreat, a Goenka retreat, if I was just hanging out, if I was on my way to work.

So this is huge, actually, this view. What that means is there's work—or play, depending on your favorite word—in and out, on and off the cushion, but also in and out of a jhāna.

What's quite common the first time you enter what's a new jhāna for you—let's say the first time you hit the first jhāna or the second jhāna or whatever—what's quite common is that it seems completely effortless, at least the first maybe few times in that new realm. You've made that quantum jump and it seems completely effortless. The idea of working there or doing something or playing with something seems just a million miles away. It certainly won't even occur to you if you haven't been told about it.

But if you're really marinating—if you're just skipping through jhānas really fast, you won't notice this. You'll miss almost 99% of what's valuable about jhānas. You're just skipping right through. It's like skipping—"I've seen the Taj Mahal. I went there and pointed my phone at it while I was looking at something else."

If you hang out, if you really marinate, if you really start working and playing and bringing all your sensitivity and intelligence and awareness and openness and getting really intimate and getting to know them, after a few times at a new level that you've broken to, you start to realize: oh, there is work to do here, or there is play to do. There's lots to do, but it's very, very subtle. We're talking about very subtle work-play, mostly.

If you still feel it's a completely effortless state where you can't do anything, it's actually that you're in some kind of unconsciousness. And it's not going to be very helpful in your life.

So sometimes, then the work begins. I've had my little holiday at this new level, and then the work and the play begins. I get used to this—but what is it for the mind to really work in the most delicate ways, to really play in the most delicate ways, to learn about this jhāna, to consolidate it, to deepen it, to learn about its different spaces, levels, textures, aspects?

It can also be the case, and it commonly is the case, that when consciousness reaches a new level, when the citta reaches a new level, it's a bit like a dam bursting. Again, the first experience—the first jhāna, the second jhāna—it's as if a dam has just broken apart and the water is just gushing through. It can be very, very intense. And then again, as I get used to that jhāna, it seems to get less intense, or it often can.

So what work, what play, what's involved there? The principle of moving between these modes of attention—the probing, the receiving, the wider, the narrower. That's part of the work. Again, it's quite subtle, but it's part of the work. There's something active in a jhāna. There are other modes of attention that are possible. I could wrap the jhānic quality around the body and dissolve it in, or dissolve my body out. There are many things. Play. Find modes of attention that work. Creative.

Even if I say savor whatever is the primary nimitta, the primary factor of that—like the pīti in the first jhāna—to really relish it, to really savor it, actually involves a kind of active work. It's not just—if I really want to relish it to the max, I actually have to play with how I'm relating to it.

So there's an acronym that some of you who've met over the years with me individually have heard.

What do I need? When I'm in a jhana, I need to know what I need to do now. As I said, at first I don't do anything. I'm just there. It's going along. I'm going along on this momentum of the water through the burst dam. I'm not doing anything. I'm just like, "Wow, wow, wow, wow, wow." After a while, you see, "Oh, hold on, there is work to do."

What's the work that I have to do? What's important and what's not important? Because what's important tells me what work I have to do. What's not important is not part of the work that I have to do.

So there's an acronym: SASSIE. S-A-S-S-I-E. I'm not just sitting there—I'm doing something. Don't just sit there, do something. Sometimes you can go into non-doing, but again, that's really just a mode in the larger context.

So SASSIE. The first S stands for suffusion, as the Buddha said—suffusing, saturating the whole body. This is one of the things I'm working towards. Once the pīti is there, I'm working towards making sure—can I encourage, can I help the whole body space to be completely homogeneously suffused and saturated by the pīti? At some point it will be suffused and saturated. It's just done. Then that job is done. There's nothing more to do. What else am I going to do? It's suffused and saturated. So it's done. And we've talked about ways of playing with that and what to do when it doesn't quite work.

The A in SASSIE stands for absorption. Sometimes, I don't know if you've had this experience, but sometimes it's almost as if the pīti can feel—or whatever it is, the happiness or whatever—can feel almost like it's in front of you a little bit. You've got your citta and body here somehow, and it's kind of in front, or something like that. We're aiming to... Can I get more absorbed in it? Can I put myself and put the citta more inside it so I really feel like I'm in something? To me, I would say that absorption has no limit to it. There's no limit to it.

Let me say something else about the suffusion, then come back to the absorption. When I'm trying to suffuse, I'm not looking around my body, feeling which spaces don't have pīti. That's almost like turning your attention to the negative a little bit. It's more like just... Don't take it away from the pīti and obsess with what's wrong. Just let the pīti spread. Spread it out like you're spreading jam on toast, rather than attending to the negative. Remember that subtle inclination of mind towards negativity, towards what's wrong, towards not quite good enough.

Eventually, as I said, when we become more and more familiar with pīti and more and more familiar with moving in and out of the first jhāna, the pīti will be spread every time.

It's just normal.

And eventually when we're more and more familiar with it, with the pīti, as I mentioned yesterday—and I put a lot of emphasis on this—we can start, if we want sometimes, to see pain, to play with perception so we see pain as pīti. That painful area in the body, I see it as pīti and it's therefore pleasurable. You can do that all the way through the jhānas. So I could see the same painful spot as happiness or stillness or nothingness or whatever.

Now, when I say that, what's the point of that? It's not like, "Oh, that's a pretty handy thing. That can come in useful if you're uncomfortable on a long bus ride or whatever it is." Yes, it might, but that's not really the point. And it's certainly not the point to try and think, "Oh, now I can do that. Then I can live a pain-free life." That's not the point either. The Buddha had plenty of pain. I have plenty of pain. That's not the point.

The point is it's telling me something about the malleability of perception. It's telling me something about the dependence of appearances and experiences on the way of looking. Dependent on the way of looking, there's this experience. Dependent on another way of looking, there's a different appearance, a different experience. When I understand the emptiness of all things—in other words, that all appearances, all experiences do depend on the way of looking—when I really understand that, it empowers, or rather it tells me about, that means that perceptions are malleable and it empowers my ability to be malleable with perceptions.

So I said—I think it was yesterday—I said this is the most significant thing. This is the most significant thing in the Dharma. This is the most significant thing, or it's more significant, I think I said, than "Is this a correct jhāna? Am I in or out of that jhāna?" I said that, yeah? It's the most significant thing, but it's not our primary emphasis or intention on this retreat. So as a practice modality, it's secondary. In other words, just play with that a little bit once you're familiar with pīti and another jhāna factor. It doesn't become like the main practice.

So philosophically, in terms of its implications for our life and our understanding and our liberation, it's the most significant thing. In the context of jhāna retreat, it's a secondary practice, just something you can play with now and then. Do you understand the difference?

Back to the absorption thing. Can it be the case that we can be so absorbed that we don't hear sounds, for instance, you don't hear the birds chirp or sing or whatever it is, and the sense doors close? Again, the Pali Canon, the Buddha doesn't describe the first four jhānas that way. The Visuddhimagga does, I think. Sometimes in the Pali Canon, the Buddha says that happens in the formless jhānas, in jhānas five to eight. But other passages, the Buddha doesn't say that. He describes them with the senses still open.

So obviously, the Visuddhimagga is an improvement over what the Buddha said, right? Well, hold on. Make sure you don't have a notion of heresy. Or do you have a notion of heresy? Because some people approach Dharma axiomatically from the beginning—whatever the Buddha said is true and right and the authority. There's actually probably, I don't know what percentage of Buddhists approach Buddhism that way. So how are you doing with that one?

Is it possible that someone who lived after the Buddha could improve on the Buddha's teaching? I would say exactly the same thing. Why not? But I really mean that as a question, an actual question. If you think it's not possible, why? Why is it not possible? How are you thinking about the whole thing that something like that becomes not possible?

In every other field of human endeavor, there's the possibility of improving. So Einstein improved on Newton, who improved on Copernicus. At the moment, there's maybe something wrong with Einstein's theory.

We're going to need to improve on that pretty soon.

This raises an interesting question that I won't delve into fully here—I've discussed it elsewhere—but let's consider: if we accept that the Buddha's teaching is complete and perfect, then the question becomes straightforward. Do the senses close in jhana or not? Do I hear the birds or do I not hear the birds? If you decide the Buddha is right, then you hear the birds. End of discussion.

But if you think it's possible that someone could improve on the Buddha's teaching, then the question becomes more open. If you ask me whether anyone in the history of Buddhism has improved on the Buddha or on certain aspects of his teaching, I would say yes—I think Nagarjuna did. He took what the Buddha said somewhat briefly and didn't fully expand upon. If you know the Kaccayana Sutta and its teaching on the middle way between existence and non-existence, it's all there in the Pali Canon. But Nagarjuna took it, really expanded it, worked with it, explored its implications—to me, that's a genuine improvement. I'm not imposing this view on anyone, but that's my assessment.

So how are we going to decide about this question? Is the Visuddhimagga's assertion that your senses close and you can't hear the birds an improvement or not? Certainly, we're talking about deeper absorption, more intense absorption, because you can't hear anything. That must be better, right? More is more. More is better.

Again, I'd like us to use our intelligence here. If we're going to say it's better, why is it better? Why is deeper absorption necessarily better? This connects back to what I was discussing at the beginning: How am I thinking? How am I conceiving of the jhanas? How am I conceiving of awakening? And how am I understanding the place of jhanas in relation to awakening?

Why would deeper absorption be better? You have to explain the whole framework—what are we doing? Where are we going? What are we doing with jhanas? You can construct a conception that views jhanas as requiring laser-beam attention—that deeper absorption must be better because insight arises from this laser-beam attention that can dissect momentary reality, perceiving the super-fast arising and passing of the aggregates. This becomes "ultimate reality," seen through laser-beam attention. If I think that's the ultimate insight—well, I've been through all this before and won't repeat it all—but is more necessarily better? What is the actual fruit of that deeper absorption?

You can turn things around and investigate this directly. Spend time with people who have that degree of absorption, or who claim to have it. Learn about how they are, how their life unfolds, what their insight is like. Talk with them about deep insight questions. Does it bear fruit? What kind of fruit does it bear?

Absorption, I would say, is potentially infinite. However absorbed we are, the question remains: what work am I trying to do in practice, in this moment, in this jhana, or with this quality of awareness? Am I trying to get more absorbed? I can never reach the end of that continuum. Someone says, "Oh, I didn't hear the birds." Another person claims, "Well, someone could have been sawing off my neck with a chainsaw and I wouldn't have felt anything." Okay, that person might seem "better," but it doesn't matter. What's the fruit?

In terms of the relationship between work and play, absorption gives us a direction. However absorbed I am, I can always be more absorbed, but I don't need to worry so much about it. It's just a little bit more. It's not a question of "Do I have it or don't I have it?" "Is this real jhana because I can still hear the birds?"

It's not that question. It's just it gives you a direction that's open-ended. And that, in a way, takes the pressure off. And it avoids this whole question of do I have it, do I not have it? Do you understand?

So the work with that one, when you're suffused in the first samādhi, it's just done. I've done it. Okay, I don't have to bother about it. With this one, it's just a constant kind of part of the creative working and playing. Is it possible to get more inside it? Is it possible to get really, really into it? And it's open, so it's a direction that invites subtle work and play, but it's not something I'm going to fret about. One day might be better than the other, it doesn't matter.

Two S's in the middle of "sassie." Sustaining the pīti, or in the case of the first jhāna, whatever is the primary nimitta of whatever jhāna you're working in, and sustaining the attention on that. These two as well, I would say they're infinite and they're infinite in their possibilities. So however much we sustain, we can always increase the sustaining.

And if you look closely enough—and I don't want you to do this at the moment—if you look closely enough, you can see that there's micro nanoseconds, even if it's so sustained, the attention is so, so sustained. I just have to look at it in a certain way and see that there's micro nanoseconds where it wasn't. But don't do that. And I'll explain why at the end.

But it's a direction. I'm working towards, okay, this is right now what I need to work on. Really sustaining, really keeping the mind on this subtle object, on this refined object. Or if it feels like there's gaps in the pīti, again, or the happiness or whatever. If I look at it closely enough, I will see gaps. So again, it's something to bring a little more discernment, intelligence to, and it's just, however sustained those things are, they can be more sustained.

So I'm working, they're a direction of work, a direction of play, as opposed to an achievement thing and a definition thing. I define it as, it wasn't a jhāna because it was all going great and then I heard one bird chirp. So at that second there I was out of the jhāna and then the next second I was back in. It's all just—it's not that helpful to think that way. Just work on more sustaining.

S-A-S-S-I. The I is for intensity. So in this case if we're talking about the first jhāna it's the intensity of pīti. And I would say that actually doesn't matter. So again, the very common tendency would be like, well, it must be better if it's more intense, right? No, it actually doesn't matter. It has to be strong enough that it's pleasant. And that's it.

The intensity will vary over time. You will notice. You will also notice if you play with certain things, sometimes there's things you can do that build the intensity. Over time with the first jhāna—like, I mean, you know, a lot of time in and out of the first jhāna, a lot of marinating, a lot of experience and skill developing with it—the intensity will actually get less intense. It's like that mountain river that I was talking about. That's the direction of maturation, not more and more intensity.

So there's a certain way that the intensity of the first jhāna, A doesn't matter and B will anyway in its own time get less intense.

S-A-S-S-I-E is for enjoy, which sometimes I find myself having to say to people, it's almost like you want to meditate with a flashing neon sign that says enjoy, enjoy, enjoy, enjoy, enjoy. Sometimes it's almost like you say, you know, it may be that if you just really seek to maximize enjoyment in the moment over and over with whatever ingenuity and creativity and play you want, that that will basically take you where you want to go and whatever needs to happen will happen just from the intention to maximize enjoyment. It's very different from is this it, is this not it, am I doing it right, et cetera.

But how many times have I heard from retreatants practicing jhāna, how difficult it is to allow oneself to really enjoy, to fully enjoy. And how so often we notice there's something holding back or something blocking or preventing. Sometimes it's a verbal—we actually say, this can't be right, this can't be, I don't know what they're teaching here, but it's not proper Dharma or whatever it is. Sometimes, or more often, it's actually more an energetic thing. We actually just feel ourselves holding back or preventing and then doubt comes, is this really okay, et cetera.

Sometimes it's because of one's past, maybe particular kinds of religious upbringings that kind of stress that anything spiritual or religious can't have enjoyment, have anything to do with it. Sometimes it might be our Dharma background, our Buddhist Dharma background that has again encouraged a sort of snobbishness around enjoyment.

Again, all because of certain views around where we're going and then certain views that get entrenched in terms of persona and all the rest of it. So this is so common. This is really, really common.

What needs to happen with this? Sometimes a person needs to actually inquire with themselves or with a friend or with the teacher. Actually, what are the views and what am I believing here? And what's actually at the root of this psychology, this belief?

Perhaps more often though, it just gets fixed without a big psychological process. It just gets fixed moment to moment. Okay, I notice I'm a little bit holding back the bliss. Can I just enjoy it? What would it be like—can I just this moment—can I just find, can I just really savor it and relish it? Can I just really open to it? So you're just moment to moment encouraging the enjoyment, and that is changing the psychological habit patterns, deeply entrenched psychological habit patterns around enjoyment, around spirituality.

So more often I've noticed it can be healed, that pattern, that holding, that prevention can be healed just by moment to moment, again and again. I don't have to have a big psychological process about it, but sometimes some people do. It's really helpful to inquire into that.

The work, the play, it's very labile. It's very responsive. It's very agile. What is the work play right now? What do I need to do right now? And sometimes it is: enjoy what you have. Enjoy what you have. Maximize the enjoyment. Again, how powerful that "it's not quite good enough. It's not as good as it was yesterday. It's not as..." And that micro tendency of the psychology to poo-poo what we have or to find fault—to look actually what happens is, of everything we could pay attention to, something nice is going on, something that could be better, we pay attention to the thing that could be better. It's an inclination of attention even more than it is of actual thought. "No, this really isn't that good"—that's quite a gross level. Sometimes it's just where the attention goes. I'm fussing over what's not quite right.

So if I just enjoy what you have, enjoy the good thing. Sometimes that's the emphasis that needs to be there. Such a great gift in terms of re-educating, reprogramming the psyche over and over. These micro moments bring psychological change.

And other times, you know, it's pleasant, it's nice, it's good, it's going well, the mind is definitely stable, good feeling, whatever it is—pīti, sukha, whatever—but there's just a slight, very, very slight dullness to what's happening. Not falling asleep or anything. It's just... it could be one needs to actually bring more presence. We're talking very subtle now. Bring more aliveness. Bring more alertness. One needs to actually exercise more experimentation and play rather than just sit there and say, "It's okay. It's good. It's fine." Probe more, whatever it is. Play with the intensity up and down. Play with the modes of intention.

So sometimes something's pleasant, we say, "Oh, that's good." But actually what we need to do, for example, is: now can I really ramp up the intensity of the attention in this moment and really penetrate that? So often, as I said, this business of intensity of attention—many people are not familiar with this because you don't get taught that in school. So we need to familiarize ourselves. What is it in this moment? What does it feel like?

How do I do it? Turn the intensity up, for example. But that will take me in some moments to another level. At other times it will be more just the receptivity. At other times it will be don't fuss with trying to make it better—just enjoy it.

So what we need to do at any moment is a constantly shifting ground, kaleidoscope. What's quite common, I mentioned for instance this experience of white light or golden light—that's pretty common. I call that a secondary nimitta. It's a secondary sign that the samādhi is deepening. The primary one again, if we're talking about the first jhāna, the primary one is the pīti.

So what can happen is the bright light starts to get very interesting and the pīti is there as well. This is quite important. Can I blend them? Because the light is good and it's helpful and it's a sign, but can I mix them so they're almost like two aspects of the same thing, two facets of the same thing? So that if I'm probing the pīti, it's the same as probing the light. I have the experience that probing the pīti is probing the light. And if I'm probing the light, I can probe the light as something that will take me deeper into the pīti. In other words, they're just aspects of the same phenomenon.

If I can't blend them, then I have to be really sure what's primary and what's secondary, and the light is secondary. Just leave it. It's fine—it's a good sign, but it's not the primary thing. The primary thing is the pīti, and that's what I'm trying to really get into. But oftentimes it is possible. Do you understand what I mean, mix them together? It's almost like visually entering the light is the same thing as entering the pīti.

The two kinds of sustaining—they're both referring to steadiness. One is steadiness of the attention and one is steadiness of the primary nimittas, the steadiness of the pīti. In other words, it doesn't go away for a second or whatever and come back. Or if it's the second jhāna, it's the happiness or whatever. So two kinds of sustaining.

We use this term mastery, and all this is part of developing mastery. Mastery is not about measuring the self and getting brownie points and ego stuff. It's about working with the jhānas in a way that they're going to really be most fruitful.

So what happens here: I am meditating. Now I've gotten into the first jhāna and it's trundling on very nicely. And then something happens—I've just been thrown out of that realm. I'm not even sure what happened. I've just been ejected. Or it was beginning, it feels like it's losing power a little bit, and then it's gone.

After that happens—actually you can try this from the beginning once you feel like, okay, this must be the territory of the first jhāna—when that happens, when you lose it, see if you can just remember it. Just remember back the first jhāna or whatever it is. Just see if you can do that. It was a recent experience. It was alive. Just remember it back. Just summon it back. It's a very delicate, light movement.

Of course, sometimes you won't be able to, and you'll have to go back to your base or springboard practice. Or if you're in another jhana, you might find a jhana lower down or whatever. So these are all things you can try.

Towards the end of a sitting, if you're not completely out of energy, you could practice just a couple of minutes or whatever - two or three minutes, five minutes. You could practice deliberately going from, let's say you were in the first jhana or thereabouts, deliberately going from there to a kind of more normal consciousness. You just drop, just come out of it deliberately. Spend some time there, a few moments, and then see if you can come back to the first jhana. Just jump straight back into the first jhana. So you're more deliberately jumping.

All this - what I'm going to give you ideas to try - it's all very light. It's just fun and games. It's just play. I mean, it is part of mastery, but you have to have a very light attitude to it. You're just playing with perception, basically, playing with consciousness, playing with realms.

Now, we talked about walking meditation instructions, right? Should I just briefly go through that again? Again, all this applies to where is my learning edge playground. Let's say I'm now getting used to the first jhana, I've been in and out and it's super exciting and I'm into it. When I go to the walking period, I stand at one end of my walking path, and I just see - can I go to the energy body? Remember back the first jhana? And I just stand there, maybe piti comes, and I just stand and get into the piti and work with it, suffuse it, et cetera - the same deal. And I stand there as long as it takes or as long as I want to.

So I could spend the whole walking period just standing there and it becomes a standing period - it's fine. Or after some minutes when I feel like, "Okay, there's the piti and I'm really into it, whole body, everything," then I can begin to walk. And the question is, can I keep that focus? Can I keep the primacy of the piti around as I'm walking? And how fast do I have to walk to do that?

So the interesting thing is I might need to walk really fast or I might need to walk really slow. I have to be really responsive to find what is the pace. All of this is responsive, sensitive and responsive. I can stop anywhere on the path and get into the piti again, go to the end, take my time, however long I want. Basically I'm walking up and down in the piti and focusing on the piti, in that bubble and enjoying and opening and probing that bubble. That's basic walking instructions.

Now, some of this - what I'm going to put out now - actually, you have to be a little careful with the pacing of when you try it. But after you've had enough experience or familiarity with the first jhana and the piti, then let's say you're in the lunch queue and it's not your turn to dole the food on your plate. You're in the lunch queue and - can I be there in the lunch queue and just remember back the piti and maybe even the whole jhanic state? And maybe you get it back and then can I get into it for thirty seconds, a minute? If it's a really slow lunch queue, however long.

Or you're having a cup of tea in the lounge or the library. Just let me see - can I find the piti? Is it there? Can I summon it? Can I remember it and then get into it? Or you're walking down the corridor here. Let's just see, I walk down the corridor. Let's see if I can walk down the corridor in the piti. I'm just remembering or summoning it very, very lightly. Or you're sitting on the toilet or you're lying down in bed before - whatever.

So what you're really doing is deliberately remembering the state, deliberately remembering the perception actually, and the subtlest of intentions, the subtlest of intentions to recall it. You have to have enough familiarity with the piti and the jhana to begin to try this. You don't want to try it too early because it would just be a bit frustrating.

Sometimes a little whisper, a silent whisper in the mind - for instance, "rapture," which is one of the translations of piti, or "bliss" or whatever, or "piti" if you want Pali - just like a grain of something into the citta and it does its magic. The mind, as samadhi gets deeper and deeper, the mind becomes more and more suggestive. Very, very subtle suggestions actually work their magical power. But this needs enough familiarity. You don't want to try it too early or put too much pressure on.

This is the sort of thing that in one-to-one interviews, I might wait until I suggest this to a person. You get the sense - and sometimes I find myself more aware that it's available. It's almost that you can feel it in them, but the person hasn't realized that it's just available yet.

Sometimes a teacher might suggest to you, "Why don't you try this?" Eventually you can begin your sittings the way I described in the walking period. You can actually begin with piti, begin with the first jhana, or if the third jhana is your learning edge playground, you begin with the third jhana through this very, very subtle intention.

Of course, sometimes while you're still working on that, sometimes you'll try it and think, "Okay, rapture. Come on now." Give it five or ten minutes maximum. If it's not igniting, it's not igniting. Fine. Return to the base practice. But in time, this becomes more than anything else the way you get into jhana. You just remember it. You just have this subtlest of intention. This is part of the elements of mastery.

We have to be careful with energy here because one of the functions of the base practice or springboard practice is that it actually gives energy. You build energy through it. So if you just start right away with the piti, sometimes it will go for a little while, but the whole sitting will run out of steam sooner. The analogy I sometimes use is like a long jumper who needs a run-up, though that analogy doesn't really work perfectly when you think about it, because some long jumpers don't always need run-ups.

The base practice functions sometimes as that energy builder. We might find the piti right away—great! But then fifteen minutes later, it's all dissipated. We didn't have enough energy built up from the base practice. It's still worth playing with though. At that point, simply go back to the base practice. What's more important here is the malleability.

When you reach that point—and again, don't hurry any of this—some people hear all this and want to try it immediately, but it's too soon. Other people think, "I could never do that. It sounds completely advanced and outlandish," when actually they're ready for it. So talk with teachers about it. Try a little bit. Keep it all very light, but probably wait for these developments to unfold naturally.

At first, not every time, just occasionally try beginning your sitting with subtle intention. Eventually it becomes possible to do this consistently. But what do you do when you're sitting and it's all going really well? You sit, and you sit more, and you sit more. You basically sit as long as it's good. "Good" means primarily as long as this jhana is beneficial—marinate in it.

There's a place for moving quickly between jhanas, but it has a very minor role. Much more important is to marinate. Sit as long as this jhana is sustainable and feels beneficial. This marination is so important. We want to work toward a minimum capacity—let's say being able to sit in really nice piti, really absorbed, for an hour, if you don't have work obligations or other commitments.

If you're zipping through one to eight, racing through all the jhanas and then coming back down from eight to one as your practice, ask yourself honestly: Is that making much difference to your life? What difference is it making? How much difference? If it's not making a significant impact, why practice that way? Maybe someone taught you that approach, maybe that's your understanding of the texts, but why continue if it's not transformative?

The point of all this is to make a difference—a real profound, liberating, beautiful difference, a whole depth of resource and all the other qualities we've discussed. So the marination is one of the primary things that will really make the difference.

I'm sitting as long as I can within my playground—let's say that's the pīti of the first jhāna. Then at some point I start to run out of batteries. My energy goes down a little bit. Either the pīti begins to subside and the mind starts to get more distracted, or areas of the body start to get uncomfortable with pain or whatever.

Is it possible to resurrect it? I've run out of batteries, but sometimes it's almost like you get a little emergency supply somewhere that you can tap into. I just resurrect the pīti, find a way, and it comes back for some minutes perhaps. This is all very variable—maybe you get a couple of shots at an extra five or ten minutes just by resurrecting it. The fact that it disappeared doesn't mean you can't somehow find a way to get it back. Maybe that involves going back to your base or springboard practice.

But at a certain point, it's like okay, there's no more juice in the tank. It's not going to come back. Then it's time to do something different. Either you get up and do walking meditation or standing meditation, or you just go have a cup of tea. Go and relax, rest the citta, appreciate, look at the beauty outside. Put the mind in that restful, open, light gratitude. Maybe it's time for your yoga practice or whatever it is. Maybe you go for a walk.

There will be times in this kind of practice where you need to rest—you just need to rest if we're doing it this way. You actually need to rest and recharge rather than just sit, walk, sit, walk, sit, walk continuously. Again, you have to be careful about the pacing of when you begin to try this.

But eventually, as I mentioned, part of mastery is that you can go for a walk—not just walking meditation, but you can go for a walk in your bubble of pīti, giving that the primary attention. Or you can go for a walk in your bubble of peacefulness of the third jhāna or stillness of the fourth jhāna, whatever. Your primary focus is on that quality—that primary quality of stillness, peacefulness, pīti, whatever it is—and you're really enjoying it. You're not really having to worry about where the feet place themselves.

So when is it time to introduce trying to play with this? You can talk to us and find out, or just try it. You don't want to put too much pressure on yourself, and you have to be careful with the pacing here. At first, it's all just games. Okay, let's see if I can walk from here to that tree over there in pīti. Maybe it's fifty yards or whatever—it doesn't matter. Gradually you can extend that. But this is part of the fun, part of the playing, and part of the mastery. No pressure. Very light. It's really just playfulness.

Let's say you're sitting and it's time to come out of the jhāna. The lunch bell goes and if you're into it, it's like, who cares about lunch? That's actually a very healthy response. Then you remember, oh, I have lunch wash-up to do, so I need my lunch. Okay, I need to end.

Coming out—sometimes at first, coming out of a jhāna, you need to do it quite slowly because it's really quite an altered state. If you just open your eyes and jump up, it might be disorienting or jarring. So when you're new to certain states, I would suggest coming out quite gradually.

But secondly, as part of that, sometimes see if it's possible to keep the jhāna quality around. Keep a connection with that and have it even be the primary focus. So okay, I'm going now to lunch or whatever it is. I'm sitting. Open the eyes. As I open the eyes, I'm still really in touch with the pīti if we're talking about the first jhāna or whatever it is. As I get up, still. As I move, move out. Maybe as I move out, I begin to lose it. So I just stop a little bit, see if I can get it back, and move again. Again, it's all playfulness.

I'll say this again: when we get to the higher jhānas, you don't need to come out in sequence. Right now we're talking about the first jhāna. Let's say you're working on the third jhāna. When you come out, you don't need to go, "Okay, three, two, one."

You don't need to do it. Just as you don't need to go 1, 2, 3 to get into the third jhana. So sometimes you can do that just because that's the game you've decided to play that day. Otherwise you could do 3, 1, 2 and then come out or whatever, or 3 to 0 or whatever. But you certainly don't need to do that.

A couple of things that are in a way implicit in what I've said, but so important: patience and perseverance.

The more you do this practice, the more you realize that the state of the citta and the perception can experience quantum jumps in a split second. Often unexpectedly—nothing's really happening, nothing's really happening, and suddenly there's an opening.

If I'm getting dejected and despondent when nothing is happening, if I'm getting impatient and kind of giving up the alertness and refinement of my antennae, that very attitude will prevent these quantum jumps from happening because I've turned something off. But if you can keep them alive—in other words, don't get sucked into impatience, don't get sucked into a view of "I'm terrible" or whatever—then you're entirely there. And it's really quite remarkable how quickly things can shift. There's just a quantum leap and suddenly a door is there and you can go through it.

So that's patience and perseverance because that kind of thing is possible. But patience and perseverance with playfulness—really, really important.

This means: Do I need to be a bit more active here? Do I need to bump up the sense of presence, the aliveness? Do I need to make sure my antennae are attentive to subtleties? Do I need to try different things? Do I need to play with the subtle effort levels—a bit more, a bit less? So patience and perseverance, but with playfulness.

And always this question: What needs emphasizing? What needs prioritizing right now? Right now in this moment, what needs emphasizing? What needs prioritizing?

Is it that in this moment, or for this little stretch of time, the concentration—the stability of attention on the object, on the breath or the primary nimitta, the pīti, or whatever—is that what needs the emphasis right now, the priority? Or is it the subtlety of attention that needs the emphasis and the priority now? Or is it the surrendering? Or is it the spreading? Or is it the maximizing of the enjoyment moment to moment?

These are all different emphases. "Okay, now for this little stretch in this practice period, that's what I'm emphasizing. Or that's what needs emphasizing." This is what I mean by a kind of playfulness, agility, responsiveness, willingness.

Some of you might have heard the instruction to review a jhana after you're out. Has anyone heard that before? So this gets interpreted different ways, but I'd say one of the things is, one of the questions to ask is: Was there anything new that I learned there? Was there anything new for me? Anything helpful that I learned? In other words, something happened that felt like it was an opening, an improvement, a deepening or whatever in some way. Was there anything different that I did perhaps? Anything at all. And just to remember it at that point before you get up and try it again. And it might have been a coincidence. It might not have been that thing, but it might be—yes, it was that thing that you did or did differently or a different weighting or emphasis or whatever.

In the larger scale of things, you might want to check: Am I neglecting the first and second jhana, for instance? So it's more of a macroscopic checking, reviewing.

Sometimes what you often hear is that part of reviewing a jhana after a jhana is to review the fact of its impermanence—lest you mistake a jhana for a permanent thing. I find that a little puzzling because it's completely obvious, or it should be completely obvious, that it's impermanent. It should be completely obvious, or it becomes much more obvious with time, that it's also not an achievement of the self. Jhana is dependent on certain causes and conditions coming together. And the more you practice, the more that should become glaringly obvious.

There's actually very little danger of getting attached to expecting a jhana to be permanent, and also very little danger of the self getting grandiose, I think. So it's dependent on causes and conditions. A jhana is also—so it's definitely impermanent, it's dependent on causes and conditions, it's also empty. In terms of the deeper levels of its emptiness, don't do that yet. Don't contemplate its emptiness yet.

Even some of you won't quite know what that means. But if you're familiar with emptiness practice, leave that aside. It's something we'll come back to later as an option. And that's not part of reviewing a jhana.

And also, don't contemplate its microscopic impermanence. Don't do that either. That will not be helpful at this point. We don't want to deconstruct jhanas too soon. We want to let them construct. Deconstructing a jhana too soon is really like throwing the baby out with the bathwater. I've actually missed the point. We can always deconstruct later. What we want is actually to consolidate, to see it and experience it as something continuous and homogeneous, not impermanent with lots of holes in it and not full of its opposite.

Outside of Formal Practice

Outside of formal practice, when you're doing your work or just having a shower or whatever you're doing, there are times when the citta needs to rest. You really need to not put too much pressure on it. But there's a spectrum there because still you can have quite a light contact or light presence, light sense of the presence of the primary jhana factor, the pīti or whatever.

The whole flavor of that can vary. Either you can completely rest, just let the whole thing go, or you can be like, "I'm moving down the corridor really in this pīti," or going for a walk in this pīti, or you can just be moving around with just a light sense of the flavor of the primary jhana factor, whether it's pīti or sukha or whatever it is.

Generally speaking, the whole tone and tenor of the practice outside of sitting should be really quite light, really quite easy, open. Just this light mindfulness, open, light, easy. That's the vibe of things.

We also, outside of formal sittings—and again, remember all this is jhana practice, all of it—we also want to be vigilant to the coming and going of the hindrances. And not take them personally, if that's possible, and not believe them. But we're aware because they come and they're like poison darts. The hindrance comes and it spreads its poison into the citta, and then it starts coloring the view of the self. It starts coloring the view of other people. It starts coloring the view of the perception, the view of the retreat. Hindrances are like poison darts. We need to be really quite aware when they're around, not believe them, not take them personally.

So that's good. We got through what I was intending. What that means for tomorrow is I may well be in, or depending on what happens at hospital, I may not be in. But at least we've done that. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 208

Q & A

Rob Burbea · 1h22

> In this Q&A session from a jhāna retreat, Rob Burbea offers practical guidance for common challenges in concentration practice. He begins with essential teachings on the hindrances (nīvaraṇa), emphasizing the importance of not taking them personally and recognizing how they can poison perception through proliferating thought (papañca). The discussion covers a wide range of practitioner experiences: working skillfully with over-efforting, navigating the transition between jhānic states when absorption becomes too deep, and managing the excitement and creative inspiration that often accompanies pīti. Burbea addresses questions about maintaining jhānic states outside formal sitting practice, dealing with energetic blocks that arise during deepening concentration, and the relationship between different types of happiness - from excitement to the serene sukha of deeper jhānic states. Throughout, he emphasizes the malleability of mental states through different ways of relating, the importance of clear intention on retreat, and practical techniques like the 'sunbathing' approach to receiving pleasant experiences. His responses demonstrate the subtle art of jhāna practice, where micro-adjustments in attention and relationship can transform entire meditative experiences.

Rather than give you more material today, we'll have some questions and responses. You've got enough to work with and work on for a while, and I don't want to overwhelm you further.

Before we open it up, let me offer just a couple of reminders. First, remember what I said about the hindrances—they're going to come, in case you hadn't noticed. They're going to come and go. The whole thing is like this.

What do we want in relation to the hindrances? We want to be working on them—antidotes, what can I try? The same creativity, the same responsiveness, the same awareness and sensitivity, working on them when they come. But we also want, in terms of wisdom, not to take them personally. It doesn't mean your practice has now forever fallen through the floor into the hell realms and you'll be stuck there forever. It doesn't mean you can't do this. It doesn't mean you're a failure. It doesn't mean any of that.

This is really, really important because when the hindrance is around, they're like little poisons and they poison the mind. The mind starts believing all kinds of things, particularly about the self, about one's practice. So we really need to keep the view screwed on right with them.

Recognize that this is a hindrance. Self-doubt is a hindrance. "I can't do this"—it's doubt. It's a hindrance. When they come, they make us prone to believing all kinds of things about someone else, about Gaia House, about ourselves, about the retreat, about life. They really are like a poison dart, and then it spreads in the bloodstream and everything gets caught up and toxified through that and the whole way we look at things. So not to take them personally and not to believe the stories they spin.

The hindrance in itself is more at a very base level—it's not at a complex level of the mind. It's a very basic level. When we're not careful, the complex story-making, world-building levels of the mind get infected by the hindrances. That's papañca. Then we go bonkers.

Over time, we learn to wean the papañca off, to refine it off the hindrances. The hindrance just becomes more and more like just a bit antsy or whatever it is—the basic energy of it without it proliferating, which is what papañca means, proliferating to these other levels. But they will come and go.

On the scale of things, how you feel right now—some of you will be flying and some of you will be really not flying—it's just part of the up and down. If you're up, guess what? And if you're down, guess what? And if you're in the middle, guess what? It takes a while to get used to this.

If you were to do a really long jhāna retreat, it becomes so obvious that our whole relationship to it becomes different—we have a much more spacious perspective. Of course we prefer the hindrances not to be there. Of course. But the whole added sense of "Oh, this is terrible, I'm terrible"—all that stuff goes more and more. That's what we're aiming for with the hindrances.

Let's open it up to some questions. Questions that feel relevant to your practice, wherever that is right now. Whatever you're working on, whatever you're learning—your edge, your playground—or something I've said about the bigger picture that maybe needs clarification or integration.

Now I can't see. Is that Lauren? It is Lauren. Okay.

Let me just repeat, if I understand it, that Lauren's noticing a sort of cyclic pattern of over-efforting, and when that pattern is there, it's very convincing to believe that you have a really major problem with getting stuck in over-efforting and that you need to back way off. What's the question then?

Okay, so needing some moral support and some skillful ways of working with it. Yeah.

For moral support—I don't know if it helps you, but it's certainly a pattern I can relate to. I can look back over the last thirty-six years and say, yeah, I've really been in that in different ways, in different modalities of practice and at all kinds of levels. I felt like I was stuck there or felt like it was a real personality problem and all that. So I don't know if that makes you feel better or worse.

I look back at all that and I feel like for myself there was a lot of cost to it in different ways, but there's been more blessing than cost. I'm glad that over-efforting may come from a really deep love and a really deep desire and a really deep yearning for something. These are all really beautiful qualities.

If you have something like that, then you have—sometimes I say to someone, I'm actually saying it to someone else who's here—it's like you've been given a really powerful horse to ride. And you have to learn how to handle that horse. You could have been given a little—I don't know if you've been to Dartmoor and seen those little ponies. They're very different kinds of animals, and handling one and handling the other requires different skills. So there's a tremendous gift here, but it takes longer to learn how to handle it. Does that make sense?

It really can be learned—how to harness the power of that and how to let that willingness to really give yourself an effort and apply yourself and bring your intensity and bring this cohesion of mind and energy and desire, letting that really gather power when we're talking about soul power and all that. It's a really great gift, and it takes time to learn how to let those things come together in a way that they're actually balanced and it works. So it's not a small deal, it's a big deal.

As I've said, the whole question of effort is going to be around in everyone's practice for the rest of their lives. For any serious practitioner, you bump into it. And I would say any really serious practitioner is also going to find it really painful at times. It's not just the effort, it's also the wanting.

So there's an energetic side to over-effort. If I think back to the late '80s, I had a really long period of being stuck in that shaking movement stuff, and it got incredibly wacky. It looked bonkers, and I was twenty-one or twenty-two. Of course, I was just really trying really hard. The teachers at that time had no idea what it was. It got really intense and very weird in terms of its manifestations. It went on for a long time.

Looking back now, I see that the principal causal factor there was slight over-efforting. So there's an energetic side of this and we really need to learn how to handle that. It can have very gross effects—you can just feel like something completely locks. Or it can look like you're a complete raving lunatic. But it can also have very subtle effects. As I said, it's just a little bit too much effort and it actually stimulates the mind to think more and to get slightly distracted more. It's a relatively subtle effect.

But anyway, everyone's going to have to deal with the question of effort. I remember being on long retreats here and just wanting something so badly and not being able to find the answers and finding that so difficult—in tears. I felt like I didn't have anyone to ask or anyone who would give me answers that would satisfy. So it can be intense when we really give ourselves to something.

To me, it's still a good sign.

So it's just saying, okay, you've got a powerful horse you've been given. Let's learn to ride this, you know.

I would have to hear a bit more, Lauren, about what's going on, what ways you're feeling stuck and what you mean by backing way off. When we talk about working with effort, we've got a huge range. One is backing way off, which means just stop meditating—stop whatever it is, sometimes it's fretting about questions, sometimes it's energetic. Just take half a day off and go for a walk. That's pretty rare, but that would be backing way off, for example.

Or backing way off can look like I'm just sitting here, but I'm going into a very different mode in terms of my relationship with whatever the principal object I'm working with, whether it's pīti, whether it's breath, or whatever it is. Or it might mean going to an insight practice for a while—but I've still got my mind engaged, I'm still doing samādhi. That's my intention. I'm just taking this kind of detour into a practice I know brings a lot more ease, and it's within a much larger context.

Or it could be finding an imaginal image that you've worked with in the past that has been helpful in this relationship. That's not... really, in terms of samādhi practice, again, it doesn't have to be just pīti—it can become whatever it becomes. There are lots of ways there. If it looks like, well, right now I'm headed in the wrong direction, it might look like that. But in the bigger picture, it's really not.

If you go into some imaginal practice that changes your whole relationship with being on retreat and what you're doing, that might be exactly what's needed. It looks like a detour. It looks like you've given up something—maybe you haven't. Some part of your consciousness firmly holds the intention and the navigation and where you're going in mind, and it's just very skillful to go off into something else for a while. Does that make sense? Do you want to say a bit more about the specifics, or is it better to work with this one-to-one in an interview?

[Response from student]

Okay, so there's fear in the larger picture that you've been asked or told to back way off, and maybe that same thing will happen on this retreat—maybe we'll say don't meditate, or maybe it's better if you go back home, or whatever at that scale. To address that first: I've very rarely done that as a teacher. I would be extremely surprised if that were my usual way of teaching. So I don't think that's going to happen on this retreat.

In terms of grabbing at the pīti—the other thing you mentioned—the fear is not a neutral factor. It's not like this thing is happening and the fear is there, but it's not affecting anything. When fear is present and when it's strong fear, it's doing something.

So when we talk about what look like detours, it might actually be working with the fear in different ways. We can talk about that in an interview. But it sounds like the fear at this point is strong enough and prominent enough, and probably having quite some effects, that it itself needs working with. It needs understanding. Something in you needs reassuring. You need to be able to diffuse the power of the fear—its energy and its contraction and the belief in the thinking. There are different parts to fear: there's energy, there's the cognitive component (what we're believing that we're afraid of), and the contraction.

One thing is to work with this—again, we can meet in an interview with one of us and really go into that, actually work in real time with the fear. Because as I said, it's not just happening to be there. It's not a neutral factor. It's doing something, and almost certainly what it's doing is not helpful in the mix.

In terms of pīti and grabbing at the pīti, this is really quite common to some degree. I think I mentioned it briefly in one of the talks. The Buddha took the trouble to say exactly that. Why would he say that? Partly because he must have encountered it a lot as a teacher, is my guess. So it's normal.

Let me just say two things for now, and then I think it would be good to meet one-to-one. First: is there access at times to lovely states—not necessarily jhānic, but lovely states sort of other than the pīti—that are much softer or warmer or a bit more expansive or something like that?

[Student responds: "Yes"]

So at times you're able to ask the question, what's pleasant, and find a kind of mild pleasantness. And does that mild pleasantness have a quality of softness to it? Because piti can sometimes be quite intense, and that's often part of the issue.

So that's good. The softness itself is not a neutral factor - it's softening something. That's the thing about jhanas. This whole marinating and resource aspect means that whatever the jhanic quality is, it then affects the citta and the body. So if there's something soft and warm and maybe even soothing that's lovely, then actually hang out in that. Take your time with this. Hang out in that. Feel that touching the heart, touching the body, touching the consciousness.

Sometimes you may want to then put the fear in that. Take the fear, the idea that you've had, and put it in the middle of that - whatever your language would be - of this soft, warm space, and just see what that does. Put the difficult and the lovely into contact with each other. Other times, and you don't need to rush this, you could see if you can hang out in that soft place.

The second thing I want to say about all this: snatching is this kind of movement that, although it looks like something I'm doing, feels to you right now that you're not in control of it. The mind is just grabbing beyond your will. Is it possible to spend much more time in that sunbathing posture? Both with the softness, and then practice that stance, that poise with what's lovely.

Over time that just becomes - maybe that resets the habit. The habit is not so much to immediately grab forward, but also to soak it up, which involves much less doing. So you're training the habit so that both possibilities become more equalized, and eventually you will have autonomy because they're equal - they're equally available possibilities. They've both been practiced equally, and therefore you can begin to choose.

And with that, then you can really soak up that soft whatever it is. Let's not even worry whether it's jhanic or not jhanic - it doesn't matter. It's a skillful state. You want to be tuning into the very softness, the warmth, the healing. There's something that reassures the whole system, the whole nervous system, the mind eventually. But you're really just lapping it up, like soft, gentle water just lapping over the being.

Then when you're used to that, at times maybe you can see if the piti can come up and you have the same stance, the same poise in relation to the piti. When it goes out of that, the mind might quickly want to panic a little bit - "Oh, here it is again, my overefforting" - and all that stuff very quickly gets ignited. But can I keep bringing it back to this more open, receptive, sunbathing, showering poise, this relationship mode of attention?

You also have to think about retraining the sankaras. That grabbing movement is a very base level mind movement. Retraining often happens just by over and over and over doing something different. When we notice it, diffusing that by doing the opposite. Partly just knowing that's what you're doing. It will come up. This habit will come up. You're going to encounter it so many times you can't count. Can I not freak out? Is it possible to just switch the mode in that moment?

Let's see how that goes, but bring that to the interviews because there are lots of details here. It gets very individual. So much depends on micro-moments and microchoices at a subtle level. But how does that sound for now?

Mikhail, yes? So Mikhail is asking - hadn't heard much about the absorption which I mentioned as one of the elements of this sassy, and thought he would try focusing on that. He picked the second jhana, as that's where your playground is anyway, and said, "Okay, let's see if I can get absorbed."

And then did indeed, after a bit of work, find himself very absorbed in this state, a very deep state. But the happiness, he noticed at some point, had gone. And also any sense of energy body experience. So if I ask you, what was prominent in your consciousness at that point? No happiness, no energy body—what was it?

This is definitely possible. There are two possibilities really within that. One is that what happens is the mind does get more absorbed, more concentrated, whatever we say, and actually goes beyond the second jhāna into a less fabricated state. I'm going to have to explain this at more length—I've mentioned it a couple of times—but there's no longer the fabrication of the perception of happiness.

So it might have gone into something like the fourth jhāna, where there isn't the fabrication of perception of happiness. And then it might have gone even beyond that. As you say, it's quite vast and empty. It might have gone into the beginnings of one of the formless jhānas—no body sense, no dominant emotional sense really, apart from a kind of stillness. Or it might have gone into something akin to that, that isn't strictly speaking one of the classical jhānas, but it's in that sort of territory.

It's very possible, but if you want to practice this or that jhāna, I need to know what's the factor in it that's the most important. And in the second jhāna, it's happiness. Unquestionably, it's happiness—for me, at least, that's the way I would emphasize things. It's not even the fact that there's no thinking or whatever; that's secondary. I'll come back to that when we talk about the second jhāna, but it's the happiness.

Now within the second jhāna, the quality of the happiness, as I said—jhānas are not one uniform experience. The second jhāna is not like this every time, where you could take a snapshot and it's just the same thing. There's a whole range within the second jhāna. So you get a very bubbly kind of happiness and a much, much stiller happiness. Part of the art of really learning the second jhāna is getting to know that territory, but also learning to keep the mind focused and fed by the happiness.

So what can happen? Because it gets more subtle within that range, the mind is actually not quite able to stay—it hasn't been trained in staying with that more refined object, that happiness. And it might, because of past experience, be actually more trained with staying with a big empty space, even though technically speaking that's even more refined.

So partly what you can think of as what you're doing in each jhāna is training yourself to really stay with and really absorb in the primary nimitta of that jhāna over its range. And then the other thing is that in the first four jhānas, that means—happiness is an emotion, it's a mental quality, but you really want to feel it in your body as well. So this double-aspected nature of the primary nimitta is actually quite important in the second, third, and fourth jhānas particularly.

If you stopped a guy in the street in Newton Abbot and said—I don't know, asked him to think of something that made him happy and then said, "Can you focus on that happiness?"—it would be the strangest thing. Most people would say, "How do I focus on happiness?" So we're actually learning to do that, and part of what helps, and part of anyway what is the nature of the jhāna because it's a rūpa jhāna, is that we feel the happiness and we focus—we feel the happiness in the energy body as well as in the mind. But what we're focusing on is the energy body experience of happiness, as well as the mental. That has to be there.

So if you're saying, "Okay, my job is, my playground is now the second jhāna," I really have to keep it within those bounds. And for all kinds of historical reasons, it might want to slip out of it. The mind wants something deeper. The mind is just used to going to big open spaces, whatever. But I have to keep bringing it back.

In terms of the happiness, the intensity of the happiness as well as its subtlety can vary. Sometimes in the second jhāna you're really talking about this upsurge of joy—it's almost overwhelming. Sometimes you're talking about almost like it feels like this underground spring that the Buddha was talking about is really the subtlest thing. It's the subtlest thread that you're paying attention to. And your job, if that's your territory, is: how can I keep paying attention to that? And by paying attention to it, I keep it in that realm.

How does this all sound? Exactly, yes. The subtlety of the attention was probably not enough to stay with the subtlety of sukha as it got more subtle. And you're probably more used to that silence a little bit in different forms.

Again, there's a habit of mine. It's just created a groove there. It's great. We're not saying you're never going to—we don't want you ever going there again in your life. We're not saying that. We're just saying, okay, this is my playground.

Eventually we want you to have everything—all the toys and all the swings and everything. But it takes a certain training: when the happiness gets subtle, can I keep it on that subtle happiness without it sliding somewhere else? And that's a training.

In terms of what you said about backing out—so you can back right out, open your eyes, that's great, well done, and then you come back again. In time, you can do it much more subtly than that. You can remember back a certain happiness that you can pay attention to and then just do it again. But you have to have enough experience with the happiness to be able to remember it back, call it back.

Or, if you're familiar with the first jhana, you can go back to the first jhana rather than opening your eyes and all that. Go back to the first jhana. There's definitely, by definition, the bodily experience in the first jhana that's more gross, because the first jhana is less refined, more gross than the second jhana. So you find that, hang out in that for a while, and then see if it goes again by itself, or you can just encourage it to go.

So this kind of maneuvering, as you meet different difficulties, that's all part of the art of it. Back up into a lower jhana, sometimes even go forward and then come backwards—which we'll talk about. But yeah, well done. That's great.

Let me read Andy's note. Is it okay, Andy?

"The citta wants to move towards peacefulness—a deep, delicious, beautiful, dark, juicy peacefulness—rather than piti or sukha, which have been around. I've been working with the peacefulness just as recommended, and will continue to do this as it feels like what the mind-heart really wants. There was such a sense of relief when I let it. Is there anything else I should consider or do on this front?"

Yeah, you know, just take these as well. So each is a part of the work-play you want to do—get used now to that peacefulness.

Actually, let me ask you a question first. Would you also say it's got love in it?

Okay. Love and grace. It has got love and grace in it. Would you say it has a tenderness to it?

Okay, it's got tenderness. Would you say it has a kind of emotional warmth—and almost by implication it does?

Yes. Okay, tick, tick, tick. Okay, good. So it sounds to me like we're in the right territory. Fab. Great.

So what you want to do is let yourself go. The mind really does—it's like it wants to go somewhere. And partly this is dependent on your past experience, you know, a lot of sitting in different places and all that. So yeah, let it go. Let that be your primary playground even now.

And your job then is to really know that territory inside out. And to me, there's quite a lot to discover about the third jhana. Things start to get really quite interesting then in terms of the different aspects and levels of it. So rather than me tell you what to look for, you just hang out there with the awareness, with the sensitivity, noticing what changes, and then you can report back and one of us can talk about it.

Second thing is there's also—what would you say—particular challenges, particular subtle difficulties that are particular to each jhana. And there's some that start to arise in the third jhana. Also, obviously some really beautiful stuff that starts there, but some particular challenges that arise. And again, rather than me tell you what they are, you'll begin to encounter them as well.

And that's exactly what I mean—this sense of where the mind wants to go is very much part of the territory of long-term jhana practice. Some people have a style of practicing jhanas where they simply sit down and see where the mind wants to go, then follow that. I'd say yes, that's wonderful, that's part of it.

But we also want to develop the other capacity. Going back to the horse analogy—sometimes you get on a horse and just see where it wants to go. That's certainly a possible relationship with a horse ride. But we also want the ability to say, "No, I want to go to the bingo hall," or wherever it is we need to go.

Often when people ask me "Should I do this or should I do that?" my answer is: yes, both. We want to have this range. Sometimes I let go of control completely, and sometimes I want to have choice and mastery.

Here's why I chose to read this question out—what might be needed here is recognizing that while in the long term you do want mastery of the first and second jhana, how you get there might be different. It might well be that taking the third jhana as your learning edge right now, really getting to know it and hanging out there, becomes your priority.

After you've been sitting in the third jhana and feeling really, really nice from it, then see if sometimes you can go backwards from the third. By that point the mind has gotten a lot of what it wants in that particular scene. It's drunk from that particular beautiful well, had its submerging, refreshing dunk in that spring. Then it's much more amenable to going back.

You might find—and you'll have to experiment—that maybe it goes right back to the piti, or maybe to the sukha. Going back to the sukha might even be easier because, as you pointed out, the third jhana has sukha in it. So it's easier to get a sense of the sukha. And secondly, the mind is just much more... well, here's where my horse riding analogy gets stretched—the horse has been given the right water to drink.

What's that? The right food to eat, yeah.

Once it has, it's satisfied and it will go. If it knows the food's that way—that it likes, the carrots are that way—and you want to go to bingo, and they won't let the horse in the bingo hall, then once you give it the carrots, it's happy to go to the bingo hall.

So that's one thing. It's also, as you said, the happiness is closer to the... Now, it might be that you just remember the happiness and it comes back. Another little trick you can... Well, actually, if the happiness is there, it's fine. Sometimes people can't get back to the happiness, and then we would offer something else, but I'll leave that for now.

And then from the happiness, you can just... Remember, in the second jhana, it has sukha and piti. In the first jhana, it has sukha and piti. So you're just in a way, slightly shifting what you're bringing out of the mix. But again, attuning to a quality in the mix amplifies it. I amplify the sukha in the second jhana, I amplify the piti in the first. And then going back to that again will be much easier and the mind will be more amenable to that.

Does that sound okay?

Yeah, please.

Well, no, not in the next few days. Marinate in that. That's your primary playground. But as you've already tried, as you already reported, the happiness that's prominent in the second jhana is already available after you've marinated for an hour or two hours or whatever it is, right? So after you feel like I've had a good, long, lovely, refreshing drink of the peacefulness, then try to come back in the happiness. But at the moment, you can spend much, much less time in the happiness than the peacefulness. And let the peacefulness be really where you're hanging out the most.

I don't think there'd be anyone who said the first jhana is a better experience than the third jhana. Unquestionably, the third jhana is lovelier. Maybe there's someone, but it would be pretty unusual. So there's no arguing with that. But what we do want is a sense eventually that, gosh, they're all lovely. They're just lovely in different ways. And even the piti, which relatively speaking is gross, it's really a treasure.

Somehow, whichever way we arrive at it, we want to get back—or get, if you haven't had it before—a sense that, yeah, the first jhana is a really lovely place. The piti is a lovely thing. I have a really good relationship with it. So we're just finding which way will help you get to that being the case.

Does that make sense? Very good.

Anything, please?

Oh, should we try that? Yeah, let's try that. If you're happy to do that.

I've been on a bunch of insight retreats and never deliberately spent time cultivating jhanas. And I believe I'm one of a few people who've experienced third and maybe fourth jhana as a result of just relaxing in the midst of an insight retreat and the mind wanting to go to a very peaceful place.

In all of the experiences of jhana, on and off of retreat—first of all, I've never really verified this with anyone—but it tends to have a flavor of like the floor kind of goes out from under me and I drop into a place that's very different from normal. And sometimes incredibly peaceful, sometimes incredibly blissful.

So I guess my first question is... Well, you don't want us to ask, is that it? So I'm not sure if it's even necessary. I don't want to ask—like if I'm on the right track in those experiences.

Oh, you mean if they are the right experience? No, no, it's not that I don't want you to ask.

Let's take our time with this. I really think it's important to differentiate between genres. People can get so hung up on where the division is and "have I achieved it?" The relationship with that question is often not so helpful. But it may be really fine.

You need to map out the territory for yourself. There are certain ways that people can relate to this questioning that's quite common but really not so helpful. I would need to hear more about those experiences based on what you said. Bring it to our one-to-one interview where we can find out more about what's involved there.

What can happen for someone who's done a lot of insight practice is that one drops in because of the insight—mindfulness, letting go, letting go, letting go. Equanimity is a result of letting go. You get that, right? Equanimity can be defined as the relative absence, the relative attenuation of pushing things away or trying to grab on. In other words, it's a relative degree of letting go, and equanimity is a result of that.

Another way of defining equanimity is as a relative degree of letting go itself. If you just keep letting go—aware, letting go, aware, letting go, aware, letting go—you will end up in some state of equanimity. Equanimity will arise. Does everyone understand that?

Whether that state is a jhanic state of equanimity, well, technically speaking, equanimity begins in the third jhana and goes all the way to the eighth, actually. We'll talk about this when we get to the formless jhanas. The Buddha sometimes describes the formless jhanas as almost like perspectives on equanimity or things you do with equanimity.

So where you are, I'd have to hear more. That's one thing. The second thing is whether it's an actual jhanic state of equanimity. Again, relative to normal consciousness, any state of equanimity and stillness where the mind is quiet and peaceful is going to feel like "wow." We still don't know whether it's a jhanic one.

So we do need to map this stuff out. We need to map it out because it might give us information about how you need to move now. What do you need to prioritize? Where's your playground? How do we need to progress from here? A bit like with Andy—what order are we going to move in here?

"Bottom dropping out from you." Yeah, that can happen. One thing that can happen in the fourth jhana is there's a real sense of sinking—everything kind of goes down. In the fifth jhana though, the bottom can fall out in terms of the floor falls out. Because there's no solidity, it really feels like they've taken the floor away and there's just space, you know? So there are different kinds of bottoms falling out.

"That was sort of the setup for what's happening now. What's happening now is nothing jhanic, actually, on this retreat, as far as I can tell. Nothing like those experiences, in any case. It feels as though, at times, there's plenty of piti, sometimes plenty of sukha, less often. I will feel that kind of beginning of that dropping that I'm used to, and sometimes be able to even conjure it. It feels as though it's on the verge of entering a jhanic state. But what happens instead is that I'm confronted by more intense... I guess it sort of feels like energetic blocks in the body. So as the resolution is being turned up and the subtlety and the sensitivity is being turned up, that's what becomes prominent and it kind of pushes me out."

So you're turning up the resolution at that point? The sensitivity of the attention is going up—it's sort of like all at once goes up quite a bit.

When does that typically occur? This is worth mapping out. I suspect there are certain conditions under which the pleasant tears come versus the more neutral pīti. But even when the pleasant tears arise, you're still finding it challenging to move into jhāna?

Actually, let me step back. When you do get the pleasant tears flowing and you're working with them skillfully—letting them move through the body, opening to them, really luxuriating in that quality—what prevents the deepening? Is it still these emotional blocks or contractions that arise, or is it something else?

Because what I'm hearing is that the pīti can become quite strong and pervasive, which sounds promising for jhānic development. The key question is what's interrupting that natural deepening process. Sometimes it's simply a matter of learning to stay with the pleasure more fully rather than unconsciously pulling back from it.

There's often a kind of threshold where the nervous system wants to either fully surrender into the jhanic absorption or it reflexively contracts away from it. This can happen even when we consciously want to go deeper. The contractions you're describing—whether emotional or energetic—might be part of that protective mechanism.

So let's be very specific about the pleasant pīti experiences. When they occur, how long can you sustain them before something shifts? And when they do shift, is it always toward these contractions, or are there other patterns you notice? This mapping will help us understand what's most skillful to work with in those crucial moments when the jhānic factors are gathering strength.

And relative to the times it feels like, well, I'm really not sure I like this, what would you say?

I would say it's 10% incredibly pleasant, like 60% mildly pleasant, and then 30% not sure.

Okay, that's not bad. So I was just wondering about whether you needed to bring in some of those other experiences that you had in some of those other states that you've gone into on the insight retreats and actually let that help. But it doesn't sound like it. It sounds like the PT is fine. It's just sometimes getting into it.

Sometimes you want to be playing with the relationship with the PT. As I said, it looked a little bit like more opening would be the thing. And when I say more opening, you know, these things are really like—we can have words like opening or paying attention, but you're really kind of, like I said, dial it up to 11, you know, if we're talking about opening.

So really, really kind of—what does it mean to kind of maximally open my being and surrender and abandon? And just that relationship with the PT, you're in a different relationship. Everything is a dependent arising, meaning how we experience PT and what it does depends primarily on my relationship with it.

One way of thinking about what we're doing is we're playing with our relationship with the primary nimitta. That's all we're doing. We're playing with our relationship with other things which allow the primary nimitta to arise. Coming into a different relationship with something will shape the perception of that thing.

When we talk about this emptiness, dependent arising, playing with perception, we're talking about playing with the way of relating and noticing that the very experience, appearance, perception of this thing—in this case PT—changes dependent on my relationship.

It's not always the case that there's a formula. Okay, you always need to go into this opening mode. So what we need, again, is this kind of willingness to be responsive, to try this, to try that. Ah, that's better. Okay, or that begins to—oh no, or that suddenly makes it much better or just gradually makes it better.

But the very sort of willingness to be responsive and really try different relationships. So it might be a lot of the time that it's more of that opening, you know, really, really go into the opening mode. It might be that that's just sometimes and other times it needs something else, you know.

So how does that sound?

Yeah, but we'll still talk later.

Okay, great. Anyone need any help with the hindrances or anything?

Nicole, yeah. Is it okay to take it?

Thank you. I'm thinking of it as a hindrance. I think there's probably different ways to think about what happens, and it happens for me on every retreat. But for this one, it's really turned up, which is that I have a constant conversation, like I'm in an interview with one of you, about the experience as it's happening.

And in some ways, I really like it because it's kind of the way that I'm—oh yeah, you said this, so okay, I'll try that. So in part, it's quite a positive thing because it's a way that I'm experimenting and playing, but it also gets exhausting. There's a kind of neurotic tendency to keep doing that throughout the day.

So I've been, since it's on this retreat, trying to play with it as a kind of restlessness of the mind and open the energy body from the top of the head and see if it can get more space around it and also trying the breathing and the counting in relationship to add more pegs. And I also went on a walk and did a little inquiry around maybe some more psychological reasons why that might be. But it was really insistent.

Okay. And when you say it's a neurotic tendency, does that mean that you feel, for instance—well, one question would I have is, do you feel like the tone of it is quite anxious or for instance, are you saying I'm trying to impress or I'm afraid how they're going to judge me or what's the—I'm just interested in those words, neurotic tendency.

I suppose, just habit of mind.

Yeah. And maybe it's more of a habit.

Yeah, that's my sense.

So this is really, really common, just again, really, really common.

If it was more like, "Oh my gosh, I'm going to have an interview tomorrow with someone and heavens, what will they think?"—if it had that anxious quality—then we would need to unpack things more psychologically. But it sounds like there's sometimes even delight in it, so that's quite different.

If it was more of that worried, anxious type, then we would need to address it differently. But returning to Ajahn Chah's understanding of vitakka and vicara—this evaluative thought—it may partly be your way of processing and understanding your experience. There's some natural pondering and reflection happening, and that's not necessarily problematic.

So I personally wouldn't be too worried about it. What might help is actually writing down your questions very briefly. By doing that, you're telling the mind, "Look, I've got this handled. You don't need to keep rehearsing it. It's written down, and I'll take it to the interview or wherever it needs to go." That might help—just something simple like that to reassure the mind that it will get dealt with.

In terms of moment-to-moment practice, I really want to emphasize this: we can make so many things into enemies that don't necessarily need to be enemies. If I think meditation is all about stopping thought, then these mental activities will be regarded as enemies. I just wouldn't go there. I don't think it's a problem.

The only concern is when it feels like it's interfering with absorption. So what I want to point out on a moment-to-moment level is this: there's a difference between a thought arising and me being entangled in a thought. There's a difference between noticing "here's a thought going over there" and being dragged along with it, or willingly going along with it.

So if you're not clear on that distinction, that's something to notice. What's the difference between a thought arising and actually being attached to a thought so that we get dragged along with it?

You mentioned that often there's still physical tension while the thinking is happening, and you can focus on that tension. But you have a desire for the mind to be quiet so the physical work can be more prominent. I think this is totally understandable, but in terms of strategy, it's like when one of my teachers started meditating in a building site. I'm sure he had the desire that those demolition machines and all the construction noise weren't there, but that was just the reality. It had to be in the background.

Imagine we were sitting here and there was a radio playing. It's there. Or we're having a conversation with a radio in the background—we just deal with it. We don't have to get into this battle. If I get into too much desire of "I wish that would just shut up," then actually my attention is going over there in a very unhelpful way.

So if I can come into a relationship where it's simply "okay, it's just there"—like background radio—there may well be some useful material in it about processing the day or remembering things I need to handle. But you can take care of that practical aspect by making notes. And moment to moment, if you're working toward more absorption, just aim at what's most prominent and get more deeply into that.

The other piece to remember is what I said about "drifting"—it's a subtle manifestation of restlessness. One way it often manifests is that the mind has more thought and tends to follow those thoughts more readily. Sometimes that drifting comes from too much effort. Just a little bit too much effort can actually stimulate more thinking and encourage the mind to follow those thoughts.

So this could also be an effort issue. And if I get into too much desire for the thoughts to go away so I can absorb more deeply, that can add to the over-effort. The usual pattern is: there's more thought, so I need to try harder. That may be the case sometimes, but it may be exactly the opposite. When there are more of these mental threads unreeling, what I actually need to do is back off more, go into a softer mode, become more receptive.

So it could well be related to effort levels as well. And you mentioned you're also working with over-effort and finding the retreat tiring, and that you get most annoyed with the mental voice when you're tired. That makes perfect sense, and it's something for everyone to note.

This is hard work. Sometimes it feels completely effortless and wonderful, but much of the time it's going to feel like hard work for many different reasons and in many different ways. It might be that just a little too much effort accumulates to become very tiring after a while.

But as I said, it's not like, "When will this effort question go away so I can get into the real stuff?" That is part of the real stuff. It's not going to end. It will actually just become subtler and subtler, this effort question. So we really have to get our view right about that as well.

It sounds like not that you need to stop meditating and go for walks, but much more a question of subtle effort and learning to back off—which may be more about this opening, receptive mode.

Let me share a note I received last night. Someone wrote:

"I just wanted to share some practice. As I was listening to your talk yesterday, I kept noticing some contraction and dukkha in the energy body. Finally, as you moved into the Q&A, I decided to see if I could untangle or smooth out whatever was going on. Just a little reflection on emptiness and some long breaths opened up a beautiful, peaceful tranquility. It was time for tea, but I continued to sit till my bladder suggested it was really time to go.

I was inspired by what you said about carrying the jhana around, so I thought, why don't I try that now? I made it all the way to the loo, and after that, through tea, fairly slowly, and into the lounge. I kept working, playing and reestablishing the jhana—or perhaps more accurately, the connection to the sense of tranquility. It was so easy!

I've really had a view of not being able to carry this kind of mindfulness concentration outside of the sittings very well. And it has been a source of some measuring and self-judgment. I felt some of this heal tonight."

This is such a beautiful example of skillful working with something that was initially a contraction and then quite easily—this thing about quantum shifts—turned into something lovely. And there's this long-term view of being inadequate or measuring oneself as "not doing it right," and then suddenly something opens up and it's like, "Oh, actually this is possible for me. I can do this."

The content could have been different, but in terms of that general pattern, it's so important not to believe "I can't do this. I'm like this. I'm not built for this." In time, confidence comes. This confidence is really important.

There was something else—Boaz asked yesterday about ekagata, and I felt I could have said something more about that word. It's usually translated as "one-pointedness," which I said was a good translation. It's just that in English, most people thinking of "one-pointedness" would think of one narrow spatial point. The better, though clumsy-sounding translation would be "with one thing prominent."

Boaz asked why this is a significant factor in the jhanas. In the Abhidhamma, in Theravada Buddhist psychology—maybe in the Mahayana as well—they would say every moment of mind has something that's prominent in it. The difference in the jhanas is that a jhanic state continues. It's moment after moment after moment.

Jhana is related to the Pali word jayati, which means "to burn." People say jhana is like a candle burning steadily, or that jhana will burn up your defilements. But the point is it's something continuous. This ekagata—what makes it characteristic of jhana is that moment after moment, the same thing is prominent. There's a kind of temporal extension of what's prominent.

Yes, it's spelled E-K-A-G-G-A-T-A. In the first edition of my book, I completely mis-translated it, so I changed it in the second edition because I had missed the double G. I translated ekagata as "gone to oneness," like unified, but that's wrong. It's actually "due to one," one prominence.

Okay. Anything else? Yes—who's that there?

I'm noticing that I keep falling into some—I don't know if it's a jhana or not, but I find this very tiring and very intense. I feel I can't stop it. Right now I was kind of going... It's like a pulling. I get pulled into some states. I don't really know.

Yes, okay. So as we've been saying, that sort of thing can be quite normal. We can get pulled into a hindrance, we can get pulled into a jhana, we can get pulled into some other state that's more familiar because of our meditation habits.

Again, I would probably say come to a one-on-one and we'll really try to identify what those states are, because that identification will help guide us in terms of how you need to move from there. Sometimes it's not a bad thing—it's just, okay, now we're here a lot. How do we move from here? Other times it's like, okay, we need to help it not go there, in which case we need to try different approaches. But we need to probably hear more about what those states actually are.

This sounds quite helpful—to know what it is and then proceed accordingly.

Yes. So bring it to a one-on-one interview and we can really hear more about it—or them, if there's more than one—and get a sense of what it is. That will guide us in terms of how to respond. But that sort of thing is very normal.

Thank you.

Good. I think... Oh yes, I already said it, but just to reiterate—if the pīti is really strong and feels very sexual, like an orgasm, it's really, really completely okay. Just enjoy it. Really get into it.

You see what Robert's going to bring to the retreat.

No, it's really important because we have this feeling of "this can't be right," or we feel like, "Am I maybe emanating some kind of weird sexual energy into the hall that's going to pollute the pure, pristine atmosphere of renunciate celibacy?" It's completely not an issue. It's just a manifestation of pīti. Open to it. Enjoy it. The same approach applies. There's absolutely no shame in it. It's something to open to and get into. It's doing good stuff. It's really good.

I can't see who that is. Did Danny have a question? Okay, Sabra, please.

Just a clarifying question. I feel like I remember hearing you warn about elation, and I'm wondering about the difference between elation and excitement and happiness and sukha.

Yes, thank you. The difference between elation, excitement, happiness, and sukha. I don't know—for elation, I'd have to look up the original Pali and see what that refers to.

The Buddha was addressing a small group of highly advanced meditators who were working on psychic power meditation. One of their practices involved what we might call clairvoyance - a kind of seeing far away that occurs within meditation. And the Buddha noted that one of the subtle hindrances they encountered was getting excited about their ability to do this, or about what was opening up, or about entering new territory, or about what they were seeing.

I don't have the Pali term at hand and would need to look it up, but my sense is that what was being cautioned against is something closest to excitement. Excitement is quite fascinating in this regard. When there's too much excitement, it can lead to that snatching quality we've discussed. It also creates a certain agitation that disturbs the serenity necessary for these kinds of practices. For developing psychic powers and similar capacities, the mind needs to be extraordinarily still - super, super still. Any kind of excitement will make the waters turbulent and become a hindrance.

But excitement itself is quite interesting - it's almost like an energy. This brings us back to what I was saying earlier with Jason about how sometimes people come to me saying they have fear about this or that, and I find myself wondering whether what they're experiencing is actually fear or excitement. Often it turns out to be excitement, but the mind is relating to it in a particular way and labeling it such that it becomes an experience of fear. At its root - though that's not quite the right word - it's more naturally excitement. They need to learn to play with their relationship to this energy so it can become excitement again. And excitement can be energizing, empowering, galvanizing - it can give you courage.

But excitement can also wobble in different ways. An excited energy might become bubbly happiness or pīti. All these states are quite close to one another. The different modes of relating to something like excitement will shape the very perception of it, transforming it into something else through dependent arising.

Excitement and pīti, for example, are very close. There have probably been times in the tradition of translating Pali to English when pīti has been translated as excitement. They're intimately related. Part of the experience of the first jhāna, especially initially, is excitement - it's tremendously exciting for many reasons, both because of its energetics and because of the sense of "Wow, look what's happening!"

The key point is that we can come into different relationships with the energy of excitement, and because of dependent arising - because everything depends on the way of looking, because there's no independent appearance of anything - this can actually shape the experience. The energy itself is open to malleability. You can shape it toward pīti, perhaps even toward sukha.

I usually translate sukha as happiness, though I'm not sure what Karen had in mind yesterday when she asked about this. "Happiness" seems to me the closest English word to encompass sukha's territory. Looking back at English translations over the past thirty years, there have been all kinds of different renderings of both pīti and sukha. Some translations even reverse what each means, which I find baffling. I think as time has gone on, the translations have become more consistent.

But you'll notice that when the third jhāna opens, the kind of happiness characteristic of that state is still technically sukha, though most people will never have experienced that particular quality of happiness. It's supremely serene and feels almost otherworldly in its flavor and texture. I use the word "happiness" simply because it seems the broadest, most stretchable English term to cover sukha's different ranges.

"So that was actually helpful," someone responded, "because I've been experiencing a lot of that kind of excitement today - getting in the way of my clairvoyance!" They continued: "You mentioned that we need to train attention at each level of subtlety. I'm really noticing that with a lot of pīti comes a particular kind of papañca - very inspired ideas that seem really great, and I think they are, but they're a distraction from the practice."

When our base practice is metta and we encounter shifts toward greater subtlety, the habitual ways of practicing loving-kindness often no longer work in generating the qualities we associate with metta. This becomes an alive avenue of exploration: how do we practice metta at this level of subtlety? There may be moments of success, but sustained understanding—that sense of "I've got this now"—remains elusive.

Instead, there's often an abundance of piti, but it manifests as energy rather than the familiar warmth of loving-kindness. Sometimes this energy becomes more blissful, but it doesn't feel like metta. This raises a crucial question: if the traditional approach feels like trying to squeeze something that won't respond—like using a gross practice at a subtle level—should we abandon metta altogether and simply go with the piti?

Everything changes as practice deepens. Things naturally become more subtle, and we must learn to work with these different levels of refinement. Even on a dedicated metta retreat, we would expect this progression toward subtlety, requiring constant adaptation in our approach.

When abundant piti arises in the context of metta practice aimed at jhana, we have several choices. First, we can let the metta intention go entirely. If the piti is strong enough—definitely pleasant and stable, present for several minutes without disappearing—we can work with the piti directly and set aside the metta. The piti becomes the principal object.

The second possibility, more appropriate for a metta-focused retreat rather than a jhana retreat, involves allowing the piti itself to become the metta. The lovely sensations we're experiencing become what we want to share: "I'm feeling something beautiful here, and I want you to have some too." We radiate this energy outward while bathing in it ourselves—there's no scarcity when we're already immersed in piti.

The piti becomes the very flavor of metta. This is what we imagine radiating out. On a long metta retreat, everyone would eventually experience piti, sukha, and the rest of the jhanic factors. The practice adapts: "This is the flavor of metta right now, so this is what I'm sharing."

To radiate these qualities effectively, we must still feel them fully. Rather than mechanically reciting phrases, we recognize: "This is the flavor I want to share with you." Whether it's the energetic joy of piti or the subtle happiness of third jhana sukha, we feel our energy body radiating this quality from every pore, from the entire energy space. We can visualize it emanating from our hands, learning to integrate metta, piti, and bodily experience.

Sometimes we maintain the metta intention while working with piti; other times we simply surrender to the piti itself. The choice depends on our primary intention.

However, when the issue isn't abundant piti but rather subtle manifestations of metta that we don't know how to work with—when we can't conjure traditional loving-kindness and experience only general well-being without recognizable metta qualities—the guidance shifts. Interestingly, this same practitioner might find that informal moments, like holding a door open for someone, deeply touch the heart, even when formal practice feels disconnected from metta.

This points to the crucial role of intention. On a jhana retreat, if there's well-being present but not recognizable metta, we work with the well-being. The absence of traditional metta isn't problematic because our intention is to develop jhanic states. If this were a metta retreat, we would focus on rekindling loving-kindness. But remembering our primary intention—what we established on the opening day—guides our choices and prevents unnecessary struggle with practices that don't align with our current developmental phase.

It makes so much difference. Even a subtle bifurcating or shift in the emphasis of attention—"I'm worried about my metta now"—don't worry about your metta. You have plenty of metta. You can worry about that on a metta retreat, about developing that more and more. But first, it's not something to worry about for you, and second, it's not something to worry about on this retreat. So it's the well-being, and you can let that be more primary.

Does that answer the question? What about the subtlety business? I think you spoke to it.

In terms of the first thing, where there's pīti, there's often excitement and often all kinds of creative ideas about projects that I'm going to do and such. Sometimes there's even more than that—there's actual... I don't know what you'd call it—creative energy, not just the idea to do something, but actual poetry or music arising.

Second jhāna, for some people, even more. It's almost like this spring that the Buddha talked about can be a spring of inspiration and creativity. You can kind of plug into something. In a way, well, any of the first four at least, but this is a big deal.

Again, I hesitated to even say what I just said, but really my invitation and hope and wish to stress: we're on a jhāna retreat. At some point in your life, when you've developed a bit more of this jhāna business, you might decide to take a retreat where you actually meditate for a bit, get in touch with that inspiration, write whatever is coming—poetry, whatever it is—go back to the meditation, do that, and actually do that. That's great. Doing that now will kind of pretty much abort your progress in jhānas.

My real hope is that you'll all keep the intention. Like that's why I'm here. That's what I'm hoping to serve and support. But you can, you know, if you get into this, there's no reason why you can't have another retreat at another time. You go somewhere and for a week or whatever it is, you're playing with that. But that's your intention. And then that's clear.

Here, if you really want these treasures to open up, you have to... it's what I said in the opening talk. There's something very, very powerful, much more powerful than we realize, about keeping the intention really clear and kind of single and steady. And you say metta's a great intention. Even creative—I don't know what it is—but creativity, they're all great intentions. But too many great intentions pulling in too many directions, you'll end up with not so much.

It connects to what you said, which I found really galvanizing, around this kind of soul—like gathering of soul power. Exactly. There's a lot of power in that gathering.

Let me just see... do I have anything else? No, I think that's okay.

So why don't we just have a few quiet moments together. Thank you all. Time for tea, and see you soon.

CHAPTER 209

Q & A, and Short Talk

Rob Burbea · 1h10

> In this Q&A session from the "Practising the Jhānas" retreat, Rob Burbea responds to practitioners' questions about deepening jhāna meditation. Key topics include the delicate balance between probing into jhānic qualities and maintaining an open, receptive awareness - comparing this to tuning a radio receiver to find the right frequency rather than forcing concentration on a spatial point. Burbea addresses how to work with insight practices like anattā contemplation alongside jhāna development, emphasizing the importance of knowing when to shift from analytical looking to pure enjoyment of pleasant states.
> The discussion covers practical challenges such as working with subtle hindrances like micro-sloth and torpor, the tendency for some practitioners to find jhānas becoming less dramatic over time, and dealing with dry samādhi states that lack the essential joy and happiness. Burbea emphasizes maximizing enjoyment (the 'E' in P.I.T.I.E.S.) as often more important than deepening absorption, and explains how the second jhāna's happiness is crucial for long-term insight development. He also addresses retreat conduct, explaining his approach to noble silence that allows eye contact and connection while maintaining clear intention for practice.

Okay, so time again if there are any questions that feel relevant to your practice or to anything that's been said about the framework, or anything about the detail that we've covered.

I have maybe just a few things I'd like to throw in as well, but why don't we start with some questions?

Andy, yes. Why don't we use the mic, then it's easier.

Andy: This was a question, Rob, about the difference or the similarity and the contrast between tuning in to the nimitta or the qualities of the jhana, which feels to me like quite proby and sort of—you know, it's almost like keyhole surgery. It's almost like getting into the quality amid all the other stuff around it.

But also finding the need for something more expansive. I've been trying to play with it, almost conceiving it as listening to those qualities rather than probing in—a listening, a tuning. I think you said something about trying to hear a noise, a faint noise amid lots of other noise. Because it feels like I need to open more, and yet the very active kind of fine-tuning feels the opposite of that.

Thank you. So are you talking in particular about this space of peacefulness that opened for you?

Andy: No, but with the first jhana as well. Actually, probably more with the peacefulness.

More with the peacefulness. Okay, good.

It's both, you know. Sometimes the probing is a concentration thing, literally like how much attention can there be in a small amount of area? But then there's also the probing with the sense of, can I really get the sense of this?

And then with the opening, there's also, as you say—I don't quite know what would be the best analogy—that thing I said about listening for a sound, where there are lots of sounds and there's just some particular sound I'm listening to. Maybe that's a quality. You're actually not scrunching anything up. You're sort of opening more. It's like your antennae are just becoming more sensitive within that openness.

So yes, those two modes will be important and you can play between them.

What happens sometimes with the peacefulness is—I'll get into this when we talk more about the peacefulness—sometimes there's a very large peacefulness, actually, and it's even larger than the energy body size. Depending on where you are, we want to spend more or less time in that. But at the beginning of the peacefulness, it's probably more an energy body size, but you can still open up the attention wide.

It's really like, almost like imagine it's a kind of realm. It's a large realm where you're almost listening to the music of the realm. So there's very subtle, exquisite, quiet music there. This is a metaphor, yes. And that's more open and the whole thing can feel more open.

Other times you can, just as with the first jhana, pick a place where it seems strongest and you kind of burrow into it, probe into it.

But sometimes what else can happen is—and it might be after you've just lost it for a bit, or it might be as you're getting into it more—there's almost like a filament of something, a filament of that peacefulness. So spatially, it's relatively—you don't know where you're going to find it in the energy body space, but it can tend to be more lower down in the body. It's a kind of filament, like some kind of organism that has these filament-like things. An anemone? Do they have them? That sort of thing. But it's physical.

The other thing to add here—and we'll get to it more when we talk about the third jhana—sometimes you're talking about a point in space that you're probing more. Sometimes you're more open.

Sometimes you're more tuning into the mental quality of peacefulness, and sometimes you're more tuning into the physical quality of peacefulness. Ideally, we want those two to blend. But what it means at any time in your responsive play and working is: what do I pick up here? If in doubt, pick up the physical one first.

And so that might feel like it's just a filament. It might be located—oh, it's located in my belly button or my kidney or whatever it is. But more likely it's just a sort of place in space, a region in space. And there's this kind of filament of that exquisite peacefulness. And that's what you're going with. So there's that as well.

The other metaphor I want to add is tuning the receiver. If we think about tuning a radio receiver, we're thinking about the wavelength changing—lower frequencies, higher frequencies. What you're doing in each jhana is tuning to a particular frequency as much as you're probing a certain point in space. Probing a certain point in space is very helpful, but that's not really what you're doing. You're really tuning to a certain frequency.

If probing a certain point in space or opening up wide space or working with a filament or whatever helps you lock in and get a sense of that frequency that's particular to that jhana—or that bandwidth of frequencies—then that's all good. But in a way, the primary thing you're doing is focusing on a certain frequency. As I said, the jhanas themselves are more and more refined.

So one of the things I forgot to ask you yesterday is: is this state of peacefulness more refined—let's use the word refined—than the second and the first jhanas?

"Oh, yes. Yeah, definitely."

Because that's also a signal. If you say, "Well, I'm not sure," then I wouldn't be so sure that you've moved into a deeper state. It might be peaceful, it might be very nice, but one of the real markers—apart from the other questions I asked you, maybe some others I can't think of right now—is the shift in refinement. And as you shift in refinement, then you have to get skilled at tuning your receiver and holding there. How that happens might be through the probing, might be through the open space with the antennae up, might be through the sense of filament. You can play with all of that.

"That's really helpful. I think the tuning is so helpful. It's completely shifted my thinking about this whole practice, just this tuning of the dial. But it seems like when there's tuning, or at least I'm finding it difficult then to also incorporate the enjoyment. I'm tuning and then I'm like, oh no wait, actually remember to enjoy it as well. Any recommendations about how to make sure the enjoyment is there with the tuning?"

Well, if we turn it around and say maximize the enjoyment—that's the most important thing, the 'E' on the end of SASSIE—then you will inevitably find that getting your tuning right is part of maximizing the enjoyment. So it might be just reversing the intentionality.

I do think that so many people obviously think of jhana and samadhi as "I'm focusing on one point and it's a spatial point." Even if they don't think that consciously, that's what it becomes. But that's a very limited and actually limiting way of understanding what's happening. So I would rather go with this frequency thing. But in terms of intention, you can reverse that.

So just: I'm here with this thing. It's like I'm listening to a radio program and I really want to enjoy it—what is that music or whatever it is? I love it. Then I'm going to want to play with that dial just because I love it. I'm just following my enjoyment.

It's just part of like, well, I can play with the volume. I can shut my door so I don't hear my siblings arguing or whatever it is. But that's going to be just organically part of me being into it. Do you see what I mean?

So it might be part of it as just a kind of subtle reordering of the hierarchy of intention at any point. Like I said, sometimes I feel that all you need to do is trust this kind of wish to enjoy things to the max and really let that lead sometimes.

But let's see if there's anything else. It might be related to something I said earlier—the sense of tuning to the refinement might be helped at different times by tuning in more to the physical and, in inverted commas, the energy body frequency of that refinement, and sometimes more to the mental. But that shift might also help incorporate—literally incorporate—the enjoyment more. Does that make sense?

Julia, I have a question about using insight ways of looking in jhana practice. So I've been using them as a base practice and noticing that there's some anxiety about how indiscriminately or discriminately I'm using them, like remembering that part of the instruction with them in emptiness practice is to use them for everything—whether something is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. But then some worry about using them to look at well-being, for example, like that will prevent piti from fabricating.

So part of what I've been playing with is just sort of using them indiscriminately for a little while, and then once a sense of well-being starts to open up, using them more discriminately. Like, I found using anatta can help relax some clinging around the well-being that's coming. But if you have any thoughts...

Yeah, really important question. Thank you. So it's a bit like—what's it a bit like? It's a bit like going down a water slide, you know, one of those theme park things. But imagine this water slide at certain points all the way down has turnings off it. So it goes, but every once in a while it has a turning off to the left, a turning off to the right. And you can just kind of veer, if you want, hopefully without slamming—it's not a great analogy. But you get the idea. It's got padded sides.

So what that means is, yeah, if you use it indiscriminately at first—everything that comes up, you said anatta—let's say we're taking that as anatta, anatta, whatever comes up. Once some well-being comes up, then if you keep—let's say if I just started with back pain, so I just did anatta, anatta, anatta to everything, including the back pain. What would eventually happen was the pain would attenuate, the body sense would start to dissolve, and at some point pleasure of some kind would come up. Let's say it was piti.

So at that point I've got—okay, I'm sliding down this thing, it's great, and I've got a right turn there that I can lean into, which means once the piti has built enough, I can then stop doing insight practice and just subtly or gently—let's put it gently—but completely switch what I'm doing to now I just want to enjoy that particular thing, which is the piti.

If the piti comes up—okay, back pain's gone to neutral, and then piti's come up, and then the body's dissolving, and then I say, okay, piti, and I keep doing anatta on piti, it will go beyond it. Have you found that already? Is that what's happening? Or you're worried that it might happen?

That's what I'm worried about. And so I find that I'm not even using it to look at the piti to begin—like as soon as something in the realm of pleasurable comes up, I just stop and then sort of things shut down.

Okay. So you need to find a kind of middle ground between being—you know, as the Buddha says, don't snatch at it. Okay. So that's really important. But you can also kind of relax.

Don't worry about exactly where you land. You might overshoot and find yourself in some other jhana, and that's perfectly fine. Either you can work backwards from there—and we can talk about how to do that—or you can hang out there for a while, get really comfortable with that state, and then work backwards. Or that deeper state can simply become your primary playground.

The important thing first is to feel confident that you can do this, to gain that sense of wellbeing where at some point you can steer your body into this beautiful state and just enjoy it. You make that shift. Exactly where it lands initially—don't worry about it. First, cultivate that confidence. That's really crucial.

Then we can map it out more precisely. We can see where you're actually landing. Maybe it turns out to be the fourth jhana, for example. Well then, let's learn the fourth jhana before we learn the first. This is what I mentioned about people who've done different practices.

I realize now we have a room full of practitioners with extensive experience, especially in insight practice. Things won't necessarily evolve for everyone in the traditional order of one, two, three, four. It may or it may not.

But once the piti has arisen, don't snatch at it. You may also find that piti is arising while you're doing anatta practice on something else entirely. That's another option. I wouldn't recommend doing anatta on the piti itself so much. As I mentioned, if you stay with those insight practices, they'll take you all the way into the formless realms, and that will probably be disorienting for right now.

How does that sound? I'm not giving exact step-by-step instructions here, but I think the most important thing is not to worry too much about precise placement.

"That's what I wanted to hear."

Good, that's really important.

"I'd like to ask about subtle hindrances—hindrances that seem to be somehow coupled with increasing subtlety. I was practicing the second jhana, doing the same thing I mentioned yesterday about really absorbing into it and trying to keep up with the subtlety of attention when the sukha gets really refined. What I've been noticing repeatedly is that after a certain point, when it gets really subtle, especially when it starts to lean more toward peacefulness and the third jhana, my attention somehow... there arises a bit of micro-level sloth and torpor, some micro-level tiredness. When it gets really subtle and moves toward that peacefulness, I just get tired somehow and lose my focus, and it falls apart. Then I have to reverse, come back. I might get some energy from increasing the sukha or increasing the piti, and then again I go back to that level of very subtle attention, subtle nimitta, but then it falls into this tiredness. How could one work with this?"

As I'm listening, Mikhail, I'm wondering if you could consider two things. One is maximizing the enjoyment rather than maximizing the concentration or even worrying about the subtlety—although we talked about that yesterday. The other thing, mixed with that, is: could you keep it longer at a more bubbly level of happiness? Which technically is just happiness with more piti mixed into it.

Let it stay there much longer with the intention and attitude to really enjoy it, rather than thinking "now I'm refining my concentration, now I'm going deeper into absorption." These are all important factors, but it might be that what's happening—given your background and practice habits—is that the absorption and concentration are deepening faster than the enjoyment is deepening.

I find the Buddha's images so accurate in so many ways. His similes are remarkable. It's like really drinking that water from the spring. Really, truly delight in it. Because that's doing something important as well. It's giving you energy, but it's also transforming the way the state then moves deeper.

It can go deeper through this increasing subtlety, as you described, but sometimes it gets too subtle and we're not able to follow it. Sometimes that's simply not quite the right movement that needs to happen.

I'm going to talk about the second jhana tomorrow, but this is actually quite key. What's the most significant aspect of the second jhana? One might be tempted to say it's where thinking stops—the Buddha says that's where thought ceases. That's certainly a very significant threshold in terms of deepening concentration.

I'm going to come back to that. It's not as simple as we might think what that means. It is important, but I would say in the grand scheme of things, what's much more important is the happiness. Bathing in the happiness is doing something to the being. Knowing these different bandwidths of happiness is doing something to the being, marinating over and over again in that happiness, drinking your fill of happiness, is in the long term, in terms of its relation to insight, in terms of its work that it's doing, in terms of your capacity to let go, in terms of how it's opening the heart, in terms of what it's teaching you eventually about perception and malleability perception, emptiness, dependent arising. That's the key thing.

So yes, what's the work that needs to happen in this moment? That's a sort of very subtle question that's going on for any meditator in not every moment, but a lot of moments. And I can, one can say, oh, I really need to focus more. I really need to let it subtilize, you know, drop down with the subtlety and corresponding subtlety of mind. I want to be absorbed more. These are all valid choices at any time.

But it might be that just delighting in the happiness is actually much more significant. And as I said, it will probably deliver you to a slightly different place or a very different place. Even in terms of the third jhāna when we get to it, it's not... In a way, you can divide the third jhāna into three and all those levels are important. But going with the happiness more and really, really enjoying it might help steer you a little bit better.

Does this make sense?

Yes, indeed. To do that, it sounds like you already know, but just to add, I want to keep the happiness relatively gross. It's a little bit the opposite of the instructions I gave you yesterday. You can play between the two. Sometimes just keep the happiness more gross. How do we do that? It's part of this tuning. It's part of just an intention to keep it. I want to keep it in this ballpark, in this bandwidth.

But it's also, sometimes what you can do, it sounds like you already are doing it, is just mix a bit more pīti in if it gets too subtle, or rather if it gets too calm. If the happiness starts to get too serene, you just mix a bit more pīti in with it.

Eventually all these different bandwidths of the different genres become just accessible without having to do any tricks. You just kind of remember back to this and that level within it. But how does that sound?

Yeah, it sounds very good and you have been describing some of my experiences already and just wanted to add that I just realized that many times my second jhāna works better when I'm doing it in walking meditation. So it keeps on a grosser level just because of the movement of the body and coordination.

So that's great. And eventually what we want is that it's not so influenced by posture, walking, sitting, standing, but by intention and this kind of steering. It's all part of the responsiveness and creativity that we're talking about. And you can do it by just a little bit more, a little bit more pīti in there.

I have a couple of questions. Let's start with the first. I've been working on the first jhāna for a few days, and then it felt like I reached your mastery definition, and I moved on. But I kind of wonder whether it might have been too fast because it feels like the access to all these different aspects of mastery is very dependent on the fact that I do it all the time. And what I would really like to do is to be able to practice jhānas back home on a daily practice, you know, just one hour a day or two, and with all the noise of daily life in the background. So I kind of wonder...

Yeah, probably, you know, access to jhānas is dependent on a million conditions, a lot of different conditions. Off retreat, on retreat, there'll be lots of different conditions which allow that each day, each sitting, you know. But one of them is just how familiar it all is, you know, how familiar that pīti is. So a lot of those aspects of mastery are just dependent on being so repeatedly soaked in something that it's just easy to summon it and etc.

So it might be, yeah, longer. Then how would, you know, just like spend more time with what already feels like familiar and stable work? It might be, but it still might be that you might have, because we talked about you having two or even three playgrounds. So that increasing familiarity, let's say, with the first jhāna might happen in parallel at the same time, in other words, on this retreat with the second and the third, you know, and you're just developing more and more of them like that together, right? In other words, you're still getting familiarity with the first, but you're still developing familiarity with the second as well.

I don't know. At a certain point, as I'll perhaps mention tomorrow, what will happen is it becomes almost a little difficult to stay in the first jhana. As Andy was saying, the mind so much wants to slide forward. It's almost got its own agenda and its own wisdom.

So it's a tricky question, but there's no reason why you can't just continue for a while with three jhanas and move between them. It doesn't have to be rigid—the next three days I'll spend in one, the next three days after that in another. It could simply be: today I'll practice all three, tomorrow I'll practice all three, and the day after I'll practice all three.

As to what happens in your daily life, it's hard to predict because a lot depends on circumstances. Go back to the Buddha's description of the first jhana—it's dependent on seclusion, dependent on withdrawal. But not withdrawal from people and things; rather, withdrawal from entanglement, seclusion from the hindrances.

Of course, sometimes in our daily life we're just entangled in stuff—relational difficulties, work pressures, this stress, that pressure—and the mind is actually more entangled. Then it's harder to withdraw internally from those pressures. Health issues and all kinds of things affect what actually happens. So it's really hard to predict.

My intuitive hunch is: why don't you let yourself just have three jhanas for now? Let them develop in parallel. So your day is moving between those three as best you can, maybe roughly equally though it doesn't have to be. This day might lean more toward one, that day more toward another. Just trust in all of that—it will bear fruit in different ways.

It's probably the case that whatever you can access regularly on a long retreat is further along than what most people can access in their daily life, but there's so much individual variation in this. So that's my intuitive sense. Does that sound okay?

"Can I ask one more thing?"

"Of course."

"So with the first jhana, it was very different than when I practiced it previously, in the ways you mentioned—less intense and all that. But it was also just less wonderful in a way. The first time I practiced it, about a year ago, it was really deeply affecting my whole being, very impressive, and produced a lot of faith in the Dharma. Now it's as if some parts of the psyche just aren't interested anymore. They don't get involved. It's not like the body is suffused with pīti, and even though consciousness can be full of the jhana, some parts seem to... So I wonder: is it important, and can I convince them to join again? Or should I just say okay, never mind, now they're in the second and third jhana? And will this happen with each of them?"

It's very normal—I think I mentioned this—to become much less interested in the first jhana after you've tasted particularly the third. It's very, very normal, and you can go through a period like this.

One thing to consider is taking a larger view: I'm really wanting all eight jhanas. It does get less intense over time, becoming more mellow, and that's partly due to opening to the third jhana and these more peaceful realms. So that's all normal.

Again, if you think in terms of direction rather than trying to achieve a certain amount of full involvement... Just think: here I am now, practicing the first jhana. Maybe it's a little less engaged than when I practice the second and third jhana. But when I go there, part of my intention is: can I find this really lovely? Can I actually get into it?

Rather than asking "am I or am I not," it's more a direction. Is it possible to find more engagement, more delight? Without the sense of "did I pass or fail that test?" It's a subtle difference—it's a direction of exploration rather than evaluation.

Does that make sense? I don't think it's about whether you pass or fail—it feels like some areas are just off-limits, not interested in this. Yeah, but your task is simply to give yourself to it more, to open to it more.

It may be that when you've had more to drink from the third jhana and perhaps deeper jhanas, your relationship with the first jhana becomes recontextualized. When it first comes, there's nothing else—just normal consciousness or papañca, and the first jhana. It's completely the most amazing thing, a signal to the being that entirely other states of consciousness are possible. Often it makes a dramatic impression.

As you progress, it takes its place in a much larger jigsaw puzzle or mandala of the eight jhanas. You still have a sense that this is really valuable. Part of your task is to find, within that larger context, "Can I really discover the enjoyment here?" You're working in that direction, though it probably won't be as dramatic as it was the first time. But that's okay, because it's just one part of a much bigger picture.

"Does the same thing happen to the other jhanas as well, or is it just the first because of the third?"

In a way it does, though there might be something particular about our relationship with the first jhana. You'll have to find out. I think once you've done more and have a whole context, you really start to—it's almost like having that context takes the pressure off, you know, removes the need for it to be a certain way.

Does that make sense, what I'm saying about context? It's like having a larger context just takes the pressure off. I also think if you spend more time in the third, the quality of the rapture becomes delicious in a different way. You have to discover, "Oh, it's a different taste than I was originally used to." And then, "Oh, that's actually really nice."

"Yes. Sometimes the samadhi is quite dry, actually. I recognize myself in what you're saying about people who've been on traditional insight retreats. For me, it's quite spacious, a lot of equanimity usually, but quite dry—no big deal, no big clashes. The energy body is quite light but not really pleasant, more like neutral. I've tried different things, like warming the whole thing up with metta, trying to find pleasure, but sometimes there is no pleasure. So, any advice?"

This is really important. This is why I said the movement to equanimity, or the tendency to find oneself in a sort of equanimous space, will be quite common for people who've done a lot of insight practice. The question for our purposes here is whether that equanimity is close to a jhanic equanimity—there are different kinds of jhanic equanimity, very big ones or smaller ones with the energy body—or whether it's just equanimity and not really close to jhana.

What you're describing doesn't sound like it's very close to jhanic equanimity. It's still a skillful state, much better than being in papañca, but not really close to jhanic equanimity. For some people, what they're describing develops into something like the fourth jhana as they work their way into it. But from what you're describing, it's not that close.

Rather than trying to go there first and convert that to a fourth jhana, try from the beginning to think more about pīti and sukha. What will ignite that? Are there ways that pīti and happiness can arise? If I asked you what would bring up pīti and happiness, what would you say?

In other words, not letting yourself go to that state, but cultivating something else from the beginning that would...

I mean, in the big picture, I'm moving between the third and second jhana quite easily throughout the day. It's not happening all the time, this dry samadhi thing.

Okay.

But it does occur.

Okay.

So I can just come back to the first...

I mean, I'm a bit snobby about the first jhana now, I have to say. I go easily to the second one. I really love to explore the different subtleties of this jhana, so I really love that one. It became sort of my base.

The second?

Yeah, the second one.

Good.

Yeah, good.

Okay, so it's only going to this equanimity place that's not very jhanic sometimes.

Yes.

Yeah, okay. When it goes there, bring it back. In other words, at the moment, it's not ripe enough. The others are not ripe enough to turn that into a jhanic state at the moment. You need more time in the happiness and the equanimity. As I said, it's not quite the same as Mikhail's question, but somewhat related. Then they will deliver you to a different kind of equanimity that's much closer to a jhana.

So when it goes there... Like I said, relatively speaking, it's a pretty skillful place to hang out. But it doesn't really sound like it's got in it what will, at the moment, allow it to blossom into an actually jhanic equanimity of any kind, really.

So when it goes there, fine, just see: "Oh, it's done that again," and do something to bring back—if you can summon it just by itself—the happiness or the peacefulness of the third. Great. Just go back. If you can't, then ask: "How am I going to get back?" If I can remember it, if I can add a happy thought, if I can just have a subtle intention, if I need to go back to the base practice, or whatever.

Yeah.

But I wouldn't hang out in that at the moment. I wouldn't hang out in that kind of equanimity too much.

Yeah.

So you're liking the second and third, and you just need more time there. It really works on the being gradually, you know, and it prepares something to ripen in its time. So this space that you're in now is more a result of your other practice rather than the jhana practice. Does that make sense?

Yes.

Yeah.

Okay. Great.

So is that Lauren?

Yes, please.

So I felt your suggestions yesterday were helpful, and I've today been able to work a little with piti—well, a lot with piti—and two questions about it that are coming up today, but also in the past when I've worked with piti.

The first one is related to some of these questions around enjoyment. Sometimes, especially if I'm working with the breath energy, there'll be a lot of pleasure. But if I let the breath go and bring the attention to what are like sensations of tingling and sort of an effervescence in the body—like compression, expansion—the energy body feels like it's harmonized, but there's not a lot of pleasure in it.

So that's one question.

And then the other one is that sometimes when that harmonized energy body coalesces even more, or there's a deepening of the samadhi, there'll be actually pretty frequently an immediate response where my mind will immediately pull back and be like, "No, don't go in there."

So yeah, those are two questions. Sorry, I'm struggling a little bit today with the medication and things.

So the first one, I just want to make sure I understand. You're working with the breath and the energy body, and piti arises. But when you switch to the piti, you find it's not really strong enough to work with. Is that correct?

Well, the pleasure.

Yeah.

So maybe there's a lot of sensation in the body...

There's a lot of tingling throughout the whole body, but it's not necessarily pleasurable—it's just kind of odd.

This is quite interesting. It might be that you need to spend more time working with the breath. You're working with the breath and energy body as your principal practice, yes? It might be you just need more time with the breath and energy body to allow that tingling to become clearly pleasant.

Or it might be that actually you turn your attention to the tingling and find that whether you perceive it as pleasant or unpleasant—I mentioned this briefly the other day—is actually something you can play with. You can just decide to see it as pleasant. It may be that that's the case.

It's a bit like when we talked about excitement. Sometimes it's kind of on a fence and you can flip it either way. It's just odd, or it's a bit unpleasant, or it's pleasant. And you can learn to play with the perception that way. Then it's like, okay, that's what I'm doing again and again until it is established in a kind of flow of pleasantness.

I would try both approaches: playing with perception—just decide to see it as pleasant—and also staying a little longer, or maybe even a lot longer, with the practice. Let the tingling build up and see if it transforms by itself.

And the second question was about when the samadhi starts to deepen, the mind pulls back from the felt sensations of the deepening or the experience of the samadhi.

What might be interesting is to get a little more specific. Is it fear arising at that point? If so, what exactly are you afraid of at that moment? Because samadhi deepening involves a whole bunch of different things happening, a whole bunch of interwoven aspects. So what exactly is it that you're afraid of? Do you have a sense?

That's a good question. You might not know now, so that would be something to take and find out. There are all kinds of things that a meditator can get a little bit afraid of at that point. The pullback may be coming from fear, so that would be just an inquiry to take into practice—really, really valuable potentially.

Find out what it is exactly. Then we can target more specifically what we might need to do, how we might need to work differently with that. Does that make sense? Why don't we just say that for now? Give it to you as an inquiry, as something to begin to discern a little bit more clearly.

Hannah, does it feel like your question can wait till tomorrow or is it better to ask now? It can wait? Okay.

Let me just say a few things that have come up in interviews that might be useful to everyone. First thing—I didn't mention this in the opening talk, but I never said, and I never say on a retreat, don't make eye contact or that kind of thing. Some of you will be coming in from other retreats and other forms where that's what you're taught, and you're just plugging that in. As I said, I don't consider it a particularly helpful teaching to give or kind of guidance to give for retreat generally.

So you can make eye contact with each other and with coordinators and with whoever else, if you want to, when you want to. Again, can you be responsive to what you need at any moment? Because actually the connection with each other is part of the appreciation, it's part of the metta, it's part of the rich soil of what allows samadhi to deepen. It may not be that shuffling around slowly staring at your feet and being kind of insular like that—it may not open up much samadhi because something might get dry in the heart and feel not connected.

But you have to see at any moment what you need, because there might be moments where actually you do need to be a bit more inside. Something's going on in your experience or whatever, and you need to kind of—yeah, I'm not into that right now. You're not obliged to make eye contact. Eye contact gets very complicated psychologically, or it can on retreat. What's involved in eye contact or what it triggers or what it means or all this. What are my psychological patterns of avoiding contact or needing it or seeking it? We could probably talk for hours on this. I'm certainly not going to, but it's quite complex psychologically. But we say one thing: just what do I need right now? And I might need to be a bit more within and a bit more focused for whatever reason—maybe it's an emotional thing, maybe I'm just working with a certain energy at that point or whatever.

But correspondingly, if you make eye contact or smile at someone, they might be at a moment or a time when they need to be more insular. And so you might come at them with eye contact and a smile, without realizing that you're hoping for a smile back, and they just completely blank you. And if you're not careful, that can be kind of—I start to take that personally and I start to think, oh, they don't like me for some reason or whatever it is. And the mind just spins with that.

So if we're going to let ourselves at times make eye contact and be open, you have to be also quite spacious about: am I putting pressure on this situation or expecting or demanding something? Really respect other people's space and their rhythms and what they need.

In response to Karen's question, we're talking about when the Buddha says—he hardly ever says, I said this before, but I'll say it again—he hardly ever says, "Dependent on really focusing very hard and very steadily on the tip of the nose, the first jhana arises." He hardly ever says that. He says basically the standard formula is: dependent on withdrawal or dependent on seclusion from the hindrances, from entanglement, the practitioner opens and enters into the first jhana.

So it's not that we want to close sense contact. I mean that's one way of doing it, but you might be drying something else up inside. And I said how much the samadhi practice depends on open-heartedness and openness of being. So this is something—it can be quite subtle as usual, quite some responsiveness. It's dependent on open-heartedness, but not getting entangled, rather than just shutting everything down.

So that's part, again, to me, part of the art and part of the beauty of being on retreat: really sensing deeper levels of connection that we can have with each other. Deep sense of communion in silence without talking to each other or having someone listen to my story or whatever it is. You just get the sense of each person's being and the particularities and the uniqueness of each person's being, and it's just in the vibe. One's open to that and one's cherishing in a way, sensitive to each person's particularities and enjoying that. Sometimes we're a bit more like this and sometimes we're a bit more like this, but being open and feeling connected is actually quite important, I think, and it's part of the art. Does that make sense?

Some of you have probably never been on a retreat where anyone said to not make eye contact, but for a lot of people in the Theravada and Dharma world that's very, very common. So hopefully that makes sense.

If I'm going to be open, etc.—again, we go back to related to this in a certain way—I really need to keep my intention steady. My intention is jhana practice. And that's why we're here. That's what this retreat was set up for. So I can be open, et cetera, but my intention is steady. And that very steadiness of intention is what allows you to be open. Again, there's a difference between being open and getting entangled and then getting lost and my intention has gone somewhere else, versus I can be open partly because I'm just really clear about what my intention is.

So the intention is really for jhana practice, primarily. And then secondly, this intention: like what is my playground? So this should hopefully get, if it's not clear for you already, it should be getting very, very clear soon. Now some of you, like I said, when we responded to Karen, and I've said in interviews, some of you are going to have multiple playgrounds at once. So it's not necessarily it's the second jhana or it's the first. It might be. Some of you might be working on two or three at once, and partly because of how they interact with each other or what that enables. In other words, for example, like the third jhana might mellow out the first jhana. The first jhana is just too intense, and so the second jhana helps it a little bit. So yeah, it should be getting clear.

And if you feel it's really not clear where your learning edge playground is, let's try to get everyone clear with the three of us—with Sari and Robert—really what your playground is, within the next day or two at most. So you really know: oh, this is my learning edge playground, yes? And as I said, for some of you, because of your past experience, it will be a kind of multiple playground. That's completely fine.

This is different than teaching a retreat where people are just starting from the beginning in meditation. Does anyone who's quite familiar with imaginal practice—is anyone getting confused about what the difference is between imaginal spaces and jhanic spaces? Or is that okay? Good, so I don't really need to talk about that.

Now here's a funny thing. And again, everyone brings their own unique psychology to this. Sometimes we're too easily satisfied as human beings. A lot of people, what you're running into is too much pushiness—either "I want this to be better," which we've talked about, or "What's next? What's next? What's the next jhana? What's next? I'm ready for the next one."

But sometimes we're a little bit too easily satisfied with something that we can already do. And it's nice. So it's like, okay, well, I'll just stay here. It's so individual and it can change at different times. This is part of the art of the whole thing, and something to check out with a teacher.

I learn a lot about my life psychology here. You see it in the microcosm of something like jhana practice. Jhana practice reveals a lot because it's inherently kind of goal-oriented, and so we learn so much about our relationship with goals and all that. Some of you, or some of you in some moments, will be being too pushy—and probably everyone has encountered that. But some of you will be a little too easily satisfied with where you are, or where you've been for a while. Again, that's something you might want to bring to interviews and explore a little bit.

The interviews—yes, they're quite regular, aren't they? They're every other day for people. And really, I don't know if you've been feeling this, but there's no pressure on the interviews. Don't feel like you have to come in and say something super insightful or interesting, or have a big problem, or a really great question. I mean, hopefully you will have all of those things, but you don't have to.

Sometimes what happens in the course of a long retreat with jhanas is the practice itself is just kind of plateauing for a while. It's like something's gestating, and then at a certain point it'll just take a quantum leap. So if that's the case at any point—well, I'm going into this interview saying pretty much the same thing I said in the last interview, reporting the same thing—no problem. Just report it. Maybe the interview is a lot shorter and we're just checking how you're doing. Maybe the teacher will ask you a couple of things or find something to work with, but maybe it's just shorter. If you feel any sense of pressure for the interviews, you don't have to.

Something I've said before, but I think it really bears repeating, maybe in slightly different words. If we're talking about piti, we'll have a huge range of how strong it is, how intense it feels. And in a way it really doesn't matter. It's got to be strong enough to work with, strong enough to get into. But sometimes it can feel relatively weak—and especially, like I said, maybe that's compared to the first few times I experienced it or whatever.

In a way, what we want is to be okay with that whole range—okay when it's really very intense. Can I bear that? Can I open to it? Can I actually find that enjoyable? Can I really come into a relationship with it where that's fruitful, rather than kind of almost cringing in relationship to it, or holding back or contracting, which would be very normal for most people? But also on the other side, when it's relatively weak, it's fine.

It's okay. It's definitely pleasant, but it's definitely nothing to write home about. Can I still get into that? Can I learn how to work with that relatively unremarkable pīti and still really give myself wholeheartedly and see what's possible there?

It may not become more intense. I mean, it may become more intense, but as we said with the samādhi, the intensity is not so important. What's important though is here is this—in this sitting or this walking, whatever it is—is this pīti that's not so intense. It's still pīti. Can I stay interested in it? Can I work with it?

Maybe what has to happen is I have to actually increase the intensity of my attention—not the intensity of the pīti, but the intensity of my attention. And again, it's like, do I know how to do that? Do I actually get a sense of what it feels like to have a very intense attention and a less intense attention and a kind of medium attention? Do I recognize what that feels like? Can I turn the dial on that or the fader switch? Can I have an intense attention without getting a headache?

Or is it with this slightly weaker pīti that I actually need to go into the opening more? And that's what needs to happen. So can I open intensely? We tend to think of intensity as a kind of probing. What would it be to really, really intensely—that's why I use words like surrender and abandon oneself. So it might be that that needs to get more intense.

It's not the pīti necessarily that needs to get more intense, but I need to find the whole kind of—of all the aspects of attention, all the different dials there, all the different faders there, what's the maximal setting for each one? That's a way too technical analogy, but I'm playing with all these different aspects of attention, playing with all the possibilities there to really make this work, even though the pīti itself is not very remarkable. So that in itself is a really useful skill. It's a real part of the art.

I just want to throw out two things which I hardly mentioned, just in case people who haven't encountered them before are encountering them and are a little phased by them.

So one is, I think I mentioned it—did I mention the nāda sound? I just mentioned it, but I didn't really. So it's pretty common for some people in meditation, or common at certain stretches of their meditation life, when the samādhi deepens—in some degree it might be even not jhānic—to hear a kind of ringing in the ears, a kind of buzzing or that sort of thing. It's very normal. Some people take that as a meditation object and there's a couple of different ways you can work with it as a meditation object. You can work with it as a concentration object. You can work with it in a way that is a kind of help, a platform in insight.

But really what I wanted to just say right now is just that it's normal and nothing weird is going on. If you hear a ringing in your ears that sounds like it's really loud even sometimes, you don't have to take it as an object. And if you're fine with whatever practice you're doing, leave it. Just let it be there. It's just something that's going on. It might come and go. It's not a big deal. It doesn't mean there's something wrong with your brain or anything like that at all.

The second thing that can happen—it happens a lot with insight meditation, and certainly if you're doing these actual insight ways of looking that Julia mentioned and I mentioned the other day, but it will also happen with samādhi practice—is that sometimes after a practice and you look around you or you're walking around, and it's almost like everything feels like you're looking at a wall and it just feels like it's made of paper or it's see-through or it's lost its solidity. Very, very normal. Not a problem at all. You're not going crazy. It's completely normal.

What's going on there is actually really interesting and is something I'll come back to when we really start to talk about insight and jhāna more. But I'm saying both these things about the sound and the kind of visual perception of sort of loss of solidity or that sort of thing just to reassure in case these things are opening up and you're not used to them.

I think that's it. I don't really know what to do about this note that I just got. I'm not sure if we should try and all decide, but it might be something we should somehow all try and decide together. This may not be wise to try and do it this way. We're all adults. The maintenance department have asked that we flag up to you the potential of setting off the fire alarm if there is much smoke from the Hanukkah candles in the dining room and to check that they are definitely not left unattended. I mean, for me, if I just say what I think and then you can tell me what you think.

I don't think it's a problem if a fire alarm goes off. It's fine. They know how to deal with it and they'll deal with it. It's probably pretty unlikely. So that's my inclination with the first bit.

The second bit about unattended—I don't know, how long do they burn for, do you think? Oh, is that it? An hour and a half. Okay.

So, you know, you can kind of get a sense if some of you are sitting there in silence with them and practicing. You can just, if you're the only one there, then sorry, you have to stay. If there's a few of you, then maybe you can just communicate where you're going now, and then, well, do you want to come back in fifteen minutes and do a rota or something? How does that sound? Anyone got any better ideas with that?

I'm glad it's only an hour and a half because it's not all night. Does that sound okay? So this doesn't have to be a big deal at all.

Okay, great. So let's have a bit of quiet to end before tea.

Thank you everyone, and now time for tea.

CHAPTER 210

The Second Jhāna

Rob Burbea · 1h31

> In this comprehensive teaching, Rob Burbea examines the second jhāna through the Buddha's classical descriptions and practical guidance for cultivation. He explores how vitakka-vicāra (thinking and pondering) subside, giving way to inner tranquillity and unity of mind born of samādhi. The primary nimitta shifts from pīti to sukha (happiness) - an emotional quality that pervades the entire body like the Buddha's beautiful simile of a spring-fed lake.
> Burbea emphasizes the crucial importance of discriminating between pīti and sukha, warning against stagnation that occurs when practitioners fail to make these subtle distinctions. He offers practical techniques for transition, including dropping light questions about present emotions and using suggestion when the mind becomes more malleable in deeper samādhi. The teaching addresses common misconceptions about attachment to jhānic pleasure, arguing that the Buddha encouraged pursuit of these wholesome pleasures while warning against sense pleasures.
> The discussion includes the arising of mettā as a secondary nimitta, the confidence (ajjhattaṃ pasādanaṃ) that emerges from this profound happiness independent of external conditions, and how this transforms one's relationship with letting go and the spiritual path itself.

Today I would like to talk about the second jhāna and weave into that, as usual, some things that apply much more generally to any jhāna or jhāna practice in general.

As I said at the beginning, the teachings will progress through the retreat at the pace that they do, dependent on a lot of factors. It's highly unlikely that your practice progresses at the same rate, and in fact, it's totally undesirable. At some point, you're going to coincide with the teachings—you may have already done that or maybe later—but what we're really interested in is your pace. That's really, really important. What's your playground? What's your pace? When is it a maturing or transition time?

Let me read again the Buddha's description of the second jhāna, of which there are two: a simile and a more technical-sounding one. A practitioner, with the subsiding of thinking and pondering—again, there's that vitaka vicāra, how different this translation from the more common these days "initial and sustained application"—by gaining inner tranquility and unity of mind, reaches and remains in the second jhāna, which is free from thinking and pondering, born of concentration and filled with delight and happiness.

So again, filled with pīti and sukha. This translator is rendering pīti as delight. With the subsiding of vitaka vicāra, by gaining inner tranquility and unity of mind, one reaches and remains in the second jhāna, which is characterized by being free from thinking and pondering, free from vitaka and vicāra, born of concentration and filled with pīti and sukha.

Let me read another translation so you get a sense: Furthermore, with the stilling of directed thought and evaluation—again, quite a different translation of vitaka and vicāra—she enters and remains in the second jhāna. Rapture and pleasure, pīti and sukha, born of composure. The actual Pali word is samādhi, which the first translator rendered as concentration and this person has translated as composure. As I said, I would translate samādhi as quite a broad term: it's unification, it's harmonization, it's the agreement of the elements of being. Born of samādhi—a unification of awareness—free from directed thought and evaluation, free of vitaka and vicāra, internal assurance. She permeates and pervades, suffuses and fills this very body with the rapture, with the pīti and sukha born of composure, born of samādhi. There is nothing of her entire body unpervaded by pīti and sukha born of samādhi.

Basically, the vitaka and vicāra fade, and born of the samādhi is pīti and sukha, which is then spread throughout the body. A couple of other elements: that it's born of samādhi distinguishes it from the first jhāna, where the Buddha said it is born from withdrawal from the hindrances, or seclusion from the hindrances. So this is born of samādhi. Remember how rich that term samādhi is, how wide—for me at least, hopefully for you. What's this unification of awareness? The Pali is cetasso ekodibhāvaṁ—the citta, cetasso, the citta unified or raised to oneness. And then this word we'll come back to later: ajjhattaṁ sampasādanaṁ—internal assurance. Sometimes you hear the word confidence, internal confidence.

Then we have a gorgeous simile that I find absolutely beautiful: Just as a lake fed by a spring with no inflow from east, west, north, or south, where the rain god sends moderate showers from time to time, the water welling up from below, mingling with cool water, would suffuse, fill, and irradiate that cool water so that no part of the pool was untouched by it. So with this pīti and sukha born of samādhi, the practitioner so suffuses their body that no spot remains untouched.

Remember, we're talking about a very hot climate where that kind of image is going to be supremely appealing—unlike Devon in December. To me, that's a lovely, lovely image.

And I feel very much as you get more into the jhanas, some of these similes actually seem more accurate than the more technical sounding descriptions, which are open to all kinds of ambiguities over translations and terms and what they might have meant at one historical period and then another. To me, there's something much more accurate about the poetic translation than there is about what sounds more technical—the kind of descriptions and language where there are these five factors and there are these three factors, and we tend to think, oh, that must be the really accurate one. But you'll see how you do with it. See what you gravitate towards, what opens, what you learn as time goes on.

So these are the descriptions we have. They're pretty brief. Again, as I think I mentioned yesterday or another time, when the mind opens into new territory, a new realm, a new level, it tends to experience that level as effortless at first. It's just—whoa, we're suddenly not in Kansas anymore. We're suddenly, what is this? And you're just going along with the ride, it feels like, and it's effortless and wonderful. There are always exceptions, always exceptions, but it tends to be that that's the case.

Then at times after that, after those first few experiences where it's all just effortlessly kind of happening and you're almost just a bewitched witness of the whole experience, it might be that at times the relationship with the second jhana matures. And so at times we're actually practicing—we're conscious that it's not effortless anymore. I need to actually practice tuning to this frequency of happiness, which at times may be super obvious and kind of blow your socks off remarkable—like wow—and other times much more subtle and maybe not so remarkable. I need to practice tuning to that and steadying my attention on what is essentially a more refined object. The sukha is more refined than the piti.

As I mentioned, the jhanas are not primarily a spectrum of stronger and stronger concentration. The eighth jhana is not invariably a state of more immovability of mind than the fourth jhana or the seventh jhana or whatever. That's not necessarily the case. That's not the primary thing that's changing. It might happen that way sometimes, but it might happen completely otherwise at different times. Rather, the jhanas are primarily a spectrum of increasing refinement—let's say increasing refinement. I'm aware there's a bit of ambiguity between the word subtlety and refinement, so let's choose the word refinement, the way that this cloth is a lot more coarse and less refined than this cloth. The texture of it is much more refined. They're primarily a spectrum of deeper and more refinement. They get more and more refined.

Technically—and we'll come back to this—there's a reason for that. It's because they're also a spectrum of less and less fabrication on the spectrum of the fabrication of perception. If you've never heard that term before, I'll explain it in more detail later on. This is really, really central and it's really, really important to understand that. In general, I would say, in terms of understanding what the Dharma is, where we're going, what emptiness means, what dependent arising means, what liberation means—it's a key concept. The jhanas too map onto that very key central concept because the jhanas too, in their spectrum of more and more refinement, are also, you could say, places or areas on a spectrum of less and less fabrication.

It's actually like this coarse cloth has almost more material to it. It's thicker and denser. And this fine cloth has less material to it. It's thinner with more filaments. So we're actually fabricating less as we go deeper and deeper into jhanas. We may or may not be aware of that, but to become conscious of it and to understand it and understand its implications is huge, is massive. In a way, I would say we don't really understand what the jhanas are, really understand how they relate to insight practice, or how they integrate into the whole practice. And we don't really understand what we're doing when we're practicing concentration—we don't really understand that until we understand this and its relation, the whole notion of the fabrication of perception: how one fabricates more or less at different times, how does that happen, and what happens when we fabricate more or less? We will come back to that.

However, having said all that, in the second jhana we've got "born of samadhi." So I think it's true to say that usually a state of second jhana is an improvement of concentration over the first jhana—usually. But that samadhi, again, it's a wider word—unification, harmonization, etc. A wider word than it usually gets translated as just concentration, I would say.

It may be that a practitioner is still at this point staying with their breath. The breath is the primary object and the piti has come up and they're really mixing that with the breath and getting into that, and then the happiness comes up. And one can, if one wants, stay with the breath. Or the metta might be the base practice and one can, if one wants, stay with the metta. But what happens is—or what should happen—is they get mixed. It must feel at some point that I am breathing happiness, or the breath has become happiness, or the metta has become happiness. I am radiating out sukha and happiness, or the body has become happiness.

The Buddha says, "no part of the body left unpervaded by this sukha and piti."

You have the option of keeping with the breath if that's your base practice and you want to, and that's what helps, or keeping with the metta. But these primary base practice objects—the metta or the breath—should completely integrate with the happiness. As I said, they just become happiness.

Or you can, as described with the first jhana, make the happiness the primary object and what you're primarily paying attention to. Then the breath or the metta may support that a little bit, or it's just gone—you're really not concerned with it. You have a bodily sense of happiness, an emotional sense of happiness, and that's what you're concentrating on.

If we were all to take a sort of school trip to Newton Abbott and each one of us were to stop someone on the street and say, "Think of something that makes you happy, and then can you concentrate on that happiness?" I think most people would just be baffled. It would feel impossible or very, very difficult.

For most of us, happiness as an object to focus on and steady the mind with is actually something we never do. We wouldn't know how to do it and we wouldn't be able to do it. So we're training that. We have to train that.

We're not concentrating so much on a spatial point. We're concentrating, if you like, on that frequency or that bandwidth of frequencies, which is happiness. That's really what we're doing. Within that, or within our intention to do that and our playing with that, there may be times when the attention is really steady and really focusing on a spatial point. But that spatial point is happiness, or it's the center of the happiness.

Again, what we're really doing is focusing on the happiness, and that's central. Rather than thinking of concentration as a focus on a spatial point—which may be helpful at times and at other times not what's helpful—we let go of the sense of the spatial point being so important. It's the frequency.

This word sukha, S-U-K-K-H-A in Pali, is an emotional quality, the emotion of happiness. I mean that word in quite a broad way. Technically in Buddhist psychology, it's a citta quality—a quality of the heart and mind. However, it's also physical, and this we really want to emphasize. You feel it as much in the body, and you need to feel it in the body.

This is partly why the person in Newton Abbott won't be able to do it—because it's just an extremely ephemeral, extremely wispy mental quality. They can't locate it in their body. Feeling it in the body, pervading the body with it, is exactly what enables us to really get into it and really stabilize with it.

When I say "in the body," I mean in the energy body, in the whole space, in the vibration tone. It becomes happiness. The vibration tone of the energy body space becomes happiness.

At the beginning, when you first open to this level—either the second jhana or just the emergence of the sukha—identifying it as an emotion is for most people actually quite a crucial distinction to make. The piti is a primarily physical quality. The sukha is an emotion.

Just making that distinction, although because of what I just said, it's actually not quite true—they're both energy body vibrations, different energy body vibrations—will really help you make the distinction, get a sense of the different playgrounds, get a sense of the territory, and actually build the whole thing if you recognize it and feel it as an emotional quality as well. That's what's going to really start to distinguish it from the piti.

Identifying it as an emotional quality versus a primarily physical quality, which we could regard the piti as—and the piti isn't just that either—makes things black and white. It's not this absolute division, but sometimes making things black and white is actually really helpful at a certain stage to make things clearer. Is it the ultimate truth? Definitely not. But just making that division at first is really helpful.

It will help to draw it out of the mix, to draw out that emotional quality of sukha from the mix. "Ah, this is the emotion. That's what I'm paying attention to at first." And to begin to distinguish: this is piti, this is sukha.

You really need to taste it—which really means feel it in the body and feel the different qualities and enjoy them—several times, perhaps quite a few times, to really get used to this. At first, it might be very, very obvious. If the second jhana just explodes out of the first, it's very obvious: I'm in a completely different territory now. But as time goes on, there might be a "hold on a minute, where's the division here?"

This distinguishing, this making discernment, is actually really key. This is what we're talking about when I emphasize sensitivity, attunement, discernment—it's all really key not just to jhana practice, but to what we said right at the beginning: the quality of your relationship with your own emotions and your wisdom with your own emotions, your sensitivity to all kinds of things in life, your capacity...

for relationship, the skill you can work with in emptiness practice, in soul-making practice, in brahmaviharas practice. That's why we emphasized it.

I would say—or rather a lot of people say, and I agree with them—that as the Buddha describes, piti and sukha are both present in the first jhana, and they're both present in the second jhana. But what's characteristic of the first jhana is that the piti is to the fore. We're entranced by that more, and maybe there's more of it in the mix. Then in the second jhana, that flips and the sukha becomes prominent over the piti. The piti is still there, but the sukha becomes prominent, and the sukha is our primary nimitta, whereas in the first jhana, the piti was the primary nimitta.

Karen asked me, "Is that in the Pali Canon?" No, I've never seen it in the Pali Canon. I mean, it might be somewhere—I very much doubt it, but I don't think so. Maybe it's in a commentary somewhere, I'm not sure. When I say that, I'm speaking from the teachers that I have really trusted and who have taught me jhana practice, or from whom I've learned jhana practice, and from my own experience. That's pretty clear. Is it in the Pali? I don't think so.

We get these very brief descriptions, and as we go into the further jhanas, the descriptions are even briefer. So we have to somehow discern and get a sense of what the territory is. But as I said—I think I've already said it twice and I'll say it once more—back to this distinguishing between piti and sukha, really making that distinction. What can happen if we don't is this kind of stagnation. It's the discernment that takes us deeper. It's the sensitivity that takes us deeper on the whole path, deeper on the jhana path in a full way.

I know practitioners who sit a lot, who did sit a lot, put a lot of work in, and they reach a kind of place that's around this area. It's a kind of a mix. They do not—either they do not take the instruction or they do not bother to make the differentiation. Twenty years later they're still pretty much hovering around in the same kind of soup. That might be completely fine with them, or they might want something different, but they're not going to open up anywhere deeper unless they make the distinctions, the discriminations, the subtle discriminations. It's nice where they are and they can sit for quite a while, but it hasn't gone anywhere and there isn't much new insight. So it doesn't just apply to the depth of samadhi practice—it applies to the insight practice as well. That all gets stagnated as well.

Sometimes, though, they're mixed. The piti and the sukha are mixed and it's hard to tell at the beginning. So there will be times, if you're new to the second jhana, when you're not quite sure. But generally speaking, we want to be clear: this is piti and this is sukha. Generally speaking, they do kind of separate like that. But there will be times when it's actually quite hard to tell.

What all that means is that part of the work—or play, depending on your favorite word there—part of the work and play at this stage is exactly that. That's part of your job. Can I really get used to what the differences are? Can I make the discriminations? That's really part of the work.

So how does the second jhana arise? What color is an unripe mango? Is it green? What color is a ripe mango? Is it kind of yellow, red? Let's say it's more yellow-red. Ajahn Jeff used to say, "Don't take a green unripe mango and paint it yellow-red and then call that a ripe mango." Don't take your practice wherever it is and try to do something and call that the second jhana. Don't take your first jhana and push it or put pressure on it or just do something that you're kind of forcing.

You don't force a mango to ripen. His approach was very much that these things will ripen in their own time. If you do it that way, rather than kind of jumping the gun or forcing anything or wanting to achieve something or having some kind of timetable, it will be much, much more fruitful. Again, generally speaking—there are all kinds of exceptions, and I'll come back to some of those exceptions.

So again, we talked about pīti—remember when we discussed it, we said that generally speaking, you could say there are two ways that pīti arises. One is I take an object—maybe it's a point in the abdomen or the breath at the nostrils, if it's the breath, maybe I take the metta, whatever it is—and I just work with that, work with that, work with that. I do not put up with the hindrances when they come. I really try to work with the hindrances, and I have this background awareness. I play with this idea of more intense attention, less intense attention, delicacy of attention, subtilizing the attention. If I do all that—those four things—then the way the pīti tends to arise is sudden and eruptive and quite strong after, for most people, quite a while.

Then there's another way, which is taking the energy body experience from the beginning and actually just kind of tending to the little ember of well-being there, fanning it when it needs fanning, protecting it when it needs protection from the winds, building in a way, coaxing it to become more of a campfire—the pīti. But that needs work and play: playing with the modes of attention, playing with very intense probing at times or intense attention, intense opening, radical opening, receiving. So I have to be intense. I can't—at times at least—I have to be intense with how I'm coaxing this ember. Sometimes my intention and my attention and my whole work and play has to be quite intense without putting pressure or a demand on it.

When we get to the second jhāna and this happiness, it might be the case, as I said, that it probably relies more on its arising in a way that's helpful. It probably relies more on a really, very gratifying relationship with the pīti. The pīti—one is really into it and really enjoying it. So if the pīti is okay and it's kind of just okay, and then you think, "Maybe the second jhāna would be better"—that goes back to the foolish, inexperienced cow. Remember that?

So I have to—what does this mean here? It means then that again, with the pīti that's arisen, I have to work and play with that in these ways. I actually have to shape it. I need to really take care of it and take care of my relationship to it. The sukha of the second jhāna will only arise when I do that.

So if it matures—if the sukha of the second jhāna matures organically like this mango—it emerges through working and playing with the pīti, and through the pīti feeling really lovely, really pleasurable, really enjoyable. Then the sukha emerges in a much clearer way. It's like, "Whoa, this really is—okay, this really is something else now. Now this is really something quite extraordinary." And this is clearly what that word sukha means. It's clearly the second jhāna.

After that—to say in different words what I said earlier—after a few times of that, then you might find yourself needing to... In other words, after quite a bit of experience with the second jhāna, then you might find yourself needing to go back and work with a much more subtle and unremarkable sukha and build it up the way we built up the ember of well-being into pīti.

Does this make sense what I'm saying? It's like if I've got a pīti that's not that great, then my chances of taking a happiness that's okay and building it into the second jhāna are probably—there are always exceptions, and I'd be really interested if there are actually, to hear back just for teaching purposes—but it's more likely that the happiness that comes when the pīti wasn't that remarkable, and then the sukha is not that remarkable, it will be hard to get that to feel really gratifying and like "this is really something." Versus the pīti that can arise with patience and time from just working with the ember in the energy body.

With the pīti, we can go two ways. I take an object, I stick with it, but I have to be careful how I'm sticking with it and be intense and watch—be subtle with the attention and the delicacy and all that. I can do that, or I can just take the ember of well-being in the energy body and build it and build it and build it. So basically, I can get either of two ways to a pīti that's really nice.

When you come to the second jhāna, I'm just wondering whether the probability of coming to a sukha which is characteristic of the second jhāna that's really nice is not an equal probability. I can't start from a happiness that's not really that gratifying, especially if that was built on a pīti that never got really that gratifying. It's probably possible, but at first it's unlikely. With the pīti, I have to get really into the pīti. I have to really get that far and really enjoy it. And then it's more likely to succeed.

After a lot of experience with the sukha and the second jhāna, then you can take a really quite unremarkable happiness—you're already quite skilled and it's already quite familiar—and that can grow.

Having said all that, sometimes what happens—sometimes what I encounter in teaching—is someone whose first jhāna is just great and they're even getting all the elements of mastery. So it's usually the case that as a person really starts to gain those elements of mastery through practice with the first jhāna, the second jhāna is already kind of intruding, emerging, showing itself.

That's usually the case. Occasionally—or sometimes; I don't know what proportion of times—someone's first jhana is going really well. They're really enjoying it, they're really into it, and there are some of those elements of mastery, but the second jhana is not showing. It's not emerging.

Sometimes—this is not how Ajahn Chah teaches; he would say you never paint that mango at all, or you never force a ripening—obviously there are some things you could do, little tricks you can play with.

So one is: here's the piti. I'm really used to it. I'm really into it. It's going great right now—it's going great generally, I'm into it, I've practiced with it, I've gotten used to all that mastery, or a lot of the mastery. And then right now, it's going great in this sitting, walking, standing, whatever it is. When it's going great, I can just drop a question—just a really light question: "What is the emotion right now? What's the emotion I'm feeling right now?" And the answer should be happiness. It should be sukha.

A second possibility: again, here it is going quite well. (This is something that doesn't need to be going well—after a while, after a lot of practice, it doesn't need to be going well for this one to work. But here, let's say at the beginning when it's not quite happening.) Here I am, and I drop in the word—whichever word I prefer—just a whisper, a grain of magic, alchemical, chemical. Just drop it in, a drop into the citta: "happiness," or "joy," or "sukha," or whatever word you prefer.

As I said, the mind goes deeper in samadhi, becomes more and more suggestible, and potently so. More and more sensitive the mind becomes—sensitive to suggestion, sensitive, becomes more malleable in all kinds of ways.

Another thing you can try: you've probably noticed that most often piti tends to flow upwards in the body. One feels a sort of upward current of it. What you can try sometimes is just feel that upward current. Again, this is when you're really used to it and it's great and you're enjoying it. Then the upward current—imagine it shooting out the top of your head like a fountain, like a spout of a fountain. The water comes out the top of your head and then, like a fountain, it falls back down. Just imagine that; see what happens.

A fourth possibility—I'm not sure how much one might want to try this, but it may well be very useful for some people at some times: again, here's the piti. It's going well. I'm into it; my practice is right now. And just the memory—introduce, again, very, very subtly, just the memory of something that makes you happy, or a happiness. Just like a little tincture, a little drop of tincture into the citta, the memory of a happiness while the piti is there. Drop that in.

So these are all little tricks. In a way, the safest gamble is to let something mature and just get really, really into the piti. Find that enjoyment, find that intensity of relationship with the piti. Don't confuse intensity with this kind of forward-probing narrowing—that's one form of intensity. Another form is: how intensely am I opening? But an intensely enjoyable relationship with the piti, and it matures out of that in time.

If not, or if you feel like—or if the teacher says—well, maybe you want to try one of those tricks. If you're playing enough, you will discover your own tricks at this point, at this threshold, at this border between the first and second jhana. You should discover your own tricks and come and share them with us. There's all kinds of things that are possible.

Eventually you won't need any tricks, because hopefully you have mastery of the second jhana, which means you just have the subtle intention for the second jhana or for the sukha to arise, and it goes there. I can't even remember the tricks I used to use. This was all I could come up with because I couldn't remember. After a while, one just doesn't need them.

It's just from intention. But there is that point of learning new territory where you will be like, "Well, it's gone there before and how do I get it back?" Or if it needs a nudging, you know?

Going back to something I mentioned earlier, there's this phrase in Pali which means something like "with the subsiding, with the allaying, with the cessation, with the calming" of what? Thinking—thinking about vitakka and vicāra begins to not make much sense at this point. So what is that? This refers to what's characteristic here.

Vicāra, that word also has a particular meaning sometimes. So it's used as a pair. Vitakka-vicāra just means thinking. Vicāra has a particular meaning of a kind of discursive thought. What I mean by that is the mind getting hooked on a thought and following a thought for more than one moment. So this thought leads to that thought, or I'm following a train of thought. This is discursive thinking.

"Discursive" in English comes from the Latin curare, which means to run, to move, to move fastly. The mind is in a certain—you understand, it's hooked and it's moved. Does that make sense? The mind is moved with a thought. One thought follows another. So when we reason "this, therefore that, therefore the next thing"—that's also, in English, discursive thought. That's also one of the meanings of discursive thought: consequential movement of thought.

I would say that if you're careful enough in your attention, if you're sensitive enough in your attention, you will notice in the second jhāna that it may be that thought arises at times. This citta, which has infinite depth and subtlety—it may be that thought arises at times, but what there isn't in the second jhāna is any being hooked to a thought. The mind is not then moved off on a thought. One thought does not lead to a second thought. This follows that, or "I was thinking this." And the kind of thought that arises is probably very, very wispy, very, very subtle. It's not extended in time either.

So there's a larger point here, I think, just about—in addition to mapping out what actually is the range of experience of the second jhāna—and there's a larger, perhaps even equally important point. What is it to have a thought? We use that word so much. "I'm thinking," or "there was thought," or "there wasn't thought."

I would say the whole idea of thought and the whole experience of thought has an enormous range to it—from the mind shouting something and completely lost in a tangle of shouting at itself or whatever it is and very coarse thoughts, to extremely, extremely subtle, the kind of subtlety that most people wouldn't even notice. And we're not used to, we're not even aware that, oh, there might be this level there.

So an invitation alongside all this: to open up that investigation, to pay attention and notice, what do we mean when we say thought? And what does it mean when the mind gets quiet? Is it completely quiet? Is it quiet at a certain level? What kind of thoughts have gone? What kind of relationship with thought has gone?

So what has gone is that being hooked onto a thought, or rather more than being hooked onto a thought—one thought hooking us to the next, one thought being hooked to the next. That's gone. And also gross thought has gone.

Again, this is the sort of thing—it may take a while to notice this. And I really mean, again, this is also why I keep—and sorry to anyone who doesn't like this—but why subtlety and sensitivity is such an important part for me in the teaching. One begins to realize, oh, these things are not so black and white. And there's way more subtlety of range for most phenomena than we tend to realize at first, and we can develop our sensitivity and get aware of that range of subtlety. And that pays enormous dividends.

All this business about what is thought actually has huge implications for very, very deep insight. People talk about non-conceptual awareness and "the mind was completely non-conceptual," etc. And so what's the difference between a conception and a thought? And does a conception have to be verbal? Does a thought have to be verbal? I need to notice all this for the really deep end of insight, when you're talking about really deep unfabricating, or understandings of emptiness and the way certain words are used in texts and stuff like that—but we won't talk about that now.

So like I said, it may take a while to notice this. In a way, what happens with the samādhi of the second jhāna is partly what enables us, or should enable us, to begin to notice this a little bit. But as I said whenever it was—usually at first, a new level, when the mind enters a new level, it's like a dam bursting and the water is just gushing and you're just going along for this water ride. And it just seems like there's no thought happening. In time, it's like your eyes getting used to a darkened room.

You grow accustomed to this new territory, like your eyes adjusting to a darkened room. You say, "Oh, hold on a minute. There are some things here I didn't notice at first." But we're talking about something very, very subtle and a whole different relationship, a whole different level of thought.

So let's leave that aside for now. But this brings me to an important question I posed earlier: How wise would it be to use my perception of the presence or absence of thought as a kind of measurement of where I am in samadhi? To keep glancing there asking, "Has it stopped thinking yet?" I don't think that would be very helpful or very wise at all. Given both the confusion about what vitakka and vicara actually mean and the subtlety of the range of what thinking might be, I can't see much value in this approach.

You will notice something in relation to thought if you're really getting into the second jhana. But don't make that the primary criteria.

As I said before, each jhana has a primary nimitta. And in the second jhana, the primary nimitta is sukha. That's the thing we're really making primary and really getting into. That's what we're really taking care of and really opening our relationship with.

Now there's what's significant in practice, but there's also why that's significant—why are we making that the significant thing in practice? There may be people out there with the idea that the most significant thing about the second jhana is the quieting, the stilling of thought. I would be very surprised if there aren't. But again, we have to think: Why do I choose to emphasize this over that? Of all the things I could emphasize in practice right now, of all the things I could make a priority, why this and not that?

Remember we were talking about how I think about samadhi and how I relate to samadhi in the present moment is connected to my big view. So we apply that here. Here's this collection of factors. Which is the most significant one and why?

I'm going to choose the sukha as the most significant one. Maybe there's someone who chooses the lessening of thought as the most significant one. But I would say the quietening of thought is not the most significant or transformative aspect or factor. It's actually an absence of a factor here, isn't it? It's the absence of two factors that were present in the first jhana.

I would say that's not the most transformative factor or aspect of the second jhana. I would say happiness is. It's the sukha, it's the range of happiness, it's the remarkableness of that happiness. It's the fact that it comes pretty much independent of someone needing to praise me or some sense pleasure or something—these are the things that transform.

If and only if I really marinate in it and really drink it lots and lots of times for a long time, then that happiness is really, really going to make a difference in one's life—a huge difference. As a resource, we've talked about this before, it's a tremendous resource. Just imagine several hours a day just drinking that kind of happiness, that depth of happiness, that beauty of happiness. Even half an hour a day, whatever it is.

After a while, just knowing it's there and that you can access it if you want to—the sense of what's possible is also really transformed by the tasting of that happiness. One's ability to let go becomes vastly expanded. That's part of the function of a resource in Dharma. This lovely, lovely feeling means it doesn't so much matter how much money I have, whether I get famous, whether I get rich, whether the food is nice where I'm staying or not. It's completely relativized by that kind of experience.

So one's ability to let go is made much more vast, much more steady, much more profound, much more wide-reaching because of the happiness. And it's the happiness that's pretty much independent of what someone is giving me or sense pleasures. It's massive, the difference—but only if we marinate for a long period of time with the happiness as what I'm drinking, drinking, drinking, slaking the thirst for what we're really looking for in chasing sense pleasures or praise or whatever it is.

I'm going to leave soul-making Dharma and sensing the soul completely out of this conversation for now, because some of you know that gets a lot more interesting and there's a lot more to say there. I'm just leaving it out for now not to complicate things.

If, though, I decide to say or to take, "Oh no, it's the quietening of thought..."

That's the most significant thing about the second jhana. My question would be why? Why do you think that is, and can you explain how that fits into and makes more sense in a bigger picture? Is it that you believe that when the mind is free of thought it's seeing things as they really are, or that thought creates a kind of smoke screen in front of reality? When I bring in this question, it's like: how does it fit? What actually is most significant? And why, if I'm choosing to emphasize this, or if a person's choosing to emphasize that, why is that significant? And how is that significant - for jhana practice, for what it's going to deliver, and in the whole path?

Sometimes what happens in practice is that a person is in the first jhana, and then they just completely leapfrog the second jhana and end up in the third jhana. That's the next thing that just emerges by itself. I don't know how common this is, but I've certainly encountered it quite a few times. This is quite an interesting phenomenon.

We have to think back: where are we trying to go? In this way of setting up where we want eventually to have mastery of the second jhana too, it becomes a question of: do we need to stop now and go back? Or should we let the third mature and really get into that, then go back?

It's also possible that practice might skip from the first jhana to a peacefulness that is not really akin to the third jhana. It's peaceful, it's relatively still, there's some equanimity there. It's certainly not unpleasant, but it's not really the third jhana.

This partly depends on background practice, and partly depends on one's psychological patterns. For some people, there's a kind of resistance to intense happiness for whatever reasons, however that came to be as a karmic formation, a sankara. Sometimes that needs a little unpacking, or the relationship with happiness and bubbly happiness needs a little looking at. But eventually we want to master them all.

We could say that each jhana delivers its particular insight - though more accurately, each jhana delivers something particular in relation to the ability to let go. That's what I would translate insight as. Insight has to be directly related to letting go. Insight is what allows letting go.

With the first jhana, it might simply be the fact that a whole other realm is possible. Other states of consciousness, other dimensions are possible when the mind is not entangled. Just that knowledge, that firsthand intimate experience and the intensity with which it impacts consciousness as something completely different than we have experienced before - that makes a big difference for many people.

With the second jhana, it's related to this happiness. In the very short Buddhist description, there are just two words: ajjhatam pasadanam, which translates as something like internal confidence or internal assurance. I think this confidence could mean one of three things, or two or three of them together.

It could mean confidence in the stability of the citta right then, in that moment. Because of the samadhi and the stilling of thought and the sense of integration, there's confidence in how stable this is. Instead of the first jhana's more active quality - the vitakka and vicara working like a soap mixer - here it's more still. There's a kind of confidence in that stability.

It could be confidence that comes from discovering such a profound and fulfilling happiness that doesn't seem primarily dependent on external conditions. Just knowing that, tasting that, drinking from it - that's going to give one quite a bit of confidence in one's life.

Or it could be confidence in the Dharma itself and in one's own ability to tread the path that the Buddha described. One really has a sense: here I am 2,500 years later experiencing these remarkable experiences that the Buddha described. He's got them in a kind of spectrum, and if I'm experiencing this and it has such an intimate sense of "this really is what we're talking about," then one's confidence in the Dharma itself and in one's ability to tread the path gets quite a support. Maybe I can do more. If I can do this, I can do more - all the way to liberation.

I don't know which of those confidences the term refers to, but confidence is part of the gift. I would emphasize the second one as primary, but I think maybe they're all there. I certainly remember the confidence it gave me in the path and that I was actually walking this path and it was possible. What the Buddha was talking about was real. It makes such an impact - much more than just being mindful and being a little calmer, or seeing impermanence. It makes such an impact because of the beauty and the depth and the remarkability of the experience.

It really gave me a lot of confidence in the path and that I was on the path and that I could do that because, look, I'm doing it. I feel it.

But I think probably for me, the most important one is the discovery of this kind of happiness—that we have access to this kind of happiness. It's open to us and it's not dependent on external conditions.

So I mentioned earlier, probably when we were talking about the first jhana, that each jhana has a primary nimitta in our language and a secondary nimitta, right? And I think I just gave one—I'm not sure how many examples I gave of a secondary nimitta in the first jhana. The primary nimitta is piti.

In the second jhana, the primary nimitta is sukha.

But in the first jhana, for example, or any jhana, you could have a secondary nimitta of, say, a bright white light in the mind or a cloud of light, that sort of thing. You could also, for some people, have something aural—they hear a sound or sounds or whatever it is. There can be different ones. Those two are probably the most common.

But there are also other kinds of secondary nimitta which are a little bit more, let's say, intrinsically important or valuable. And one of them is quite common at this stage, the second jhana, and then in a way even more differently so in the third jhana: metta is there.

So sometimes people are not doing a metta practice—they're just working on the breath and now it's open to the second jhana—and actually feel... sometimes people have come to me and say, "I think the metta is the primary thing, not the happiness." It's not technically—it's a secondary nimitta—but it's very valuable.

So automatically in a jhana, there is metta in it. It's kind of impossible to be in a jhana and have ill will or aversion, the opposite of metta. So it's more again back to: what will I become sensitive to? What can I pick up on? What's in the mix of frequencies here? And metta is especially noticeable in different flavors in the second and third jhanas.

So we can allow that. And sometimes you can focus more on that. You can lean your emphasis more into the metta there—again, it's a dialer. How much does it become completely primary? Does it become kind of fifty-fifty? Does it become just in the background? There can be, for a lot of people obviously, a lot of healing—a lot of healing with the love that's there. And particularly when we talk about the third jhana, but a lot of healing.

But we need to be clear: what's the primary nimitta? And that's the sukha, that's the happiness. So we're not leaning too much and too often and too long into the love over the stretch of our practice.

Why would metta come up at that point? Why would metta reveal itself, do you think?

"Because they're both unfabricated," someone suggests.

So if I say that slightly differently, if that's okay: when we're in a jhana, we're not fabricating. So I'm introducing more this conversation about fabrication, this teaching about fabrication.

When we're in a jhana, and more and more so as we go down the jhanas, we're fabricating less and less self and less and less of any kind of otherness—other person or whatever. So the duality between self and other gets less. And there's more sense of non-separation, more oneness. There's less like, "That's your space and this is my space, thank you very much," or whatever it is. Less judging or less irritation. There's just a tendency—self and other, both less fabricated, more non-separateness, less duality there and less polarity in all that and all the difficulties.

So in a way, there's a kind of natural arising of metta because of that, because we feel less separate. Afterwards, even the metta gets unfabricated, but we'll talk about that later. That's when we get into equanimity and things.

So if you're practicing in this territory—when you're practicing and when this territory opens up for you and it feels like, okay, now that's my playground and that's what I'm really exploring, and you're really into it and you've just spent a sitting period in the second jhana—whatever it is, and it's time to end because you have to go wash up or whatever, so you know it's coming up time to end, but it's still going well and there's still energy there, then you can spend a few minutes, if you want, just a few minutes at the end of the session playing what I call two games: ping pong and leapfrog.

For example, here I am in the second jhana, and then I go, okay, well, let's go to just normal consciousness. I'm leapfrogging the first jhana. Then I go from there to one, and then I'll go from one back to two, and then I'll go from two back to one, and then I'll go to two again. Then I'm ping-ponging: one, two, one, two, one, two, one, two.

I actually need to practice that transition both ways. So this is a minor part of our practice, but one of the elements of mastery. Can I really just move back and forth at ease between any jhana and its adjacent jhana? So if I'm practicing the second jhana, can I go to the first? And if I haven't reached the third yet, then second to first, to second, to first, to second. It's all very light. It's all just a game.

And then I can also practice leapfrog. Here there aren't too many leapfrog options because we've only got zero, first, and second jhana. So you can go from second to ordinary consciousness to second. There aren't many leapfrog options available yet. So you can just spend a few minutes of fun at the end of sitting playing ping pong and leapfrog. These are the elements of mastery. I would like to encourage this. I wouldn't spend a whole sitting doing this, but they're part of learning the territory, they're part of the discrimination, they're part of the mastery, they're part of what makes the mind and the citta really malleable.

So again, when we come to talking about mastery, we have to think about pacing. Is it not ripe yet to try this stuff? I'm just getting used to the second jhana and it's too soon to try going for a walk in the second jhana when I'm just getting accustomed to it. I need to be really, really familiar. And when I do try all that—like the whole practice and the whole tenor of the days here—we really want to encourage this kind of light playfulness. If I get too heavy and too tight and too pressured, it just squeezes the sukha out of things and then there won't be the fruit. So the whole thing is very light when it's time to play.

Okay, so I don't know where things are at in the dharma world these days. I don't get out much—it's actually true. But certainly, if I think back years ago, and I don't know, maybe this is a question for you: Who's heard from anyone, "Oh, careful with the jhanas, there's a danger you might get attached"? Some years ago, this would have been everyone. It would have been the default response. "You don't really want to be—A, what's the point? It's not insight. And B, there's really a danger there that you're going to get attached." And that's really pretty serious.

So, like I said, it's interesting. I'm not sure—maybe two-fifths of the people put their hand up. Anyway, half of you. If you go back to what the Buddha said, what did he say about all this? There is one occasion where I remember him talking about a monk who was very ill and because of the low energy was not able to access whatever level of jhana he was able to reach before his illness or when he was well. This monk was having some dukkha about that. And the Buddha said, "It's anatta. It's anatta." You see it as anatta, both the jhana and the self. It's not-self. So there's that kind of attachment possibility.

But what the Buddha mostly said, a few times, is this: Talking about the pleasure of jhana, he said, "This, the pleasure of jhana, is a pleasure I will allow myself." This is someone who talks about the middle way in terms of renunciation and the senses, but basically relative to most of us, he's a pretty extreme renunciant. This extreme renunciant says: "This is a pleasure I will allow myself. This is a pleasure that should not be feared. This is a pleasure that should be pursued and developed. This is a pleasure that should not be feared. This is a pleasure that should be pursued and developed."

And when he talks about sense pleasures, he talks about them as a pit of vipers, a pit of—you know those elephant traps that old hunter-gatherers made, with these big wooden stakes, and the elephant or mammoth is supposed to fall in? That's the sort of image he gives for sense pleasures. It looks like a nice piece of grass or whatever is there, but actually it's a trap. So he talks about the jhanas in that way—not to be feared, this is a pleasure, I will allow myself this pleasure, should be pursued and developed—and he talks about sense pleasures with a whole list of pretty extreme negative similes.

Is it or was it the case that somewhere along the line modern dharma teachings have kind of reversed the Buddha's instructions regarding these kinds of pleasures—sense pleasure and jhanic pleasure—and reversed the Buddha's concerns regarding attachment to either?

I find this really interesting, both historically and psychologically, and how that may have evolved and why. It may be changing—it's definitely changing, no question—but the Buddha is pretty clear about this.

Again, I don't know if anyone is still unsure when the piti, for example, feels very sexual or orgasmic. Is that okay? It seems a bit much, or it can't be right, surely. Just to remind you again of the Buddha's words describing the jhana: piti, sukha, whole body pervaded, leaving no spot untouched. What he does not say is "the whole body pervaded except below the waist and above the middle of the thigh." He says whole body.

This is one of these things that's changing now, but years ago it was quite a pervasive belief that you really shouldn't mess with the jhanas—there's a real danger you'll get attached. Again, can we bring a little intelligence to this, a little questioning?

It seems to me there are three kinds of attachment that are potential with jhanas. One is attachment to the pleasure—that would be the most obvious one people would think of. After sixteen or seventeen years of teaching, I honestly struggle to remember one person who had experienced an actual jhana more than ten times who was attached to the pleasure there. Maybe other people encounter this a lot, but I don't. I don't think it's a problem for Westerners.

I just wonder what that attachment would look like. Is there some basement at Gaia House like an opium den with old yogis in the dark, getting older and not doing their work? What do we actually think it would look like? I think it would look like someone who's unwilling to explore or investigate the difficult. I think this is extremely rare. I've never encountered it. I really sit here struggling to think of anyone. I just can't.

After about ten times of jhana, you're not going to be attached to the pleasure in any problematic way. I just can't see it.

What I do see, and what we might recognize in ourselves much more commonly, is an attachment to looking at, obsessing with, prioritizing, attending to the difficult. I mentioned this before—sometimes that's a psychological tendency, sometimes cultural, sometimes dharmically trained. When I have the option of giving equal attention to the pleasant, I find that I can't. I'm so trained. Immediately there's a contraction in the body. Immediately there's some dukkha. The mind goes there.

That willingness is great, but if it's not balanced with equal freedom and willingness on the other side, there's actually an attachment. Sometimes that attachment is ideological because a person thinks this is where the real stuff is—that what's happening in a jhana is suppressing or hiding the difficult. What's dukkha is what's real. A jhana is a fabrication, a construction, a reality where you're stepping out of touch, hiding from the real stuff.

This can be extremely common and extremely entrenched. So sometimes as a teacher over the years, I have to be really delicate and careful how I bring this up, what I say to people, and how I might say it.

It could be an ideological attachment, or it could just be habitual—a tendency of personality, culture, upbringing, or dharma practice. In a way then, practicing the jhanas wholeheartedly and being open-minded will actually remedy that opposite attachment, which doesn't even occur to people as possibly being an attachment.

When I can keep both open, when I'm really able to do both, I'm really free to do both.

That's where we want to arrive—at range and possibility.

Second, what seems to me another way of getting attached to the jhanas is developing a grandiose self-view: "Look at me, look what I can do. I can reach this or that jhana." There's a kind of inflation of self-importance.

Again, I would say that after twenty experiences of a certain jhana, it should become really obvious to a person that the self isn't making it happen. This jhana simply arises when the conditions are present. When the conditions are there, a jhanic experience, a jhanic perception manifests. It depends on conditions—all kinds of conditions.

I mentioned that monk earlier. The Buddha also says at one point that jhana depends on digestion being neither too hot nor too cold. In Asian medicine, they speak of digestion in these terms. I certainly know that samadhi is greatly dependent on things like digestion and all kinds of other factors—energy levels, countless variables.

After twenty experiences, one really sees—it becomes almost difficult not to recognize—that it's entirely dependent on conditions. It's not something the self can feel grandiose or pumped up about.

What's actually much more common is a negative self-view in relation to not reaching jhana: "I'm not far enough along yet. I can't do it. I'm a failure. I bet everyone else is better. I'm progressing too slowly." Then what can happen is that a person thinks, "I want to attain this deeper jhana. I want to attain the jhanas or reach beyond where I am now." But actually, the intention is one of achievement for decorating the self-view and propping it up, or—this is a better way of putting it—addressing a negative self-view. "If I could just get that, then I'd feel better about myself, earn a badge, whatever."

Sometimes this intention isn't fully conscious. We don't quite realize what's mixed into our intention when it comes to practice. What's actually operating is a kind of avoidance of negative self-perception, an intention to sidestep a negative self-view. This can be quite subtle and operate very quietly.

Even here, the attachment is the opposite of what we tend to think. We imagine attachment looks like grandiosity and inflated self-view, but actually it's happening in reverse and often much more subtly.

Why not let the jhana give you the deepest things it can offer? The deepest gifts are the beauty of that happiness and the way it touches your being, the way it bathes the whole body and the entire citta. These are much deeper, more far-reaching, more lasting, and more impactful gifts than the ability to say, "I have achieved this" to yourself or others, or to feel included when others discuss their attainments.

Let the jhanas give you the deepest gifts they want to offer, that they can give you. This returns us to what's truly significant—what we're emphasizing when we speak about happiness.

Perhaps for me, the most interesting kind of attachment that might arise from jhana practice is attachment to view. For example, someone opening to the sixth jhana and experiencing this infinite consciousness—the Buddha's description is quite brief, but there's an experience of infinite consciousness that pervades the cosmos, or exists as a transcendent realm. It can be felt both ways.

It's possible that someone opening to this experience might think, "Ah, this is ultimately true. This is what they're talking about—cosmic consciousness," and decide that it represents ultimate truth, becoming attached to that as a view. To be attached to a view means truly believing this view, this perception, is true.

Here again, there's something paradoxical. I would say that attachment to such views—seeing this cosmic consciousness, this infinite awareness, this vast awareness as ultimate reality, the eternal backdrop of all things, the source of everything—someone is much more likely to get stuck in that view and believe it's the final truth when they haven't experienced jhanas five, six, seven, and eight.

So it's the opposite. Having the map of something that goes beyond this quasi-sixth jhana state of infinite consciousness—once you reach the seventh or eighth jhana, you see that the previous state was fabricated, merely a stage in the journey.

So it's actually the jhanas that help us wean off attachments to this or that as the ultimate truth. The concern, I would say, is actually the opposite. The jhanas are rather a remedy for certain attachments rather than a concern.

That kind of view of a vast awareness being ultimately real, cosmic consciousness, awareness being the nature of things, that awareness being eternal and unruffled—all that is much more likely to arise from standard insight meditation practice. It's a very common experience, really quite common in other spiritual traditions as well. But if we can go beyond that kind of experience, if we have the map and it places that experience in context, we begin hopefully to experience something beyond it. We can see that it's not ultimate because we've gone beyond it, and we begin to understand its context.

So what is that exactly? How did that experience of this vast, eternal-seeming awareness, cosmic consciousness, whatever it is—how did it arise? How did it dependently arise as a perception? We understand its context.

This understanding of its dependent arising and dependent ceasing is more than saying we see that it's impermanent as a view. A person can go in and out of the vastness of awareness or cosmic consciousness many times and think, "Yeah, my experience of it is impermanent, but it's not impermanent. It's eternal. It's just there and unchanging and radiant forever and serene and untouched forever, and it embraces everything and permeates everything." There are different variations of this. Even if I realize my experience of it is impermanent, I can either accept that my experience of it comes and goes, or I can just work towards making it more and more of the time that I'm hanging out there.

But that's not what I mean by understanding its dependent arising and dependent cessation. What I mean is: how does this perception arise and how does it cease? Not that it arises and ceases, but how? It's dependent on a certain amount of unfabricating, and if I unfabricate more, it goes beyond it. This is different than just saying, "Yeah, it's impermanent" or "My experience of it is impermanent."

So hopefully, if we have the right context for what we're doing in the whole of the Dharma, how what we're doing in jhana practice fits into that, this kind of attachment doesn't arise. Or we can get beyond it, to put it that way.

The more common danger here is attachment to what the Buddha would call wrong view or a misunderstanding—a limited and limiting view of emptiness, of the nature of awareness. If I think that's the ultimate nature of awareness, it's not ultimate. It's a perception. It's a relative perception. It's incredibly useful, incredibly healing and valuable and liberating to a certain extent. Is it ultimate? No. How am I going to find out that it's not ultimate? Through having the map, through going beyond it. Otherwise I might have a limited understanding or wrong view about what nibbana is and all this.

So the shoe is rather on the other foot, I think, in terms of attachment and jhana. They're actually very powerful in terms of weaning us off what can be really difficult kinds of attachment to sense pleasures, and in this case, to certain spiritual views.

This phenomenon I've just described—I said I couldn't really think of anyone who'd gotten attached to jhanic pleasure, anyone that I'd encountered as a teacher or heard about over however many years of teaching and meeting a lot of people. But I think in the first six months of teaching, I lost count of how many people I encountered who seemed to me actually pretty entrenched in some version of that vast awareness being ultimate. It's so common, and it can get very, very entrenched. There are people who remain in that kind of view for decades and never get out of it.

Sometimes the language that goes with it is very free and easy. It's very much like, "Well, awareness is ultimately there. I don't have to do anything. It's just there. Whatever happens, whether I'm aware or not, it's there. And everything's kind of equal within that." So it can sound very easy, and the person seems unattached, and it's all very free. It may even go with the view that there's no need to meditate because this is just there all the time. And actually, all that is hiding a really quite entrenched view that's very, very difficult to budge.

But one of the ways of going beyond this entrenched view is actually through the jhanas and with the jhana map—actually placing these experiences in their proper context. As I said, understanding their dependent arising and dependent fading, understanding the whole process, and then having this framework provides an entirely different relationship with all these beautiful and actually quite valuable mystical openings. We begin to understand their relationship with truth and therefore with liberation.

So I think that's all I wanted to say today.

Should we take a couple of questions, or shall we leave it here? Let's just sit quietly. I think that's enough.

Thank you, everybody. Time for tea.

CHAPTER 211

Q & A

Rob Burbea · 1h28

> In this Q&A session from the 'Practising the Jhānas' retreat, Rob Burbea responds to student questions covering key aspects of jhāna practice. He explores working with the nāda sound (inner ringing) as both a concentration object and insight practice, explaining how to tune into higher frequencies while maintaining awareness of the energy body. Burbea clarifies the important distinction between subtlety, intensity, and refinement in meditation, emphasizing that the strength of pīti doesn't matter as long as it's pleasant - what matters is how we relate to it. He addresses common feelings of guilt around experiencing happiness when others suffer, contextualizing jhāna practice as developing inner resources for sustainable service. The talk includes practical guidance on working with the full range of sukha in second jhāna, the importance of being comfortable with both subtle and intense states, and a valuable technique for recognizing when mental proliferation (papañca) may have hindrances at its root. Burbea emphasizes the need for flexibility with effort levels and warns against rigid inertia in practice, encouraging students to experiment with different intensities of attention while maintaining the larger vision of where the practice is heading.

We have gathered today for some questions, if there are any. I have a couple written questions and perhaps three little things I wanted to address. Are there any oral questions to begin with? I will get to all of these things, including the written questions, but perhaps we could start with an oral one.

Question: Correct me if I'm wrong, but I don't recall you actually describing how one might practice with the ringing in the ears as a concentration practice. Did you, or could you?

I can, though I deliberately didn't. The reason I deliberately avoided this is because the more you pay attention to it, the more prominent it becomes and the more sustained it becomes. It's possible that further down the line you might decide you don't want it to be prominent and sustained. So I feel somewhat tentative about giving that as an instruction.

There are, I think, four ways you could relate to it. One possibility is that this is actually tinnitus, and I don't know if there's a medical solution for that. Another approach, which someone mentioned, is ignoring it—though I would frame this not so much as ignoring it, but as not getting into a fight with it.

So one option is this: whether it's tinnitus or simply the ringing in the ears that comes up as the mind gets still and energized for some people, you might decide this isn't something you're particularly interested in working with meditatively. If that's the case, then the best attitude is not really paying attention to it, and most importantly, not getting into an aversive relationship with it. What you're really watching then is your aversion in relationship to it. It's just some noise happening. It doesn't mean anything about you.

If I get into an aversive relationship with it, I make it unpleasant. I will perceive that sound as unpleasant. Then that unpleasantness triggers more aversion if I'm not careful, and it's perceived as even more unpleasant. The whole thing cycles around because of dependent arising—simply because there was even just a little bit of aversion at the beginning that I wasn't taking care of.

Do you understand that loop? It happens with any object of perception. There it is, and I'm in an aversive relation, even a subtly aversive relationship to it. It cannot help but color and shape and form the object of perception—in this case the internal sound—and it colors and shapes it negatively. It becomes more unpleasant. Then usually, without mindfulness, without care, without skillful relationship in the moment, what's more unpleasant just triggers more aversion, and the whole thing loops around. That can eventually become as maddening as it is for people who really don't like their tinnitus.

Whether it's organic in origin or whether it's this meditative phenomenon, if I decide I'm not really taking it up as an object, then I really need to just watch that aversion. That's one approach if I'm not really interested in it.

If I am interested in it—again, with the caution that this is why I didn't initially present it, because one might change one's mind—I explored it for a while, and it doesn't come up that much anymore. Enough time has gone by that I wasn't particularly interested in it. I didn't get aversive, and the whole thing died down.

But if one did decide to experiment with it, then broadly speaking, there are two ways. One is using it as a kind of concentration object. That would be like a samatha practice—the primary thing you're paying attention to. It's a sound, so when you get distracted, that's what you return to. As with working with the breath, it's about getting really intimate with it. Can I really listen in a very fine way? Do I need to play with the delicacy of my listening, the intensity of my listening? It's the same kind of approach.

What often happens for people who choose this as an object is that as they listen more carefully—or it might be obvious from the beginning—it begins to reveal that it's actually not so much a single tone as a collection of frequencies. There's a lower one, there's a higher one, there's content in the middle, and maybe they're slightly different. You can begin to discern these distinctions. It's almost like listening under a magnifying glass.

Everything is individual, but it's often the case that listening to the higher-pitched frequencies will bring more energy into the being.

Everyone's individual, but find the highest pitch in this kind of chord, if you like. The highest pitch in the chord—that's what you listen to. And that brings more energy and is, if you like, a more refined object.

So we were talking about the refinement with the jhānas and that kind of business. It's similar to that. It's a more refined object, partly because in a way a higher pitch sound, in terms of physics, is a more refined object. What can then happen is you tune into that higher pitch, the higher pitch, the higher pitch, and probably again, the background of the whole thing with the body. You really want to include the body as a bit like... It's a bit like the instructions we gave to Julian. If I paid attention to my upper lip here with the breath, I still want the body in the background.

Eventually what will happen with the sound or with the body is the body just gets integrated into, in this case, into the listening and one is listening with the body. Some people can start that already because they're familiar with kind of listening with the body. But at some point, just by including the body in the background awareness—this sound is a foreground, the higher pitch is foreground, background awareness—it starts to integrate. And the connection between that and pīti in the whole energy body can go.

And what happens is this higher pitch that I've been paying attention to, it may be that after a little while, that starts to kind of split into a chord. It was perceived as one pitch and then it becomes a chord. And again, you can go to the highest one. So that's a method. And for some people, it's really, really helpful for their samādhi.

But again, not to get confused what the primary nimitta is once the jhānic factors arise. So it might be that some people listen to that and they listen to that and that's the object and they're really, really steady and very focused and very concentrated, but they're not getting so much into the pīti or the sukha or the whatever. So again, in this way of teaching that we're exploring on this retreat, once the pīti or sukha or whatever it is comes up and it's very, you know, it's constant enough, it's strong enough to work with, it's definitely pleasant, then that becomes the primary. And then the sound is a bit like the breath in the energy body. Is there a way that it helps it? Probably is because energy body in energetic terms—which remember is completely an illusion, it's a relative truth—but in energetic terms, in that language, energy body, we're talking about vibrations.

When I say pay attention to the energy body, I say frequencies, vibration, tone. This is all musical language. A tone is a note. A frequency, a vibration—that's all music. So it could be that the energy body and the sound are just kind of mutually vibrating like that and that's what allows the whole thing to grow in the samādhi direction if that's what I want.

There's another way of using it which is more—some people use it as a kind of insight practice. So then it becomes less an object of concentration in itself and more a kind of backdrop that relativizes the arising and passing of other phenomena. In other words, this sound feels like it's going on forever and it's just there, even though it's a bit like when I talked about a vastness of awareness. In fact, they're very parallel practices.

So this sound feels like—people who really get into it give it a kind of cosmic significance, like it's the primordial sound of the universe or whatever. The concepts and views wrapped up in there are that it's eternal. It eternally pervades the whole universe forever, maybe even before the beginning, before the end of the universe. It's just there. My ability to hear at any time might come and go. That's actually really important.

Is it an ultimate truth? I would say absolutely not, but it can be a really important stepping stone in terms of insight. So if I just, I have this sense of it as constant, eternal—not in the transcending time sense, but as in lasting forever—and I have that sense of it, then anything else that comes up, any other sounds, the birds, the heating noise, the voice, any other sensations, the pain in the back, whatever it is, taste, smells, touches, thoughts, all of that is given a constant backdrop with which to offset its relative impermanence and the fact that it's just coming and going and this thing just stays.

Do you understand? Does it make sense? So that's very similar to what people get into with the vastness of awareness. And what that does, because you've got something that's constant and you've got a little bit of a—like, I haven't got the view this is an irritating tinnitus sound. I've got the view this is something mystically, mystically lasting forever, and it pervades the whole universe. So it's less a thing that you're doing that to, more a thing you're kind of—it's a backdrop.

And that enables one, if it's working well, to let go in relation to the phenomena—sights, sounds, smells, tastes, touches and thoughts—that arise impermanently, arise and pass, arise and pass, against the backdrop of that forever lasting... Does that make sense? So that would be a way of using it as an insight practice. And some people, either way, can find it really, really powerful.

The reason I didn't pursue that approach was because of what I mentioned earlier—some people end up genuinely irritated by this practice and feel somewhat trapped by it, not realizing that if they want to change direction, they actually need to work with the aversion itself to free themselves from that stuck place.

But yes, for many practitioners, this can be profoundly transformative.

The question I would still pose, however, is this: let's say you're an insight meditator practicing in that second way I described—wonderful, but then how do you transcend that? How do you go beyond it? I'm genuinely curious about anyone who has practiced this way for an extended period and derived significant benefit from it. By extended period, I mean probably months, though I know people who have been practicing this way for decades. Yet I haven't encountered anyone who has moved beyond it—not to say it's impossible, but the "how" becomes a real question.

Through this practice, you might establish your entire view of practice and its goal in a particular way. This comes with conscious and semi-conscious views that shape everything. Through all of this, you might set up your understanding of what practice is and what the goal of practice is in a way that actually prevents you from going beyond it.

So it's simply a question I'm raising. I'm not saying it's impossible—of course it's not impossible—but it would require a complete reworking. In that system, there's nothing integrated into the view that you can rely on to naturally carry you beyond that framework in time. Rather, you would need to re-examine the entire view and probably do something quite different.

Whereas there are other approaches to insight practice that I'd like to explore in this retreat—approaches that have within them a principle where you simply keep applying the same fundamental understanding, not necessarily the same technique, but the same principle. And it naturally goes beyond, beyond, beyond wherever you are. It will consume everything in its path. But that's an entirely different subject.

So there are different possibilities available to us.

Nick, thank you. Yes, an exploration has opened up over the last couple of days around the spectrum from subtlety to intensity of experience—particularly experiences of the energy body and of the nimittas. I feel like I've done most of this work within a soul-making context, and within that framework, I feel quite confident working with subtle energy body experiences, especially when there's image present as well.

But I've realized something here. Because there's this particular map we're working with, and there are these more universal qualities we're trying to access or these realms we're attempting to tap into and experience, I began to feel confused about what constitutes subtle versus intense experience, and whether subtlety might actually have some near enemies.

I had two really powerful pīti experiences in two separate sits, and then one that was much, much less intense—much gentler and softer. I found myself uncertain: was this subtle pīti, or was it somehow blocked or hindered? Then you offered the image of the glowing ember and fanning it gently to coax flames into being. It seems obvious that the ember represents the subtle aspect and the flames the intense aspect. But you can also have a really intense feeling of a glowing ember, or a very subtle experience of flames.

I've been reflecting on this quite a bit. I might be making too much of it, but it seems like an important distinction to feel into more deeply, to develop greater confidence. For instance, does one need to experience a quality like equanimity really intensely before being able to recognize it in its subtle aspects?

Let me respond and see if this addresses what you're asking, Nick.

I think the confusion lies with the word "subtlety" itself, which I've been conscious of when I use it. It's actually—what's the word when something has at least three meanings? Not ambiguous, but... well, it's potentially confusing.

We can speak of the intensity of the pīti—how strong it feels—and that's an element of the "S" in our formula, the sukha. As I mentioned, the intensity doesn't matter. What matters is only that it's definitely pleasant.

Over the course of developing jhana practice, you'll probably experience piti across the entire range of intensity. The crucial point regarding sassa (the first establishment) is that you don't need to worry too much about intensity levels. As long as the piti is relatively pleasant, that's sufficient. If it becomes so intensely pleasant that you're struggling to open to it—almost uncomfortably pleasant—then you may need to work with it differently. But generally speaking, you needn't be concerned about intensity.

Over time—and by this I mean initially with jhana practice—you'll notice variation in the strength and intensity of piti from session to session, regardless of whether you've approached through the ember method via the energy body or through the nostrils. This variation doesn't matter. Over much longer periods, once you've developed second, third, and fourth jhana, you'll realize there's been a gradual, though not uniformly linear, lessening in the intensity of piti over time. This simply refers to its strength.

But we can also discuss subtlety and intensity of attention—and I would question whether these even mean the same thing. What does it mean to turn up the intensity of attention on something? This is quite difficult to communicate if one hasn't experienced it directly. You could have a very subtle object while paying attention to it very intensely, absolutely, and perhaps in different ways.

A third term that gets mixed in here is refinement. As we progress through the jhanas, each becomes more refined than the previous one. Subtlety isn't quite the same as refinement, and subtlety of attention certainly differs from both. We're dealing with at least three distinct concepts that could easily be confused: subtlety, intensity, and refinement. Then we have these qualities both of attention and of the perceived object.

We could be discussing quite a few different things here. Are we talking about the attention? The nimitta? And are we discussing its subtlety, refinement, intensity, or something else? In some circumstances, subtlety and intensity might simply be opposites of each other, though this doesn't quite hit the nail on the head.

Again, we return to the big picture: What am I actually trying to accomplish here? In soul-making practice, we're not necessarily seeking more intensity of anything particular. What we're developing is sensitivity. Part of truly opening to an image and working skillfully with it involves having the art, skill, and capacity to notice—do I have sufficient sensitivity to perceive the different soul resonances and energetic resonances?

You're simply tuning in to what's present, what it needs, and what you can notice. With samadhi practice, it's more about what's needed to deepen the experience, to make it feel better, or to help you feel truly absorbed in it.

This is why, for example, the intensity element in sassa doesn't actually matter. What matters is how you're relating to it. If you have clarity about where you're going—wanting to deepen into a pleasant experience or help it progress to the next level—that guidance only becomes relevant at certain times, once the experience has truly matured and is ready to ripen.

As a general principle, if you can become accustomed to this big picture view—where am I going in this practice?—it helps guide you in moments when you won't have a teacher to consult. Consider where this practice is leading. The larger hierarchical view informs the middle hierarchy, which informs this present moment: what you emphasize in attention, what you attune to, what you amplify through attunement.

For a beginner just learning to work with piti, rather than worrying whether this is subtle piti or whether it's hindered or blocked somehow, ask instead: How do I make this feel better? How do I increase the well-being?

Moving in that direction rather than worrying about whether this is subtle or intense. Subtle and intense doesn't matter. It's simply about whether it's definitely pleasant, and knowing that it will naturally move across a range.

The question of whether something is blocked or hindered is different entirely. It's not a matter of thinking, "Oh, it's not so strong in this session, so am I blocking or hindering it?" No. If it's blocked or hindered, you will feel that as an actual obstruction—it will feel uncomfortable. You'll sense it as stuck somewhere, or as tension or pain in the body.

So I wouldn't worry about that. What you can always ask is: Can I get into this more? Can I enjoy it more? This doesn't equate to "Can I make it stronger?" Rather, getting into it more and enjoying it more might include playing with the intensity of attention, the delicacy of attention, different modes of attention. Am I opening? Am I going into it? Am I wrapping myself in it? All of these explorations.

But again, as a general principle, it's really helpful to think backwards. This is oftentimes what's missing in people's dharma practice—one hasn't thought through what the actual aim is of this or that practice, and then how everything acts to support that aim. We end up being quite unsure in any moment what to do, or unfortunately, because we've heard one teacher say this and another say that, we end up emphasizing something that doesn't fit into our paradigm or creates confusion between different approaches.

Does that make sense?

Good. So I have a couple of written questions here.

"Today I had a very strange meditation experience. I was doing formal sitting practice outdoors on a chair under my favorite tree. I was aiming at exploring the realms close to the first and second jhana. I had played with the nada sound—that's the sound Jason was just talking about—and played with connecting the sound and my left foot.

"I had moved on to metta as a springboard and felt the warmth and happiness and well-being of giving metta. In the scene, there was also the nada and light." So even though she was doing metta, there were still the sound and this light present as secondary nimittas.

Going back to the nada sound—it can arise for people as a kind of secondary nimitta, an indication that their practice is deepening in terms of samadhi.

"I was working and playing with expanding and enjoying that too. Then I sensed as though something was moving under my right foot. I had heavy trekking boots on. This felt very surprising and strange and caught my attention. After a short while—about five or ten seconds, it seemed—that subsided. Instead, I felt something trying to push my left foot up from the ground, as if it were in the way.

"I experienced this as very strange. First I wondered if the wind might be moving a branch on which maybe my foot was resting. The sensation continued, and I opened my eyes and saw my left foot moving almost rhythmically in pace with the sensation. I lifted my foot and boot, but there was nothing—no branch that could have been moved by the wind, no animal, no hole in the ground, only small pieces of branches, leaves, soil and mud.

"I perceived this as very strange. I put my foot back and went back to my intended practice, meditating in the playground of the foothills of the first jhana. To my surprise, the sensation of something trying to lift my left boot reappeared soon. This was scary. Was an animal trying to break into my boot or wanting to get it out of its way? Again, I opened my eyes, lifted my boot and looked carefully..."

I even poked around with a stick. Nothing. I was really puzzled.

Let me say that I don't think this is that common, though I can share that I've experienced something similar. In certain meditative states—maybe less in the deeper jhanas, but certainly around the first jhana territory as you described, in those rooms, those foothills around it—the energy, the piti, opens the body in various ways. One of the ways it opens the body for me is that my heels come off the ground. It's really not a big deal. They just slowly rise up off the ground, similar to the head tilting back that I mentioned earlier.

Maybe it's just you and me experiencing this, but I'm perfectly okay with that. It doesn't bother me at all. I understand it as simply a movement, an expansion of piti actually expanding the physical body, much the same way that the head tilting slightly back is. It disappears as the samadhi gets deeper beyond the first jhana territory, and even in the first jhana, it tends to quiet down.

So that's how I perceive it. I suppose it could move the other way—the feet could go to the side or the toes could lift up or whatever—but it's really just an energetic phenomenon. Nothing weird at all, nothing to worry about. If I look back at my list of things I might have done slightly differently, maybe I should have tried to keep more still, but it's such a non-issue for me.

How does that sound?

Just a couple of other things, and this is for everyone: When you've got a lot of secondary nimittas and things going on, really make sure what the primary one is. These are all secondary, and to the degree that you can mix them in such that they really feel supportive rather than pulling the attention in different directions—that's good. We can do all kinds of things with our sense of body anatomy. You mentioned connecting the nada sound with your left foot. You can do all kinds of things like that.

The direction we're moving is such that at some point in the jhanas—for some people quite early on—the whole body shape kind of dissolves from consciousness. So I guess we want to make sure that we're not perpetuating these phenomena beyond where they're useful. Does that make sense?

These are just things to check, but really nothing to worry about and very normal.

Before I forget, my interviews will move to seven o'clock, so that's an hour earlier, whatever your time zone. Please come an hour earlier.

Let me address another question that came in: "Working with pleasure, joy, love, et cetera, brings up a lot of guilt and a little sadness and even pain. Am I allowed to be happy and live my life joyfully if someone is suffering? Does my happiness cause suffering in someone else? I can sense the piti, the joy underneath something that feels like holding back and guilt. I want the joy and happiness so badly, but I also feel very sad that other people suffer and maybe even suffer because of me, and don't allow themselves to live their life or don't have the conditions to do so—race, social status, et cetera."

I feel I need to suffer with them to show some allegiance and solidarity. Focusing on that guilt and sadness takes me away from the pīti again—a habit that is there for too long now. Not focusing on it seems as if no one would hold that pain, and it feels as if the pain wants to be held.

This is quite important, and it's actually quite common. I've heard this kind of thing relatively often from students over the years.

"Does my happiness cause suffering in someone else?" Well, it might, but it might in two ways. Obviously, if you speak unkindly to someone—though that's not really your happiness causing the suffering. Your happiness in jhāna doesn't cause suffering to someone else.

People might experience this when considering retreat time: "I want to go away on retreat for this long," and family or friends respond, "I'll really miss you, it'll be difficult without you." Hard, tricky. Technically speaking, your retreat decision alone doesn't cause the suffering. Or if you say, "I really want to do this—this project is really important to me. I need to devote myself to this and therefore can't have time for this or that person right now"—does that decision cause their suffering?

If they're suffering over it, is their suffering dependent on your choice alone? Or is it dependent on many conditions: their psychological propensity, their background, the agreements in your relationship, other conditions, the way they're relating to their suffering?

This is quite important, this word "cause." Sometimes it's much more helpful to think about the coming together of conditions that gives rise to suffering, or the coming together of conditions that gives rise to happiness or whatever.

What happens is we get very easily caught when a person says, "You made me suffer." Now in some instances, that's actually a really healthy view. If I rob someone or I'm inappropriately angry at them or I punch them—yes, definitely. We can think very helpfully about a one-to-one causal relationship.

But in many situations, what's actually happening is a person is suffering, and that suffering they're experiencing in this moment has all kinds of conditions—often over many years of cultivated psychological habits, or what's been cultivated in their history, or in the agreements of your relationship, or a lack of clarity about relationships, or the absence of conversation about needs and supporting each other to have different needs.

I don't know exactly what the example is here, but I would caution about thinking that one's own happiness causes suffering. Yes, if I choose X, it may mean there are certain things that if I choose them, I effectively cannot choose Y, or I have to postpone Y. We really, really need to understand this.

Sometimes this becomes an ethical question. Even with something like flying—many people have heard me go on about how we fly too easily these days with the carbon emissions. But maybe someone is making an ethical choice between X and Y, weighing up what's the most ethical, virtuous thing to do. In making this choice, they can't do that other thing.

So either I go—let's say my grandmother is dying and she needs care and I have the time and we have a good relationship. If I go, I have to fly. If I don't fly, I can't go. There are a million examples—every day, little examples, and through our life, lots of big examples.

You cannot avoid, we cannot as human beings avoid those kinds of choices. With the best conscience and sensitivity and listening that we can muster, we have to choose. But we will always be choosing, in some ways, what we could call a moral shortcoming, an ethical shortcoming. Some kind of suffering may come out of that.

This is just part of what it means to be a human being. We have to recognize this, acknowledge it, open to it, and deal with it. Someone somewhere is going to get disappointed at some point with our choices. But the question is: what's navigating me and how am I relating to that?

Let's say I devote my life to serving others, to alleviating suffering in the world. I still have to make particular choices within that.

I cannot possibly address the whole of the suffering in the whole world. Maybe I work in human rights or maybe I work in racial injustice, whatever it is. In doing that, in order to give my energy to that, I'm neglecting something else. And let's say I choose one. I mean, I have to be conscious of this. I cannot possibly help everyone's suffering at the same time.

But even then, let's say I've chosen something, I'm aware of this—okay, I have to choose and that's at the cost of something else, of not doing something else. I still have to... I give all my dedication, it's my job, whatever, but even my job, half of my money I give back into that organization. I just live on the bare minimum. I'm still going to need to sleep and eat and rest.

In a way, what we're doing with jhāna practice particularly is really taking the time on a retreat like this to develop really deep sources of rest and nourishment, so that—and I've mentioned this a few times but not so directly—so that we can move out into the world if we want to and be that much more resourced.

One can stay with this service work in hard conditions, in conditions that are not in themselves very supportive or very nourishing, that might be quite difficult. One can stay steady with the flak and the eight worldly conditions—praise, blame, et cetera—that are there. One can keep doing that and one has those resources accessible to one.

So if you didn't, and you say, "I'm going to try and help, I'm going to go somewhere and help in a refugee camp or whatever," and I decide to do it without sleeping and eating, how sustainable is it going to be? So it's similar to that. If we want to really make our capacity and the possibility of our service very stable, very far-reaching, it's like we can stay steady. We have the capacity. We can keep showing up, we have the energy, we have the flexibility, we have the bigness of heart that can be close to really difficult dukkha, and something in the heart has grown large—and partly it grows large through jhāna practice, partly.

So all that... there's still that kind of question to kind of, again, understand what are we doing, what's the context of what we're doing here.

Again, I don't know how often, but it is really quite common. I have heard this kind of question quite a lot over the years. Oftentimes, it's just asking for a more thorough and careful, loving psychological inquiry into what's going on there for oneself. And because it might be we've been educated in a certain way to believe certain things that... as I said, around the first and second jhāna a lot of this comes up. Is it okay to experience this much pleasure? But also is it okay, just this, is it okay to feel this happy when other people are not?

So this is very, very common. And yeah, there might be all kinds of views that have been implanted in there socially, culturally, from the family, whatever.

Just in terms of the last thing in the note, I think it's quite important. So there's already a recognition in this note. There's already a recognition: focusing on that guilt and sadness, et cetera, takes me away from the pīti again. And the person who's written this has written, "It's a habit that's been there for too long now." So there's already a recognition.

Now there's something else going on here that needs some investigation: "Not focusing on it, not focusing on the sadness and the suffering in the world seems as if no one would hold that pain and it feels as if the pain wants to be held."

So again, if we're talking about world suffering or social injustice, I think we need to be clear that I'm not the only person in the world caring for this issue. Sometimes the mind just gets squeezed into sort of semi-conscious beliefs that obviously don't make sense. There are other people working on this. I can afford to take a rest for a few weeks to do a retreat or I can afford to sit for half an hour in the morning or two hours a day or whatever. It's not really going to mean that that suffering is not attended to or goes unheld in the world.

If it's, for instance, there's one person that I know in my life and it really seems like they're isolated and they have no one but me to have a sense of holding with, I think that needs a larger conversation and a larger look at the situation and their situation and our relationship et cetera and what can be brought in there because that's also... maybe it's obviously not that helpful for them and it may not be that helpful for me.

So... but again I don't know the details here and the person hasn't signed it, but I hope that... at least there's something to this kind of thing. It's very, very common, so I'm glad... I'm glad to know it's really common especially around this territory with the pīti and the sukha, given, I think, some of how we've been educated in our culture.

Okay. I wanted to just throw a few things out there and then we'll see if there are any more. Are there any more questions? Live as well? Yeah. Please. Yeah, please, with the mic.

I started to practice the walking meditation—the walking around practice—and it was really lovely. I was pleased that it opened up and became very beautiful. It moved into a space that was similar to what I've experienced before when practicing metta and also in soul-making practices, where it feels like everything has that quality as I'm walking around the space. I was wondering, first, is that what it's supposed to be like? And second, it feels like when you focus on that nimitta and then enhance it, that kind of experience naturally happens. Can you do that with any object that has an open-hearted, well-being quality? I've done it with metta, though I haven't practiced jhana or soul-making formally, and I've never practiced things like the brahmaviharas.

Let's take the first question first. Walking around with this primary nimitta quality goes very well, and then you notice that basically everything is perceived almost as that nimitta or as if it's a manifestation of it. This is very normal, and I'm very glad that it happened. It's extremely important—extremely important. I'll return to it later, but basically it's the dependent arising of perception and has everything to do with emptiness.

If I experience this—let's say I experience it with something like metta—I might first experience metta as coming from me, something I generate and direct outward to another person or all beings. Then I begin to experience another sense where the universe is metta, or the universe is made of metta, or everything shines that forth, or that's its real substance.

If I experience that three or five times, it will be nice—a pleasant experience. But if I experience it five hundred times, really going back and forth between that perception of the world and our usual perception in Western culture—where of course the world is not love, this glass is not love but made of whatever chemical composition glass has, there's the water, and that's reality, and a being is made up of their molecules and is not love or a form of love or a spark of love—something begins to shift.

If I really start going in and out of these perceptions extensively, the very movement between them starts to relativize or dislodge this entrenched view about what is really real and what is just an occasional nice experience. I begin to wonder: which is real? Some people then conclude that the love perception is the real one. While it's very good to live there and even hold that view, perhaps for a long time, at some point I'm going to want to go even beyond that and realize something about the emptiness of perception, the dependent arising of perception.

As you move deeper into the later jhanas, this becomes an extremely important element of what is significant in jhana practice. Again, we return to this question: what's actually significant, what's less significant? For me, this turns out to be extremely significant, beautiful, and lovely. This theme we'll revisit at least once more.

For your second question about whether you can enhance any quality in this way—well, there may be qualities I could work with, but I wouldn't enjoy it. Qualities with suffering at their core, like hatred—well, actually hatred for something can be enjoyable to a certain degree for some time, but self-hatred probably isn't something I can get into and really enjoy. So the ease at the end won't be possible with such qualities.

But with skillful qualities, what the Buddha would call kusala—wholesome qualities—I would say yes, probably. In soul-making practice, different kinds of spaces open up and one can absorb into them more or less, and there's an infinite amount possible. So my initial response is yes, probably. But on this retreat, we're focusing on the primary nimitta—what's the primary thing we're doing this with.

Let me mention a few small points that refer to things I've said before, but perhaps saying them slightly differently will help them land better. With the second jhana, I'm not sure if I mentioned this when we discussed it, but with the sukha as the primary nimitta of the second jhana, we really want eventually to experience that whole range of sukha—really the whole range. It can become very ecstatically happy, bubbly, laughing on one extreme, and on the other extreme, it can become very, very serene.

It's nowhere near laughter. There's not much bubbles in it, and everything in between. As I said, maybe even with love or without love—that's a bit secondary. But we want to really know that whole range, that whole territory. That's what I meant about getting familiar with a jhana.

When we take the time to marinate and master, it's like really—I used to say to people, it's like knowing the library at Gaia House. I use that example because I spent so many hours in there doing interviews. You can put your head in the room and say "it's a library, it's got books in it" and then close the door. Or you can really know every square inch—it's a big room with lots of complexity. There's this little bit on the carpet here, there's this little angle where the windows meet, there's this bit of a bookcase there that's chipped. You can really, really know a place, a territory, or not.

We want to know the whole range. We want to be comfortable, actually—this is more what I wanted to say. We want to be comfortable with that whole range, enjoy that whole range, all of it. So we need to get to a place where the whole range is really comfortable for us and enjoyable, and we know and feel its value. Every place on that range we want to feel like "I love this, I love this."

It's like asking a musician or a chef or someone who's really into something: "What's your favorite food?" or "What's your favorite piece of music?" Someone who's really into something is not going to give you one answer. They're going to be like, "I can't, I can't." They're going to give you maybe ten options. It's the same thing with the bandwidth of happiness. "I love that, but I also love this. I love the bubbly, but I also love the really serene one. And that bit in the middle is pretty nice too."

So we really want to be comfortable with the whole range, enjoy the whole range, know and feel its value. And let it do its—this is part of letting it do its work on the being, on the heart, on the soul, and also on the body. Marinating with the sense of loving and enjoying and opening. It does work. It does work on the being. It does work on the heart.

What's common for probably any human being is that certain emotions are more frequently gravitated to. Of the whole emotional spectrum that a human being can have, there are certain ones that a certain personality tends to gravitate towards, and tends maybe, relatively speaking, to avoid the others. Some people gravitate towards a subtle kind of—well, whatever it is, could be anything. But oftentimes, for example, one might find themselves avoiding the really bubbly happiness. We're now talking about psychology and energetic makeup. What's my propensity, my habit of psychology?

Part of the power of jhana practice is, again, to open all that up and really have the whole thing available to us. That's part of—if you ask me what does it mean to be a free human being—part of it to me means having the whole range. Having the whole range, the whole playground, the whole delicious range, including the really difficult. I can experience really hard grief and grieve with the world, and I can experience this incredibly bubbly, giggling, laughter-like thing, and there's no either-or. There's an either-or in the same moment, but one is free and one's not scared of any of that or holding back. One's letting all that range work on the heart, work on the soul, work on the being. It ends up being wide, having that range and that freedom.

So that was one thing. The question is, is that also true with pīti? That's a good question. I don't know. I think I would be, as a teacher, less insistent about that with the pīti than with the happiness. Because I'm not sure if experiencing, let's say, the really intense... Let's turn it around.

What I am sure about is experiencing subtle pīti—going a little back to Nick's question—that that's important for everyone. That one needs to actually be able to even notice it and tune to it and be able to enjoy it. Why? I don't want to be always having really super strong pīti and then not be able to notice something that's more subtle, not be able to tune to it and kind of turn my nose up at it because that's that same kind of negative "it's not good enough" thing. So the subtle end of pīti, I would say everyone needs to explore. With the stronger end, I'm just not sure.

I don't know what the answer is. I feel less inclined to insist on that. It may be that intense PT is necessary for everyone, but I think it's more of a personal matter.

Stepping back from that particular question and thinking about human freedom and what it means to be liberated, I do feel that sometimes certain people are habitually holding their energy in or holding it back. They maintain a subtle energetic pattern where they don't allow things to build up, and oftentimes they don't even know they're doing this. It's become so familiar as a psychological and energetic habit.

I'm not just talking about in meditation—I'm talking about their whole life. For these people, to really open and surrender or to have a lot of energy is territory they don't go toward or don't allow to happen. They don't realize they're preventing it through this subtle holding. It's very, very subtle how that can get blocked.

Sometimes for some people—and I mentioned someone who's convinced that what she needs is to focus more—my opinion is actually that what she needs is to learn to let energy build and to open more. Does that mean she needs a super intense PT? I don't know, but psychologically, knowing her over some years, that seems to be what's needed.

But I would feel tentative about saying that about the PT in general, or for everyone. For me, with the intense end of the PT, I think it would be more an individual question as a teacher, and together we would sense it. For these kinds of things, it's also a matter of timing—is it the right moment to even bring this up with a student? At times, there's nothing they're going to be able to do with it anyway, and it's probably only going to bring self-judgment. There are all kinds of factors involved.

And also what they want, because at the end of the day, it's what they want. It's also their vision of awakening. If someone's view and vision of awakening is of people who are very, very even and equanimous, who don't show big eruptions of emotion or experience those—who are more "mature"—if one holds that whole view, whether semi-consciously or through verbal teaching, or just from seeing this repeatedly in the Buddhist world with people who are supposed to be respected, then they assume that's how a seasoned practitioner comports themselves.

If that's their view of awakening and they say, "No, that's what I want. I want to be like that," it's up to them. It's their life, their emotions, their body. It's not up to me to override that, unless they specifically ask—which is very rare for a student to say, "Tell me everything you think" or "What do you want?" I've only had one person say that to me, I think—Robert. It's very, very rare. Which I hope you still don't regret!

As a teacher, you have to respect people's choices and their views. In dharma talks, I do find myself shaking up those whole views—like, is that what awakening is? Are you unconsciously thinking it looks like this? But one-to-one as a teacher, I tend to be very un-pushy and very much oriented toward: What does this person want? What's the right timing? What are they asking for?

A talk is different, especially when it's being recorded. I feel I have a different responsibility when something's going out on the internet. Even though you're asking the question now, I'm answering it to people I don't even know. I'm answering you, but I'm answering people I don't know. Does that make sense?

So I think it's really important to acknowledge: I don't actually know the answer regarding the PT, or I feel unsure. But with the happiness, yes, I think I would be a bit more insistent on that in this way of teaching the jhānas.

Again, if I think of the jhānas as just getting more and more concentrated, more and more able to hold my mind, then none of this matters. It's just a matter of noticing that as you do that, you go through these different stages, but basically what's most important is: Are you thinking or not thinking, and how steadily can you hold your mind on an object?

But to me that's not—again, we're back to the larger framework and the implications that has for what I'm doing.

Returning to the effort question—as we engage in all of this practice, the effort question never goes away. It only becomes more subtle, if anything, but it's never something we should abandon entirely. We need to be willing to overshoot the mark of right effort at times, and to undershoot it. I need to be willing to experience both, to taste them and recognize what each feels like.

When I really overshoot, there might be a headache between my eyes or some other physical tension. When I undershoot, I might fall asleep or lose focus entirely—these are extreme examples, but even with subtle overshooting and undershooting, I really need to develop a sense of recognition: "Oh, that's what that feels like." To cultivate this sensitivity, I have to be willing to experiment—let's try a bit more effort, or let's try a bit less, whatever counters my habitual tendency.

This brings us back to the question of inertia that we discussed in the first couple of days. Do I have inertia with effort levels? The opposite of inertia is fluidity, malleability, ease of movement. Am I willing to slide that effort up and down fluidly and play with it? "Oh yes, too much. Oh yes, not enough"—whatever is needed in this moment.

Inertia creeps into our meditation practice, certainly into our jhana practice, and actually into our lives in countless ways. One ongoing inquiry is: where is there inertia for me? Where might there be inertia? This awareness is part of developing the skill and art of working with effort levels.

We're playing with the intensity of effort—up and down—the intensity of delicacy, all of that. Remember, there's intensity of probing, but also intensity of opening. We don't tend to think of opening, abandoning, or surrendering as something one can do intensely—or perhaps "radically" is a better word. We really want to develop a feel for the whole spectrum on these dimmer switches of intensity and learn to play with them deliberately. They're up to us. We can adjust these fader switches.

The third thing that occurred to me is a question—and again, this may or may not apply now, but it's something you can explore. It's a kind of mental exercise or thought experiment that I think might be really fruitful. It has several parts.

The first part involves entertaining an idea: whatever your mind is snagged on, if your mind is circling around some issue or feels held back by something—whether subtly or quite significantly—or if it feels dragged somewhere by something, in either a gentle or stronger way, what if you entertain the possibility that this issue and its effect on you actually has, as its real root and origin, a hindrance?

It's not about what I think the issue is, but rather—and this is just a game, a conceptual experiment—what if hindrances are actually more originary? What if they're the origins of things that we later don't recognize as hindrances? They're like seedlings that sprout, and then we see a tree without recognizing the original seed.

This relates to what I mentioned about hindrances becoming papañca if we're not careful. Papañca is the complete opposite of samādhi—do we all agree on that?

Yeah, it's completely the opposite of samadhi. This kind of circling around an issue or whatever—sometimes it can be a very noble issue. I'm not insisting that every time we're thinking about something or every time we're upset, we're just playing a game here, like a thought game.

No matter how noble the issue, how important it seems, how important to my soul—just play with that view. Maybe the true origin of this thing is a hindrance. What has happened is that hindrance has not been recognized as a hindrance and it's been allowed to grow up and become a poisonous papañca tree. Because without a lot of care and practice, that's what happens with hindrances. That's what they do.

This is part of why I said we get to a place where we don't believe the hindrance. It can seem so convincing, so convincing. Even being really upset about this or that political issue—sometimes what's happening there is aversion. A part of us obviously really cares about this, and sometimes it's just our aversion hooking into this particular issue. It can all sound very justified, but there's actually a mixture. At times it's more one or the other.

We want to encourage the quietening of papañca because papañca is the opposite, and papañca prevents samādhi. Where there's papañca, there's no samādhi. Where there's samādhi, there's no papañca. They cannot coexist.

What we're doing here, if we play this little game, is tracing back the papañca through the aid of entertaining a certain conceptual possibility—that it might have a hindrance as its root—and tracing it back to that hindrance. Then we can work on it as a hindrance. It may not feel relevant at all now, but it might actually turn out to be really helpful as an exercise.

One of the teachers I studied jhāna practice with made this their main teaching on jhāna practice. This is really the point of jhāna and samādhi. Obviously I've talked about it, but I want to emphasize it more now. I don't agree, or it doesn't appeal to me that this would be the main thing, but it's hugely powerful. There are teachers out there—and you may well encounter them—for whom this is the main thing we're doing. Watching out for papañca. Relating that to hindrances, dealing with the hindrances, allows the samādhi. That's actually the most important thing. I won't elaborate—this is that person's teaching—but I actually feel it was valuable. It's a very valuable teaching.

So just a game, just very light—play with it. You're not signing up to "I believe this idea forever about all emotions and I can never change my mind." You're just entertaining a certain concept and seeing what happens for five minutes or whatever it is.

Kirsten asked: "I started to do this a little bit, and sometimes I'm not clear what the hindrance is exactly. It might be a mixture, and then I might get lost a little bit in this. So then I might go to restlessness. I just want to know how accurate or how important the accuracy of defining the hindrance is."

That's really important. I had jotted down before coming in that it's probably more than one hindrance, because what we often get is multiple hindrance attacks. Yeah, it can be—in fact, maybe usually hindrances come in gangs. So it's probably more than one, and that's fine. Maybe you can split them, or maybe even just thinking of that—just see what helps.

Sometimes just the notion that it's a hindrance—that's what I mean. Sometimes the precision of the identification is not important. It's just, as I said, playing with a certain framework and actually reframing: "Oh, maybe this is a hindrance," and I don't even know what the hindrance is. It doesn't matter.

Just that simple recognition can be enough. Sometimes you might think, "No, I need greater clarity about which specific hindrance this is," but the true power lies more in the general conception rather than precise identification—though identification certainly has its place. You'll have to discover what works best in each particular instance. But I don't believe it's necessary to identify the exact hindrance every time.

Often multiple hindrances operate simultaneously—two or more ganging up together. This is perfectly normal and part of the territory.

Yogi Question: I've been experimenting with this approach throughout the retreat, and it's been tremendously helpful until yesterday when I fell down what I can only call a "hindrance cliff." When I found myself deep in it, I became so angry at even asking the question about hindrances. Eventually I recognized it was likely a self-doubt hindrance cliff I had tumbled down. But I needed considerable time before I could engage with this framework again without working myself up even further. So I'm curious about timing—when do you know to stop playing this "game" and try something else? Perhaps the answer is simply that you know when it's making things worse.

Response: Thank you—this is a really important question. Several elements deserve attention here.

Everything I've shared about working with emotions on this retreat exists within a much larger context of opening, skillful engagement, and soulmaking with emotions. This broader perspective feels essential to remember. Sometimes for you or anyone, simply knowing this larger context can remind something deep within your being—and that recognition alone might be sufficient.

If our soul feels compressed into a box, it will naturally rebel, and it should. It absolutely should. Does this make sense? Sometimes it might be enough simply to remind myself—and for you to remind yourself—of the bigger vision you hold regarding human emotional life.

We're not exploring this extensively on this retreat, and I've explained why. I've led other retreats where the primary focus was working with emotions in specific ways, but always within the context of vast emotions. So if I tell my soul that this vastness exists and we're simply playing a particular game right now, that reminder alone might help.

Even so, there may be times when this approach isn't appropriate. The essential question remains: What helps? How long does it take to recognize when something truly isn't helpful? I don't know precisely, but you develop a sense—especially with emotions. This is actually a very common discernment we must make in any dharma practice.

You choose a particular way of working with an emotion, then after some time you must ask yourself: Is this genuinely helping or not? If it's not helpful—and while I can't say exactly how long "some time" is, certainly several minutes—then you need to step away and try something different.

Sometimes it's simply a matter of cooling off. During that cooling period, the hindrance might naturally abate, or you might somehow—even subconsciously—remember the bigger picture around emotions.

What I most want to convey is this: Do we have the freedom to view emotions this way sometimes? Do I possess a range of perspectives and approaches without fear? Some people become terrified of certain emotions, while others become equally afraid of letting emotions settle into quietude. Do I have freedom from fear on both sides? Do I have skill and flexibility in both directions? This is what we're ultimately cultivating.

Wisdom also includes recognizing that sometimes an emotion can genuinely function as a hindrance—and viewing it that way becomes the most helpful approach. Sometimes we become so immersed in our immediate experience that it simply doesn't occur to us to consider that what we're experiencing could be a hindrance. We're so accustomed to relating to emotions in other ways.

This is more about maintaining a broad perspective. There might be periods of practice where you lean heavily into one particular relationship with emotions, and other periods where you engage quite differently. When I reflect on long retreat experiences, this applies not only to difficult emotions but to beautiful emotions as well.

I remember two instances at Gaia House. One was a short-lived thing and the other was a more general realization.

The more short-lived thing was... I can't even put it in a context. It was probably that I was doing samadhi practice for a stretch, and I just either remembered by heart a Mary Oliver poem about an owl. I can't remember the context, but somehow I went for a walk while reciting that to myself and was really deeply touched by the beauty of it, and had kind of realized: my soul needs that.

My soul needs that—in that moment, that particular poem, but also just... it's weird, not just piti and sukha. It's strange. We have this banquet here that we're talking about, but actually, I think the soul is richer than that.

So that's one thing. It was also, I remember, near the beginning of retreat, so there was still a question for me, like: okay, was that restlessness just settling into this retreat? I don't know, maybe it was, maybe it wasn't. But I can also see that more generally, it's like... if you asked me, "Would you only ever want to experience piti, sukha, peacefulness, stillness, and all the eight jhanas, and that was your whole emotional range?" I would say no, I wouldn't like that. I would like the whole range, please, thank you very much—including, like I said, including the grief, including even anger and all that. To me, this is more soul-making, but to me...

So that was more a moment. I was still left—I mean, it all settled down—but I was still left afterwards wondering: hmm, I wonder if that was just not quite settled yet on the retreat. It was like day four of a long retreat or something. I can't remember, but anyway, that was a question.

The other thing, and I haven't mentioned this yet, is that for me... I can't remember exactly, but I was exploring—you know, again, for a long time—really, really marinating and making my intention very clear on, I can't remember how many jhanas, but let's say the first four. That was my territory that I was really working with, and I was on a long retreat.

And at a certain point, as wonderful as they are, I'm actually missing something more mystical. So that there are lovely experiences, and as we'll talk tomorrow about the third jhana hopefully, there is definitely the beginnings of a mystical sense, a sense of sacredness. But you can also very much practice those jhanas and not really have much sense at all of a mystical sense. And they're not, I would say, again, primary. So even if you're—like for me, my tendency is very much, my yearning is very much towards the mystical—but they're not really that primary in them.

And I know lots of people that practice those first four jhanas without any mystical sense. And again, that goes in... it's related to the whole big conceptual framework. What are we doing here? What's important, et cetera.

But I realized for me, I feel something missing here. Again, it was in the context of a long solo retreat and I knew that I had to keep my intention steady. We're back to that question about keeping intention. So I don't know, I think recognizing it was very helpful. I didn't then change what practices I was doing—I can't remember what I did, but whatever I did worked—but it wasn't a kind of radical shift or change of direction. It was maybe just including something at the sides a bit more or something like that.

Again, that's probably a much longer answer than you wanted, but does that make sense what I just said?

Maybe it was recognizing that, you know, I only missed the mystical because I knew the mystical. And, you know, maybe were it something that I'd never experienced outside, I would maybe have a sense... Let's say I was a soul that wanted the mystical, but I hadn't experienced the mystical, and there were four jhanas. Well, these are great. Maybe I would have had a vague sense of: I'm missing something. Wonderful as this is, absolutely wonderful as this is, I'm still missing something. Maybe I would have had that sense, but not quite known what it was I was missing. I don't know, but back then I'd had quite a lot of different, all kinds of things.

And I think a part of me, yeah, in the context... but recognizing: Yeah, I can go back to that. I'm not signing up to this sort of forever. I will stay in the four jhanas as long as I can and do nothing else. That was never in my... I never signed up to that. So maybe that, yeah, that larger context and a larger sense of possibility was helpful.

And I think a part of me recognized that, yes, I could go back to that state. I'm not signing up to remain in the four jhanas forever, doing nothing else. That was never part of what I committed to. So perhaps that larger context and broader sense of possibility helped sustain the practice.

Let us close now with a few moments of quiet together.

Thank you, everyone. Time for tea, and then I believe Zohar and Lauren will need to transition. I'll be beginning interviews at seven o'clock.

Thank you for your presence and attention throughout this exploration of the jhanas. May your practice continue to unfold with wisdom and compassion.

CHAPTER 212

The Third Jhāna

Rob Burbea · 1h22

> In this dharma talk from the 'Practising the Jhānas' series, Rob Burbea offers detailed instruction on the third jhāna, emphasizing its primary characteristic of sublime peacefulness (sukha) without rapture (pīti). Drawing from the Buddha's beautiful simile of lotuses immersed in cool water, he describes how the practitioner 'permeates and pervades, suffuses and fills this very body' with refined happiness.
>
> Burbea outlines three experiential levels within the third jhāna: contentment/satisfaction, personal peacefulness, and entering a vast realm of peace. He provides practical methods for accessing this state, either by drinking deeply from second jhāna happiness until satisfaction arises, or by following the spectrum of increasingly subtle sukha as pīti gradually fades away. The talk emphasizes the critical importance of maintaining extremely refined attention while working with such subtle states.
> A significant portion addresses the profound shift in perception that occurs both during and after third jhāna practice - the experience of 'one taste' where all phenomena appear pervaded by the same deep peacefulness. This points toward understanding dependent arising (paṭiccasamuppāda) and the empty nature of all perceptions. Burbea explains how this peacefulness emerges through the natural attenuation of the mind's habitual pushing and pulling in relationship to experience, offering both dualistic (jhāna as escape from the world) and non-dualistic (one taste pervading all) perspectives as valid approaches to practice.

Today I want to talk about the third jhāna. Remember what we were saying: the pacing of the teachings will almost certainly not be the pacing of your practice, and if it is, we actually don't want that. Your optimal pacing of practice for this retreat may intersect the trajectory of the pacing of the teachings at one point, but it shouldn't more than that. You're going at your optimum pace for marination, for mastery.

So, the third jhāna. What does the Buddha say about the third jhāna? If you get hold of the text of the Pali Canon, it's about a shelf load full of volumes. I don't know if anyone's counted how many times he talks about jhāna in there, but it's really, really a lot—so much so that they barely print it again. They just say "as before, as before, as before." This gives you a sense of how much priority he put on the jhānas in his way of teaching.

That doesn't mean everyone needs to learn the jhānas. Some people think that. One of my teachers said, "If there's no jhāna, there's no liberation." I'm not sure I agree—we tend not to agree—but it does seem, looking at the Buddha, that he put considerable emphasis on this practice. There are, I think, two suttas where he really talks about mindfulness. I don't know how many suttas are in the whole Pali Canon—does anyone know roughly? A thousand? So two of those thousand are about mindfulness, one of which you'll be very familiar with: the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. And then there are a lot of suttas on jhāna practice. We've kind of inherited a sense of a norm that probably doesn't actually historically reflect the kinds of practice that certainly the monastics were doing.

Here he is speaking about the jhānas again, addressing a group of monks. He's just gone through the first and second jhāna, and then he says: "And furthermore, with the fading of pīti, with the fading of rapture, he—the monk practicing—remains in equanimity, mindful and alert, and physically sensitive to sukha. With the fading of rapture, he remains in equanimity, mindfulness, and physically sensitive to sukha. He enters and remains in the third jhāna. And of him, the noble ones, the enlightened ones, declare: 'Equanimous and mindful, he has a pleasurable abiding.'"

The monk permeates and pervades, suffuses and fills this very body with the sukha divested of pīti—with the sukha, with the pīti removed, filtered out, gone from it. He permeates and pervades, suffuses and fills this very body with happiness divested of pīti, so that there is nothing of his entire body unpervaded with sukha divested of pīti.

And then comes a really gorgeous, appealing simile: "Just as in a pond of blue, white and red lotuses, there may be some of the blue, white or red lotuses which, born and growing in the water, stay immersed in the water and flourish without standing up out of the water, so that they are permeated and pervaded, suffused and filled with cool water from their roots to their tips, and nothing of those blue, white or red lotuses would be unpervaded with cool water. Even so, the monk permeates this very body with the sukha divested of rapture. There is nothing of his entire body unpervaded with sukha divested of rapture."

When we come to talk about jhāna factors, I couldn't find the sutta—it's possible that there are times when the Buddha actually says the first jhāna has five factors, the second jhāna has three factors, the third jhāna has two factors, and so on. But I couldn't find it. Anyway, most people agree that the third jhāna has only two jhāna factors: sukha and ekaggatā.

But this text I've just read from the Buddha says all this other business. It says, "With the fading of pīti, he remains in equanimity, mindful and alert." "Mindful" is sati, "equanimity" is upekkhā—in Pali you probably know those words. "Alert"—the actual word is sampajañña, which some people translate as "clearly comprehending." It goes a lot with the mindfulness language and is very prevalent in the mindfulness sutta.

So you've got these other elements or aspects that clearly the Buddha is pointing to, but they don't qualify as jhāna factors. I think there's something that—once you practice third jhāna, we'll see something similar in the fourth jhāna—there's something a little bit misleading about the Buddha's description. It's not at all the case that there isn't mindfulness and alertness and equanimity in the third jhāna—there absolutely is. But the primary nimitta is sukha without pīti, or actually sukha—pure sukha, if you like.

Now, pure sukha—sukha without piti—is actually quite a rare thing for a human being. Mostly, even in non-jhanic states, we experience happiness with a bit of that upwelling quality. Certainly when we're laughing or giggling, it has that kind of bubbling up to it, those proto-jhanic factors of piti and sukha within it. It's quite rare to have happiness without piti.

I use a word that I think is more accurate, speaking from an experiential point of view: the primary nimitta of the third jhana is peacefulness. And that peacefulness is almost unbelievably lovely. It is warm, tender, and very, very refined.

If you're ever in doubt—have I reached the next jhana?—one way of knowing is to ask: is it more refined than the jhana I've come from? You may have moved from something where the dominant element in the citta is happiness to a state where the dominant element is something like peacefulness. But if that peacefulness is not a total quantum leap in refinement, then it's unlikely you've moved from the second to the third jhana.

This is one thing to look for, and remember what I said: what's actually happening throughout the whole spectrum of the jhanas is this increasing refinement as we develop through them. That's one of the key elements.

There's something very lovely here. There's a warmth, a real tenderness. It has heart qualities in it, but in a very soft, undramatic way. Well, it might be dramatic when you first enter it—it really is breathtaking—but the way those qualities pervade the space is not dramatic in terms of the heart qualities.

There's an increase in refinement. It's a very refined state, and I would say it's very beautiful. There's something again almost breathtakingly beautiful about it. It feels very healing. There's something about that space—bathing oneself and dissolving one's body and heart and mind in that space—that just feels naturally, organically healing. Again, in a very undramatic, quiet, but very powerful way in terms of healing the heart.

There's love in it. There's metta in it organically. You don't have to make that happen. All these qualities are just part of the radiant glow of that space, of that jhanic territory.

So yes, there's mindfulness. Yes, there's alertness. And yes, there's equanimity. But we would expect mindfulness and alertness in any jhana. Here, they may be upgraded quite a bit beyond what most people experience, unless you've really gotten into momentum on a mindfulness retreat where there's a lot of mindfulness and alertness.

And yes, there's equanimity. But let's come back to that one because most people who haven't experienced the third and fourth jhana—what one will understand by the word equanimity, based either on daily life or on insight meditation practice—we're really talking about a different level here, a different flavor. That's why I said it can be a little misleading if we focus on the other words right now. There is equanimity, and I'll come back to that.

In my experience and the way I teach this, the third jhana has three levels. I did read a text somewhere, I think in the Visuddhimagga, saying different jhanas break into three levels or two levels, but I don't recall it actually describing what those levels are. Whether this division I'm making based on experience and teaching experience corresponds to the Visuddhimagga, I don't personally mind either way. I just find this very helpful, and so do many others.

The first level—following the Buddha's lovely simile of a gorgeous cool pond in a hot climate, near the top, as there's a descent through the jhanas and one feels them that way—is characterized by what I would call contentment or satisfaction, or perhaps fulfillment, though that's a more complicated word. Something like contentment and satisfaction. But the level of contentment, the fullness, the degree of contentment and satisfaction at the beginning of the third jhana is unlikely to be something we've experienced in daily life. It's really of a different order.

The second level, the middle level, is where the peacefulness comes to dominate. But it feels like my peacefulness. I'm peaceful, this space here is peaceful. It's not that I'm thinking "mine, mine" and hanging onto it in any way. I say this only in contrast to the deeper level, the third level, which feels more like a realm.

of peacefulness. One's in a realm, one's in a vast space—or one has a sense, that's a better way to put it—one has a sense of a space of peacefulness, a vast space pervaded by peacefulness, a world of peacefulness.

So at this point it really is—and I'll come back to this—it really is like I've entered a different world here. As opposed to first jhāna, second jhāna, where something extraordinary is happening in my body, in my citta, in my consciousness, in my energy body, here at times it can feel like I've really entered a different world.

So those are the three levels that I would demarcate and encourage people to find, but the order in which they will be revealed to you may not be one, two, three. In other words, you may find yourself first in the middle one or the third one. No rush. In time, they will all become apparent, and we want them to all become familiar. Just as we have mastery with regard to a jhāna—I can go there directly—you can also navigate within a jhāna. So if you wanted to, you can go from the fourth jhāna to the most superficial level of the third jhāna, that contentment. You can just jump to wherever.

No rush with that. It's part of the mastery. It's part of really knowing them. It will emerge just from everything that we've been doing—sitting with it, walking with it, being in it, but keeping the sensitivity, the antennae tuned, alive, alert, subtly discriminating, noticing and enjoying. And these things will get revealed.

So how does one access, how does one enter the third jhāna? One way is to just be in the second jhāna with the happiness, but really drink it. Really drink and drink and drink that happiness. Drink and drink and enjoy that drinking. We have a thirst we don't even recognize. And in a way we need to slake that thirst, just drink and drink and enjoy.

And at a certain point, one may realize, oh, the most prominent emotion has changed. It's actually gone from happiness to this satisfaction, to this contentment. Why? Because I've drunk enough. I've actually satisfied that thirst. And sometimes at first one may not realize that shift if it goes to that deeper level. But one way of moving here from the second to the third jhāna is really drink that happiness and really, really enjoy it and really open to all the things we've been saying. We need to really tune to it, really stay with it and take it in and bathe in it and enjoy it and drink it.

A second possibility, though, is that—as we've mentioned a couple of times, it's come up in questions—the happiness of the second jhāna has a range to it. At the shallow end, it's actually more rapturous. Technically speaking, it's got more pīti in it. And at the deep end of the second jhāna, it's got less pīti in it. The pīti is drained out. That's why the happiness there is more serene. That corresponds with the Buddha's description.

But in a way, there's a way of understanding the second jhāna as a kind of transition jhāna. Pīti and sukha in the first jhāna with a lot of pīti dominating. Less and less pīti all the way through the second jhāna until the pīti is drained out and you're just left with this purified sukha. That's one way of understanding it. There's a kind of spectrum of less and less pīti, and correspondingly there's a spectrum of more and more subtilized happiness.

So you can either drink your fill with the happiness or go with this, ride the spectrum down into more and more subtlety.

Eventually, like all the other jhānas, if we're talking about mastery, you can just summon it. You don't need to go from the second jhāna. You don't need to do anything. You just remember the third jhāna and call it back by a subtle intention.

If one is going through letting the happiness get more and more subtle, it's absolutely, totally crucial that the attention needs to get increasingly subtle with it, and that you need to get really into it. Again, if it's like subtle pīti, subtle happiness, it doesn't need to be strong for me to totally relish it and totally enjoy it and totally get into it.

So if the attention is not fully maximally subtle, and if I'm not fully maximally enjoying it, what I will end up with is a state of peacefulness—or perhaps I will end up either getting lost or falling asleep, or with a kind of state of peacefulness that is actually slightly dull, slightly insensitive. And the peacefulness will not be so alluring and so magical in that way.

But even these words "dull" and "insensitive"—again, to most people, they mean something quite gross. At this level, we're talking about dullness. We're also talking about really subtle dullness, really subtle insensitivity. So compared to our normal state of consciousness, they're not gross, obvious defects.

But if I'm taking that second method of going down in terms of the subtlety of the happiness, I absolutely have to really be on my toes with the attention, really subtilizing the attention, really getting into it, really making sure I'm opening, enjoying, penetrating. So there's a slide, but where that slide takes us depends very much on what the mind is doing and what the relationship with it is.

What this all implies to me is that the safest bet is actually the first way: just drink that happiness. Drink it and drink it and drink it, open it, slake your thirst. This avoids that kind of satellite, non-jhanic state of equanimity or peacefulness.

As we've mentioned several times, it can be likely that one goes there because of the habitual tracks and momentum of previous insight meditation practice. If you practice mindfulness, once that gets going you're basically practicing a kind of let go, let go, let go, and as I'll come back to at the end today, that will take you into some state of equanimity. It's a very okay state—relatively speaking, it's a skillful state—but it's unlikely that it's the third jhana. If it's just, "Oh, I recognize this place from before, this kind of quiet place I've gotten to sometimes on retreats," it seems to match. There's peacefulness, there's mindfulness, there's equanimity, there's alertness, but it's unlikely to be the third jhana. It might be, but it's unlikely.

Again, what this partly implies to me is maybe safest to go with the first approach: drink, drink, drink the happiness. See if you can keep it at a certain bandwidth where it's really obvious happiness and not something quite subtle.

It may be possible that that kind of non-jhanic equanimity, peacefulness state can get kind of nudged, maneuvered into a jhanic state like the third jhana. If you hang out there—this state you remember from insight retreats—and if you hang out there, but the attention has to be really, really alive, really subtle, and really maximizing the enjoyment. Really trying to find what's most pleasurable. It may be possible for some people that this more familiar insight state of equanimity, with very careful work and play, becomes the third jhana.

But you'll much more likely have more likable and much clearer experiences of the third jhana if you go through the second jhana in one of the ways I was talking about, more likely that drinking approach. You'll more likely end up in what's definitely jhana territory rather than a sort of relatively skillful but only relatively skillful peace or equanimity.

In relation to differentiating this third jhana from those kind of relatively peaceful states that we might know of equanimity or peace, what we might call satellite states: the third jhana is breathtakingly touching. There's something that touches the being, impresses on the body, the heart, the soul, very profoundly. It's really very touching. There's a beauty there. It's very beautiful, really an extraordinary state, and it really does impress on the whole being.

So yes, this differentiation between states—and remember I said I contradict myself many times, and sometimes we don't need to worry so much about am I in it, am I out, where exactly is the boundary. Instead, just work and play with this care, which gets very fine now. The work and play is still sassy, still sassy at this level. Rather than am I in, am I out, just keep playing with the sassy and let your work and play be also quite subtle and intense, but in this very subtle, very gentle way. I have to learn how to work intensely without being too crude and too heavy-handed and too pressured.

I can't remember if it was in the Pali Canon—something the Buddha said—but it might be in the Visuddhimagga. There's a simile of a desert traveler, someone who's been walking for days and days across a desert, going from somewhere to somewhere. They're parched with thirst and weary and dirty, sand everywhere, staggering along. Then in the distance they see—or even someone tells them—they see an oasis. That relief and glee and excitement that they feel corresponds to the first jhana. It's not a mirage; it's an actual oasis.

The second jhana in this simile: they reach the oasis and flop down by the side of it on their hands and knees and just drink and drink and drink that cool water. Their thirst, which has built up over wandering the desert—samsara, basically—their thirst begins to be slaked. They need to drink a lot; they're pretty dehydrated. They need to drink and drink and drink.

The third jhana: at a certain point, they just decide, "I'm just going to get in." They just immerse themselves into this beautiful, cool, spring-fed pond with lotuses. They just dunk themselves and wash their body and submerge themselves and drink some more.

Like I said, the ordinary usage in English of words like happiness and peacefulness and equanimity doesn't really capture the kind of degree and depth and beauty and impact, the whole other level that we're talking about here with jhanic factors and jhanic words. And certainly when you get to the third jhana, that's the case.

A little bit about working in the third jhana. As I mentioned, the third level feels like a kind of sense of a realm, of a much wider, perhaps a vaster space even. But this is quite important: the focus within that sense of "I'm in a whole other world here"—the focus, the primary focus—needs to still be the whole body space, the energy body space. You can still be aware you're really in this other realm, but the jhana will only stabilize and deepen and you'll only get its maximal fruits if the primary focus is on the whole body space, just actually a bit bigger. So it might be as much as two feet in front of you, that sort of space around the energy body.

You work with the same—you might work with these two modes of attention, the narrow focus penetrating or the wide open receiving, abandoning, surrendering, or you might find others: wrapping around or dissolving into, all kinds. But basically the focus is the energy body and moving gently in a very unhurried way, playing with these different modes of attention. That's what's going to consolidate it, allow it to get deeper.

So in the third level, the sense of that realm, that sort of vast realm is still there, but it's not the primary focus. Yet we can still be touched by it, allow ourselves to have a sense of the appreciation of that lovely space, that larger lovely space. Appreciate it, be touched by it—that kind of otherworldly sense.

The sense of really visiting another realm, of being admitted into another kind of more blessed realm in a way. When I say the primary focus is with the whole body and the energy body, it doesn't mean that I'm still not aware of this realm and I can't still feel the beauty of that and the loveliness of that. One can kind of invite or imagine bringing in that sense of peacefulness from the bigger space, or just allow it in, opening the energy body space to it. In some way or another, all that lovely, lovely peacefulness from that space—you bring it into the energy body if you need to.

Sometimes what happens—and this should only be the kind of thing that happens and that you're playing with after you've had quite a lot of experience with the third jhana—is that it hasn't quite settled yet. It's not quite consolidated. I'm not quite into it yet, though I've had many experiences before of it. All I can find then is like a filament, the barest, subtlest sort of magical thread, very, very faint, very subtle, that has the taste of that peacefulness.

All I can find is one, and maybe it's in one place in my body. When I say body, it might be the anatomical body—in my belly, or whatever—or it might be the energy body, remembering that when I say whole body, it means the space, right? I'm not necessarily correlating it with any part of my anatomy. It's just somewhere in this space, but it feels like it's connected with my body. Usually things feel like they start getting lower down. The center of the attention starts getting lower down. Maybe even the place where initially, in this case, the peacefulness is stronger is lower down the body. That's common, but there are always exceptions. Eventually, obviously, we want the whole space to be filled with that peacefulness.

But sometimes what happens, with a lot of experience, and this session it's not quite going so well, but it's fine—I can tell I just need to play a little bit. All I can find is this one really, really subtle thread. I start to follow that. I'm tuning to it and I'm just enjoying that thread and attuning the attention to it and finding the beauty in it. Just that relationship with that thread, so to speak, that filament of it starts to allow the whole thing to spread, starts to allow the peacefulness, the fabric of that filament, of that thread to spread throughout the whole space. Often by itself. You can still do the spreading stuff, of course, but often you'll find it just spreads by itself at this point.

Something similar can happen with the second jhana. If you've had a lot of experience with the second jhana, a really clear experience with it, going in and out many times, then sometimes again it's sort of, "Oh, today's not quite kind of got into it," or "It's there, but it's really not strong." It's kind of in boundary territory, in borderline territory. Again, sometimes it might be a trickle—I'm drinking from a trickle, just a little trickle from a fountain, but I'm drinking it and I'm really enjoying it. If I don't get into that "oh, it was better yesterday" or whatever, and I'm just really drinking, then that trickle—I follow that trickle, I tune to its qualities, I enjoy it, all the same things—and it can build from there.

In a way it's true for the first jhana because of how we've been talking about the two possibilities of pīti arising, that one of them is like the ember and glowing.

Sometimes what happens with, again, with quite a bit of experience with the third jhana already—remember, when you encounter a new territory, a new jhanic territory, a new level of consciousness, whatever you want to call it, a new state of consciousness, the first few experiences are often like a dam bursting. Everything is perfect and wow, and there's no effort involved, or very little effort. After a while, then it's like, "Oh, then certain subtle work, subtle play is obviously needed." It's not that one's gone backwards. This is just the natural maturation of things.

If one is not noticing subtle work and play, I would say I'm not sure that one is practicing what the Buddha would call right concentration, because there isn't that degree of sensitive, subtle discernment to actually notice, "Oh, I see, that's different," or this thing or that thing.

One of the things that one can notice after a while that can happen sometimes is that it's almost like there's a mental aspect of this lovely peacefulness, this gorgeous peacefulness, and there's, so to speak, a physical aspect of this gorgeous peacefulness—in other words, felt in the energy body—and they can become separated sometimes. The mental and the physical peacefulness can become separated. We want them integrated. We want the whole thing. Clearly jhanic experiences have integrated all these elements, so we want them integrated.

It could be that you've practiced really a fair amount with the third jhana, in and out, and you've really got used to it, and then you start to notice this sometimes. Occasionally you start to notice this. It could be that either of those comes first. I'm experiencing a mental peacefulness that I recognize from the third jhana but not the bodily, or the other way around. It could be either, but they're not integrated. One is present, one is not absent.

The breath can really help integrate them, or I suppose the metta at that point. But the breath, particularly if you've been doing breath practice, is something that the mind can follow—not just follow with attention, but the way the breath is tells us how the mind is. The way someone's breath is, you know this at a very gross level—the mind and breath are quite related. So bringing the breath back in, if you've been working with the breath, can be quite helpful at integrating the mental and the physical.

This is why this relationship between breath and mind is so significant. Mostly we're taught not to manipulate the breath in meditation, right? You just watch it. But how my breath is at any moment does reflect how my mind is at any moment. And so, in a way, the mind is shaping the breath. But it also—like so many things, if the causality seems to work one way, it often works the other way too. If I shape the breath, I can affect my mind.

That's why when we started with those really long breaths and with the energy body breathing—really long breaths—because we often need more energy. And that's why the Anapanasati Sutta starts with breathing in long, then breathing in short. To me it's deliberate because the manipulation of the breath manipulates the mind, which if you're trying to settle the mind is what you're trying to do anyway. So you actually settle the mind, shape the mind through playing gently, subtly, responsively with the breath.

The breath integrates or is a bridge that straddles body and mind. And so at this point, if the mental peacefulness is there but the bodily peacefulness is not, or vice versa, bringing the breath back in can help. It's one of the things that can help integrate them.

But really with these rupa jhanas, with these first four jhanas—body, body, body, body, body—it's maybe more likely for people to feel like they're experiencing a mental peacefulness but there really isn't the sense of that peacefulness pervading the body to that degree. So as I said, there may be a thread or just a place in the energy body. It's just a location in this space of the energy body. It may be very, very subtle. And tuning to that, focusing on it, following it, enjoying it can help.

Or it may be there's a sense of this realm. Maybe I've already got a sense of the third level, but it's still not integrated and settled. And I want to kind of immerse the body in that realm, immerse the body in the peacefulness. But I have to get the body involved.

Always you hear in the Buddha's description—he says it in each short paragraph, he says it twice—about getting the whole body involved. "No spot untouched, pervading, suffusing." Over and over again: body, body, body with these form jhanas. So I really have to make sure I work to get the body sense filled like that and really involved and really pervaded.

I can immerse my body in this space of peacefulness. I can dissolve my body out, so to speak. I dissolve my energy body out into that peacefulness, or I dissolve the peacefulness into the body. But so much has to do with tuning again. What's happening in each jhana is not that we're paying attention to one small physical location or keeping our mind fixed on one small location in space. We're tuning to a certain frequency, and the frequency that we're tuning to in the third jhana is very, very refined.

So it's really about tuning at this point—tuning to that radio station that has that really otherworldly, transcendently peaceful music. And I just want to learn to tune there and really get that fine tuning, and then pay attention, attune, and let things amplify from there.

Experientially, the third jhana is—there's a quantum jump in stillness from the first to the second jhana, and then there's a whole other quantum jump in stillness from the second to the third. So it's a very still state. And sometimes people's initial descriptions when they first enter it in an interview, they say, "Oh, it was really still." It is very still compared to what most human beings will ever have remotely come near experiencing. But yet there is actually a very, very subtle, gentle movement in it. It's possible that there are very, very subtle, gentle movements within it.

Almost—if the breath is your base practice—it's almost as if you'd forgotten about the breath and then it's almost like it can re-emerge at this point, but just really, really faint echoes of the breath. It's like one is almost not sure: is that the breath or is that me just imagining a very subtle breath? In a way, it doesn't matter, but there can be this very gentle breath or very faint echoes of the breath, whatever it is, and they carry this very subtle, gentle movement that's somehow there within the stillness.

It doesn't in any way disturb the stillness, this movement. So it's almost like the very gentle movement is somehow integrated into the stillness without disturbing it. The movement itself, this very gentle movement, seems itself—the very movement seems to express stillness, which in English is a contradiction in words. But there's something very beautiful about the movement, so it seems to really manifest or express this lovely stillness.

The image I had, and I think I've shared it with a few of you, might be helpful as a gentle guide at certain moments. Imagine a lagoon or pond with fairly deep water, and beneath the surface, a few long strands of seaweed swaying really, really gently and slowly. There may be some movement in your experience that's akin to this graceful underwater dance. This movement might manifest with the breath or something else entirely.

As I mentioned, if breath has been your base practice, it may reemerge at this point and reintegrate naturally. After giving all your attention to piti and sukha, after all that delightful commotion and bubbliness, the breath begins to surface again—almost as if saying, "Oh, I can notice it again, and I can welcome it back." But it's very subtle, very delicate.

The breath has become peacefulness itself. Just as the body has transformed into peacefulness, the breath too has become peacefulness. This gentle swaying movement, like that underwater seaweed, expresses peace through its very motion. The movement itself manifests stillness—a beautiful paradox that transcends ordinary language.

Let's think about jhana factors as ingredients in cooking or alchemy, whichever metaphor resonates with you. Working backward from the Buddha's definitions: the first jhana contains both piti and sukha, with piti being prominent. The second jhana spans a range where both sukha and piti are present, but throughout this range, piti gradually filters out. The third jhana contains sukha without piti—the effervescent quality has been completely refined away.

This understanding opens up fascinating possibilities. When I'm established in third jhana, if I want to explore second jhana, I can simply take some piti from the shelf, so to speak, and add a measured amount. Depending on how much I incorporate, I'll find myself in different regions of the second jhana. A little piti takes me to the deeper end of second jhana; more piti brings me to the more effervescent, bubbly regions.

This is part of the art, the creative range possible in this practice—consciously titrating jhana factors to build or open particular states. The same principle applies to fourth jhana, where sukha too has dissolved. If I'm in fourth jhana and add sukha back, I return to third jhana. A whole alchemy of possibilities emerges—mixing ingredients, exploring the spectrum of consciousness with intention and skill.

As the third jhana deepens, you may notice something remarkable quite early in your explorations. If your senses remain open—and the Buddha is very clear that closing the senses is not necessary in the first four jhanas—you continue hearing birds, traffic, or other sounds. What becomes extraordinary is that all phenomena begin to be perceived as having one taste.

This taste pervades not just the inner landscape of jhana but extends into the world of the senses. Even unpleasant sounds—drilling, lawnmowers, harsh noises—begin to carry this same taste of beautiful, profound peacefulness. A cosmic deep okayness spreads throughout everything, and all of existence seems imbued with this singular flavor of peace.

This experience naturally extends beyond formal meditation. When you rise from sitting and move into informal practice—walking, having tea, simply being present—pay attention to what I call the aftereffects on perception. This is a crucial concept that probably becomes most clear here in third jhana and grows increasingly significant as we progress through the deeper states.

In these aftereffects, while remaining open, sensitive, and present, you'll notice that the world itself appears imbued with that gorgeous, delicious, almost mystical peacefulness. It's as if this peace is revealed as the very nature of things—not something imposed upon reality, but the fundamental fabric of existence itself.

Peace is the fabric of the cosmos.

This is pointing to what is probably the most significant thing in the Dharma. We have to pick it up though. We have to make the connections and we have to see it and understand it and see it many, many times through this kind of experience, through other related kinds of insight experience.

But it's pointing to the dependent arising of perception. The world, how the world appears to me, the very world that I live in is dependent on how I look at it. So everyone is living in the same world where we are, but we also aren't. Dependent arising. The world is empty of being this way or that way, ultimately. Any one thing is empty of being this way or that way ultimately.

And one way, and I think one of the most powerful ways and one of the ways I like to emphasize in teaching is seeing that through—again, we're back to—through playing with perception and seeing the effects of this way of looking on the perception of self, other, world, time, everything. And then playing with that way of looking and seeing the effects on perception of self, other, world, time, phenomena. And then another way of perceiving, another way of perceiving. And actually one can integrate the whole of the Dharma into that exploration or even sum up the whole of the Dharma as that exploration. The most significant thing, dharmically, I would say.

So even something like generosity, we don't tend to think of that as playing with perception. But if you practice generosity and you pay attention and sometimes you practice a really radical generosity and see what happens to the perception of self, of other, of world. The whole of the Dharma, all the qualities that the Buddha is pointing to, can be seen to be integrated into a certain movement of exploration, which is this exploration of dependent arising through playing with perception. The appearance of the world, the whole world depends on how I'm looking at any moment.

So we could also say that's a teaching about karma. Where am I reborn? Do you understand that? Do you understand how that makes sense?

Another way of saying all this is a teaching on karma. If I, let's say... Let's take two things. Let's take two pairs. Kindness or unkindness and generosity or stinginess. Kindness or unkindness, generosity and stinginess. And I practice those things. I practice stinginess to different degrees. And I notice the effect on how myself feels. Not that I'm judging myself so much, but just how does myself feel? How does my energy body feel? How does myself feel more solid, more contracted? How does the world feel? Do I feel connected with the world or does the world feel somehow separate? Do I feel a kind of oneness or do I feel a separation? All these things.

Same thing with kindness. I practice unkindness or kindness or I practice generosity. So basically what you'll realize, what you'll come to realize, if you pay careful attention to these things, really go for it as a practice, is that the world I actually perceive that I live in can either be, if I practice a lot of unkindness and a lot of stinginess, I will perceive the world as a hostile place more and more. A cold, barren, hostile place. I have to keep looking over my shoulder. There won't be a sense of the world is a lovely place full of love and warmth and actually somehow we're all one despite the appearances of separateness. The energy body will feel brittle and hard and separate and cold and all the rest of it.

So these are just everyday examples outside of meditation. What happens in meditation is you're taking some of those kinds of things and just cranking them up to a whole other level of power where the effects on perception of self, other, world and all that just become way more powerfully obvious. Does that make sense?

So one way of understanding what actually holds everything in the Dharma together is that exploration. So we will return to this just because it's so important. And as I said, it's even more important when we get to the formless jhānas. But this whole shifts in perception with different ways of looking. We call it the dependent arising of perception, the dependent arising of the world, dependent arising of the self. I need to see that loads of times and let it really impress on the citta. So it's through repetition but also again through extending the degree of range of ways of looking, how many and also how powerful they are.

We can think of that also as a teaching about karma. I practice this, I do this or I think this repeatedly or I view the world repeatedly and I will end up being reborn.

I don't mean a thousand years from now, I mean now—and ten minutes from now, whatever—I would end up being reborn in a world that's colored a certain way. And if I practice kindness and generosity and all the other lovely, really good stuff, I'm reborn in a world. It's the same world, but actually it's very, very different. I'll talk about it again.

We need to see that so many times and see it over so many different kinds of ways of looking, really making the connection. Actually, I have to put this whole idea—I have to, in a way, load it in as a cartridge as the whole way I'm seeing practice, and then follow through with it and then see what it does. If I don't do that, it won't impress so deeply, and I have to do that many, many times through a range of different, variously powerful practice and a range of kinds of practice.

Until we get it and the heart, the citta, gets something really deeply and it's profoundly liberating, there's a mystical beauty and wonder that comes from that, from the kind of insight that comes from that. I would say an insight of a whole other level.

Going back to something I said before, there are three things we can extract out here experientially, and then relate them to insight.

Experientially, I can have—one can have—in the third jhana this sense of one taste. Either in the meditation or outside, everything has this one taste. And so there is actually less duality. Once one opens repeatedly to that experience, there's less duality between the jhana and not-jhana, or meditation and the rest of the world, or even the jhanic realm and the rest of the world. One sees that actually that's the nature of the whole world.

So there's less duality between a place I need to get to and the rest of the world, because all of it has this one taste of peacefulness. Does that make sense? So that's a certain opening and perception that we can have that's very fruitful. We could call it—let's just stick the label on it for now—kind of non-dualistic between jhana and the world, let's say. The jhanic realm and the worldly realm.

But sometimes we can have a much more dualistic sense of the jhanas. They are—and there's a passage, I think it's in the Majjhima Nikaya, there's certainly more than one passage, where the Buddha describes each jhana as an escape. Nisarana is the Pali. So they're realms of escape.

So this lovely, gorgeous realm of peacefulness is a realm of escape from the world. He's actually describing Sariputta meditating. I think it's Sariputta who says, "Actually there's a better escape than the first jhana—the second jhana. That's a better escape than the first jhana." Then in the second jhana, after a certain time, there's a better escape. The third jhana is a better escape from the world than the second jhana, et cetera, et cetera, all the way through.

Nisarana—now it's true that word can mean other things. It can mean things like just a sort of result, or when something issues in something else, like a result, or it can mean a flowing out. But it's also related to the word nis, which is a prefix that means "out" or "outside" or "going out," and sarana is a word you may know: "Saranam Buddhang saranam gachami"—what does that mean? Refuge or shelter. So a jhana as a refuge outside—outside of the world.

And experientially, to me, there is very much that thrust in the Buddha's teachings. Again, in the context of really looking at the Pali Canon and noticing how much he talks about jhana, how much he talks about not being reborn, et cetera. Let's not go there right now. It can also mean leaving behind.

But there's a case for—he's really saying there's this escape from the world. And there are other escapes from the world: the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth jhanas, et cetera. You could say they're also an escape then from the non-peacefulness that characterizes the world. They're an escape from the non-sukha that characterizes the body as it's usually experienced, and the mind as it's usually experienced, and the world as it's usually experienced.

There's quite a dualistic teaching. And it points the way, or paves the way even—each jhana is a step or a further escape. It paves the way for the total escape of the arahant not to be reborn into this world.

So we've got this non-dualistic teaching, or this kind of non-dualistic teaching—everything's all one taste, world and meditation. And then we've got this kind of dualistic teaching—meditation or jhana as escape from the world. And what I would like to stress is actually that we can have both of those as experiences, and they're both very valid.

And we shouldn't make a duality between duality and non-duality. To me, that's really, really important, because some of the most entrenched, unbudgeable, dualistic thinking people I've met call themselves non-dualists. To me, that's actually really, really important.

So both as experiences, both of these are blessings that we can enter this realm. You know, I've been very sick and in a lot of pain and just to be able to go into a realm where there's none of that, there's no discomfort—it's really a blessing and really a gift. But one can also have the other view. Everything becomes that. So they're just views. They're just views that we can move between.

What's the deeper view between, what's deeper than these two views, is this third thing that we were talking about: dependent arising. Because dependent arising, when I really understand that, legitimizes and opens the door for all kinds of different views. One can view dualistically and one can view so-called non-dualistically. One understands this or that perception arises dependently. It's empty and that gives me freedom.

There's no perception of anything that is not empty. Since all perceptions are empty, in a way, there's not a hierarchy. There's not an intrinsic hierarchy. There's a hierarchy dependent on what I might want at any time. I might want to reduce suffering, but then, okay, which way of reducing suffering right now helps the best? The hierarchy is not intrinsic. It's not, so to speak, ontologically intrinsic, but it might be practically. One might hierarchize practically, so to speak.

So a realm of escape, in this case, from the usual realm, which is non-peacefulness and non-sukha, and that's the world. And that's the world as we know it. So how does this peacefulness arise? How does it arise? Peacefulness arises from the quieting, from the attenuating of the push and pull of the citta in relationship to phenomena. We push away what we don't like. I prefer this thing to that thing so I push that one away and pull this one towards me, or I prefer this one and I don't want it to go away so I keep pulling on it so it won't go away.

Now we all know that happens at an extremely gross level. We literally—don't leave me—and pulling someone or whatever it is or literally pushing something or someone away. But the amazing thing is it happens more subtly as well, and more subtly and more subtly, and we can trace that investigation into more and more subtlety, into more and more subtleness.

Peacefulness arises from attenuating the degree of push and pull. And the degree of peacefulness will correspond to just how much push and pull we let go of. Equanimity also, which is a kind of peacefulness we'll come back to, arises from lessening the push and pull in the moment. I'm talking about meditation—I'm not talking about ways of living. Equanimity also, which is a kind of peacefulness, arises from an attenuation of the mind's habitual moment-to-moment push and pull with experience.

So, practically speaking, the question arises: how do we attenuate? How do we reduce? How do we dampen the push and pull? If dampening the push and pull gives such profound rewards, then I want to know how do I dampen the push and pull?

Well, in a way, drinking from the second jhana, drinking and drinking and drinking, as I described earlier, until satisfaction arises—in a way, that's dampening the push and pull, because satisfaction implies that I don't need to push and pull. If I'm satisfied, I don't need to change what's there. I don't need to pull this thing towards me. I don't need to push this thing away. I don't need to hang on to anything. I'm just satisfied.

So drinking the second jhana is, I don't know if it's officially the proximal cause of the third jhana, of the equanimity that the Buddha is talking about in the third jhana, that degree of equanimity. So the equanimity that Buddha's talking about in the third jhana—this is a little side note now—it's related to that kind of peacefulness and the sense of being in a realm that's just free of disturbance and kind of undisturbable, or that the one taste has spread everywhere and then it's just undisturbable. Undisturbable is another word for equanimity or imperturbable; the Buddha sometimes uses that word, not perturbable.

But one way that we might attenuate the push and pull is through just drinking and drinking from the second jhana. Another way, or actually a whole set of ways, is by deliberately practicing attenuating the push and pull. This is actually almost any insight way of looking—what I call insight ways of looking. Any insight way of looking is basically doing that. If it doesn't do that, it doesn't qualify for the name insight way of looking.

So there are loads of them and some of them it's very obvious that's what I'm doing. For instance, some of you will know this—if I'm working with what I call the second dukkha method, I'm actually feeling into the sense of pushing away or grabbing on or holding on. I'm feeling in, in the energy body, in the mind, in the subtle awareness to any sense of contraction, push and pull, and then I'm relaxing it.

And then I'm noticing another one, relaxing it, noticing another one, relaxing it. So it's very obvious that in a deliberate and sustained way, that's exactly what we're doing. And if we just keep doing that, a profound, lovely peacefulness will open up because the push and pull is being attenuated.

There's something else—practicing the view of anatta, of seeing phenomena as not-self, or practicing the view of seeing phenomena as impermanent, anicca. It's not often immediately obvious to people that that's what we're doing. When we see things as impermanent, moment to moment arising and passing, effectively what we're doing, as well as obviously seeing the impermanence, is that the result in the moment of seeing the impermanence—not ten years later, not even a month later, but in the moment—should be that because we see everything's flowing so fast, we just let go. We don't even have to think, "Oh, it's impermanent, therefore I should let go because I don't want to suffer a sense of loss." It just happens automatically.

It's like trying to catch sand that's pouring and pouring through a net with completely the wrong size meshing—it just keeps falling through. If you keep trying to catch it, you just haven't realized it's impossible. You don't have to think about it; it's just obvious. Similarly, when we're practicing with impermanence, effectively what we're doing is attenuating the push and pull. And the same with anatta practice—actually the same with any of what I would call insight ways of looking. It's a deliberate moment-to-moment sustained attenuating of the push and pull with all phenomena, or just a certain set of phenomena that you've pre-circumscribed.

So that's the second way. A third way is going back to this other element we've already pinpointed—the one taste. If everything has one taste as its most salient characteristic, I don't need to choose. It's all the same. It's like I'm not going to choose this molecule of water over that molecule of water to drink—it's all just water. And so what's my reason for push and pull?

Now, I'm not talking about living your life that way—that would be utterly, utterly stupid. Some people get the idea that Buddhists are supposed to have that attitude to everything. I'm talking about a meditation practice that one does for a period of time for the sake of seeing what the results are, because it's telling. It's opening up a beautiful resource and space, and it's going to tell me something about emptiness and dependent arising, which is the most liberating insight or range of insight that I can have.

But if I, in some way or other, practice perceiving things with equality—there's equality, everything is the same somehow, either everything has the taste of love or it has the taste of this peacefulness, but everything is that—then just that perception, with no differentiation, there's nothing to hook any reason to push this away and pull that. Do you understand? That makes sense? So that's another way that one might practice in meditation.

In a way, those second and third approaches—deliberately practicing attenuating the push and pull and the one taste—are more insight practices. Primarily on this retreat, if we talk about how the push-pull gets attenuated so that the peacefulness can arise, it's primarily through the second jhāna and the satisfaction that comes there.

The same deal applies with the third jhāna, with mastery and everything we've been talking about. The different elements of mastery, which you already know, and the issues of pacing—when is it the right time for me to play with trying some of that? When is it premature? Am I being too heavy with it? Or can I keep it very light and very much like a game?

Now we've expanded our possibilities for leapfrog and ping-pong. You can jump—let's say you've been in the third jhāna and you can jump to the first, and then the third, and first. That's ping-pong: first, third, first, third. But it's also leapfrog, so it's a leapfrog ping-pong. Do you see? Or three, one, three, one, three, one, three, two, two... You get the idea. You start to move in any permutation and combination just at the end of sittings for fun. You're exercising the malleability of ways of looking, and it's an element of mastery.

So including going out of any jhāna at all—let's just go back to normal consciousness and then jump from there to the second or the third or whatever it is. These are little games you can have in the last five or ten minutes if there are batteries left, if there's energy left.

Okay, so let's stop there and have a bit of quiet together.

Thank you everybody.

These are little games you can explore in the final five or ten minutes of your sitting if there's still energy remaining, if the batteries haven't run down completely.

The invitation is to exercise the malleability of ways of looking—it's truly an element of mastery. This includes the capacity to step outside any jhanic genre altogether, returning to ordinary consciousness and then leaping directly from there to the second or third jhana, or wherever your practice naturally takes you.

So let us pause here and rest together in some quiet.

Thank you, everyone. As I mentioned, I'll be moving my interviews to seven o'clock. I strive to be as punctual as possible, though I hope you can extend a little patience if the timing isn't perfectly exact.

It's tea time now, so please go and enjoy your tea.

Thank you for your deep listening and practice.

CHAPTER 213

Q & A, and Short Talk

Rob Burbea · 1h44

> In this Q&A session from his jhāna retreat, Rob Burbea explores the relationship between emotions and jhāna practice, advising practitioners to maintain focus on joy and pīti while acknowledging that emotional exploration can deepen in the broader context of practice. He clarifies his use of "radical" as meaning "going to the root" - whether in understanding emptiness or practicing compassion with complete dedication.
>
> Burbea discusses the SASIE framework (Suffusion, Absorption, Sustaining, Intensity, Enjoyment) for jhāna development, emphasizing which aspects have goals versus infinite refinement. He addresses working backwards from higher jhānas when pīti proves elusive, offering practical techniques including attention to upward energy currents and imagination.
> A significant portion explores physical and psychological "locks" - energetic contractions that may dissolve through jhānic absorption. Burbea warns against making bodily unlocking a primary project while acknowledging its value for understanding dependent arising and perception's malleability. He emphasizes that the deeper teaching is emptiness - how playing with perception reveals that no phenomenon exists independently of the way of looking. This understanding brings liberation not just from specific discomforts, but opens wonder and sacredness toward all existence.

I think we'll have some questions today, if there are any. If not, I've got some that people have left in notes and also just a few little things that I wanted to put out there.

Question on Emotion and Jhana

"My question is around emotion and jhana. Emotion is going to come up in practice and in a retreat. The first day's instruction to put down the difficult and to tune into the joy and the beauty and the appreciation. There's a certain point where it feels like they're not mutually exclusive. So noticing sadness coming up and noticing the beauty of the sadness, for example. In the body, rather than necessarily getting into a story and a selfie around some sadness, actually noticing just the warmth in the heart around sadness and the beauty of it. Noticing the sensations of the eyes watering up and that being seen as deeply beautiful. And a couple of times noticing how actually those sensations can become piti. I was like, oh, this is interesting. This could actually become a springboard into jhana from the sense of appreciation of the emotional spectrum.

"And also noticing actually that the quieter the mind becomes and the more the sense of the body and the mind become collected, that when there are thoughts around the emotions, there's a much deeper sense of personal insight around what can be revealed from those emotions and how to work with them in the life or in the imagination or on the cushion. Similar things with anger, having flavors of less ill will and becoming more a sense of personal power and conflict resolution. That sense in the body of, actually this could be a skillful place to be in.

"So I wanted to ask you, specifically in terms of this retreat, what would be your guidance on working with emotions when they come up, whether to hang out with them, listen to them, explore them, cultivate them in a quasi-jhanic state, or whether to notice them, steer into the joy, and lessen the fabrication of the emotions?"

Context, context, context. There's the context of this retreat, and this retreat - or each person's version of this retreat - is in the context of each person's life of practice, larger practice, and each person's life.

This thing about anger, actually being able to transform it, kind of filter out the poisonous elements and transform it into something that's just power - not power over, but just power - the ability not to shrink, not to go crazy, not to spit poison everywhere, but just to be powerful and upright and do what needs to be done. That's a really skillful thing. However, it's not the primary objective and intention of this retreat.

It may be that in practicing jhanas, as you say, there's just more clarity, there's more sensitivity, there's more energy body awareness because of the way we're practicing the jhanas - or primarily because I'm emphasizing a lot about sensitivity and embodiment and all that. It could be that the possibility to make those kinds of transformations is actually increased on this retreat. A person sees, maybe for the first time, these kinds of possibilities. So that's great. And it's something to note. And on the course of this retreat, it still takes very much second place. So that when there's a choice, it's go towards the joy, go towards the piti, et cetera.

In the context of one's life, I will always say both/and. We want everything and we want to not be afraid of doing this because when I'm doing this, I'm not doing that, or doing that because then when I'm doing this, not be afraid of the territory there, be able to do both, have accessible to both and really just left with what would be skillful right now.

The kind of overriding determinative factor of this retreat is that if we want to do jhanas, like I said right from the beginning, the intention has to stay really steady. Otherwise very easily it gets into all these other explorations, wonderful as they are and really important as they are in the larger context. But for a jhana retreat - and this goes for a solitary jhana retreat or whatever it is - the intention needs to stay steady.

So I don't think I said put down the difficult in the opening so much as, again, this thing about context and let it take second place and what are we trying to do and can I see the context and see this retreat in that larger context, that larger freedom and range of possibility which I want and recognize, okay, but just for now I'm going to do this.

So you could, for example, just bookmark those possibilities that you mentioned. You could bookmark that and say, I'm going to practice that later. That would be the absolutely strict way of doing it. But of course you can have a little wiggle room at the sides of things. It's just if that gets too much, the whole kind of current of intention starts to fray. We really have to take care of the intention to cohere it.

You're absolutely right to reflect on that word choice. When the heart is deeply touched by beauty, the tears that arise are quite different from what we typically call sadness. They emerge from a place of profound appreciation and openness rather than loss or disappointment.

This capacity to be moved—to have tears come not from sadness but from being deeply touched by beauty—is actually a precious development on the path. As we grow more sensitive through practice, the heart becomes increasingly receptive to the profound beauty that surrounds us. This isn't a weakness or something to be concerned about; it's a sign of a maturing sensitivity that allows us to receive the fullness of life more completely.

Your exploration of this experience shows real wisdom. You noticed yourself investigating the secondary intention—being with the emotion—rather than staying with the primary intention of jhana practice. This kind of awareness is exactly what allows us to navigate skillfully between different aspects of our meditation. Sometimes we need to tend to what's arising; other times we need to return to our chosen object. Learning to discern which is called for in any given moment is a crucial skill.

I'm particularly struck by your question about the stamina for perceiving beauty. What a wonderful inquiry! How far can we extend our capacity to receive beauty before we're so moved that tears arise? This kind of experimental attitude—playing with the edges of our experience—shows a mature practitioner's curiosity about the workings of their own heart and mind.

And yes, noticing what happens in the body when we're moved by beauty, and whether that can be perceived as pleasurable—this is exactly the kind of investigation that deepens our understanding of how pleasure and joy manifest in our experience. These bodily sensations that accompany being touched by beauty can indeed become part of the pleasurable territory we're exploring in jhana practice.

This is all really wonderful territory you're mapping. The tears that come from being touched by beauty are not something to move away from or transform, but rather something to appreciate as a sign of an opening heart. This is quite different from anger, which we might want to transform using loving-kindness. Beauty-touched tears are already expressing something beautiful in themselves.

It hasn't actually occurred to them that there might be tears or something, or there's a quivering in the heart, and they assume "I must be sad or I must be upset"—but not necessarily. So that's actually a really important distinction.

When we talk about emotions generally, I would say, and I have said, that I don't think we're ever going to exhaust what there is to explore about emotions as human beings. You just rattle off possibilities: "Oh, I could do this. Where's the boundary? How much can I tolerate? What if I see it this way? Can it turn into this?" These are just one, two, three questions right there. There's so much more in terms of experience, but also in terms of just how we're conceiving emotions.

To me, the exploration of emotion, along with several other aspects of our existence, is endless—endlessly fertile, endlessly rich.

The fact that you're moving into different intentions—it's not right or wrong, but there is something, as I said, really important about being really clear and staying with a central intention if you want to do jhāna practice, if you want that to develop. But that's great. That's really great, Lawrence. Well done.

Yes, so definitely that being touched, because it relates to—or being touchable because it relates to—a kind of openheartedness or openness of being, which I said, actually, is more primary than anything else in the arising of pīti, more primary than sticking your mind, nailing your mind to the breath or whatever it is. So you can understand how that fits together, yeah?

And then to be able to kind of ride that and help it go to peace—that's wonderful, you know, all of that.

There was another question woven in there, right? I've forgotten what it was.

"Yeah, I think it was around whether or not emotion can be another springboard to jhāna. And I think you've kind of answered that with the openness. I think there was another one hidden in the middle, but it doesn't matter. We can do it another time."

Yeah. Okay, great. Very good.

"So my question is around the word 'radical,' which you use a lot. You've been using it more over the years. And you've used it in other contexts in relationship to ethics, insight. And you've also used it now in relationship to jhāna practice. What does that mean? Why is that so important? I mean, you know, I think about the middle way—it's like, well, it doesn't fit in a way. Of course, the Buddha was radical in many ways. So I'm wondering if you could just elaborate a bit more. Why is that so important? Why has that seemingly become more important over the years of your teaching?"

Yeah. So I feel like the word "radical" gets used in at least three ways in English. One is kind of just crazily extreme, you know, like a radical fundamentalist terrorist or something like that. One is just as a kind of euphemism for something unusual: "It's radical. Wow, what a radical idea. It's unusual."

But the third, and there are others, but the third way is the way I usually mean it. "Radical"—the word in English comes from radix in Latin, which means "root." To go to the root of something.

To me, radical emptiness, for example, as an example I might use, would be an understanding of emptiness that goes to the root of absolutely everything. In other words, you can't even go beyond it. If my understanding of emptiness just pertains to selves—for example, the self is empty, what there really is is aggregates—then to me that's not radical, or one could have a more radical teaching, because the aggregates themselves might be empty. You understand? And then the time in which the aggregates exist is also empty, etc.

So I tend to use it that way.

When I used it the other way, I think I was talking about radical... practicing exchanging self and other radically. I think there I again really meant a mixture in terms of what I meant. So radically as sort of something like more extremely than you might think of.

We can do a lot of practices a little bit, sort of just dipping our toes in a little bit or a little bit half-heartedly. What would it be to really—I'm seeing here with this pain and this, and whatever it is, I'm dying of cancer—what would it be to practice exchanging self and other with all that? And I really mean it.

I came to this meditation retreat and I wanted it to go well, and it doesn't feel like it's going well. And just to completely turn it around—really, what, in this moment, I give up my desire for that because I'm taking on this frustration, this misery, this failure, these hindrances, this not going well in the hope that there's some kind of reciprocal gift for someone else that I may never even meet.

In that sense, to really do that full-heartedly with the totality of one's being. And if you know that practice, you can get down to things like my very body, my atoms, my mind, this thought, that thought. So there's a radicality in terms of completeness to the fundaments of one's being.

I tend to use it that way, and sometimes it's a bit more just a sloppy word for more than you might usually think. Do I use it more over the years? Maybe, I don't know. It's a commonly used word now in the Dharma. So maybe I'm just upping the ante a little bit on what I mean by it. But I think that answers the question—it's just those two meanings.

And I had another question about the levels of mastery—which would indicate or at least assume that the next jhāna is sort of on its way, if not there already. On the other end, I'm wondering what would be some of the conditions or factors or indicators whereby we'd be spending too much time in a particular jhāna?

Maybe one might have very strong experiences of the next jhāna that just happens over and over again. That might indicate—it's not just, for example, in the second jhāna, it's not just happiness once in a while and a little bit, it just keeps going into the second jhāna. It's a very clear, very vivid experience where you can tick a lot of boxes.

And maybe if I've already got a lot of the elements of mastery of the first jhāna and I can already sit in there for hours, then am I learning anything new at that point about the first jhāna? That's another question. Am I learning anything new here? Of course, I may not be learning anything new because I'm not paying attention enough and I'm not playing enough, but I may not be learning anything new because I actually know that territory. That would be another criterion.

Shall I throw out a few things I was wanting to say? Some of them are quite little.

I made a couple of mistakes in yesterday's talk. The first is really not that significant, but just in case someone gets wondering and it gives them the wrong sense. In that simile about the wanderer through the desert—I said the desert represents saṃsāra. Actually, that can't be right because that would imply that the jhānas are nirvāna. Or maybe it's an oasis in a desert. Anyway, maybe the desert represents the life run by the hindrances. Maybe it represents saṃsāra, and the oasis is not the end of the desert—it's just a respite, and you've still got to go further. Either one, but it doesn't really matter.

Second mistake, slightly more significant, or I don't know if it was a mistake or just wasn't clear enough. I said something like experiences of deep equanimity or fairly deep equanimity that come from insight meditation are often not actually the third or fourth jhāna where there's the equanimity coming in such a strong and beautiful way.

However, experiences like—some of you know the practice, the kind of group of practices that I call the vastness of awareness—actually as you get into that, there is a real mystical sense of wonder. It is very beautiful. There is a sense of sacredness there.

It does really touch you, and it is an experience of deep equanimity. However, those kinds of opening—what I call the practices of vastness of awareness—have a range of depths to them. So it's something that one can open up just a little bit and may not yet have that kind of almost divinity to it and sacredness to it and sense of almost the ultimate.

For example, at one level of depth, all phenomena seem to emerge out of that vastness and disappear back into it. It's like the womb or the source of everything. And that very seeing—it's a bit like when we talked about the nāda sound, how you can use it in an insight way—it's just a backdrop. Everything comes out of that, fades back into it. That level of seeing is very fruitful for the equanimity. It begins to have a kind of mystical flavor to the whole thing, a divine flavor.

As you practice more with the vastness of awareness and it goes even deeper, there's a sense where everything has one substance and that substance is awareness. Everything is awareness. So now we're really moving into a mystical sense of things, and that will have a lot of beauty.

When I said people have opened to equanimity through insight practice, I didn't really mean just basic insight practice. If by insight practice you just mean watching, just being mindful with that general encouragement to watch and let go, that won't take you to these deep levels of vastness of awareness. You actually have to direct it, do something more deliberate and change the practice slightly so that it goes there. Someone reported they got confused by that, so I hope this helps clarify things.

In other words, we make the vastness of awareness a practice in itself that's slightly different than regular insight practice. We have to change a few things in order for it to really go to these lovely deeper levels.

Now, a couple of people are struggling with working backwards—not being able to get the first jhāna, not even being able to get pīti or sustained pīti, but being able to get the happiness or something deeper. So I want to offer this in case it's relevant for anyone now or later.

There are a few different things you can try if that's the case. Let's say you can get the happiness and you're getting more fine with that, you're learning the happiness, but pīti just won't happen. If we think about the jhāna factors and everything we've said so far, we should be able to surmise these things ourselves.

Pīti and sukha are both energy body experiences. At first we think of sukha, the happiness, as a mental experience. But that's just initially—once a person has had the pīti and they want to make the distinction between pīti and sukha. Eventually one sees that actually they're both just frequencies of vibration of the energy body. Yes, they have mental components too, but really one could see sukha as just a more refined energy body vibration than the pīti.

So what that means, if I want to work backwards, is this: here I am in the happiness and it's going well and I'm in it, I'm stewing in it, I'm drinking it in. Then, listening to the mix of frequencies in the energy body, in the happiness, can I notice the coarser ones? Not the more subtle ones, but the coarser ones. And actually tune to them and find the enjoyment in them, because what I attune to is what gets amplified. We said that much earlier. Do you understand? So that might be a way of working backwards.

It might also be that—and probably most people, not everyone, but most people notice this—the pīti tends to have an upward current to it. It tends to move up the body. And in a way, when I say opening and surrendering, abandoning to the pīti, you're really opening the body to that upward current. That's what all this head tilting back business is, if any of you get that. The body is naturally being opened, or like we said with the question about the feet, it's naturally being opened like that. It's opening to what for most people primarily feels like it has an upward current in it. It can be really strong, can be really subtle. It can feel like the pīti is actually pretty stable, but within that stability, it has slight waves of upward waves.

Here's a side point I've just remembered that might be important to say, and I'll come back to what I'm saying and enumerate it so we won't get lost. Sometimes people say, "I thought you said the pīti had to be steady before we work on it, but I feel these waves, like it comes in waves."

Then I ask them: think about the sea, think about the ocean. If you think about a wave in the ocean near the shore, near the sand, that wave or that portion of sand has times when it has water over it—a wave breaks over it—and it has times when the water recedes before the next wave comes and it's bare sand or rock.

If you go to a wave a hundred meters out where the sea is deeper, then I still see there's a wave. It doesn't break necessarily out there, but there's a wave. There's that undulating motion of the water. But out far to sea there, you're never going to get—unless there's a tsunami or something—you're never going to get bare sand or bare rock. You're never going to see the bottom.

In other words, out there, the pīti, the water, is actually steady enough. But within that steadiness—in other words, it never disappears—within that steadiness, there are waves. Do you understand?

So it's not that the pīti has to be totally still. By its very nature, pīti tends to have currents within it. What we don't want, though, in order to be able to work with pīti skillfully, is a pattern where there's a wave and then nothing—bare sand—and then a wave and then nothing again. Does this make sense?

So that was a side point. But generally, pīti has these upward currents.

If I'm in the second jhāna and it's going well—I've learned how to make it go well, I'm enjoying it and really getting into it—but I can't access the pīti or I can't get the first jhāna, then what I can do is see if I can simply notice any upward currents in the energy body experience, maybe within the happiness or whatever is present.

They might be quite subtle at that point, so again I have to get my antennae out. I have to cultivate that delicacy of listening, that receptivity. Within that receptive awareness, I start to notice, "Oh yeah, there are some upward currents." Again, attuning to them, they amplify, and maybe that takes me to the pīti or amplifies the pīti experience.

The third option is simply to imagine upward currents. Don't be afraid to use your imagination in these kinds of practices. I imagine them for a little while, and lo and behold, the next thing I know, I feel them. And then I can enjoy them, get into them, and the whole experience transforms.

The fourth possibility: here I am in the happiness, it's flowing well, but I still can't get the pīti. Here I am in the happiness though, enjoying it, getting into it. I've been established there for a while—really some minutes upon minutes—and then I just drop in a little magic formula, a little tincture. Maybe the word "pīti," maybe the word "rapture," maybe "ecstasy" or "bliss"—whatever your word is, in whatever language resonates for you.

The mind at these levels of samādhi becomes so malleable, so sensitive, so receptive that simply dropping in a word like this can have profound effect. This is a really skillful technique to master for jhāna practice in many different ways.

The fifth approach: generally, if this is the difficulty—I'm getting comfortable with the sukha and the second jhāna, but struggling with the pīti in the first jhāna—then you'd want to spend much more time in the really bubbly happiness rather than too much time in the more serene happiness. Because the bubbly variety, from our cooking ingredients exploration yesterday, has more pīti naturally present within it.

So there are five approaches you could try.

[Student question about experiencing pīti with breaks]

If your experience is feeling the pīti with these breaks—that there's "sand" between the waves—can you nudge it toward continuity? More often, it's a question of simply letting it ripen until that naturally occurs.

But having said that, like everything in this practice, it's not so black and white. There's an intermediate possibility: this choppy quality is naturally where it wants to go initially. Often the first experiences of pīti someone has are more like waves near the shore—coming and then going, coming again, without being sure how it's arising or what it even is.

In time, it naturally wants to mature toward that steady offshore quality. We can do things that slow down this maturing process, and we can do things to ease its passage. The best way to ease this passage is to ensure that when these waves come, I'm neither snatching at them—as the Buddha advises, don't snatch—but I'm truly opening to them.

Again, we return to this principle: if the wave comes, maybe it has a little afterecho, and I really want to open to that resonance. If I'm not fully opening to these experiences, that might be one thing actually slowing down this maturation process—preventing your jhāna boat from reaching those deeper waters.

Another possibility, without applying too much pressure: even if it feels like it's going badly and I'm believing the mind that's saying "I can't do this" or "I've lost it," sometimes it's worth saying, "What the hell? Let me just play with imagining my body full of pīti." Just a few moments of experimenting with that, even though it feels like it might be pointless.

So you have a whole range of possibilities and approaches there.

How are your hindrances doing today? Or actually, how is your papañca today? How's your papañca compared with yesterday?

How's the suffering from your papancha doing compared to two days ago? It's going to be up and down. So wherever you are at the moment, it's going to move, it's going to move.

And we're so interested in that movement over time—from this high amplitude up and down business where we're really believing something and everything's grumpy and we hate Guy House and all that stuff—with applying the antidotes, but even more importantly with the wisdom. Am I believing? Am I just a sucker for this thing? With this kind of questioning of what am I believing here, this high amplitude wave over time, over time—and actually it may take weeks or whatever—but this is where we want to get to: that this high amplitude wave becomes just a little sort of placid caterpillar wiggle. It's really just a sort of energetic movement.

And so much rests on the belief. So much rests on what am I believing here. Without care, there's a hindrance. I believe the coloring of perception and the thoughts that the hindrance stimulates. The coloring of perception and thoughts are believed, and then it becomes papancha, and then that just snowballs.

So doubt and aversion—for example, I was talking with someone yesterday—even subtle doubt and even more powerfully subtle aversion will color the memory of, for example, yesterday's wonderfulness or the joy that you experienced two days ago or three days ago. Aversion, like craving, like grasping, is incredibly powerful. It cannot be there without shaping, fabricating, and coloring whatever phenomenon is in consciousness at the same time. Whatever phenomenon—whether that's a memory, a sight, a sound, smell, taste, touch, the sense of self, whatever—any degree of aversion is going to color that.

So yesterday it was wonderful. Three days ago it was wonderful. And now there's a little bit of aversion in the mind and I look back and it wasn't that good. Or whatever it is. This is what I mean by developing some insight and wisdom in relation to the hindrances and papancha and what the Buddha calls the defilements, the kilesas—greed, hatred, delusion. I think aversion is a much better word than hatred.

The same thing with the rest of the hindrances, subtle doubt, et cetera. I can't remember what stage it was—probably sounds like it was getting into the first jhana and really doing that over and over. At some point, doubt comes. And it wasn't even really strong doubt. And I was sitting cross-legged a lot. And I thought, I'm probably just sitting on a nerve. I was sitting with my heel in my perineum. It can't be jhana. It's just some—I don't know—I'm pressing on my perineal nerve, is there a perineal nerve? It's probably a group of nerves. Whatever.

And then the mind starts. Just these little things. But aversion is a killer. It's a killer. It kills joy. And connecting again to what we were talking about yesterday with dependent arising and the teaching about karma: a little bit of aversion. What kind of world do I live in? What does my self feel like? What does my practice feel like? What's my view of things? What's my sense of where I am? Who I am?

So the second hindrance—I should look it up maybe later. They're usually in the order: sense desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, restlessness, doubt. The second one, ill will, usually means I wish someone harm. To me, that's a really extreme form of the hindrance. The killer at this point for you, I hope, will be aversion in a much more subtle way. It's not even toward anyone. You might get it toward yourself, but it's aversion.

Aversion will be the killer, and aversion can be to any phenomenon whatsoever—any sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thought, memory, any phenomenon of experience, a situation, sensations, a state itself. We have aversion to a state. So this ends up being really like, oh, watch that seed, watch that seed, because it's extremely powerful. And it will either—that seed, like I said, will sprout and grow and it will be a whole damn forest if I'm not careful.

Or even in very subtle seed form, it already sends out its toxins, coloring the perception. Even if there's not a lot of thinking, we start believing what we're seeing, smelling, tasting, touching. We start believing what we're sensing, colored through the lens of aversion.

So there's something—again, so much of the gift of this practice is in relationship to hindrances and getting wise in relationship to hindrances. But this is a long-term lesson. It's not something we get just like that necessarily.

A couple more little things. I don't know if everyone needs this, but shall we very briefly review SASSI, not to get hung up on the wrong things?

SASSI—first S, suffused. I do want it to move towards suffusion. The whole body saturated and suffused, pervaded and permeated, steeped and drenched, and the whole body involved. Once I've got that, I tick it and I don't have to bother about it again. It's done. For that sitting, it's done. There is a goal there, and I try to move towards that goal.

Occasionally, depending on where you are in your evolution of practice, it won't spread everywhere. I've tried all my little tricks—it won't spread. Don't worry about it. Eventually it will spread. But there is a goal, and then I'm done with that job.

Whereas the A and the two middle S's—these are infinite. I will never come to a point where there's no more possibility. There will never be a moment in any meditation I ever do in my life where I cannot improve whatever degree of absorption I've had, where the object cannot sustain either longer in time—the pīti or the sukha—longer in time or with fewer nano, micro, pico interruptions. And the same goes with the mind, that the mind can't sustain either longer in time or with fewer kinds of nano, micro, pico interruptions.

So they're infinite. Now, what does that mean about how I relate to them if they're infinite? It does something to the goal-oriented mind and the judgmental and the measuring mind. Wherever I am, the direction is that way. If I feel like, "Wow, I'm so far gone that way. I've never gone this far before. This is amazing"—great, that's wonderful. And the direction is still that way. And if it's not going so well, the direction is still that way. There's nothing to judge here.

These things will vary from time to time. I'm gradually working at my skill, but because they're infinite, it releases me from any kind of success-failure notion. Do you understand? This is really, really important. Don't get hung up on the wrong things.

So this is why I give the SASSI part—what do I do now, but also what's important and what is not so important. What do I need to complete, like the suffusion, and what do I just need to—it just tells me what direction to go in.

When we come to the I, the intensity of—let's say the pīti or whatever it is—it doesn't matter. As long as it's strong enough, meaning it's pleasant, it's obviously pleasant, it doesn't matter. I'm not trying to make it more intense. It will get more intense or less intense. It's irrelevant.

That completely lets me off the hook of having to worry about it. However much I'm enjoying the pīti, I can enjoy more. So in a way, that's infinite. But part of the art of enjoying is not to pressure myself to do that—it's simply a direction.

These orientations are important for our micro-psychological well-being, which if we're not careful can unfortunately blossom like a poisonous fungus into our macro-psychological well-being. We get hung up on the wrong things and keep judging ourselves by what's actually not the right thing to judge ourselves by. Does that make sense?

This relates to what I keep saying about marination and mastery—these are really important orientations and aspirations for how we're practicing and how I'd like to communicate all this. Mastery includes trying to sustain longer, to sit longer with the pīti-sukha, so I can sit an hour or more with whichever jhāna. Marinating involves playing with the elements of sampasādana and exploring all this richness.

Mastery also includes times when it's not going so well today. Then I might emphasize in this sitting, or for the next twenty minutes, just my steadiness of focus—partly what I've been trying to de-emphasize. There are times when that's exactly what I need to do. Maybe I can do that with the pīti-sukha, which is quite a refined object. I feel like I need to understand how to pay attention to more refined objects. It's actually hard—most people wouldn't be able to do that. So I need to train myself to stay with subtler objects.

That's the micro view, the subtle view of what I'm doing and what my emphasis is in the next twenty minutes sometimes. Other times I'm working on the eighth jhāna generally, but actually what I need to do right now is go back to my base practice and work on my focus and steadiness there. All that's normal and available for someone who has the view that mastery is what I'm doing. It's wide, there's a range, and we're responsive to shifting emphasis at different times. It includes quite a lot.

So we have flexibility, responsibility, responsivity, and inclusiveness.

In relation to mastery, someone wrote a question. Let me read it: "We say that the arising of jhāna depends on causes and conditions. We also say that mastery of a jhāna includes being able to enter it at will, which could perhaps be understood as implying a certain independence of at least some causes and conditions. So there's an apparent contradiction there. Could you please elaborate on how to relate to these two statements and how to skillfully relate to the notion of entering at will?"

Very good. This is exactly one of those things where I will contradict myself. But more importantly, it's an instance where we want a range of views and don't want to get locked into this view or that view.

For anyone at all, give them the right medical drugs and their ability to enter a jhāna at will will be severely compromised. If you've had enough general anesthetics, or have illness, low energy, fatigue, digestive upset—a million different things will at times mean that even someone who's a master will not on those occasions be able to enter at will. It's never going to be 100% of the time. Never. But still, it's good to aspire to.

This relates to the whole teaching about self and emptiness of self. To see jhāna as depending on causes and conditions is a way to conceive of jhāna without self—without the self coming in and getting all tight about "Can I do this? Am I failing? What badge do I get? Have I achieved?" It's just causes and conditions.

From the point of view of emptiness of self, seeing in terms of causes and conditions is seeing not in terms of self. Yet we can also—and need to in life and in the Dharma—see in terms of self: I do this. I choose this ethically.

I make this choice. I cultivate this. I cultivate metta, and so forth. I choose to cultivate metta. All of that is normal and healthy and skillful—a kind of view or conception of what's happening.

In other words, setting up mastery as a goal actually gives us a direction. If I never mentioned it, then people might be sliding around all over the place and not getting as much fruit out of the whole practice, because it wouldn't occur to them to try for certain things that fall under this umbrella of mastery. Do you understand? It wouldn't occur to you to try this or that. But if you say, "Oh, there's this thing called mastery—see if you can do it," then something opens up. And mastery depends on intention.

So you can say intention is one of the causes and conditions. Going back to what I said earlier, is intention ever a completely sufficient cause and condition? It's necessary but not sufficient. Intention by itself—give me enough drugs, give me enough of this or that, starve me, make me too tired, and so forth—intention itself is not sufficient. You understand? But I need to mention it because it actually is a very powerful ingredient among the causes and conditions. But it's never sufficient.

The larger point here has to do with teachings about emptiness. Again, I want the range of views. I want to be able to drop into different perspectives. Here's a situation. Here's something I have to do. Here's something that happened to me. Here's something that I did wrong. Here's something I succeeded at. Here's something I'm doing great. Here's something that people are praising me for. Here's something that people are blaming me for.

At times, I want to have available to me a way of viewing all that which deconstructs the self out of it. I see in terms of causes and conditions, and that can be extremely liberating and healing—taking the pressure off the self, the measuring of the self, the blaming of yourself at times.

But if I get stuck there and I say, "Well, that must be the right way to view things because that's Buddhist, right? Not-self, no-self, there is no self, and all that emptiness"—I think one gets stuck in a partial and incomplete view of emptiness.

The radical emptiness of self means actually that any view of self, even the view that there is no self, is eradicated, ripped up from its root. What that means is all views become available to us, including the view of self. So someone who's really understood the emptiness of things and the emptiness of self can move easily between views that look in terms of not-self and views that look in terms of self.

Is this making sense? This is really, really, really important. To my way of understanding, if one hasn't seen this, one hasn't really gone deep enough. It also just won't make sense in one's life.

Here, this collection of aggregates wants to marry that collection of aggregates. This collection of aggregates would like to have sex with that collection of aggregates. This collection of aggregates would like to compose this piece of music in praise of the collection of aggregates that is the universe, or whatever. If we just look that way, there are going to be enormous areas and dimensions of our being, of our lives, of our souls, of our existence that are not supported—and that's going to be a real problem. It would be a real problem for ourselves, it would be a real problem for our relationships, it would be a real problem for society and the planet.

Sometimes you get this shadow side of Buddhism that always wants to deconstruct things and see things that way, when actually I do need to be not just able to comfortably move into a self-view, but able to move into a self-view that's actually beautiful and soulful and enriching and gives meaning and all of that. I want both of those.

So these two seemingly contradictory teachings—mastery and at-will versus dependent on causes and conditions—yes, they're contradictory, complementary, but we want them both and they're helpful at different times. In a way, they're not completely contradictory. I suppose the truest one is dependent on causes and conditions, of which intention is one, but never completely a sufficient one just by itself.

Does that make sense? Is that okay?

Does that make sense? Is that okay?

"Yeah. Yeah. Yeah, thank you."

Marco was expressing gratitude to the jhāna practice for enabling him to see that there was a hierarchy of views happening. The perspective that "this is really just causes and conditions" was trumping the view that "I can do this with my intention." This recognition is really important.

If all these different views are available, the question becomes: why do I choose this one over that one at any time? If they're all legitimate, and I hereby give you permission to hold them, how will I choose between these different views? That becomes the criteria, and it's a really interesting question.

Classical Dharma offers a simple answer: What reduces the suffering here? We can get attached to a view of "it's really just causes and conditions" and "there is no self." There's a kind of attachment there, but if it comes in too soon, too quickly and too pervasively, it prevents a lot of other really good things from opening in our life. It blocks other views that might, in certain situations, deliver much more relevant fruit.

When someone is practicing the jhānas and starting to get grandiose—"look what I can do"—as I pointed out earlier, this is actually very rare. If they're real jhānas and the practitioner is going in and out enough, this grandiosity is uncommon. What's much more common is the opposite view: "I'm failing at something."

Then this view of "it's just something arising out of causes and conditions—when the causes and conditions aren't there, it's not there" becomes helpful for relieving the suffering and contraction of a certain self-view that judges oneself. I'm using it for that purpose.

But there might be times when someone adopts the other view—"I can do this"—and it actually feels like that's releasing some suffering or counterbalancing some history of being told "you can't do something." This could be anything. In classical Dharma, the framework is simply this: among all these views, which one do I pick up now to look through, to perceive this situation in order to reduce whatever suffering is there, to heal whatever suffering is present? That's the criterion for adopting this view or that view.

This is really important. We can add to this framework and enrich it and make it more complex, but I'm not going to do that now.

This question about mastery is also quite interesting, because it may well be that—and this is something each person should check in the larger scheme of things—do I have somewhere, maybe consciously, maybe semi-consciously, a kind of philosophy or psychology, or a mixture of the two, that doesn't like the idea of mastery? Or doesn't even like the idea of the self's autonomy?

As if I much prefer the view of things just happening: "This thing opened up so I flowed with that, and then conditions were such that this thing opened up and I flowed with that." There can be a lot of beauty in that perspective, a lot of really lovely flow and even creativity and all kinds of things.

But behind it, usually semi-consciously, is a little bit of an entrenchment in a view that doesn't allow a notion of the autonomous self deciding and acting and choosing X or Y and perhaps even gaining mastery. Of course, one can be locked in the other view as well. But this tendency is quite interesting to check out, especially in spiritual circles.

Again, my opinion is: why can't we have both? Why can't we have both and explore the whole range? What might it be that we don't like that view so much? What's preventing us from seeing the beauty in the view of the self's autonomy and the self's power to choose and the self's decision to do something and work at something and accomplish something? Or vice versa, though this is much rarer in spiritual circles.

So explore what's holding us back, what we don't like about it, and actually liberate that resistance so both views become available to us. Why not?

These are subtle imprisonments that we can hopefully begin to see as we do more practice, whether it's jhāna practice or whatever. Jhāna practice, as I've mentioned a couple of times, ramps up our ability to see all kinds of really subtle locked places or defilements. People generally would have no idea that such a practice would do such a thing. You tend to think, "Well, insight practice where I'm just opening, or mindfulness where I'm just opening and being with whatever comes up and giving everything equal interest—that's where I'm going to notice these things."

But there are many hidden things that one cannot notice unless you actually try working in certain ways—for instance, with a goal, with the idea of mastery or this or that. That starts illuminating things, shining lights into hidden corners that we wouldn't otherwise have even realized were there.

To me, there are all kinds of secondary gifts to jhāna practice. Each of them is immense, though we don't tend to think that way or realize that at first.

Are there any other questions? Yes, is that Saber at the back?

Can I just say one more thing about that before you start?

So a very common experience as you develop jhana practice is that you almost feel like the mind has a momentum to go—let's say, to the third jhana. I was intending to go to the first jhana, and it just goes to the third jhana. As you practice more and more, that kind of thing becomes very common. I could just sit here and wait, and the mind will go somewhere. When we've done a lot of jhana practice, there's that propensity—it could be any jhana. It just wants to go, or I've aimed it there and it goes over there. This becomes increasingly common, so that many people actually end up practicing that way. If they've done extensive dedicated jhana practice, they simply sit down and see where it goes. There's not much intention at all. It's like seeing where I slide on the ice today.

I used to say it's as if the mind has a mind of its own. It really develops this kind of other intention. When you've done substantial jhana practice, this can be fine because they're all good places. But I would still balance it with the question: can I still retain some choice? Even if it wants to go there, can I still choose to go somewhere else at times?

So there's really this range. Sometimes you might need to let it go where it wants for a little bit—the horse wants to go to the carrot shop for a while, and then you direct it elsewhere. But this idea of keeping open the range of freedom, the range of possibilities, is something really important to me.

"It's a question about what you just pointed to regarding freeze-up, locked places. I've been seeing that process over the last couple days—psychological but also in the body. Places of deep, old, subtle holding and tightness beginning to move and open. There's so much beauty in that, and also it feels like it takes time. I'm curious about how to relate to this, because I see how my mind can keep sticking, going back to something I'm calling locked. Really it's opening, but..."

This is a really important question. Let me speak about three kinds of locks—to oversimplify for now.

There's a kind of mental lock in view, which is usually the hardest to even identify. Unless someone says something or you read something, you think, "Whoa, hold on." We don't even realize what views we're locked into. That's one kind of locking. Over the years, I've spoken extensively about that.

Then there's a locking in a kind of mental territory. Yesterday I was saying about the second jhana, for instance—don't neglect the really bubbly happiness, especially if that's alien to your personality. It's not congruent with the usual shapes the self takes. We can get locked into certain emotional bandwidths or territories. A person has a certain range, whatever it is.

Now, those first two—the locking in views and the mental territory locking—I would say regarding views, there are times when one has to be really vigorous and alert, actually trying to look, really trying to question things, to see where I might be locked and open things up that way. There's a real sense of actively trying to do this. One will never come to the end of that, but the intention can be quite strong and the action quite strong. I might start reading material about this or that.

With the second category, mental territory, there are also times when that becomes the most important thing in practice—actually the most important thing in one's life. It's looking at the views I have of all kinds of things: what the Dharma is, what awakening is, all manner of things. One needs to be active and vigorous in questioning and exploration, and that might mean wide exploration.

But the intention and the action can be quite strong.

In the second case—what I'm calling a lock into mental territory—let's say this example I gave: I'm very used to being quite peaceful and equanimous, but real bubbly happiness is kind of alien to me. Then I would say the middle version there is gentle unlocking. But the unlocking happens just by hanging out in that kind of happiness, for example. I don't need to put too much pressure on the whole situation or too much pressure on that pattern, on that lock.

If something is opening that is expanding my heart range—effectively my soul range—then I want to linger there and let it do its work rather than just say, "Yep, taste of that one, tick, because I've experienced it once," and then go back to a kind of equanimity which is supposedly deeper. It can kind of go under the mask of a deepening of practice. Does this make sense?

But the third one, the locks in the body, is in a way a little bit more delicate. So yes, as we practice jhāna, and to the degree in any formal session that there's real absorption and suffusion, those physical locks tend to dissolve. And that dissolution may last after the session. It may last—if it's non-habitual, if it was just locked and I've never had that particular lock before—then it can just go. That was it. It doesn't come back.

If it's a habitual lock, something gets unlocked when there's the jhāna or whatever, and that unlocking can last some degree of time afterwards. I would just be careful not to put pressure on it because it may well come back. There's a kind of bodily karmic knot there that is just a tendency to create that kind of lock. We can play with perception and see the knot as pīti, see the knot as happiness—all that's going to really help.

But I would be really, really careful about two things. One is making too much of a project of unlocking the body. And a lot of people get into this. It becomes really a big deal. If I see that as a long-term project, that's not Dharma to me. I may unlock this or that at different times through different practices, through different playing with perception, through different states. And that's wonderful and that's great. But if I make that—if I get a bit obsessed with that—then that's something else. It's not Dharma anymore. I've shrunken my view of what Dharma could be into something much smaller and gotten a bit obsessed about something, using something as a kind of measuring stick for how I'm doing.

So sometimes with a lot of practice or a little practice, things that have been habitual may go forever. It's just gone. And sometimes they may go for a little while and come back. Sometimes they may go for a long while and come back. But I really have to have my view there quite right. The Dharma offers us much, much more than just that kind of unlocking of energy patterns.

Another way of saying all that is just to be very, very light when you're playing with that and hold it in a much larger context. And even the way you're playing with it—in playing with perception or the state—to be really quite light about it. How does that sound?

There was another piece that I feel is really important. If we go back to this thing about playing with perception: you can get into this enough that here's a lock, here's a contraction, here's a pain—whatever it is, and pain in energetic terms is just a contraction of energy—and you can play with perception, see it as pīti, and it unlocks.

But what's most significant about that shift, even if it never comes back and it's been mildly bugging me for the last ten or twenty years—to me, what's more significant about that shift is the dependent arising of perception. For that coin to drop, it may well come back. It doesn't take anything away from the insight if it comes back an hour later, ten minutes later. In the long run of things, the fruit of seeing that through playing with perception, what I perceive as a lock actually is liberated, is unlocked. Understanding then the dependent arising of perception, therefore the implication for emptiness—that is way more significant than "I've got rid of a discomfort that has been bugging me for twenty years."

Yeah, I think that's the power of what I've been playing with—really seeing this tendency to look at the problem and the training in widening back out again and coming back to the fuller fabric of the energy body, even whether or not the lock is unlocking.

Yes, exactly. So thank you.

That's a middle ground as well. So we've got, again, these three things that we need to hierarchize. You've got this knot, this lock that has been with me for twenty years on and off, and I just wish it would go away. And it does—it goes away forever. Versus what you just said: I've trained the attention and the citta so that when there is some discomfort in the body, I don't have to go there. I can actually put my attention elsewhere and be pretty happy, and there's this lock there. And then the third one, where one actually sees that the lock itself is empty, because when I look at it in a certain way, it dissolves.

If I had to put that in hierarchy of order of importance, I would put the disappearing of this bugging thing at the bottom, then what you said, and then the emptiness one at the top. So this training—thank you for saying that—it's so important. Again, it's really understanding what's the relative significance of different experiences that we have.

But this has everything to do with—and I'll maybe come back to this—why are we practicing? What are we practicing for? And how easily we can have... I'll say this again: it's up to us why we practice. It's up to you. You can have any reason why you practice. It's not for me to tell you why to practice. That's for you to find out—why do I want to practice?

But the range of possibilities of what we're looking for when we practice is huge. And sometimes a person very consciously just chooses something quite small in terms of the reason they're practicing. What also happens, though, is over time the reasons for practice shrink somehow or other, and that's quite interesting as well. Or we've just not been told what fruit there is on offer, and so we're operating under a limited menu of potential. So all this is actually really, really key.

Does that make sense? I'm going to stop trying to remember what the other thing I was going to say was. Does that feel okay for now, Sabra?

"Definitely."

Yeah, okay, good. Someone else? Is there anyone who hasn't...? Yeah, Mikael, just to give more people a chance. Mikael, please.

"I would like to ask in relation to this discussion about the malleability of perception in regard to pain. Because as you mentioned in some talk before, one can through this practice start to slowly notice that actually any vedanā, any experience, can be sort of looked at, can be seen as pleasant. If there is pain, one can sort of see and distill or somehow... What's the word you used? Filter out the pleasant out of the mix and just take that in. And once that really gets going, at least I got really excited about that. It was exhilarating—wow, this is meaningful, this is really deep.

And some intuition in me says that it's possible to go wrong, or it's possible to overdo this. If one gets first contact with such malleability of perception in regard to pain, one can get an impression that this is what freedom from suffering is all about, and then starts to apply this with almost like any experience, any pain, all the time—bliss, bliss, bliss, bliss—and it's wonderful for a time, for sure, but then an intuition in me says that that is not completely healthy in the long run, and there might be a sort of mistake or a risk of mistake in view. What would you comment on this?"

Yeah, trust your intuition. Absolutely. Because, you know, to me, if someone hears this idea—it came up recently on a seminar I did—someone can hear this idea and almost get the impression that, "Oh, if I just get really good at that, then I can have a pain-free life." And then they just start trying to do this everywhere.

That would be missing the point. The point is this ability to play with perception to the degree that something painful becomes something pleasant, for example, or becomes just an empty space or lots of other possibilities—or becomes the face of Buddha-nature or the face of God or whatever. This ability to play with perception, if I limit it to this pain-to-pleasure thing, and then I think, "Oh great, what a useful thing," and then I'm trying to live without pain—that's just, again, taking what's not... there's two gifts on offer and one takes the much, much poorer one, which is freedom from pain.

Now, that might sound like it's Dharma because the Dharma is about reducing suffering and all that. But that's not the real lesson here. The potential lesson from this experience—and it needs to sit within a context of other teachings on emptiness and different kinds of playing with perception—is that perception is malleable. Nothing exists as anything in particular. A thing is not fundamentally this or that, independent of the way of looking.

This eventually tells me about the emptiness of all phenomena. I begin to see this in many different ways, to various depths and degrees, through multiple directions. And this understanding starts revealing the emptiness of all phenomena: no phenomena whatsoever is fundamentally existent as anything in itself. It is this or that only dependent on the way of looking.

This is knowledge that can come not just intellectually, but into the heart. The knowledge that everything is radically empty like that liberates in a much grander way. It liberates independent of this pain or that pain. It liberates in relation to the whole of existence and all phenomena. Even more importantly, it brings an unspeakable joy and wonder and sense of mystery and grace into the whole fabric of existence at a very deep level. To me, that's the point.

Rather than simply becoming really good at getting through life without pain, which seems narrow to me, this understanding opens something vast. Yes, you can use these techniques occasionally when things are rough, but that's not the point. The point is what this is teaching us about the nature of existence itself.

If I experience this transformation of perception just once or twice, it might seem like, "Well, okay." But as I begin exploring perception in many different ways, at some point the coin drops about the nature of existence itself—about the way things actually are, the true nature of things, the emptiness and suchness of phenomena. Knowing this liberates in a much broader and deeper way than just dealing with this or that particular instance.

I can still experience pain, but this understanding liberates in relation to life and death itself. It brings a wonder and sense of sacredness that's almost impossible to put into words. To me, that's the real point.

And just like the mastery question we discussed earlier, no one will be able to do this all the time. The Buddha experienced plenty of pain in his old age, and only certain kinds of meditation would release him from perceptions of pain. I myself have struggled with pain quite a lot at times. Again, it comes back to discerning what's truly significant and what's not. Your intuition is spot on here. The real gift is much vaster in scale than just a neat trick that helps us feel better.

Thank you. Perhaps we have time for one more question?

[A participant asks about somatic blocks and locks in the body]

Yes, some locks might indeed suggest lifestyle changes. I used to have chronic cramping in my lower intestine for many years—a very common, uncomfortable sensation that felt like something was constantly locking there. It was a regular visitor in my meditation practice for years and years. I learned tremendously from it about clinging and perception and letting go, for which I'm deeply grateful. What had been an ongoing difficulty became something I learned from profoundly.

In hindsight, though, it was also related to having ulcerative colitis and Crohn's disease. When I eventually found a certain probiotic and began taking it, that eased considerably. So yes, sometimes these physical manifestations do point toward practical changes we can make.

But I think you're asking more about psychological aspects—suppressed desires, projects we're not completing, things we want to say but don't. These may or may not express themselves as locks in the body. Often when someone suppresses desire or doesn't see a project through, there's no particular sense of bodily contraction. What's actually happening is they're not allowing energy to build up in the body, so they don't necessarily experience holding or contraction.

I'm hesitant to use bodily sensations as definitive indicators of psychological needs. At a very subtle level—and we'll return to this since we've already touched on it—the presence of any perceived lock or contraction in the body indicates that subtle aversion is present in the mind.

But that's more to do again with dependent arising and insight practices that can, when I release that aversion, lo and behold, the sense of the lock unfolds, dissolves.

So some of these more personality locks or patterns like that—they may or may not express themselves in long-term physical manifestations. Sometimes with people, they do very clearly, and it may or may not be related to these larger psychological issues. Sometimes they don't really express at all or in any noticeable way. And sometimes they express, but in a way that's not obvious to that person, even when they've practiced a lot with the energy body, but maybe obvious to someone else who's a bit more sensitive to that and used to it. The person doesn't realize they hold in a certain way.

And that may be to do with more psychological holding—they hold in relation to life or in relationship with someone or in relation to their self-expression, they're just holding back. Sometimes it's sensible to someone else, but they have no notion of it at all because it's actually quite subtle and there's no discomfort with it. Sometimes with these more civilized holdings, there's discomfort, and discomfort is like waving a red flag saying something's wrong here. So there can be the whole range there, really.

I think what's more important here is that if you look at your life and you feel like, "I am kind of squashing my libido"—in the larger sense, libido—"in a certain way, or I'm dampening my desire, or I'm not allowing... I'm in some way inhibiting either my desire to accumulate and burn or my desire to follow through or whatever"—that's extremely significant. I would say massively significant.

Again, all that can hide under a nice Buddhist facade of the well-behaved, equanimous yogi who lets go a lot very well. "Maybe you should be a teacher."

So this is a really, really important point, I would say. To take that up as an investigation, then you can see, okay, how much does that have to do with physical locks? How much are these physical locks really trustworthy as indicators of the relationship with desire? But probably if that's the kind of thing you're talking about—long-term projects and such—my guess is that the physical manifestations will only be partially helpful as indicators. There's a bigger thing going on, and your job will be to investigate that.

Going back to what we said in terms of the views as well—what views are operating? So in terms of those one, two, three that I mentioned earlier, what views am I locked into? Maybe a view about desire, maybe a view about self, maybe a view about Buddhist practice. It could be all kinds of things or nothing to do with Buddhism, but the views.

Then there might be—the other thing might be—the second one, it might be an emotional lock. That this territory of actually sitting with a really strong desire and everything I talked about the other day—if it's really strong, it will burn. And a lot of people say, "I don't like burning. There's a danger that I won't get that. I'll be frustrated. I'll fail. People will think this or I'll think this or whatever it is. Or I just cannot tolerate that burn. I cannot tolerate that much desire. It's uncomfortable." Or it can be uncomfortable sometimes.

And so it might be I just have kind of shut the door on that emotional territory. And then some of that—again, the boundary between what's emotional, what's physical, what's energetic, there's not a clear boundary there. But again, it might be that a person just cannot tolerate that much energy in their being.

So there are a lot of things here. I think it's immensely important, immensely important. And what does it mean to be a liberated human being? What does it mean in relation to this? Am I really liberated if I can't actually feel any desire or I can't follow through on desire? If my only option is to let go, is that really liberation? You're not saying that, but it's a larger question.

So to me, it's really, really important. The investigation of all that is probably not something that's—it depends how long this has been around, but it's probably not something that happens with an "ah, I got it now." There may be long-term habits here of thinking, of view, of energetics, of emotional territory, all kinds of things. So it may take a while. It may involve approaches from all different angles and levels and all that. But I think it's hugely important.

And again, you could decide to see that as an investigation that's outside of Dharma.

Or you can expand your view of what Dharma is, and that becomes an investigation that's really at the core of Dharma. In a way that's up to you—it doesn't really matter—but there are certainly ways of doing it both ways, in or out. So I think it's very important.

I'm not sure whether to read these notes. Someone's written—it's anonymous, I don't know if that was intentional or not—but it says: "You don't even need the jhana to be happy. I realized this today and it totally blew my mind, just wanted to share that."

Yeah, that's totally right. I'm just wondering if I've missed something here or if the person wants to say a bit more.

[After some exchange about using the microphone]

Yeah, so this is what I wondered. This is really important. Two things here. One is that as we practice the jhanas more, the jhana factors like piti and sukha—happiness—can come up outside of a formal session very, very strongly. Sometimes it's very obvious to see the connection with, for example, a sitting we've just had. We get up and we're in the lunch queue and we're just overflowing with happiness. But sometimes it seems almost a bit random. It's just like it wasn't going so well and then suddenly there's this eruption of happiness. So that's all very normal.

The jhana factor of sukha can come up even very strongly outside of an actual jhana, outside of the total absorption in it. There is still an important difference between absorbing into a jhana where everything is really collected and the happiness. But the happiness itself is also really a treasure. To savor it more, we marinate in it and sit in it. But this is really great.

But then also, as you said, it was a relief because—you know sometimes so much can happen—we say okay, this is the goal and there's these stages and there's eight of them and then there's this idea of mastery, and it's so easy for the self-measuring and the critic and all that to come in. And then we get, you know, it's all very tight. Then we realize oh actually it doesn't need to be so black and white—have I got it, have I not. It can come up anywhere, and that takes some pressure off. So that's great.

And then thirdly, you know, which isn't what you were saying, but yeah, it should be obvious. There's plenty of people who experience happiness in the world who've never heard the word jhana and never had jhana. So happiness is just—this wasn't what you were saying—but we should realize that too, that we're not saying here that no one who hasn't experienced jhana can ever be, ever experience happiness. No.

But there is something about the degree of jhanic happiness that I think is sometimes there that is pretty extraordinary. But that, as you've found, can come off the cushion and say, "I've never been this sort of happy." So all that is great.

And on that note, I'll just read this. I don't know, again, depending on how your hindrances are doing and how your papañca is doing and all that right now. Should I read this? Leave it?

[After some back and forth with the group]

Dear Rob, in second jhana, I heard the central heating as happiness, and that pretty much blew the roof off. So again, it's playing with perception, or a perception was played with just by being in the jhana. More joy than I have ever felt ever. Then I came out of third jhana—this is someone who's spent a lot of time working on this stuff in the past, so it's not their first jhana retreat—then I came out of third to walk, and everyone seemed like these radiant, translucent Buddhas. Which is what you are, by the way.

Wow.

So it doesn't sound like there's a question there, but there's some beautiful sharing. We should probably end here, as my interviews begin at seven.

Actually, there's one other thing I wanted to mention... No, I think I'll leave it for now.

Let's just have a bit of quiet together.

Thank you, everybody.

And time for tea.

CHAPTER 214

Q & A

Rob Burbea · 1h30

> In this Q&A session from a jhāna retreat, Rob Burbea addresses several important questions about practice. He explores the profound nature of desire and intention in spiritual life, responding to a practitioner's insight about how working toward jhānic goals requires letting go of clinging, aversion, and delusion. Burbea discusses the challenges of maintaining deep intentions in daily life and offers guidance on learning from moments when we feel we haven't lived up to our deepest desires.
>
> The discussion includes detailed exploration of upekkhā (equanimity), comparing different translations and examining how it functions across different levels of practice—from the basic equipoise with worldly conditions to the profound equanimity that emerges through progressively letting go of subtler forms of clinging. Burbea clarifies the relationship between mental and physical feelings in jhānic states, explaining how sukha and pīti are experienced primarily as energetic vibrations throughout the body.
> For practitioners familiar with soul-making dharma, Burbea distinguishes between the erotic engagement with images (which maintains duality) and jhānic absorption (which moves toward dissolution of separation). He emphasizes the importance of marinating in jhānic states rather than moving quickly between experiences, and addresses concerns about spiritual bypassing, explaining how different practices serve different purposes within a complete spiritual life.

Okay, so before we start today, I've got a request. You may or may not have realized, but we're not alone at Gaia House—there are other retreatants here on personal retreat and work retreat. There's been a request to please not talk outside of the Q&A period and interviews. I don't know what exactly is happening during your work periods, but for their sake, who naturally expected to come on a silent retreat, and also for your sake, we need to maintain silence.

There's this idea of actually letting things build, letting the energies build. When there's happiness and appreciation—very natural human responses—you want to share that or talk. That's important, of course; it's an important part of being human. But in this practice, we're also wanting to let the energies build and not squander them so much. There will be a chance to talk at the end, to share time together verbally at the end of the retreat. But unless it's talking with each other about the work and what needs doing right then about whatever yogi job you're doing, just repeat the initial agreement to sustain silence together.

Can you feel together in that silence? Do I need to speak and be heard and exchange that to feel connected? One of the opportunities—I think this already somehow came up in a Q&A—is that as a retreat gets longer, we get more sensitive. Part of the gift of that sensitivity is that we can feel each other more deeply, more widely, more completely, more openly and sensitively, and we don't need to talk necessarily. We don't even need to talk to someone or hear their story or hear whatever to sense how they're doing and their personhood and the particular flavors of their being, and to sense that connection and the way one can feel very connected across space without all that.

I don't know the details, but the other resident teacher has obviously heard from some yogis or encountered something. There's a request to all of us to uphold, to revisit that commitment together and keep that. If it feels like, "Oh, but it's such a nice connection," then I invite you to remind yourself that you can have that verbal connection at the end of the retreat with each other, and to see how connected you can feel without words. This has to do with the same qualities that we're bringing to this kind of practice anyway, and to me, that are part of what we bring to any practice: sensitivity, openness, receptivity, attunement.

It's all the same thing. If a certain period is a time when you don't want to do that, then you just shift the balance of attention. So if you are feeling like you're really enjoying and appreciating each other and the connection, let that be more prominent. I'm washing dishes or whatever, and there can be eye contact and smiling if you want, without the expectation that it comes back. But the emphasis of attention is more on that sense of connection and appreciating it and feeling it with the whole body and resonating it.

You can get exquisitely sensitive. Some of you know this on long retreat. You might be sitting right here at the front, and I don't know how many yards it is to the back of the hall. Someone comes in quietly and you know who it is—how does that happen? If I'm just talking all the time, I won't develop that kind of sensitivity.

You can play with the balance of attention. If I want that connection, then I can be a little more open. If I want to be more inner—maybe I'm working with my primary nimitta, maybe I'm processing something inside, maybe I just need to collect my mind and be mindful, whatever it is—then the balance is more inside. Again, it's just context.

It's never the case that we want never to talk to anyone, although the Buddha seemed to recommend that almost as a preference for his monks and nuns. But we want to have this freedom and this capacity to do things differently at different times. This is a really important part of expanding our range and expanding our freedom. So we can just revisit that together.

Good. I have just a few questions from people, and we can take some verbal, live ones. Is there anything anyone would like to ask? I just saw Nicole first, so why don't you go ahead...

"So last night before sleeping I had a vitakka and vicāra attack, which is a great time to have right before you go to sleep. But really appreciating the whole jhāna system. A bunch of things you said all came into order, and I'm just really feeling like this thing is really brilliant. Particularly I've been struck by when you said the most important thing about the jhānas is working towards a goal and asked who actually believes me. I raised my hand, and then as soon as I raised my hand, I was like, 'If Rob asked me why, I would have no idea.' It was just this instinctual hand raising. So as it all came together last night, it was long and extended, but the short of it is basically the Buddha setting up work towards a goal, but the goal necessitates that you let go of clinging and aversion and even delusion and get more and more and more subtle."

So all the ways that you would naturally go towards a goal, you're asked to let go of in order to complete that goal. And then along the way, you make the world over and over and over again through dependent origination, and you see that—either through hindrances, where you create a hell realm, or through beauty. And I was like, mind blown.

But the thing that I'm grappling with: after you gave that talk about desire, it struck me so deep, I actually went to my room and I just wept for an hour. I haven't ever had that kind of response on retreat. I was disturbed—not necessarily in a bad way, but in this deep-in-my-belly kind of way—and went through a whole process. From one way of looking, I could see it as a sort of self-doubt, hindrance attack. But this other way of looking, it's like I felt how important intention and desire is.

I mean, I've been listening to you say it for years—"Desire is a maker of worlds"—and I'm like, "Yeah," but then I got it and I was like, "Oh." That's really where I'm struggling. I can see if I looked at it one way, it's amazing—like what can I do? But I'm actually just having this response of the gravity of like, can I live up to my desire and stick with that intention?

Being on this retreat, it's been so beautiful to have the intention so strongly held. And then I leave and it's a world where literally, on one level, your attention and your desires being grabbed at everywhere. So it's just, yeah, I'm just really wondering if there's words around the gravity of intention and grappling with that.

Rob: Thank you, Nicole. So do you mean—I just want to try and make sure I understand—so you mean in your life, the question is really about now that I've seen how important it is to honor my desire in the deepest sense of the word "honor," and to deeply honor my deepest desires, and I see how difficult that is to do in the world with different things pulling... What would support that? Is that what you're asking?

Nicole: Yeah, I think there's just a lot of self-doubt coming, like, just deep-rooted. Like, can I... My desire is strong and deep, and it's vast. Like, yes, I desire the jhānas, but way more than the jhānas. It's for mystery and beauty and these things that—do I even know the definition or the depth to which they go? No, I don't. And yet seeing how intention is going to make my life, I'm just feeling like, can I... like I want it, and can I do that? And there's just pain around that.

Rob: So the pain is around not knowing whether you can and the self-doubt with it.

Nicole: Yeah. Feeling the desire and not knowing about, yeah.

Rob: So I don't know you that well, but to the degree that I know you, it seems like you have done that pretty well in your life so far, but I don't know if you would agree with that. Like I said, I don't know you that well yet, so...

Nicole: Yeah, I guess I can see both. There's times that I've done it very well and times that I've failed. And I think the times when it fails is very painful. And not so much the not getting the thing, but seeing how I've let intentions fray.

Rob: Yeah, okay. So, you know, with something... I mean, there's so much to say about this, but I think what you just said is maybe the key thing. Rather than get into "I failed or I didn't fail," it's like, what just happened there? And what just happened there might be over the last ten years with a certain desire, or it might be in one interaction. I had a certain desire in a certain situation. Whoa, I just got completely sidetracked or blocked or afraid or inhibited or lost my risk-taking capability.

So to me, I wonder from what you're saying, whether the most important thing is learning from—one of the most important things is learning from when you feel like you haven't lived up to that. Is that... Just wondering if that's distracting people or not. It seems okay. It's really okay with me as long as it's not.

Here's the continued beautified version:

Perhaps one of the most important aspects is learning from those moments when you feel you haven't lived up to your intentions. When something happens and you sense you've fallen short, it becomes crucial to examine what exactly occurred. Was it fear? And if so, fear of what? What thoughts arose? What beliefs were you holding? Was there inhibition?

Desire has a profound relationship with risk-taking. How willing are we to feel fear and still take the risk? This might involve long-term visionary risks or immediate, moment-to-moment choices, depending on the entire context of our situation.

On a larger scale, I can recall several pivotal moments in my life where I took significant risks. I mentioned earlier the decision to pursue music—situations where things appeared very promising from a social perspective in one realm, yet I chose to venture into something that made others wonder, "What are you doing?" These represent long-term risk-taking. But there are also immediate moments when we're afraid to take certain risks. The key is identifying what just happened when you feel lost, when something occurred and you didn't live up to your intentions.

Another important element from what you shared is this sense of "I don't quite know what I'm desiring." To me, that's perfectly acceptable. If you're familiar with the soul-making teachings, this aligns with eros. Eros creates and discovers "beyonds" that are often completely nebulous. I might sense gorgeous, luminous divinities that I cannot articulate or even differentiate in my perception of them, yet they're pulling me forward. This is completely valid.

However, along the way to such nebulous destinations, this sensing wants to translate into practical action. A full spectrum of desire, a complete eros, encompasses both very clear choices it asks us to make here and now—or later—as well as more nebulous longings that extend into the future. This entire range is part of the fullness. Does that make sense?

There's also something worth considering: it's valuable to desire, to long for, and to risk something for goals we may well never achieve. So one important question becomes: Is it acceptable not to attain this thing, yet still give myself completely to it?

When we think imaginatively, wherever there's desire and eros for something, there will be within that constellation an image or images associated with that very desire—the angel who wants that, the self that's desired. From the very fire of desire and eros, other images should constantly arise, beckoning you toward what you love and long for, or emerging from it. These can take very potent imaginal forms, so allow them to do so.

This relates to another person's question as well. If you truly want certain things in life, you're going to disappoint some people and invite their disapproval. People will consider you selfish or criticize your choices. Depending on what you desire, some will wonder why you're less available to them, why you've become different for them in some way. This is simply part of what you must navigate.

You cannot satisfy everyone. Depending on your relational and empathic sensitivity—which you may possess to quite a degree—you're likely to feel the pain of these disappointed expectations acutely. It becomes very easy to feel guilty, to believe you must take care of this person or that person, to explain why you're not available or why you're choosing one path over another.

This is precisely how deep, strong desires often get derailed. We feel obligated to explain ourselves or to give others what they want instead of following our own path. It's challenging to be in the world with authentic desire, and even more difficult when people don't understand what you're seeking, don't value it, can't appreciate it, or consider it not worthwhile. They may doubt your ability to achieve it, among many other responses.

So that's quite hard. Someone who's more emotionally less sensitive, less pulled upon in relationship by others' needs and wishes and pain, actually has an easier time with that. I don't know, is any of this addressing what you're exploring? We could probably talk all day and night about it because it's a huge subject.

One more thing. So it sounds like what happened was potent. And in that potency, again, there are lots of different things going on. One of the things that was going on was this self-doubt. But I would wager there were lots of other things going on, and some of them were probably very beautiful and probably very empowering.

It's like, okay, all this is going on. You could actually visit every frequency and emotion that had been going on in there, but some of them, when you get to them, will be very potentially empowering. Here's self-doubt—obviously, that's potentially disempowering. It needs attention, partly for that very reason. I need to understand it.

But there might be within it, just for example, here's this thing I really, really want. And I feel that wanting. And in that wanting, another way of saying it is, here's this thing I'm devoted to. This devotion and this longing I can feel energetically. I can feel emotionally and energetically. That's something that I can really sit with.

Even if what I want is actually vague, I'm not yet clear, but the fire of it is clear, and the energy of it is clear, and the devotion in it is clear. So rather than worrying too much about getting the clarity right now about what the object is, I can come back and be with my sense of devotion. I might even get at first that it feels like it's just somewhere in the mass of burning and confused—somewhere in there is my devotion.

When I sit with my devotion, it naturally samādhi-fies the being around it. It harmonizes and energizes and I can feel that uprightness. I sit with that uprightness and that sense of devotion and I let it shape my energy body. That's a kind of prayer, even though I'm not clear exactly what I'm praying to. It does something to the body and the psyche, regularly sitting in that and feeling one's alignment.

So you can do that for a long time. You can do that for a short time. But it will do something.

That's a bit what happened. It was useful to look for the hindrance in it and then sort of tend to that, which I did by devoting this retreat to a teacher that I mentor who suffers from self-doubt a lot. So I bring her into the sits especially when that comes up and use that for that part of it.

And then a kind of fire of devotion. I was aware that once that was taken care of, there was actually—it was vague, but a sense of what I was longing for, at least just in the energy body. And that really kicked the practice into another gear the next day. But it came back last night as the sort of system of jhānas and what we're doing and maybe why you said that thing about why working towards a goal is so important. It wobbles.

What's wobbling? Going between feeling overwhelmed by the power of that desire and can I meet it, and just feeling the power of the desire.

Again, if we just talk about imaginal practice, the very doubt and wobble and fear and whatever it is—if I let myself go into that, out of that will come an image. The one who, potentially, in relation to what they love most deeply and long for, feels very unsure of themselves. The dukkha of that can take—you have to go into it though. You're not trying to pacify or talk your way or reassure it. You're actually letting that constellate as an image.

So yeah, it might get clear what I'm desiring, but it also gets clear just the desire itself. And I begin to trust that more and more, let that empower the whole being.

Okay, great. We could talk a lot more, but that's good. Some other people had their hands up earlier. Victor, please.

I wanted to tease out the term equanimity. I think you've mentioned it a few times, and I think you said the ordinary use in English of equanimity doesn't quite cover what happens in jhānic states. I was struck by how, from what I gather, Bhikkhu Anālayo uses the term equipoise as the translation of upekkhā. And I think because he says equanimity as a term can have a dampening effect.

Thoughts?

Yeah, thank you. I'm going to talk more about equanimity tomorrow, but we can say a few things now. So equanimity as a term in English—I'm not sure if I even heard it before Buddhist speak—but what's called the near enemy in dharma of equanimity is indifference. So that may be what Ānālayo is pointing to, something that can look like equanimity but actually dims the brightness.

I think he said it in the context that pleasure could be seen in the context of, "Well, there's pleasure here but dukkha is somewhere else." So it takes the brightness off the term equanimity compared to equipoise, which is sort of like a balanced stance.

I'm really happy with the word equipoise. I think, yeah, I'm not sure about the word equanimity. Equanimity—animus, you know—equal soul, equal animation is probably what it comes from. So equal what? Passion. So does that take the brightness off or does it not take the brightness off?

Equanimity is actually—we can talk about it very briefly, or we can talk really, really a lot about it. And it's actually, once we start inquiring, quite complex. I was trying to remember—I think upekkhā—I think somewhere or other I traced the word. I think in Sanskrit it's upekshā and the ikshā, upa ikshā, and I think that's to do with equal seeing. So seeing things equally.

So you could say it's equally poised in the sense of there's a balance between this and that, and even between pain and pleasure. And so at one level, yeah, that would be a good translation. Here I perceive pleasure, here I perceive dukkha or whatever. And the being is equipoised. It's not leaning towards the pleasure or away from the dukkha at one level. Yeah, that would be a good word. It's a balance of mind, something like that. And that's good at a certain level. That's really fine at a certain level.

I'm just wondering whether I should talk about this now or wait till tomorrow. I mean, for me the bigger picture is the effect of the term equanimity in Buddhist communities in relation to climate issues. That's the background.

I don't actually use the term much. I actually think equanimity doesn't really exist, which I'll explain, I hope. The other thing is exactly because of that—it very easily becomes a shadow for Buddhists. So that equanimity in relation to something like climate change very easily goes to a kind of indifference, you know, or to whatever social injustice, racial injustice, could be anything. So we have to be really careful. And of course, everyone—we all teach that the near enemy of equanimity is indifference. But it's still there as a really dangerous edge.

So there's one level of equanimity, as I said, which is an important but more superficial level. When the Buddha talks about equanimity in terms of the eight worldly conditions—have you heard that? It's praise, blame, success, failure, gain, loss, and pleasure, pain. And then we could put this word, this other translation, equipoise.

So a good practitioner at this superficial level of understanding views those things as kind of indifferent in the best sense of the word—doesn't mind if it's success or failure, doesn't mind if it's gain or loss, doesn't mind if it's praise or blame, at one level.

Of course, we can refine that a little bit and say, even with relation to climate change: yes, I care, and this is how it should be. Equanimity in the context of the brahmavihāra, equanimity in the context of really caring passionately, really with a lot of mettā, with a lot of compassion for what's happening in the world and the suffering that something like climate change is already delivering for so many people. There is the compassion, ideally. There is the mettā. There should also be the engagement as well. And it might be that the ship is sinking—and that's where the equanimity comes in. One isn't going to be incapacitated in one's efforts or totally incapacitated by grief and disempowered by grief or worry or fear. That's the best sense of equanimity at that level. Does that make sense?

But then there's a whole other level of equanimity, which I think maybe I'll speak about tomorrow, and that has more to do with this other possible etymology, upa-iksha in Sanskrit, where the iksha is seeing things equally.

We're getting into equanimity as we encounter it in the third jhana, which we already talked about, and then more fully in the fourth jhana, and then as we relate to insight practice. Let me say this very briefly for now.

Let's take this basic level, this polarity of pleasure and pain, or pleasant and unpleasant. In practice, the usual reaction to the pleasant is to want it and to try to hold it, to grasp it and bring it towards ourselves. And the usual reaction to the unpleasant is to try to push it away. That push and pull of grasping and aversion—to the degree that they are present in consciousness at any moment is the degree to which equanimity is not present. You could define equanimity that way.

So as I practice, in one way or another, letting go—and this is not a way to live one's life; it's completely not a way to live one's life, but it's a practice—in the moment of letting go of any pushing away of anything that I notice at any level, and letting go or calming any pulling towards me or hanging on at any level, if I just practice that, and there are many different ways of doing this, I notice there's a calming in the being. That calming is part of what equanimity is and looks like.

But it doesn't stop there. If I keep doing it, I will then begin to notice that the very perception—which may be the iksha, the seeing—of the pleasant and unpleasant begins to change. The very sense of them begins to change. What's unpleasant becomes less unpleasant. What's pleasant may for a little while get more pleasant, and then it goes towards more neutral, until in the end, everything becomes a kind of neither pleasant nor unpleasant vedana.

But it doesn't stop there either. It goes even deeper. If I keep doing this, letting go at really deep and subtle levels of this push-pull, the actual sensation begins to disappear. So we've gone way beyond a state of calmness in response to, or a state of okayness in response to pleasure and pain. We're actually affecting or fabricating the very perceptions of pleasure and pain.

These are practices. I can say this a thousand times, but until you actually know how to practice this, put it into practice and see it for yourself... There's a whole range here. Eventually what happens is not just that pleasure and pain disappear, but the very sensations disappear. And then actually the very world disappears. Self disappears, world disappears, time disappears.

In that state, we're not talking about equanimity in relation to anything that's pleasant or unpleasant, but it's a deep level of equanimity. That's partly why I think equanimity is actually a thing that doesn't exist, because by the time you've got real equanimity, there's nothing to be equanimous about.

Equanimity is a big subject, complex, and very much interwoven with the territory we'll get into as we go on to the fourth jhana and the other jhanas and how that meets with insight.

But in terms of what you're saying about climate change—and I know what a concern that is for you and how passionate and dedicated you are, and also living in Australia where there doesn't seem to be much consciousness about it at the moment—it's really important that we don't use certain teachings, and it could be in any spiritual tradition, to brush over or hide our noblest responses.

"Thank you, Rob, for mentioning the push and pull, which you also spoke about when you described the third jhana. When you mentioned the third jhana, you spoke of something like peacefulness that arises from quieting the push and pull. I have a question regarding that, because if I remember correctly, when you read the description of the first jhana, there was something about being secluded from the hindrances. So I was under the impression that we were done with the push and pull in the first jhana already, because aversion and greed weren't present anymore, which are the push and pull. If we're already secluded from the hindrances, where is this pushing and pulling coming from? I'm confused."

Thank you, it's really important.

Thank you, Rob, for mentioning the push and pull, which you also spoke about when you described the third jhana. When you mentioned in the third jhana, you mentioned something like peacefulness that arises from quieting the push and pull. I have a question regarding that, because if I remember correctly, when you read the description of the first jhana, there was something in the lines of "secluded from the hindrances." So I was under the impression that we were done with the push and pull in the first jhana already because aversion and greed weren't present anymore, which are the push and pull. If we're already secluded from the hindrances, where is this push and pull coming from? I'm confused.

Thank you, it's really important. It depends... I use the word clinging, and push and pull is just another word for clinging for me. But I use that word in a very elastic way, so that there are very obvious manifestations of clinging—like the hindrances, for instance. But that's really just one level. As you say, when we let go of the hindrances, a certain amount of clinging, a certain amount of push-pull has gone from our experience. But it's enough that then the being, the energy body and the being feel really good. First jhana arises.

But as I use that word, it has all kinds of a range of depths and subtlety. Maybe in the dharma world, there's a lot of teachings that don't use that word so much—it stays like quite a gross thing. Either there is clinging or there isn't. And that often goes with teachings that either there is a self—the self was there or it's not. But I view all these words—self and clinging and all of that—as spectra. They go really, really subtle.

So by the time we get to the third or fourth jhana, the amount of push and pull is way less. But even there, and I'll repeat this as we get into more territory, it doesn't stop there. There's really, really subtle clinging and push-pull even in the fourth jhana. Now, I'm sure a lot of people wouldn't agree, but that's how I use those words.

Yeah, I understand. So it's really the degree of push-pull, where in the spectrum we are in the push-pull that becomes more and more subtle levels.

In a way you could say one way of understanding what's happening in the jhanas is that we're just letting go of clinging at deeper levels or to more refined things. How do you cling to consciousness? We tend to think of clinging, as I said, or in English and in a lot of dharma, as referring to something that's actually quite gross—clinging, craving, and all that. But I really mean them as open-ended terms. Let's just see where the limit is.

It's the stillness and subtlety of the attention that allows us to see where that clinging is more subtly. But it's also framing the teachings from the beginning in a way that doesn't define things in a limited way. If I define clinging as something gross, then I'm not going to look for any more subtle clinging. But if I define it in this more open way, right from the beginning, then it's a question of, oh, well, maybe there's more. I have to get still and sensitive. I have to get down to a certain level of very little clinging to see when there's even less.

That whole process, that whole investigation of letting go of more and more clinging, is what I would call an insight investigation. Like I said, any insight way of looking—which means any insight practice as I would frame it and teach it—is doing just that. In one way or another, that's the primary thing it's doing. It may look like it's doing something very different, but that's primarily what it's doing.

At certain points, you may just be able to follow the same practice into deeper and deeper, more and more subtle levels of clinging—deeper and deeper letting go. Or you may need to tweak the practice a little bit so that you can get into subtler and subtler levels of letting go.

The way we're practicing jhana at the moment is we're not really thinking so much about letting go of clinging and where's the clinging. But there is a way—and I hope to get to it on this retreat—there is a way of practicing jhana where that's actually how you move from one jhana to another. You identify the clinging and you let go, and you can just keep and let go, and that takes you to another level.

But at the moment, that's not really how we're approaching things. We're approaching more through just getting into it, letting it ripen, enjoying it, opening to it. In a way we're approaching more just trusting the samadhi intention of enjoying and getting into something and trusting that will naturally ripen in this process.

So when I mentioned the other day that the equanimity of the third jhana arises from attenuating the push-pull, in a way that's more just a "let's understand kind of technically what's really happening here." For most of you at this point, the methodology to get to the third jhana is actually more through just getting into the second jhana and really getting satisfied.

Now we could see that satisfaction as, because I'm satisfied, I don't need to push-pull so much anymore. So it's a deep level of letting go of push-pull, but it's not the end of it. There's more. It gets subtler than that. So that point was more just wanting to be really precise about understanding things and trying to weave things together in terms of understanding, less about the practice.

The second thing, I think, is investigating the very essence of a desire. When I compare my desire for awakening—or whatever words I might use for what feels most important to me—with my desire for, say, a particular food or even for a relationship, there's something qualitatively different about them.

There's a texture to the desire for awakening that feels less fabricated, less conditioned. It has a different quality of urgency, a different kind of pull. It doesn't seem to get blown out as easily by external circumstances. When someone ridicules my spiritual aspirations, that desire doesn't just evaporate the way other desires might.

So while it's absolutely true that desire is fabricated—we're constantly being shaped by what we're exposed to, by cultural conditioning, by spiritual teachings we encounter—I think we can still discern something about the depth and authenticity of different desires. Some feel more rooted in what we might call our deepest nature, while others are clearly more superficial fabrications.

The practice becomes one of learning to distinguish between these different qualities of desire, learning to sense which ones feel most true, most aligned with our deepest sense of purpose and meaning. This isn't about finding some inherent, unchanging desire that exists independent of conditions—that would be a metaphysical position that might not hold up under scrutiny. Rather, it's about learning to sense the difference between desires that feel authentic and life-giving versus those that feel more compulsive or driven by external pressures.

Does that speak to what you're exploring?

Two different things—and obviously a ridiculous example would be your desire to eat a certain food versus something else—you can actually feel when a desire is deeper in you. There is a qualitative and quantitative difference, but we need to really begin sensing into the differences there and learning to notice, tune into, and take care of the deeper desires. Introspectively, there should be differences that you can tell. But that's a short answer for now.

And there is really—and I was thinking very much because somehow it had come up between us at some point and I devoted a chunk of time to it on those recordings—the other thing with all this is that some people have patterns. In fact, it's quite common to have patterns that... This is a jhana retreat, not a desire retreat, but anyway. Because I have talked about it a lot and I think it's important, but I don't want to spend the whole time talking about it. But it's good to know oneself in relation to desire. And what I see is that that's quite rare as well—that a person really knows, "I know my patterns with desire." It's not that I know what I want, but I actually know what happens in me with desires.

So some people, the flame can't get going. Some people, the flame goes and they can't tolerate it. Some people get confused or distracted by other ignitions that get thrown from all kinds of other sources. Some people, the flame bursts up and then somehow they don't really follow through. Or they say, "I'm going to do this and I'm going to do that," and it doesn't really follow through. What's happened? What happened over those months or whatever it is that one isn't a person of one's word? So it's really good to know oneself in relation to these things. I think it's really, really important.

I really meant it the other day when I said, in terms of significance of teachings, this is a much more significant teaching than anything I might tell you about how to move from one jhana to another—maybe even than the jhanas themselves. In fact, I would say that. It's like really understanding ourselves and really becoming mature in relation to desire—it's huge. But there's a lot of aspects to that. A lot, lot, lot of aspects to it. And I've spoken about it a lot on recordings and things. Is that okay for now?

Thank you. Okay. I've got a couple of written ones. Should I do that or is someone else right now? I've got a couple from you here, I suppose. Let me do someone else's one and we'll come back.

"I'm exploring sukha and its different nuances—the buoyant and bubbly, and more recently its soft, gentle aspect. I'm enjoying it. I feel absorbed into it. But a question keeps arising for me again and again about the difference between a mental feeling and a physical one. What is a mental feeling or an emotion exactly? I thought that all feelings could only actually be felt in the body. I do have a sense of feeling the mental aspect/emotion, but it's not really clear where in the body I'm feeling it. It just feels all over, so it's harder to probe than with the pīti. Yesterday you spoke about tuning into a frequency in the energy body, which I do, but isn't the energy body just imaginary? Maybe I'm just experiencing a hindrance of doubt. If you can distill this somewhat lengthy question and offer any answers, that will be much appreciated."

Yeah, this is important. Thank you. There's a few questions sort of woven in there. What is a mental feeling or an emotion exactly? It's a really complex thing, is what it is. So usually, usually I would say an emotion has several aspects to it. It usually has some kind of thought content or a type of thought content associated with it. Of course, once you get into the jhanas, then it's like emotions free of thoughts.

It also usually has a kind of texture of the mind. It's like the mind feels like it has a certain texture to it—agitated or spacious or calm or whatever—but even more subtle than that. But it also has a bodily aspect to it. So at least those three aspects, plus probably beliefs and the whole network of other things are a part of the complexes that we call emotions.

This business about sukha being an emotional thing and piti—two things about that. One is it's a thing from Abhidhamma, so I don't necessarily subscribe to that. Abhidhamma is Buddhist psychology and it tends to have a certain way of framing things that sometimes is useful and I find sometimes really not useful. So they classify things: when sukha is this or something like that, this is a mental feeling, this is a this, this is a that. They like putting things in categories and it's all very sort of black and white and very simple sounding, but there are lots and lots of categories of different things.

So an emotion to me is actually a complex thing. When we get down to jhanic emotion, like let's say the sukha, in a way you're talking about a simpler thing, but I would still say it's felt two ways. It's felt in the body and again in jhanic terms that's the primary thing because every time the Buddha says with the first four jhanas: "The practitioner pervades and permeates, suffuses and saturates, drenches and steeps their whole body with that quality."

Most people, I think, who haven't practiced meditation or energy body awareness would just be a bit baffled by that. What does it mean to have, let's say, happiness in one's whole body? I mean, some people might get it, but generally it's—and then to focus on that. But this is really the primary thing in jhana practice. It's the energetic vibration, the energy body vibration, so to speak, or frequency, which is an aspect of an emotion.

Now there's a mental one as well. Where is that mental one? Well, it's in the mind. But where's the mind? I don't know. It doesn't really matter. What matters in terms of practice is the primary thing is body, body, body, energy body, energy body, energy body—where it is in the body.

Once it's spread, let me backtrack and say one more thing about this piti and sukha. I've said it already. At first, when people are opening to all this, I will say something like piti is a physical feeling and then sukha is an emotional one. It's a white lie. It's just something that helps people differentiate those two at first. But after a while you'll be like well actually they're both kind of physical. They're just different vibrations physically or different ranges of vibrations physically. So it was just a little teaching device but basically they're vibrations in the body.

And then the second sort of piece of question here: "I do have a sense of feeling the mental aspect or emotion, but it's not really clear where in the body I'm feeling it. It just feels all over."

So that's perfect. You know, that's what we want. For me, it pervades the whole body. That's exactly what I want. I feel it all over, even homogeneously all over.

"So it's harder to probe than with the piti."

Not necessarily. So sometimes when the piti or the sukha, when it feels stronger in some place. So you've got three scenarios. You've got a scenario that hasn't spread yet and it won't spread this session. And then, okay, that's where I do my probing, obviously. I stop trying to spread it, but that's where I do my probing.

You've got a second scenario where it's spread, but it's not 100% homogenous. And then I take the strongest area and that's where I do my probing. Does that make sense?

And the third scenario is it's completely spread and it's completely homogenous. And then I just choose a random place. It doesn't matter if it's homogenous. And I just go into it at one point. It's like a person diving into a swimming pool. They're diving in at one point.

But once they dive in—or into a lake—once they dive in, then that very diving, that very penetrating might make them feel like they're in a different terrain. It might take them to another level in that process. So you don't have to worry about finding the perfect spot; you can just choose any place and do that.

Yesterday you spoke about tuning into a frequency in the energy body, which I do, but isn't the energy body just imaginary?

Well, the energy body is no more imaginary than anything else is imaginary. So again, it's one of those things—sometimes it's really helpful for me, I feel, or I sense for a particular person at a particular time to take the energy body as a real thing. And of course, there are loads of schools of yoga and healing and all kinds of things, shamanic healing that take the energy body as a real thing. They talk about subtle body or energy body and it's rarefied. That's fine, but I really think that has limits.

The thing about the energy body—or one of the things about the energy body that's really important to understand—is that it's very amenable to our imagination. That's not quite the same thing as saying it's totally imaginary, because when we say something's imaginary we tend to then dismiss it relative to something else. That's why I say it's as imaginary as anything else maybe.

But the energy body as we're playing with it is very sensitive and susceptible and responsive to our imagination. So if I imagine the energy moving in a certain way from my energy body, lo and behold that's what I will experience in the energy body if I keep doing that. Make sense?

And then with other people, or the same person at a different time, it's like, okay, enough now with this reifying of the energy body—you've been doing that for years. And again, the whole—it's a bit like what Jason was asking about, or someone else about blocks and unblocking things. One can get kind of obsessed about this, as if the whole of practice is getting my energy body to feel a certain way.

For those people, I might say, it's not a real thing. Actually, what's more deeply real or more usefully seen as real is just the idea that we're playing with perception. I don't think it's doubt so much as some clarity was needed there. Does that sound okay?

Very good. I think these questions are useful anyway for other people.

Which jhana does that second bright light nimitta appear in?

The bright light is quite common for some people—it can appear in any jhana or even before a jhana. It's what I call a secondary nimitta. It's just an indication that the samadhi is going well. So some people get it very associated with the first jhana, some people it only comes in the fourth jhana, some people it never comes, some people it's just their access concentration or whatever. So it's not particular to a jhana; it's just a secondary nimitta. In other words, it's not of primary importance unless we really mix it with the primary nimitta and get into it that way.

And second question: did you say that jhanas one to four had equanimity in them?

No, I didn't say that, but the Buddha said jhanas three and four had equanimity in them. But I was saying, well, hold on, that's a little misleading. So we really need to unpack, first, what's primary in jhanas three and four—it's the peacefulness, and I'll explain that about jhana four tomorrow—and unpack this whole idea of equanimity because, as we've been talking about a little bit today, it's actually quite a complex idea and we need to go a little more carefully.

From another point of view, relating to Monica's question, yeah, you could say each jhana has some degree of equanimity to it because most things are not on-off switches. It's not either you have equanimity or you don't—you have some degree of equanimity. So the first jhana, even when it's so intense that you have to peel me off the ceiling because it's just ecstasy like that, actually has some degree of equanimity in it in relation to other things.

So a lot of these things, a lot of dharma concepts are really not on-off, black or white—they're really spectra. And if we think of them as on-off, we're actually making the same mistake I mentioned about clinging or self. A lot of people report, "I was meditating and then there was no self." It's like, no, think about it more as a spectrum because what you're calling "no self" at the moment is actually just a much less fabricated sense of self. It's just lower down on the spectrum.

And if I have that idea of spectrum—repeating what I said before—in relation to equanimity, in relation to self, in relation to clinging, all these other words, then actually that's going to enable me to notice way more than I would have noticed if I just had a view of either there is self or there isn't self in a moment. Either self is being fabricated or it isn't. Either there's equanimity or there isn't.

So this idea of a spectrum, which just goes subtler and subtler, and it's part of the beauty and the art to trace it and understand it—that's really, really important.

I think this question is about territories and responsiveness. I've been trying throughout much of this retreat to figure out how to stay in one territory. I'm working in the third jhana space, and I'm wondering about what you said regarding contentment being one of the levels. I've been following this and notice there are edges where I drop out into another space. One of them is with contentment, and I'm really trying to figure out the edge of where that is—how far down to go in my experience of what's coming up in terms of contentment.

I notice in the middle range there's a very particular atmosphere, exactly as you described for the third jhana space, with contentment. When I go lighter, there's a kind of perfect contentment—quite light feeling. But then I notice I can go really very low with the contentment and still have the qualities like the sukha and peacefulness. But the contentment becomes quite a lot bigger. It's more like a deep well of rich contentment feeling rather than the perfect contentment kind of feeling. I'm wondering how this is still within the range.

When you go deeper, the contentment is not perfect—is that what you're saying?

No, it gets more rich and deeper in my experience rather than quite light and gentle—not quite uplifting, but more light and gentle. But it still feels like perfect contentment.

Well, that's fine. The contentment thing is not the primary indicator. It's just me pointing out a bandwidth that, if you really want to develop sensitivity to all these different levels, is good to know and hang out with. Might it take different flavors and colors at different times? Yes. But the primary thing is the contentment, and it really feels extremely satisfying. Then you're still in the contentment.

I want to say a couple more things. Again, there's real encouragement to marinate. Especially if different things are opening, it can be very tempting to want to just slide around everywhere and check out what's this, what's that. But as we've been emphasizing right from the beginning, the fruits of this particular set of practice—what we call jhana practice—will come from marinating. This means many, many times over and over, just putting yourself, submerging yourself and holding, sustaining something for as long as you can: an hour, two hours, longer, three, whatever, four. Just sit in something over and over and over. That's going to do something to mind, heart and body that just won't get the chance to happen if we're sliding around too much.

If you've done a lot of soul-making and imaginal practice, oftentimes one doesn't actually... One of the amazing things about soul-making practice is just a couple of minutes sometimes with an image can be incredibly potent. It's also true that a couple of minutes with a jhana can be incredibly potent, but it's much more the case that if we really marinate for much longer in a jhana, it's going to do something that it won't do in just a couple of minutes.

It's actually quite rare for a soul-making practitioner or an imaginal practitioner to really spend hours and hours and hours revisiting the same image and just really being with that. At least I haven't put that out as an offering. I haven't heard anyone really do that. It's not really what we're doing so much with imaginal practices. There's a difference here.

I'm going to say this very briefly because I know some of you don't know this territory at all about soul-making Dharma, so I'll say this for those of you who do. In case you are a soul-maker and you find yourself taking the same kind of rhythms into jhana practice—just moving quite quickly with all these lovely amazing things opening up—

When we're with an image, when we're with an erotic imaginal image, when there's eros for an image—I don't mean by that sexual eros necessarily, though it could mean that—we're doing something different. We're resonating and being with it, but we want to maintain the two-ness. Remember this from soul-making teachings? Why? Because eros needs two-ness. Eros needs the polarity and the imaginal needs the eros. Without the eros, the imaginal folds, and without the two-ness, the eros folds and therefore the imaginal folds.

In jhana practice, actually what we're doing is, as much as we can—that's the 'A' of SASSIE—can I dissolve into this?

Can I kind of dissolve my body into the peacefulness or whatever it is? So it's almost like in imaginal practice, the duality is maintained, and self doesn't dissolve into its object. There's not that even intentional direction. We maintain this polarity, this erotic tension between self and imaginal object. Lovely as that is, but we're not letting it collapse into oneness. In jhana practice, the movement is actually to let it dissolve.

In imaginal practice, the self also might start to become imaginal. Here's this wonderful imaginal object and the self also starts to become imaginal. In jhana practice, the self should become less and less of a sense of self. Back to the spectrum of self, it's actually less and less of a self. It's more and more dissolved.

So these are really, really important differences. The movement is towards less—we could say less polarity, less duality in jhana practice. Whereas in imaginal practice, you're actually sustained—not always, but for the most part, you want to sustain some sense of duality and polarity. Sometimes you can let yourself go there, dissolve that way a little bit, merge, union and all that. But if you do too much of that, it will just dissolve the whole thing.

Do we ever reach a state of complete non-duality in jhana practice? No. No matter what it might feel like. Again, here's one of those spectra. It's a spectrum of less and less separation. Not necessarily as you go more and more from one to eight, but your experience of, say, jhana number four at different times might be more or less separate, dualistic.

It never becomes—in my way of understanding—because duality is also a word that I consider a spectrum. So it's very easy to say, "That was a completely non-dualistic experience and the self was gone." It's probably not. In fact, it's definitely not. If there's a jhana, in my way of understanding this, there's still some duality. But still, because of the A being open-ended in SASSY, the movement is towards less duality.

Does this make sense for the soul-making practitioner? So there's a difference. Just check if you're getting around too much—that's a different modality, that's a different rhythm. In the jhana, it's really towards dissolving, dissolving, towards dissolving. You will never completely dissolve. You will never, however absorbed you are, however great the A is of SASSY, there can be more.

So just to delineate between those two.

A participant shared: "I feel like I have a strong erotic relationship to the jhanas and I've had this since piti began to arise, so the way I experience absorption in the jhana is kind of a temporary absorption, but I also have this long-term relationship with the jhana which is soulful and erotic in a sense, and it's very central in my experience of them."

Yes, so I mentioned this very briefly one time. There's so much information, but let me say it again. If I understand what you're saying—in soul-making teachings, we talk about eros. There is this—we define eros as this wanting or movement towards more intimacy, more closeness, more touching, more penetration, more opening with whatever it is. That could be an image, it could be an imaginal person or whatever. But that definition is, if you like, the seed definition.

The larger definition of eros means that it is—okay, it does that, there's that movement—but in doing that, it ignites and stimulates the whole soul-making dynamic, which involves psyche and logos as well. When psyche and logos get expanded, the object becomes bigger and richer and more multifaceted and more complex, has more beyonds. And then the self becomes imaginal as well.

So outside of meditation, outside of jhana meditation, one might have—and ideally to get the engines really going and the whole relationship with it—one does have an erotic relationship. There is eros in relation to the jhanas in the bigger sense, in the wider sense. There's a whole image, there's a self image: me on the path, me and the history, me and the teacher, me and the jhanas, that territory, their mystical sense. But that's outside of meditation.

In the meditation, it's eros in the smaller sense. We're not letting it go to psyche and logos because it's a kind of proliferation. And we want it simple. It's this thing and I'm just dissolving into it. We don't let the self become imaginal. We don't let the thing become more complex in a way.

We actually want to get more into it like that. So it's a different approach - there's eros, but it's the small version, the seed definition. We can explore this distinction more another time, but I think it's quite important.

There are just a couple of other points I want to touch on before we end. Again, this relates to context. Right now we've been discussing soul-making practice, desire, and equanimity. Yesterday we talked about emotions. Sometimes you hear - perhaps less so these days - that jhanas are dangerous because what you're doing is suppressing emotion. You could be bypassing, engaging in spiritual bypassing, or suppressing emotions related to traumas that are really important to address.

I think as you do more jhana practice, you'll realize more and more that there isn't really suppression happening. The whole idea will become obviously incorrect, at least the way we're practicing it. This is not what's occurring here.

But the wider point is that there's no single practice that's complete and perfect. We really need to have this sense of a larger context. When we're doing jhana practice, yes, we do have a certain leaning or preference in how we relate to difficult emotions when they arise - as I mentioned in the opening talk. But then I have a second-order preference, a third, and a fourth. There's a certain leaning in that direction.

When we do other practices, we'll reverse that order. Is there a danger of spiritual bypassing? Yes, there is. Does everyone know that term? It's like avoiding some issue by hanging out in a nice space, in this case. But we can spiritually bypass through any practice, and there are other dangers. No single practice avoids all dangers or is without pitfalls.

If I never relate to emotions in the way we're exploring on this retreat - this inquiry into whether something might be a hindrance at its root, giving attention there and letting the mind develop its loveliness - what might I miss? Sometimes when you let the mind develop its loveliness, a difficult memory comes up within that loveliness. Very occasionally, you can place that difficult memory in the loveliness and see what happens. Sometimes it's very clear that I'm not suppressing anything - I'm actually placing it there, or it's arising naturally. There's no sense of blocking or inhibiting emotional responses.

There's something we can learn about emotions through jhana practice that's much more difficult to learn through other modalities or modes of practice. The danger of not doing jhana practice is that we don't learn those particular things about emotions. Are they the complete and final truth about emotions? No, they're not. They're just one perspective, one aspect. But to have this range of understanding, possibility, freedom, and skill with emotions - that's really precious.

We're operating within a certain context here. Of course, I could be in psychotherapy or working with emotions in other ways. Then at some point, someone might ask whether I'm engaging in sociopolitical or ecological bypassing - somewhat akin to what Victor mentioned. There's every possibility of that as well.

There have been critiques of all kinds of spiritual and psychological practices: that I'm getting so absorbed in this particular thing and believing in its reality that I've neglected something else. There's no one practice that will take care of everything. What's really important is the bigger picture - how am I seeing this within a larger mandala of practices that will do their best to cover the whole terrain of what it means to be human, seeing things from different angles and perspectives, working with things in different ways. That's really important.

One final point before we end. How long have we been here? I know it probably feels like decades for some people, but how long? Thirteen days? Usually, around the third or fourth evening of a week-long insight retreat, as I ring the bell for the final sitting, I would say something like: "Check in with how you're feeling right now. It's the end of the daily schedule, but maybe there's actually energy there and you're just going to bed out of habit. Or maybe you feel tired, but actually, if I look into it, it's aversion that's making me tired. Maybe I want to sit up and explore that a little bit."

There would be encouragement to see what's possible in terms of extending the effort on a macro level. So it's thirteen days now, and I don't know where each of you are - you're probably all in different places. But now I'll say this to everyone, though it's one of those things I should have mentioned at the beginning. I thought it was obvious from the way the schedule looked.

The rhythm of retreat extends beyond our formal schedule. While we gather as a group between 9:00 and 9:30 in the evening, the hall remains open. As retreats lengthen, practitioners often discover different rhythms emerging, with much more energy becoming available. Sometimes we find ourselves naturally rising or retiring at unusual times.

It's worth examining: how much of our daily rhythm stems from mere habit? Sometimes fear drives our choices—we worry about being tired tomorrow. Sometimes subtle aversion masquerates as tiredness. We think we need sleep, but actually we're pushing things away very gently, and the mind closes down. Going to bed becomes a way of avoiding what's present.

Similarly, the meditative day need not begin at 6:45. That may suit your rhythm, but I invite you to listen inwardly, feeling what seems possible and right, sensing your energy capacity. If you're uncertain, experiment a little. While the old practice of progressively reducing sleep has fallen out of favor—and I don't think it's wise—there is value in listening deeply, discovering your rhythms, and if you're unsure, genuinely experimenting.

All practice spaces remain available during morning work periods, at lunch, after lunch. We've been exploring effort on the micro level—that moment-to-moment capacity to lean back metaphorically into greater receptivity, or to intensify attention right now. This is crucial. But there's also the macro level regarding the rhythm of your day.

Your day can breathe naturally, yet we want to remain listening, responsive, stretching ourselves, experimenting. Sometimes we think, "I know I'm an over-striver, so I shouldn't stay up late or rise early or sit so much." But remember—opening the heart, which we've emphasized throughout this retreat, isn't mutually incompatible with spending more time in formal meditation or extending your effort. If you practice one, the other doesn't disappear.

This time is precious. I truly mean it when I say don't pressure yourself about these three weeks. Yet simultaneously, I hope you sense this preciousness. We're already thirteen days in. Time flies, circumstances change, and some opportunities won't return.

Rather than operating from "should," approach this with sensitivity, attunement, responsiveness, experimentation. How much am I sitting? How much am I exploring my edges? What habitual patterns emerge around formal practice, bedtime, rising time? How much stems from habit? How much from subtle fear? How much from gentle aversion?

Instead of formulas—everyone should sleep exactly this many hours—I invite you to extend that same sensitivity, attunement, responsiveness and experimentation to this domain as well. Play with it. See what unfolds, without any sense of obligation. But we must experiment to discover certain truths and recognize what's possible.

Let's rest together in some quiet now.

CHAPTER 215

The Fourth Jhāna

Rob Burbea · 1h31

> In this comprehensive exploration of the fourth jhāna, Rob Burbea guides practitioners through the most refined of the rūpa jhānas, characterized by profound stillness and equanimity (upekkhā). Drawing from the Buddha's classical descriptions in the suttas, he examines how this state manifests as a translucent, luminous stillness that can feel like 'breathing the air of another world.' The talk addresses the cessation of breath perception, the phenomenon of physical leaning forward, and the subtle distinction between absence of emotion and the deep peace that pervades this state.
> Burbea discusses the progression from third to fourth jhāna through increased refinement and the letting go of pleasure and pain, exploring the Buddha's somewhat puzzling descriptions of abandoning sukha and dukkha. He emphasizes the jhāna's qualities of purity, brightness, and imperturbability, while examining different levels of equanimity - from equanimity based on singleness versus multiplicity. The teaching includes practical guidance on cultivation through tuning to stillness within the third jhāna, dissolving body and mind into luminous awareness, and developing the subtle skills needed to maintain this extremely refined frequency of consciousness.

So we talked about the third jhāna, which is characterized by its primary nimitta of that very exquisite, tender and lovely peacefulness. That's what's really characterizing it. I've pointed out at several stages now that this tender and lovely peacefulness and the exquisiteness of it is a very refined place—a very refined realm, a very refined state, a very refined texture.

Again, if you're not sure whether you've definitely reached this level—maybe you've been there before, maybe it feels peaceful and equanimous, maybe it feels very deep—the refinement is one of the things that tells you you've moved deeper.

Now refinement means more than just calming. Certainly when you move from pīti, which can have a lot of waves in it, to something like the third jhāna, there's a calming, and there's the peacefulness. But by refinement, I would use the analogy of different kinds of cloth. One cloth can be quite coarse—my jeans here, the cloth is quite coarse. A refined cloth actually has fewer fibers in it, less material, less substance to it.

This is trying to articulate what we mean by refined. It's almost gossamer-like in its refinedness at this level. Things are getting really, really refined. To say it's more refined is more than to say just that it's calmer. It is calmer, but its texture is very, very refined in that sense, like a refined material.

Some of you may know states of very deep relaxation. Some of you may even have experimented a little with sleep yoga practices, dream and in-between dream states. There are states that are very peaceful where really not much is happening, where the mind is not moving anywhere. But compared to something like the third jhāna, they don't have that refinement. They're thicker, more kind of velvety. They can be helpful, but when we talk about the peacefulness of the third jhāna, we're really talking about a very refined quality. That's part of what helps with the discernment.

But today I'd like to go on and talk about the fourth jhāna. Again, every time we move in the teachings or progress in the teachings, just a reminder about pacing. We're going on in the teachings to the fourth jhāna, but what's your pacing? That's the more important question. Where's your playground right now? The playground of your learning edge, the playground where you're spending most of your time marinating, exploring the elements of mastery. That's what will really help rather than zipping through at the pace that I'm going through, which will even get faster in the coming days because I've got some medical appointments.

So really, the encouragement to discern and attune your whole being and your practice to your sense of your own playground, your learning edge, in dialogue with us. That's where you hang out, that's where you have your fun, that's where you work and play and marinate.

But the fourth jhāna—let's go back to the Buddha. He's gone through jhānas one, two, three, with both their more technical descriptions and then each one with their simile, with the lotus ponds. After the third jhāna, he says: "And furthermore, with the abandoning of pleasure and pain—as with the earlier disappearance of elation and distress—he enters and remains in the fourth jhāna, which is purity of equanimity and mindfulness, neither pleasure nor pain. He sits permeating the body with a pure, bright awareness so that there is nothing of his entire body unpervaded by pure, bright awareness."

His simile is: "Just as if a person were sitting wrapped from head to foot with a white cloth so that there would be no part of their body to which the white cloth did not extend, even so, the practitioner sits permeating their body with a pure, bright awareness. There is nothing of their entire body unpervaded by pure, bright awareness." That's his description of the fourth jhāna.

Technically, the jhāna factors are just two now. Ekaggatā, which we've had in everyone—this "with one thing prominent," that's how I'm translating it. One thing is prominent; the mind is gathered around and in and with one thing prominent. And that one thing prominent is the primary nimitta, which is technically upekkhā. And upekkhā, as we've been talking about the last few days, is equanimity. So technically, at least in the commentaries and in the Buddha's teachings, the two jhāna factors here are ekaggatā and upekkhā—one thing prominent and equanimity.

We talked about equanimity a little bit already. We'll talk about it a little bit more today and perhaps even more as the retreat goes on. If I had to find what I think is the most helpful and accurate English word that encompasses the experience here and points us in the right direction, I would say stillness. There is equanimity and that's important, but I would say stillness.

What strikes one almost overwhelmingly is being transfixed in and by an extremely refined, translucent stillness. That's the texture and the experience. We talked about refinement with the third jhana, and it's even more refined here. This is a really important discerning factor: Am I moving in the right direction? Do I need to shape this a little more? Have I gone off on a sidetrack?

It's extraordinarily refined. The cloth is now translucent. It's so subtle, so refined in its texture—the substance of the space that one is in—that it's as if it's translucent. It's also a very bright space. Not for everyone, not always, but it's very common at this point to have a white light. And that white light is the stillness. The stillness is the white light.

Technically, I would call it a secondary nimitta. This white light can come up earlier, but here it's an almost breathtaking white light of stillness. Usually it's a secondary nimitta. Sometimes people can have it as very pitch black, but more commonly there's this bright white light as the stillness, mixed with the stillness. Technically it's a secondary nimitta, but probably by this point it's quite organically mixed so that it is the stillness. The light is the stillness, the stillness is the light.

This light—there's a brightness in the mind, and in a way that brightness is just a sign, signal, manifestation, reflection of the brightness of presence at that point, the aliveness of the mind. That's one way of understanding what's actually happening there. It's a reflection of the energy in the mind of being present, of being conscious.

When we read the Buddha's description, does it sound maybe less appealing than the other ones? A little less exciting than the lotus pond business and all the upwelling of happiness? But there's something—I want to translate it into experiential terms—almost stunning here, breathtaking. One feels this still light, this very, very refined still light. It's almost as if one is in another realm, breathing the air of another world, to quote an old poet.

In fact, somewhere in the Pali Canon, the Buddha gives it the synonym, the nickname, "the beautiful." It's called the beautiful. So hopefully this helps give a bit more sense than something that might sound disappointing. And again, like all the other jhanas, he refers to it as an escape, nisaranam. The Buddha talks that way about the jhanas at times, and this is also a sense we can have in it.

Once you're in this space, it really can feel like one is in another world. And that world is an escape from all the pleasure and pain and all the shakiness and all the complexity and difficulty of the world of the senses. So there is this way of experiencing it as an escape from this world in a dualistic relationship or comparison. This is a better place. And we can have that sense of being in this other realm.

But like with the third jhana we talked about, there's this possibility for the aftereffect of that experience to spill out onto the world and color our sense of the world, so that the essential nature of things, the essential nature of this world that we all agree on and feel that we inhabit, is perceived to be essentially stillness. It's the same process—where before it was perceived to be essentially peacefulness, now essentially stillness.

So there's the dualistic conception—a duality with the world where this is an escape and it's a much better place to be. There's that kind of thrust, both of teaching and experience. Then there's the thrust of: here's an experience and it opens my eyes, opens my senses and my felt sense of what this world really is and what the nature of this world really is. It's much less dualistic because then the world can be seen as being truly, in essence, this luminous transcendent stillness.

Much less dualistic.

And as we explore the third jhana, there's a third possibility emerging from the Buddha's teaching, where he emphasized all the jhanas as perception attainments on the way to pointing something out about the nature of perception—about the malleability of perception, about the dependent arising and thus the emptiness of all things.

So you could see it seemingly dualistically, seemingly non-dualistically, and in a way that transcends both because it understands the dependent arising of the perception of duality or non-duality, the dependent arising of this or that.

All this becomes really important when we come to understanding not just insight, but also where we're going with the path. What are we aiming for? What is liberation? And what does our path suggest about our relationship with the world? What kind of relationship and stance and view of the world does an awakened being have? A liberated being.

Do they see it as something to escape from, never to be reborn again into this world? There's a kind of dualistic conception, but there are other possibilities as well. It might sound like a technical point at this stage, but a lot ends up hinging on this—about how we want to live, about how we treat the planet, about our sense of awakening, all of that. We will return to this.

In the fourth jhana, the breath stops. One is no longer actually breathing, as far as one can tell. If you stay with the breath as your primary object all the way through, this will become very clear. The breath grows more and more subtle until eventually there is no breath. Or you might notice it, so to speak, out of the corner of your eye if you're doing another practice.

How is it that we don't die then? I don't know the answer to this. I assume we're breathing very, very subtly, and there's such stillness in the being at that point that we barely need to move any oxygen. Maybe others who know more about biology could explain it better, but that's my understanding.

One does continue to breathe, but technically the suttas say the breath stops, and most teachers would say the breath stops. You would be hard-pressed to find a perception of the breath there, even if breath was your main object. So the perception of the breath stops. My assumption is you're somehow still breathing, but because of the stillness and whatever is happening, the amount of oxygen actually moving to sustain the organism for sometimes quite long periods is very small. I don't actually know what's going on—it's neither here nor there, just thought I'd mention it.

The citta, though, is really captivated and transfixed by this translucent, very refined stillness—this sense of a beautiful realm of stillness. And again, it's still a rupa jhana. As the Buddha says, it's still pervading the whole body. This luminous stillness pervades the whole body. The body has become that.

So the citta is captivated and transfixed. And again, like the other jhanas, once you've gained quite a bit of experience with it, moving in and out of that jhana, you might begin to feel like, oh, now I actually have to learn how to develop the steadiness of my focus to stay steady on this really refined frequency, this really refined luminous texture. As always, sometimes at first it feels effortless, and then afterwards you start to realize there's subtle work and play to be done here. One aspect is simply learning to stay with this very refined stillness.

Another thing that can happen experientially at this stage is that the felt center of the citta, the felt center of awareness, can drop. It might have dropped already in the second and third jhanas. Some people experience the center of the piti often around their face or throat. Sometimes people experience the center of the happiness around the heart chakra. When you get into the peacefulness, it's sometimes lower in the belly, and with the stillness it can feel like it's even lower—if I'm sitting on a chair, somewhere under here is where the center of my awareness can feel like it is.

This is a completely secondary phenomenon, so don't latch onto that. For some people, this is what they notice, and then they use that as an indicator or barometer of which jhana they're in. Not a very good idea because it's a secondary phenomenon. It's not reliable. We want to be really clear, as always: What's the primary nimitta here? This is what's telling me where I am if I'm wanting to map it. This is what's discerning between the different qualities. That's actually quite important. I'm mentioning it as a thing you might notice in your experience.

If you don't notice it, no problem at all. It really doesn't matter. But if you do notice it, be careful that you're not latching onto that as your primary indicator.

I don't know what Jason was referring to, but I also find the Buddha's descriptions somewhat confusing and puzzling. He said something like... let me find it again. He described the fourth jhana as arising "with the abandoning of pleasure and pain" - you could also say sukha and dukkha - "as with the earlier disappearance of elation and distress." That's how this particular English translation renders it; the Pali terms are somanassa and domanassa. So with the abandoning of all that, but also with the earlier disappearance - if something had been abandoned earlier, the monk enters and remains in the fourth jhana.

I won't spend too long on this, but let me address it briefly. The "earlier disappearance of elation and distress" - what could that be? Why is it even coming up now? Something has disappeared earlier. It could be the earlier disappearance of piti and the hindrances - piti as elation and the hindrances as distress. The hindrances disappeared in the first jhana, the piti disappeared in the third jhana, so it could be related to that.

Or, probably more accurately with these Pali words somanassa and domanassa, they may refer more to the distress when one actually sees samsara - when one sees the fact that we're living in a world of impermanent things, and even pleasant things are imper-manent. There's a kind of distress of the renunciate in that recognition. The elation comes when one realizes there's a path and has confidence that one can follow that path.

I don't know. I've never heard a meditation teacher dwell much on this, and I'm certainly not going to. When you go into the scholarly side, there's a bit of debate. What's he talking about here? Why is he suddenly introducing these terms that he hasn't used before? I don't think it matters too much.

The other phrase - "abandoning of pleasure and pain" - is slightly odd as well, because you could say "with the subsiding of pleasure and pain." But abandoning is something we do deliberately. The Pali word is pahana, which is also what the Buddha uses when you abandon unskillful ethical behavior. You abandon this or that unwholesome, unskillful quality.

I don't actually think it matters, but what it could be pointing to is what we talked about yesterday when this question came up several times about equanimity. If "abandon" means deliberately letting go of clinging to pleasure or pain - and clinging can be pushing away as well in my language - clinging, pushing away, pulling towards, or hanging onto pleasure and pain. In other words, if I abandon the push-pull, that's something I can do deliberately.

Actually, in this case, the way I would understand it, I'm not even completely abandoning it, because if you remember what we said yesterday, there's actually a whole spectrum here of really, really subtle levels of push-pull clinging. So if I abandon them a lot, but not quite all the way, then what I'm going to end up with, following on from what we said yesterday, when there's less push-pull, it attenuates the vedana. The very pleasantness and unpleasantness eventually just attenuate and become neither pleasant nor unpleasant. So the dominant vedana becomes the neutral one because I've abandoned not so much the pleasure and pain, but I've abandoned any reactivity - or I've abandoned a lot of the reactivity.

It actually gets, as you say, confusing. Why is he introducing this now? Because it seems to suggest another way of going into the jhana through playing with this push-pull dynamic.

So two things. One is about that - okay, so pleasure and pain decrease, pleasant and unpleasant decrease, and one is left with neither pleasant nor unpleasant. But what one can say about that "neither pleasant nor unpleasant" that one is left with is that it's very, very nice. And if it's not, something's not right. It's not the fourth jhana we're talking about. It's very nice and very enjoyable. It's really, again, an improvement over the third jhana and is felt and experienced that way. And it's also somehow a kind of neutral vedana. So that's one thing to bear in mind.

The second, and possibly more important point, is this: all this talk about abandoning pleasure and pain and the earlier disappearance of elation and distress and the different possibilities of what that might mean...

There's a whole scholarly debate here about the precise textual interpretations, with scholars debating whether particular suttas contain mistakes, searching for Chinese parallels and engaging in extensive analysis. But ultimately, I would say it basically points to equanimity. And that's all we need to worry about, I think. That's probably what matters most.

Remember, we were defining equanimity yesterday during the Q&A as not an on-off switch—not black or white, where you either have it or you don't—but rather a spectrum. To the degree that there is equanimity, to that degree there is the reduction of push and pull. There is the reduction of clinging. So equanimity exists on a spectrum.

Another way of understanding this spectrum is that it represents decreasing push-pull, decreasing clinging. Does that make sense?

So I think that's all we need to really understand here. The fourth jhana is pointing to a state of deep equanimity. And as I mentioned yesterday, there are different ways and different contexts in which the Buddha talks about equanimity, and it's a really fascinating subject.

This fourth jhana is what the Buddha would call equanimity based on singleness. This stands in contrast to what he describes on other occasions as equanimity based on multiplicity. So we have equanimity based on singleness versus equanimity based on multiplicity.

What is this singleness and multiplicity of phenomena? Equanimity based on multiplicity means equanimity in relationship to many phenomena happening, many things occurring in the senses. But this fourth jhana is not that, because everything has pretty much disappeared. There is just this translucent, refined, beautiful white stillness—bright white light stillness. The body and everything else has dissolved into just that.

So it's an equanimity based on there being nothing else happening. It's just that single, unified state. Do you understand? This is versus equanimity based on multiplicity, which we touched on yesterday.

An example was when the Buddha talks about the eight worldly conditions: praise and blame, pleasure and pain, success and failure, gain and loss. Victor was asking about the word equanimity in this context. We can have those conditions or those opposites, and we can have equanimity in relationship to those perceptions.

There's the perception of praise and blame. This person tells me I'm wonderful. Another person tells me I'm an idiot, whatever it might be. And the mind can have equanimity in relation to both. What that means at this level—which is very important but represents a more superficial level of equanimity—is equipoise. Equanimity comes from "equi-" meaning equal feeling toward both. I'm not getting super excited and glad when this person praises me, then super depressed or angry when someone blames me. There's equipoise—equal feeling toward opposites. It's not that I like this and don't like that, prefer this or get excited about this while feeling elated about this and distressed about that. This is equanimity in relation to the multiplicity of phenomena. Clear enough?

But again, as I pointed out yesterday in the Q&A, we can have deeper levels of equanimity. For example, following the example I used yesterday about the state of the vastness of awareness—when consciousness opens up and, because of the openness of consciousness and the way one is practicing, it's like letting everything just belong to the space, that vast space of awareness.

After a time it might seem like the bird that was just singing is simply coming out of that silent awareness, and then the sound just disappears back into it. One experiences this with body sensations, thoughts, and everything else. They're all just emanating from what starts to feel like a mystical, divine, forever-lasting space of peaceful, transcendent awareness. Things simply arise out of that mystical source and disappear back into it.

And then my job as a meditator at that point is simply to let them come and let them go back. Let them be. It's not mine. Let the space contain everything, and let all these phenomena belong to the awareness.

You can hear in what I've just described that there's a relationship. One is practicing a relationship of let it be, let it come, let it go, let it be. Can you hear that? It's a really beautiful way of practicing, an extremely fruitful way of practicing. There's tremendous potential there. It's not particularly difficult—just something that with the right setup of practice, staying with it again and again, practicing that relationship of letting everything belong to the space, letting it come, letting it go, letting it belong to the space.

The very mystical beauty of that space starts to help you let go. It's like the space itself is not doing anything, but the sense of it is almost as if it can do the work. It can do the work of just being there, holding things mystically, being a source—I don't know what you'd call it—a resting place of phenomena. It's almost like the space does the work.

Technically speaking, you're engaging a certain way of looking—an insight way of looking—which is just letting be, letting go, letting go, letting go. This technically means less clinging, less push and pull. Do you understand? Less push and pull. That takes the whole thing deeper and deeper over time.

It might deepen so that the ugly sound and the beautiful sound start to lose their associated vedanā. Exactly what I was saying before starts to happen. The pleasant and unpleasant begin to fade into more neutral phenomena. That neutrality may be impregnated with this mystical divinity, mystical silence, the mystical nature of awareness. But it's not in the particularity of an individual sound that it's pleasant or unpleasant. They've all got that quality, even the ugly sounds.

So the equanimity can deepen, and it can deepen to the sense of one taste, which I mentioned in relation to the third jhāna. Everything in this vastness of awareness—all the sounds, all the sensations, all the thoughts, whatever comes up—can begin at some point to feel like its true essence, its true substance is the same. And that substance is, in this case, mystical, divine, lasting-forever awareness.

So there's a kind of oneness of substance that emerges there. In contrast to a more superficial level of equanimity where we were equanimous in relation to two things that were opposite—praise and blame, pleasure and pain—because everything is one substance, the opposites lose their meaning. They're no longer opposites anymore because they're the same thing, the same substance. They're all, in this case, divine awareness, the awareness of God, whatever you want to call it.

There are many other possibilities that function in the same way, unfolding similarly. A similar thing could happen with a kind of mystical love or mystical compassion—all kinds of possibilities. Really, really lovely. Very available. We just need to set up practice in the right way and follow it.

Lovely as it is, it's still not the end of the road, nor is it the deepest end of equanimity. As I also mentioned yesterday, the ultimate limit of equanimity that's possible is when there are no objects arising anymore because the fading has not just faded the pleasure and pain, the pleasant and unpleasant vedanā—it's actually faded any sense of any object or phenomenon or sensation as well.

So in that ultra-deep equanimity, there are no objects, things, sensations, or phenomena in relation to which a person can be equanimous. There's a strange paradox in the depth of equanimity: the truest equanimity can't really be regarded as equanimity because there's nothing there to be equanimous about.

Here we have in the fourth jhāna an instance of equanimity based on singleness, in complement to other instances where the Buddha talks about equanimity based on multiplicity.

I think it's mostly true to say—predominantly true to say—that at this point in the fourth jhāna, if you check what's the emotion, the most likely and most accurate answer, the answer that's most prevalent, would be that there isn't an emotion. The emotions have been pacified in that state. There's an absence or a pacification of emotion.

Let me say a bit about that and come back to it, perhaps qualifying that statement. This is interesting, you know. This subject of emotion as human beings—I've said it's one of those subjects that I don't think there's any end for us. There shouldn't be an end for us as human beings of our exploration of emotion, even just in our conception of emotion, let alone what we do with emotions and how we relate to them.

Here, what happens—what can actually be quite common for human beings—is that we don't receive much cultural support for this reality: many people are genuinely afraid of their emotions. When a strong emotion arises, there's often a lack of confidence: "I'm not sure I can tolerate this or be with it. I won't end up as a puddle on the floor, or a nervous wreck, or completely out of control."

People relate to this fear in different ways, but it exists primarily because our culture rarely provides training for working skillfully with the heart. To me, dharma practice should be, over time, broadening and deepening the capacity of the heart. We can learn to hold tremendous emotion—we can hold intense emotion.

Consider the grief at what's happening in our world right now. This is genuinely hard to bear, hard to hold. It may be that for many people, this is one reason why—and I don't know if this is true, but perhaps—species loss and climate change and what I used to call species extinction (though I think a more accurate term might be species extermination, mass species extermination) represent simply too much grief to bear. So people avoid it. If you look at what receives the most views each day in newspapers, climate change articles rarely make the top ten.

The same pattern can emerge with personal grief, or even with joy. Sometimes—and we've discussed this bandwidth of happiness—for some people there's a sense of "okay, that's enough now. Can I move on to something else?" Can we hold that much joy? Can we allow that much energy of piti to flow through us? Can we hold that much grief? Can we hold skillful anger or frustration when it arises in ways that are truly large and beneficial?

To me, a huge part of the dharma path involves actually broadening and deepening the capacity—the holding capacity—of the heart. We receive very little training for this in our culture.

But in addition to expanding our capacity for intensity, there's the possibility of developing through dharma practice what we've emphasized from the very beginning: this sensitivity and refinement. This extends not just our range of emotional intensity, but also our range of emotional types—emotions we become aware of, that we notice, that we can tune into. There's tremendous beauty in having this extended palette in our inner life, and then relating from that richness to others, to our beloveds, to the rest of the world, to ourselves, to art.

To me, this is also profoundly important.

But there is, as I mentioned, often a kind of fear among many people in our culture regarding their emotional life. "I'm okay with this range, but if it gets too intense in one direction or another, I'm really not sure I'm okay. I'm really not sure I will be okay."

Yet correspondingly, there can also be—for some people, perhaps even the same person at different times—a fear of the absence of emotion. So when we speak of an absence of emotion in the fourth jhana, sometimes that can sound unsettling. "I'm not sure I like the sound of that," or there might be an idea that this can't be healthy.

Sometimes these ideas about that state—and it's important to remember it's just a temporary state—arise from concepts woven into one's current worldview based on what one is working through psychologically.

I remember when I started meditating, I went a little nuts for a couple of years, as I mentioned briefly. Part of my rehabilitation involved psychotherapy and becoming deeply interested in—and receiving real help with—my emotional life, which had been either extremely volatile without my understanding it, or cut off from certain emotions entirely. I engaged in extensive exploration and opening with emotions, and this work was tremendously helpful.

But I could easily have swung into the opposite view: "If emotion is quiet, then there must be suppression. If emotions are quiet at any point, this must have unhealthy long-term consequences. Authentic being requires emotion—and probably difficult emotion, because those are the more authentic ones."

These kinds of views are actually not uncommon. So there can be, for some people, a fear of emotion. There can be, for other people or the same person at different times, a fear of the quieting, a fear of the absence of emotions. This is an interesting phenomenon to investigate.

Having said there's an absence of emotion in the fourth jhana, it's actually—like all these things—not quite so simple or black and white, because of several factors.

First, I would say the fourth jhana still contains happiness. It somehow still has happiness within it, but it's so almost invisibly woven into the texture, so impalpably woven into the fabric of the state, so subtle that it's implicit rather than explicit. It takes considerable time to even notice it.

This makes perfect sense, because this state was born out of happiness. Moving through the jhanas, the fourth jhana emerged from happiness—from the happiness of the second jhana and the refined happiness of the third jhana. But this happiness isn't something you notice initially.

I would say it's definitely present. And certainly in the beginning levels of the fourth jhana, it still contains what we might call the echoes or embers of the third jhana's sukha and peacefulness—that truly warm, gorgeous peacefulness.

The beginning of the fourth jhana retains these embers—those echoes and remnants from the third jhana's sukha and profound peacefulness. That warm, gorgeous peacefulness still lingers, casting subtle emotional hues and colors throughout this refined space.

Here again, I must contradict what I said earlier about the absence of emotion. The fourth jhana, like all the jhanas, contains metta within it—though now it remains hidden, deeply embedded in the fabric of the state itself.

I've always found it fascinating when the Buddha describes right intention, the second factor of the Noble Eightfold Path. What does he say these intentions are? He defines them as the intention toward renunciation, the intention toward non-ill will, and the intention toward non-cruelty.

Now, technically speaking, ill will is the far enemy of metta, and cruelty is the far enemy of compassion—they are direct opposites. So why didn't the Buddha simply say "metta and compassion" instead of "non-ill will and non-cruelty"? Sometimes you'll see it translated that way, but I think he chose these particular words deliberately.

He's making a subtle linguistic distinction that allows legitimacy for states exactly like the fourth jhana. Here we find deep equanimity where metta remains pregnant within the experience, but the state itself is characterized by non-ill will and non-cruelty. It's definitely free from these negative qualities, yet the positive emotions aren't necessarily in the foreground.

This careful language creates space for exploring states where everything appears to go quiet, where metta and compassion aren't always foremost, yet they remain woven into the fabric of the experience. So while the fourth jhana can feel like a pacification or absence of emotion, this isn't quite accurate. As always, nothing is as black and white as it first appears.

Several of you have shared how certain images sometimes arise—very briefly or much in the background—that help ignite a jhana or support access to the primary nimitta. These images don't appear as discursive thoughts but as something subtly supporting the entire experience, propping it up from behind the scenes.

The Buddha's image of being wrapped in white cloth has served this function for me—wrapped in a cloth of pure, luminous stillness. These background images work in that very tinctural way we discussed, in an extremely subtle manner. If I focus too much on the image itself, it becomes more like an imaginal practice. But when they remain very much in the background, they somehow help consolidate and deepen the entire experience, allowing the primary nimitta to become richer—not richer with more imagery, but richer in its essential quality.

One image I used to experience was lying at the bottom of a clear pond filled with lotuses. Picture crystal-clear water, perhaps ten or twenty feet deep, and I'm resting on the bottom, gazing upward at the light filtering down through the water. There's complete rest in this vision—the mind simultaneously so alive and so deeply at peace within this luminosity. Somehow I could breathe underwater in this imaginal space.

Another image that would arise made no rational sense whatsoever. I would feel as if I'd been "completely hung out to dry"—like hanging on a clothesline with pegs on my arms, just suspended there. This doesn't even sound comfortable, yet what it represented was the complete satisfaction that began in the third jhana, now ramped up beyond all conceivable limits. It was as if I'd been thoroughly wrung out, put through the washing machine of this entire process, and then simply hung there in complete fulfillment.

These remain very much secondary nimittas—subtle supportive elements that can help deepen the experience or provide gentle indications of the state's quality.

I believe it's in some commentary that mentions two levels of the fourth jhana, though I'm uncertain what specific levels they're referencing. I could certainly delineate two or even three levels myself, though the exact categorization doesn't really matter.

But what matters is, am I getting to know the territory? Am I getting familiar with the different ranges and substates and textures of this whole space?

So in a way that, yes, this thing about being hung out to dry, that peacefulness and complete contentment that was there at the beginning of the third jhāna, and the deepening echoes of the warmth and tender peacefulness of the third jhāna—they characterize, you could say, the beginning stages of the fourth jhāna. That may be one level we could talk about.

But as it deepens, even those things begin to fade, and they almost become indiscernible, and there's just left this kind of purity, this pure stillness, pure non-movement, pure absence of solidity—free of solidity—pure presence, pure awareness, pure consciousness. There's a sense of purity there that's very beautiful and that comes to predominate.

You could also divide it another way, again like we divided the third jhāna: there's the stillness here in the energy body space, but one might also, as it deepens, get a sense of a much larger realm of stillness. But again, as we said with the third jhāna, the primary focus wants to be in the energy body space. I'm not yet going out there—that comes later. I'm not yet exploring the far reaches of this realm of stillness. I want to be primarily here for the fourth jhāna to really consolidate and deepen and really bathe in its nectar.

You could make three levels or two levels—this two or that two. It doesn't really matter. For me it doesn't matter. I think the invitation though is again to discern more, to get to really know spaces inside out and get really familiar with them.

So how does it progress to the fourth jhāna? How do we do that? Well, mostly through the maturing of the third jhāna. Over time, long-term maturing of the third jhāna will just deliver the fourth jhāna—it should at some point.

Eventually, how do we get to the fourth jhāna? Well, the same way with all that mastery business. Eventually, it's just by subtle intention. Through the familiarity of going to this space, this level, the fourth jhāna eventually, we just remember that stillness, remember that state, remember that beauty and purity, and it can come back just from the intention.

What can help, if it's ready to mature, if it's maturing and just needs a little help—and sometimes you don't even need to do that little bit of nudging—but what can help is noticing within the third jhāna, noticing and tuning to, well, let's say two things: the stillness and equanimity in the third jhāna.

So third jhāna has peacefulness, but as I said, it also has a lot of stillness in it. It's not completely still, but if I tune to the element or the feeling or the sense of stillness, the frequency of stillness in it—again, that's going to stand out and it may help the whole thing deepen because what I tune to gets amplified. And in this case, the amplification is a deepening.

So tuning to the stillness, noticing and then tuning to, really tuning to the stillness or equanimity in the third jhāna. Or noticing and tuning to whatever the most refined frequency is in the third jhāna. Because again, as we move from jhāna to jhāna, there's an increase in refinement. So tuning to what's most refined is a general principle—not just applies to this—that will help take me to the next level. And the stillness of the fourth jhāna will begin to emerge.

I would say, again, that a bit like what we said with the third jhāna, the fourth jhāna will be better—it will feel better, more compelling, more clear, more clearly discriminated, more fulfilling and all that—when it actually has within it, and you can feel within it, some of that profound and beautiful, tender gentleness that goes with the third jhāna. In other words, the beginnings of the fourth jhāna, when they have that kind of experience, that usually ends up being a much richer fourth jhāna experience, even if later on they kind of refine out. They can get subtler and subtler and then they get purified out. There's this luminous stillness.

You can play with the same things really: opening the body and opening the mind to it. Opening, abandoning, surrendering, or penetrating—same modes of attention. Or you can think about dissolving, which I think I mentioned before, but somehow at this level, it gets really, really potent for me, this word dissolving. What would it be to dissolve my body into this luminous, beautiful stillness? Dissolve my body into it. The body becomes that, but the body also just dissolves in it. So there's a movement of intention there. There's a direction there.

And again, just as in the third jhāna, we said sometimes there can be a kind of felt sense of bifurcating or splitting between the mind and the body a little bit, just subtly. Again, at first, it's body and mind totally integrated—they're just really into it. And then with a lot of fourth jhāna experience, sometimes you can feel like, oh, body and mind. And then dissolving my body, and other times dissolving my mind. What is it to dissolve the mind into this luminous stillness and to play with that kind of intention.

So at times those feel like separate intentions, separate processes. Ideally they're one, but it doesn't matter. This is again—we're getting out of this thinking of a jhāna as a very neat, defined, black and white on-off switch or a box. And it's more just territory here. And okay, now I dissolve my body and then I dissolve my mind. Doesn't matter if they're separate. So jhāna practice is a broader thing, rather than worrying about those edges of "Is this it?"

Is it not it? Is it right? Is it wrong? But like always, we want to really penetrate and get intimate—really get inside and intimate with this luminous stillness. And remembering that the primary nimitta is this purity of refined stillness.

A funny thing can happen that you might have witnessed or experienced: sometimes in the fourth jhana, what can be quite common is a kind of leaning forward. The physical body actually starts leaning forward. This can be—I don't know how common this is—actually leaning forward, and it can be really, really extreme. Someone sitting cross-legged on the floor actually ends up with their forehead on the floor. Someone might think, "Oh, they're fast asleep." Or they see them going like this and think they're fast asleep. Far from it.

The nodding looks very different and feels very different. You can tell the difference between these things. They're quite—they both involve a leaning forward—but they're really quite different phenomena.

Ajahn Mahabua was one of the great—he died not that long ago—one of the great twentieth-century Thai forest meditation masters. He used to say in relation to this leaning forward: don't alter it at all. Don't mess with it. The process is happening; you let it happen. And if your forehead ends up on the floor, you let it end up on the floor.

I had a teacher who said, as soon as you start noticing that happening, stop it and just make sure you can sit upright. So there are differences of opinion.

I admit, over the years I've gotten into what I wouldn't call a bad habit, but a habit that I slightly regret. I do lean forward, and sometimes quite a lot. Looking back, it would have been better had I nipped that habit in the bud and not allowed it to develop, because it can be a little distracting as things go on. But it's certainly not a tragedy. However, I'm saying this now so that if you encounter it, you can perhaps nip it in the bud and make an intention to sit upright—stop it when it's happening. But even if it does happen, sometimes you can very gently sit up, keeping the meditation going.

What's happening here? I don't know. I'm not sure percentage-wise how common this is, but it's really not uncommon. Is it that we're conceiving of our attention as something that operates forwards? And so the stillness is in front of us, and we generally conceive of our attention—I know I can hear something back there, but because the eyes go that way and the nose is there and the mouth is there, the sense organs are in the head and they're pointing that way—is it that we just habitually conceive of our attention going forwards, and then we conceive of the stillness primarily in front of us, and that's why we're leaning forwards?

Do you remember, you can play with a few things here, and I think it's worth trying to nip this in the bud if it starts to come up for you. You can play with almost imagining the stillness 360 degrees, like the Buddha's analogy: wrapped around the body. So it's 360 degrees around—it's a scaffolding of stillness, almost. It's right around the body space, keeping it upright, because there's as much support, as much presence of the scaffolding in front as behind, as to the sides. Playing with that 360 degrees prevents us from the habit of feeling and sensing objects in the mind being somewhat in front of us. In a way, my attention is pulled equally, equanimously, in all directions. There's maybe less chance of falling over forwards.

Remember on the opening evening when I introduced counting with the breath and actually said to play with it behind? Getting used to playing with breathing in from the back, getting used to turning around in physical space 180 degrees—the sense of where we're paying attention and which direction the attention moves in can bear significant fruits later on when it comes to something like this.

So it could be something like that. It could also be—and I don't know, I've never really talked to anyone about this—that what starts to happen at this level is a significant degree of unfabricating. We've talked a little bit about that. Some of you are very familiar with this teaching, but it's related to what I said about equanimity. As we let go of more and more clinging in the moment, there's less and less push and pull, less and less clinging. Then we talked about the vedana—the pleasant and unpleasant are actually fabricated less. Less and less and less and less. So there's more and more unfabricating. Less and less fabricating of what? Well, of self, but also in this case of perception and sensation. Less and less and less, until at certain points the sensations don't even arise.

Less and less and less. There's more unfabricating. There's quite a degree of unfabricating at this point, at the point of the fourth jhana. Unfabricating is quite a degree of deconstructing or non-constructing going on.

Sometimes I wonder, is this sort of falling over just a kind of reflection in the body of the kind of unfabricating that's going on? There's less construction, because it also happens for me sometimes—and again it's a habit; if I could go back I would change—but it can also occur when you're deep in insight ways of looking and they're working primarily with this unfabricating, working with deeply letting go, and a similar sort of thing happens. I don't know, I'm not sure, but it's worth knowing about and working with. It's part of the territory potentially here. And it may be something that comes to bother you if you don't nip it in the bud, or it may be like—I don't think it's that much of an issue for me—but for some people they feel like, oh, I really wish, et cetera.

Probably a more significant thing to look out for is that again, after many experiences going in and out of the fourth jhana and getting used to it—you remember what I said about a dam bursting when you reach a new level and it's just like, wow, it's just happening. I don't have to do anything. It's just perfect as it is. And then after a while, it's like, ah, now some more subtle work and play. I see the need for that and the potential for that.

So one thing that can happen, a kind of problem that emerges after quite a lot of experience going in and out of the fourth jhana, is that sometimes one's there and it's very nice, it's very still, the mind is definitely very mindful, very equanimous, very focused, but it's just a fraction dull. So there's no nodding, there's none of that. The whole thing is much, much more subtle. It's very subtly, very slightly dull at times.

This actually is an important thing to notice, to look out for and notice. It's still a state of equanimity, of mindfulness, of clear awareness and all the rest of it, of focus, of samadhi, but just relatively to what it could be, it's just a little bit dull. That's a really important thing to take note of. It's just gone into that slight dullness. Can I ramp up in this moment the sense of presence? Just turn up the sense of presence. I'm present to this primary nimitta, to this stillness. There's a presence there, a real aliveness of presence.

One of the ways you can do this is really come into the sense of now, now, now. It's now. This thing is now. This stillness is now. And really come sharply into the sense of now with presence. It's two ways of saying the same thing. And that allows it to become brighter and more alive.

There are many instances, like I said, where the Buddha talks about the jhanas in the Pali Canon. There are some instances where he sort of does it in a certain formula, and other instances where he does it in another formula, and other instances where in a third kind of formula or way of explaining. And there's one of these sort of stock, almost contrived formulas where he goes through the first four jhanas and describes them as we've just described them. And then he says, "Then the practitioner, then the monk"—he's usually talking about monks—"thus with mind," which means something like he, the monk, with a citta, with a mind-heart, with an awareness, thus meaning from the jhanas.

The usual translation you'll hear is "concentrated," but actually it means "samadhi-fied"—partly why I'm wanting to dwell on this. And he goes through a whole list. So what he's going to do is go through a whole list describing what the practitioner has got from their practice of the jhanas or the first four jhanas, and then describing what they then do with that, how they put that mind to work. And there are different formulas and different contexts, depending on who he's talking to and what he's describing.

But what's often translated, for example, after the first four jhanas is: "Then the practitioner, with a mind thus concentrated." So I'm just wanting to point out—we've dwelt on this a number of times—what's the difference if we translate samadhi as "concentration" or we leave it as samadhi? We talked about this, right?

So to me, samadhi is the richer word and I don't get narrowed into that view of what—because it's very easy to read these texts and take certain conclusions. And I want to actually take the time going through this and indicate how we can read these passages and the translations of these passages and just assume it means "with a mind very concentrated" and very stuck, very able to stay steady with one thing, and very like a laser beam. All these words are very easy to hear that way. I'm going to bother to go through the Pali and actually see how there are different ways we can open this out.

So that's the first one. With a citta, with a mind thus samadhi-fied, thus harmonized in agreement. To me, it's got a whole different range and richness of what's involved there, rather than just "concentrated."

Then he said, so with the mind thus samadhi-fied, and then he goes on to other adjectives: with the mind thus, not just samadhi-fied, but parisuddhe, which means "purified." What might that mean? Purified. Purified of what? Okay, but that should have come with the first jhana.

Of vedana, of hindrances—it could mean all kinds of things. What I'm pointing to is how easy it is to read these texts and listen to dharma talks already programmed to hear a certain narrow range of meaning which is not necessarily there. It could also be purified of relative grossness—when you refine something. I want to open up these possibilities.

Yes, hindrances and subtle hindrances. Yes, pleasure and pain. Yes, relative grossness. What is happening here? Because this is the point—the Buddha has gone through the first four jhanas and then explains to someone what the point of it is. Again, we return to this whole question we've explored so much at the beginning of this retreat: What's the point of this? Why are we doing this? What are we going to emphasize? What's important here?

So the mind could be purified of who knows what—grossness, subtle hindrances, pleasure, pain. But then the Buddha repeats this: parisuddhe pariyodāte, which also means pure. This word pariyodāta also means very clever or excellent or accomplished. Sometimes it's translated as bright. In English, that word carries the same ambiguity—"Oh, she's very bright."

As I said, there is this sense of visual luminosity there, but it's really a kind of brightness of presence. When we talk about a bright person, it's also that they're bright in presence. It's not just that they're very good at doing Rubik's cubes or whatever. The mind is bright with presence, but also bright with possibility. When we say someone is bright, there's possibility there.

This translation of bright points to a very pure realm of still light. The purity is interesting if we linger here, because it's also related to the stillness. Stillness itself is something pure—purity of push-pull, purity of equanimity.

Again, just expanding on the possible meanings. When you say a person has a really pure character, it's like saying they have a lot of integrity, which is also like saying they can't be bribed by something pleasant or blackmailed by the threat of something unpleasant. Do you understand? So the purity could refer to something like that—how is the mind in its poise right now in relation to the threat and the dangling carrot of unpleasant and pleasant?

Opening up meanings—it's so easy to hear and read just what we already know, what we've already been told. That's the most common way, unfortunately, for human beings to hear and read: to simply hear and read what we already know.

It could also be pure in refinement. If you think about something like gold—you mine gold, gather it, and it's got other stuff in it. To purify gold is also to refine gold. The mind is getting down to something of its pure, nearer to its pure natural nature. Words like pure can mean many different things, and I think the text is pregnant with all those meanings rather than being brought down to just one.

Then the Buddha continues with more adjectives describing this mind after meditation, after the fourth jhana: anaṅgaṇa, which is something like passionless or blameless or unblemished, and vigataupakkilesa, which means something like free, without defilements or obstructions. Mudubhūta, which means malleable, pliant, supple.

Later there are passages where the Buddha does this same description and really picks up on that quality, saying like a goldsmith who has this substance—now they've got their gold, molten gold—then they can shape it however they like. Malleable, malleable, malleable.

That may be, in my view, one of the really centrally important fruits of all this. I stressed it at the beginning of the retreat—malleability, that one of the main fruits of jhana practice is the malleability of perception.

So it's here now. Kamaniye, which means workable, able to be put to work or directed in a certain way. Thite, which means steady. And then the last one, aninjapatte, which means attained to imperturbability.

It's very easy, I think, to hear or read that in context and just read it very quickly, thinking, "Yes, it means the mind is now absolutely nailed to its object. It doesn't move. It's imperturbable." But does it only point to that? Might it also point again to equanimity, which we've been talking about, and the quietening of the push and pull?

Push and pull throws the mind out of balance. When you're exerting a thought, you're pulled by something or trying to hang on to something or pushing something away—it throws the mind out of balance. And so it could be that the imperturbability refers, or refers as well, or maybe even refers principally, less to a complete ability to fix the mind's attention on something unwaveringly and more to this capacity not to be swayed. It's steady, it's unshakable, it's imperturbable. I'm not swayed by my reactivity to any phenomenon—pleasant, unpleasant, or otherwise.

But really the point here is again just to illustrate, in a much larger context, how very easily we can hear and read and basically hear and read what we already know. And we're learning very little new. Things are not being opened up or challenged. In this particular case, to open up the view—and it's related to what are we doing here, why are we doing this, and therefore what's important of all the different things that are going on when we practice samadhi and all the different things that we could emphasize. And again, how much what we emphasize, how much the big picture view will end up directing us consciously or unconsciously, wisely or unwisely, in terms of our micro moment-to-moment choices.

And then he says cittam abhinirati and abhininameti, which basically directs or applies the citta, inclines or bends the citta towards. And then he gives a whole bunch of things that you can then do with the mind or direct your awareness to. One of them is vipassana practice or certain kinds of vipassana practice.

I want to point something else out about that sutta. Here he is speaking, explaining to someone, this person or that person. It's a kind of contrived educational situation, a contrived formula in a way. He goes through the first four jhanas, he gives the stock descriptions. And then he gives this whole list of "and thus the monk with the mind does this and this and this and this." The whole thing is a very stock, contrived formula.

But to me, it's important not to get misled by that contrived formula and actually see the sutta in context—that it is a contrived formula. It's a kind of educational heuristic technique he's using. It doesn't then mean that we should do jhana one followed by jhana two followed by jhana three followed by jhana four and then decide "okay, now I'm going to do this." Again, it's very easy to read a sutta like that and just take it without really understanding it as a heuristic tool, as an educational tool. It's a contrived formula. It doesn't mean that that's how we meditate. But there are some people who would teach that way because it says, well, one, two, three, four, and then you do this, then you do your vipassana. And there may be other situations where there's one, two, three, up to eight, and then you do vipassana. But these are just—do you understand what I mean by contrived? It's not really a strict instruction for practice.

A couple of things. If any of you, or any of your future selves, or anyone listening to this anywhere at any time, if ever you decide that you would like to really get deep into jhana practice and you find yourself in that territory and you want to devote some time to it—jhanas and how they work with insight so beautifully and fruitfully—once you got to this stage, it can be really helpful to almost make the fourth jhana your base.

I know a monk who teaches this. A famous monk from the mid-20th century in Thailand, a Thai forest monk, one of my teacher's teachers, said, "Make the fourth jhana your base." It's like a hub. And from there, you can go to lots of places. And it's this place of very bright, very steady, but not very warm awareness and consciousness.

I would like to say make the third and fourth jhana your base. If you ever get to that level of practice and you decide you're really into this, make the third and fourth because the third has such a lovely, warm, healing space. It's such a lovely, warm, healing space. So you make the third and fourth your base and then venture out backwards in the jhanas, forwards in the jhanas to different insight practices. And that becomes home base.

But having said that, as I mentioned, some of you will never want to do that. And you should never feel that you should do that. You don't have to develop jhanas to that degree.

You don't have to develop jhanas to any degree. Sometimes people say they need the jhanas—perhaps because I've emphasized something or they've heard something—they need the jhanas to get insight. I don't think it's true. There is a passage where the Buddha says, "Without jhana, there's no liberation. Without insight, there's no liberation." But I'm not sure about that interpretation.

You might have heard me say something that was simply contextual. When I first started talking publicly about jhanas here more than ten years ago, the context was much more anti-jhana—much more dismissive and poo-pooing, thinking they were a ridiculous waste of time or a dead end or dangerous. So teaching happens within a context. I might really emphasize their importance, but you don't need the jhanas.

Sometimes people think, because I emphasize their healing qualities, that they need the jhanas to heal. You probably don't. They can be very healing, but it's very rare that someone actually needs the jhanas to heal and couldn't heal in some other way.

However, having said that, what you may need to heal—much more than the jhana itself—is some of what we've been emphasizing in our way of working. For instance, when we talk about opening and really opening, really abandoning and really surrendering, that may be much more significant in a person's healing than the attainment of this or that jhana. Because that person may, for lots of different reasons, have quite a limited ability to really open, or they think they're really opening when actually it's only halfway, or to be really wholehearted.

These capacities—however they come—may be necessary. I think it's probably rare that an actual jhana is necessary when nothing else would give that kind of healing for a certain person. But to be able to open as a human being—I mean really open, open the energy body and open—that may well be quite significant because it has to do with much more than the attainment of a state in meditation. It has to do with one's relationship with life and existence, relationship with others, sexuality—all kinds of things.

Do you remember we talked about the cooking ingredients? Similar thing here. If you're in the fourth jhana and you want to go to the third jhana, what do you need to grab from the shelf and add? Yes, sukha. You just reach for your sukha and pour in the sukha, and fourth jhana plus sukha should deliver you to the third jhana. It's a handy trick, but again, part of the art of all this and the malleability of perception—the art of playing with perception.

I think I mentioned this already, but it's worth stating again: probably over time, through repeated experiences with the third and fourth jhana and the deeper jhanas—jhanas from three onwards—their increased refinement will actually have the effect of refining the piti in the first jhana. Not so much retroactively, but when you come back to the piti and the first jhana, they will usually calm it and maybe refine it as well. When you go to these other jhanas repeatedly and then come back, your sense of what the first jhana is begins to change. Again, that's part of why the post-it notes. This may happen with other jhanas, with the sukha, and so forth.

All the business about mastery applies here as well. All the elements of mastery—you can play with them here. They're just the same: ability to sustain, ability to summon at will, ability to ping pong, ability to go for walks outside, all the rest of it.

Because now you've got more jhanas to play with, there are increased leapfrog ping pong permutation possibilities. You can be jumping all over and practice that. Once you get to this point, you want to practice a little bit at the end—just having some fun at the end of sittings, moving around and seeing how rapidly you can move. But mostly you want to be marinating and really marinating in this. It does something very profound to the consciousness, to the being.

Let's have some quiet together.

Thank you, everyone, and time for tea.

CHAPTER 216

Q & A

Rob Burbea · 1h15

> In this Q&A session from the Practising the Jhānas retreat, Rob Burbea addresses various questions about jhāna practice and related topics. Key discussions include understanding primary nimittas versus satellite states, distinguishing between pīti and sukha across the jhānic spectrum, and navigating transitions from second to third jhāna. Burbea emphasizes the importance of balancing probing and opening in samādhi practice, offering practical guidance on working with both pleasant and unpleasant experiences during meditation.
>
> The session also explores deeper territory, examining how different ways of looking (insight approaches) can be applied to jhānic states and painful experiences. Burbea discusses the dependent arising of perception, explaining how attention mixed with various factors (aversion, identification, views of self and reality) affects what we perceive. He offers a radical reinterpretation of the Bahiya Sutta and Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, suggesting these texts point toward understanding the fabrication and unfabrication of experience rather than simple bare attention or impermanence practice. This teaching bridges jhāna practice with profound insight into emptiness and dependent origination.

Q & A

A period is open for questions if anyone would like to ask.

I have a question about primary nimittas, and you've talked about satellite states a few times. Last night as I was practicing with my base practice, it didn't feel like there were primary nimittas of pīti or sukha around initially. Then after a while I noticed a sense of physical well-being in the body, which didn't exactly feel like pīti as I'd been used to, and it didn't really feel like happiness either. It was more of a physical, gentle calm. But that was what was around, so I tried to absorb into it, and that worked to some degree. There was quite a lot of absorption into that state.

But it didn't feel jhanic in the ways that other states have felt before, and so then I started thinking, is this some kind of satellite state? Do all of the jhānas have satellite states? And then I also thought, perhaps this is another kind of pīti which I haven't encountered—a sense of physical well-being, but it just didn't fit the box of how I've conceived of pīti before.

I also have some questions around primary nimittas. You've encouraged us that the primary nimitta needs to be what we focus on in jhāna practice. And I began to wonder, why is that? If love is one of the characteristics of the second jhāna, for example, why do you not encourage people to focus on those aspects? And then also some questions around soulmaking, where you talk about an infinitude of qualities that we can theoretically absorb into. So it's not one question, but just an exploration of those themes.

Well, how nice was it?

It was nicer than any hindrances. It wasn't... I think it could have been a bit brighter, perhaps. It felt a little bit low energy, maybe. The pleasure could have been brighter.

Yeah, the pleasure or the state—the state itself.

It doesn't sound, again, it's like when to fuss over is it, isn't it? But that's partly what you're asking. So it doesn't sound jhanic. And yes, there are lots—the nature of the pīti will change over time and it will certainly change, as I said, after you've gotten more into the third, fourth, et cetera. They really have an effect on the pīti. But the pītis, they have an effect, but it's still really yummy. It's not just that they make it kind of bland. It's actually really nice. It's just different—it's mellower, but really, really nice.

And so yes, probably there are what we could talk about as satellite states or states in the neighborhood. I'm not sure I would call that a satellite state or state in the neighborhood. I'll talk hopefully in the next few days about different kinds of satellite states where there's this very clear, amazing state, and there's this very clear, amazing state, and there's this very clear, amazing state, and they have some things really in common as if they're part of a larger constellation.

In a way, what it sounds like you're talking about is something where some of the jhāna factors are a little bit gathered together, but not really in a way that they're blossoming. I don't know, strictly speaking, I would call that a satellite state, but it's in a certain territory.

The question practically then is, is this fruitful to hang out in? And obviously compared to papañca and compared to whatever else, it's skillful, it's fruitful. Is it going to be fruitful in the way that I can hang out in it and the way that I'm hanging out with it allows it to blossom into an actual jhanic state of, say, peacefulness or something like that? That takes... As I said when I talked about the third jhāna, it's a much safer bet to go through the happiness and really drink. It's not to say that it's impossible the other way, with just this kind of nice, calm feeling. It's not that it's impossible, and it's worth playing with and trying, but generally speaking, it will be more the other way, from a really ripe, full, fleshy satisfaction.

It didn't feel like how I would think the third jhāna would feel. It wasn't refined in that way. It was sort of the similar level of refinement as pīti but just without the movement and energy.

It doesn't sound at all like the third jhāna. So a lot of people—it would be very common, we've talked about this several times now—mistake a kind of sense of calmness, maybe even one that they're familiar with, deep peacefulness, very quiet mind, et cetera, for that territory.

But the question is whether the way that I'm being with it can refine it. So it didn't feel refined, but the question is: can I be with it in a way that refines it?

It is possible, but that's going to depend on a lot of things. Partly it will depend on whether I really have a lot of experience with the third jhāna, because then the chances of a state like that refining into the third jhāna are much higher. If I don't really have much experience of the third jhāna—and I mean the real third jhāna deal—then the chances of a state like that refining and ripening just through careful attention aren't impossible, but they're not very high. Rather, it's much more likely to ripen through the second jhāna and that real fullness and really getting into it.

As for the other secondary nimittas, none of this is black and white. Of course, there's a lovely love there. You're going to want to explore that. It's just that if you make that your primary thing, it will ripen into something else. It will go in a different direction. What we pay attention to is what gets amplified, and it also sets a direction.

If we were on a retreat about exploring metta and different heart openings and different kinds of love, then of course we would do that. But because we're on a jhāna retreat, it's really something to keep this intention—it's like, okay, this is my road. Yes, there are lots of interesting things at the side of the road, and I can explore all that, but I need to remember: this is my road if we want to develop the jhānas.

As to soul making, there's an infinitude of different states and lovely things and different openings. Yeah, I guess the question is that we're selecting in the jhāna path—there's a very specific trajectory that we've been talking about. And then there's a curiosity about the outcomes: How does it unfold if one begins to absorb into these other qualities?

Sometimes in the second jhāna, or just in the sitting, there's a sense of nobility, for example. That would be more of an imaginal practice of taking that as an object or feeling the resonance of that. Though it may or may not be a fully imaginal practice—it could just be an energetic practice.

We did something on the opening evening about getting in touch with the sense of devotion. Do you remember that? Something like that's very skillful. Lawrence mentioned working with anger, then it goes to power. Those things are emotional, energetic practices, transformations. They don't necessarily need to be imaginal. For something to be imaginal, it involves a lot of different things happening.

All of these fruits are there. But like I said, what do we want to do? And it's not better or worse, because for some person, actually being able to feel into their devotion that's connected with their desire that way and actually feel it in the energy body and let that empower—that's huge.

For another person, like what Lawrence was talking about, the ability to be with anger in a way that's not fragmenting the being, driving them crazy, hurting everyone around them, toxic, et cetera—to actually distill that energetically, emotionally, and find the power and strength there that everything coheres around, and then sit in that, and act from there, speak from there, be from there, perceive from there. That's huge.

Those things are huge. So again, we have to really get clear: what is the larger context of what we're doing here? To me, the larger context of what we're doing here, as I said in the opening, sits within all these other practices and feeds and complements all of them, and is fed and complemented by all of them. But it's also distinct.

If we're walking down this road, there's all sorts of "Look at that lovely pear on that tree. Oh, and look at that over there." And it's fantastic. In the context of our larger life of practice, yes, we can go to that. There's a side road down where the apple orchard is or whatever it is. Brilliant! But jhānas won't deepen unless that intention is really, "This is my road, this is my road, this is my road."

It doesn't mean you can't have a few apples and pears on the way, but there's something about keeping it that way to deepen in jhānas. There are more potential riches and openings than anyone can ever experience in their whole lifetime, whoever you are. And that's the thing, especially when you get talking about soul making.

There are things that are part of what I would call basic Dharma training—by which I mean things like working with anger that way, things like being able to get a sense of my nobility and have that energized in the heart and affect my sense of self and my life, things like being with the sense of devotion and letting that empower, things like working with the emotions, emptiness, all that. That's all a very large plate of stuff to get through in terms of basic Dharma practices—very possible.

But once you get to soul making, it becomes infinite. By the nature of what the soul making dynamic does, it will always create new openings, new states, new perceptions, new territory, new beyonds. It will create and discover new aspects of reality. So there's a distinction there.

I guess what I was calling the tray or the play of basic Dharma practice is probably quite wide compared to some other presentations.

Provisionally from a teaching point of view, if you think, "Oh, have I now gone into my first jhāna? Have I skipped ahead and I'm calling something that's actually the beginnings of the third jhāna the first jhāna? Am I still calling that the first jhāna and then calling the sukha something else?"

From my point of view, it doesn't actually matter that much. What matters is that you're exploring these territories with some kind of map sense, and you're getting familiar with different territories and different energies. The precise labeling of "this is first jhāna, this is second jhāna" - while it can be helpful - is not the most crucial thing.

What's more important is that you're developing familiarity with these different qualities of energy, these different textures of consciousness and embodiment. You're learning to navigate between them, to recognize them, to cultivate them. That's the real skill development that's happening.

So yes, I think you're very much on the right track. Keep exploring with that sense of curiosity and openness that you seem to have. The refinement you're noticing in what you're calling pīti is quite typical - these energies do tend to become more subtle and refined as we get more familiar with them.

And the wild, bubbling quality of what you're experiencing as sukha is also completely normal. Sometimes sukha can indeed be quite exuberant, especially when we're first getting to know it. As you spend more time with it, you may find it has its own range of expressions, from the more effervescent to the more smooth and flowing.

The key is to stay curious about both, to keep visiting them, and to notice how they feel different in your body and awareness.

I see what you mean. If that's a concern, though, I would check with the emotion, because the emotion in the sukha is going to be primarily this very warm, tender, exquisite peacefulness or satisfaction—whatever it is, depending on the level.

But you're shaking your head, so it sounds like it's not problematic.

"No, the emotion is clear. It's more the refinement that I was concerned about."

Okay. Yeah. So I don't know, other than just hang out in both—lots and lots—and hopefully it will get clear. It should get clear. But don't rush all these things. Probably everyone's got kind of post-it notes still at this point, and that's appropriate. Things mature, things change. We notice different territories. We notice more as time goes on.

So it's all basically really nice. You're enjoying it, and it's just asking you to get more and more familiar with it. And then it will get clearer.

"I have a question about going from second to third. Sometimes it feels like—especially if it's come from quite a bubbly end of second—when I get into third, it's like coming from a really bright place into a darkened room, where it's kind of hard at first to make out the nuances of third. Because it's like, okay, right, it feels peaceful, but I haven't yet seen the crystal clarity or the tenderness or the divinity or those qualities. And I found that sometimes I actually end up in a space a bit like what Juho was saying, which is not really what I thought it was. So it's like, okay, that's not quite the kind of deep, dark pool of third. What would you recommend at that point? Is it just better to go back or try and refine?"

You could go back, because probably that place you're describing that's not quite it is, as I said, one of these habit results of your insight practice over the years. It's a state of relative equanimity and quietness, and the mind has got quite used to that, so you're ending up in that.

So one thing you could do is come back to the second and maybe you could even start feeling the drinking of the happiness as satisfying, as a verb in present tense. You understand? And maybe that will take you to the satisfied. So you're tuning a little bit more to something more specific that's more related to the third. So that's one option.

Another option might be—and this should be possible with time—that you can, since a lot of this just starts to become memory and subtle intention, you're actually remembering the whole set of qualities of the third jhana. That whole gorgeous, realm-like, exquisite—we're using words like divine—you're actually remembering that flavor and you bring that. You actually go there, but try going there by memory of those things.

Does that make sense? So it's really a realm that you're remembering, almost, as opposed to just hanging out. Because you've been practicing so long, there's probably a lot of momentum and habitual momentum to get into these other states that are, as we've been saying, relatively skillful, relatively equanimous, relatively peaceful, relatively non-eventful. It's all good, but if you want to make sure you don't bypass the actual third jhana—which by this point you can see the qualitative difference is quite marked—then you have to aim a little more.

Either in the process of the second jhana with the satisfying, satisfying—you see what you're doing there? You're actually inclining the mind towards a certain emotion in the present whose fulfillment is the third jhana. Does that make sense?

Or, as I said, you're remembering a whole realm—other aspects of the realm apart from the fact that there's equanimity and peace there.

It may not be ready for that, but it may be getting there. We have to see. But that's part of the whole mastery deal. And you can maybe remember that when it's going well in the second jhana. You can maybe just lightly, subtly intend to remember that. Okay. Does that make sense?

Yeah, no, that's really helpful.

Good. I just want to ask one more thing about... So yesterday I was sitting with a really bright, bubbly, quite silly actually happiness in second jhana, just really enjoying it, and then suddenly this spontaneous "not me, not mine" came out of it just completely from nowhere. It was really surprising. And so then I had this happiness that wasn't about anything and didn't belong to anybody. And it had this kind of—it was just really wonderful, magical, just like, wow. And I just wanted to know whether there was anything worth exploring there or whether I should shelve that for later.

I think that probably, to some extent, to some degree or other, there is less self-identification with the happiness in the territory of the second jhana. So usually when we're happy, it's connected to a story and quite a more fabricated sense of self who is feeling very happy about something or other. And there's a whole projection in time and with one's life and all that's going—even if I'm not thinking, thinking, thinking, that's all there. It's all being fabricated to a certain extent: the self and then taking this happiness personally. Does this make sense?

In the second jhana, naturally—which I'll get to in the next couple of days—the self is, as we go through the jhanas, less and less fabricated. Maybe I'll modify that statement at some point, but it's less and less fabricated. So in the second jhana, there's very little personality. There's very little story. There's very little background history and where I'm going and what I want and the whole rest of it. There's even very little psychological history. It's just happiness. So already, to a certain extent, there's a kind of—to some degree or other, there's a sort of—it's not perfectly "not me or mine" in the same way that it would be for the usual sense of self. Do you understand?

So it might be just that you're—this is something we kind of notice as it goes on anyway. But because it's a little less identified, then it lends itself more to being seen as less identified. And you have a history of "not me, not mine" practice of anatta, of disidentifying. So it just kind of piggybacks on that.

Or rather, it's available as a practice. And again, I hope to talk about this at some point, and maybe even a few times on this retreat: we turn an insight way of looking onto a jhana. The jhana itself, or the primary nimitta, becomes an object for an insight way of looking. I wouldn't recommend that to anyone at this point. It's a whole other level of skill and art.

But one can then regard this or that jhana—the whole thing or one aspect of it—as "not me, not mine, not me, not mine." And that becomes a super powerful practice. You have to stay with it, stay with it, stay with it and see what happens. But I wouldn't do that before you really know that jhana inside out and it's really got established. Again, if you do that too early, so to speak, you risk being the foolish inexperienced cow kind of thing that the Buddha was talking about. It will probably just slide all over without kind of knowing where you are, and then you might lose control.

The jhanas themselves need to be consolidated, thoroughly familiar, thoroughly steady and established. And then for some people, they can start doing their insight ways of looking on the jhana itself. And that, as I said, is a both very lovely but super powerful way of practicing. But I will try and talk more about that another time.

Yeah. Thanks. Yeah. Good. Good.

I think Mikhail had one.

Yeah, thank you. I have a quick technical question about steadiness and enjoyment. What to do when it seems that when I emphasize steadiness, I start to lose somehow the capacity to enjoy, and when I emphasize enjoyment, I lose my steadiness and mind starts easily wandering. They seem somehow to close each other out to some extent.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 6/14). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

So what could be the answer? What exactly happens when you emphasize the enjoyment?

My way to emphasize enjoyment generally is to open and open and open to the enjoyment and really let go—somehow fall into the lap of, say, happiness or pīti or something. I really like to let go and let the whole consciousness and energy body sense open, and I just fall somehow into the arms of the nimitta. I wondered if this really opening, opening, opening strategy is actually causing some... like I'm opening, it's kind of like too much.

Well, yes, thank you for saying that. This is so individual and can change with time. But just immediately when you say that, it sounds like you can't open too much, but what you can do is open too much relative to how much probing you're doing.

There's no end to how much you can open. I don't think there is. We're infinitely deep human beings. We can just open and open. But relative to how much penetration and probing you're doing, you can hear it in the way you language it, Mikhail. When you're doing that, you're kind of going into quite a passive mode. And that's the problem.

Whereas when you're penetrating and probing with the intention, the agenda of enjoying, then it's really like they go together. The enjoyment and the sustaining go together. You understand? So it sounds like for you right now, in the mix of things, upping the penetrative probing with the enjoyment—in the mix.

For other people, for a lot of people, it's more opening that needs to happen. I said this already—people can think, "Oh, but I am opening," but actually they're not. One isn't opening as much as one could. But one's so used to only a limited amount of opening in the being that one thinks, "Well, I'm opening." But actually there's more opening to be able to do there.

So all this is very individual. But if you keep in mind—you know, there are lots of modes of attention—but if you keep in mind these two principles, one's a bit more yang, if you like, and one's a bit more yin. One's a bit more active, one's a bit more passive or receptive. If you just keep that in mind and the necessity to play with both and to move around, then the question becomes: well, it may not be because it's all going fine, or it might be like, "Am I overdoing it a little bit right now on one or the other?"

And "right now" might be for the six months I've gotten into a habit of overdoing on one side or the other, or it might be just in this moment or this five minutes or whatever. Does that make sense?

So when you probe, there's no mutual exclusivity between enjoying and sustaining. If I'm probing trying to enjoy to the max, I will obviously try and sustain, of course. But if I go into too receptive a mode, then everything gets a bit loose and I'm not doing any work. I'm not really working there. I'm expecting everything to happen.

But again, this is an answer I'm giving you right now, and for someone else it might be that what's needed is the other one—oftentimes without realizing it or recognizing that's what's needed.

Thank you. Would you say generally that steadiness arises out of the balance of opening and probing? When it really hits the sweet spot of opening and probing at the moment, at the nimitta, at the context of the practice—that's where the steadiness arises?

I'm not sure. I feel a bit... I'm hesitant to say that. The probing and the opening thing is a very fluid, responsive, sort of unformulaic thing. So really we were just saying the most general thing, like don't neglect one for the sake of the other.

So I'm not sure there's a sweet spot per se, as much as just... that whole movement is not only going to help sustaining, it's going to help deepening, it's going to help absorbing, it's going to help all kinds of things.

If you go back to the Buddha's original image—or rather the image for the soap mixer with the first jhāna—it's quite active. You're kind of mixing something. There's something about moving between those modes that's also part of it, mixing. And in a way that applies to the other jhānas as well, in a way, or at a much subtler level.

So I don't know that it's just about sustaining as much as the whole show just works better. It's like kneading bread, working it in the flour.

Alright, thank you. Is that Nick back there?

It's just related to part of that question about the probing and the receptivity. You just called it passive as well as the more active being with the nimitta. Naturally, I'm just much more receptive. That's where the opening comes much more naturally.

With PT, it's really about opening to that experience. I've been working to develop a sense of what the probing is like, since it's unfamiliar to me. What I found is that several times when I've taken a part of the energy body that has felt particularly strong in PT and really put my concentration there to probe into that, what tends to happen is that immediately there's an opening.

The sense in the energy body then is that the probing goes almost immediately into an opening. It's like the sensation there just opens right up quite expansively. I feel like I've lost the probing already, and I don't know if this is just because I'm not very skilled at it yet or if that's something that naturally happens. When you probe into anything, there's space in there, and that's what you kind of fall into. So I'm a little confused about how to work with that.

Yeah, I think what you're describing is very normal. That's where the image of someone diving into a lake becomes helpful as a way to understand the probing movement. The body becomes streamlined in its shape when you're diving, not just splattering into the lake. If you're diving, there's this streamlined probing of one point in the water, but then very quickly you find yourself surrounded by water. You aimed at a point, but then it was like, "Oh, now I'm in a new territory."

So that may happen, as you're describing, very quickly, or it may happen at some point when you're probing. Very normal. But then you can just do the same thing again. So it's not like you're getting it wrong. You can just probe again, and again, and again. It's not like you need to rush—"Right, same again, immediately, quick, don't lose any time." The whole thing is simply: what feels helpful right now?

If it feels good, great. Then you may try doing it again and again and again, or you may at some point switch to a more open mode. It's not that we're trying to eliminate any gaps in the probing or any interruptions. If it's opening that way, something is working.

Does it mean that you can't sustain the probe in one area, that it just won't sustain, but you can go back a bit later and probe somewhere else? Or can you stay much more in the probing mode?

Let's take this person who dives into a lake. They dive and they dive, and then they're underwater and it's all around them. They could, if they want, just keep going in the same direction. They're in a bigger space now, but they could just keep going in the same direction. It's something like that. Their perception shifts—rather than a spot that they're aiming at, aiming to dive right on that spot in the water, their perception is now that it's three-dimensional around them, but they can keep going in the same direction. It's more like a direction.

I'm wondering about the spectrum between pīti and sukha, because I've been exploring the really, really subtle, fine end of pīti, where it's just these beautiful, tiny explosions, and I'm loving it. Then there are times—and I'm less familiar with the sukha—but there are times when I'm in that bubbly, really bubbly energy that feels like it has much more pīti in it than the fine end of pīti does.

I've been playing with cross-fading pīti and sukha, and it seems almost like pīti has this spectrum here, and then the second jhāna spectrum is here, as though you can almost go finer in pīti than you might at the top of the second jhāna.

Can I offer something and see if it helps? There is a spectrum of refinement across all the jhānas. The eighth jhāna is just unbelievably refined compared to any of the others, and certainly compared to the first.

So there's that spectrum of refinement.

Then there's a spectrum of refinement... Well, again, it's maybe these words subtlety and refinement that get a bit confused. So I would probably say there's a spectrum of... Let's use the word calming and refinement differently. What gets confusing is maybe the word subtlety.

There's a spectrum of calming sukha, for instance, through the second jhana. There's a spectrum of calming the peacefulness and the sukha in the third jhana as it gets towards the fourth jhana. In the first jhana, although piti has a large range, in a way it's not that the deeper end of piti has a subtler or more refined piti.

If I said anything, I probably wasn't that clear because I think these words are getting slightly overlapped and confused and I'm perhaps not being consistent with using them. The thing about subtle piti is just that if that's all there is, then we need to be good with that and be able to work with it. And really be okay with that.

"Yeah, I've been loving subtle piti, I feel. It's incredibly..."

Okay, can I just say one more thing? So that's all we need to do. If you're loving it and you can work with it and you can get into it, great, fine, tick. You've passed that particular thing.

And generally speaking, if I've got all the other elements of mastery of piti, then I really want to just be getting into the piti, no matter how strong it is, until it just goes to the second jhana, rather than keeping it at a subtle, or what you're calling refined state. Do you understand? It's like, let's just do this thing until it gives birth to the sukha. And then we're going with the sukha. Does that make sense?

"Yeah, that makes sense. It was kind of like a nerdy question more than a problem, really. I think that happened, and I can tell the difference of refinement and the quality between the piti and the sukha. The bodily sensation of them feel different, and that seems clear to me. It just seems like there's..."

There are probably all kinds of nerdy—your word—corners we could get interested in and all that. But in terms of what we want to do on this retreat, it may well be it's time for the second jhana and really, really ripening into that and really getting into that. And then maybe sometime later you can come back and explore this level, in terms of priorities.

So it may well be, and there are all kinds of interesting things, and that's great, but just in terms of setting our priorities, it might be that it's ripe now and this would be holding yourself back a little bit unnecessarily. We want to move on. Sounds like it to me.

"I've developed two habits in my working with piti that I wanted to check out with you and just make sure I'm not veering off course. The first is because I think I'm not so good at probing without probing too hard and kind of turning it into what was the word the Buddha used?"

Snatching.

"Yeah. I find myself kind of micro-probing just for a second. Like, pleasure over here, pleasure over there, pleasure over here. And what can the being do to maximize it just for a split second here or there? Does that feel like a suitable substitute? Should I work on the way you describe it more?"

My intuition would be no, it probably wouldn't really cohere that way and it would be much more useful—and probably useful in your life as well—to be able to really sustain a kind of probing intensity without it being too tight. It's not just jhanic skill here, but there's probably a mirroring on a life level of what it is to really be able to focus on something and sustain that effort and sustain intensity without it being problematic.

But really, having said what my intuitive sense would be, I should have first said, well, how does it work? Does it work well?

"It has resulted in jhana, first jhana a few times. It's probably the most useful thing so far, but I haven't had a whole lot of... I don't feel super successful about attaining jhana on this retreat compared to my expectations."

So you could do it sometimes and also think about developing the capacity to probe, be very directed, be intense without it being a kind of problematic grasping. View that as something that you could develop. But don't give up this because as you said, it's been successful sometimes.

In the end, we want to find out what works best for you. No matter what I say or anyone else, it's really what works best for you. But if you've got nothing to compare it to, then you're not actually going to know. Is this the optimal thing for me, this method? Or actually, is it second or even fifth best?

And there may well be - like many of these practices - when we talk about opening, when we talk about hanging out, there are fruits to developing certain ways of working that may be worth more than the jhana itself. In terms of life, in terms of desire, in terms of capacity to be intense sometimes in life and sustain that intensity. Some of these things are much more significant than whether or not I get into the first jhana or whatever it is.

Try a few things, and it may well be that what you're describing actually is your method and it works fine no matter what anyone else says. But you don't know yet because you haven't tried enough.

"And the other thing that I find myself doing - you've said maximize the pleasure. And I think because of all my insight practice, I noticed that my attention goes so easily to pain. Maybe it's just being human. What I noticed myself doing yesterday was, how could this not hurt? This place of pain? Because when the jhana comes, gross pain pretty much just goes away. And what I was finding yesterday was that focusing on a spot where there's pain, the pain would go down just from the attention. I guess there's a certain degree of letting go in the way the attention is. I'm not sure - it doesn't really seem synonymous with focus on pleasure or maximize the pleasure. I'm just wondering your thoughts on that."

Well, there are two things. First of all, I didn't say maximize the pleasure. I said maximize the enjoyment. They're very different, right? Pleasure is in the object. Enjoyment is in my relationship with the object. Do you understand the difference? That's really important.

Then just now you said "focus on the pleasure." And that was an instruction at some points. Because what we are trained in - maybe just as human beings, or habitually, certainly as insight meditators - is paying attention to the unpleasant and the difficult.

Mostly that's what most people spend most of their insight meditation retreats doing: paying attention to what's difficult in one way or another. And there's a real encouragement given for that and developing of willingness.

So when you come to jhana practice you realize that sometimes what you can choose to do is focus on the pleasant. When there's unpleasant and pleasant, you can focus on the pleasant. You can choose to do that, and in doing that you can learn all sorts of things - not just about the tendency of the mind. Actually, it's really hard because the mind keeps wanting to go to the unpleasant. Why don't you just stay there? It just will go there. There's something to learn about the tendency and habit patterns of the mind, but there's also something to learn about dependent arising.

Sometimes when I focus on the pleasant, that pleasant amplifies and it takes over and the unpleasant disappears. What's going on? What do I need to understand about perception there?

So there are at least two things to understand if that's the case. One is just a jhanic skill. If I want to develop in samadhi, there are many occasions when it will be more helpful to focus on the pleasant and not the unpleasant. There's a life skill in that, but there's also a samadhi meditative skill in that.

But then there's another level that has to do with dependent arising, dependent arising of perception. How is it that this pain that has been there for however long disappeared, was unfabricated when I looked at the pleasant? Really, really important.

Then there's a third option or third category which is, as you said, sometimes I bring the attention to the unpleasant and the unpleasant disappears. Just bringing attention to it makes it disappear. A certain kind of attention. That's the thing. It's a certain kind of attention because I can certainly bring... This is the thing. We talk about mindfulness as if mindfulness is just mindfulness and it's a pure thing. You bring mindfulness to this, you bring mindfulness to that.

We don't bring mindfulness alone. We bring mindfulness plus about a hundred other things—perhaps not literally a hundred, but we bring mindfulness plus intention, plus relationship, plus subtle aversion or grasping, plus equanimity, plus metta, plus self-view, plus reality view. All of this is present in a moment of so-called "bare attention." It's not bare at all. There's no such thing. Do you understand this? This is really, really important.

So what you find is that sometimes I bring attention to a pain and it makes it worse because there's more aversion wrapped up in it, or there's a certain view, or a certain time view—"how much longer?"—or whatever it is. All kinds of things get wrapped up in the mindfulness in that moment, and while I'm looking at it, this is actually fabricating more unpleasantness.

Other times one looks and brings an attention, and what's wrapped up in that attention—or what's absent from that attention—allows the pain to unfabricate. Still other times you bring attention and it just stays the same. Whatever's in the mix of mindfulness is holding it at a level point.

Two important things emerge here. One is to realize this fundamental truth. There's an old teaching—I remember a teacher saying that if you pay attention to a pain, three things could happen: it could go away, it could get worse, or it could stay the same. What's the insight there? The insight was: you can't do anything about it, just put up with it. In other words, you're not in control of pain. This isn't my teaching—have you heard this before? It doesn't matter anyway.

What we're exploring here is whether I can realize two things that are extremely significant. First, that there isn't such a thing as bare attention or pure mindfulness. And how do I know that? Because I start experimenting—I'll try to talk about this more tomorrow—because I start experimenting with noticing what else is in the mindfulness and then changing what else is in the mindfulness, playing with what else is in the mindfulness. And that equals playing with perception.

What is it to have a mindfulness that has much less aversion in it? What is it—going back to Andy's question—what is it to have a mindfulness that has much less "this pain is not me or mine," much less identification? What is it to have a mindfulness that has much less "this is a real thing" or much less time sense in it? These are all factors in the real sense of the word—from the Latin "to do"—so they do stuff, and we want to realize that.

The only way we can really realize this is by actually getting skilled, learning the art of playing with this. It's really, really subtle. And you start to realize: when I bring this kind of attention—let's say with no aversion—the pain will decrease. When I bring that kind of attention—let's say with more aversion—it will increase, and so forth with all these other elements.

Playing with this equals what I'm going to call insight ways of looking. I start to get really interested in how the way of looking affects the perception. In this case we're talking about pain, but it could be anything. That's the whole road of insight meditation, in my view. I start learning about playing with perception and its effects on the perception of anything—the dependent arising of perception.

This has to do with emptiness. I'll go into this more when I talk about it further. The meaning is that this pain does not exist as a thing unto itself. It's dependent on how I look at it. When I say "how I look at it" or "way of looking," I mean how I relate to it—everything that's involved in my sensing of it. This "way of looking" is just shorthand for what's in my sensing of it: my conception of self, of it, of reality, of materiality, of time, and also my relationship with it. A little bit of pushing away, or a little bit of "I need to hang on to this because it's important"—all of that is part of the way of looking.

The art is to really start exploring all that and really playing with it, eventually coming to the conclusion that this thing, and that thing, and that thing—everything, everything—no thing exists independently of a way of looking. Nothing exists by itself. And that's what emptiness means.

Everything is empty of independent existence, of an existence inherently independent of the way of being looked at in the moment.

So there's a lot here. At the moment, it sounds like what you're bringing is a skillful attention and it's disappearing. Now, what I'm adding to that is fantastic. And that little discovery there should pique your interest. There's a huge, gorgeous avenue of insight exploration that takes you to the most profound insights if you want to follow it and explore all that.

But in the context of jhana retreat, what order do we choose these approaches? So here's this pain. First thing is maybe don't focus on it. Just focus on the pleasantness. That's my first choice in the context of jhana retreat. I'm still learning about dependent arising there if the pain disappears.

But if that doesn't work in this context, then I can bring the attention to the difficult. Since you're doing metta as your base practice, I can work with it in two different ways. One is what we mentioned already: what if I make that very difficulty, that very unpleasantness, that stuckness or whatever it is, the center of the metta? In terms of attention, I'm bringing a certain kind of attention to it. I'm looking at it in a certain way. There's a certain way of looking that involves the imagination, where the metta is coming from. That would be a second choice way of working.

But a third choice in this context—in other contexts, it would be the first choice—is that you bring the attention to it, but you take care of what's wrapped up in that attention, primarily in terms of aversion and identification. There are lots of other possibilities. As we get deeper in this whole insight exploration, you also get much wider in terms of how many possibilities there are, and also the power of different ways of looking.

So just to finish, going back to what was mentioned: to view something as not me, not mine. This pain is not me or mine. The conventional view is that it's happening in my shoulder or whatever. So automatically, without thinking about it, we identify with it. It's me or mine. To bring in a view and actually practice this subtle view—it's not a philosophy. It's a subtly woven into the attention. Or you could say what we're doing is subtly taking out the habitual subtle me-mine. Rather than adding something, you're actually taking something out.

As you develop this more and more, there are more powerful ways of looking. To get to the point where you're sensing this pain and woven into the sensing is "it's not real, it's empty. It doesn't exist independently." That's an even more powerful approach that works even more powerfully to unfabricate.

You could flip it around in the negative. Actually, it looks like you're doing something extra. People say, "I don't like doing in meditation. I don't like doing. I want to just be." Well, we're doing plenty all the time with this unconscious habitual "me, mine, me, mine" or "it's real." Most people don't walk around thinking and obsessing "it's a real knee, it's a real pain" or whatever. There's just automatically, subconsciously, nonverbally woven into the way of looking...

that's unconsciously fabricating experience 99,999 times out of 100,000. These views of me-mine, not verbal, not conscious, and also views of "this is a real thing"—it's a real thing—are simply woven into our way of perceiving.

At first, of course, when you do these practices, it feels like you're doing something. "Oh, now I have to remember me-mine, me-mine. What a lot of work. I do this over and over," or "not real, not real, empty," and so forth. There are different variations of that. But actually what you're doing is taking away, in that moment, in those moments, a doing that has just become so habitual and so unconscious that you don't even recognize it's a doing. You understand? So you can view that as well as a kind of less doing.

So when Bahiya—who knows the story of Bahiya and the Buddha? Monarchy, surely you know the story of Bahiya. Yes. "In the seen, just the seen." What does it mean? What's the Buddha getting at? It's bare attention, right? In the seen, just the seen. You could read it that way.

You could read it as: "In the seen, just the seen. Let's see what else"—S-E-E-N, not S-C-E-N-E—"Let's investigate what else we're adding to the seen habitually, unconsciously, through avidya, through ignorance, that we don't even realize. And in the seen, just the seen—let's start taking those things away. See what happens."

And that's why the Bahiya Sutta ends with a description of the cessation of consciousness and perception, of the unfabricated. There's no air, earth, fire, water, no sun, no moon, no nothing. There's no form, no perception there. If it meant just bare attention—he's given Bahiya this instruction of bare attention, Bahiya has gone and done his bare attention practice—then what should Bahiya end up with? He would end up with some kind of vivid sense of this moment and its pristine sort of reality. That's what you get from bare attention practice.

But if you actually think about "in the seen, just the seen," maybe hidden in there is a teaching about what else is there. Can we remove those factors and then see what you get? And what will happen is all these factors are fabricators. Every time—to just say in different ways what I said before—every time we're sensing something with an unconscious me-mine or an unconscious sense of its reality, it's fabricating that thing. Start taking out those, and there's lots of hidden ones. Even the belief in a present moment—it's hidden in the conception of time. There's a past, there's a future, there's a present. It's so everyday woven in. No one's walking around saying, "It's a present moment." It's not at that level.

Start taking these things away—what's going to happen? You're going to end up unfabricating, unfabricating, unfabricating, end up in the place that's at the end of the Bahiya Sutta, which is "know this, know that"—disappearance of everything. That's why Bahiya became an Arahant. It's not because he... anyway.

Do you understand? So again, how we can read something or hear something a hundred times. I don't know, how many times have you heard about the Bahiya Sutta or read about it? Many. Yeah, it's very common. And we just read and hear, and we're just thinking with the same old—or reading and hearing, listening with the same old fabrication, same old view, same old box—and it filters out any possibility. Actually, maybe—and I don't mind—but maybe there's a whole other level here, and that actually makes sense of the two parts of the Bahiya Sutta, because otherwise they're very strange. It's an udana sutta. Udana means inspired utterance.

The inspired utterance in that sutta is not the familiar passage about "in the seen, just the seen" - which is what you often hear emphasized in teachings as if that's the golden piece, the instruction for attention. The inspired utterance is actually at the end, when the Buddha describes the unfabricated, the cessation.

If you take the whole sutta as meaning one thing, it becomes a very terse instruction. But if you read it that way, it completely disconnects the two parts of the sutta. They simply don't make sense together - they don't belong together. And the udana disappears. The inspired utterance vanishes, and this is significant. That's why you hardly ever hear it mentioned in the context of the Bahiya Sutta. Do you understand?

The principle here is really that there's a way of understanding what insight meditation is or can be. There's a way of framing insight meditation that keeps opening up deeper and deeper into this territory of emptiness, dependent arising. I would like to explore this further - understanding what attention truly is, and understanding these kinds of experiences you're describing. This is so, so important, potentially profoundly fruitful.

Andrew then asked about applying this same interpretive approach to other core texts: "I really enjoyed that exploration. I wonder if you could do the same thing for the Satipatthana Sutta and Anapanasati Sutta - the mindfulness suttas. Is there a way you can find clues to deeper insight within them as well? Maybe even find the jhanas in there somewhere."

Let me offer just one clue from the Satipatthana Sutta for now, and perhaps we'll explore more another time. Who remembers the refrain in the Satipatthana Sutta - the repeated chorus that appears after each foundation?

It describes what you pay attention to, then includes a refrain that's usually translated as something like "attending to arising and ceasing" with regard to vedana, or mind states, or whatever foundation is being discussed. We read this and naturally think it's an instruction about anicca, impermanence.

But the Pali word is actually samudaya. This is the same word the Buddha uses in relation to dependent arising and how suffering arises. When he presents the Four Noble Truths, dukkha is something that samudayas - it arises together, it co-arises. The actual phrase could be interpreted as: "pay attention to origination factors and dissolution factors, factors of arising and factors of ceasing."

To me, it's possible to interpret that refrain as saying: pay attention not just to the fact that things arise and cease, but to how they arise and cease. Coming back to your earlier question - here's a pain, and it arises and ceases. Yes, it's valuable to realize that pain is impermanent, and you can develop that practice by noticing more and more impermanence.

Or I could start getting interested in what we've been talking about—the fact that when there's this kind of attention, a pain intensifies or arises more. When there's that kind of attention, it fades. It gets fabricated more, fabricated less. And I start becoming interested in the origination and dissolution factors of vedanā.

Does that make sense?

There are other suttas—and they're kind of repeated, and I can't remember where—where the Buddha says, you know, how do you move from this level of awakening, I think it's to the final level of awakening, and the Buddha says a practitioner should train themselves to pay attention to the aggregates: vedanā and perception and body and all the rest of it—mental formations, consciousness.

The usual English translation is something like "and see, and pay attention, such as its disappearance, such as its arising, such as its disappearance." But I think the emphasis there is on the such. In other words, how? How is it arising? How is it disappearing? Otherwise, it's just a teaching on impermanence, rather than a teaching on this whole business of the dependent arising of perception.

Is this making sense?

This is what I tend to emphasize as being what I feel is the more interesting, profound, liberating and coherent view. Whether it's what the Buddha meant, I'm not particularly interested in that. It's what I tend to teach.

Now, of course, like I said, noticing impermanence is important. Just relatively speaking, the liberative power and the kind of radicality of what gets uncovered is of a whole different order. Because to say that everything's impermanent is—okay, you could say it's radical—but to say that nothing really exists at all as anything is a whole other level of radicality, to me. It's a whole other level of whoa—we've just gone to a whole shift in our reality view.

So this is, again, people will know that's what I tend to emphasize, but the impermanence thing is really important too, and fruitful.

Is that okay for now? I think we're definitely going to need to end, so why don't we have a bit of quiet together?

Thank you, everybody. Time for tea.

CHAPTER 217

Jhānas and Insight

Rob Burbea · 1h36

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea examines the deep interconnection between jhāna practice and insight meditation, challenging common assumptions about their relationship. Rather than viewing concentration and insight as sequential practices, Burbea presents them as part of a single spectrum of fabrication and unfabrication. He explores how awakening involves knowing the radical emptiness of all phenomena - including self, objects, awareness, time, and even awakening itself - and how this understanding directly relates to the cessation of suffering through the release of clinging to what we perceive as real.
>
> Burbea demonstrates how jhānas naturally lead to insight by unfabricating the sense of self, objects, and dukkha, while simultaneously showing how insight practice can open access to jhānic states. He discusses the crucial concept of 'ways of looking' (the manner of relating, conceiving, and sensing phenomena) and how skillful ways of looking reduce fabrication at increasingly subtle levels. The talk includes practical guidance on working with the Twelve Links of Dependent Origination (paṭiccasamutpāda) as a framework for understanding how different levels of avijjā (ignorance) create varying degrees of fabrication in our experience.
>
> Drawing connections to advanced practices, Burbea explains how specific insight approaches correspond to particular jhānas, and how the 'after-effects on perception' from jhānic states can profoundly transform our ordinary experience of reality. This comprehensive exploration offers both theoretical understanding and practical direction for integrating concentration and wisdom practices into a unified path of liberation.

Thank you.

What I would like to talk about today is primarily the relationship of jhanas and insight—something about that at least, quite a lot about that. In a way it's fortuitous some of what came up in the Q&A yesterday regarding some of the questions really elicited a sort of outlining, explaining of a kind of different way of framing what insight could be. So we've already made good headway with a lot of this, the insight part at least.

Some of you have heard or read many times this regarding the insight part, have heard or read this kind of thing many times. It's been framed to you many times. For some of you this will be really quite new. Fine either way. My experience teaching this over the years is that to really fully understand what we're saying here—or rather this framework for an understanding of what insight could be or how we can understand the journey of insight and what we're doing and actually the journey of Dharma—so it's not just insight meant, it's actually how the whole thing fits together and can kind of fit together quite coherently in a way that it just goes really into the depths in a very coherent way and the whole Dharma coheres in that. That framework really takes a while to fully understand. It takes really a while to really understand the implications of it.

To me part of the reasons for presenting the Dharma this way or presenting insight this way is because the implications are profound and coherently profound. It's very, very rare for someone to fully understand this and fully understand its implications on two or three hearings or readings or something like that, or even sometimes ten. You may think you do, or one may think one does, but experience has shown me over some years of teaching that actually even when people think they do, there's more here to really grasp this.

So if it feels like, "What the hell are you talking about?" That's all fine and normal because this is a process of understanding something and it should be. If you feel like, "Yeah, yeah, yeah, I know all that," then maybe that might be the time to sort of question a little bit. It takes time. It takes repetition. It takes pondering. And again, this kind of active pondering.

Someone told me they came, did a long retreat and we worked together. And then they went back home and very wisely, I thought, were trying to fit this framework that I'm going to explain about insight and that we've already touched on, were trying to fit it into frameworks of Dharma or insight meditation that they already knew. "It must just be aversion at that or whatever." And after a lot of hard thinking and a lot of intelligence, they realized that they couldn't. Actually, it was something quite different. But the point I'm trying to make is about the active pondering and the active wrestling with something and practice. So it's quite rare for someone to have done all that with this. So if you feel confused, there's good grounds for that. Hopefully not just because I'm completely incoherently babbling. That may be the case.

It's also, some of you will know, a lot of what I'm going to say today regarding insight and emptiness and that business forms really the conceptual foundation for soul-making Dharma and it's kind of what gives legitimacy to soul-making Dharma and doesn't just make you as a soul-making Dharma practitioner easily consignable to the fruitcake bin.

So, back to repeating. Some of this we've said already, either yesterday or earlier in the retreat, but still, because it's difficult to really see how it all coheres and really digest that in one's being, repeating a bit. And some will be repeat from, as I said, near the beginning and some perhaps from yesterday, but perhaps in different words, different approaches.

Perhaps most common in the Dharma world with regards to jhana practice is a kind of view: first you practice your jhanas and you get that together, or rather first in a session even, first you do your jhanas, then you do your insight. And if you're not into jhanas because either they're dangerous or taboo or they're ridiculously too difficult to reach, first you practice your concentration, you're steadying your mind, then you do your insight. That's a kind of normal way to come across that.

That's perhaps the common view. First the concentration, if no jhana or concentration, then the insight. As I pointed out in one of the other talks and I gave that example when we went through all those Pali words, to me reading that passage and kind of getting a sense of the context of it and similar passages in the Pali Canon, this is really a very contrived formula that the Buddha is presenting in a certain teaching situation. The whole thing is probably a contrivance. First you do jhana one, then you do jhana two in a session, then you do jhana three, then you do jhana four, and then you do vipassana or whatever.

If you kind of get a grasp of the session and who he's talking to, it's not really an instruction for the meditator who sits down and does this thing in order. I don't think you could, but to me it doesn't read—there's nothing convincing there at all to suggest that this is what you need to do in your 45 minutes of sitting or whatever.

So first the usual view: first your concentration, then your insight. And you can, one could look at passages like that and say, "Well, the Buddha's saying it, look at this." But I don't actually view such passages as actual meditation instructions really at all.

And again, repeating other stuff we've said, there's a view that when you're concentrating the mind, you're sharpening the mind, you're making it more pointy, its ability to point, and you're sharpening Manjushri's sword. Manjushri is the bodhisattva of wisdom. So really what you're doing in concentration, the most important thing that you're doing is sharpening the mind.

Making the cut so finely through its profound sharpness that it reveals the ultimately true atomic nature of things—the momentary arising and passing of the five aggregates through time, occurring with extraordinary rapidity. If I sharpen my sword enough, I can perceive this fundamental process.

Or again, as we explored earlier, one might hold the view that concentration practice essentially gathers the energy of the mind like a laser beam. This laser beam of intense energy becomes focused on something—directed at layers of rock. Because of its intensity, because of the power of this gathered and concentrated mental energy, the laser beam can drill down through successive layers: through rock layers of construction, through rock layers of fabrication, through rock layers of illusion, penetrating all the way down until it reaches something called reality.

Or there's the perspective that concentration makes the mind so steady, so imperturbably steady, that this unwavering gaze cannot help but see the truth of things. We don't perceive the nature of things clearly because our gaze lacks sufficient steadiness—it wobbles, becomes micro-distracted or hugely distracted. But if we can simply gaze unwaveringly at something, this will reveal how things truly are.

Another idea, sometimes explicit, sometimes implicit in teachings, suggests that eliminating thought is the primary goal of concentration practice. In this view, thought becomes the problem, the enemy, the obscurer of truth. When we eliminate thought through concentration, we lift the veils concealing reality, because thought itself obscures our vision. We lift these veils to reveal the real world beneath.

These represent various explicit or implicit conceptions of what we're accomplishing and how concentration fits into our practice.

Then, perhaps more recently—though to some degree present throughout Buddhism's history—there's the idea that awakening doesn't actually involve any extraordinary or deep insight or realization. In this understanding, awakening simply involves an ordinary sense of things, the ordinary sense of the world that everyone would agree upon, but without the tendency toward gross papañca—that familiar pattern of becoming caught up, self-obsessed, and making mountains out of molehills. Just the ordinary sense of things, no extraordinary insight, without the tendency for gross papañca, and with a reduction of the three kilesas: the three primary defilements of greed, aversion, and delusion.

This raises the question: what exactly do we mean by delusion if there's no extraordinary realization involved? In some models, delusion and papañca become equivalent. Papañca, because it creates chaos everywhere, essentially becomes delusion—believing all kinds of nonsense, swimming in that murky, turbulent soup of proliferating thoughts and reactions. This is what we eliminate when we uproot avijjā.

Alternatively, avijjā might be more precisely defined as belief in a real personality—believing in the self as a concrete reality. In this framework, awakening doesn't involve any special change or insight about the nature of things, just the ordinary sense of the world with less papañca, less greed and ill-will, plus the end of belief in personality. Instead, one develops belief in the process of aggregates unfolding through time—understanding that the true nature of the self is this process of momentary aggregates arising and passing: five aggregates of body-mind arising, passing, momentary.

In this last system and its variations, jhāna practice may have no place at all. Why would you need jhāna practice if there's no extraordinary or deep insight or realization into the nature of things? It's just the ordinary sense of things with less papañca.

Perhaps jhāna finds its place precisely in this—as a kind of retraining of the mind into the habit of non-papañca. This is what occurs in jhāna: the papañca quiets significantly, and that becomes jhāna practice's purpose. You're simply accustoming yourself to less papañca until the mind is weaned off the habit of papañca entirely. So jhāna either embodies that state or somehow contributes to the lessening of gross papañca.

There are variations of this view to different degrees.

As I pointed out before—and this is absolutely crucial—all of these perspectives quite rightly need to situate the view of concentration, and thus of jhāna practice, coherently within a larger framework that must begin with the fundamental question: where am I going? What is awakening?

The view of awakening must be intimately connected with one's understanding of truth and reality. These go together—the view of awakening and the view of truth and reality are inseparably linked.

Someone may not have even thought this way, but it needs to be to some degree coherent this way. The view of awakening is tied in with what is the view of truth and reality. If I'm absolutely fixed on a certain view of truth and reality—this world as it seems to common sense post Isaac Newton and Descartes and all those people is the reality of things—my awakening or my vision of awakening has to fit into that view.

Whatever it is, the view of awakening tied in with that is the view of truth and reality, and drawing on that or emerging from that is the view of what insight is. Do you see how these fit together? View of awakening, truth and reality, insight. Insight is what opens up truth and reality, and that gives me awakening.

And then the last stage: within all that framework, I have to situate coherently what is my conceptual framework, what's my view of jhānas or no jhānas, jhānas, what for? And as we said before, what do I emphasize within jhāna practice? So what I emphasize moment to moment—am I really fussing over this, can I stay with the nostrils or whatever—how much I emphasize that and how much I even get upset or not at its success or failure in the moment is actually determined by this larger scale structure. How does my ability to stay at the nostrils relate to insight? What do I mean by insight? Is it related to what's my view of reality and truth? And that's related to awakening. You see how all this nestles together? It must.

Now, it needs to be to some degree coherent, but all this fits together in different models, different paradigms. What's also quite common is that if someone is supportive of jhāna practice, then jhānas contribute to insight—so jhānas lead to insight. Much less so the other way around. Insight is much less regarded as insight practice, as a process, or insight per se, having insights as something that opens up the jhānas or delivers the jhānas. So the causality is one way. And that's probably, again, what most of you have come across, right? Jhānas go to insight.

What we were saying here earlier in the retreat is that jhānas are not enough for liberation, which we said, but they have their part in what contributes to liberation alongside other factors—not just insight, but other factors that we talked about. So jhānas contribute to liberation, awakening. Jhānas are part of the pool of factors that open up liberation. Insight is a large contributing factor to liberation as well.

Jhānas can bring insight, absolutely. Jhānas should deliver insight. What we want to go into today is how. How do jhānas bring insight? But also I want to stress that insight leads to jhānas. So another way into jhānas is through insight. Or if you're doing insight practice in what I would say is the most fruitful way, jhānas are going to be very available on that road. And so insight leads to jhānas. And the question in both directions is how? How?

So, not wanting to dismiss any of these other conceptions at all, but really wanting to add to them. There are some modifications I would definitely make to some of them regarding views about what's ultimately true and what's ultimately real, but it's all good. There is a place for the laser beam. There is a place for all the rest of it.

But in addition to all those views, all those ways of conceiving with necessary ontological modifications, what we would like to say is that an awakened person knows something deeply. To know something deeply means not just as an idea, not just in the head, but in the heart and in the being. They know something deeply and they can engage that knowing in their very sense of things. And they can engage that knowing deliberately in their very sense of things. It's a deep heart knowing.

And what do they know? They know the emptiness of all phenomena. That's what an awakened person knows. The emptiness, the total emptiness of all phenomena, the total radical emptiness of all phenomena. Which means a phenomena is empty and it doesn't leave any bit of itself or any level of itself that's not empty. That's what the radical bit means—it goes to its root. An awakened person knows deeply the emptiness of all phenomena. There is no electron, no basic unit of matter that is not empty. This happens to agree with current understanding of physics, but that may or may not change.

But there's no electron, there's no basic building block of matter that's not empty. There is no self or self-view or conception of the self that is ultimately true—or to say it the other way around, that's not empty. All conceptions, all views of the self are empty. This is what an awakened person knows.

The energy body is empty. Space is empty—and not just empty of having things in it, but empty of having independent existence, of existing independently of the way of looking, of having inherent existence. Awareness is empty. Awareness is not fundamental. Consciousness is not fundamental. It too is empty. Time is empty—not just past and future, but the present moment too, empty. Awakening is also empty. So this is what an awakened person knows.

And to say they're empty means, as we said yesterday, that none of these things, no phenomenon whatsoever, exists independently of the way of looking. It exists as this or as that, dependent on the way of looking. And it exists as anything at all, dependent on a way of looking. It does not fabricate as a phenomenon unless the way of looking makes it fabricate as a phenomenon.

So what's that got to do with freedom from suffering? Is it obvious what it's got to do with freedom from suffering?

As Derek said, we only cling to what we think is real. When I first started teaching this, and I realized I was going on and on about this stuff, some people would ask, "Well, why are you talking about this?" It was as if it was some abstract philosophy. But no, it's intimately, directly connected with suffering.

Suffering comes from clinging and craving, right? That's pretty much what most Buddhists believe. Soulmakers also believe that—we have something else called eros, but we're not going into that today. Craving and clinging are what cause suffering. Take them away and the suffering goes away. You should know this at some level, or you wouldn't be here if you didn't know it.

But we only crave and cling to what we sense is real. When we realize something is not real, we don't cling or crave. We don't try to get rid of it. So the sense of self, the sense of an object or other, the sense of time—all these things. Seeing the emptiness means seeing that they're not really real in the way that we thought they were. We say they're neither real nor not real. But that's enough to take away the sense of inherent reality that we usually have in relation to things, dependent on which our craving and clinging gets established, and dependent on that craving and clinging, our suffering.

Do you understand? This is really important.

How does an awakened person get to such knowledge, such a far-out-sounding understanding? Knowledge, again, is in the heart, in the whole being. One way is by playing with what we call ways of looking, which we talked about again yesterday and several other times. Way of looking means the way of relating, the way of conceiving, the way of viewing, the way of sensing—everything that's wrapped up in that relationship with any phenomena, any experience, perception, appearance in the moment. That's what we mean by way of looking. Everything that's wrapped up in there.

One can begin playing with different ways of looking and one starts to see, like a scientist—oh, well this way of looking, when I look that way, like when we're in the middle of papañca, when I look that way it actually fabricates more suffering. Suffering gets worse or gets locked into place. And it actually fabricates more sense of self. The self feels more solid, more separate, more contracted. It fabricates more of whatever it is that I'm tussling with or grasping after, more of an object and more sense of time. Time itself also feels heavier, more pressured. One starts to realize all this.

And because I'm playing with ways of looking, I also start to realize, oh, there are some ways of looking that do the opposite. They release suffering. They unfabricate the self to some degree. They unfabricate objects and things to some degree. They unfabricate—eventually one sees—the sense of time as well.

So those are the interesting ones.

Actually, it's all interesting. Those are the ones I want to follow and develop—the ones that unfabricate suffering, and with the unfabrication of suffering, they unfabricate self and the world of objects and eventually time as well.

One can grow into practicing this way, getting really interested not just in the art of it but in the freedom it delivers in the moment. The delight of practicing this way becomes palpable. Looking at this thing in this way means I'm relating to this thing in this way, and right there and then—I don't have to wait ten months or ten years—right there and then the suffering goes out of experience. The self is less fabricated. The object itself gets less fabricated. There's release, relief, ease, openness. All kinds of mystical states of consciousness begin to open because the self and objects and time are not being fabricated in their usual way. Other senses of things open. Delightful ways of practice.

One gets really interested in that and develops one's range of ways of looking, as well as one's depth. In other words, learning to—as we said yesterday—recognize that some ways of looking let go of a little bit of clinging, while some ways of looking that we can develop let go of clinging at a whole deeper level, a much subtler level of clinging. Because they do that, they have even more power in unfabricating, because it's the clinging—and I use that word very widely—but it's the clinging that's fabricating. It's fabricating not just the suffering but also the self, objects, the world, time, and so on.

So one develops one's range and one's skill and one's depth, going deeper and deeper into this learning to unfabricate more through the ways of looking that one is developing through practice.

We talked about, for example, pleasure and pain and equanimity, and said equanimity is a letting go of push and pull. In other words, it's an attenuating and letting go of clinging. As I just do that and do that and do that, the pleasure and pain get less, eventually. The pain might go to pleasure and then get less. I get left with neutral vedanā, neither pleasant nor unpleasant, and eventually that fades. Eventually, as we touched on yesterday, eventually everything fades. No thing, no self, no consciousness in the usual sense, no time, no present moment, no space, no world.

The Buddha had different names for that: the unfabricated, the deathless, cessation of perception and feeling, the unborn—lots of different names. We can open to that something that's incredibly hard to put into language because language is based on a world of things and subjects and objects. But this is possible for us if we just take this one idea of ways of looking. Notice that some fabricate more and some fabricate less, get really interested in that, and just keep going. You can get all the way to the unfabricated just following one principle and playing—having a fun and delightful time doing it.

It doesn't stop there, I would say. Some people would say it stops there: "Now I've realized the unborn." I would say it doesn't stop there, because then one can also see that time is empty as well. One may have seen that getting there, and one may need additional little ways of seeing that. And also, what is fabricated is empty. Fabrications are empty. The things that are fabricated in this process—they're not real things either.

So if time is empty, the time in which the process of fabrication happens also is empty. That means the whole notion—and fabricated things are empty—that means the whole notion of fabrication is empty. So the very idea and thread that we were following, this idea of fabrication, ends up dissolving as well. It's empty too.

When one has reached the unfabricated, the unborn—whatever you want to call it; some people use the word nirvāṇa for that—there can be an extreme duality between that transcending of the world in the unfabricated and the world. The world of saṃsāra, the world of form, the world of struggle, this world that we all agree on. And then there's this that's completely transcendent. This is holy; this is essentially worthless except as a potential stepping stone to that.

Once one has seen that fabrication too is empty, then actually the whole duality collapses as well, because there is no fabricated, and without a fabricated, the unfabricated as an idea doesn't make sense. So that hierarchy of sacredness collapses. Everything empty, everything sacred. Unfabricated, fabricated—no ultimate truth, no place that has, ultimately speaking, more reality, no view that has ultimately more reality than another.

There are only left ways of looking. That's what we have as human beings, as awakened human beings. Only ways of looking.

A huge range and depth of ways of looking. Ways of playing with perception and the art of that. And we can do that then. An awakened person can do that for different ends.

In classical Buddha Dharma, of course, why do I choose this way of looking over that way of looking? It's because I want less suffering. So in this situation, I look at it this way to reduce the suffering. It's just basic Four Noble Truths in condensed version. When you get into soul-making dharma, actually you might choose other reasons for ways of looking that are not primarily the reduction of suffering. That's not really what you're going for. You're going for something else sometimes. There will often in soul-making dharma, of course, be an overlap—in other words, when we choose a view because we want the sacredness there, or the beauty, or the soul-making, that most often also reduces the suffering, but sometimes not. But classical Buddha Dharma, that's why we choose certain things. Everything's oriented to reducing suffering.

Practicing what was that word the Buddha used? Mudubhūta—the malleability of mind, the malleability of perception, the malleability of ways of looking, of views. Or we say playing with perception, meaning playing with perceiving. This is a way of construing what insight practice is: playing with perception and seeing, through playing with perception, what happens when I look this way, when I look that way, when I look a third way, when I look a fourth way, seeing what the perception is. I perceive a certain way, the perception is. The experience, the appearance, the phenomenon depends on the way of looking.

So that in a nutshell is what we could say insight practice is and how it all hangs together.

Now we can understand—and in a way we've hinted at this quite strongly several times already—we can actually understand the jhānas as doing that too. As well as being these really, really valuable resources in all kinds of ways that we've talked about, as well as being certainly the way we're teaching them here and the way you're practicing, as well as developing our sensitivity and our attunement and all the beauty of that and the gifts that gives in all kinds of realms of our life—relational, emotional, energetic, soul-making, et cetera—also for emptiness practices. But as well as resources and sensitivity and everything else we said about the jhānas, we can also view them as playing with perception and begin to understand actually there's one spectrum, one spectrum of more or less fabrication.

Of suffering—dukkha is a better word if we're really... suffering is such a heavy word in English, but dukkha. Sometimes you open to a new level and you wouldn't have considered where you were before has any dukkha in it whatsoever. And it's only when you go deeper that you realize, relatively speaking, the older level, which you've now transcended, had some very subtle dukkha in it. So I prefer the word dukkha because it's a foreign word, it can keep for us a much subtler range than we tend to associate with the word suffering.

But you realize there's one spectrum, one spectrum of dukkha. We can be fabricating a lot, really a lot, somewhat less, somewhat less, somewhat less, all the way down. But that spectrum of fabrication of suffering is the same spectrum as the fabrication of self-sense. They're just two threads of the same rope, of the same spectrum. When we're suffering a lot, the self-sense is fabricated a lot—much more solid, much more contracted, much more separate. But so is the world fabricated. The perception of the world is correspondingly, it's just another thread of that rope of one spectrum.

Is this making sense? And so is clinging, if we use the word broadly enough. This end, the dukkha end, has got a lot of clinging and craving in it. And as I said, when you start engaging practices and really sustaining them and playing with them—practices that take away clinging, craving repeatedly, moment after moment—then we move down that spectrum. And as we take away more subtle levels of clinging and craving, we just find it's the same spectrum.

So this is a spectrum of suffering, it's a spectrum of self-sense, it's a spectrum of object-sense, thing-sense—because they fade as well: sensations, things, sights, sounds, all the rest of it, the world—also of clinging, and also of jhānas. The whole thing is just one... Do you understand? It's one spectrum. We're just talking about different, if you like, threads of a rope. Does this make sense? I'm going through it quite quickly.

A few little things I want to throw in at this point. A little bit came out of Andy's question yesterday, which I'm glad you asked. After a jhāna, in a jhāna, or kind of around the territory of a jhāna—and Andy was asking about the happiness and the sense of self in relation to the happiness—but let me say a couple of things. In the territory of the jhāna, after, in, or around it, sort of perijhānic, a few things happen in relation to classical insights, again, which is tied into what I've just been saying. We're more clear and we're more spacious, so that something like impermanence is just completely obvious to us.

It's just in that space it's obvious that things are impermanent.

Also, because of the yumminess of a jhāna—whichever jhāna—because of the yumminess, it's much easier to see the dukkha, the relative dukkha of other pleasures, or the fact that other pleasures are far less satisfying. When you've tasted a certain, let's say even just really strong pīti and you're truly absorbed in it, it would be hard to match that with any sensual experience, certainly in terms of happiness.

More saliently for what I want to say today—and these are all related because they all have to do with this unfabricating—is that in, around, or after a jhāna, it's much easier to see that phenomena are not self. They're not me, not mine. It's much easier to see. Why?

Tying it to what we just said about this rope, this spectrum of fabrication which has different threads in it—different aspects of the same process that are being fabricated together—the jhāna already is less fabrication of self. And so because the self is less fabricated, what the self habitually does is also less fabricated at the time. One of the things the self habitually does is appropriate: me-mine, me-mine, me-mine, me-mine, without thinking about it. That's what the self does. The more self, the more me-mining, the more appropriation.

As the self gets fabricated less naturally in the jhāna, there's less me-mining. And because there's less me-mining, less appropriation, things are much more likely to appear to us as not me, not mine—anattā, as the Buddha said, not me, not mine. The transition from that point to deliberately viewing things as not me, not mine, is just a very small step because it's already moving in that direction.

So there is in jhānas this attenuation, this unfabricating of self, and that has all these factors unfabricated together. Self is one of them.

However, I want to read a note that I received. This is really, really important:

"You talked about resistance against the idea of having an autonomous self. I felt this was blocking the whole process and made me believe that I had matured in some jhānic states when actually this wasn't the case. Today it feels more like this belief of having matured took me away from actual learning. I then noticed that I tend to stay in a passive, receptive mode during meditation but also in life. When today I actually tried to play with active and receptive modes, finally a strong felt sense of 'I' arose. I am alive. I exist. I am here in this world. I can influence. I can be active. I felt very powerful. Now I can actually find my pace and my way of working. This psychological basis just wasn't developed. What a blessing and lovely fruit of this retreat."

This is really, really important because it stands in apparent contradiction to what I just said, but an important contradiction. I've just said jhānas are about fabricating less. And here a person was saying that actually, by the way we're practicing jhāna, it does invite the self to be active, to be more autonomous, to see itself and feel itself as more active and autonomous. That sounds like a more separate and more fabricated self, right?

This is why I said at some point in the last few days: careful. You may think, or one might think very understandably, "I need a jhāna to heal something." And it may be that it's not the jhāna itself that we need to heal something. For some people it is—they need to just really bathe in that third jhāna, whatever it is. But probably more often than not, it's something in the ways that we're adopting to work that heals something psychologically and has its mirror in life. The freeing and opening and reclaiming that's mirrored in life may be more significant than whether I have attained this or that jhāna.

When we talked about this, I mentioned the ability to stay and choose to be intense and choose to show up that way—me being intense, and the "me" can be quite a subtle sense but it's still there. I have to sustain something, or opening, really opening the being, surrendering, abandoning. Or what this person is sharing, or the happiness that's a kind of emotional range that I don't usually let myself experience. There are many examples, but here's a very important exception.

Can you understand what we're saying here? Everything's tied together—these threads of one rope.

So revisiting our idea of working with pain and being able to look at pain so that it unfabricates, or we refabricate an unpleasant sensation in the body as pleasant pīti or happiness or whatever it is—let me be clear about this, because someone might hear about that and think something particular.

When you're meditating, there's pain. But sometimes, because of the meditation, you're relaxing, and the relaxation allows the tissues—the muscular tissues—to relax and therefore expand. They're not squeezing on the blood vessels (excuse me if my biology is completely wrong), so I'm not getting pins and needles. They're taking the pressure off the system and the tension. Some pain disappears just because of organic biological relaxation reasons.

So yes, absolutely, there's a level that happens there. And to start talking about emptiness just for that would be a complete misuse of the word emptiness and would be easily dismissible. But there is some of that going on. There's an organic reality to it—we can explain it in real organic terms, in terms of real organicity.

Secondly, though, is the level of the energy body. So there's the level of physical body—muscles and blood vessels and nerves and all the rest of it. But then there's the level of the energy body. And the energy body changes. This was like a definition of the first four jhānas, certainly the first five jhānas at least—there are changes in the energy body, and the energy body becomes more homogeneous, more unified, and has a different vibration.

Another way we could understand what the energy body is: the energy body is a kind of reality that straddles the physical and the mental. It spans those strata, so that it is, for instance, susceptible to the mind state. The mind state changes, the energy body changes. Mind state is obviously a mental factor. It's extremely susceptible and malleable through the mind, and we've talked about using the imagination. Why? Imagination is in the mind, and the energy body experience—the way the energy body is, how the energy body is—will be affected by what's in the mind. If I imagine this, if I imagine that.

We don't tend to think in these terms anymore in our culture. Probably back in medieval times there were certain strata of reality, ontological categories that spanned both the physical and the mental. The energy body is one of them.

So there's that level too, and that's happening in jhāna and that's happening when a pain dissolves through meditation, through jhāna. And there's a level of playing with perception and the fact that actually the pain is unfabricating and it's empty and therefore malleable and therefore can be refabricated.

So there are all these three levels: a level of organic reality, so to speak; a level of energy body, which spans physical and mental; and the level of emptiness and playing with perception. They're all part of that experience.

Yesterday when we talked about Bāhiya and this idea of bare attention—which that sutta doesn't use those words, "bare attention," nor are they anywhere in the Pali canon, nor to my mind do I even know what the Pali would be for bare attention—but anyway, or even mindfulness, the way many people would understand what mindfulness is, or in the past have understood what mindfulness is (maybe it's changing now, I don't know)—it's still, despite not being ultimate, if we fit it into this whole idea of a spectrum of fabrication, then actually it just fits nicely at some point on the spectrum of fabrication.

When I'm engaging bare attention, there are certain things I'm not adding to the experience. I'm not adding a lot of papañca. I'm not adding a lot of views and concepts, and I'm not layering over that way. That's probably how you've been taught about bare attention, right?

So I'm doing a similar thing here. When we talked yesterday about taking things out of the way of looking that are automatically there—also in bare attentional mindfulness, the stuff we're taking out. So it's a relatively skillful way of looking. There's a modicum in it of unfabrication, or it involves a modicum to a degree where we're fabricating less. You understand?

The mistake would be to think that what we sense through bare attention is an unfabricated reality.

If I've approached this whole question of fabrication with a presupposition about where unfabricating stops, about what actually is real and what is not, do you understand? It makes a huge difference. I'll come back to this. The concept that I've started with was limited. It wasn't an open-ended investigation, despite whatever rhetoric might be dressing it up. I've actually limited something. I arrive at that limit and then call it ultimate reality. It's still very skillful though. On this rope of unfabricating, on this spectrum of unfabricating, it's still somewhere. It's more toward that end, but still, relatively speaking, it brings less suffering, less self, less of all the rest of it.

Thinking about the jhānas and their relationship to insight, I mentioned this phrase that I use—it must be a more elegant phrase, but what I call "after effects on perception." This, to me, is hugely significant: this idea of the after effects of certain states of consciousness on our perception. These after effects imply something about the dependent arising of experience, and correspondingly they imply something about the emptiness of our perceptions.

So these after effects, as we move through more territory jhānically and in other kinds of states, there's a spilling over outside of the meditation into how we sense the world. After effects on perception—out there on the lawn, on your walk, with the lunch bowl in front of you, whatever. They open new worlds and new experiences for us.

Usually this business about after effects on perception gets really potent with the formless jhānas. But I tend to think the first glimpses of it come with the third jhāna. I mentioned that world of peace and so forth. However, the other day I got a lovely note—actually from a few days ago. "For some reason I hesitate to write these non-questions, non-issue notes, but since you seem to enjoy the one from earlier, here's the epilogue." This is from our friend of the radiant Buddhas.

"Seeing everyone as radiant Buddhas was so lovely, so delightful that I was back in the second jhāna by the time I made it outside. I then spent forty-five minutes wandering around the grounds and marveling at how everything seemed shot through with joy."

So the after effect on perception is basically that the primary nimitta starts to color things. Things are colored, things are seen that way.

"I stopped in my tracks and mouthed 'wow' at the sight of the old fruit crates piled by the outdoor loo, the bins by the hermitage, the hedge by the nuns' graveyard, the dead leaves on the path—all of it radiant with happiness and light and something beyond, something blessed. And if that's not enjoyment... wow."

Sometimes this is subtle and sometimes very powerful. It can happen not just from jhānic states, but from all kinds of states. I said usually you get the first glimpse in the third jhāna—this person is saying no, earlier—but it gets very marked in the formless jhānas. It can have a very clearly, very profound and touching impression on the being, on the sense of existence.

If these experiences are repeated enough—if it's just a one-off, you tend to think something was weird in your brain, or you forget about it, or it becomes just this thing you don't quite know how to get back to. But if it's repeated enough, and they can come from lots of other non-jhānic states as well, other perceptions, other ways of looking, you're going in and out of normal perception and this kind of perception. For example, let's take from this person's note: in and out, in and out. Many times. At some point you start thinking, "Well, which is the real way things are? Which is real?"

Are things not shot through with joy? Is the universe just purposeless and cold, or very hot matter in the Newtonian sense? Or is there some way that joy is mystically woven into the fabric of the cosmos? That joy perhaps is the essence of things—the divine essence of things? Or that there's a joy that shines through things, a transcendent joy, and that transcendent joy shines through this world of appearances, this world that we call the world, this world that we've grown so accustomed to sensing in other ways, in disenchanted ways?

It goes back and forth, back and forth so many times. Which is actually real here? Which is real? How do I know? Which mind state, which way of looking reveals the way things really are?

Do you have that? Or lines, you know what lines are? Kidding. It's good that I've practiced a lot of equanimity.

Years ago, we did a retreat - I think three years in a row - called "Loving-kindness and Compassion as a Path to Awakening," something like that. Maybe some of you were even on it. This was 2006, seven, eight, I think. It was a three-week or three-and-a-half-week retreat. First week we did metta, second week compassion, and by the third week, after people had developed this really quite strong current of metta and compassion - people would say you could walk into the meditation hall and it was like cutting through thick air, so saturated with love.

After they had developed that stream, I gave them a practice of deliberately directing that metta and compassion not to beings, self or others, but to phenomena. This sensation, this sound, this pain, whatever it was. I let them explore this for a while, then came back and asked, "Did anyone notice that when you were doing that, the phenomena you were directing metta to actually faded?"

There's almost a law here. That's what the Buddha calls it - dependent arising is the law. The word for Dharma is law. To trust this enough is like putting a cake in the oven. You set it, go away, come back, and this will have happened. For most people, yes. It's a law. They faded.

Then there's a question. Here was a phenomenon, a sensation, an experience, a perception. When I direct metta or compassion to it, it fades, it unfabricates, it disappears to some degree or completely. Amazing. Similar to the kinds of things we've been exploring.

Then you ask, "How much metta reveals the real thing? The real sensation? The real self? A little or a lot, because metta is a skillful quality? Somewhere in the middle - do we need exactly a medium amount to reveal the real way things are?"

Mindfulness, as we said yesterday, is actually a composite. It's all attention. Mindfulness is always with something else, with many other things. Those qualities, that composite of qualities, determine the fabrication, the unfabrication, the locking into a certain level of fabrication of whatever phenomenon the mindfulness is observing.

Derek might like to say, "Not mindfulness - equanimity," because equanimity gives this sense of balance. But we've already explored that. The more equanimity means the less push and pull. That's how we've defined equanimity. Less push and pull is the same as less clinging. If I just practice that, getting more and more equanimous, at a certain point the phenomena will fade.

How much clinging reveals the real object? Here's this phenomenon, this pain, even a sight or sound that's continuous. How much clinging reveals the real object? A lot? A little? None? If it's none, then where's the object, because it's completely faded? A medium amount?

This is what we mean by saying something is empty. I cannot privilege a certain amount of clinging or metta or equanimity. I cannot privilege any particular way of looking or any amount of what's wrapped up in the way of looking to reveal the real way something is. In other words, it's empty. It doesn't exist independently. There's no zero point anywhere.

When we get to the formless realms - although clearly someone has already had very strong experiences, maybe others as well - these aftereffects on perception start to go up a notch in their power. What they can deliver in the worlds they open up, these aftereffects and the sense of things, the way they influence the sense of existence, impact the sense of existence, open up the very sense of the cosmos.

An interesting thing when you get there is that the strength and even the impact of the aftereffect on perception is not actually predictable from the strength and degree of absorption of the meditation just before. I take that as good news. You might think, "Oh, I got a really strong seventh jhana, so I expect a really strong aftereffect." Maybe, maybe not. Or you got there sort of - it was in the neighborhood of the seventh jhana, but it wasn't really...

It wasn't really... I was not quite consolidated or deep or whatever. And I get up and afterwards, the after effect is really strong.

So it's telling me something: don't worry too much. It's samyojana all over again. Yes, I go for more absorption. Yes, I go for more samadhi, and so forth. But there's no end to that. And now we're adding, in terms of these after effects on perception, which again, in terms of liberation, the way I would conceive it - a whole different sense of the cosmos, a whole different sense of existence is what the awakened person knows - how absorbed I am at any time in any sitting may not relate to how much opening there is afterwards in terms of the after effect on perception and the world, the sense of the cosmos that opens up.

To me, that's good news. I don't have to worry about it too much. I've got direction to go in, but I'll be surprised by the fruits afterwards.

So we said one spectrum, one spectrum of fabrication - more or less, one way of viewing things. And in a way, like I said, you can actually put the whole Dharma in kind of... the whole Dharma can be seen as relating to or pertaining to or even emerging from that one understanding. Everything. We talked about generosity - same deal. Things that don't seem like they have to do with obvious ways of looking - same deal.

But to be less fabricated means less is getting fabricated, less is getting built. There's less there in the perception. So less solidity, less substantiality. Going back to earlier in the retreat, I was saying, well, it looks like things are kind of... almost like I could put my hand through the walls. There's a perception of less solidity and less substantiality also to the body, also to the energy body.

Another way of saying that is there's more refinement. We've talked about this word "refinement" and the refined cloth - less substance, less solidity - or refining gold or flour or something. There's less solidity, there's less substance.

Again, something I've said before: if I'm unsure with this new experience I've had, if I'm unsure, "Is that the next jhana? Is that the next deepest jhana?" One probably almost more important clue than any other is: Is it more refined? Does its texture feel more refined? Which isn't the same as "Is it stronger or calmer or weaker?" Is it more refined? Its actual texture is more refined.

I think I'll come back to this another time, what I'm going to say right now, but I'll mention it now. There are several suttas - I think I mentioned it yesterday, where the Buddha talks about establishing oneself, I did mention it yesterday, establishing oneself in a jhana, any jhana, and actually taking that jhana itself as an object on which to practice certain insight ways of looking. Let's come back to it hopefully later in the retreat.

In other words, you hold that jhanic perception in attention - the primary nimitta and everything else that's involved - and very precisely, in a very exact way, you start removing different kinds and levels of what I'm going to call clinging in relation to that jhana. I use that word "clinging" to include also appropriation, me-mine, or even me-mine of the attention - not just the primary nimitta, but also the attention being paid. That's also not me, not mine. So clinging is a big word. I use it to mean that and more.

But basically that's what you're doing. With the jhana - and it's helpful because it's a steady object, it's very, very steady - and then you start taking things away. So this is a kind of very advanced way of practicing, but it's actually very powerful and very available for people who want to go down that road and develop it.

What happens when I do that? What would we expect to happen if I do that on the first jhana? I think I'm hearing all the right things. It will fade. Piti will stop, or it will go to the second jhana. All of the above.

So it could just go to the second jhana. Why? Because the second jhana is a less fabricated state. If piti fades completely, something is fading and it will go to the third jhana if it fades completely. Or just generally speaking, it will fade.

But the spectrum again is all one thing. So it will go down the spectrum of the jhanas. But this fading business is unfabricating business. You know, sometimes it's like being in an elevator and it just... okay, stops at every floor. But sometimes you're just in an elevator and it just goes whoosh and you've missed all the floors.

It's just gotten like, oh, everything's gone now. But the point is that there's an unfabricating going on. And again, the jhanic spectrum fits into this spectrum of unfabrication.

Why do things fade with an insight way of looking? Why is there less fabrication with an insight way of looking? That's not entirely a fair question, because to explain something, you have to rely on something else to use it to explain it.

If we think about the twelve links of dependent origination, how do we explain fading, unfabricating, based on the twelve links of dependent origination? Where does that fit in? Where exactly?

Everyone's right. Nama-rupa is the fourth link. It's presented as if it's in order, but that's not a really helpful way of looking at it. Usually the first—but it's the first in terms of being the most fundamental—is avijja, which means delusion. The fourth one is nama-rupa, and nama-rupa, the Buddha says, involves different factors. It includes vedana and perception. The way I'm using the word perception, going back to the beginning of the retreat, is synonymous with phenomenon, experience, appearance, perception. They're all the same thing.

Clinging and craving come later, or they seem as if they come later when it's thought of linearly, but it shouldn't be thought of linearly. It should be thought of as a completely interlinked web that's not a linear process in time. And self seems to come really at the end with becoming and birth, right, if you think of the whole thing in a momentary way. But to think of the thing more, as I said, not as a linear process in time, not a process in time so much—when I'm engaging an insight way of looking, what defines an insight way of looking is clinging less, craving less.

So it seems to come afterwards. But if we don't think of it linearly, it basically has an effect on the fabrication of self, which seems to come later after craving, clinging, becoming, birth. That's where people usually put the self. So you can see that: less clinging, less self is fabricated, and then less dukkha and all the nasty stuff at the end. That bit's clear.

But it works, as I said, not linearly as well. So it will work back to this—what's actually the fourth link, nama-rupa—of which one element is perception and another element is vedana. So that decreasing clinging decreases—they're not on-off switches. Again, each one is a slider switch. Less clinging, craving; less self; less dukkha; less also nama-rupa, which means less perception and vedana, less experience and vedana. There's a fading, right?

Avijja is the first link, and as I said it's not the first in a temporal process; it's the first in terms of what the Buddha said: this is the fundamental problem. Everything rests on this in that sense. What's avijja? Avijja is a lot of things, or rather has a lot of different levels. When I'm engaging an insight way of looking, you could say I'm engaging a view that has less avijja in it.

So when I—going back to what Andy shared, this example of seeing something, sensing something as not-me, not-mine—to sense something as me or mine habitually, unconsciously, has more habitual ignorance, delusion, avijja in it than to sense it as not-me or not-mine.

Let's contrast two ways of looking. One is the normal way of looking that we have in 99% of our states of consciousness: something is always me-mine. This pain is me-mine, or this pleasure is me-mine, or whatever. It's always me-mine. I'm not thinking it, but it's just there—me-mine. That's one. The Buddha calls that appropriation. It's based on a self-view.

He calls it avijja.

When I engage an insight way of looking—for example, anatta—I'm actually looking at "not me, not mine." So you could say what I've done there is take away that particular element, that particular level of avijja, which usually sees things as me or mine.

So avijja, again, it's not an on-off switch. Less avijja in any moment, in a way of looking, means less perception. And it also means less clinging and less self. Do you understand?

So this is mapping this understanding onto the twelve links of dependent origination. They're not on-off switches. If you put a lot of avijja in your way of looking, you're going to get a much more fabricated perception, much more clinging and craving, much more suffering, much more self-sense. If I take away a lot of avijja—let's say I've got it half full—then I'm going to get less perception, less suffering, less clinging, less self.

If I get avijja really, really low, that's another way an insight way of looking can work. It's not so much by relaxing clinging, but actually by changing avijja. In the moment, I'm taking away—again, I think I'm doing, but I'm actually non-doing—I'm taking away the habitual avijja that's programmed in my way of looking at any point.

Does it make sense, how all this fits together with dependent arising? And this, to me, is what the Buddha is pointing at when he talks about dependent arising—what's the most important thing the Buddha's pointing at when he gives this teaching.

What one finds is that with a lot of this, and especially with the formless realms, a specific insight way of looking kind of goes with a specific jhana. If I practice a specific insight way of looking, it leads to a specific jhana, and a specific jhana opens me up to a specific insight way of looking.

A very good example of this is the seventh jhana, the realm of nothingness. After one emerges from the seventh jhana, if the aftereffect on perception is reasonably strong, one can be moving around and looking around and recognizing there are things, but there's a more compelling sense that these things are not really things. The thingness of them is an illusion. There are no things. So the jhana, in its aftereffect on perception, has delivered an insight that there are no things.

But one can also work the other way around. If in meditation I sit down and engage the way of looking—no thing, there are no things, everything is a dependent arising, everything is fabricated in this way—it will take me to the seventh jhana. So specific insights and specific jhanas correspond, and the causality, as so often is the case, works both ways.

Or the eighth jhana. One might emerge from that and one of the senses one can have is called "neither perception nor non-perception." One of the aftereffects on perception is "all this is just a perception." And again, one could take that view—just a perception—and engage it repeatedly in meditation, sustaining that view on all phenomena: just a perception, just a perception. It will take me to the eighth jhana. Specific insight, corresponding jhana.

"Is that true for someone who has spent no time in the jhanas?"

It gets qualified a little bit. If you've never spent time in any of those jhanas, but you really engage that practice—I could teach my little niece when she's five to just look at everything and say "no thing, no thing," or "empty of inherent existence." It's not going to take her to the seventh jhana.

But if you understand what that means and very, very delicately, very subtly—it's not a big cogitation thing; we're really talking about a very subtle, delicate, beautiful way of looking—if I understand what that means so that when I say "no thing," it's got all my understanding wrapped up in the way of looking very subtly, very agilely, even if I haven't gone to the seventh jhana, it will take me to the seventh jhana.

If I practice, let's say, anatta—not me, not mine—and I understand that one, I don't quite understand this nothingness thing, but I understand not me, not mine, I know what that means, I can make it work—if I do that and I've already been to the seventh jhana, then the not me, not mine may well take me to the seventh jhana. But if I haven't gone to the seventh jhana before...

It may well not. In other words, sometimes what happens is people open up from these practices as far as they can go. But with training—actually, you can kind of... If they go together, the jhanic training and the insight training, you can kind of stop the elevator. You press the button on the elevator: "I want to get off at floor seven," or whatever. Does that make sense?

So usually we think of insight as something we get. You're meditating, you're being mindful, and you receive an insight—suddenly you really understand the fact of impermanence at another level. And that's a good way of thinking about insight. But this way of thinking about insight is insight as ways of looking. Insight is something we do. We actively decide to perceive in a certain way, to look in a certain way.

Once it gets to a certain level, there's a way that what we're engaging is provisional truths, if you like—a certain degree of less avijjā. So even this thing about no-thing is not quite an ultimate truth. It's pretty deep, but it's still a provisional truth. And what you're really doing is engaging a provisional truth as a way of looking. Through the jhana, you're gaining access to that level of provisional truth, of skillful opening perception.

Jhanas, then, are—as we said—huge resources in all these ways that we've talked about before, as well as providing both indirect and direct insight. Even the second jhana—I think I mentioned earlier on the retreat—just to know and really know firsthand that happiness, that degree of happiness and that much happiness and that depth of happiness is available and is not dependent necessarily on getting something from the external world or from someone else. That's an insight.

We also talked very briefly about the relationship between letting go of aversion and the arising of happiness. So that's also part of the insight there. Or in the third and fourth jhanas, the fact that that kind of peace, that kind of stillness really happens when we let go of push and pull. So all this is this kind of insight woven into jhanic openings.

So jhanas—what can we say? They loosen attachments and they relativize objects for us, meaning our usual sense, our usual perspectives and beliefs about things in the world, about objects, about things that we can get. They certainly relativize, as we were just talking about with the second jhana, they relativize the pleasure that we can get from sense objects. Leaving aside the soul-making teachings of sensing with soul, there's no way that one would get that degree of happiness that you get in the second jhana from any sensual object. It's just of a different order, as we said earlier on the retreat.

In time, or later on, or more and more in time, they relativize the nature of objects too—the relative nature of objects too. So all these perceptions open up, these insight ways of looking, these provisional truths, and we start to see: a thing is a thing, and it's also not a thing. So my very sense of something is different when I've seen that. So not just the relative pleasure of something, but actually the relative nature of something becomes more relativized.

Soul-making Dharma, just very briefly, is dependent—as I said right at the beginning—on this understanding of emptiness and the flexibility of the idea, the potential flexibility of ways of looking. That's at the basis of soul-making Dharma. And soul-making Dharma, for those of you who are into it, also leads to that. It opens up more flexibility and it calls into question the whole idea that there is a fixed way things are: "This is like this and that's like that and that's just how it is." Soul-making Dharma is another way you can pry that open, and it breaks open the whole idea that something is this way or that way in itself.

So both insight into emptiness and also the jhanas, in the way I would teach it, they depend on our willingness to play with perception, depend on our willingness to be malleable with perception. But they deliver for us, they open up for us a malleability of perception—both the insight work into emptiness and the jhanic work.

And we talked about that with pain, and some of you have been experimenting with this and been almost startled at what's possible with unpleasant sensations—that they can become pīti or happiness. What about the mind? Foggy mind, dull mind, agitated mind. To the degree that I know that it's empty, that's also a perception. I have a perception of a mind state. It's a perception. Everything's a perception—just a perception. And knowing that it's empty means, the implication of knowing that it's empty means that it's malleable. It's not a fixed thing. The mind state too.

So that's maybe at some point something one can experiment with too. I've seen it with physical things—pain, unpleasantness. Can I also see the mind state in that way? It's flexible.

And then shape it.

I don't know. I would probably say that all jhānas open up for us or deliver for us a kind of more intuitive capacities. Sometimes that's related to creativity—poems and music and whatever else. There's something in the jhāna, it's almost like they become sources of creative potential or become sources of creativity or creative openings. Intuition, let's say.

But also intuition regarding insight. One of the blessings of jhāna in regard to insight is that it opens up our capacity for intuition in the realm of insight—our intuitive seeing and grasping of things, insight.

I would still say though, other factors are more important. So no matter how much intuition seems like it's opening up intuition regarding insight from jhānic experience, I would still say that gets trumped by what our conceptual framework of the Dharma is and what our conceptual framework of insight is. That will be more important. And if that's limited, it will limit what insight is possible, no matter how much the jhānic opening and how much it feels like, "Yeah, I'm super intuitive and I must be really seeing reality and all that."

So the question comes back to: is my conceptual framework for insight—or of insight—is my conceptual framework of Dharma actually big enough, helpful enough? Will it lead me—because it should, the conceptual framework should actually lead me to more insights—or actually does it hinder and limit? And that will trump any sense of intuitive opening or whatever from the jhāna.

We talked about three ways it's possible to get attached to jhāna. This is the last point now. But when we went into those three ways—attached to the pleasure, attached to the sort of self-grandiosity, or attached to view—actually as we investigated each one, I kind of suggested that it's more likely that the jhāna experience, repeated experience of jhāna releases attachments, including attachments to certain insight views.

I gave the example of the sixth jhāna and just the fact that one experiences something beyond that infinite consciousness—one experiences the seventh jhāna and the eighth jhāna. Just that, and the fact that it's in the map. Both the map and the experience, the conceptual framework and the experience help me go beyond. So I don't get too entrenched and too attached to such a view.

If my conceptual framework—and I might not even be someone who thinks I have a conceptual framework because I don't like conception or I think it's intellectual or I think it's not the real deal or whatever—I do have a concept. You do. Everyone has a conceptual framework. It might be conscious, semi-conscious, or relatively unconscious. It might be coherent or incoherent. It might be muddled or not. It might be mixed with whatever, but you can't not have a conceptual framework, I would say.

But if my conceptual framework, for example, says something like, "This vastness of awareness, that lovely opening that I was describing the other way, precious opening—that sounds like emptiness. When I hear talk about emptiness, it sounds like that. That sounds like the ultimate. When I hear talk about the ultimate, that sounds like the nature of mind. When I hear talk about the nature of mind as the sort of ultimate thing that one wants to open to, or the nature of awareness, that sounds like rigpa." If you know the Vajrayāna teachings, that sounds like when the Buddha talks about consciousness without limit, without feature, that sounds like the radiant mind or whatever that I've heard the Buddha talk about or other teachers talk about or read about.

Especially when we get into Vajrayāna teachings, the language can get quite confusingly similar and not differentiated enough, really, as signposts.

So if I've got that kind of conceptual framework and I experience this vastness of awareness and I've got no further or deeper experience than that vastness of awareness, nor have I got any way—any way—I don't even, not only don't have the experience, but I've got no way of going beyond that experience of vastness of awareness, no way of going further. I wouldn't even know how to try to go further. None of that fits into my conceptual framework, but my conceptual framework doesn't support any of that or doesn't suggest or suggest how. Then I'm limited and maybe trapped and maybe forced into a kind of attachment to a certain view—entrenched, to use the Buddha's words.

But that doesn't have to be the case, obviously. If I have a conceptual framework that actually can keep going beyond these things—and partly the jhānas can be part of that, and they're woven into the same conceptual framework—then, and this isn't for everyone, but some people will say, "Oh, that makes sense," and it allows more. There's more potency there, there's more distance, there's more depth potential there—less likelihood of getting entrenched in a certain view of anything as ultimate or of "this is how things are." This is the reality of X or Y. And that's what an awakened person knows.

Okay. Let's sit quietly together for a bit.

I don't know how all this lands. Don't worry if it doesn't all, as I said at the beginning, if it doesn't make complete sense right now. Maybe that's the case. But it may still be, even though it doesn't make sense, that there's some kind of sense of beauty there or something that calls you or draws you. Maybe, maybe not of course. Some perfume, some sense of possibility.

Maybe that's the important thing. If it feels like it doesn't quite make sense, maybe that sense of beauty, that calling, that possibility is still there—and perhaps that's what matters most.

Thank you, everybody.

Time for tea. Enjoy.

CHAPTER 218

The Fifth Jhāna (The Realm of Infinite Space)

Rob Burbea · 1h34

> In this comprehensive exploration of the fifth jhāna, Rob Burbea delves into what the Buddha called the "realm of infinite space" (ākāsānañcāyatana) - the first of the immaterial realms (arūpa jhānas). Drawing from classical descriptions in the Pali Canon, he unpacks the Buddha's terse instructions about transcending perceptions of materiality (rūpasaññānam samatikkamma) and the disappearance of perceptions of resistance and diversity.
>
> Burbea offers practical approaches for accessing this realm, primarily from the fourth jhāna foundation, emphasizing the kinesthetic sense of non-solidity and the well-being that accompanies the absence of materiality. He explores alternative entry methods through insight practices (vipassanā) that see all sense objects as mere materiality - the four elements of earth, air, fire, and water. The talk includes guidance on eyes-open practice, working with visual and kinesthetic senses of boundless space, and the profound after-effects on perception that reveal cosmic oneness and the space-like nature of apparent solidity.
> A significant portion addresses the crucial role of authentic desire (chanda) and intention in jhāna practice, arguing that understanding one's relationship to desire is more fundamental than technical mastery. Burbea emphasizes how different practitioners have different authentic styles of spiritual longing, and how this determines what unfolds in practice. For practitioners of soul-making dharma, he connects jhāna practice to erotic engagement and the importance of personal fantasy in sustaining path commitment.

What I wanted to talk about today is the fifth jhāna. Actually, the Buddha never calls it the fifth jhāna, to my knowledge. He calls them the first, second, third, fourth, and then he calls them the realm of this, the realm of that. The fifth jhāna is the realm of infinite space.

I don't know how it is for you, listening to and hearing about things that you may not have experienced yet. For some people, it's super exciting and they want to jump straight there. For some people, it's just—what's that got to do with me?—and something turns off a little bit. For some people, the inner critic kicks in: "Oh, I'm not there yet."

It's always interesting, I've found over the years, talking about or possibly talking about things and areas and experiences and openings and insights where it's often the case that many or some of the people I'm talking to are not there yet, and how that lands. I've noticed that when talking about something, one person is totally transfixed and bewitched and enchanted, while another person is sort of looking out the window.

This is for you and it's for future yous—of which there are actually an infinite amount for each of you—and it's for other beings elsewhere now and in the future.

So, the realm of infinite space. I don't know, how does that sound? Big, yeah. Not a place where you want to lose your keys. Let's see what the Buddha has to say about that.

The practitioner is practicing and has reached a certain place in this very contrived exposition, contrived unfoldment. The stage-by-stage is a teaching contrivance. So they reach a certain stage in their samādhi, and they're sitting there or standing there, walking, whatever, and the thought occurs to them: "What if I, with the complete transcendence of perceptions of physical form—I'm going to come back to retranslate that because I don't like that—with the complete transcending of perceptions of physical form, with the disappearance of perceptions of resistance and not heeding, not attending to perceptions of diversity, realizing space is infinite. What if I then were to enter and remain in the sphere of the infinitude of space?"

Without jumping at the sphere of the infinitude of space, he enters and remains in the sphere of infinitude of space. He sticks with it, that theme, develops it, pursues it, and establishes himself firmly in it. That's all the Buddha says about it. Actually, there's a bit more in other suttas—suttas that for some reason are very rarely talked about, but I'm very fond of them.

But that's one translation. I'm not particularly keen on a lot of that. "The complete transcending of perceptions of physical form" is translated by someone else as "bypassing entirely beyond bodily sensations." I'm not entirely happy with that either.

The Pāli is rūpasaññānaṃ samatikkamma. Samatikkam is something like transcending, going beyond. Rūpasaññānaṃ is just rūpa and saññā, both of which words you want to know. Saññānaṃ is the genitive plural of saññā, which is perception. And rūpa is rūpa.

But rūpa is an interesting word because it can mean body, and it can also mean form as in a shape of something. I think the least misleading translation here would be something like "with the complete transcending of perceptions of materiality." I think that would pinpoint it more easily.

"With the disappearance of perceptions of resistance"—perceptions, so the floor is resistant to me and that's why I can stand on it. The wall is resistant to me and that's why I feel it when I look at the wall. I sense that it will hurt if I run at it with my head first. There's a sense of it blocking something. Physical objects block something.

And "not heeding to perceptions of diversity" or manifoldness means not paying attention to the many things that make up the world of materiality. There's the clock, there's the lamp, there's the glass, there's the flowers, there's the shirt, there's the table, there's the person, there's the body, there's the cushion—not heeding all these separate things, transcending the perception of materiality and the quieting, the disappearance, or the setting down—which is really the Pāli—the putting down of the perception of resistance. It's another way of saying solidity.

And then again, without jumping at it, without snatching at it, enters and remains.

But then again, this sense of sticking with it, developing it, pursuing it, establishing it. So that's pretty much all the Buddha says about that. The descriptions become shorter and shorter, terser and terser. We'll return to another sutta where there is a bit more detail, but only in terms of how to reach this state.

In translations, you often encounter phrases like "thinking space is infinite" after the transcending of perceptions of materiality. This is a strange construction in Pali—common but slightly unusual. I'd prefer something like "seeing" or "sensing" or "perceiving that space is infinite." The word "perceiving" captures both a passive aspect—recognizing that space is infinite—and also an active dimension. As we've highlighted so much on this retreat, perception has this active quality. I actually tune the perception. I play with perception so that the infinitude of space opens up. For me, the word "perceiving" is better because it encompasses both that passive recognition and active engagement. I play with my perception so that the sense of infinitude reveals itself.

The first four jhanas are called rupa jhanas, and the last four jhanas are called arupa jhanas. The "a" is a negative prefix. Usually this is translated as the rupa jhanas and then the arupa jhanas as the "formless" jhanas. Again, I'm beginning to wonder whether a better translation would be the "immaterial" jhanas. And as I mentioned, the Buddha doesn't actually use the word jhana for these states. He uses the word ayatana, which means something like sphere, realm, or base. I prefer "realm." It's a world. It's a realm of existence—ayatana.

So these jhanas five through eight are really openings into other realms. We had a glimpse, a taste of that—the beginnings of this—perhaps in the third and fourth jhanas, but now we're clearly in other realms.

This business of realms is quite important because this entire range of jhanic experiences maps neatly and coherently onto a whole cosmology. In Buddhist cosmology, there are three worlds—tiloka in Pali, meaning three worlds or three realms, three planes of existence, three levels of the cosmos.

There is what we might call the form realm, the realm of rupa. It's sometimes called the desire world in Buddhist cosmology—kamaloka—but I want to point out that it's the world of materiality. It's the world of the four elements: solidity, liquidity, air (which really means movement), and heat—heat and cold. Earth, air, fire, water. It's the world of materiality. This is the world that we all agree on. We might slightly disagree or be more or less informed about current thinking in physics regarding the nature of the world, but it's the world we all experience—the world of materiality that everyone agrees upon.

Above this is a plane of existence that correlates with the first four jhanas, the rupa jhanas. This is the world of subtle form. All of this cosmology often gets ignored in modern secular Buddhism, dismissed as superstitious religious mumbo-jumbo belonging to ancient Eastern thought. But actually, when you start to really move in and out of these jhanic perceptions, transitioning between these different realms, you begin to think, "Well, maybe there's something to this." What appears to be completely irrelevant, abstract, and arbitrary metaphysics reveals its direct correlation with meditative experience.

The world of the four jhanas—the plane of the four jhanas—is the world of subtle form, the rupa jhanas. Again, I would say "subtle materiality." Consider what happens to the perception of the materiality of the body. In normal consciousness, I perceive solid bone, solid flesh—that's my body. Organs, all the rest of it. Even in the first jhana, the body becomes much more subtle in this cosmology. It's more refined, this perception of the body's materiality—it's subtle materiality.

Yesterday we discussed the energy body as something that spans physical and mental. This too would fall into the category of subtle materiality. This kind of cosmological thinking in relation to the energy body doesn't exist only in Buddhism. It also appears in Islamic mysticism, probably some strands of Jewish Kabbalah. It's a bit more complicated in Christian mysticism, but perhaps there as well. The energy body or subtle body belongs to that middle realm of subtle materiality.

And then you reach the immaterial realm.

in Christianity and also in Islam and maybe in Judaism, different levels of angels inhabit each realm, just as in Buddhism different levels of devas and gods inhabit each realm.

So usually translated as "formless," but "immaterial" may be better.

How do we get there? How does this open up? Well, probably in most cases it's going to first open up in a convincing and persuasive and deeply impactful way from the fourth jhāna. And then the fourth jhāna really needs a sense of being really deep and really well established.

Once that fourth jhāna is really established, then you can start almost feeling into the space of the energy body again, with a view, with feeling for the sense of the body space. And what you sense there is a lack of solidity, a complete lack of solidity, as if it's just empty space. And actually that goes with a subtle well-being.

So you could either tune into the—here I am in the fourth jhāna. It's not pīti, it's not sukha, it's something much more subtle, but there is a well-being there, despite this "neither pleasure nor pain" language. There is a well-being, but it's the well-being of non-solidity, of non-materiality. It's almost like you feel as if you could just put your hand right through this space here.

That feeling right there in this location, in the energy body space, in the energy body region—the kinesthetic sense of that lack of solidity and the well-being that goes with the absence of solidity and materiality—is very refined.

Again, if we think about the five jhānas plus normal consciousness: normal consciousness, it's just solid. It's not very refined at all. First jhāna, more refined. Second jhāna, more refined. We've said this before. Third, fourth. By the time you get to the fourth, it's very refined. By the time you get to the fifth, it's refined out of any sense of solidity. There's not even a sense of a kind of energetic substance or the stillness or whatever. It's kind of gone. Do you understand? It's just an extension of the same thing—the energy body sense of refinement.

So to really sense that, to really feel into it, inhabit it and stay with that—stay with that very sense of the well-being that comes from the absence of solidity and really focus on that. This is one approach.

And one might notice, actually there's no edges. This very absence of solidity has no edges. It's edgeless. Or one might notice that any edges that maybe habitually creep in—the assumption or even an imagination of edges that might creep in subtly into the mind—they just keep dissolving. The mind just sees through them. So they just become space.

In the Visuddhimagga, which is this commentary that I mentioned a couple of times from Sri Lanka, there is a technique where you use little discs. They're called kasiṇas and you focus on—they can be different colors. And that's one of the meditative techniques that's explained a lot and emphasized a lot in the Visuddhimagga. And then from that little technique, you deliberately try imagining a bigger and bigger disc until it's infinite.

But this way of doing it that I've talked about, I don't think you need to stretch anything. Just this absence that you're feeling, the kinesthetic sense of absence—you don't need to stretch anything. You don't need to push anything outwards or make an effort, kind of stretching space to infinity. Just hanging out there, after a while you just realize it just goes on forever. There's no end to this. And if there are, as I said, if there are edges, they just keep dissolving. You just keep kind of seeing through them.

For many people they have an internal visual imagination and there's literally the seeing of space. That can be really helpful. There's a seeing of this kind of infinitude of space. But we really also want to get a kinesthetic sense involved as well.

So it can feel as if one just was falling through space. I think it came up partly in a Q&A really early in the retreat—it can feel like they've just taken the floor away and it's as if there's just nothing underneath me at all and nothing above. So the visual and kinesthetic sense can very much work together and that will really help kind of empower the whole thing and consolidate it.

And there is a delight in this. There is something actually to enjoy.

So technically you're supposed to be beyond pleasure and pain, but actually there's a great delight in this very absence of resistance that the Buddha is talking about. The very sense of just infinite, of just falling through space or potentially being able to fall through space. Nothing there, nothing at all in the way, nothing at all that one could bang into or that would obstruct in any way.

So that enjoying is actually quite an important element. We'll come back to that. But really what one's doing is staying focused on the space, on the total absence of solidity or resistance, and not attending to anything else that comes up in the mind or anything else that one might perceive. That's the non-attending to perceptions of diversity.

And you keep doing that and the thing starts to get bigger, but also really, really consolidated. Sometimes people want to worry about how big it is. They sense space. It's definitely not solid, but how big is it? Is it infinite yet? I don't think we need to worry about that. It's the same thing. I don't need to worry about pushing it. It's more just one's sense that there aren't edges.

The Pali word in the suttas is ananta, which literally means without end or without a boundary, without edge. It's that absence of boundaries. And one just keeps any sense of wherever they could be—they just disappear and just kind of the mind falls through them. They just disappear. And then the sense just opens out, opens out. Keeping with the sense of space allows the expansion.

Sometimes, as we mentioned already, there's a kind of level of the fourth jhāna, which we could say is a slightly deeper level, like the third jhāna, where it opens up wider. But in the third and fourth jhānas, we want to keep the attention more in the energy body space. But there's a sense of a wider realm. So it could go from there. One starts giving one's attention to the wider realm rather than just keeping the energy with the energy body. But essentially, it's the same thing. You'll have to see what works better for you.

So, as usual, damn bursts at first, perhaps, and it just goes there effortless. But it might be in time and with enough experience in and out, in and out, that one time one's practicing this and body sensations start to come back, or even physical pain starts to come back. Either one then needs to go back to a lower jhāna, probably the fourth jhāna, or if you have more experience, you could go to a higher jhāna actually.

Let's say you already know the sixth or the seventh. Here I am trying to get into the fifth in this session but something in the body keeps returning. I could go back to the fourth or could go to the sixth or seventh if I know them and then come back. Those visitations will really help everything to become less solid again and then one can stay more in the fifth jhāna.

Or another option might be that one could—here I am, pain is starting to re-emerge in the body or just body sensations—and one can almost focus in between the regions of pain. Just look at the gaps, the space in between. And eventually those will open up and the space will re-establish itself.

But really, I think the best foundation is probably a really strong sense of stillness from the fourth jhāna, a really refined and pristine, pure sense of stillness from the fourth jhāna. And then if one attempts the fifth jhāna and it's not steady, one can always return to the fourth jhāna so that you can make it kind of a home base in many different ways.

But it's tricky. Like I said, a lot of what I say will have exceptions, but generally speaking, the fourth jhāna wants to be really quite mature before the fifth can be really established.

Sometimes there are suttas—I couldn't find them, but there are suttas where the Buddha talks about, if I remember, it's almost like there are four jhānas and then there are four immaterial realms. And what they really are, are perspectives on the fourth jhāna. They're ways of looking at what's happening in the fourth jhāna, particularly ways of looking at what's happening to the sense of the body. So that the immaterial realms are different ways of sensing or different ways of looking at the body sense in the fourth jhāna.

So in a way, infinite space as a realm is already there in the fourth jhāna. If I look at the fourth jhāna, if I look at the sense of the body in a certain way and I just see it as space, it's already there. There's already so little solidity. I just look at it and sense the body as space. Or, and this one matches more of the Buddha's descriptions, if I sense the body space—what did the Buddha say about the fourth jhāna? The analogy was a purified, bright awareness. Purified mindfulness. That's what was pervading.

It wasn't sukha. It was a purified, bright awareness that was pervading the body. So that one's already hinting at the beginnings of the sixth jhana. I look at the body and I see it as awareness. What I'm paying attention to is the very awareness there. And that will take me to the sixth jhana, and so forth.

For most people—I've never done a statistical analysis, but I think for most people—this jhana is perceived as pitch black. So you could have a very luminous white, bright white fourth jhana. For most people, I think the fifth jhana will be black, but it doesn't really matter. That's a very secondary thing.

I think one of the lovely things about this realm is that you can actually practice it with the eyes open. And this is something I would really, really recommend in addition to the usual eyes-closed ways of working: sitting, standing, looking at the sky, for instance, looking at space, getting a sense of the space, feeling that space—the space of the sky, the space there in nature—feeling it with the body, feeling it kinesthetically as well. And again, realizing it's boundless, it's ananta, it doesn't have boundaries.

When I was learning this, we had a heat wave—I think it was really hot from something like March until October—and I was on retreat the whole time. I would just stand in the fields and the less busy lanes and just be staring at the sky, much to the amusement probably of the neighbors. But that's one way of practicing and it's very potent, just as potent. Eyes open, looking and getting a real feel for the space. The body and the mind become kind of one with boundless space. That's what we're trying to do—again, dissolve the body and dissolve the mind in this boundless space.

And it's very exhilarating. Exhilaration is perhaps a really accurate word. There's really a sense of "wow." It's almost dramatic in that dissolution, in that infinitude, in that disappearance of body and solidity. We're moving in that direction. It's the same thing with samadhi—it's absorption, absorption as a direction. Dissolving body and mind. Absorbing into it. Being space. I used to say to myself, "Being space. I've become space." But it's a direction. However absorbed we are, we can always be more absorbed.

So with this kind of opening, there is—or there should be—a very strong sense of cosmic oneness, mystical cosmic oneness that emerges with the opening to this realm. Both in the jhana certainly, because one has become space, there's nothing but space. The whole cosmos is just space. And also in the aftereffects on perception. As I mentioned yesterday, to me, the aftereffects on perception become really important at this level. The formless jhanas are really powerful. They're potentially very potent. So there's a strong sense of cosmic oneness. And again, that does something to the heart, to the soul, to the sense of existence, to all of that. I'll return to that later, come back to the oneness bit later.

There's also in this state what the Buddha calls a sense of release. I meant to look up the Pali—I can't remember—but the Buddha talks about a release. Now all jhanas are releases. They're releases from the hindrances. Certainly the first four jhanas are releases from sense desires and the irritations or aversions to sensual impacts. But here we have a different kind of release. We're released from the perceptions of materiality and solidity. And that really is felt as a release.

That release, that sense of release is what I would call a secondary nimitta. The primary nimitta here is space and its endlessness—space, just nothing solid there, just nothing, nothing, nothing solid there. That's the primary nimitta. A secondary nimitta—which again, like we've talked about before with the metta or other secondary nimittas, you can lean into and emphasize and explore more at times—but probably overall, if you want the whole journey to deepen, it needs to remain secondary. But it's still really important to sense the release here.

And that's what I would call a secondary nimitta. It's a tremendous release to be released. This is one of those things—you could stop a person on the street and ask them if they feel imprisoned by materiality and solidity, and they'd probably tell you that you need to get out more.

There are imprisonments that we don't realize are imprisonments until we've gone beyond them. That's why I prefer to keep the word dukkha in the Pali, because it's talking about subtle things that we have no sense of as dukkha at all. We wouldn't list them on our catalog of what constitutes suffering. But the release from perceptions of materiality and solidity—there's a genuine freedom there. So that too becomes a secondary nimitta.

They're completely connected: release, freedom, secondary nimitta. It's very exhilarating. There's joy as well, perhaps, as a secondary nimitta at times. I would say wonder and awe arise, but these are all secondary.

The sense of infinity itself is going to affect—or it can, if we let it, if we don't get in the way, if we're not entrenched in certain views which erect walls of conception that aren't demolishable—if we actually allow it, then the sense of infinity and the release from materiality, this whole perception of cosmic oneness, they really affect the being deeply. They affect the sense of existence, the whole relationship with death, the self and the self's dying. This taste of infinity—it's more than a taste, this immersion in, this dissolution in infinity.

Like I said, all the jhanas really have their impact, and part of their impact, a strand of their impact, is in lessening attachment. So here as well.

Another secondary nimitta will be love—metta, let's say metta more accurately. Why? All this oneness and non-heeding of perceptions of diversity—metta is unconditional love. The more oneness, the more naturally there is metta. When I'm not heeding diversity and not attending to perceptions of diversity, then everyone is equally deserving of metta, and the metta flows to all equally. It's when I prefer this bit of diversity to that bit of diversity that metta becomes conditional and not so pure.

So metta is there as a secondary nimitta, again something we can certainly lean into at times. In the aftereffects on perception, it might be among those aftereffects—you might have many different aftereffects, so that might be a very strong one. Just walking around after this kind of experience, there's tremendous metta, and one may really lean into that. You're not so much concentrating on the space sense or the infinity—it's just the metta now, that profound sort of ocean of it.

Just a small point here that may not be needed anymore, but I remember years ago it was commonly taught that metta and karuna and mudita—loving-kindness, compassion, and appreciative joy—were good objects for jhana practice, but they only went as far as the third jhana. That's as far as you could take them. Has anyone heard that? It's from the Visuddhimagga. The Buddha never said that. In the Pali Canon, the Buddha says metta can take you to the fourth and fifth jhanas and beyond.

Again, it's a strange historical thing that has happened with the Visuddhimagga. A lot of material in there gets unquestioned for some reason, even though the Buddha is saying something quite different.

Relating a bit to what Derek asked yesterday, the Buddha says metta delivers, or karuna delivers to, let's say, the fifth jhana, but he adds, "for one who has not penetrated to further release." In other words, if you know the sixth or seventh, your karuna, your compassion practice, could take you to the sixth.

There are a couple of interesting things to point out here. First, just a small point regarding karuna: if karuna is taking you to the second or third jhana—karuna means compassion, right? That's your meditation—that means compassion needs to be, that means compassion is a happy state. Sometimes people have an idea that compassion is not a happy state, but actually, it's very clear what the Buddha meant by compassion: it's a happy state, a state where there's a lot of happiness in it. That's a small point.

The other thing—and I throw this out for you to explore, or whoever wants to explore when you're ready—is that at some point with all this, if you really get into it, you can start experimenting with different kinds of cocktails, what I call cocktails. I mean exactly this: mixing infinite consciousness, the sixth jhana, the realm of infinite consciousness, with, let's say, compassion. So you've got—you're starting to color space, or put two things together that are ordinarily not thought of together.

Mixing jhanas with brahmavihāras creates entirely new experiences—cocktails of consciousness, as I call them. What you read about in traditional categories begins to feel limited compared to the vast creative possibilities that open up. You can make your own combinations and even give them playful names.

But perhaps even more transformative than what happens during meditation are the aftereffects on perception. These aftereffects touch the heart, bring liberation and wonder, and fundamentally change how existence appears to us. They create the opening that transforms our lives.

From the realm of infinite space, two primary aftereffects emerge. The first is the perception that all is space. You know that old illustration about atomic structure? This pen represents the nucleus of an atom. Where are the electrons? If this were the actual size of a nucleus, the electrons would be orbiting somewhere around Plymouth, or perhaps Johannesburg! The point is we feel ourselves living in a solid world, but atoms are mostly empty space. When you really look at what matter consists of—this nucleus with electrons at impossible distances—you realize that what we experience as solid is actually almost entirely space.

The second aftereffect strikes even deeper—the perception that all sense objects are one materiality, one substance. We truly are star stuff. Everything and everyone in this room, all our atoms, probably originated from the same supernova. When a star explodes, the physical and chemical processes generate complex atoms that form carbon and other elements making up our material world. All of us, everything on Earth, likely emerged from atoms scattered by that same ancient stellar explosion. Before that, it all came from the Big Bang.

We can hear such facts intellectually, but with this perception of oneness—oneness of materiality, of physical substance—the truth impresses itself directly on the heart. It's not merely interesting information; it becomes a living reality that touches your being at the deepest level. This is mystical oneness, even though we're discussing matter. You sense not just connection but actual oneness with all materiality—the earth, each other, bodies, trees, everything.

While many suttas mention the realm of infinite space, most offer only the brief description I shared earlier. However, there's one sutta in the Majjhima Nikāya called something like "Ways to the Imperturbable" that I found particularly compelling when exploring the relationship between insight and jhāna practice. This text demonstrates how insight ways of looking can open particular jhānas.

Here the Buddha teaches that we should view all sensuality and sense perceptions in specific ways. He offers three options, though the third proves most relevant. First, all sensuality and sense perceptions are dukkha. Second, they are impermanent. These aren't mere intellectual concepts—they're insight ways of looking that must be translated skillfully into moment-to-moment perception, sensing over and over again.

This is what we mean by an insight way of looking. If the Buddha says all sense objects are impermanent, and I think, "Yeah, okay, that tells me I should live and try not to be attached," it's going to have about zero power in our life. But if we engage it as a way of looking—I mean a subtle meditative engagement—this is what I mean by insight way of looking: something very light in the consciousness as we're looking, sensing, relating in a particular way. Seeing impermanence, recognizing all these things are dukkha. Whatever I see as I walk around, sit, look at the materiality, sense the materiality—impermanent, dukkha. Then it starts to do something.

And it's not that it starts to do something twenty years later, where maybe I'll be a little less attached. I mean, it may well have that effect too, but it does something now. This again is what I mean by insight ways of looking. They have their power now. They bring release now. They change the perception now. I just need to do it over and over and over. I'm training, playing with perception over and over.

But the most significant one of the three that the Buddha gives is not the dukkha, not the impermanence, but that all materiality is just the four elements: earth, air, fire, and water. So again, what does that mean? It means perhaps I do my walking meditation or stand outside or sit with my eyes open, with my eyes closed, and with any sense of any sense object, I'm looking: it's just materiality, just materiality.

This has to mean something to me. If it doesn't mean something, then it won't work. So it has to both mean something but also in the looking be incredibly light and incredibly agile. I can't have a big philosophical essay that I'm pondering through and repeating. But pregnant in my "just impermanent, impermanent," or "it's just materiality, just materiality," there has to—that one's quite an easy one, I think—but it has to encapsulate something that means something for me. Do you understand? Then it has its power. Then it starts to have its power, and I need to sustain it moment after moment. It's a way of looking, an insight way of looking.

And that insight way of looking can take me to the fifth jhāna, the realm of infinite space. Why? You're not attending to diversity—that's one reason. And you're also not—it's all just, especially with the impermanent and dukkha—there's also a sense that I'm not interested in this. It's just all materiality; all sense objects, sense perceptions are just not interesting. There's a letting go of any clinging with regard to materiality and material objects.

So both for the reason Nicole mentioned—not tending to diversity—but also this kind of... we'll come back to this, but basically the Buddha says this is worthless, this is dukkha, this is Māra's snare, this is a cancer, this is a dart, an arrow. So all that's kind of in there. It doesn't need to be so—the Buddha's a little extreme sometimes in his language. It's more just a kind of "hmm, hmm." But very, very subtle. And then we're doing something very, very powerful. And this other realm can begin to open up from the insight way of looking.

I haven't gone through jhānas one, two, three, four. I've gone through the insight way of looking. There will be in that, and in all this—both in the sense of oneness that comes in the aftereffect on perception, and also if you follow that insight way of looking that I just described and the Buddha offered—there will be, in time, certainly in the moment but also more long-term in my life, more disidentification with the body becomes available.

And again, I would say it becomes available rather than just a constant thing, because sometimes it's important to identify with the body. Of course it's important. But that view, that relationship with the body of non-identification, becomes much more available through the insight way of looking or through the aftereffect on perception from the jhānic realm. There's just elements of the cosmos, just the material elements of the cosmos. And when we're eating, we're just moving elements from there to here and then out again, or breathing, or whatever. And again, there's a release, there's a beauty in that.

If I only ever think of body and physicality like that, to me that's an impoverishment. I miss all kinds of wonderful, beautiful, important things about existence. Do you understand? I think that's really important.

So that's one way it can happen, but the other way is not with the eyes shut, nor with the eyes open looking at the sky or looking at space, but actually looking at objects. And particularly if you've had a lot of experience going in and out of the realm of infinite space, but also maybe from other meditative experiences—which many of you have already actually already had—where you look at an object, and usually, as I said, I look at the wall or I look at Nathan or whatever it is, and in the looking there's a sense of their solidity. I just somehow sense it as part of the normal consciousness.

Again, I know there's going to be resistance and there's going to be obstruction there. But sometimes, especially if you've done a lot of fifth jhana or other kinds of meditation, there's this other perception available where you look at something and you can kind of see right through it, so to speak. It just doesn't appear solid.

So you can also train your perception, play with a way of looking where you're seeing and sensing things as space, not as solid. Look at the table and just get a sense of it not as solid. One's ability to do that rests on how familiar you are with that kind of perception from before. It could come from your previous experience of the realm of infinite space, but it could also come from other kinds of meditative opening. Because that decrease of solidity is, again, it's a kind of unfabricating.

And any meditative practice, certainly any kind of classical meditative practice, is a practice of unfabricating to some degree. Dana, sila, ethics, concentration, samadhi, jhana, insight practice—they're all unfabricating to some degree. So this kind of perception, if you're practicing any different kinds of meditation, it's very common to have that experience.

And so it might be that resting on one's previous experiences of a sense of the non-solidity of things, when one looks at them, you can actually engage that more deliberately rather than just waiting for it to come as a result. Engage it more deliberately, and then the realm of infinite space begins to open up with your eyes open. Don't need a big space. Don't need the eyes shut. It's more just a way of seeing, a way of sensing what's there that we usually perceive in a certain way. I'm just perceiving it a different way.

Does this make sense?

As we said at the start, most of you are pretty interested in this. But if my question is: Why am I doing Dharma practice? Why am I meditating? People have a lot of different reasons why they're meditating. They're looking for a lot of different things. There's such a huge variety in terms of what brings people to practice meditation these days. It's enormous. And even within Buddha Dharma, even people who come on retreats, and maybe I would say even really hardcore practitioners still have a lot of range of what they're wanting.

So if what I want in my life is simplicity and equanimity—equanimity in the sense of with regard to the eight worldly conditions: praise, blame, pain, pleasure, success, failure, gain, loss—if that's kind of why I'm practicing, I have a vision that Dharma and meditation can make my life more simple and that attracts me, and I want this kind of evenness of equanimity, if those are the goals of practice, I'm not sure whether there's that much point or need to open up to these kinds of realms really. Maybe attention to impermanence, realizing the impermanence of things would help, but I don't know that this is really necessary.

If, turning that around, if my vision of awakening, my idea of what an awakened person knows, is that they know the impermanence of all things, I'm also not so sure that one needs to open up to the realm of infinite space or the other immaterial realms. You don't really need that.

I would like to, having said that, just revisit again this question of desire, which we talked about earlier on the retreat. And one of the points I made—and I was trying to convey its significance because it wasn't obvious—is that exactly what I desire, exactly what I'm looking for, is more significant than whether I reach a certain jhana. How I relate to my desire and what exactly my desire is, is more significant than whether I reach jhana.

As a teaching, that very nugget there—how much what unfolds depends on both exactly what I'm desiring and how I'm relating to my desire—that, as a teaching, I would say is more significant than any tip or technique or instruction on how to move from this jhana to another. I think I asked how many people believed me, and some of you put your hands up and some of you didn't. And then I talked a bit about desire.

I think the piece I wanted to emphasize was not so much how much desire we have. Because sometimes when I talk, it might sound to some people like, "Oh, there's so much desire. I don't have enough desire. Rob has all this hot-blooded Mediterranean Arabic passion and whatever. And I'm not like that."

So it wasn't really about how much—it was about how we relate to our desire and what exactly we are desiring. And that an enormous amount hinges on that. An enormous amount of what will unfold for us as practitioners hinges on that. And knowing that and understanding that may be more important than how to get from one jhana to another.

And it may be more important than attaining whatever jhana.

So again, what are we really desiring? Again, there's such a huge range in the Dharma. Many people these days, with meditation entering mainstream culture, come to the Dharma for some ease—understandably enough—for some reduction of suffering. They're oppressed and badgered by their inner critic and want a certain amount of freedom in relation to the inner critic, the self-judge, or whatever you call it. They want some ease in their life and some reduction of suffering.

What might happen is that a person might actually get that. They might get some ease over time, through practice—some ease, some reduction of suffering, some abating of the inner critic. Maybe it comes from a certain amount of Dharma practice. Maybe that ease, that reduction of suffering and reduction of the inner critic, comes as much from a change in outer circumstances: a shift at work, entering into a relationship or leaving a certain relationship, life conditions changing, and they actually feel better.

So they've got what they wanted originally. They've got that degree of ease or that reduction of suffering that they wanted. And then maybe at that point, they don't really want anything more. Why am I even practicing anymore? I've kind of got what I wanted. How much would jhanas and these immaterial realms matter to such a person? How much would they even want or need to come on a retreat like this, or give much time to all this?

What exactly we want determines what unfolds, determines how we relate to practice and Dharma and all that. Someone was telling me a while ago they were talking about going on another jhana retreat—or for them it would have been the first jhana retreat—and explaining why they wanted to go. They said they thought that the jhanas would enable them to be more present.

They had been practicing meditation for probably twenty-five or thirty years. And that was how they viewed the whole of practice. It was really about being more present. Can I be more present to life? And they practiced diligently, very committed, but that was their view: it's about being present.

Wrapped up in that—it's about being present—actually is a whole cosmology. Do you understand that? Why would being present... In other words, being present gives a kind of sanctity to something. To what? To the present moment, to this world as I perceive it. It's got a whole hidden metaphysics and cosmology on which this idea rests, and this kind of raising up of this aspiration over and over: to be present, to be present to life, to be present to the way things are, to be present to the moment.

All these charged words—life, the moment, things as they are—they all pick... or rather, scratch away at the charge and they all hide certain worldviews. They're all pregnant with certain worldviews. Does this make sense?

Again, such a person, I don't think, would need to come. First of all, the jhanas are not going to make you that much more present. You don't need the jhanas to practice presence. So maybe that person would have gone on a jhana retreat and actually found only a marginal increase, if at all, in their ability to be present, but would have also realized that you don't need that. I think more would, at some point, decide that it wasn't really their cup of tea. They weren't really interested in that. It would be hard for them to sustain an interest in jhana practice.

When we talk about other realms or mastery or this mystical state or that mystical state... but the whole elevation of the idea of presence—those things have nothing to do with that. Presence has nothing to do with other realms or opening to other realms. Do you see what I'm trying to say?

So such a person, had they gone on that jhana retreat, probably would have decided—wouldn't have been able to sustain the intention. If it was a long retreat like this one, they wouldn't have been able to sustain the attention. They wouldn't have kept working and playing, because it actually wasn't what they wanted. They wanted something else. And wrapped up in that wanting more presence was resting on a whole cosmology which was kind of entrenched, and there was no real interest in shifting the cosmology.

Or sometimes it's more obvious in other ways. A person doesn't want to—there's a kind of negative desire. My desire is not to budge a certain cosmology.

So I also run into people talking about jhana practice and retreats, jhana retreats they've been on, where—you know, I think I mentioned this before—a person's come after a jhana retreat and said, "Oh, it was really fun. I had a great time," whatever. But there was a kind of walled entrenchment in a certain cosmological view, in a certain view of the world, of human being, of the cosmos, of what awakening is, of being itself.

And the absolute priority was that this view did not get challenged, that it remained what it was. There was so much invested in that view—that the world is as it is, and existentially we have to face up to that: a purposeless world of cold, purposely dancing atoms in which a human being inexplicably finds themselves. Finite life, then death, and the whole point of dharma practice is to realize that, face up to it, and be relatively okay with that existential truth. That's the point of dharma practice.

So you can do a little bit of jhanas, but not too much. You can have a little bit of fun. Even the language—"Oh, I had a great time"—is almost dismissive. "I had a great time." It was like a little hobby on the side, something that was kind of cute to play with for a bit. But I don't want to do too much, because then if I have enough of these kinds of experiences, it might start challenging my view of the cosmos, my view of what human being is, my view of existence, of what the world is, of what reality is.

So there's a kind of negative desire operating, if you like—a desire for something not to be pushed on and challenged. This person will limit their exploration of jhanas and the ways of looking that we talked about yesterday, so that they're not allowed to open up those drastic and radical, repeatedly opening, drastic and radical changes in the sense of things and existence.

Limited exploration limits the challenge. So you can zip through jhanas from one to eight, but it doesn't really make any difference to the whole sense of existence. It's just a fun game that one's playing—pleasant in the mind.

Or again, it might be someone wants a kind of equanimity in daily life. And as we've already said, then again, it will be limited. The interest in this kind of thing will actually be limited. A little bit of impermanence, maybe a little bit of the vastness of awareness because you get quite a bit of equanimity there. Maybe a little anatta at a certain level.

But also, those practices will be related to as a decrease of papañca—we've talked about this—as a decrease of reactivity, as a decrease of fussing. And that's the point of dharma practice: decrease of papañca and fuss.

So I want to speak a little bit more about desire. Yesterday we spoke about emptiness and awakening and jhanas, and I still think more fundamental and more fundamentally important than emptiness, than jhanas, than awakening, is the question of desire and how we're relating to it. I'd say it's more fundamental than all of that.

When I talked about it the other time, what I perhaps should have said—and if it was a little out of balance—is that people are different with desire. In other words, people are unique with their desire. Not everyone burns with a certain kind of passionate desire. Some people do and some people don't. Some people's desire burns differently.

So whatever I said previously, I didn't mean to sound—and I'm sorry if it did sound—as if I was implying you should all burn this way, or like this, or with this kind of intensity. I think the more important question is: what is authentic for you? What's authentic for you? Your desire and how that burns.

Some people—and I was giving some stories from my past about how the pain of desire and of staying with something, the torment and the rub of it—but some people much more naturally don't have desire that burns that way. It doesn't burn with a great, huge, passionate flame of intensity that's problematic—their eros, their desire. Either they just don't have so much—it's just what's authentic to them, not so much desire, and this has to be respected. That's one of the points I'm trying to make. Or it burns in a much easier, less intense way than something I might somehow communicate when I share about myself. A less pressured way.

So this is really important. Some people's desire does burn with a lot of pressure, with a lot of intensity. Sometimes the pressure and intensity is not authentic—it's something added on by the inner critic or by peer pressure or something like that. Sometimes a person's desire is not so flaming, burning, and passionate like that. And sometimes that's authentic, but sometimes not being so burning and intensely is not authentic. In other words, there's actually something going on where a person is dampening their desire without even realizing it—inhibiting it, blocking it, avoiding it, fearing it, dissipating it, forgetting it.

So the question here, one of the important questions, is about authenticity for each soul in relationship to desire. I think partly after the other talk on desire, I felt like I didn't make that clear enough. So that's partly why I'm saying this now.

I think I said that a talk is a talk. When I give a talk in public to many people and it's being recorded, I speak in certain ways, but it should be—I hope you feel it—

If you come to an interview with me, I need to match you where you are and not impose anything about whether you need to be desiring this or you need to have more desire or less. My desire for one-to-one interviews is to meet you where you are with that, and to really respect—genuinely respect—if your desire burns differently than mine or than the next person. It would be rather obnoxious if I didn't, I think. But talking with a group is a different thing. And talking when there's a recording, when we don't know who's going to listen to this in however many years—it's a different thing. Anyway, I didn't make that clear enough.

So I need to respect how your desire burns and how much desire there is, if that's authentic. And I may also respect, even if we're working one-on-one, even if your desire is different than mine—why should it be the same? I also need to respect your process and where you are in your process of uncovering your—let's call it—natural and authentic flame and desire. Or where you are in liberating it and knowing its power. And that takes time. That process is at a certain place at any time.

So if I'm working one-to-one with someone, that's also part of what I need to do. Even if in some sense I feel that this person actually has a lot more desire and they're not really—for whatever reason—not really in touch with it or not really allowing it, I still need to respect the process there and not push that impatiently or out of time. So there are many different elements to consider here when we talk one-on-one, and again when we're talking in a larger context.

Authenticity comes in two respects. There's authenticity about what I desire. Monica asked this question: what's the difference? Through introspection, can I slowly learn to feel the difference between a desire that's coming, let's say, more from what we might call ego and a desire from what we might more call soul? That's why we give, partly, all the soul-making teachings—they point to the difference, all those elements of the imaginal, etc. They point to all this talk about eros. Can I discern the difference when a desire of mine is actually not authentic?

I might have been pursuing something for ages before maybe someone points out, or maybe I realize, actually this isn't what I really, really want. It's not what I really, really care about. As I said the other day when we were talking about getting inundated with advertising and all that, but what about things like—how many people have been engaging emptiness practices diligently, and yet emptiness and that realization is actually not what they really, really want? How did that happen?

I think what unfolds in terms of your emptiness realization depends and is determined to a large part by what exactly I'm desiring. And if I'm not really, really—if I'm not really genuinely, authentically passionate about it, it won't deliver. I do all the practices, I kind of do the things, but it's not my thing.

So what I desire, and learning to discern the difference between what's really an authentic, deep soul desire and what's a more ego desire and what's just indoctrination and programming from cultures or the wider culture or the subculture, including dharma cultures. You're in a situation where everyone—the teacher and everyone else—is going on about emptiness, emptiness, and doing these practices, and people are excited, and one naturally thinks, well, that's what I've got to do. And it could be jhanas as well. But I would say, you know, for these things to really deliver, there needs to be this authentic passion. And the same thing—even if a person wants to be a writer or a singer, songwriter, whatever it is. Why? Where's the desire coming from? Is there something that needs that? Or is there something that needs you to do that? These are hard questions.

So authentic about what I desire, and authentic also, as I said earlier, about how my desire burns. And that's really different soul styles. And that I think really needs to be respected. Some people, yeah, it's just kind of a whole big intense thing, whatever. And some people much less so. Some people it's a quieter flame, but it's very, very steady and it's not so dramatic. What's authentic to you, to your soul?

And then there's another question, another aspect: how to be true to one's deep desires. What does that mean? What does that look like? What does it mean really for me to honor my desires? For this, I need to know myself. If I say, "I want this, I'm going to do this. I will do this. I've pledged myself to this. This is the thing that I really care about"—

And then you see a person, a little time goes by and they're not following through on it. There are all kinds of what often look like good reasons to them: "Oh, my mother hurt her leg," or "Someone asked me to do this," and there are a million reasons. But oftentimes it's actually to do with self-knowledge. For some reason this person is not seeing this pattern of getting very passionate about something and not following through. It's not steady. It's difficult stuff.

This is why I say this is actually more fundamental than emptiness or jhana or awakening or whatever—because all that is going to depend on how wise I am about my desire, what's my relationship to desire, and how well do I know myself around that.

It's interesting. I think one of the gifts of modernity is that in a way we're free. There's no dominant narrative, no dominant kind of view anymore in modernity of what the most important thing is in life, and therefore what's most desirable. So we're not obliged to believe that this or that is the best kind of desire, and that if we were somehow wiser or better or clearer or less deluded, that would be what we would really desire. Modernity has done away with all that. If I was just less deluded, I would simply desire awakening. I would simply desire this. Modern Western culture has just done away with that.

It's no longer legitimate to say to anyone else, "This or that is what makes a life really worth living. That's what you should really desire." What that does—the gift of that—is it makes us free, free to choose. Or to a certain extent, it makes us more free than if that were uniformly agreed in the culture. Like in certain cultures, it was always agreed: it's best to become a monk. If you've really got the desire and the spirit and you're really clear, you'd become a monk. Everyone knew that. Someone who wasn't becoming a monk knew they were making a kind of second-level choice. But that whole view and narrative and framework has gone. There's nothing we can point to anymore, nothing that it's legitimate to point to in modern Western culture.

So there's an absence, the gift of which is a certain kind of freedom—freedom to choose, to a certain degree, because then we have to deal with all kinds of other stuff that gets in the way of freedom or looks like freedom but actually isn't.

But this very gift is at the same time, I think, a huge problem for modern culture. The loss of any kind of objective criteria or universally agreed-upon criteria to determine what is it that makes a life really worth living? What is the good life? What is a beautiful life? What is a life most worth living? And of course, relative to that is: what then should I desire? All this is connected.

The absence of that is the cause of huge and widespread and profound problems in modern culture, modern society, postmodern society. These are ethical issues, and I think at the root of our climate change, species extinction, racial injustice—so much of what's going on in the world are actually ethical issues at root. Part of the very ethical problem is this absence. Does this make sense?

So I've talked about that quite a lot recently on recordings and I hope to be able to talk about it some more. I just think it's so pressing and so important. You see how all these things are connected. We talk about emptiness, but until the desires are there and until that's connected to what actually makes a life worth living and how we're going to relate to all this and what is my relationship with all that—it's huge.

I just want to touch on this and pinpoint what's actually significant. Sometimes we don't realize what's significant because we're certain that something else is significant. You actually have to go to another level and realize, "Oh, there's something else here, a whole other level that I hadn't even considered that's actually really, really significant."

Just following on with a couple of small things about desire, primarily for soul makers—I'll be brief because this is not a soulmaking retreat. If you love soulmaking Dharma and if you love soulmaking practices, then you should realize, if not by now, you should realize at some point that your very sense of soulmaking Dharma will expand. It will expand into new territories that it hadn't included before. It will expand new possibilities, new realms of existence and being, and your being will get included. If you haven't already, it more and more gets included, worked into the soulmaking dynamic. What soulmaking dharma pertains to and is, the sense of it starts to expand.

I think at some point most practitioners, most soulmaking dharma practitioners, will realize two things. One is that jhana practice is a kind of art, and as such is also part of and contributes to the art of soulmaking practice.

So some of you already kind of get that connection, while others find it much less apparent or not there yet. Jhana practice as an art becomes or is seen to become very relevant to soul-making dharma practice - relevant in terms of the sensitivity and attunement that we've talked about, the magic. Some of you already get a sense of the magic of jhana practice and this magic of playing with perception. If you're practicing soulmaking dharma, you're practicing a kind of magic too. You start to see that these things are really, really connected. They're truly relevant to what possibilities open up. So that's one thing that should become clear.

A second thing that should become clear is that being able to really sustain - the demand in jhana practice to really sustain, to stay with over and over for hours and hours, to marinate in and return to the primary nimitta, to let that really mature that way in practice - that kind of sustaining needs eros. The very way we're relating to the primary nimitta is, in soul-making dharma language, erotic in the small definition of erotic. To sustain, to be able to sustain that eros in the small definition is relevant to the art and skill and also relevant to being in relationship with anything that we love.

So again, this question: How does your eros burn? What's your style? Is it that you get excited about this and then a quick flame, then a quick flame of excitement about that and then another quick flame of excitement - oh, this wonder opens up and then something else? Or is it this very steady staying with one thing, staying with one thing? What's the style of eros? A lot depends on that in terms of our relationship with jhana practice and our ability to really sustain. It is an erotic relationship, in the small sense. And again, that comes back to what's authentic - what's the authentic way my eros burns?

A kind of contradictory or complementary question arises: because of the nature of the soul-making dynamic, there's always this double question. Because of the nature of soul and soul-making, there's always this question of what's authentic to my soul, and there's the possibility of my soul's growing and extending and learning new ways and new ways it can burn that I hadn't even recognized were available to me as part of me - the kinds, the styles of my fire burning, of my eros. So you get a kind of complicated question there.

The second small thing for soul-makers is this: I said much earlier on this retreat, and this is connected to all this business about desire, that one of the most significant things, one of the most crucial elements of fruitful practice is the view that we have of the self on the path. If that's problematic, then no matter what we experience in meditation, no matter what we open to, it won't deliver its full fruit. It can be stymied, it can be blocked. The view of the self on the path - this is important for everyone. It's not something we usually talk about. We usually expect that if I just do the right practices, that will all get taken care of. Maybe, but maybe not.

When we come - again, this is just for people interested in soul-making - a view of the self on the path can also be related to the fantasy of the path and the fantasy of the self on the path. Sometimes a person recognizes that they really need something like this to help them sustain, whether it's jhana practice or emptiness or just dharma practice or soul-making practice or whatever it is. I need something in the view of the self. If you know soul-making dharma practice, I need a fantasy here to actually sustain and keep delivering, keep encouraging me, supporting me.

There's the possibility of a kind of formulaic answer - taking the bodhisattva vows and having that kind of quasi-imaginal relationship with the whole quasi-imaginal sense of the self on the path. I'm a bodhisattva, I'm doing this for all beings, or I'm a warrior or whatever it is. All that's okay, taking a formula if you like. But it will be much more powerful and much more soulful if it's personal, unique to you, to your particulars - authentic again. The word "authentic" comes from auto, and auto means self. So it pertains to you. In other words, if the fantasy is a particular one, not just a generic Buddhist formula or something else like that.

If you are the author - that word "author" is phonetically related to "authentic," though not etymologically related. Its etymological root is from augere in Latin, which means to increase. An author is someone that grows something. But phonetically they're related - authentic and author. If you want to be a real author, I need to be authentic, and that means getting in touch with what this self needs, what's personal and particular.

So how do I access that? Yes, possibly through generic universal Buddhist formulas or whatever. Or it's accessed in one of two ways, which is out of the corner of my eye, so to speak. What I mean by fantasy is something we kind of see out of the corner of our eye. When I'm really in love with something, when I'm inspired, there's somewhere - I'm not really noticing at first - somewhere is hiding a fantasy of what I'm doing and of the self.

in its journey of doing what I'm loving.

When I love, when I'm in love, when I'm inspired, there's a fantasy hiding there. So how do I discover what my personal fantasy is? I kind of glimpse it out of the corner of my eye. It's not really an image—it's a kind of background narrative image—but I can glimpse that in those times. Then I can use it, draw upon it, and develop it in practice, and it becomes really fertile potentially as a support for my desire, for my sustaining on the path, whatever path I've chosen.

So it can come out of those times of love, out of the corner of my eye I catch it. Or it can come right in and through my dukkha. When I'm really struggling on the path, when I'm really struggling with a sense of the self on the path, when it's got so heavy, so frustrating, when the longing is burning painfully, when there's grief perhaps, when there's despair—right there, in and through my dukkha, the very crucible of that dukkha, there's enough in there.

I have to go into it with a lot of skill and a lot of the right kind of holding. But if I do, in the alchemy of it, of this crucible of dukkha, it can emerge—a fantasy of self on the path that's liberating and supportive and sustaining and powerful and generative and nourishing and beautiful and endlessly fertile, as soul-making images are. So it's exactly when I feel really the pain of the problem of having a goal and my relationship with it—with all the soul-making skill that I have and art—that's exactly when the most fertile thing can come.

Last thing. So that was a bit of a digression. Again, I feel very important, this whole desire business, but I've talked about it so much elsewhere. Back to the realm of infinite space. Same deal with mastery. Same things. We're aiming for the same things in time when it's ready.

Can go there not from any jhāna, as I've described. Can go there either by subtle intention, just from a normal consciousness, through an insight way of looking, through just looking at things and seeing through them, sensing their non-solidity. Can go from not the fourth jhāna, but the second or the third, et cetera. Want to play with all this and develop all that.

Then one of the things I think gets really delightful at this point is walking in the realm of infinite space. I mean going for a walk on the lanes. Very interesting and very lovely experience, I would say. Then again, with every new jhāna, we've added more permutations for our leapfrog ping-pong, because you can jump around all kinds of different places to this one and that one.

I think that's all I wanted to say today. So let's have a bit of quiet together.

CHAPTER 219

The Sixth Jhāna (The Realm of Infinite Consciousness)

Rob Burbea · 1h19

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea guides practitioners through understanding the sixth jhāna, traditionally known as the realm of infinite consciousness (viññāṇañcāyatana). Drawing from the Buddha's descriptions in the suttas, he explains how this immaterial realm (arūpa-jhāna) involves awareness knowing itself - consciousness focusing purely on consciousness in an infinitely expansive way.
>
> Burbea carefully distinguishes this transcendent state from the 'vastness of awareness' practice, noting that while both involve infinite consciousness, the sixth jhāna is more purely transcendent and intensely electric, representing a complete escape (nissaraṇa) from the phenomenal world. He explores various approaches to accessing this realm, from progressing naturally through the fifth jhāna to direct methods of tuning into the subtle sense of knowing present in any moment of consciousness.
> The talk addresses the profound implications of such openings - the sense of touching divine dimensions, the mystical oneness of consciousness, and how these 'perception attainments' (saññā-samāpatti) relativize our ordinary experience while remaining provisional truths. Burbea emphasizes the importance of right relationship with desire, intelligent practice, and understanding these states within a coherent conceptual framework that supports rather than hinders the path toward liberation.

I mentioned at the beginning of the retreat that in many ways, the retreat happening at all has been somewhat of a miracle for many different reasons. We had initially gambled that Robert's employers would give him the time off work to come, and then it turned out that they were only given partial time. Then Kirsten heroically sacrificed a full retreat to sit this retreat fully and joined with the teaching. So it's been a bit of a patchwork in that sense, but it's happening.

Now, in fact, tomorrow, the time has already come for Robert to say goodbye, as his employers demand his services on Monday morning. So he will be leaving us about lunchtime tomorrow after his interviews. Just again, I really want to say how grateful, how absolutely hugely grateful I am—and I think we all are—to you for being here and using your holiday time to do that, and also to Kirsten for stepping in. The retreat couldn't have happened. This kind of patchwork of tag team teachers was the only way this could have happened. So we're really, really grateful to Robert for everything that you've brought here—your spirit, your knowledge—and also to Kirsten, for that willingness to step in and offer and share and be there for everyone.

Robert will slip out quietly with belly full after lunch tomorrow. Too much emptiness of time, and you get a little bit confused. Do you want to say anything, Robert? You don't have to.

[Robert responds] I would just say that eating with you all these last two weeks and seeing your practice and your patience and your perseverance has really touched me and brought much joy. As I'm leaving, I guess my wish for you all would be that during these last few days—this victory lap of the retreat—where the conditions are so rare and so precious, that your intentions remain strong and that the fire continues.

Actually, just to echo that last point, you all probably know how it is on retreats. We have, I think, four days left, something like that. If this was a week retreat, this would be really towards the end. The mind starts sensing it's towards the end. Papañca begins. Hindrances don't give a damn. They'll be coming and going—you're up and down, wherever you are in your little or big struggles.

As Robert said, keeping steady, keeping going—this is so much a part of the art, the fundamentals of the art of this practice. The fundamentals of any practice, the fundamentals that sustain staying in relationships, staying with a project that you love—it's so crucial. So how is your intention? How's that doing? What am I believing? Am I, again—this thing we've come back to several times—am I buying into what the seeds of the hindrances have spawned? And then it's a story and it's very, very convincing. And then my intention is wobbling.

They're seductive and they seduce us, the hindrances and upādāna seduce us into believing this or that because they're so convincing. So these are precious days, you know—these four days are precious days, precious opportunity to practice, to go further, to learn more about this territory, but also everything around this territory that we've talked about: my personal relationship with desire and intention and steadiness and form and all that. So again, once more the invitation to work, play, enjoy, and find out.

Okay, so today we will talk about the sixth jhāna—which the Buddha didn't call the sixth jhāna, but called the realm of infinite consciousness, the sphere or the base of infinite consciousness. Hoping to shed great light on what's involved here as he goes through the stages, describing a practitioner practicing, the thought occurs to him after he's gone through the first four jhānas and the fifth jhāna:

"What if I, with the complete transcending of the sphere, the realm of the infinitude of space, realizing that consciousness is infinite, were to enter and remain in the realm of the infinitude of consciousness?"

Without jumping at the realm of the sphere of the infinitude of consciousness, he enters and remains in the sphere of the infinitude of consciousness. He sticks with that theme, develops it, pursues it, and establishes himself firmly in it.

So there's not a lot to go on there other than stick with it, develop it, pursue it, establish it. And it's something to do with consciousness. And again, it's very, very big.

Okay, what is this? What's he pointing to here? What's involved in this perception, this attainment, this opening?

I would say the central feature, if you like, is awareness knowing itself. Sometimes I've heard it described as actually it's awareness knowing the infinitude of space—in other words, it's the consciousness of the fifth jhāna. And there's certainly a way that it can seem like that. But I've come more to think that the primary feature is just awareness knowing itself, and then there's an infinite expanse of that.

But either way—whether it's awareness knowing infinite space, or the awareness that knows infinite space, or awareness knowing itself—I tend to think the second one, awareness knowing itself, is primary.

I should say right now that I use the words awareness and consciousness completely interchangeably. Over the last forty-five years or so, there have been different approaches—not really trends, but some people have at times drawn these two words apart, referring to consciousness as something much more limited. They see it as one of the aggregates, impermanent, unsatisfactory, narrow, tied to objects, while they regard awareness as something vast, free, even ultimate—giving awareness a capital A.

I don't ultimately buy into that distinction, so I think it's actually clearer to just use the words interchangeably—awareness and consciousness. Then we can explain different senses or perceptions of the nature of awareness at different times, each having different relative truth value. Anyway, all we need to know for now is that I will use those words completely synonymously and interchangeably.

So awareness knowing itself. What's happening here is there's a kind of honing in, tuning to and focusing on awareness, on consciousness. Consciousness hones in on consciousness. Awareness hones in on awareness. The Pali word is viññāṇa. There isn't, by the way, a distinction in Pali between a word for consciousness and a word for awareness. Viññāṇa is, I think grammatically speaking, a verbal noun. It literally translates as "knowing." So awareness, consciousness, or knowing are synonymous terms.

What does awareness mean? In Buddhist understanding, it means knowing. Not knowing something—not "I know something" or "I'm clever because I know the square root of two to eight decimal places." It means knowing itself. It means being conscious. It means the recognition of something, the perception of something.

There's this quality, again and again in this state, of almost returning to and locking in on the sense of knowing. Sometimes, depending on how you access it, you can use these little grains, little tinctures of internal whispers in the mind to direct the mind and help support it to lock in on that primary nimitta. The primary nimitta is consciousness. The primary nimitta is consciousness knowing itself. You can use these little tinctures—just like "knowing" or "consciousness" or whatever it is—very, very subtly, to help support the mind in its attuning to, finding, and then sustaining its focus on the sense of knowing. There's a very subtle whisper internally to direct the attention to the sense of knowing.

I would say—and this is a long debate certainly in Buddhist history, in the Mahāyāna as well as the Theravāda and the Vajrayāna, and probably a debate outside of Buddhist philosophy and psychology as well—I would say consciousness of consciousness is an integral aspect of consciousness. In other words, to be conscious involves the subtle, at least the subtle recognition that one is conscious in the moment. Otherwise, a machine can be aware of this or that, but a machine doesn't have consciousness. It doesn't recognize itself. It doesn't have that feeling of being aware.

There's been a long debate about it, but in a way I think it's a little ridiculous. It's just part of the definition of consciousness—that consciousness in any moment is conscious of itself. Do you understand what I mean by that? Usually, that sense of being conscious is not something that receives much attention. It's very much in the mix of a moment of consciousness. There's much more attention to what we're conscious of—the object, this or that thing that I'm paying attention to, this or that object of consciousness.

But to some degree, some subtle degree mixed in with any moment of consciousness and as part of what defines it as consciousness, as I said, is some small degree of a sense that there is consciousness right now. And it goes with the subject: I am conscious. This is conscious.

Now that subtle sense, that subtle portion or strand within consciousness, can be amplified. And how do things get amplified? First they need to be noticed, then they need to be attuned to, and that attuning to what we notice amplifies it. In other words, in the mix of what consciousness is in any moment, by noticing this sense of being conscious, this awareness of awareness, by noticing it and tuning to it repeatedly, we amplify that sense within consciousness.

Eventually the relative balance can shift from mostly "I'm conscious of the object"—whatever the object is I'm paying attention to—and very little sense of the consciousness of consciousness, to the reverse. With noticing it, tuning to it, and the amplification that will happen naturally with that, it can start to reverse until eventually all the attention, all the consciousness, is the consciousness of consciousness.

Does that make sense?

So there's this kind of lock effect—you know, locks on canals with water, the way they function? Do you have those in Israel? Because it's a desert, you might not know. Like that, yes.

Can you just either look at something right now, or feel a body sensation, or listen to the sound of the heating? So there's the object—the sound, the sensation, the visual object, whatever it is. And at the same time that's there, can you get a sense that there is awareness present? You're conscious of being conscious. Can you be aware of the awareness there? It's mixed in with it.

So this is a beginning of something. It's quite a hard thing to stay with. It's a subtle thing. As we go into the jhanas, everything gets subtler and subtler, but you can train the mind to pick that up and stay with it and amplify it. But we're really talking about the present moment—this moment, this moment, this moment of awareness, and getting the sense of awareness of awareness in the present moment.

So this is key to the whole thing. It's subtle, and so some of you might not have been able to get a sense. That would be very normal. Some of you might have practice already doing this. Either way is fine. But we're talking about a subtle sense, and therefore it needs practice to develop that—to notice it, to stay tuned to it, to kind of develop it.

As I'll explain later, there are many ways into this, but this sense of consciousness can then expand. This lock effect happens where all the other objects are kind of filtered out of it, and it becomes just an infinite consciousness—infinitely expansive consciousness. Here, now again, we're really talking about something wow. It's so different a perception, so different an opening than we usually have as human beings.

I think I shared much earlier in the retreat: someone coming in for an interview and saying, "Oh yeah, I think I got into the sixth jhana the other day, and it was all very light." It can't be. We're really talking about something that's immensely striking and very, very impacting on the consciousness, on the sense of being. So it's a deep realm of existence, a deep—that's what that word ayatana means, I've explained—a deep realm, a deep dimension of the cosmos. Something divine there, for sure. That's a sense. It's very intense.

So it's quite an intense experience. Electric, almost, I would say. Consciousness moment after moment focusing on itself with nothing else there, and just an infinite expanse of this. It's electric, it's compelling, it's intense, usually. And there's something in that—it's almost like it's sufficient unto itself. It's just consciousness. There's nothing else. And this consciousness just knows itself and it pervades infinitely. And it has this kind of transcendent quality of being. It's sufficient unto itself. It does not need anything. Just consciousness knowing itself forever. Eternally sufficient unto itself. Eternally transcendent. Eternal in the sense of lasting forever.

So again, it is, as the Buddha calls it, nissarana, nissaranam—an escape. It's another dimension of the cosmos, another dimension of being. It's another realm. There is a freedom from everything else there. Freedom from the phenomenal material world. A release, a letting go of all else. There's just nothing else there but this pure consciousness, knowing itself, sufficient unto itself, infinitely expansive. And the objects are filtered out—everything else gone.

So I've mentioned a couple of times on this retreat, and I know some of you are familiar in practice with what I call the practice of the vastness of awareness. So it's actually worth lingering on this and comparing the two, because they can sound very similar.

They are both infinitely vast consciousness or infinitely vast awareness, both of them totally unperturbed by the arising or passing of phenomena. In both states, there's a sense that they last forever, that they're eternal in that sense of forever duration—forever undisturbed, forever radiant, forever peaceful. So there's clearly some similarity, and people might wonder about the distinction. But it's good to distinguish them.

We've said there's a letting go of everything else in the sixth jhana, in this infinite consciousness. The vastness of awareness too, if we compare, is also a letting go. It's quite difficult to pinpoint exactly what the differences are, but I would say that the vastness of awareness, yes, it's a letting go and it has all those other similarities in common with this infinite consciousness, this realm of infinite consciousness. But the vastness of awareness is more inclusive of phenomena, objects, experiences.

Particularly, it includes and is even accessed by way of its relationship with phenomena, with other experiences. It's their relationship with the vastness of awareness that's the key difference—one of the key elements, including what we might call their substantive relationship.

When one practices the vastness of awareness, there are different stages. As it moves into deeper stages, there can be this beautiful sense that not only do phenomena seem to arise out of this vastness of awareness—this beautiful, peaceful, radiant and divine space of awareness—not only do they rise out and die back in, born out of and dying back into this source, but as it gets deeper, it also feels like their very substance is awareness. There's a sense that the substantial nature of all phenomena is this awareness, this vast divine awareness.

So the vastness of awareness also feels like a freedom, but it's a freedom with and within appearances and experiences and phenomena. It's a view or a way of looking, a perspective on phenomena, on experience, on this life as we experience it. It's a different view, a different sense of this world and this life, whereas the sixth jhana is something transcendent. It's beyond. It's gone beyond this world.

The infinite consciousness is more intense than the vastness of awareness, which has an almost infinitely deep ease to it. There's a real intensity in the sixth jhana, and it's a much rarer state for people to access for a number of reasons. Sometimes because it takes a lot to sustain that intensity, or even build up enough intensity that one would find oneself in such a state. It's also much rarer because one can open to the vastness of awareness from much more common ways of practicing insight meditation. If we just practice insight meditation with more open awareness, just being aware and letting things come and go, it will start to open up the beginning stages of the vastness of awareness. So quite a number of experienced insight meditators will have opened to some degree, to some level, to the vastness of awareness.

If you're interested in the vastness of awareness—we've mentioned it a couple of times on this retreat—there's a whole chapter on it in Seeing That Frees, depending on maybe the three chapters that come before it. It's there and should be very clear. Really worth that opening, and the modicum of effort it takes is so worth it. There are also, I think, four guided meditations I did years ago, each titled "The Space of Awareness" with different subtitles—guided meditations of different ways of opening up the vastness of awareness, if I remember.

It's a different state. It's not the sixth jhana. You could say it's related, and definitely worth visiting and opening to, putting some time in there and being touched by that beauty and the liberative and healing qualities. But the sixth jhana, the infinite consciousness, is something rarer.

They're also slightly different in their aftereffects on perception. In the vastness of awareness, you could get up and go for a walk and see a stone, and the substance of the stone is that awareness, is the divine awareness, is this vastness of awareness. Or that stone is somehow, the appearance of the stone is the play of this awareness. It's really hard to put your finger on, but I think it would be more accurate to say that in the infinite consciousness, with its aftereffect on perception, a phenomenon or a stone or an object feels more as if it has consciousness. Not so much that its substance is awareness, but that it has consciousness—even as part of a cosmic consciousness.

So distinguishing the aftereffects on perception between these two states, the vastness of awareness and the infinite consciousness...

The after-effect on perception in the vastness of awareness will be something akin to the stone—the appearance of the stone feels like its substance is awareness, or that the appearance of the stone is the play of awareness. With infinite consciousness, the after-effect on perception feels different—perhaps moving more toward the sense that the stone has consciousness, even if the stone's consciousness is part of a much more unified cosmic consciousness or divine consciousness.

It's hard to articulate. I've never really heard anyone even attempt to make these distinctions, but that's my current thinking about it.

Both of these states, though, are undisputedly mystical senses of divinity. It's very often the case that a person will start using words like "divine" even if they've never in their life used those words before—with either of these two experiences, the vastness of awareness or the infinite consciousness. One really feels as if there is something of a divine order here, something of the nature of the divine that is being revealed, that's being opened. "This is God's awareness" can be the sense.

But as we said, the sixth jhāna, the infinite consciousness, is more purely transcendent. It's really a realm beyond phenomena.

I would say that both of these experiences are immeasurably precious. And I would also say that they're part of our human birthright. As human beings, this is part of what is available to us and what is our human birthright—to know this, to open to this, to be touched by these levels of being, these dimensions of being, these openings. They're available.

Particularly with infinite consciousness, with repeated exposure, it brings such a different sense of existence—such a sense of opening up the dimensionality of existence, of the cosmos, of being.

There are also many variations and satellite states around the sixth jhāna, especially when we practice with the eyes open and especially in terms of their after-effects on perception. But I won't go into them now.

Again, I want to emphasize how important these comments about desire are. I think it would be really understandable if someone, with repeated experience of going in and out of this infinite consciousness—really being touched by it and opened by it, opening to it and assimilating that opening and that sense and that perception into their sense of existence—it would be really understandable if such a person were to look back and think to themselves that life knowing that realm is so much richer, so much richer in dimensionality, than life not knowing that realm. "How did I live that way?" would be very understandable.

And they might also think, "I wouldn't want to live without knowing this, without that opening, without that sense of dimensionality." To them, in retrospect, it might feel as if life without this was a kind of impoverishment—not that they want to escape into this transcendent realm, but that life without it would in some way be less worthwhile. That would be very understandable as a view or a feeling.

But it's tricky, isn't it? It's tricky. I'm hesitant even saying all this because it's loaded—loaded because of many things we've talked about on this retreat in terms of desire, in terms of goals, in terms of what I said yesterday about living in a Western culture that, beginning with the Protestant Reformation, has actually been deconstructing and dissolving any agreed-upon idea of what makes life worthwhile.

Don't underestimate how influenced we are—not by Buddhist history so much, but by Western history. Things that happened in relation to medieval theology influence us today way more than people realize. Something happened starting with the Protestant Reformation that fractured and fragmented any sense of agreed-upon idea of what was holy. And that influences very much what anyone can say to anyone else about what is worthwhile or what one should desire.

So all this is here when we talk about such states. It's loaded, it's charged in all kinds of ways—potentially painful in all kinds of ways, potentially enticing in all kinds of ways.

The usual insight meditation way of teaching—or at least it used to be—is not about experiences. It's just: don't try and get experiences. Just notice what experiences there are. Just be mindful. Just notice what comes up and what goes. To say something like what I just said—that these states are precious—is a little bit loaded. It's implying something. It invites, it opens the door for the pain of striving, the pain of desire that we've revisited several times on this retreat.

So the usual way of teaching insight meditation is a lot easier, because it effectively just closes the door on any kind of striving like that. Just: all you have to do is be aware. Whatever comes, whatever goes, it's all the same. Good experiences, bad experiences, remarkable experiences, boring experiences. All you have to do is just be aware.

And when you're not aware, you just notice it and you come back.

There's such value in that way of practicing and teaching. It's a lot easier—I think for both student and teacher. When you start saying, "Oh, this is really precious," or "That's really precious," or "This experience is..." then you start running risks. But there are risks both ways. If you go just into the mode of "experiences are not important," there are significant risks as well.

All this is tied into desire. What do I desire? Why do I desire what I desire? What's going on with me? What's authentic desire? What's deep desire? What's involved in my desire? And how do we teach regarding such experiences, such openings, such perceptions?

If one goes into an interview and reports such an experience, and what comes back from the teacher is a response of "Sounds good, but it's just another experience. It's impermanent. Let it go. Don't get attached"—that response itself is a kind of teaching. It's set in a framework that needs to be at least semi-coherently nestled within a whole idea of what awakening and liberation is and what insight is.

Again, we get this tracing down—a feeding down from a top-level conception into how I'm responding to this or that experience in any moment, or someone else reporting this or that experience in any moment. So if I say it's immeasurably precious, it's loaded. But it's tricky.

I think it would be understandable if a person did report such a sense of—almost like, I can't imagine life without the sense of that kind of dimensionality to it. It would be understandable. They may have some work to do, but it would potentially be understandable.

Such a different sense of existence, such a different sense of the cosmos, of the dimensionality of being that comes with this. We assimilate that, incorporate that into our being in addition to the usual sense of consciousness. It doesn't replace it one hundred percent of the time. It just becomes available sometimes—this completely other sense of consciousness, this completely other dimension. But our usual sense is still available.

The usual sense of consciousness is that it's mine, and it's somehow in here—usually in here, in the head. From here, in my head, it's somehow sensing out. It's associated with this materiality, meaning this physical matter, this physical organism. That's the usual agreed-upon idea, but also sense of consciousness in our culture. So that's still available, but other senses become available as well.

It's not the case that this infinite consciousness is the ultimate nature of consciousness. It's not. Even just labeling it as the sixth jhāna would strongly suggest that it can't be. Nor is it ultimately the true nature of mind, nature of awareness, nature of consciousness. Nor is the vastness of awareness. Neither of these are the true or ultimate nature of awareness or consciousness. They're not the final truth regarding awareness, regarding consciousness.

Also, I don't think such an experience really proves the possibility of a consciousness—let's say, without or not contained by matter. So that's the experience: there's this consciousness. It's an immaterial realm, right? We're now in the immaterial realms, the arūpa jhānas, arūpa āyatanas. There's just this infinite consciousness sufficient unto itself. The experience would seem to suggest that here is a consciousness without being contained in matter.

To me, it doesn't prove that. There's the whole question of epistemology from meditation experiences and what we can deduce from a certain meditative opening. We would need more convincing, other kinds of experience, other phenomena, other things to happen to be more convincing that there's a possibility of consciousness without being contained or associated with matter.

But still, again, how are we to regard all this? I think there's value to say: here now we're opening to deep provisional truths. They're deeper truths, but they're still provisional.

So we can talk about almost like a scale of relative truth, if you like. Deeper truths, still provisional. Provisional truths, experiences, openings, insights. What's the Buddha's words? Perception attainments. And he talks about them in a scale of perception attainments—the attainment, the ability, the achievement to perceive this or that as a level of truth, if you like, but still a provisional truth, not a final, not an ultimate truth. So that feels to me really, really important.

How do we get there? How does such a place, how does such a realm, how does such a dimension of existence, of being open up for us?

So there's a number of possibilities. One is simply, as usual, just hanging out in the previous jhāna—in which case the realm of infinite space—just hanging out there, really getting into it, revisiting over and over, hanging out, hanging out, and it will naturally mature. It naturally matures at a certain point from the previous jhāna. That would be a very normal occurrence.

I think I very briefly mentioned this earlier in the retreat though. Though I know one teacher disagrees with me and one teacher who agrees, I think the order of ease of access through these rūpa jhānas, much as for some of the order of ease of access through the rūpa jhānas, is individually variable. So I feel for me, I felt it was easier to access, for example, to learn this infinite consciousness, then the infinite space. Other people, it might be the other way around or something. But I think there's an individual variation here. So one teacher had insisted on doing them in their sort of numerical order, and another teacher was much less pedantic about that, less emphatic about that. But I would agree. I think there's individual variations in tendency there.

But one way, as I said, is just hanging out in the realm of infinite space and just really, really getting into it. When the fruit is ripe, it ripens, it matures.

Then a second possibility is to be in the realm of infinite space, to hang out there, and then at some point when it's steady, when you're really into it, when it's established, when you've got some mastery, then begin becoming aware of the awareness there in that state, in that space. This is just a subtle shift of the attention and of the intention to pick up on that subtle sense of awareness that we experimented with earlier today, but within the realm of infinite space. So that would be a very kind of straightforward way of going about it if it needs a little nudging.

Third possibility is any jhāna—well, any of the jhānas up to now, let's say, better, easier to say—or even a normal state of consciousness, a non-jhānic state of consciousness, and actually just what we did earlier. So can you get a sense? So if it's a jhānic state of awareness, the object of the consciousness at any time will be the primary nimitta. If it's a non-jhānic state of awareness it could be any smell, taste, touch, sight, sound—something that's quite steady though. You don't want something flickering too much. Something quite steady, or it's probably easier if something's quite steady. So something you can look at and it's not going to disappear on you, or a sound that's continuous. If I pick the heating and not—well there are no birds right now—but pick the heating, it's more of a constant thing.

And so normal consciousness with a normal sense object or any jhānic consciousness with the consciousness of the primary nimitta and then noticing, tuning to and focusing in on that sense of knowing, that sense of consciousness. So in other words, this realm of infinite consciousness can be approached not from the fifth jhāna, not even from the fourth, third, second, first—can be approached from normal consciousness. It's just a matter of tuning, noticing, tuning, and then amplifying that very sense of consciousness, and then it can begin to open up and open up. So that's one way as well.

A fourth way is obviously related to that, but I mentioned it, I think yesterday—I can't remember—and the Buddha says it somewhere or other. He kind of classifies the arūpa jhānas, the arūpa āyatanas, as, if you like, perspectives on the fourth jhāna. So it's really that there are not eight jhānas, but four jhānas, and the fourth one has five variations: the fourth jhāna, and then the four arūpa jhānas. Somewhere or other in the Pali canon, I'm pretty sure the Buddha frames it like that.

Already, we said in his description, what he emphasized in his description of the fourth jhāna was the pure awareness, the body wrapped in pure awareness, or he sometimes says pure mindfulness. So it's right there in the fourth jhāna. And if I pick up on that, pick up on the sense of presence, the sense of consciousness, of pure mindfulness, pure awareness, right there in the fourth jhāna, the body has become that. That will open up into the infinite consciousness.

Fifth, there's insight ways of looking that will open up the infinite consciousness. They're actually the same as what opens up infinite space. In other words, the same ones might take you to either space, either the infinite space or the infinite consciousness. We mentioned them yesterday.

And lastly, as always, with experience, with enough familiarity, enough in and out...

Part of the whole deal with mastery is that eventually we can access these realms—or this particular realm—just by subtle intention, just by remembering it. We remember that realm, remember our experience of it, and that opens the doors to this divine awareness, this God's mind.

Again, I don't think there's any need to push or stretch it to infinity. Whichever way you go, I don't think that's so necessary. It should—I think it will—but it should automatically just expand that way. This happens partly because there's nothing else in consciousness. There's nothing in the way. There's nothing but infinite consciousness.

Again, that could be a little tincture. If it's not quite stable yet and you're working to consolidate, you can just drop in that phrase: "nothing but infinite consciousness." That kind of primes—it's very, very subtle. It's not like a big thing. This is an alchemical tincture one's putting into the space just to very gently direct and guide the mind and support that opening out.

So it should go—it probably will go—automatically because there's nothing in the way really, there's nothing to limit it. Sometimes you just need to relax into it. So it's strange—it is a very intense state, but there might be, as you work with it, times when actually more relaxation is needed, and other times it's more like really honing in with the intensity on that focus on the consciousness, on the consciousness of consciousness.

So one can just let it expand. This leaning forward business that I mentioned can start happening sometimes in the third jhana, but certainly in the fourth and later. This more relaxed approach may help with that because sometimes the leaning forward is, again, due to our usual—not just intellectual construal, but sense of attention—placing its mental object in front and then, with just a little bit of trying, we end up leaning forward because we're aiming in front of ourselves with just a little bit of effort. But the more relaxed approach can open it up more evenly. So it may help with that leaning forward issue.

A lot depends on how you access this infinite consciousness. If you're coming from infinite space, there's nothing there to prevent it from becoming infinite. It's already infinite. So it just kind of flips to consciousness. If you're coming from, let's say, just normal consciousness, and then you're focusing—you're noticing the sense of consciousness, you're noticing the awareness of awareness, you're tuning to that and amplifying it—then it may well be that other objects come in and out of the awareness as you're trying to do that. And either you just stay really, really with the sense of knowing, really with the sense of consciousness, or you somehow see, sense the other objects as consciousness.

The Buddha talks about escape—as we said, nisaranam. And again, I've still forgotten to look up the word, but he talks about what's often translated in English as "releases of awareness." So the different jhanas and then particularly the formless are releases of awareness.

So again, we're talking about a realm here, completely free from, completely transcending the hassle and the reach of material perceptions. Sometimes the Buddha calls the four formless realms "the peaceful liberations." So that's a synonym: the peaceful liberations.

And then there are passages where he talks about fully liberated beings, arahants, as liberated in one way or liberated in two ways. An arahant liberated in one way is just someone who's gotten rid of, exterminated, expunged all greed, hatred and delusion. They've ended their kilesas. But an arahant liberated in two ways is someone who also has access to these formless realms. And the Buddha has this lovely passage: they remain "touching with their body the peaceful liberations." Their whole sense of existence is touching with their body something that's beyond the body and immaterial. They remain in the world touching with their body the peaceful liberations. Other arahants, other fully enlightened beings, don't know these realms. They haven't developed them. They're not necessary. There's a difference.

Experientially, the very sense of release, of a beyond, of realms beyond—that very sense can help maintain, again, if you're working in this space, in this realm, and it's just working to really settle it at any one time, then the very sense of release and beyondness and escape can be part of what helps consolidate it in that moment. But I need to enjoy that. In other words, the very sense of this transcendence, the beyondness, the release—they're slightly different things because release is "I am released" or "this is released." Beyondness, transcendence—there is that. But the enjoyment of that, the subtle enjoyment of that, is again also part of the binding glue, the consolidating moisture, the liquid of the experience.

So again, such an opening, such a perception, such a revelation, relativizes this world—the world that we all agree on. This world of material forms, of things, of beings. Opening to that relativizes this world. It takes its place in a series of worlds, of realms. It's not just "there is this world and nothing else." And then it relativizes our relationship with this world, and that could happen in different ways. It could, as we said before—and this is problematic to my way of thinking—become problematically dualistic.

For many practitioners today, this kind of dualistic view—seeing this world as samsara, as something not worth much, something we want to escape—rarely poses a problem. In fact, traditionally the thrust of Pali Canon teachings embraced this perspective far more commonly than we see now. Some practitioners find no issue whatsoever with this dualism. Yet I believe it carries real dangers. When we regard this world in such a way, do we still care for it? Do we love it? What becomes of our duty to this world and to others within it? The relationship itself risks becoming problematically dualistic.

This danger diminishes significantly when we apply the same principles we've explored throughout: allowing the aftereffects of perception to open up, really exploring them thoroughly. This is why I emphasize so strongly that the aftereffects on perception are as significant as the pure jhanic experiences themselves. These aftereffects truly change everything—they have profound impact on our sense of this world.

When perception opens to reveal that stones possess consciousness, that divinity radiates from everywhere, this very quality of divinity permeating all existence, then the dualism we've discussed gets evened out. This represents one crucial reason for attending to these aftereffects.

The second approach for addressing any tendency toward problematic dualism involves understanding the dependent arising and therefore the emptiness of perception—everything we explored together yesterday. This experience of the world that seven billion people agree upon, this experience of infinite consciousness, this experience of subtle realm worlds, this experience of infinite space—whatever emerges—all arise as dependent originations. They manifest dependent on certain ways of looking.

This world and that world, this realm and that realm, are perceptions arising dependent on different ways of looking. Understanding this in the most powerful way transcends duality entirely, granting us freedom to be dualistic when we choose dualism and non-dualistic when we choose non-duality. As I've said, this collapses any duality between non-duality and duality itself. We become free—free with a full range of ways of looking, free to move, free to experience all realms with equal sacredness because we've understood something fundamental about the emptiness of it all, the dependent arising of it all. Through playing with insight ways of looking, through exploring various ways of perceiving, we open this entire understanding.

The Buddha characterizes these states as embodying a kind of equanimity. Certainly they are profoundly equanimous—completely unperturbed, completely undisturbed. In this sense, they express genuine equanimity, without any push-pull toward other objects. They represent states of very deep equipoise. So yes, they are both calm and focused.

Yet with experience, secondary background emotions often arise. While maintaining that equanimous, calm quality, one might simultaneously be jumping for joy in the background. Wonder emerges, potentially love, peace, ecstasy—all these can manifest as background experiences, and naturally so, rightly so. We've already mentioned the qualities of release and freedom that characterize these states.

Just as with infinite space, I strongly recommend practicing this realm with eyes open as well. Look at the sky or sense the space around you, allowing that to expand. Perhaps consciousness first expands to infinite space, then flips into this new realm. Maybe you begin sensing consciousness within that much larger visual or kinesthetic space. Or perhaps you work more intimately, as we described, with a smaller sense of space—not the vast sky, but simply any object before you.

Like infinite space, these states evoke a profound sense of oneness—mystical, cosmic oneness that feels almost overwhelming in its intensity. This perception emerges both within the jhana itself, in the pure jhanic experience, and in the aftereffects on perception that follow.

Again, this is precisely why I emphasize so strongly the aftereffects on perception. Really take that time off the cushion in a much more relaxed way—walking around, having a cup of tea, whatever feels natural—and notice the effects that formal practice has had on perception. How is everything right now? What has happened to your perception of self, of world, of consciousness? What has shifted in your sense of things, of materiality, of existence itself? Really noticing these transformations does something very profound indeed.

That oneness can emerge in the jhana itself or in the after-effects on perception. Yesterday we explored how the primary oneness that comes with infinite space is a oneness of materiality, of material substance. We are all star stuff. We are all the same big bang. We are truly one matter—our bodies, everything. This jhana, in contrast, reveals a oneness of consciousness, a oneness of awareness.

One can have the sense that while there appears to be separate awarenesses, separate consciousnesses, actually at another level there is one. There is one divine consciousness of which we are part or in which we partake.

When you get to soul-making Dharma, there are important variants of this and it becomes significantly different. I've noticed when I'm teaching soul-making Dharma and speak about participating in God's mind, sometimes people write to me, and from what I read, it sounds like they're relating or hearing what I said through this lens of oneness of awareness. There's actually something different in soul-making Dharma. There are more variants and more subtlety and more allowances for individual particularity. God's awareness needs my awareness, my particular awareness, my particular dukkha, my particular ways that my mind works—and yours, your particularities, your foibles, your struggles. That's different from the notion that there is simply one awareness, a simple, pure, clean awareness in which we somehow participate. There are significant differences there, but this is not a soul-making treatment—just for those of you who are interested.

The oneness is technically, I suppose, a secondary nimitta. The primary nimitta is the consciousness. The oneness—though they may become completely fused at times—is technically secondary. So we should focus primarily, as always, on the consciousness most of the time. The oneness will come. It will arise naturally in the after-effects on perception. You can trust that.

Even though you could say perhaps one of the most significant, impactful, potent, and transformative perceptions here is the very sense of oneness, still we don't need to—probably most people don't need to—go looking for it. You can trust that it will arise and do its work. Of course, there are always exceptions, but I would say that.

The same approach applies with mastery—all the little tricks of the trade, going for walks, all of that. Just to emphasize, I don't know how all this sounds, but it's really just a matter of training.

When we talked yesterday about the fifth jhana, infinite space, or even today—yesterday with infinite space, we said looking at an object that we would usually sense as solid in the very looking, even though I'm not touching it, my sense in looking is of solidity. That would be the normal sense of it. Then seeing and sensing physical objects, material objects as space, seeing and sensing them as not solid and staying with that. Getting that sense and then staying with it—infinite space can open up from that.

What's basically happening, if I sustain it, is a training of different elements. Can I flip so I can see what I usually sense as solid? Can I flip the perception so that I sense it as space, as not solid? Can I sustain that? Can I allow that to open? These are all just elements of training. Training the perception of space.

Space is not something we usually pay attention to. Usually we're basically addicted or imprisoned by habit—we pay attention to objects in space. Even when an architect talks about paying attention to space, it's not quite the same thing. What they really mean is a geometry that has shapes. Actual space itself is not something human beings habitually pay attention to.

So we're training a perception, training an ability—a more refined perception. The point I want to make is it's all training, just training of perceptions. The training has slightly different elements in it. How many suttas are there where the Buddha describes some meditation, describing a monk doing this, and "thus he trains himself," and then a little further, "thus he trains himself, thus he trains himself"? It's just training.

What that means is it's possible, it's available. Even the thing we did earlier today—can you get a sense of the awareness of awareness? Can you become aware of awareness in the moment? Can you sustain that? Can you focus in on it? Can you let it amplify? Can you let it expand? It's all training, just training. What that means to me—it's an important word because it means it's totally possible, it's totally available.

I don't know how it sounds, but we're really talking about something majestic in its grandeur.

unfathomable in its beauty and wonder and depth and sublimity and dimensionality and divinity, but also that in another sense or at the very same time is just a training.

Yes, it's very rare and even rarer, as I said, than the vastness of awareness, but it's just a training. It's rare just because people have not been taught or don't sustain their journey of working towards it, playing towards it.

So it's possible and available if we get our relationship with desire right. All this. And I just want to keep coming back to that. I can talk about blah blah blah and all this great sounding stuff, but if the relationship with desire isn't right, if I don't understand myself in relationship to desire, I don't understand what I'm bringing in or what is brought into my desires at different times and how I relate to that—not just in this moment but over time in a sustained way for a retreat but also for years, months and years. It's possible and available if I have that fundamental inquiry and understanding and right relationship with desire.

And I think if I bring a kind of intelligence to my working and playing—and by intelligence I don't mean scholarship, I've said that before, nor do I mean something really intellectual. I don't mean that at all. I mean everything that we've emphasized: the flexibility, the responsiveness, the attunement, the coherent conceptual framework of what am I doing and why and where is it going and how does this fit into where I'm going. Because that bigger picture conceptual framework should guide me in my momentary choices and momentary emphases.

So if that's askew or I haven't got a coherent one or it doesn't make sense, or if I'm trying to work towards this jhāna but actually I'm laboring under the umbrella of a conceptual framework that doesn't really support it or emphasizes an aspect like, how long can I stay on one object? We've talked about this before—that I'm emphasizing something that's actually just going to capsize the boat and not let this boat deliver me to where I want to go.

So if there's the right relationship with desire and inquiry into that in the open—that's the hard thing. That's not an easy thing. That's a big ask. And it's more fundamental. And if there's this intelligent, what I mean by intelligent work and play, then these things are really possible and available. And they're just trainings. They're just trainings.

So last thing about desire, and someone wrote a note, a couple of people wrote a note, in fact. So again, it's just a small thing for people who are already familiar with soul-making dharma, just very briefly. We talked about this, the importance of the absolute necessity of having a helpful view of the self on the path, a helpful view of the practitioner self. And in soul-making dharma, we talk about fantasies of the path, fantasies of the self on the path. And I've talked about that several times in other soul-making retreats over the last years. I can't remember where, but it's there.

And a couple of people were asking, "Yeah, but okay, but when you're on a jhāna retreat, for example, let's say it's an emptiness retreat, or let's say it's a metta retreat, or it's a themed retreat, and it's not a soul-making themed retreat, how do I relate to this whole idea of fantasy? How can I work with the whole idea of fantasy? Because I'm supposed to be doing jhāna practice, I'm supposed to be doing emptiness practice or whatever it is."

So a fantasy is something, as I said, that's almost—I use it as a word—something in the background, something in the background. It's a background kind of imaginal narrative, if you like, or semi-narrative. But it in fact has an eternality to it, but it appears in narrative form, if you like, but it's in the background.

And what can happen or what we can do sometimes is bring that, when we notice that fantasy, we can bring it into the foreground and work on it with our imaginal practice. In other words, what was fantasy in the background becomes image in the foreground, and then we work and play with that image. And of course, it might be an image of myself. So that's what we're working with. So a glimpse of fantasy in the corner of my eye when things are going really well, when I'm into practice, when I'm inspired, a glimpse of fantasy. And then if I want, I can bring that to the foreground and work on it in a sort of conscious, deliberate, imaginal practice. But then once you've done that, it can go to the background again. So that's one way of doing it.

Or you might find there's no fantasy, actually. There's just dukkha. I'm just stuck here. I just am hitting my head against a brick wall. I feel completely contracted or imprisoned or whatever it is. There is no fantasy. Or what there is is a self-view that's not an imaginal fantasy. It's an impoverishment and it's a reified self-view that's painful.

Then as I said yesterday, then what I have to do is I have to go through that dukkha. I have to go right to the middle of the dukkha and feel the dukkha of it and feel the pain of it. I have to hold it in certain ways. I cannot approach it just with simple mindfulness. Simple mindfulness will drain the self out and drain the story out. Very useful at times, but here we want a certain kind of crucible, a certain kind of holding which allows the self to be there and the dukkha and the story but allows them to alchemically reconfigure or arise differently in a much more helpful way.

So through the dukkha and through the very heat of the dukkha and the material of the dukkha in that crucible, if I hold it right in my imaginative practice, then an image of the self and an image of the path will arise. And then that can go to the background.

If this is all in the context of a jhana retreat or an emptiness retreat or a metta retreat—and not a soul-making retreat—it can go to the background. In other words, we only use these fantasies, we only bring them to the foreground as much and when they are needed. Otherwise, they can stay in the background. And from the background, they quietly but powerfully do their work in their subtle, half-hidden, almost subliminal way.

So you bring it forward or you concentrate on your dukkha and allow the image to become primary only when you need it. A bit like using insight ways of looking on a jhana retreat if an insight way of looking is not your base or springboard practice. For some people it is, and that's fine—they're doing that all the time. For other people, it's sort of almost last in the list of things to do when something feels stuck. I try this, I try imagining, I try breathing through, I try this and that. Last on the list maybe is an insight way of looking, but I'm just taking something else, bringing it into primacy for a certain time for the sake of lubricating and opening up the jhanic path.

Now, on this retreat where there's an intention to stay constant with my intention and on a certain path, I bring it forward, and when it does its work, I can let it go again—unless it's my primary, my base practice. So we only use it when we've tried everything else which hasn't helped.

Let's sit quietly for a bit now. Thank you everybody. It's time for tea.

CHAPTER 220

The Seventh Jhāna (The Realm of Nothingness)

Rob Burbea · 1h26

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea guides practitioners through the seventh jhāna, traditionally known as the realm of nothingness or ākiñcāyatana. Drawing from the Buddha's teachings in the Ānañjasappāya Sutta, he explains three distinct insight ways of looking that can lead to this formless absorption: seeing all perceptions as not peaceful, recognizing phenomena as empty of self, and understanding that 'I am not anything belonging to anyone anywhere.'
>
> Burbea emphasizes how this jhāna represents a deep understanding of emptiness (suññatā) - not mere impermanence, but the profound recognition of the 'no-thingness' of all phenomena. He explores the relationship between samādhi and insight (vipassanā), noting how insight ways of looking can both deliver the jhāna and be reinforced by it. The talk addresses practical aspects including the dissolution of space, working with perceptions that arise, and the importance of stepping-stone stability through previous jhānas.
>
> The discussion extends to the liberating implications of emptiness realization, showing how understanding no-thingness frees us from imprisonment by forms and structures. Burbea connects this to mettā practice, explaining how love becomes more profound when directed toward beings understood as empty yet appearing. He concludes by examining the malleability of perception that emptiness understanding enables, illustrated through a practitioner's experience of activism supported by imaginal cosmopoiesis.

So, seventh jhāna—which the Buddha didn't call it that, as far as I'm aware—has the appealing name of the realm of nothingness, the dimension of nothingness.

Let's again start by checking out what the Buddha says. A monk has gone through the first six jhānas, and then the thought occurs to him: "What if I, with the complete transcending of the sphere, the realm, the base, the dimension of the infinitude of consciousness, recognizing there is nothing—what if I were to enter and remain in the sphere of nothingness?" Without jumping at the sphere of nothingness, he enters and remains in the sphere of nothingness. He sticks with that theme, develops it, pursues it, and establishes himself firmly in it.

Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

But believe me, it gets worse trying to put language to these states.

Some people—and I have no idea about statistics, but it's certainly not unheard of—encounter this realm unexpectedly. A person, even a beginner on their first insight meditation retreat, maybe someone who just heard meditation was good for stress reduction and relaxation, might be sitting there one day following simple instructions, minding their own business, when suddenly a huge black space opens up. They feel like they fall into it—a void, the void. They might have heard this language before. The term "void" carries different meanings in different Buddhist traditions over the years, and in other traditions as well.

Some proportion of people have that kind of experience. But usually when it happens out of the blue, without much preparation or orientation, there's not really a discerning of which, if any, of the four arūpa jhānas—the four immaterial realms or dimensions—one has encountered.

The person will speak of it simply: "Everything disappeared. There was nothing there." But actually, I've heard people say that in relation to the first jhāna. These states, including the first jhāna, are so different from people's usual experience that one understandably struggles not only to put them into language and describe what happened to a teacher or friend, but also to actually discern what has occurred. As the Buddha said, we need to understand what's present and what is absent.

So someone just says, "Everything disappeared." Well, actually, there's still a lot present. In the first jhāna, there's still pīti, sukha, and all the rest of it. Here, in the realm of nothingness, there's much less. But usually, without training, the eyes are not used to the dark, so to speak. There isn't this discernment of what is still there and what is not.

If you ask such a person who has stumbled into encountering something like a void or big black space, "Was there a sense of space there?" they may not have had that much discernment. Was there a sense of space or was there not? Usually, if someone is asked to imagine nothing—maybe not for you at this point, but if you say to someone, "Imagine just nothingness"—probably they would try to imagine a big black empty space with nothing in it. But that's not the realm of nothingness. That's probably more akin to the realm of infinite space.

At any rate, this novice meditator, without any kind of map or orientation or understanding of what has just happened—experiencing this big dark space with nothing in it—lacks the discrimination necessary because they're not trained and not prepared to discriminate the subtleties and differences in all these states. Most would call it nothingness, but actually, because of this non-discrimination and non-preparation to discern, there won't be the blossoming, the full blossoming of whatever potential state is there.

It's the discriminating, the discerning, that allows something to blossom. We're back to this process of noticing, attuning, amplifying. Amplifying means blossoming. If I don't notice a difference, if I don't attune to it—and if I don't notice and attune to it—then it doesn't get amplified. In other words, it doesn't blossom.

So whatever state this is that oftentimes scares the living daylights out of a novice meditator, it's probably not really any of the formless jhānas. It's in that territory, potentially could be any of them, but because there's not the discrimination, because there isn't the preparation and skill and subtlety and sensitivity of awareness to discriminate, it doesn't actually become any one of them.

More significantly, the person almost certainly does not understand how that happened. They were just meditating, just noticing things, letting go, and then this thing occurred. They have no idea how it happened or why it happened. They may or may not get much explanation from books or teachers or retreat talks. No understanding of how it happened or why it happened—it just seems like a random occurrence.

What's the important thing? Two things: you'll be okay and it's impermanent. Both of which are true, but there's no real understanding of the why there. The why has to do with dependent origination, dependent arising, or dependent fading.

So it probably doesn't fully blossom. Probably there's very little or no understanding of how or why that has opened or kind of emerged. And as I mentioned, there's probably or often would be quite frightening, such an experience. One just feels like one's on the edge of an abyss or has fallen into an abyss.

There will be fear with such an opening, such a deep bottoming out of experience, such a deep disappearance of the world of phenomenal reality, the conventional and accustomed world of phenomenal reality. There will be fear, usually, if there aren't a series of stepping stones to such an experience—a series of stepping stones that one has enjoyed and learned to trust and delighted in and they've become stable bases, stable stepping stones.

And what are they? Well, the other six jhanas. So these other six jhanas up to the seventh jhana, because we learn to really trust them, they're also droppings out. They're also disappearances of to some degree. They're unfadings, unfabrications, unfabricating to some degree. Do you understand? But we've gotten used to that. Not only have we gotten used to it, we've learned that they can become stable and that they're delightful and we trust them. There's nothing to be feared here.

Without those stepping stones and the training and time that it takes to really establish those stepping stones, then just being presented with this edge of an abyss or falling into an abyss is going to be frightening. It's a long way from normal consciousness to such an abyss. It's much less of a way from the realm of infinite consciousness, the sixth jhana, to the seventh jhana. It's just a step. And so there's much, much less likelihood for there to be fear. And then that fear can cause mayhem in all kinds of ways.

So what's going on here? And the Buddha doesn't help that much, does he there? So we were in the infinite consciousness, and it's not then with this next step that consciousness is not there in the realm of nothingness, but the sense of space has gone. This is why I say, if I say to you, can you imagine a big black space with nothing in it? Most would have some sense of that. But we're saying that's not actually the realm of nothingness. Can you imagine nothingness, not even space? Little trickier, huh?

So this is really kind of gone beyond our, gone quite beyond our usual sense of things. Space has gone. It's not that consciousness has gone. Consciousness is there, but consciousness is not prominent in the way it was in the sixth jhana, in the realm of infinite consciousness, when the consciousness and the consciousness knowing itself or even knowing the infinite space was the primary nimitta.

There's still consciousness. There has to be consciousness there in the realm of nothingness. Otherwise we wouldn't have any sense of anything, any perception of anything, any consciousness of anything. But the consciousness is not prominent. It's rather that the citta, the mind, the heart is struck, captivated, drawn to the sense of nothingness. This sense of nothingness, which doesn't even have a sense of space with it. I might have the last vestiges of space, but as you get deeper into it, even the space kind of collapses or gets sucked into itself like a kind of black hole or something like that.

And that nothingness is the primary nimitta. That's what the mind is drawn to, captivated by, struck by, entranced by. The consciousness is still there but it's not the primary thing. Later on, and I hope we will get to go into this or describe it on this retreat, later we have to re-find and refocus on the consciousness as one aspect or thread of being able to go even deeper. So at the moment we forget about the aspect of consciousness. Later we have to find it again, as just one thread of a path that can take us beyond even this nothingness.

Experientially, the realm of nothingness is usually pitch black. As I said, we've gone beyond anything that could be described as space with nothing in it, which would be more akin to the infinite space. Sometimes, without the sense of space, it can feel as if it almost has a thick texture to it, because the space sort of thins things out—and then there's no space. It almost feels thick, though this is difficult language to use. But that quality probably passes, and it's not that thickness doesn't represent a step backwards in terms of refinement. This is definitely a refinement over the previous realm of infinite consciousness.

There's nothing left as a perception. Nothing left as a perception but the perception of nothing. There's nothing left but nothing. There's nothing left but nothingness. And that's the one thing that's striking one—something, again, very breathtaking.

It may be for some, even those who are not beginners—like the person we described just innocently sitting on an insight meditation retreat, having never heard about any of this—it may still be an acquired taste for some people. But I would say that at some point, either immediately or gradually or eventually, at some point it will turn and one will fall in love with it. Fall in love with this mystical nothing, this mystical void, this mystical nothingness.

So how do we get there? How does it open up? Well again, one possibility is just letting the realm of infinite consciousness mature—really getting to know that, sitting in that, loving it, opening to it, getting to know it inside out, staying in it, staying in it, staying in it, dissolving as much as one can. And naturally at some point there will be an evolution, and it will sort of take a quantum leap, a quantum jump into a different dimension—the dimension of nothingness.

As always, eventually with time and the intention to develop mastery, there's the possibility of accessing the realm of nothingness just through a subtle intention, through the memory of it. That takes a lot of practice, as with all the jhanas, just getting familiar, but it's equally possible.

But here—and I want to dwell on this—is where the insight ways of looking as a way into this realm get really interesting and really important, really significant. In the other sutta that we've already mentioned, the Anañja Sappaya Sutta, "The Way to the Imperturbable" or "The Conducive to the Imperturbable," sometimes translated, here is a sutta where the bulk of it is the Buddha talking about insight ways of looking predominantly to the formless realms. There's other material in it too.

He's talked about up to the sixth jhana and gives the name "the imperturbable" to the fourth, fifth, and sixth jhanas. So just for this sutta, it seems to refer to those three. He's gone up to that point and then says, "Then again the disciple of the noble ones considers this"—I would say this "consider," again, I don't know what a better word in English would be. It's not an intellectual pondering. One employs a way of looking. And that's very light, very agile, very subtle and very potent. A heavy pondering philosophically is not going to produce any meditative state and open any doors to other dimensions. We don't really have a word in English, but the way I would definitely translate this is: the disciple of the noble ones employs a way of looking.

The text says something like this, and understands something like: all sensuality and all sensual perceptions and all perceptions of forms and all perceptions of the form jhanas, the rūpa jhanas, and the realm of infinite space and the realm of infinite consciousness—all that, all sense perceptions, all form perceptions, all rūpa jhana perceptions, all perceptions of infinite space and infinite consciousness, all that—they're all perceptions. They're all just perceptions. Where they cease without remainder, where they end without remainder, where they no longer are, that is peaceful. That is exquisite—that is, the dimension of nothingness. Practicing and frequently abiding in this way, her mind acquires confidence in that dimension.

Let's take this individually rather than reading all the others first. So what's going on here? Basically, one's employing a way of looking. Again, if you're not used to this idea of ways of looking, we're talking about something very subtle. It's an insight way of looking. It's a certain conception and relationship with, in this case, all those perceptions. So anything that comes up or that might come up—one might be in the fifth jhana or one might be looking at a perception, a material sensual perception in the world, it might be the third jhana, a perception of a rūpa jhana, whatever—all those perceptions and whatever perceptions will come up or have come up, they're not peaceful, they're dukkha basically. Some of you know what I call the first dukkha practice: unsatisfactory. Particularly, they're not peaceful.

There's a sort of confidence there that when they're let go, when these perceptions fade, when they let go, there's a dimension called the dimension of nothingness which arises when they quieten, which arises when they're absent. Does that make sense? All that I just said is all right there in a way of looking that's just happening again and again and again. Very subtle tincture in the way of looking, very subtle—not a whole verbose philosophy. And one's applying it to whatever one is perceiving, again and again and again, sustaining over and over and over, and those perceptions fade. And in their absence, the perception of the realm of nothingness opens up.

They're not peaceful, but this is peaceful—this is exquisite, the dimension of nothingness. So that's one way the Buddha describes it. As one could say, yes, they're dukkha, they're unsatisfactory, but particularly with his emphasis on: they're not peaceful. This is peaceful.

The second way, the second insight way of looking that opens up this realm: Again, the Buddha says the disciple of the noble ones, having gone into the wilderness, to the root of a tree, into an empty dwelling, or into a retreat center in rural Devon, considers this. Again, "consider"—same deal. It's with the insight way of looking, very subtle, very potent. Its potency is proportional to its subtlety in the mind, to its non-verboseness. There may be words there, very subtle, but we're talking about something very agile.

Considers this—I really don't like the word "considers," but looks in this way: "This is empty of self or of anything pertaining to self." Or you could translate it: "This is void of self or of anything belonging to self." Practicing and frequently abiding in this way, the mind acquires confidence in that dimension, and the dimension of nothingness opens up.

When we read that originally, you think, "Oh yes, that's to do with there being no self because Buddhists talk about there being no self, right?" I think it's actually more to do with what I call the phenomenal self—not the personal self, but the self of phenomena. This is a lamp, this is a piece of paper, this is a glass, this is a hand. Just as habitual avidyā, habitual delusion, takes self to be something real, a real thing, we also do that with anything at all. This is a sound, this is a taste, this is a clock. Do you understand?

To me, what the deep teachings of emptiness are pointing to is not just the emptiness of the personal self, but also the emptiness of the selves of phenomena. Everything is empty. All things are empty of being things, of being inherently existing things.

So the way of looking: "This is empty of self. This is void of self or of anything pertaining to self or belonging to self." I think it's referring to that. And that if you practice it that way... And the "this" there, again, is anything. Anything that's in the attention, anything that one pays attention to—whether it's this body or this whatever it is—is empty of self, empty of self. It's empty in itself. That's another way of saying it's empty in itself.

If one does that again and again and again—we're talking about something very agile—it has to make sense to me what that means. It's empty, empty. It's empty of self or of being something that is a part of some larger self, like it's a part of a larger phenomena, like this spring here is a part of a larger lamp or anything like that. That has to make sense. The insight way of looking has to make sense to me.

A way of going about "empty of self" means it's fabricated in the way we've been talking about. This thing does not exist as a thing unless the mind fabricates it as a thing. And if the mind doesn't put in the conditions—clinging and conception and a certain relationship to it—that thing does not get fabricated or constructed as a thing. Does this make sense?

So these ways of looking have to make sense, but it will be equivalent, or one way of doing it, or a shorthand way is: fabricated, fabricated. But I have to have the experience of having seen things unfabricate through playing with other ways of looking in the past. I have to have enough experience of that so that when I point at something with my mind and say "fabricated," it's resting on the consolidation of my previous insight, seeing things fade. I know they're fabricated. I know it here in my heart. So I can just look at them as fabricated.

And in that one word, there's a whole—you could write a book explaining what that one word means: fabricated. So it has to be there, and that's what I mean. It's very agile because that one word contains a lot of understanding but in a very dense way, but very light.

So fabricated, maybe... It's empty in itself or of a phenomenal self, which is more than to say it's not me or not mine, I would say. To really point to this jhāna, we need to go beyond the teachings about personal self and not me, not mine, and actually to the level of the phenomenal self, the emptiness of phenomenal self, which is a deeper level.

It could also be—and some of you know this, and it's in Seeing That Frees—all this stuff is in Seeing That Frees—but it could also be: this is empty, empty of self or of anything belonging to a self, void of self or void of anything belonging to itself. Some of you know, in Seeing That Frees, you can find a meditation on wholes and parts and a way of going deep into emptiness, or pretty deep into emptiness, through a meditation on wholes and parts and their relationship and their mutual dependency and mutual emptiness.

And so this could be referring to something like that. Whatever this is, it's not a part of something bigger and it's not a whole which has parts. The very notions are empty. So there are different ways of doing it.

We don't have time to go into detail. I'm just pointing at various possibilities here, though they're explored in quite a lot of detail in Seeing That Frees. But that might be another approach.

So that's the second contemplation. The third one presents us with an even more puzzling formula: "Then again, the disciple of the noble ones considers this: I am not anything belonging to anyone anywhere, nor is there anything belonging to me in anyone anywhere."

This formulation should make us scratch our heads. I think we must consider the historical context of the Buddha's time—the different religious views and meditative practices that were prevalent then. It's quite possible that this addresses specific metaphysical positions. In fact, in the Buddha's biographical story, we encounter practitioners who take the realm of infinite consciousness as ultimate reality, believing that everything in the world belongs to that ultimate reality. Not only do they view it as the ultimate reality, but they hold that I in my true essence, and you in your true essence, are that ultimate reality. Your true Self with a capital S is that infinite cosmic consciousness.

This strange formula cuts through any possibility of viewing myself or any elements of myself in relation to something like this cosmic consciousness. "I am not belonging to anyone"—that deity, that cosmic consciousness. There's nothing in my makeup that belongs to that. Even though I might have been deeply attached to such a view, and it might have been an extremely helpful, beautiful, liberating, heart-opening perspective at another level, now I cut through it. Remember what we discussed about provisional truth—I'm moving to another level now.

"I am not anything belonging to anyone, any deity for instance, anywhere. Nor is there anything belonging to me in anyone anywhere." I'm also not taking the seat of identification with the cosmic consciousness or anything like that, claiming that all this somehow belongs to me.

If you reach this point in practice, however strange these formulas sound—puzzling, baffling, seemingly arcane—it's still worth engaging with them playfully. Sometimes even when we only half understand something, these contemplations can have a magical power.

Now I'm contradicting what I said earlier. I emphasized that when you work with concepts like fabrication or emptiness, they must really mean something to you—you have to genuinely understand them. Yet I'm contradicting myself here: there's also the possibility of thinking, "I have no idea what this means, but I'm just going to try playing with it and see what happens." That exploration is for later stages of practice.

The Buddha continues: "Practicing and frequently abiding in this way, his mind acquires confidence in that dimension." The realm of nothingness opens up in all its mystical depth. Again, we're talking about insight ways of looking, not mere intellectual pondering. We're working with something very light, liquid, agile, very subtle, yet possessing immense power. I want to return to these insight ways of looking and their relationship with this dimension of nothingness shortly, speaking practically in terms of technique.

So here we are again. I really want to dissolve into this nothingness as much as possible. As with all the jhānas, there will be a subtle polarity between subject and object. The object here is the nothingness itself, but there will still be some degree of subtle polarity, a subtle sense of separation, a subtle duality present. The fundamental structure of consciousness—what I call "sati"—remains.

But again, absorption: how much can I dissolve into this? It's an open-ended direction that doesn't reach a final endpoint. We keep trying to absorb more deeply, to dissolve more completely. Yet we will never totally absorb. Even if you feel completely absorbed, it simply means you haven't noticed a subtle remnant of subject-object duality, of subject-object polarity still present.

We cannot totally erase or collapse the subject-object duality without much deeper insight ways of looking. I know that in many circles it's very popular and quick off the tongue to say "no subject-object duality" and "there was no self" and "there's no this or that." It's very easy to say these things, but again, this is precisely why I place so much emphasis on subtlety, discernment, discrimination, attunement—really noticing that there is still a subtle subject-object duality here.

Unless I move the insight to a completely different level—which hopefully we'll explore in the next couple of days—that duality is not going to collapse. Usually when people talk about "yeah, there was no self and there's no duality and there's no separation," it's simply that they're not paying close enough attention to what's actually happening. They haven't noticed something crucial. There hasn't been sufficient training in subtle discerning and discrimination.

So when we talk about non-conceptual awareness, when we talk about the total collapse of subject-object duality, we're talking about something extremely rare and extremely strange. That takes quite a rare and sophisticated, profound, and subtle insight to collapse, to go beyond.

But practically speaking, I want to keep this absorption open-ended. I will never reach the end of it. It's open-ended, this absorption. I just try to dissolve mind and body in this nothingness as much as one can.

And again, this forward leaning tendency—we can configure this nothingness differently. We can configure this nothingness upright, so there's less leaning. Instead of it being in front of me with me falling into it, or the mind getting sucked into it, or trying to probe it in front of me, I can put it where the body is. There's nothingness here—it's not just in front of me, it's here too, in the space where the body used to be. Or I can configure it 360 degrees around. All this can help with that strong tendency to lean that happens for many people.

Depending on how one approached it, just like with infinite consciousness, many aspects of working with it depend on which route one has taken into it. If one is going from these insight ways of looking, one considers: this is empty of self, this is empty of anything belonging to a self. The "this" is really anything at all—anything that arises. It could be the perceptions of normal sensory awareness. And one starts with that: the perception of my body, the perception of this pain, the perception of this pīti, whatever. One just keeps training the insight way of looking on it.

Let's say it starts with a pain in my tummy. I just keep looking at it with the same insight way of looking. What's going to happen? Probably the pain fades. Probably it goes through a phase where there's pīti arising, maybe sukha. So maybe it goes through some of the jhānas. Maybe the train doesn't stop there—you're just kind of seeing the station out the window, and it goes by as it's fading. Then it starts to open up into deeper senses of fading.

So the "this" from the insight wavelength could be anything. And it might be, if one is approaching it that way through the insight ways of looking—or sometimes if one is approaching it other ways, from the infinite consciousness, for instance—that still other perceptions are arising.

This is quite important because some people say, "Oh, they're not gone," and they get into a tizzy about that, thinking the perceptions need to disappear—a very subtle tizzy. If that's happening, then what's really skillful is to regard them as no-things. They are not things. In other words, the same insight way of looking is just trained on them.

Now, by that point, it might be that I don't even need the whole "it's empty" formulation. It's just: they're no-thing. This thing is a no-thing. It's a no-thing. It's a no-thing. Or they're fabrications—again, I need to understand what that means. This sound I hear, that plane or whatever it is, it's fabrication, that sense perception. I need to understand that.

Or they're just perceptions. That's an interesting one. The insight way of looking "just perception" has many alternative subtexts. It can mean—and I think when some people hear it, or I've taught it in the past, they take it to mean, and it's totally valuable for it to mean at one level—what it means is: this is just awareness in substance. Whatever this sound or this pain or this thought is, it's just awareness in substance. So it's taking the insight from the vastness of awareness and applying it as an insight way of looking. It's just a perception. It's just awareness in substance.

But here we need to go beyond that. And if I say "just a perception," it really means it's fabricated. It's a deeper insight.

It's just a perception, meaning it's just something that's fabricated—as all perceptions are. So we might use as our tincture for an insight way of looking just this very subtle "just a perception," for example, or something like that, whatever the tincture is. But it's important to read the small print. It's important to know what it means, because the small print will determine what happens.

If I'm viewing it as "just a perception," but what I really mean or what I really understand by that is "it's just the same substance as awareness," it will take me to the vastness of awareness or maybe the infinite consciousness. But if my "just a perception" has the small print "just fabricated, because all perceptions are fabricated," then it takes me deeper. Make sense?

Again, when perceptions are still arising—when the nothingness is sort of there, but there's still stuff at the edges that one feels like, "Oh, it's not completely pure yet"—one could regard those perceptions as dukkha. Dukkha because perceptions are not peaceful, which corresponds to the first of the Buddha's three insight ways of looking. They're dukkha. But it has to be that we're not talking about aversion there. If that's dukkha and it's got irritation in it and aversion, that's not going to take me deeper. It will take me out of the whole depth, because aversion is a fabricator and we're moving in the direction of less fabrication.

So you have to be careful with these kinds of things and these insight ways of looking that aversion doesn't get woven in subtly. It has a very strong effect when it does that. You're really trying to view without aversion: "It's dukkha, it's unsatisfactory. It's dukkha because it's a perception and perceptions are not peaceful," as the Buddha says, but that doesn't mean there's aversion to them.

These insight ways of looking are very subtle, light, agile, liquid, but very finely poised as well. There's something where the degree of the delicacy and the subtlety of the poise is the degree of their power.

Actually, what I've just described—this kind of not quite pure jhānic state—it's like in the neighborhood of the nothingness, or the nothingness is there but the mind hasn't completely entered into it, or it's kind of half in and half out, or mostly in and there's a little bit less. This not quite pure jhānic state may actually be more useful because of the opportunity to practice those ways of looking at objects and at sense perceptions and mental perceptions right then.

Again, we tend to think, "Oh, it's not going well," or we judge it dependent on how deep the absorption is. But the very fact that it's kind of not quite in yet gives us more opportunity to look in a certain way at these perceptions. And that may be more useful than when it's just completely, purely emptied out, because it's the ability to look at—it's the ability to sense and to relate to perceptions in these ways, with these insight ways of looking—that's what's most liberating. That's what brings the radical change and the radical openings of view: our ability to be in the world of things, to engage things, knowing they are empty.

So this kind of "it's not quite settled yet" state with regard to the realm of nothingness gives us the opportunity to practice ways of looking right then in this kind of in-between state that one might judge as "I haven't really got it." It gives us the opportunity to practice ways of looking that are, in the end, actually more powerful.

So this whole realm of nothingness and everything that goes with it is an experience and/or an understanding of emptiness at a very deep but not yet total or ultimate level. When we're talking about the dimension of nothingness, we should be understanding emptiness at a very deep level from it, with it, or on our way to it. It's wrapped up in the dimension of nothing—an understanding at a very deep level of emptiness. It's not the final, ultimate deepest level of emptiness, but it's still really important.

Again, we can talk about nothingness and no-thingness, but they're really just two sides of the same coin. The advantage, I think, of working from the insight ways of looking, as the Buddha described—and as we went through very briefly there, and in a lot more detail in Seeing That Frees—the advantage of working that way is because those insights get consolidated more.

Especially the second and third: "This is empty of a self or of what belongs to a self." There's—what's that phrase again?—"I am not anything belonging to anyone anywhere, nor is there anything belonging to me and anyone anywhere." These ones are empowering a view of emptiness with regard to phenomena, the phenomena of the world, the phenomena of our life.

The first one—"perceptions aren't peaceful, let me go for something without perceptions where there's more peace"—again, you can hear the danger of dualism there. You can hear the danger of a dualistic attachment.

In a way, what I've just said—the samādhi here, in other words, how absorbed am I in this state—is actually less valuable than the insight. The degree of my absorption into this state may be less valuable than the insight that comes from the state or on my way to it or around it or in the after-effects. I would say that the insight is actually more important than the degree of samādhi here.

So no-thing, or the emptiness of things. The understanding of the no-thingness of things, of the absence of inherent existence of things—that really ultimately there are no things—the understanding of that while we're perceiving things is, as I said, immensely liberating. So freeing in its potential. It's a very profound understanding and it has different levels to it. Lots of different levels to it, at least the way I would teach it. The same understanding of no-thingness at deeper and deeper levels.

That's the usual way I would teach emptiness. You just go one level, consolidate that, then to a whole other level of what the same thing means. What it means to say something is empty. What it means to say there are no things. But even at not such a profound level, it can be enormously liberating. There is so much potency of potential freedom there.

When there's no thing, when we begin to sense that or be able to see there's no thing here really, then there's the possibility that we can be with something with either no or much less sense of imprisonment with regard to that thing. Much less sense, or no sense, of imprisonment in, with, or by any form.

Whether that form is a relationship one feels claustrophobic in, whether it's a work situation that one feels hampered by, stuck in, constricted by, whether it's any kind of situation or a social situation or an ongoing social construction that one finds oneself in, whether it's an illness, whether it's a retreat—all the bonds of finitude. Where there's finitude, we can feel imprisoned by those edges in all kinds of ways.

You just have to ponder this and actually see: where there's a thing, there's the possibility of imprisonment in relation to, with, by, in that thing.

So understanding this no-thingness, being able to relate to a thing, see a thing, be in a thing—I'm using 'thing' obviously in a very broad sense now—to be able to see that way and know its no-thingness can open up tremendous freedom, the end of a sense of imprisonment. One is free. The bars are still there; one is free.

Sometimes I used to say to people years ago, for example, in walking meditation: "Can't I just go for a walk? Same thing. I'll walk. I'll do it mindfully." And I would say, "No, walk up and down and up and down and up and down. You have a beginning and you have an end. Closed form."

Sometimes I would say to people, "Do a walking meditation period for six hours or more—six, seven, eight hours. Walk, walk, walk until you see the illusion of the closeness of that form." Of course, I have to incline my mind to that insight. Here I'm imprisoned. I can't be free to go anywhere. I'm just walking up and down in this body—until one sees through, sees through the form, sees through any sense of imprisonment in that form, sees the emptiness of walking.

What we're talking about here applies to so many other things, so many forms, so many structures, so many imprisonments. It's an emptiness insight, and it's related to this no-thingness of the seventh jhana.

As I said, there are many different levels of this. But even at a more conventional level, we can—as I said, "I don't know what all this means, just walk"—for example, do your walking meditation hours and hours and hours until you see through what looks like a restricted form. You're free.

So the samadhi, as I said, may be less valuable than the insight here. And there's a way, as we've been talking about, the jhana should bring certain insights. It will bring certain insights. When one goes into this level, this dimension of nothingness, it should bring certain insights.

But certainly the insight ways of looking will deliver the jhana. So the causality works both ways. But if I enter this jhana and this dimension of nothingness via the insight ways of looking, it will tend to reinforce those insights more. I will learn those insights more because they've been part of how I've arrived there as well.

In the jhana, as I said, you can have a sense of nothingness and a sense of no-thingness. They can be slightly different. I mean, the actual jhana is really a sense of nothingness. The insight is of no-thingness. It's the latter—the sense of no-thingness, the recognition of no-thingness—that's most important for insight.

Even if I just have an experience of nothingness, deep nothingness, to me it should lead to the insights that the Buddha is talking about: emptiness of phenomenal self and so forth. It should lead to the insight that there are no things, really.

But again, the power of conceptual framework. Because I've heard and read people talk about this state, and they seem to have very good absorption into it, but they don't seem to have sucked the juice from it in terms of the most relevant and the deepest insight from it. So all very well—the absorption is good and fantastic, and you can hold your mind there—but where's the liberating insight from it?

It could be again that because of a conceptual framework which isn't relating these things to emptiness, there's actually a stranglehold on the growth of insight. It may be that the force of the jhanic experience anyway opens that. But I do know cases where that's not the case. And to me, it points again to the hidden power of conceptual frameworks and how important it is to pay attention to conceptual frameworks and just see: are they—are we adopting and using and relying on the most powerful conceptual frameworks, the ones that make the most sense, the ones that point in the right direction? Are we picking the right thing from the fruit tree?

Or are we walking away with something else like a twig or something and not an apple?

So the view then that comes, that becomes available and the understanding and also the after effect on perception here is one moves in the world afterwards and one's clearly moving in a world of things. But they're at the same time felt and seen to be in some very mysterious way, not things. It's a thing and it's not a thing. And it's hard to put that into language. But one way of saying that is these understandings and these perception attainments, they don't make us dysfunctional in the world. Like I'm now unable to drink water because I can't sense a thing there. Of course I can sense a thing, but I can also sense it as not a thing.

No thing, as I said, related to emptiness, does not mean impermanence. Emptiness is way beyond impermanence. When we talk about the no-thingness of things, we're not saying there's not really a glass of water here, there's not really a glass here, there's not really water here. What there are is the really, really rapid arising and passing of either perceptions or atoms or whatever it is. That's impermanence. It might be super-fast impermanence. That's not emptiness.

So that would be an example. If I took the insight of rapid impermanence from all this business of no-thingness and this jhāna, I would be taking, I don't know, a twig from the apple tree and not the apple. No-thing emptiness, this is much, much deeper, much more powerfully liberating than impermanence.

So again there are certain recurrent themes through all this and still with this level of opening and this mystical kind of revelation really, it still brings mettā. Mettā comes from it, just like all the other jhānas. The mettā here, you know, luscious, profound, flavored with the depth of mystery and flavored with the depth of the mystery of no-thingness, of thingness and no-thingness at the same time, of emptiness. Mettā at a whole other level.

And again, we can ask, why mettā? Why mettā? Everything's disappearing. There's no thing. But there's also then less emphasis on the differences. There's certainly less emphasis on this self and the interests of the self and the selfish interests of this self over and above others. But even more, there's a kind of, again, there's oneness. Just like the other arupa jhānas that we've talked about. Oneness, another whole level of oneness, another whole level of mystical oneness opens up with these perceptions.

So we have the oneness of materiality, this sort of woven togetherness of our bodies, of our matter, of all matter, with all matter in the universe. We had the oneness of awareness from the infinite consciousness, the mysterious oneness of our consciousnesses. And here we have a kind of oneness of essence or substance, but that essence is a kind of essence of emptiness. I use essence almost in inverted commas, the substance of all beings and all things, the substance of all phenomena, the essence of all beings and all phenomena is recognized, is felt to be emptiness. But we have to use that word essence a little carefully. And that's a whole other level of mystical oneness that the heart opens to.

So it's emptiness understood at a certain level there, or a certain bandwidth of levels pertaining to the seventh jhāna. So mettā comes, as we would expect by now, and a further opening of oneness.

So just to linger on the mettā piece, later, after you've developed this for a while, and also with the development of other emptiness practices, again, we can make cocktails. So we can mix perhaps certain brahmavihāra practices, maybe mettā or karuṇā, compassion practice, with, for instance, this sense of no-thingness or emptiness.

There is, as we talked about, this spectrum of fading, spectrum of unfabricating, and it's possible, with practice, it's possible to play with perception, which is, again, one way of construing everything that we're doing, one way of construing what the whole dharma is. We're playing with perception and play along that spectrum of fading so that self and other fade to a great degree and phenomena as well. There's a partial fading of this being or that being who one is then directing mettā towards. They become extremely insubstantial, barely there because they're just on the sort of cusp of completely fading out and diaphanous there. They're on the verge of fading, but still they're there as an object, as a person, knowing that they're empty.

So there's a knowing that they are empty, they are empty of inherent existence. There's an experientially, that knowing of their emptiness is empowering an insight way of looking, which is empowering the fading down to a point where they're just kind of appearing, teetering on the edge. And then the love, and then practicing the mettā or the karuṇā towards this empty person, that balance somewhere on a cusp of fading and appearance.

So they're barely there. They're appearing, but they're barely there. They're barely formed. They're half faded, yet they're distinct.

They're just about distinct as this person or that person. Doing that and then adding into this alchemical mix, adding your metta towards this person or your karuna towards this person empowers the metta or the karuna to a whole other level.

Some people think, well, if someone's empty, surely I'm not going to have metta because they're empty, right? But no, if you actually practice it, it takes the love and the compassion to a whole other level, a whole other empowerment. And actually this kind of thing—playing with the spectrum of fading through an insight way of looking, making cocktails—there are all kinds of options that start opening up, all kinds of games we can play and be very creative here, all kinds of beauty and wonder that can open up in this territory.

In a way one could say this is the territory now of tantric practice, of vajrayana, ideally I would say. It comes from this knowing of emptiness, this understanding of emptiness, and this ability to actually control, if you like, or play with perception to a certain degree so that things don't just completely fade and then I can't do anything, there's nothing because everything's completely gone. But nor are things or beings reified and solid. They're in this diaphanous, divine, empty yet appearing, on the cusp of fading yet appearing. They're in that place and it's a magical place and it's a place of potent magic.

In the Mahayana teachings, it's said that only a Buddha—not an Arahant, not a fully enlightened person in the Theravada teachings—only a Buddha, a complete Buddha, can both fully view something or someone as empty at the same time that they still perceive that thing or that someone. They still perceive them as someone or something. For all the rest of us, when I view X or Y or this person or that person or this phenomenon or that phenomenon as empty, if that makes sense to me what it means and I'm applying it in this agile, subtle way, I'm viewing this as empty, that thing will disappear, it will fade. Only a Buddha can fully view something as empty and still perceive it.

That's a core and fundamental but not very well known Mahayana teaching and it has enormous implications. One way of construing what one's doing when you're practicing Vajrayana visualization practices and seeing appearances as divine—and some of you will never have heard of this, some of you will have—is you're deliberately mimicking the mind of a Buddha and that capacity of a Buddha to do just that, to understand and view something as empty at the same time you're actually perceiving it without it completely fading. So that Vajrayana, that kind of practice, is just this pretend mimicking of being a Buddha. And if you do that enough, that's one way to become a Buddha, is you just imitate a Buddha and then you become a Buddha. That's all Mahayana and Vajrayana teaching.

I'm just mentioning it. But a couple of things from that, and they're significant. Well, I think that's very significant in all kinds of ways. And certainly as practice options, hugely significant and immensely beautiful playgrounds open up, immensely beautiful realms and possibilities open up there.

But there are a couple of points I want to draw out from what I've just been talking about. So one is about this malleability of perception with the emptiness and the fading. I'll come back to that. The other, again, is revisiting our theme of desire. We said there's this iddhipāda that the Buddha talked about, and desire is one of them. And then we keep touching on it in this retreat. And one of the things I said, and I've said it now, I've pulled it out as something to talk about twice and a third time now, at least I think, is again, what is it exactly I'm desiring from practice?

What exactly is the mix of desires, the precise mix of my desires that brings me to practice, that keeps me practicing, that takes me to retreats or whatever it is? What's in there, what those desires are, has a tremendous influence on then what unfolds, let's say, on a retreat or in your practice or in your life. So that if one of those desires or even the main desire for practice is to open my heart and for the heart to be touched and that's really what takes me to practice and that's maybe what brings me on a jhāna retreat somehow—that may seem a bit of a strange choice of retreat. If you want that, why would you choose a jhāna retreat necessarily?

And again, talking about this, the influence of exactly what it is that I desire, the influence of that on what unfolds and what becomes possible. If that's my primary intention, maybe conscious, maybe semi-conscious, then it's probably not enough to sustain the intention for jhānas and for jhāna practice. It's a wonderful intention, but it's probably not enough to actually show up hour after hour on a retreat like this or a longer jhāna retreat to actually sustain: this is what I'm doing. I'm not getting distracted. This is the primary thing I'm doing. I'm occasionally doing something else, but this is what I'm doing.

We've talked over and over about just how hard that is to sustain that intention and also just how important it is to sustain that intention because without it sustaining, things won't open up. They'll open up in a very limited way, but they won't unfold to these kinds of depths or any real jhānic depths. Hard to sustain that, difficult to sustain that intention, a single intention like that. But if my kind of primary thing that I'm looking for or wanting from practice is the heart to be touched or open, then as I said, it's probably not enough to sustain that intention. It's probably not enough to keep working and playing, for instance, in the ways that we've been taught, because I'm actually interested in something else and it's hard to see the connection and I'll be drawn to other things because they're more obviously in line with my desires.

So this might seem a strange thing to say at this point of the retreat, but again, partly I'm talking to the recordings when I talk, but there's a more general principle which applies anyway, and I want to really reinforce that general principle. So if I'm interested in any deep practice, developing any deep practice—jhānas, emptiness, whatever it is—then I really have to understand, I'm saying it again, I really have to understand desire. And I have to understand my relationship with desire. And that has to be authentic. And I have to understand what I tend to do or not do with desire. And I have to understand what the influences are of different desires. And all of that, which is repeating what I've said before.

So it's this general principle that is really important. If there was someone listening to the recordings who starts listening, let's say, to the recordings from this retreat, but really what they're mostly wanting is open-heartedness and for their heart to be touched or something—which may not even be something they've articulated consciously to themselves—it's probably the case that they will have given up listening to the recordings by now. But the general principle is really important about what we're talking about: that desire and really being clear about what the desires are.

But the second thing I think is really important because it is true. Most of you will have got this sense. It is true that the jhānas open the heart. Can I say that now? And you feel that that's a—yeah, it should be. You should have a real sense of like, wow, this really has an impact on the heart. The capacity of the heart to be touched, the capacity of the heart to hold ranges and depths and beauties of emotion and also difficult emotion, and all that. Jhānas do open the heart enormously in ways and at levels that perhaps before really engaging in such practices and staying with them and pursuing and staying with the intention and working in these ways would have been undreamed of—the way the heart opened. It would never have occurred to us that the heart could open in such ways or at such levels.

Again though, again, if consciously or semi-consciously I have a conception or a conceptual framework or an idea or an image of what heart opening, love, or even sensitivity—one word that we've been using—if I have an idea, an image, a notion, a conception of what those things mean. Heart opening, love, sensitivity, for example. What they mean, what they look like, what they involve, what they need. If my idea is limited, then it might be that there is a limited range and possibility and depth of heart opening. Because my very conception, even if it's semi-conscious, is limiting what's possible for the heart. It's limiting the heart opening that's possible. One remains confined in the presupposed limits. Again, they weren't even conscious perhaps.

In fact, the danger is even more, and especially so when we think, "Well, I just want my heart to open. I'm not really into conceptual frameworks. I'm not really a conceptual person. I'm just kind of open because I want my heart to be open. So I keep my mind open." But actually it's not. There's an idea there. There's a limit. There's an idea, an image, a notion of what heart opening or being touched or whatever means, involves, needs, looks like. And that limited idea is limiting what's actually possible.

So heart opening is endless, I would say. It's endless. There's no end to heart opening. There's no end. It's endless in terms of what it is and also what it includes and what it involves. It's endless if we let it be endless—meaning if we let the heart open, but also if we let the mind be not limited in terms of what it means.

Again, the power of conception, the power of conceptual frameworks, the power of notions and ideas, conscious or unconscious, is enormous, really, really enormous. This is something to really explore. Again, we can talk about jhānas, but there's other issues like desire and idea or conception that have power and have determinative power over much, much more than we recognize. And they have determined over what will open for us as human beings or what remains closed. We don't even understand why is it remaining closed. We don't even recognize it remains closed until we hear other people talking about things. "Why haven't I had that experience?"

Okay, last thing relating back to the emptiness. We talked about the metta and the love and the desire. And again, coming back to our theme of malleability of perception. So it should be, I would say, that to the degree that one has realized the emptiness of things—and remember, that's a spectrum. It's really a spectrum. So we're talking about emptiness of things can be realized at a very everyday, not big deal level. And it's still really, really important. And it can be realized all the way down, incredibly deep, everything in between.

But that realization of the emptiness of things—or the no-thingness of things—for many people, it legitimizes and opens up the possibilities for playing with perception even more, for the malleability of perception.

In the opening talk, or very near the beginning of the retreat anyway, I acknowledged and wanted to recognize together the fact that I knew many of you would have been very active in different sorts of activism recently, particularly around climate change and species loss and the environment. You may have arrived at the retreat tired from all that—from the craziness of extinction rebellions and such—tired, wired, and grieving.

Someone who indeed arrived at the retreat after lots of dedicated activism, wired, tired, and grieving, left a beautiful note the other day. I'm going to read it to you and then say a few things about it.

She writes: "This morning I decided to walk in sukha"—so walk with the primary nimitta of the second jhāna—"being surrounded and welcomed by it rather than walking in a sukha bubble of my energy body." The usual instruction has been to keep the sukha, if we're doing sukha while walking, contained within the energy body bubble space. She tried something different—to walk surrounded by it rather than just in the energy bubble.

She continues: "For many months, I found it nearly impossible to enjoy being in nature, although I was in amazing places in the natural world. I mainly perceived nature as wounded, deeply ailing, dying. A perception that is not only very painful, but also, as I was very aware, not always helpful or sustainable for the being. This morning, all was radiating or being an expression or manifestation of happiness. The very fabric of the cosmos was sukha. This was very beautiful and healing.

"Yet what was even more profound and made me cry was that not only was all an expression of sukha, but the cosmos—or all, or it—was delighted and happy at my activism. No matter how flawed, mad, confused it may be at times, it rejoiced in it, no matter what the outcome."

I want to analyze this a little bit. This is a beautiful experience, very healing. There's jhānic familiarity—in this case with the second jhāna—and at least some degree of mastery, because walking with the sukha is part of the elements of mastery. There's jhānic familiarity, some degree of mastery, and then the deliberate choice not to contain it to the energy body as would be usual for the second jhāna, but to allow it to become huge and cosmic.

In soul-making dharma, I want to make a distinction here. We use the word cosmopoiesis, which means cosmos and poiesis—making or creating, or an art of perceiving the cosmos a certain way, of sensing the cosmos a certain way. Here came a cosmopoiesis at first, but that cosmopoiesis wasn't fully imaginal. The point I want to make is this: we can have a cosmopoiesis—as someone shared in a note the other day about the fabric of the universe being joy—so here the fabric of the universe is sukha. There's a cosmopoiesis, an altered perception of the cosmos, but we can have a cosmopoiesis that's not fully imaginal. It's just a cosmopoiesis, an effect of perception, a malleability of perception regarding what the sense of the cosmos is.

Then, in this report, that cosmopoiesis becomes more imaginal. What's the difference? One of the differences is that the self gets drawn into the soul-making dynamic. It's not just that the universe has joy as its fabric—delightful as that is, incredibly beautiful and mystical and lovely an experience as that is. When it becomes imaginal, when we enter soul-making territory, something else starts to happen: the self gets drawn into the soul-making dynamic. The self becomes image to some extent. Then other elements of what we call the lattice of the imaginal—the nodes, the different elements—start to get drawn in because the self has become imaginal.

This is very different from an experience where there's joy, where the cosmos is joy, where its essence and substance is joy, but the self is not really drawn into the experience. The self is prominent, enjoying it, touched by it, but it hasn't become imaginal in that way.

One of the moves that sends experience into imaginal territory—and it's not really a black and white division, like all these things, even with jhānas—is the becoming imaginal of the self. It's not just the objects, not just the world, but the self as well.

Back to fantasies of the path: what supports our desire, what supports our intention? Here opened up the possibility of an image that involved the image of the self and of nature and of the cosmos. Self, other, world all became imaginal. The potential here is for that very image—the delight and happiness and rejoicing in her activism, in the narrative of the self, in the dedication and even the willingness of the self to do this work, mad as it seemed, ineffectual as it seemed, difficult and painful as it seemed—the narrative and the dukkha of the self become image. They get drawn into the image.

It's different than just a cosmopoiesis where the fabric of the cosmos becomes joy and the self remains very quiet, very much in the background. It's a different level, but that possibility then can become—immensely helpful in the long term—for instance, as a fantasy, as an image that really ramps up the support long-term for working at difficult things, working through difficult times, whatever it is.

If you're on a retreat and it's difficult, what's the fantasy of the path we've talked about? What's the view? In this case, it's activism. No matter what the outcome.

The blessing of when things get imaginal that way is they get liberated because of the eternality of the imaginal territory. They get liberated from dependency on the outcome. So one's free to work, free to be with the pain, supported by the beauty and the soulfulness and the depth of the fantasy that touches the self and not so hampered by and worried by and limited by what the outcome might be. And yet one's still working full out for it, but supported by this whole other dimension of being, the imaginal sense.

And then this support in the long time to be able to sustain one's soul desires, one's deep desires through the difficult, through the long term, without the heart having to close, without the heart having to close to grief, to pain, to possible failure and the threat of possible failure.

So it's not a soul-making retreat, but I wanted to say this because again, desire and understanding desire and understanding has a lot to do with being able to open up to what we want to open up to. Being able to do what we set out to do and sustain that. And there's also this connection with the malleability of perception, which starts to—we've talked about it from the beginning of this retreat, in this realm of nothingness, and we talk about the emptiness of things. As I said, the legitimacy and the possibility of the malleability of perception just open up even more, goes to a whole other level. So relevant in a few ways.

Okay, let's have some quiet time together.

Thank you everybody. Time for tea. Enjoy.

CHAPTER 221

The Eighth Jhāna (The Realm of Neither Perception Nor Non-Perception)

Rob Burbea · 1h09

> In this profound exploration of the eighth jhāna, Rob Burbea delves into the realm of neither perception nor non-perception (nevasaññānāsaññāyatana), the most refined of the formless attainments. Drawing from the Ānañjasappāya Sutta and other canonical sources, he examines how this state represents an almost complete release from perception while maintaining awareness. Burbea emphasizes that perception (saññā) should be understood not as mere labeling, but as the forming or fabricating of objects for consciousness. In this eighth jhāna, consciousness doesn't land on any object—not even the strange object of nothingness from the seventh jhāna. The talk explores various methods for accessing this state, including natural maturation from the realm of nothingness, insight ways of looking that recognize all perceptions as unfabricated, and subtle intentional approaches. Burbea discusses the profound after-effects on perception, creating effortless equanimity through recognizing all experience as 'just perceptions.' He addresses important warnings about avoiding aversion in practice and emphasizes how deep understanding of dependent arising and emptiness should increase rather than diminish our love and compassion for the world.

Yesterday we talked about the seventh jhana—what many people nowadays call the seventh jhana, though the Buddha simply called it the realm of nothingness. There's a possibility of going beyond that too, to a deeper jhana, a more refined jhana.

Again, the Buddha describes a practitioner who has progressed through the jhanas up to the dimension of nothingness, sticking with that theme, developing it, pursuing it, establishing himself firmly in it. After a while, the thought occurs to him: "What if I, with the complete transcending of the sphere of nothingness, were to enter and remain in the sphere of neither perception nor non-perception?" Without rushing toward this state, he enters and remains in the sphere of neither perception nor non-perception. He sticks with that theme, develops it, pursues it, and establishes himself firmly in it.

That's it. Neither perception nor non-perception.

What is this about? We should be very clear. Again, what's primary here? There's something primary that the title, the name of this realm and jhana captures: neither perception nor non-perception.

I've come across writings and heard things that seem to emphasize the absence of thinking in this jhana, or how delicate a state it is—how any little thought will decimate the state, knock you out of it—as if that fact is the most significant thing about how easily a thought will disturb it. But the title is telling us something. The name is telling us something.

So much here, certainly with regard to this jhana, and so much in relation to all the jhanas—and I would say, perhaps you're getting an inkling by now—so much in the whole of the Dharma, the whole way we understand Dharma and approach it, what we think we're doing with it and what is primary in it, so much hinges on what we mean by perception. What we mean by that word "perception," how we understand it, and how we relate to it.

What does saññā mean in Sanskrit? What does it not mean? To perceive doesn't mean to label. Remember that? Often you'll come across that in lists of what these Buddhist words mean: saññā as labeling or remembering. We could interpret it that way, but what then unfolds in terms of the whole scaffolding and conceptual framework of the Dharma will be much, much more limited.

Perception is not a labeling. It's not a verbal labeling of things. That would also imply that the sheep out there don't perceive. I don't think sheep have language, but they certainly know the difference between food, a human being, and another sheep. They're perceiving without labeling, I would assume. We're talking about something else here. An insect, maybe even an amoeba in some ways, differentiates between what's to eat, what to avoid, which way to go—without, one assumes, labeling or language.

So what is perceiving? What is perception? I'd say it's probably most helpful, most congruous with the whole conceptual framework and scaffolding understanding of the Dharma that will be most liberating, if we think of perception as meaning something like the forming or constituting or fabricating of an object for consciousness. Do you understand what I mean by that?

This is so, so important. We do that when there's no verbal label going on. As you walk from here to the dining room, not everything you notice has a verbal label accompanying it. You're still perceiving. Sometimes we call it recognition, as if it's based on memory—that's another interpretation. We can always perceive an object without recognizing what that object is.

I don't recognize it, or just that it's some kind of object. All this is perceiving.

So we could say perceiving is the act of forming, constituting, fabricating an object for consciousness. And perception, as we defined earlier, we're using that word synonymously with experience—in other words, experience, phenomenon, appearance, object even. Object, experience, appearance, and phenomenon. Phenomenon is just a Greek-derived word—phainomenon or something in Greek means appearance. So I would use those words interchangeably: perception to talk about the object, the experience, the phenomenon, the appearance. Perceiving: the act of, again, constituting, forming, fabricating that object for consciousness.

So when we say playing with perception, we're playing with both. We're playing with the forming and the fabricating and the constituting. And of course that does form and fabricate and constitute a different object or a changed object, an altered object, a more or less fabricated object for perception.

Sometimes it's interesting what a difference in terms of defining terms makes. Defining terms in this way or that way can make for the whole possibility of what the Dharma can be. Something to really reflect on. And if you're really keen, you could actually trace it: have two different definitions of perception—for example, perception understood as mental labeling, and perception understood in the way we've just talked about—and see what kind of Dharma is possible from both. That would be a really good exercise if you're up for it. Based on that, the whole interpretation of the Dharma opens or goes in one direction or the other, or closes or gets limited. Other terms take on certain meanings which end up being very significant, very liberating, or not particularly.

Anyway, so everything to me hinges—certainly in this jhāna, because it's just in the name of the jhāna: neither perception nor non-perception; certainly in jhāna work in general; and even more significantly in the whole of the Dharma, the whole of the Dharma.

So in the realm of nothingness—the jhāna before this one that we're talking about today—the primary perception, and actually the only perception left, so to speak, because we've kind of... all the other perceptions of pīti and sukha and space and all, they've gone. The only perception left is this strange perception of nothingness. The only perception left is nothingness. And that's a perception. And as we said, try to imagine that. We're not talking about a very, very big space with nothing in it, which is what most human beings would think of when they say, "Can you imagine nothingness?" We're talking about something even beyond that. It's nothingness. But that's the only perception left, and that's the primary perception in the realm of nothingness. So that's strange enough.

And now we're going to go even beyond that: neither perception nor non-perception. We're not even perceiving nothingness, because nothingness—a nothing—is a kind of object, is constituted. In the realm of nothingness, nothingness is constituted as a kind of object for consciousness, for attention, for the citta. You understand? It's some kind of very strange thing that's a nothing. It's a thing there. It's a nothing.

Here, in the realm of neither perception nor non-perception, without being unconscious—in other words, without being totally non-percipient, so without being unconscious—the citta, the consciousness, is, we could say, not landing on any object at all. It's not landing on any object, not even the strange object of nothingness. It's not landing.

So when there's nothingness, when there's whatever jhāna you're up to and is your playground, it forms an object. The primary nimitta forms an object for consciousness, and the consciousness wants to really get into it and enjoy it and yummy up. It's a kind of... you understand, there's the subject and the object. The object is the primary nimitta or the jhāna itself, and that's an object of the consciousness, and you could use the language: the consciousness is landing on that object. And that's partly what attention means.

Here it's not landing on any object, not even the strange object of nothingness. And it's not landing in that way moment after moment. And that's what makes it the jhāna, the sort of constant burning. This not landing, this sense of not landing on any object, is the primary nimitta. In other words, in some strange way, the state itself—the sense, the fact of neither really perceiving (which means, again, neither really construing, constructing, fabricating, forming an object) nor not perceiving at all—that state, that fact, the sense of that, the sense of the mind kind of... would we say doing that or not doing that? Anyway, somewhere in between. That's the primary nimitta.

And you could say a secondary nimitta is the sense of liberation with that.

Because when the mind doesn't land on something, it's not—you know, like when you throw a hook and the hook lands in something—it's just not hooked by anything. It's unhooked. Not completely yet, I'll come back to that. It's not completely unhooked. But that sense of not landing, there's a kind of liberation in that. If I use the language "unhooked," you can feel the relative liberation in that. A hook is a kind of tether, a fetter, an imprisonment. So perhaps we could say the sense of liberation with that, the sense of freedom that comes with that, is a secondary nimitta.

Who's old enough here to remember The Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy? For those who don't know, it was a series of books. I think I must have been a young teenager when it came out, and it was very funny science fiction. There were instructions on how to fly—a two-step instruction. The first step was: fling yourself at the ground. The second step was: miss.

In a way, that's what's going on in this jhana. Later on it might help you as an instruction, but probably at first it won't. What the ground translates as here, if we take the Hitchhiker's Guide instructions, is anything and nothing. Anything and nothing will constitute a ground that you want to miss. You understand?

There is a sutta in the Samyutta Nikaya where the Buddha gives an analogy. I think he's talking to Ananda, and he's giving the analogy of consciousness being liberated—liberated, unhooked, completely unhooked. The analogy he gives is sunlight rising in the east and coming into what starts off as a house in the analogy. He says to Ananda, "Sun rises in the east—where will the sunlight, which is consciousness, analogy for consciousness, where will the sunlight land?"

And Ananda says, "Well, on the western wall."

And the Buddha says, "Well, what if there isn't a western wall? What if there isn't an object for it to land on?"

And Ananda says, "Well, it will fall on the ground outside there."

And he said, "Okay, what if there isn't a ground outside?"

And then Ananda says, "Well, it will fall on the water"—which I guess is the water under the ground in some kind of cosmological system.

And he says, "What if there is no water?"

And Ananda says, "Well, then it wouldn't land."

"And if it's just so, that's consciousness liberated."

Now actually there, the Buddha's talking about the unfabricated, which is a stage ahead of even this jhana. But the analogy works very closely. We're almost there in this jhana. There's something almost but not quite analogous to the Buddha's analogy of nirvana, of the unfabricated, of what remains beyond cessation.

We could put it this way: it's not landing on anything, we could say we're not fabricating. There is not the fabrication at that time of any perceptions—all other perceptions have been unfabricated—except two perceptions. One is the very state, this sense of not landing, this sense of not quite perceiving and yet not quite not perceiving. That's sort of a perception. It's a sort of remnant, or just on the edge. It's the very perception of not really perceiving, but not really not perceiving. So that's one perception.

The other perception that remains is time. Now I'm telling you this, but it may or may not occur to a meditator in this state that that's still there as a perception. There's a sense of this not landing happening in time. It happens in this moment, and implicit in this moment—even though I'm so, so in this moment—there's still implicitly and experientially a past moment and a future moment. So this not landing, this state, is ongoing in time.

This unfabricating represents a very secondary perception, one that most practitioners wouldn't even notice unless they compared it with a completely timeless sense that emerges later. So I'm pointing this out to you now.

There are two perceptions we could say remain in this state: first, no perception of anything—not even nothing, for nothing would itself be a kind of something. There's no perception of anything except the state itself—this strange not-landing, this peculiar experience of not really perceiving yet not really not-perceiving either. And secondarily, there's the perception that this is all happening in time.

It's this latter aspect—though actually both are significant—the happening in time, that marks a fundamental difference between this eighth jhāna and a state of cessation or complete unfabricating.

In this state, in this jhāna, there's a sense of something—another way we could phrase it is a sense of something so ultra-refined that it's really on the edge of perception. That's one way of seeing what's happening. It's something so ultra-refined we can barely say it's a thing to be perceived—an object, a phenomenon, an experience, an appearance. It's so ultra-refined there's almost nothing left of perception as we understood it earlier.

As we said, secondarily there's a sense of release, of being released from perceptions. Ajahn Lee—I mentioned him earlier in the retreat; he was the teacher of the teacher of one of my teachers, a Thai monk in the early twentieth century—phrases it this way: the citta, the mind-heart, is in this state struck by its inability to decide if it's a perception or not. This captures something essential, though perhaps the translation makes it sound rather clunky, as if one is simply pondering the question. Something extremely subtle is happening here.

Again, we can think of this ultra-refinement and connect it with the whole spectrum of refinement I've discussed throughout the retreat. This provides a fruitful way to understand what unfolds through the eight jhānas—they represent a spectrum of progressive refinement, which is the same as saying they're a spectrum of progressive removal of what is gross. This is simply another way of describing progressive non-fabricating, progressive unfabricating, because we would expect the grossest phenomena to be what's most fabricated.

When we don't fabricate something, it gets removed and what remains becomes more refined. Then the next gross thing—when we don't fabricate that, it too gets removed, and we become yet more refined. Do you understand?

Thinking in detail: the first jhāna represents a refinement. What's been removed in the first jhāna? The hindrances—the grossness of the hindrances, which are indeed gross phenomena. In the first jhāna, this grossness of the hindrances is removed. We could say, to express the same thing, that the hindrances are not being fabricated.

In the second jhāna, there's a removal of thought—and we've had this challenge with vitakka and vicāra and how to translate those terms. Certainly discursive thought, that grossness, is removed. It's not being fabricated.

In the third jhāna, what is removed, what is not being fabricated? Pīti is not being fabricated. Pīti is removed. Though relatively subtle compared to the hindrances or gross bodily sense, it's now the grossest element present, so it's not being fabricated.

In the fourth jhāna, even the sukha is not being fabricated, so it's being removed. That's the gross element being removed, though by this point it's something very, very subtle.

In the fifth jhāna, even the subtle sense of materiality—remember we discussed these three levels of being: gross materiality in the kāmaloka world, the world of subtle materiality in the rūpa jhānas, the realm of subtle form in Buddhist cosmology—even this subtle form is removed. Even subtle materiality is not being fabricated. Even that relative grossness, which is actually very subtle, is removed in the fifth jhāna.

We can continue this progression. In the seventh jhāna, space is not being fabricated. In the eighth jhāna, not even nothingness is being fabricated.

You can see how this refinement, this removal of the gross, this not-fabricating, all works together.

So what happens after this jhāna? Now we're not even fabricating nothingness. We've gone beyond that. Is there some further non-fabricating that's possible? Which hopefully we'll explore.

Remarkable feature of this jhana. Very, very remarkable. And in practice, it can help you to find or notice or tune to—focus on, if you like—the most refined perception.

So again, you could do this in the state itself before it's quite consolidated and come together. Just tune to the most refined there. Keep tuning to the most refined. That will help consolidate it. The most refined, we could say perception, but it's not even quite a perception. The most refined thing, object—that doesn't really do it. The most refined sense, the most refined level, I don't know. Words really start to fall apart at this level. It gets really hard to put things into language, but the tuning to whatever is most refined there can help consolidate it if it's not already consolidated in a session.

So we can kind of refine the whole experience and move it into the more pure realm of neither perception nor non-perception by very gently, very gently looking for, very delicately looking for, listening for, attuning to, putting our antennae out for whatever is most refined. And that's a very subtle, sensitive, delicate and gentle process.

And one can even perhaps start doing that in the realm of nothingness. When that's established, when you've got some experience with that, then maybe kind of looking for what's the most refined in there, ultra refined. And again, it may start, what would we say, maturing, purifying from that, moving on from that, just from that attending to the most refined level. And that amplifies it as we've talked about all the way through the retreat. So with experience that may work that way and may take you to the realm of neither perception nor non-perception.

So I was trying to find the sutta—well, anyway, I couldn't find it. But again, the Buddha says this is an escape. It's an escape, nisaranam. It's a release of awareness. Again, he uses this language a lot. It's almost a total release from perception, almost a complete not being hooked, not casting out a hook and finding an object, almost a total release from perception while there is still awareness. So we're not talking about general anesthesia or anything like that here.

And what I was looking for and couldn't find is there's some languaging. So remember we talked about how the Buddha talks about the jhanas as perception attainments. Do you remember this? I couldn't remember if then he says the highest perception attainment is the realm of nothingness. In other words, this one, because it's neither perception nor non-perception, actually doesn't qualify as a perception attainment. I couldn't remember if he counts this one as the highest perception attainment. It doesn't really matter. The principle is the same. I do think somewhere or other he calls this one, the neither perception nor non-perception, he calls it the summit of perception or the limit of perception, I think.

But then we can go beyond this, and hopefully we'll get to that tomorrow. We can even go beyond this, this much unfabricating, this limit of perception, this summit, this perception attainment, if that's what it's called.

There is, again, with the sense of refinement there and somewhat akin to the fourth jhana and some of the other jhanas, there's a real sense of purity here. There's something in the very refinement itself and the stillness. It's extremely pure. Again, these words don't quite capture it. The experience itself is so different than normal experience that words which we use for normal experience get quite clumsy at this point. But I think that's quite a good word. There's something very pure about it. It feels very pure. Refinement, purity, release. These are all part of the texture, let's say, of this realm.

And there is something, I think—and then these words start to sound really ridiculous—amazing and jaw-dropping. So it is amazing and kind of jaw-dropping, but the whole thing is, at this point, very, very delicate because of the refinement. It's very, very still. It's almost like one is awestruck with very little reverberation going on in the being because that would disturb things. So if one can have one's jaw dropping without much reverberation, one would.

But in the refinement, in the purity, in the release, there is something really amazing there, I think—exquisite, beautiful. But these words don't really capture it. It's very different, as I said, from normal experience. We're really talking about something quite different. And in some ways, I think, in a lot of ways—at least that's my sense—in some ways it's quite different even than other jhanic experience. There's a kind of larger quantum leap here, I think.

The after-effects on perception reveal something profound. With regard to what's unfolding in both inner and outer worlds—how my mind is, how my body is, what I see, what I sense—there can arise in the aftermath a simple recognition: this is just what's happening in the realm of perception. All this.

My mind is foggy. My mind is clear. I have a pain in my tummy. I have a headache. This perception, that perception. It's just appearances—just what's happening in the realm of perception. This is profoundly different from experiencing "this is what's happening." Rather, it's "this is just what's happening in the realm of perception."

Through this understanding comes an even deeper relativizing of our phenomenal experience, both internal and external. And from this relativizing arises a truly effortless equanimity with regard to the things of this world—the eight worldly conditions of praise and blame, pain and pleasure, headache or no headache, whatever it may be. This effortless equanimity emerges partly from that after-effect on perception: it's just what's happening in the realm of perception. This relativizes everything.

These are just perceptions—whatever I'm perceiving, whether tummy ache, headache, foggy mind, this or that in the world. They're just perceptions. It's not that things are really otherwise—not that I have a foggy mind but really my mind is clear, or that some other state is more true. They're simply perceptions. No other perception is more true instead.

So how do we open this door? How does the door open for us?

One way, perhaps the safest and most reliable, is simply allowing it to naturally mature from dwelling as fully as possible, as wholeheartedly, attentively, and absorbedly as we can in the realm of nothingness. In time, it will mature.

At this point, the sati, samādhi, sukha, ekaggatā framework probably needs to shift. The sukha becomes less relevant because suffusion primarily pertains to the energy body experience. Perhaps we could speak of different kinds of suffusion, but the other factors become more important: absorbing into the nothingness, sustaining attention, maintaining the sense of nothingness, the intensity—which matters less now—and the enjoyment, which becomes very, very subtle. So perhaps samādhi, sati, ekaggatā rather than the full framework.

Working with this, entering it, abiding there repeatedly, at some point it should mature naturally.

The second possibility for reaching this dimension comes again from the Ānañjasappāya Sutta, where the Buddha describes insight ways of looking that lead to the immaterial realms. Having described the approaches we explored yesterday regarding the dimension of nothingness, he continues: "Then again, the disciple of the noble ones"—again, that word considers—"employs, engages subtly an insight way of looking thus: all sensuality, all sensual perceptions, all perceptions of forms"—which includes perceptions of jhānic forms and experiences, the perceptions of fifth and sixth jhāna, perceptions of infinite space, perceptions of consciousness, and the perception of the dimension of nothingness—"all of these are perceptions. Where they cease without remainder, that is peaceful, that is exquisite"—namely, the dimension of neither-perception-nor-non-perception. "Practicing and frequently abiding in this way, his mind acquires confidence in that dimension."

This is essentially the same instruction as for the realm of nothingness that we explored yesterday, but now extended to include the perception of nothingness itself. Very, very powerful. If you can develop facility with these kinds of insight ways of looking, they become extraordinarily effective.

Again, we're speaking of something very agile—not some elaborate thinking process or philosophical system, but a very light tincture in one's way of looking, employed again and again. Way of looking means way of relating, way of sensing.

One could practice this recognition—that perceptions are not peaceful, seeking instead what is peaceful—from within the realm of nothingness itself. You could begin employing this insight way of looking while established in the dimension of nothingness. Or actually, you can engage it from anywhere.

You could do it from right now, just whatever is in front of me—foggy mind, and so on. And again, I contradict myself constantly, saying so much about how this jhāna will depend on the one before it, and that will depend on the maturing of the one before it, and on and on. After you've gotten the hang of all this, sometimes there will be plenty of times when you sit down and the body feels funny, the mind feels blah, blah, blah. And you just start on that very discomfort of body and non-settledness of mind and non-clarity of mind. You just start employing an insight way of looking like that. And lo and behold, you end up in the eighth jhāna.

So it's all in the art, in the trust, in the confidence—primarily in the art. Also in the familiarity. That's much more likely to happen if you have some familiarity beforehand with the neither perception nor non-perception. But it's definitely not going to hurt to try such a thing. Don't get too locked on where it might end up. You're still practicing a very powerful insight way of looking—see what happens.

It will be, as we will return to, connected with the whole spectrum and the whole process of unfabricating. So whether I actually end up in the eighth jhāna is again less significant than what I learn through employing insight ways of looking and seeing what they do and understanding what they do and adding two and two together and getting four. That's much more important than whether I have achieved eighth jhāna and I get my eighth jhāna badge.

It could also arise or be helped by a similar reflection: just a perception, just a perception—which again was exactly what we included in the list we gave out yesterday. It's just a perception. And again, that could be in and from the realm of nothingness. This too is just a perception, this perception of nothingness. And "just a perception" means again, fabricated, right? It's just a perception means it's fabricated. That's the fine print for "just a perception."

Or again, you can do that from anywhere. Again, I start with my body feeling not so good and the mind—just a perception. Whatever comes into consciousness, whatever perception there is: just a perception, just a perception, meaning it's fabricated, it's fabricated, it's just a perception. And that will start, if I'm doing it right, if I've got the art right of that insight way of looking, it will unfabricate. And because all this is related on the spectrum of unfabrication, it may open up the realm of neither perception nor non-perception. So I could do that from the realm of nothingness or actually from anywhere—from a very ordinary state of consciousness, even from the midst of the hindrances.

There are also plenty of other ways of looking that one could adopt or train on the object of the realm of nothingness. But I've talked about them elsewhere. I'm not going to mention them.

The slight risk in those last three I've listed—either "these perceptions are not peaceful," that one, or "just a perception," that one, or other insight ways of looking—is that they might, they could sometimes be so powerful that they even overshoot the eighth jhāna and you get even more unfabricated. It's possible.

So there's those four. Then there's, remember I said, I think it was very near the beginning of the retreat, I talked about how the jhānas end up being—the sense we can have is just that they're there already. They're in the air, they're frequencies, they're radio frequencies. And we can just tune our dial and find that frequency. So similarly with this, neither perception nor non-perception—it's kind of like a radio frequency or radio station. And when we have a memory of it, in other words, when we've gone in and out lots of times and really gotten more familiar with it, we can just from memory tune to that frequency again. And of course, that's very related to just the whole mastery thing—opening the door or the door to this realm opening through subtle intention. Very similar.

Someone told me a little while ago that their way of working was in the realm of nothingness, their way of moving from the realm of nothingness to the realm of neither perception nor non-perception was in the realm of nothingness to just introduce a little, very subtle sort of thought or intention really: Might there be perception without this object of nothingness? And it was just a kind of invitation. Might there be a kind of perception without this nothingness as an object? And that would help open it up for them.

It might be also that some people are able to find or then tune to and open to—I don't know what to call it—a level of the mind or a part of the mind, part of the citta that already right now, or so it seems, is not perceiving but not non-perceiving. It's already neither perceiving nor non-perceiving. Sometimes that's possible, and then it's possible to find the nowness in it, make that very alive, present—now, now, now—the sense of that happening now, and refine it in that way.

So there's a part, or it can seem there's a part or level of the mind that is, even now, not engaging in perception, is free of it, or is not interested in perceptions. It wants to be free of perceptions, perhaps, and again unhooking from perception—or perhaps it's already unhooked. There's a very subtle sort of hidden dimension, but finding that and then that can be amplified. Perhaps for some people that will work, and again that's something that could work from any state of consciousness, from a normal state of consciousness. Of course the grosser the state of consciousness, the more turbulent it is, the harder that will be to do. But sometimes you get surprised with these things. You get very, very surprised at what's possible.

So these last three that I've mentioned—either tuning to it from memory, or the subtle intention, or this kind of very subtle question "Is it possible to perceive right now without this nothingness, without this object of nothingness?", that one, or this kind of finding a level of the mind that's already neither perceiving nor non-perceiving—all of them imply and need, I would say, some confidence that there is this possibility of neither perception nor non-perception.

And the confidence helps these methods to work so that we can kind of fish for it. And we have confidence in our fishing. And by fishing, I mean an ultra-sensitive, subtle receptivity and attunement. And through that it can emerge.

So again, though, there's an issue here with some of these methods. If I employ an insight way of looking, perceptions are not peaceful. They're not peaceful. I want what's peaceful. That's not peaceful. Any perception is not peaceful. If I employ this tuning to a part of the mind that's actually not engaging in perception or interested in perceptions, and maybe some of the other methods—is there the possibility of aversion? Is there the possibility of aversion to perception? Which means aversion to experience, appearance, objects. Yes, there is.

So what we're talking about here again is so important to emphasize in these insight ways of looking. If there's aversion mixed in with it, it sends the whole thing in a very different direction. It stirs things up in a very different way. So what we're talking about is an insight way of looking that doesn't have aversion in it. The aversion needs to not be there.

When the Buddha talks about insight on several occasions and the way some streams of practice mature, he uses the word disenchantment, and that the practitioner becomes disenchanted with everything actually—with the whole world of phenomenal experience in the outer. There's a disenchantment with sense objects, disenchantment with mental objects, disenchantment eventually with the jhanas, disenchantment eventually with the formless jhanas, all that. So that word occurs relatively frequently.

Some maps of the way insight progresses or the stages of insight really emphasize this quite a lot and emphasize that a practitioner practicing very deeply goes through a period or even recurrent periods of extreme disgust and repulsion at everything—the whole world of appearances, inner, outer states, mental objects, physical objects, the whole is disgusting and repulsive to them. And there's a lot of agitation often with that.

It may be that someone experiencing that sort of thing—it may just be that aversion and neurosis have gotten tied up in their practice. And one is deciding to view it as being on the edge of awakening and so forth. But actually it's just aversion. I'm aversive to my body. It's not great insight into Dharma or something. It's just there's aversion there. Or there's a kind of neurosis.

Sometimes there's a lot of encouragement for very high energy, high intensity, high intentness in practice with a kind of micro-sharp focus. All these things—intensity, energy, micro-focus building up with this teaching about disenchantment given primary place. Actually aversion gets mixed up in there and the whole thing just spawns cycles of dukkha that may have very, very little to do with liberating insight. But one might have heard that they have to do with liberating insight and so one just goes round and round in that.

Are they liberating? Is it liberating? Or are they dependent arisings? If I look a certain way, I get—there's a whole thing about playing with perception. If I look a certain way, I get a certain result. If there's aversion in my looking, I get a certain result. If there's neurosis and repulsion, I'm going to get a certain result—a result in my perception, in my sense of things. You understand?

In some circles, this is a really, really important thing to consider. Have to understand dependent arising, the dependent arising of perception. And if my whole mode of working in insight is not taking the inquiry into the dependent arising of perception—is not taking that as central—I've just got an idea. I'm going to laser beam through this and whatever I hit is closer to the bottom layer of rock and that's the truth. And eventually I'll reach that truth or reality. And I'm not inquiring into dependent arising. Do you understand what I mean by this?

To me, this is the most important thing. If I'm not thinking that way, I go back to what I said at the beginning: what's the conceptual framework? And is the conceptual framework set up to really liberate, or is it set up to take me in directions where I don't understand fully what is happening and what my experience is and why this experience arises now and why that experience arises at another time and why this experience arises or doesn't arise?

So we can certainly set up, and people do, a whole process of insight and stages of insight and there's very, very little consideration of dependent arising. It's almost like it's just a thing on the side.

To me then, dependent arising and emptiness are almost synonymous. Practically, until the very last levels, they're synonymous. If I'm not inquiring into that, if I'm not including that as the central theme and scaffolding of my meditative inquiry, then it's possible that whatever insights I have have very little to do with emptiness, as I would understand it anyway.

I remember coming across something once—I can't remember where exactly. There is a sutta in the Pali Canon, I believe, where two old monks are talking. It's not the Buddha speaking, I can't remember who it is. These two old monks describe a process of stages of insight that unfold—they go through something like disgust, et cetera. There's no place I'm aware of where the Buddha describes that process himself.

But it may well be one of those things that's very, very emphasized in certain texts like the Visuddhimagga or the Abhidhamma. And then that gets taken—this one instance of these two old monks talking becomes, in some paradigms and models, the way insight unfolds. These are the stages of insight, as opposed to: this is what will happen if you look this way. This is what will happen if you conceive this way and look this way. And if you conceive another way and look, this is what will unfold, and so on.

So the stages of insight is a possible model of stages of insight if I look a certain way, usually prioritizing impermanence and micro-focus, et cetera. I'm mentioning this because I know some of you have run into this, and some of you probably have no idea what I'm talking about. It may or may not be useful at some point.

It is true—somewhere the Buddha says, basically, there are four ways to liberation. You can choose the path that is pleasant, a pleasant path that's long. Or you can choose a path that's pleasant and short. Or you can choose a path that's unpleasant and short. Or you could choose a path that's unpleasant and long.

But I actually think what I'm trying to say now goes beyond that. Because to me, if it doesn't include this inquiry into the dependent arising of my experience now, dependent on my way of looking—if that's not in my inquiry—the question would remain. I'm not saying it's impossible. The question would still remain for me: Does that path open up a full understanding and a really deep understanding of dependent arising and emptiness? That would be a question I would have.

I would say most definitely that insight and practice and the path can be mostly fun. I absolutely, definitely say that. Mostly delightful, mostly characterized by a sense of release and relief and some degree of liberation now as I'm practicing. I would say that.

And it's part of what I mean when I say: can we bring some intelligence to this? Can we bring some intelligence to these very basic questions, or intelligence to how am I practicing? It's really, really fundamental.

We talked very briefly about what's the definition of insight. Well, we can define insight in all kinds of ways—all kinds of people do. If you listen to enough Theravadan-based Dharma, there are lots of definitions of what insight is.

But one way, and the primary way I find helpful—actually I would like to keep a few ways open—but one of the ways I would particularly like to emphasize is: insight means ways of looking that reduce clinging, which means increased letting go. In the future, for the future, but also now, right now, and even primarily now. That's what insight is. It's adopting ways of looking that liberate and that primarily liberate right now.

That means all these insight ways of looking that we're talking about—we'll give examples of, and there's loads more we could talk about—they should feel liberating. They should feel like there's a relief, a release, a delight, a beauty, an opening, a peace, a joy that comes with them. If they're not, then they're not—and they can still be insightful—but they're not the kind of insight that I would like to emphasize, put it that way.

So if we define it that way, then actually the whole... and we kind of use that as, let's say, the primary understanding of what we're doing, then the whole path just—it does not need to be this whole contracted thing of sitting through pain and all these eruptions of difficulty. Do you understand?

So again, some of these themes carry over from these different jhanas. In a way there, with that insight way of looking that Buddha gave here: perceptions are not peaceful. I want what's peaceful. That is peaceful, the realm of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.

Other times the Buddha says—I couldn't find the whole quote, but it's very common, almost a stock formula—perceptions are dukkha. Perceptions are a hassle. He doesn't say quite that word, but perceptions are a boil. You know what a boil is? Like a big painful pimple, a big zit. A boil, a dart, an arrow, a cancer, a disease, and then he goes on. This is what perception is. It's extreme language.

Or even when we simply say perceptions are not peaceful, there's again the danger of tipping us toward a dualistic conception—not merely an abstract intellectual philosophy, but a dualistic sense, a dualistic lived preference that turns away from this world.

And the world is perception. What else is the world if not perception, phenomenologically speaking? Appearance, experience, objects, phenomena—the world is perception. So if I begin to say perceptions are a boil, a dart, a cancer, are dukkha, I'm essentially saying the world is. We might find ourselves again tipping into a dualistic preference, turning away from the world in favor of this subtler realm free of perception.

Even the way of looking that sees perceptions as fabricated, as empty—this too, if we don't fully understand what we're doing and what it means completely to say something is fabricated, carries the danger of dualism.

Fabrication is an interesting word. In English—I don't know about other languages—a fabrication is also a lie. We say something "is a fabrication." The word itself is fascinating because it connotes an untruth. I use it partly because it carries this connotation, though if we take it deeply enough, we go beyond that notion of untruth. We take it, but hold it provisionally and move even beyond it.

So it has this derogatory connotation—fabricated, fabricated, fabricated. When I adopt an insight way of looking and say "it's just a perception, it's fabricated," there's this slightly dismissive quality: it's a lie, it's not true. Do you understand? But I need to understand more deeply. I need to understand dependent arising and emptiness more deeply—not just intellectually, but through lived meditative exploration.

I really need to feel this, see this, sense this, watch it work in action and feel its effects. When I do this, this happens and it feels like this—the intimate experience of that. When I take this far enough, it goes beyond any notion of duality or hierarchy. The whole understanding, when explored this way, of what it means to say something is empty or fabricated—it's not dualistic. It's almost the opposite end from dualism.

We get a sense of being so profoundly intimate with the world of experience—though that doesn't even come close as language. The word "intimacy" doesn't come close. Something even more intimate than the word intimacy can possibly connote. We participate in the co-fabrication of the universe, of the cosmos, of the world, of things, of life. But even that doesn't quite capture it because we have certain notions of what "participation" means.

We participate in the magic of the dance and co-arising of subject and object in a way that's—again, there's no word for the depth. "Participate," "intimate"—they come sort of close, but it's even deeper.

Language is based on notions of subject and object, and when they start falling apart or collapsing into each other—not into some oneness, for they're neither one nor two, subject and object, nor nothing, nor many things. They're not zero, one, two, nor many. Language is based on "there's this and that," subject and object. So the whole language of intimacy, of participation—language cannot cope at this deep level.

But if we speak of this profound sense of participation in the magic of co-arising—of subject and object, of appearances and awareness, of self and world—the magic of that, the beauty of that, somehow we're completely implicated, interwoven with that in the most gorgeous and blessed ways. This is very far from dualism.

If one goes deep enough into this same investigation, into fabrication and dependent arising, I don't lose sight of that. If I investigate fabrication just a little bit, investigate dependent arising just a little bit, I'm not going to get this gorgeous full blossoming.

Again, similar themes emerge. It should be the case with this realm of neither perception nor non-perception. And it should certainly be the case that the more we understand and open to the emptiness of the world—if our conceptual framework doesn't get in the way—remember how much depends on that...

You can have all these wonderful experiences—or frightening experiences, amazing experiences, strange experiences. But if I'm not taking care with my conceptual framework, my big picture, my understanding of what I'm doing and what's going on, those experiences can deliver very little, or actually deliver what is really not helpful.

So even more than the experience itself, the understanding and the conceptual framework matter deeply. But it should be that experiences at this level of jhana and deep emptiness—where one sees the emptiness of the world—actually somehow open up even further, increase our love for the world, our love and compassion for the world. It should work like that.

The heart, opening in that way, sensing things in that way, touched in that way, becomes tender, open at a whole other level. It becomes wonderstruck, touched with what I would say is a sense of the profound blessing of the magic of appearances. The profound blessing of that—whatever the word is that's more than participation. It's the profound blessing at the mystery of things, the mystery of appearances.

I think let's stop there, actually. Let's sit together for a bit.

CHAPTER 222

The End of Time (The Cessation of Perception and Feeling)

Rob Burbea · 1h43

> In this profound dharma talk from the "Practising the Jhānas" retreat, Rob Burbea ventures beyond the realm of neither-perception-nor-non-perception to explore the unfabricated (asaṅkhata) - that which is unconditioned and beyond all fabrication. Drawing from multiple Pali Canon sources, he examines how deep insight (paññā) into dependent arising (paṭiccasamuppāda) can lead to the complete cessation of all perception, including the six sense consciousnesses and their objects.
> Burbea presents three approaches from the suttas: viewing jhānic states as fabricated and unsatisfactory, applying the four characteristics (dukkha, anicca, anattā, śūnya) to jhāna factors, and Sāriputta's method of discerning how phenomena arise and pass away. He explores the deepest level of dependent arising - the co-arising of subject, object, and time - and how understanding their fabricated nature leads to complete unfabrication. The talk addresses profound philosophical questions about epistemology and ontology while maintaining practical relevance, showing how this understanding of fabrication forms a coherent spectrum from basic mindfulness to the most sublime mystical openings. Burbea emphasizes that while this unfabricated realm represents extraordinary freedom, it may not be the complete story, pointing toward even deeper understandings through emptiness teachings.

So I think if I remember correctly, when the opportunity came up because of the building works—and this whole retreat was Kirsten's idea—I'm pretty sure I asked, can we have a month? For whatever reasons, they said this is what we've got: just over three weeks.

I feel a little bit like I'm rushing at the end and running out of time, not quite having the opportunity to say certain things I wish I could share. I certainly wish I'd had more opportunity to meet with you individually—interviews, Q&As, and such. But as I said at the beginning, in many ways the very fact of this retreat has been a miracle. The conditions came together to allow this. So we're doing the best we can, and that's good.

I'm partly wondering how you're doing with these later talks, when I'm not really speaking at the level of your learning edge playgrounds anymore. How are they landing for you? In our modern or postmodern society, it's completely okay if this kind of material—these deep mystical states and openings—doesn't interest you. I genuinely feel it's really okay if you're not drawn to this. That's a perfectly valid relationship to have with it. Of course, some people will be absolutely fascinated and allured by it.

Someone might think, "I don't feel interested now, but it's probably because of my psychological dukkha. Once I've worked through that, then I'll be interested." It may be the case. But I would tend to guess that if you're not interested anyway, you probably never will be. It's not that a certain amount of healing or psychological clearing of the path needs to happen first. These territories are passionately interesting to some people and not so much to others.

The technical information I've been sharing in these recent talks—because I'm not really speaking to your learning edge playgrounds for most of you at this point—this technical material is really for later. As far as I can tell, it's being recorded, so it should be accessible to you if and when these territories do become your learning edge playgrounds.

But the big picture material and the conceptual framework will also be very relevant then, and it's absolutely relevant now. This bigger picture understanding is not stuff you necessarily need to write down frantically. In fact, it makes more sense to take notes on the conceptual framework than on the specific techniques for moving from the seventh to eighth jhana. You're welcome to write whatever you want, but I emphasize understanding the big picture and conceptual framework—that's what's relevant now.

What's also relevant are the reflections we've woven throughout these teachings on desire, intention, and our relationship with them. What is it to keep my intention on something I desire? How am I with desire? What happens within me around desire? These inquiries will be relevant when you're working with the eighth jhana or whatever it might be, but they're relevant now. These elements—big picture understanding, conceptual framework, our relationship with desire and intention—are more fundamental than whether one can move from this jhana to that jhana.

Sometimes we human beings have a habit of listening with misplaced priorities, without a developed sense of what's actually most important. Understanding the big picture and conceptual framework is actually rare—very rare.

Yesterday we talked about the realm of neither-perception-nor-non-perception. Today I'd like to speak about what lies beyond that: the unfabricated, the deathless, the asaṅkhata dhamma. Saṅkhata relates to saṅkhāra and usually gets translated as "conditioned" or "fabricated." So asaṅkhata means the unfabricated, the unconditioned.

Now, all this business about being rushed—that's not the end of the story for me. Opening to and realizing the unconditioned, the unfabricated, wonderful and important as that is, is not the end of the story.

For some people it is the end of the story, or for some maps of the Dharma it is. But even that is becoming quite rare in the Dharma world. Even any kind of importance given to this—I don't even know the word for it—the realm of the unfabricated or the unfabricated, this complete fading. That's actually getting rarer and rarer in many Dharma worlds. I think in the insight meditation world, certainly.

But in my book, it's extremely important, extremely touching, beautiful, liberating—but it's kind of like half the story, if you like. And the other half has to do with emptiness, which goes even deeper than the unfabricated. Now, unfabricated is important for emptiness, but emptiness, in its full understanding, goes even deeper.

I have written about and explained all this elsewhere extensively, and I'm not going to do it again today. This business about going beyond the unfabricated is in Seeing That Frees, in the chapters leading up to and then after the sections about the unfabricated, in considerable practical detail as well as conceptual detail. I've written and spoken about it, as I said, extensively—about the unfabricated, about how that opens up in practice, about what it means to go beyond it and how that opens up in practice, about the relationship of both of those stages to emptiness and liberation, and about the whole philosophy or the philosophical questions that are implicit in all that about reality and how we know what's real, how we can trust what's real. So ontology and epistemology.

I've written and talked about it extensively in where you'd expect to find it—in The Seeing That Frees, a book about emptiness and talks about emptiness. But there's also much of that material and many different approaches and even further elaborations of that material in talks about soul-making, in soul-making Dharma talks, because it's actually woven into all that and has profound implications philosophically for all that territory.

I received a note asking whether there would be any space in tonight's talk to distinguish the terms dependent origination and emptiness, maybe also codependent arising and lack of inherent existence, as the questioner had thought of them as synonymous. The short answer is no. Unfortunately, there isn't quite enough time. I can say something very brief now, but it's all in that material. It's all there. I think it's really, really clear. I really took considerable trouble being really, really clear. Every word means something, implies something. Certainly in the writing, and obviously the verbal teaching is a bit looser.

This isn't a talk about emptiness primarily. It's a talk primarily about the unfabricated, but briefly in terms of this question: Part of the problem is that terms like dependent origination and emptiness get used in many different ways in the Dharma. Even in the insight meditation world, you'll find numerous different ways they are used. I would say the same term is understood at very different levels, which a person using it at a certain level might think represents the totality. That's the final level of understanding. But someone else might, or as I would put it, rank those as provisional levels of understanding. So it gets quite tricky trying to untangle all that.

But briefly, dependent origination—we could say, okay, this book is a dependent arising. What does that mean? Well, someone sat down and spent considerable time writing it. The paper had to come from trees. Someone had to cut down the trees and take them to a paper mill and make paper out of them. And then there was the ink, and the author had to practice and study extensively. All these factors—the book arose dependently on all those conditions. That's all really, really important and lovely and can give a beautiful sense of interconnectedness with everything, but it won't do that much for liberation.

The primary emphasis I place on understanding dependent origination is dependent on the mind, dependent on the way of looking. We've seen this when we talked about working with pain on this retreat. Here's the pain. It is a pain. It seems to—I'll weave in the other word—it seems to inherently exist. It just exists. It is what it is. It's a pain and it hurts. When I find I play with perception, I look at it in a different way, I find that, oh, it's become a pleasure. It's become bliss. It does not exist inherently as pain. It doesn't exist inherently from its own side, as the Tibetans say. It's dependent. It dependently arises.

It dependently originates. Primarily, the most important thing for liberation—and I would emphasize this—it dependently originates on the way of looking in the moment. Do you understand?

So we could say much, much more about these terms. Codependent arising is, let's say for now, just the same thing, and I'll weave it into the talk later. Lack of inherent existence is at one level synonymous with emptiness or dependent arising.

In other words, to say that this pain lacks inherent existence is—as many of you have seen for yourselves and felt for yourselves in meditation already—to say that this pain lacks inherent existence is just the same thing as saying: without my looking at it in my normal habitual reactive ways, it does not arise and exist for me as pain. It lacks inherent existence. It lacks an independent existence. And that's just the same thing as saying it's empty. And it's just the same thing as saying it arises dependently, dependent on the way of looking.

So that's a very brief answer. Is that okay?

Now, so that you don't get quite confused—or rather more confused than you may already be—you should probably know that this way I'm about to talk today, and the way that I've written about and talked about other times, this way of talking about the unfabricated and this way of talking about the fabricated and this whole idea of insight ways of looking—being ways of looking, ways of relating in the moment that reduce clinging and through reducing clinging fabricate less, and the implication from that that a thing is therefore empty to a certain extent and a dependent arising, with the implications about its reality—all of that together is rare in the Dharma world.

The way I'm talking about unfabricated, fabricated, insight ways of looking, clinging, unfabricating, emptiness, dependent origination and the implications for reality—all of that together—it's not like you can just expect it to mesh neatly or nicely with other things that you will read and hear. I'm not saying it's better or worse, and you're welcome to prefer whatever you prefer or makes more sense. I'm just saying that if you're approaching something else with the idea that they must be saying the same thing, you're liable to just get very confused. It's completely up to you to gravitate to what you gravitate to, explore what you feel drawn to explore. But if you know that from the start, then you won't be trying to mesh things together which actually don't really mesh that well.

So it's rare in the Dharma, this way of talking about these things and this way of explaining things. And it's very rare, the whole conceptual framework that ties it all together—certainly with the soul making, but even all that tied together. And as I said, the understanding is very rare. So it's very rare for people to really understand this, yet.

There's a passage in the Pali Canon where the Buddha and Ananda are sort of hanging out. Ananda, remember, was the Buddha's attendant, so he probably heard—let's estimate—maybe ninety percent of the Buddha's teachings. Talks to monks, talks to nuns, talks to lay people, talks to kings and queens, talks to individual wandering ascetics, question and answer sessions, one-to-one interviews. Over many years he was just there all the time, pretty much all the time. And he wasn't thick. After the Buddha died, he became an arahant, so he wasn't someone incapable.

They're hanging out one day and the Buddha says something about dependent arising, and Ananda says, "It's so clear. It's so clear to me. It's wonderful, this dependent arising. It's just as clear as clear could be." And the Buddha turns to him and says, "Don't say that, Ananda. Don't say that. We're talking about something really profound here. Profound as a teaching, profound in its manifestation."

Just to contextualize this a little bit: this is an interesting thing as a teacher, because I feel I'm talking to someone and they're like, "Oh, I don't understand. I don't understand." And then self-judgment: "I'm so thick, I'm lost, I'm confused," and all this stuff. And actually they do understand. They do understand very well the beginnings of this thread.

Remember I was talking about this whole thing—emptiness, fabrication, dependent arising—it's just a thread. It's the same understanding I'm taking from the most basic level that my mother could understand, who has not meditated for ten seconds in her whole life and is not interested in anything. She can understand when she gets into papañca compared to afterwards: that was fabricated, that was less fabricated. There was something unreal there and there was something—she would just say—real here. It's the same thing. Papañca compared to normal consciousness. And you just keep following that thread.

And the person says, "I don't understand. I don't understand." Actually, you do understand.

You're on the right thread, and you need to know that you understand and keep going. So there are some people like that who need encouragement: "Actually, you do understand. Just keep following. Same inquiry. Just keep going. Don't freak out."

Other people are a bit more like, "Yes, yes, yes, I understand completely. I get it. It's wonderful." And you don't understand.

So the question is, which one are you? And are you able to know which one you are?

Again, put this in a little context. I would say one doesn't understand dependent arising and emptiness and all this business unless one understands that what dependently arises does not arise. And one understands that that is the case for many reasons. What dependently arises does not arise. What is unfabricated is not unfabricated. Unless one understands that, one hasn't really understood all this business.

What is unfabricated is not unfabricated. Unless one has also understood that when we talk about this fabrication business and ways of looking, we're not talking about "ah yes, it's because the brain processes things like this, or these are the neural circuits," et cetera, because we're not talking about something based in materialism or physicalism. Brains, neurons, neurotransmitter molecules and atoms—they are empty too.

Neither are we talking about the kind of complement in philosophy from materialism: mentalism. Everything is projected by the mind. The mind is somehow real and everything is projected by the mind. So unless one understands all that, one doesn't really fully yet understand this dependent arising business.

Unless one understands why there is no trauma. There is no trauma. But we can respect and care for trauma and heal it. But there is no trauma.

Unless one understands why there are no ways of looking, but at the same time, it's impossible to exist even for a moment without a way of looking, but there are no ways of looking.

Unless one understands that things are not impermanent, but nor are they permanent. And one understands that there are no moments. There are no moments of time. One hasn't understood all this yet.

Unless one understands that there are many things and at the same time there are no things. And in a way there's one thing only, or there are many kinds of versions of one thing only. Or there are infinite things. All these are true. Many, none, one, infinite—and none of them are true.

Unless one understands that there is no suffering and there is no liberation. And unless one understands that emptiness too is emptiness. One hasn't fully yet understood dependent arising.

So if you're one of those people who think that you have... I could go on, we could go on adding to this list, but I need to... we're talking about something very profound and I'm not going to be able to explain it all today. Everything there, if you really read and listen and practice, obviously, it should actually all completely make sense in the heart through practice.

So this talk—I'm not going to go into the whole emptiness thing. We don't have time. In a way, it's only half of what I said. I'm just going to talk about the unfabricated a little bit. And it's only really a little of what's really a huge area and profound area of understanding and practice. I'm really going to talk about the jhānas and in relationship to the unfabricated.

And one more thing, you know, we're not... some of you are a bit new to this fabrication and fading thing.

So we should be clear: one isn't going to understand this business about fading and dependent arising and emptiness without practicing what I call insight ways of looking. One is not going to understand that without really practicing those insight ways of looking extensively and getting into them and really grappling with that and letting the beauty of it open up.

So jhānas are really not the best way to understand fading and emptiness. However, emptiness and fading is part of the best way to understand the jhānas. That's not quite a contradiction in what I said. Jhānas are not the best way to understand fading and emptiness, but fading and emptiness are part of the best way to understand the jhānas, along with what we talked about—development of sensitivity and attunement and deep resource.

Partly the reason I've been going on about emptiness and all that and ways of looking is because it forms the best and most coherent way of understanding the jhānas and placing them coherently in a much bigger picture of the Dharma—a picture which makes sense of a lot of possibilities, including soul-making Dharma, but even without soul-making Dharma.

Whether people use the word or not, I would say that certainly most insight meditation teachers use the idea of fabrication. They may use that word or not use that word. So when people talk about papañca, whether they use the word fabrication or not, they're suggesting that it's what we call a fabrication in both senses. It's something that the mind has just concocted—that's another word. It's a concoction. It's a construction. And with this double meaning that we have in some languages, it's also a lie.

That contrasts with what usually implicitly is something unfabricated, something real or reality, something true or truth. Even if a person isn't using that concept, it's there woven into most insight meditation teachings. Fabrication is a construction, a concoction by the mind—and what is not real, it's a lie in some ways. So unfabricating the fabricated, or not fabricating, is just part of practice. It's part of what is conveyed in any dharma teaching, let alone just insight meditation teaching.

More than that, implicitly or explicitly, there's an ontology woven in. Ontology means a view or philosophy or belief about what is real. So when people talk about papañca, even if they don't use the language "real" or "fabricated," the way they talk and the jokes and the humor of it—it's clear like, "Wasn't that funny because it was completely not real, right?" So even if a person doesn't pull all this out, there are fabricated and unfabricated as notions that are implicit.

There's an implicit ontology, implicit view of what's real, and there's an implicit ontological hierarchy. Sometimes it's drawn out, it's made explicit. More often it's implicit—it's not actually talked about in this way, but sometimes it is. In other words, clearly the real is better than the unreal, is preferable, right? That's woven into it as well. And wrapped up in all that, there's a value judgment involved. It's better. This is a waste of time. This is ridiculous. This is worthless. This is even harmful.

Most of the time, that's just spun into the rhetoric, into the teaching rhetoric, sometimes verbally and sometimes not verbally. And it's not just in insight meditation. It can also be in pop versions of Zen. If you get a bit conceptual, you just get hit on the nose with a stick or whatever. And it's conveying something about what's real or not real, because reality is what's not bound up with concept. Very rarely is there actually a deep probing of the philosophical questions and psychological questions here. It's usually conveyed more non-verbally, non-philosophically.

So whatever kind of dharma we're talking about, not just insight meditation, that's an observation.

What is this unfabricated that people may be suggesting or pointing to or kind of is there implicitly without being named? And what is the fabricated? Again, whether they use those words or not.

Unfabricated maybe—we've touched on this—it's basically what is not papañca, as I just said. So when there's the absence of papañca, we are not fabricating. Or mindfulness reveals what is not fabricated. Mindfulness—less story, less view, less reaction, less conceptual involvement—and that mindfulness or bare attention reveals the unfabricated, even if one doesn't use that language.

It cuts fabrication. Does this make sense?

Or you may have heard someone say, "That's not an emotion. It's just some sensations. Really, it's just some sensations in the chest." And again, there's the "really," the ontological question, the hierarchizing, all that. Or "all there really is—not really self and story—all there really is, is the process of the five aggregates in time, including those sensations arising and passing in the chest area." Or this vast primordial impersonal awareness is regarded as what's real, and the whole concepts or stories of self is regarded as not real.

So whatever language one uses, there is this something that's fabricated, something that's not fabricated, some ontological distinction and hierarchy there, and value judgments woven in with all that.

When I use the word unfabricated, I don't mean what is revealed by bare attention. I certainly don't mean what is there, visible to us, sensible to us when there is no thought. I certainly don't mean what's sensible to us, perceivable to us when we're calm, without papañca, without making a fuss in the world.

Rather, I would say it's what appears or what opens when there is no intention whatsoever and no conception whatsoever. I could also say no perception whatsoever. But I have to explain those words, because I don't mean by conception "thought." When I say non-conceptual, I mean much, much more than non-thinking. Concept to me is a much deeper and subtler thing, much more deeply woven into consciousness. And I'll come back to that hopefully in this talk.

And when I say no intention, I certainly don't mean—or I mean much more than—"I'm just sitting here being. I'm just being right now." Or "I'm not doing," or "I'm not making any effort," or "I have no plans," or anything like that. I mean something much, much more subtle than that. Much more deeply intricated, if that's even a word, into consciousness and how consciousness works. I'll come back to that later.

But let's go back to what I said before. There is, in whatever dharma we're teaching, woven into this some kind of idea of the fabricated and the unfabricated, with all these ontological hierarchies and judgments. The question is: where are we limiting the process of unfabricating?

For all these dharmas, there is a practice that involves unfabricating. Do you understand? And the question is: where are we limiting that? Where are we limiting this practice of unfabricating? Where are we drawing the line and saying, "Oh, that's it now. I'm done with fabrication," or "That was a moment of unfabricating"? Where are we limiting it? And why are we limiting it there or here or wherever we are? Where and why?

And why not leave it as an open question?

These are real questions. In other words, someone needs to come up with a really good answer for these questions, I would say. So I'm meaning something quite different by the Unfabricated. And we'll return to those questions at the end. I think they're very, very important.

But there are lots of texts where the Buddha describes Unfabricated, at least to my reading of them, that sound like what I'm talking about. There are texts where the Buddha's describing a state where all perception has ceased. So not even what we were talking about yesterday—the neither perception nor non-perception. All perception of a subject, all perception of any kind of object, not even nothingness, not even a state of neither perception nor non-perception, all sense of time, all space, not even a present moment—all of that not there.

There are many texts in the Pali Canon. Something's interesting. A while ago, I don't know whether it's still the case, some people would say, "There's only one place in the Pali Canon where the Buddha talks about such a thing." It's not true. There are many, many places, and they're all different. It's not the same little passage getting reprinted. It's lots of different texts pointing to the same experience.

I should find one.

Let us exercise a little patience and explore this further.

That sphere should be understood, should be known. That dimension, that ayatana should be known, that realm should be known where the eye ceases and perceptions of forms fade away. There is no sight, no visual object. That sphere should be known where the ear ceases and the perception of sounds fades away. That sphere should be understood, should be known where the nose and smells, the tongue and taste, the body and perception of tactile objects fade away. That sphere should be understood where the mind ceases and perception of mental phenomena fades away. And by mental phenomena it doesn't just mean thought—it means any mental perception. So perception of a jhana, perception of the neither perception nor non-perception, perception of nothingness, any perception at all.

We're talking about something completely beyond perception of matter, completely beyond any kind of measurement, completely beyond any kind of perception, any subject, any object, any sense of time—even a present moment—no space, no nothing.

As I mentioned, there are people who claim there's only one passage about this in the Pali Canon, but actually in Seeing That Frees, if you're interested, there are many, many passages that in different ways describe such an opening and such a realm—place, whatever we want to call that. Some people really don't like this teaching. Some people really oppose such a teaching. That's always quite interesting to me.

Some people use some of those passages or use words like "the unfabricated," but if you listen to what's being said or if you follow the teachings, they're actually using "unfabricated" as synonymous with awareness—often vastness of awareness—and claiming that is the unfabricated, that is the ultimate, or that's the nature of mind or whatever. Occasionally, very occasionally—usually people who haven't been practicing that long, certainly not teachers; I've never heard a teacher say this—but occasionally someone construes the unfabricated as just things as they are, as seen or as sensed, as revealed with bare attention or mindfulness.

So sometimes people use either parts of these quotes or the word "unfabricated," but in quite different ways. Very briefly, if yesterday's language stretched language to the limit, here it's really gone beyond the pale.

The Buddha sometimes talks in positive language here. "There is," as I said—something, that passage we just read: "this should be known, that dimension should be known." It's as if it's a something that should be known.

And there's another passage where he says: "Here, with regard to earth, the perception of earth has disappeared. With regard to liquid, the perception of liquid has disappeared. With regard to fire, the perception of fire has disappeared. With regard to wind, the perception of wind has disappeared." In other words, with regard to materiality—that was the physics of their day—with regard to materiality, the perception of materiality has disappeared. "With regard to the realm of infinite space, the perception of the realm of infinite space has disappeared. With regard to the sphere of infinite consciousness, the perception of the sphere of infinite consciousness has disappeared. With regard to the sphere of nothingness, the perception of the sphere of nothingness has disappeared. With regard to the sphere of neither perception nor non-perception, the perception of the sphere of neither perception nor non-perception has disappeared. With regard to this world, the perception of this world has disappeared. With regard to the next world, the perception of the next world has disappeared. Whatever is seen, heard, sensed, cognized, attained, sought after or explored by the mind—the perception of that has disappeared."

"Absorbed in this way, samadhi-fied in this way, one is absorbed dependent neither on earth, liquid, fire, wind; dependent neither on perception of materiality, nor on the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothingness, the sphere of neither perception nor non-perception, this world, the next world, nor on what is seen, heard, sensed, cognized, attained, sought after, or explored by the mind—and yet one is absorbed. And to this one absorbed in this way, all the gods pay homage even from afar. 'Homage to you,' they say, 'you of whom we don't even know what it is that you are absorbed dependent on.'"

So it's something so beyond—and these gods are gods with very, very refined, subtle perception. It's gone even beyond that.

The point I want to make is that the Buddha's talking about it in sort of positive language. It's a something that we can perceive in a way. Other times he talks about it as if it's an object that the mind can know—the mind knows this object, as if in that language. Other times he talks about it as if it's a subject, as if it's consciousness released. There was that analogy I talked about yesterday of the sunlight not landing anywhere—it's completely released.

In those terms, talking about it in subjective terms, he talks about what remains with the cessation of the six sense consciousnesses: smell, sight, taste, touch, hearing, smelling—the five senses and mental consciousness. When that all stops, the cessation of the sixth sense consciousness and their respective objects of knowledge—smells, sights, tastes, et cetera, thoughts, or anything perceivable in the mind—what remains is consciousness without attribute, without end, luminous all around.

"Here water, earth, fire and air, materiality, have no footing. Here long and short, subtle and gross, pleasant and unpleasant"—all kinds of discrimination or measurement or relativisms. "And nama-rupa"—nama-rupa is perception, attention, contact, feeling, body, awareness—"all are destroyed with the cessation of consciousness"—i.e., those six sense consciousnesses. "Here each of these is destroyed."

The first phrase there, "consciousness without attribute," translates from the Pali as vijnanam anidasanam. A more precise rendering, I believe, recognizes that nidasa means to point to something or to show something, making this "consciousness that does not point to anything." Again, consciousness that does not land, as we explored yesterday. This describes awareness completely released from any kind of object.

Here the Buddha speaks of this unfabricated reality in subjective terms, as a kind of awareness beyond any sense of awareness we might ordinarily recognize. Even the sixth sense sphere—awareness aware of itself—does not apply here. This transcends awareness aware of itself, awareness aware of nothingness, and even the sphere of neither perception nor non-perception. It has gone completely beyond, totally released.

Sometimes the Buddha describes this as a kind of object, sometimes as a kind of subject, but most often he speaks in negative terms—what the Western theological traditions call apophatic language, or the via negativa. You cannot say this, you cannot say that. No attribute you ascribe to it will capture its truth. The Buddha declares that where all phenomena are removed, where there is complete fading of all phenomena, all ways of speaking are removed as well. All possibility of discourse about it vanishes.

More often than not, the Buddha points to this mystery through negative language: the cessation of this, the fading of that, the unfabricating of this. The entire phenomenon is indicated apophatically, negatively—this mystery that lies totally beyond what the mind can grasp or understand through conceptual means.

This experience, this opening, this realization remains possible for us as meditators. I am absolutely not suggesting it is easy, but it is entirely achievable. Yet we are still left with fascinating philosophical questions.

One teacher remarked—I heard this secondhand—"You cannot go from meditative experiences to epistemology and ontology." In other words, just because you have had a meditative experience does not mean that what you experienced in meditation is real or trustworthy in any meaningful way. Simply because you enjoyed a pleasant meditation proves nothing about anything. You have merely had a nice experience. So what?

This raises a crucial question: Just because I have had a meditation experience, what does it prove about the reality of what opened to me? How can I be certain this points to anything genuine that I can trust epistemologically—that I can rely upon as knowledge pointing to something ontologically real?

I would respond: Fair enough. That is true. I cannot one hundred percent guarantee an epistemology based on meditative experience. No one can. What argument could possibly be constructed philosophically to do so?

But my question in return would be: Where does your epistemology come from? How will you prove your epistemology? What do you believe constitutes valid knowledge about reality? That is what epistemology means—it connects with ontology, the question of what is real.

Will you claim that this world of matter everyone agrees upon is real? You still must prove that. Simply pick up a few books on twentieth-century physics and begin asking, "What do you mean by matter?" The whole assumption that matter is something real begins to grow extraordinarily shaky.

Most people understand matter as Descartes and Newton conceived it following the scientific revolution. But consider the quantum revolution. Niels Bohr, one of the fathers of quantum physics, declared: "Everything we call real, everything we think of as real is made from things we cannot call real." This appears to be what quantum physics has revealed.

So when someone insists you cannot move from meditation experience to epistemology and ontology—to claims about reality—I simply ask: What is your epistemology? If they respond with belief in the reality of matter, I ask: What do you mean by matter?

And have you really investigated whether that's real or not in the way that you think it is? Or is your epistemology, your idea of what is real and what's trustworthy as knowledge, simply based on socially agreed-upon views? Something like: "Well, it seems most people in my society agree on this view, therefore it must be right. Because our society is very smart and we make all the right choices, right?" You haven't read the news recently, have you?

Or perhaps your epistemology is just the most common view that you choose as your idea of what most people believe. If we're talking about Descartes again—well, that was a long time ago, and philosophy has moved on. Western philosophy has developed quite sophisticated, profound critiques of Descartes and this idea that there's mind and there's matter, or whatever.

So I wouldn't disagree with this person who says you can't just automatically, unquestionably jump from a wonderful meditation experience that you've really enjoyed to claims of ontology and epistemology. But I would just turn it around and say: "Okay, well, where is yours coming from? What are we going to do?"

Some people say all that talk about epistemology and ontology—which I've talked a lot about in recent years—"we don't do that anymore." That's quite a popular view in modern Western philosophy as well: this post-metaphysical stance, this "we don't do metaphysics" kind of thing.

Actually, it's impossible. It's impossible to live in the world and be in the world without some view, some belief about what is real and what is not real, and what constitutes valid knowledge or valid judgment about that. It's impossible to be a person and function in the world and make choices—even walk from here to teatime or go to the toilet—without some ontological, epistemological view operating. This has nothing to do with formal philosophy or whatever.

So there's always some epistemology, some epistemological position or view operating. It's unavoidable. And similarly with ontology, with claims about reality. This is really, really interesting.

So it's a very complicated area. And we cannot, I think—if you really, really care about all this—you cannot get away from such questions. When someone says to you, "Well, you can't just glibly jump from your meditation experience to claims about reality, or assume this thing that you've opened to is real," they're in the same boat regarding whatever they believe. They're just making their own glib jump, and it's easier for them because they're not questioning it, or not even realizing what they're assuming, or it simply hasn't been brought into question.

But there are profound, difficult questions here about epistemology and ontology. What is the reality status of this unfabricated that we might open to in meditation? What is the reality status of all this? I'm mentioning this—I'm not going to dwell on it now, as I've talked about it extensively elsewhere.

The meditative question becomes: How does this most wonderful of wonderful openings open? How?

As meditators, the Buddha says it's a fruit of jñāna—which means it's a fruit of deep insight. In other words, it comes about only through deep insight. We're not just talking about the state of samādhi or concentration.

You can get to the eighth jhāna just by concentrating. I start with my nostrils, if I'm using that method—I just concentrate, concentrate, concentrate. The first jhāna opens, I let that mature, let the mango ripen. The second jhāna, third, fourth, fifth, and all the way to the eighth. I haven't done any insight at all. I could have—as we said, the more I get into it, there are more insight ways of looking that open up these jhānas. But for this one, the unfabricated, I cannot get there without insight. It's not just a natural state of concentration that will open. It's not just a samādhi that will naturally ripen.

Again, this is all explained in Seeing That Frees—what kinds of insights and how we go about that. I'm going to give a very brief tour of a few possibilities, taking them from the Buddha instead of what I've said in Seeing That Frees.

Here he is talking—actually it's Ānanda. The first example is from Ānanda. He says: "There is the case where a monk enters and remains in the first jhāna. He notices that this first jhāna is fabricated and willed. It's fabricated and willed. It has intention in it. He discerns: whatever is fabricated and willed is inconstant and subject to cessation. Staying right there, he reaches the ending of the effluents." The ending of the effluents is just another term for complete awakening, complete enlightenment—the ending of greed, hatred, and delusion.

Looking at the Buddhist teaching on the three kinds of suffering, we see that "anicca dukkha" refers to suffering that arises from impermanence. Even experiences of happiness, joy, and love are considered dukkha because they cannot satisfy us permanently. The third category is "sankata dukkha" - suffering that arises from fabrication itself.

This points to something deeper than mere impermanence: it recognizes that everything we experience lacks inherent existence and is, from a certain perspective, inherently unsatisfactory.

This understanding forms the foundation for the first method: taking a jhanic state - up to the realm of nothingness - or a stable brahmaviharic state like loving-kindness, and repeatedly viewing it as fabricated and therefore unsatisfactory. Through this sustained contemplation, clinging diminishes, and with less clinging comes less fabrication. Ananda's instruction suggests that developing this practice deeply can lead to profound realization - potentially all the way to complete awakening.

The second example presents a different approach. The Buddha declares, "I tell you, the ending of the effluent depends on the first jhana." Here, total awakening is said to depend upon this foundational meditative state.

The method is described precisely: A monk enters and remains in the first jhana, experiencing the joy and happiness born of withdrawal from hindrances, accompanied by initial and sustained thought. Within this stable state, the practitioner regards the phenomena connected with the five aggregates - form, feeling, perceptions, fabrications, and consciousness - through the lens of insight.

The practitioner sees these jhanic elements as "inconstant, stressful, a disease, a cancer, an arrow, painful, an affliction, alien, a disintegration, a void, not-self." This extensive list of contemplative adjectives might seem overwhelming, but these various ways of seeing can actually be organized into four fundamental categories of insight.

The practice involves examining the very factors that constitute the first jhana - the five jhanic factors themselves - while remaining within that concentrated state. This represents a sophisticated integration of samatha and vipassana, using the stability of absorption as the foundation for penetrating wisdom.

The many descriptive terms in the text—inconstant, stressful, disease, cancer, arrow, and so forth—can actually be organized into four distinct categories.

We can group them into the baskets of the three characteristics and one of emptiness or voidness. The three characteristics are dukkha, which means unsatisfactory. Terms like disease, cancer, arrow, painful, affliction, and stressful are all similar words expressing that these phenomena are dukkha—fundamentally unsatisfactory. This represents the first characteristic.

The second basket contains the second characteristic: impermanence. Here we find words like inconstant and disintegration—expressions of the second characteristic as an insight way of looking. I'm examining the jhana factors right here within the jhana itself. This requires sufficient sensitivity, malleability, and attunement of mind to know the jhana intimately, then observe the individual jhana factors through these insight perspectives.

The third basket encompasses the third characteristic—not-self. When the text mentions "not self" and "alien," it points to anatta. It's not me, not mine. The piti is not me and mine. The sukha is not me, not mine. The ekaggata, the concentration—all of it is not me, not mine. We observe this through the insight lens of anatta, recognizing this truth again and again.

The fourth basket is "a void"—two separate words. This suggests these phenomena are not merely not-me, not-mine, not just anatta, but they lack phenomenal selfhood entirely. They are empty of inherent existence. The piti doesn't exist inherently. The ekaggata, whatever it may be, is void—empty of inherent existence. "Void" and "empty" are interchangeable terms here.

This is fascinating because the Pali word is sunya. Sometimes people tell me that the Buddha only discusses emptiness in two suttas with "emptiness" in their titles within the Pali Canon. Actually, there are numerous teachings about emptiness of phenomenal self throughout the Pali Canon—not just the anatta teaching about emptiness of personal self, but various ways the Buddha employs the word "empty," including different types of teachings about emptiness of phenomenal self. Here's one example: they are a void, an emptiness.

So we have four ways of looking: the three characteristics—unsatisfactory (dukkha), impermanent (anicca), not-me, not-mine (anatta)—and void or empty (sunya in Pali).

The jhanas provide excellent foundations for this practice because they offer stable objects. The etymology of jhana can be traced to a candle that burns steadily. Due to this steadiness—remember our two S's in the middle of samadhi—jhanas form ideal objects for practicing these insight ways of looking.

Additionally, because the citta in jhana is clear, subtle, and malleable, these states represent optimum conditions. As they say: location, location, location. They're truly excellent spaces and places for this practice.

However, everything we're discussing comes after you've thoroughly mastered and become familiar with jhana. Only then do you begin practicing these insight ways of looking. All of this represents a lengthy process of practice development, but it's incredibly beautiful, freeing, and gratifying. It simply takes time to develop all of this.

Earlier in the retreat we explored why jhana provides such an ideal foundation for this practice. Yes, we have a stable object and a clear, subtle citta, but already in the jhanic state there is less fabricating. We've almost defined the entire jhanic spectrum in this way. This means the self is less fabricated at that point.

And what do selves do? They go "me, mine, me, mine, me, mine, me, mine." They appropriate, right? So the habit of "me-mining" is already diminished. This makes it easier than usual in that space to simply see things as not me, not mine. The anatta practice becomes more accessible.

It's easier to let go because of the well-being, especially if you're confident that you can return to this jhana. It's not "Oh my god, I had this amazing experience once and I must cling to it." Once you've entered and exited repeatedly, you don't get attached to jhanas anymore.

I used to say it's like in this country - thank goodness for us - I'm not going to get super attached to water. I mean, there's water here, though I don't know how old that bottle is. But if I want water, I know I can go to the tap. It's simply there. When I don't know there's a tap I can turn on and off, then my relationship with water becomes very attached and difficult - understandably so.

But once we can move in and out of jhanas, we can actually let go quite freely within them because it's a well-being we become less attached to, more familiar with. We trust it can come and go, making it easier to release there. And as I mentioned, impermanence becomes obvious. These are additional reasons why jhanas are prime spaces for this work.

Here the Buddha is speaking, telling us that the ending of the effluents depends on the first jhana, then continuing through all the other jhanas up to the realm of nothingness. I would say it probably becomes easier with the third jhana simply because there's much more stillness there. What we're discussing at this level requires considerable stillness, spaciousness, and subtlety. If there's too much piti bouncing off the walls and creating turbulence, this kind of work can become more difficult. Theoretically, I think it's possible from the first jhana, but it's probably much easier from the third jhana onwards - though not past the realm of nothingness.

In neither-perception-nor-non-perception, you need to actually perceive things. You need to perceive what the jhana factors are, to make things clear. But in neither-perception-nor-non-perception, that's partly what defines the state - it's almost like not quite perceiving anything. Again, I've mentioned that only a Buddha can do this work in the realm of neither-perception-nor-non-perception, not an Arahant, not anyone else.

The Buddha goes through the same process with all the jhanas. I've missed a section here - he regards whatever phenomena are connected with the aggregates there. I made an error earlier - this passage concerns the aggregates, not the jhana factors. So the five aggregates present in the jhanic state: body, feelings, perceptions, mental formations or fabrications, and consciousness.

He regards them through one of these four ways: dukkha, anicca, anatta, or sunya - suffering, impermanence, not-self, or emptiness. Having done this, he turns his mind away from those phenomena because there's a letting go. Having done so, he inclines his mind toward the property of deathlessness, the amata - what is deathless, the unfabricated.

"This is peace, this is exquisite - the resolution of all fabrication, the ending of all fabrication, the relinquishment of all the paraphernalia of being, the ending of craving, dispassion, cessation, unbinding, nibbana."

And again, it says staying right there - in other words, remaining right in that space - one reaches total liberation. But if there's some attachment to their insight, which is after all quite an extraordinary level of insight, if they're somewhat attached to it, then they reach only as far as the non-returner stage. According to this teaching, they're reborn only in the pure abodes, the highest heavenly realms. In those realms, they will come to full awakening, there to be totally unbound, never again to return from that world.

So this covers the first jhana through the realm of nothingness. Then the Buddha states: "Thus, as far as the perception-attainments go, that is as far as gnosis-penetration goes." This confirms what I said before - you can only engage this kind of insight practice up to the realm of nothingness, because beyond that, you're not really perceiving anything clearly enough to work with the aggregates.

Now, the third passage. Are you comfortable with this level of detail? Here the Buddha speaks about Sariputta, one of his chief disciples, saying: "Monks, Sariputta is pandita" - which can be translated as wise or skilled. The translator here renders it as "of great discernment."

It's actually maha-panyo, of great—you could say wisdom, you could say discernment, you could say insight. You could also say, and what I'd like to put the emphasis on because that's what the passage is talking about, is that Sariputta has great skill in insight ways of looking. That's exactly what the passage is addressing.

Sariputta is wise and skilled of great insight, of deep insight, of wide insight, of joyous, rapid, quick, penetrating insight. Note the joyous. Yes, joyous. This insight way of looking approach, as I said yesterday, is a joyous way of practicing insight. There's no way it can't be. I mean, maybe a little bit here and there, but basically because you're looking, because you're relating in a way that unbinds right then, you feel that taste, you feel it in your body, in the consciousness—some degree of unbinding, some degree of release from suffering, and therefore it is joyous.

So why is he all that? Because there is the case where Sariputta enters and remains in the first jhana. Whatever qualities there are in the first jhana—and then he lists again the jhana factors, the five jhana factors which we've had. And then he lists things like contact, feeling, perception, intention, consciousness, desire, persistence, mindfulness, equanimity, attention. The list could go on a little bit.

He ferrets them out one by one. Known to him, they arise. Known to him, they remain. Known to him, they subside. He discerns. So this is how these qualities, not having been, come into play, come into being. Evam, this is how. Such is the way they do.

Remember we had this brief discussion—I think Andrew asked about the Satipatthana Sutta and how it can so easily be read and heard and translated as a teaching on impermanence, missing this how. So this is how these qualities, not having been, come into being. And how, having been, they vanish.

He remains unattracted and unrepelled with regard to these qualities. Independent, detached, released with an awareness rid of barriers. He understands there is a further escape, there's a further nissaranam, and pursuing it he confirms that there is. And that further escape is the second jhana. And then he goes through the same thing all the way up to the realm of nothingness.

Here's a jhana—what makes up this jhana? Sometimes when we're practicing jhana, we for the most part want to not differentiate, not deconstruct it. We want to see it as one homogeneous yumminess and just throw ourselves into that vat of homogeneous chocolate yumminess. Yes, that's how we want to relate to it. I don't want to be deconstructing it, seeing its gaps and impermanence. I don't want to be deconstructing in terms of its constituent elements unless I'm doing that so I can work on one of them—like my wattle and daub building has got a bit of a hole in it and I need to sort of focus on that bit and kind of push it back or bring something in. I'm not deconstructing it if I've got a samadhi intention, unless it's for the sake of shoring it up for the samadhi.

But now we're in an insight way of looking. We are really interested in the discerning, in seeing what's going on here, what are the elements here, and bringing into play an insight way of looking which changes my relationship with those elements very, very powerfully, very potently.

All this is extremely subtle, but it's absolutely doable with practice. So I put so much emphasis on this sensitivity, attunement, et cetera, taken to extraordinary levels, but absolutely possible. And if I can do that, then the whole thing begins to unfabricate, unfabricate.

In this example, he's going stage by stage through the jhanas. I think I said the other day, what might happen is a bit like an elevator shaft. Sometimes the elevator will just go, and you're just at a floor or in the area of a certain floor. Somehow, somewhere I'm around the seventh jhana, whatever it is. Sometimes it goes all the way. But here, there's a kind of stage by stage. He's stopping at every floor.

This word "void"—we've already explained that. There's many ways of understanding emptiness, as we said in response to the question on the note earlier. So we can understand if I'm looking at a jhana factor or something like attention or even the intention to pay attention or something like vedana or something like consciousness—there's many ways to understand its voidness, its emptiness.

In other words, there's many possible subtexts if I'm using that way of looking: empty, empty. One of them though could be fabricated, which one might have already understood. I see that when I practice letting go, this fades. Therefore it's fabricated, therefore it's empty of inherent existence.

But the key thing here, as we said, is the how—how something arises, how these elements arise, and not just the jhana itself, but the actual elements. How is it that consciousness arises? How is it that consciousness fades? How is it that a sense of contact or a perception—which remember means experience or appearance or phenomenon—how is it that it arises and how does it fade?

This is the deepest level of dependent arising. Dependent arising is a teaching you can take on many different levels.

At a certain level, it begins to deconstruct, which is why I could say at the beginning: what dependently arises does not actually arise. At the deepest level of understanding dependent arising, what dependently arises does not arise. But there's a whole range of levels.

At the deepest level where it still just about makes sense to talk about arising—let me see if I can explain this very briefly. Again, it's explored in Seeing That Frees in quite careful detail. We're speaking of a very deep meditative state. We don't even need to put a jhāna name on it—just somewhere in that territory where there's a lot of fading.

No sense of my story, no sense of my personality and all my neuroses and my whole complex me. There's just the simplest possible self. What might be the simplest possible self? Just a sense of consciousness. Just a sense of consciousness. No story, no personality, just an awareness. Just subject in the barest, most basic sense. Everything's faded and that's all that's left.

And with that, all that's left is a very, very simple object. That could be the realm of nothingness. It could be something in that territory—some very, very empty state in terms of object or what's being fabricated there as an object. Subject at its most basic level, we might say. Object at its most basic level, we might say.

And there's a third element that goes with these, that always goes with these. No subject, no object; no object, no subject. But they need a third element to stand together, to construct something: time. Time doesn't mean remembering the past or planning for after the retreat—completely beyond all that. It means just a sense of the present moment. Just a sense of a present moment.

Now implicit in a sense of a present moment—I would say implicit without any thinking—is a subtle sense of a future moment and a past moment. It goes with our sense of time. So this is the most basic tripod. Three legs propping each other up. They need each other. Generally speaking, there are always exceptions, but generally speaking, take away any one of these legs and the other two come tumbling down. The other two get unfabricated.

So this is the most basic perception. This is way down there at the low end of unfabricating. Here's the crucial point about conception and intention. I would say this barest subject, this most subtle subject, most unconstructed subject with an extremely unconstructed object and the barest sense of time—it still has pregnant within it conception and intention.

There is the sense of subject recognizing something as other than it. And subject, through saṅkāra, karmically is invested. None of this is thinking. There is an investment. This subject, this thinnest subject, is invested in some way or another with this object. I like it. I want more of it. This is not linguistic—"I like it, I want more of it." I want it to stay around. I want it to increase. I want it to decrease. I want it to go away. I want to keep it just as it is—some intention on the subject's part in relation to the object.

Do you understand? It's what subjects do. This is karma. This is saṅkāra.

This is the wheel of samsara at the most basic, basic level.

There's a conception of time—I'm not thinking about time. And there's a conception of an object—I'm not thinking about an object or a subject. But it's woven into the very perception. There's a conception of subject, object, and time. And woven into that, there's an intention, some intention or other to do with what happens in time, some investment on the subject's part to do with the object about what then happens in the next moment.

So implicit in a sense of a present moment, the bare sense of time, is implicit a sense of a next moment. And there's investment in what will happen in the next moment for this subject. So there's already clinging there. It's wrapped up in the most subtle intention and the most subtle conception. This is this most basic tripod. This is propping up samsara.

These three—coming back to that, coming back to the question on the note—they dependently co-arise. It's not like first there is a subject sort of sitting around, drumming fingers, waiting for an object and waiting for time. Or that there is time waiting for—which is also quite interesting if you know something about very recent developments in physics—but they arise together. We're even saying they arise together. We're really at the edge of what language and conception can express, because arising is something that happens in time. And now we're talking about the arising of time itself.

They arise together, they go together. Language—exactly at this point—this is the limit, I would say. This is the limit of conventional language in terms of how deep we can go with understanding the arising and passing of things and dependent arising.

They arise together. They are not separate. Subject, object, time. They're not three things. Nor are they one thing. Nor are they nothing. No things. Nor are they many things. Nor are they infinite things. Really. You could see them in all those ways. But really, they're not any of those things.

So typical avijjā, typical ignorance delusion believes in this conception. There is a subject, there are objects, and there is time. That basic conception is avijjā. Out of that basic conception comes inevitably these intentions in some way or another for the next moment in regard to this object, or I want a better object or whatever it is. Not talking about any thinking at all. It's so, so subtle. That's basic avijjā, propelling samsara, propelling the wheel of dependent origination at the most basic level.

In the conception, in this most basic conception, is the avijjā. Wrapped up with it—not even out of it, but wrapped up with it—is this stream of saṅkhārā intention. That's another intention as what fabricates. I'm invested, I'm clinging, I'm pushing, I'm pulling in the most, most subtle ways.

When we understand what's happening here, understand they're not three, understand they're not one, understand it's not nothing. When we understand how this arises through this conception and through the intention and the clinging. At the moment we understand that—or rather let's put it this way, when I am meditating and I bring that understanding and I use it as an insight way of looking, I take this: this is what's going on here. There's a conception of subject-object-time and it propels, it's wrapped up with, or wrapped up with it is this movement of intention, of clinging, very, very subtle.

When I understand that, and I plug that in as a way of looking, I understand what's going on, therefore these things are fabricated. These subject-object-time are fabricated. They're not unfabricated. Time is a fabrication. I understand how they arise together.

Then we could say, okay, at that moment our avijjā is much, much, much less. In that moment of employing that insight way of looking.

Does that make sense?

Looking at the foundation or the first link of dependent arising - avijja - we've just decreased it radically at that point. So we're not pumping into the wheel of dependent arising. We're not pumping the liquid into samsara. Samsara means "to flow" - sara, to flow into that flow. We're not pumping the liquid in because the avijja - that squeezy liquid box thingy - has got no liquid in it, or very, very little liquid in it.

And then our tripod collapses. Unfabricating. Total unfabrication. No time, no subject, no object, no present moment, no awareness in the usual sense of what we mean by awareness - or any big vastness of awareness or something like that.

So as I said, we're talking about something very, very subtle, actually very, very doable if I approach it in the right way. "Thus he trains himself." And that probably takes a while, but it's really, really possible.

The Buddha said - I'm paraphrasing; he probably said it much more elegantly - but it's something like: no matter how long your legs are and how long you walk for, you'll never reach the end of the world. No matter how long - even if you lived forever - you'd never reach the end of the world. But without reaching the end of the world, you won't know liberation. Without reaching the end of the world, you won't know liberation.

So he's talking about this - the end of the world. In other places he defines the world as basically the six senses, what appears in the six senses, including the mind. So you could say, philosophically speaking, all this has relevance as what we might call a phenomenological approach, a radical phenomenological approach in philosophical language.

And yet it's still the case that a person might go through all this business and open to the unfabricated as an experience, and yet not take it - or decide not to take it - as implying anything at all with regard to the world. It only implies something about the mind's relationship with the world and the world of experience.

So then they maybe conclude: I experienced the unfabricated, and therefore there's no rebirth, because I've severed my infatuation and my ties and my clinging with the world. There's no rebirth in the world. And from that kind of understanding, we do get a very - or it's possible to get a very - dualistic view: there's the unfabricated and there's the world. And not much more is understood about the world from that viewpoint. So one could view it that way.

One could also hear all this - and I think sometimes people do, or partially read about it - and view it as a kind of what we call in philosophy "mentalism." In other words, all this world is just... there is no materiality. Materiality is an illusion, and what's real is the mind, and the mind projects this world.

But we're going beyond that. There are lots of critiques of having that partial understanding. It's the mind, awareness, consciousness, and all the elements of the mind that make up the mind too - they are empty too. One can come to see that they are empty too. All of them - all the world and the mind and the elements of the mind - all this, they're like... Sariputta gives an analogy of two sheaves of corn or wheat or something. You know, like in a field after the farmers do their harvesting, they might prop two sheaves of wheat leaning on each other.

The whole thing - mind and world, the elements of the mind - they prop each other up. That's also partly what dependent co-arising means, like the tripod. They're not really separate things. They're empty of being really separate things. But they're not one thing.

What I've described here very briefly - kind of rushing through - what I've described here is not only beautiful as a practice, but profoundly liberating for people's lives. Maybe, let's say, most people. But we go back to the epistemology question. I'm still left with: well, how do I know I can trust this? What does this mean?

I'm not going into the epistemology thing right now, but for some people it's convincing enough. That's totally convincing and that does it for them. There will be people who don't like this approach for different reasons, or just would find, when they hear about it, they just don't find it convincing - this whole idea of less fabricating and exploring that meditative journey of less fabricating.

So there are other approaches to emptiness that are possible. And again, I've written about them in Seeing That Frees. They're what I call analytical meditations, or what are called analytical meditations. Very different from this business about insight ways of looking at fabrication. But through these analytical meditations, you can come to understand it's impossible for something to have inherent existence. It's just another way into emptiness.

Going back to something I said at the beginning: if a person says - again, fabrication, whether they use that word or not, whether I use that word or not - fabrication, what we mean by it, is an important concept.

Fabrication is an important concept. Seeing papañca as fabrication, and then seeing dukkha as fabrication, letting go of it, and then one is with the unfabricated. So papañca—in the common sense of the word, when the Buddha uses it, he means something much more subtle, I think. But anyway, we'll keep it at that.

So fabrication is an important concept because we see, for example, the difference between the papañca mind and the mindful mind or the mind of bare attention. But someone might say, "Fabrication is an important concept, but I'm not really interested in all this mystical, deep talk of the unfabricated. That's all irrelevant to life. What's that got to do with life? This business about the unfabricated—it's only for some people."

I would say, are we not then making an artificial distinction or drawing an arbitrary line between everyday life and the mystical? Because again, as I said at the beginning, why? Why have I, why have you, why has a person drawn the line about what is fabricated where they have drawn it? Why there? First of all, where exactly have you drawn it? And why there?

The principle of fabrication—the principle of clinging, the principle of the relationship between clinging and fading—it's the same and it's one spectrum. As I said, my mom can understand. There's papañca. I have to explain to her a bit what clinging means at that gross level. And she understands, "Oh yeah, when I just calm down a bit and relax a little bit, then it all fades." Basically, it's the same principle. There was the fabrication. Then I let go of the clinging and the fabrication—the papañca—faded. It's the same principle.

It's one spectrum all the way from that to what we've been talking about this evening. It's one spectrum. There's one principle, actually a really simple principle running all the way through. It's only perhaps that preconceived, unquestioned ontological assumptions—assumptions of views about beliefs about what is real—are somehow dragged in to what's actually one spectrum, what's actually a coherent system. And then these preconceived assumptions about reality just make a division in that spectrum. And I end up dividing the spectrum and actually making it a bit incoherent.

Okay, last thing. Again, someone might say—and we talked about this yesterday a little bit with the realm of neither-perception-nor-non-perception—"What's this totally transcendent, unfabricated got to do with me? What's it got to do with life? What's it got to do with my life? It's so transcendent, so removed."

You know, life is contact. Life is experiences. Remember, that's what perceptions mean. Life is the senses and what comes to us in the senses. Life is emotions, it's heart, it's story, it's self. And even if it's not self, it's at least the flow of the aggregates. That's life. What's this got to do with life? What's it got to do with me? Why should I be interested in this?

Already in the fourth jhana we talked about the quietening of emotions, and that's part of life. In the jhanas we're getting used to this unfabricating. Again, it's one way of understanding what's going on. It's probably the most helpful way of understanding what's going on in the jhanas. They're not—for the hundredth time on this retreat—they're not states of deeper concentration and ability to keep your mind unwavering on one object.

So already in the fourth jhana there's a quietening of what we might view as life, and there's hopefully a kind of opening to the beauty of this which is sort of halfway or a lot less like life than we think, than we're used to thinking. So what's it got to do with me?

Again, we talked about this before, it may be that a dualistic understanding and a dualistic sense of the world and the sense of things comes out of all this. There is the unfabricated, this wondrous mystical release and opening and something that is completely beyond conception, completely beyond perception. There is the unfabricated and there's the world of the fabricated. And they're really different. They have no connection. And this is clearly better than that. And I don't want to be reborn. I just want to, whatever the word is, dissolve, unbind. Nirvana means unbind—that's one of the etymologies. Vana, like a vine, like you wrap things in vines. Nirvana, I just want to unbind in that, not be reborn.

So it could lead to a kind of dualistic understanding. Absolutely. Could, doesn't have to.

Sometimes what happens for a person opens to this kind of experience and then it's as if that unfabricated then can be, at least at times, a sense of it shining through the world of experience, the world of matter, the world of phenomenal reality. The light of the unfabricated shines through. The song of the unfabricated blows through. It casts a light on this world. It casts its light on this world. Or it is the light behind and through the phenomenal world. Or it gives a kind of space and context to this world and the comings and goings and the ups and downs of this world. So that's much less dualistic.

We have to be careful though because remember we talked about the after effects of perception on perception. By now it should be clear there are many possibilities for what could be perceived as shining through. It could be the joy of the second jhana as some people have reported very beautifully. That can shine through or the third jhana or the realm of this or that. So there is this possibility, I think, of a sense of the unfabricated shining through, but we have to be careful in our discernment. Is it the unfabricated or is it something else?

But a third possibility is again what I've touched on before and I think we talked about it yesterday. Again it's like through all this I go further. I go further than the unfabricated. I don't stop there. Wondrous as that is. And I go further in my understanding of emptiness and dependent arising. And I realize through that, I sense through that in my being, in the fibers of my being, in my consciousness, I sense through that—again we run out of language, whatever the words might be—for something, for participation so profound that it's beyond the word participation. For an intimacy and an involvement so intimate and involved and close and deep, that it's beyond what we usually mean by words like intimacy and involvement. Participation, intimacy, involvement in the mystery of things, in the mystery and the magic of appearances.

And then there's sacredness everywhere. There's holiness everywhere. There's this beauty of emptiness everywhere without any duality.

So people take this different ways, but there are possibilities here, different possibilities.

Let's have some quiet together.

CHAPTER 223

Playing in the In-Betweens

Rob Burbea · 1h04

In this supplementary teaching from the Practising the Jhānas series, Rob Burbea addresses technical questions and methods for working in jhānic 'grey areas' - those transitional states between clear absorption and ordinary consciousness. He explores responsive practice rhythms, the crucial relationship between posture and citta quality, and specific techniques for working with obstacles in different jhānas. Key topics include spreading the nimitta when pain is present, stabilizing jhānas by moving between adjacent states, working with secondary nimittas like relief and release, and understanding the breath's role across jhānic levels. Burbea emphasizes the importance of tuning practice schedules responsively rather than following rigid patterns, and discusses how this principle applies to both samādhi and insight ways of looking. The teaching concludes with profound reflections on jhānas as dimensional resources for human flourishing, exploring how regular immersion in these states opens our sense of what human beings are capable of. A detailed exploration of soul-making approaches to energy body practice illustrates how intention shapes our relationship to meditative experiences, highlighting the difference between practicing from eros versus aversion.

Hi everyone. I am recording this from home. I got home and realized there were a few questions that I hadn't had time to respond to that I think would be helpful for people at later points in their practice. There were also a few other technical instructions that I think would be helpful for most people at some point as they go forward with jhana practice, along with a couple of general things. Most of what I want to go into falls into the category of working in jhanic grey areas.

As I mentioned, sometimes when the jhana opens for the first few experiences, it's very intense, very clear, seemingly effortless. One is very much in the jhana and might feel like there's nothing to do, nothing to improve on even. As one gains more experience in and out of that jhana and gets more familiar with that particular jhanic territory—whichever it is, whatever jhana we're talking about—then there do appear times where it becomes apparent in one's practice that sometimes it's very clear, very pure, a pure jhanic experience.

Other times we're sort of in the jhanic territory, but not quite—sort of para-jhanic territory, or kind of half in, half out, or on the edge. As I mentioned, there's mostly in, but some very subtle hindrances yapping quietly at the borders of consciousness, or there's an area of the body that won't clear up. It falls into that kind of territory—the grey area, working in the grey areas or transitional states. Not everything, but a lot of things.

Before that, though, there are a couple of general things, and then something about soul-making and jhana. So let's see how we do.

The first general thing is, again, to make clear that I would say it's more optimal for the way we're practicing jhanas to not fall into a sort of strict, unbroken rhythm of formal practice: sit-walk, sit-walk, sit-walk—45 minutes, 45 minutes, one hour, one hour, however it's divided up. Of course, sometimes that will feel like it's the most helpful rhythm at that time, but the key thing here is, does it feel like it is? Again, am I listening? Am I being responsive? Am I being attentive? Am I tuning my practice rhythm at the moment—right now, not for this retreat, but right now, for this morning, or this afternoon, or this evening? Am I tuning it to what feels best, what feels like it's actually most fertile?

Sometimes if you sit and the jhana's coming and it all feels really good, you can go way beyond one hour—way, way, way beyond. Just sit in an unlimited way. You run out of batteries, try again. Try to get the jhana again without getting up, maybe two or three times. Sit as long as you can—not with any forcing, but just sit as long as it works, as long as it feels good. The same applies to walking practice and standing practice, unless for some reason you only have 20 minutes or 40 minutes or whatever it is, and you decide to just go 40 minutes to walk now. That's all fine.

Basically there needs to be this responsive attunement of the rhythms of our practice. We're really finding out, feeling into, getting a sense for and discovering what's the most helpful right now, and breaking out of a kind of rigid, tight, predefined, pre-set mold of a rhythm for practice and different postures. This is also part of what I mentioned because the day needs to breathe and there needs to be space for appreciation and beauty and a little bit of exercise and open-heartedness.

I'm reiterating that, but I also want to say that when some of you start exploring insight ways of looking as a huge stream of investigation in your practice, and when that opens up, I would say the same principle applies there. You can have times where it's sit, walk, sit, walk—very rigid and predefined. That's absolutely fine. But you also really want times where it's this more fluid, attentive, open scheduling that's much more responsive.

Again there, in the way that I would, or the way I most commonly teach insight practice—which is through different insight ways of looking, learning them, employing them, seeing what happens with them—we still want the day to breathe. We still want space in the heart and the soul for appreciation and beauty and to be touched and for open-heartedness. We also need space to notice the after-effects on perception. Whether we're doing jhanic practice as it goes deeper and they become more common—and we know to look for them and look out for them very gently without pressure—or insight ways of looking practice, there are again very potentially powerful, very noticeable after effects on perception there as well.

But there's another reason when we come to insight ways of looking, or practicing insight ways of looking. Partly the way that process works in this way of teaching insight meditation is not through the continuity, through the accumulation of a sort of power of mindfulness through just being completely continuous with the mindfulness. So sit, walk, sit, walk, unbroken, go to lunch, continue the mindfulness—it's a great way of practice. A certain intensity and this continuity of mindfulness will be developed hopefully that way, and through that continuity of mindfulness, it can illuminate certain things. So that's great.

An alternative approach emerges when we deliberately practice different insight ways of looking. Here I actually need the comparison. I need to practice this particular insight way of looking and then consciously let it go, comparing the difference in perception when I release it. Now I'm simply back to ordinary consciousness—not particularly trying to maintain any special awareness. Of course, there's still a way of looking because there's always a way of looking, but I'm not deliberately employing this or that specific way of looking.

It's through this comparison that I learn about dependent arising. I'm not trying to accumulate so much mindfulness that I then perceive "the truth"—because there isn't one truth. Instead, I practice a way of looking, then I let go of practicing that way of looking. When I practice the way of looking, I notice what it does to perception, notice the sense of things. When I stop practicing, I notice there's a different sense of things.

In this approach, we actually need a looser, rather less continuous schedule of practice. The intention can be continuous for long periods—that's absolutely fine—but there does need to be some kind of coming out of the insight way of looking, perhaps moving into a more normal way without deliberate intention, so that we can see through comparison the effect of the insight way of looking.

It's not that practice always has to be like that, but sometimes that's part of it too. There's less emphasis on continuity. When I practice this insight way of looking, I should see within ten minutes, twenty minutes, an hour—whatever it is—the obvious effects on perception.

The second general point concerns posture. As I mentioned on the retreat, eventually you can access jhāna and remain in jhāna in almost any posture. Posture becomes very unimportant. But before that time, before the practice has really ripened to that stage, posture is actually very important, particularly at the beginning.

I encouraged this in some of the early guided meditations—really sensing into the poise and balance in posture. See if you can develop a feel for, a sense of, the beauty in posture: the beauty, dignity, and nobility that posture reflects. Notice the balance between the citta qualities that posture manifests, expresses, and reflects—between openness, relaxation, and softness on one hand, and brightness, alertness, poise, and intention on the other.

There's also the sense of actual balance in posture and the way that when the mind encompasses the whole body and includes the whole body space in a very alert, open, receptive, sensitive way, the body and posture are very subtly affected. Subtle changes in posture can affect our ability to maintain that kind of pervasive energy body awareness. This is really, really important.

If you're not familiar with this, it's really worth taking time to explore, as I said at the beginning of the retreat. I remember Kirsten showing me a picture of her very young nieces—three or four of them, I think—meditating or trying to meditate. They were very young, between two and ten years old.

One of them, quite a young one, was very interesting. You could tell from the photograph that her awareness was spread throughout her body. They were all sitting cross-legged, copying Kirsten with their eyes shut. But the awareness was spread through the whole body. You could feel from the photograph the poise in posture, and also in the attention, in the awareness. You could feel the quality of attention and how it pervaded her whole body. It was very alive and present. Quite remarkable.

Posture and citta quality go very much together at first. It's really worth exploring this if you're not familiar with it.

I remember one of my first teachers in an interview many years ago. I was called in for an interview—I think I was one of the first people to be called. I thought, "Oh, why am I first?" I was a teenager, and he said, "You're very out of contact with the earth," or something like that—"very out of contact with the ground." I had no idea what he was talking about, but it struck me as a serious problem. It sounded like a very serious ailment.

He had me sit and played with my posture a little. I was not really in contact with my body at all back then—had no training in that. I was probably quite disconnected, as most teenagers in that generation were, disconnected from my body. At a certain point, he was gently moving my shoulders and torso, and then he simply said, "There. There."

And really, it wasn't so much a visible kind of yoga-looking posture that he was responding to. He was responding to, he was feeling the way my posture helped my mind inhabit the whole body, the whole body space in a very natural and open and upright and alert way. And I think that's what he was picking up on. Of course, to me, it just seemed like some kind of supernatural powers at the time.

Now that I'm much more used to all this and teaching, and energy body is very much what I emphasize, I can easily understand how it's possible to have that kind of awareness with another person, how their mind and body are right now, and how their energy body awareness is, and how the posture is perhaps allowing, supporting, or limiting certain possibilities psychically, certain possibilities for the citta, or certain possibilities in relationship.

I remember working with someone in an interview, and they were in a very difficult space in their heart and mind and soul. I was asking them to come into presence, to be in relationship with me with an open heart and the sort of holding there, and encouraging them to open to their body experience as well. But I could tell that there was just something very, very subtle in how they were sitting and holding their posture. It didn't look like anything obvious—certainly nothing like being hunched over or contracted or some kind of obviously defensive posture. It was extremely subtle. But that was enough to prevent her from coming into a different relationship with herself and also from coming into a different relationship with me.

We played with that just a little bit, and it allowed the relational space, both with herself and with myself, to open up to possibilities that were just not available two minutes beforehand, five minutes beforehand. She had no idea.

So the mind, the citta, affects the body and the posture, and the posture affects the citta. And this goes very, very subtle and deep until it begins to be—states of openness and states of jhana, states of samadhi and all that become much more familiar and they're less dependent on the posture being like this or like that to enable them. But maybe for quite a while for some people it is quite posture dependent. So it's really worth taking the time to play with posture, even in what might seem like microscopically subtle ways. That was part of what I was trying to encourage at the beginning of the retreat.

Okay, so let's run through a few more specific technical things. As I said, most of these are relative to things kind of going well but hitting some tricky spots where it's just not quite coalescing or coming together.

We spoke about how sometimes there can be pain or discomfort in the body, or a sense of contraction or holding or tightness somewhere in the energy body, the physical body. And we spoke about the possibility of actually taking that difficult spot—for example, if you're doing metta practice as your base practice—actually imagining the center of the metta there. The metta is radiating from that very difficulty. Or imagining the breath coming in and out there, or the energy, that being the center of the energy body and the center of the breath energy, if you like, or the center of the light, the white luminosity or golden white luminosity that might pervade the energy body. Just almost exactly where you'd least expect it, imagining that to be the center of what you're trying to encourage. And sometimes it can turn out, just as we'd least expect, counterintuitively to be the loveliest place.

But what I want to add now is that if the mind is fuzzy or foggy or woolly, the mind, the head, and if you're tired, a similar thing can work. Imagine light there in the head. The head feels dull or there's that kind of tiredness behind the eyes or just the kind of wooliness there. Imagine the light centered there if you're working with light as part of the energy body awareness. Imagine the breath energy coming in and out there or coming in or out through the top of the head, through the sides, the front, the back, whatever it is, or radiating, expanding out from that very wooliness.

So just the same principle, but applied to qualities of the citta. Same principle as we suggested with regard to bodily discomforts or blocks, we can apply to discomforts or blocks in the citta. And often they do feel in the head, so we just imagine them in the head.

Some of these are quite basic. Some will apply to working in the territory of any jhana. Some apply to later jhanas, and I'll go into that specific jhana. Some of them apply to working outside of a jhana, before even entering jhanic territory, or as I said, they might apply when the jhana's kind of going okay, but there's a little bit that's not kind of brought into the fold of the jhana, it hasn't spread there. So some of these things will apply at any level.

And we just mentioned pain, so again, we mentioned on the retreat, there might be—it could be any jhana, say second or first or whatever. The jhanic nimitta is there. I'm in the territory of the jhana, but it's not quite suffusing the whole body. And indeed, there's some place in the body where there's pain or discomfort. So it's in the jhanic territory, the nimitta has arisen, but it's not fully suffused and I'm not fully absorbed. Well, it's not always best to hurry to spread or suffuse the nimitta. That may be exactly the right thing, but sometimes just pause a little bit because we've got a few options.

Sometimes, you might find that the breath becomes very, very faint and light, almost like it's dissolving or barely perceptible. And this can actually be quite lovely and beautiful. But sometimes a person thinks, "Oh, I need to be really careful here. I need to manage this." There might be a little bit of fear arising: "What if I stop breathing?" or "What if something goes wrong?" This kind of worry or management mode can actually pull you out of the jhāna.

So if you notice this happening—if the breath is becoming very faint and there's some concern about it—often the best approach is simply to trust. Trust the body. Trust the process. The body knows how to breathe. Even when the breath becomes incredibly subtle and light, even when it feels like it might disappear completely, just let it be. Don't try to manage it or control it.

Sometimes people think they need to take a conscious breath or check that they're still breathing. But this kind of intervention, this moving into management mode, often disrupts the beautiful stillness that's emerging. So instead, just relax into that faintness of breath. Let it be as subtle as it wants to be. Trust that the body will take care of what it needs to take care of.

This principle of trust extends more broadly in jhāna practice. When we enter these deeper states, there's often a natural letting go that happens—a release of our usual need to control and manage our experience. The more we can surrender into this, the more we can trust the organic wisdom of the process, the deeper and more stable our jhānic experiences tend to become.

Another aspect particular to working with the third jhāna relates to the quality of contentment and equanimity that characterizes this state. Sometimes practitioners find that while they can enter the third jhāna, it doesn't feel as dramatically different from the second jhāna as they might expect. The happiness is still there, but it's quieter, more subtle. There might be a sense of, "Is this really different? Am I actually in the third jhāna?"

This is quite normal. The transitions between jhānas aren't always marked by dramatic shifts. Sometimes they're quite gentle and gradual. The key is to tune into the particular flavor of each state. In the third jhāna, there's often a sense of deep satisfaction, a profound okayness with things as they are. The body feels suffused with a gentle, steady pleasure that's less effervescent than the pīti of the first and second jhānas, but perhaps more deeply nourishing.

If you're working to develop familiarity with the third jhāna and you're not sure whether you're really there or still in the second, you can experiment with intentionally bringing back some pīti, some of that more bubbly, energetic happiness. If you can easily toggle back to that more energetic quality, then return to the quieter contentment, you're probably working skillfully with the distinction between these states.

In all the piti and sukha of earlier jhanas, it might be that we haven't noticed the breath. We've let the breath go, allowing the piti and sukha to become the primary nimittas—which is a completely fine way of working, as we've emphasized. But sometimes, not only does the breath organically become more sensible because there's greater calmness, it may actually help the third jhana to bring attention back to the breath.

At this point, the breath should be very, very subtle and delicate. As we said, the very movement of the breath is peacefulness. The very movement of that subtle, delicate, gentle breath is peacefulness itself—like those strands of seaweed in the lagoon, just gently swaying. It's so subtle, they're moving peacefully. There's movement, movement of the breath, but the very movement is peacefulness. Sometimes deliberately returning to find the breath again—whether it emerges organically as we begin to notice and include it, or we consciously seek it—can help deepen and consolidate the third jhana when needed.

This brings us to a more general point, particularly as we enter the deeper jhanas where we encounter secondary nimittas. For instance, the secondary nimittas of release and relief are important ingredients of the jhanic mix. Any experienced jhana meditator will notice these qualities and should notice them. While they're not primary nimittas, sometimes attending to them can be skillful. When working in a jhana that's not quite coming together—when we're definitely in the territory but it's not quite coalescing or fully deepening as we know is possible—we can very gently and delicately, without pressure, look for these secondary nimittas of relief and release.

By noticing them and focusing on them briefly, even for just a few moments, we can allow the whole jhana to deepen or consolidate. This represents a very skillful, subtle movement of attention. We're working with what will help, almost taking that relief and release—or whatever the secondary nimitta is—and using it as part of the glue, part of the stitching to help cohere the jhanic experience.

For the fourth jhana specifically, we've discussed how there's often a brightness—white golden light—that's quite central. The stillness is the light, the light is the stillness. Sometimes this manifests as a vertical column of bright stillness through the center of the body space. Sometimes it feels all around you, sometimes it's not quite all around yet. You can imagine this vertical column of bright white light that is the stillness, the stillness that is the light, rising through the center of the energy body space.

One can begin to allow or even encourage that light to melt outwards from that central vertical column. In doing so, it dissolves the body into it, dissolves the body with it. This can be tremendously helpful at times.

Sometimes with the fourth jhana, particularly when that leaning forward occurs—that intensity of focus on conceiving the stillness and nimitta in front of us—it's helpful to feel that you, or the body, the energy body, is falling backwards into a jhanic realm. You conceive it as being behind you, but in addition to just conceiving it there, you actually fall back into it. This represents a different mode of attention—falling backwards versus probing forward or trying to penetrate something in front. It's different too from the vertical column that we expand outwards. These various approaches offer different modes of attention, different conceptions of the directionality of attention and the relationship between body, jhana, and nimitta.

Returning to the Buddha's description of the fourth jhana, what remains is nothing but this pure, bright awareness—wrapped in this cloth of pure, bright awareness. This connects to our earlier discussion about mixing cooking ingredients to move between jhanas. If I can turn up the sense of presence in the fourth jhana—and this will take me toward the sixth jhana, infinite consciousness, because presence is consciousness and consciousness is presence—I begin to open that up. It's already there, already pregnant with it, already implicit in the fourth jhana.

Another way to understand this is through those cooking ingredients: I mix a bit of this, add more of that ingredient to this jhana, and it takes me to another jhana. We're adding more presence to the fourth jhana, but how? By tuning to what's already there.

So here it's different than cooking. The tuning to the sense of presence—when I notice it, when I tune to it, it amplifies it. So effectively I'm adding more of that particular ingredient into my cooking pot, and the fourth jhana will then change into the sixth jhana. I've turned up the sense of presence just by tuning to it and amplifying it. The tuning to it does amplify, and that turns up, and it goes to the sixth jhana.

Of course, there should be a very strong sense of presence in the fourth jhana. The mind is almost spellbound, but still, we can increase things by tuning to them, increase certain factors within the jhana, and that can sometimes just help that jhana consolidate. As I said, it's very common for a fourth jhana with a lot of experience to get just a little bit dull. So just turn up that sense of presence. But if I really then tune into the sense of presence and hone in on that, I'm amplifying it. And that can take me to the sixth jhana.

One thing that I mentioned—the Buddha says, technically the breath stops breathing. In the fourth jhana, whatever we think about the so-called biological reality of that, that will be the meditator's experience. It's hard to locate a sense of breath in the fourth jhana. It feels as if the body has stopped breathing.

But be careful. Don't try to assess, "Is this the fourth jhana?" by keeping on checking whether your breath has stopped. That's not the right way. It's not going to be helpful. Just as checking whether thought has stopped is not going to be a helpful way of checking whether you're in the second jhana. Doing that kind of thing—checking "Has my breath stopped? No, it hasn't stopped yet"—is, in a way, reinforcing that pattern I talked about, this micro-pattern in our psychology, micro-pattern in the citta, the sankhāras of the mind, to just give attention to the negative, to look for what's not quite right, what's not quite measuring up.

Rather, just get into the stillness. The stillness is there. "Am I in the fourth jhana yet?" Just get into the stillness. Really enjoy it. Really be with it with a very alive attention. Really see if you can penetrate into that stillness. See if you can dissolve into that stillness. See if that stillness can dissolve into you. The mind, the body dissolving into the stillness. The stillness dissolving into and dissolving the mind and body. That's what we need to do, and it will mature into the fourth jhana, if there's that alive attention, and that kind of right attention with it, rather than just keep checking whether the breath has stopped.

Someone wrote me a note, actually, about breath. This person was obviously working around the territory of the second jhana, I'm guessing from the note. "It's a quick and possibly silly question. Does it matter if the breathing is through the nose or the mouth? A combination of a cold plus an enormous grin indicates probably the second jhana. Open-mouthed means I sometimes breathe through the mouth." So she had a cold, and there was this enormous grin, and so she finds herself breathing through the mouth. But then she says, "And sometimes it feels like it dissipates the strength of pīti or sukha." Breathing through the mouth actually dissipated the pīti or the sukha.

So I would say if it's from the grin, you don't have to stop your grin. Grinning is good and fine. But probably it's the case that you can just very minutely move the position of your tongue against your teeth. And that will somehow allow you to keep grinning without the mouth actually being open, and then you can breathe through your nose, so that we can have a full grin. I have a hunch—pretty sure if the tongue is in a certain position, we should be able to breathe through the nose.

Because it may well be that when we breathe through the mouth, the breath isn't allowed to become more subtle. So what the Buddha calls the bodily formations, the breath, are not allowed to become more subtle. And with that the citta is kind of—it's harder for the citta to become more subtle. If we're trying to be in jhana, it's characterized by refinement of body energy vibration and the refinement and subtlety of the citta.

You have to be present for jhāna. So if we're getting in the way by breathing through the mouth, and that keeps the breath unsubtle, then it can be a problem.

So if it's possible—if it's not because of a cold, if it's just because of a grin—there are probably things one can do with the tongue to start with. This allows breathing through the nose, and then maybe, if one is ready anyway, it goes beyond the second jhāna. Continue with the nose breath, and the whole thing gets more subtle.

If it's a cold, or a bad cold, well, you'll probably just have to breathe through the mouth and put up with it for a while. However, as the citta gets more subtle—if it can, and it's still, you know, it's not completely prevented by breathing through the mouth at all. It's not complete; that won't completely block things. You should find, as the citta gets more subtle, the breath will get more subtle.

And then even with a heavy cold—so this might even take, you know, going, avoiding the breath at first, going via what you remember of energy body vibrations of different states, of different jhanic states, or just remembering a jhāna—but if you get in the territory where the citta is subtle, then the breath will become subtle.

Again, body affects mind, breath affects mind, mind affects body and breath. So if the citta can be kind of just helped to become more subtle, even if we have a bad cold and we're breathing through the mouth, the breath will become more subtle. And because the breath is more subtle, actually less air is being moved. And with less air being moved, you might find actually that even with a relatively blocked nose, a quiet blocked nose, you can actually still breathe through the nose, because we're not actually moving that much air, and the little amount of air can find its way through the blocked nose.

But it's not that we're trying to make that happen. It's just that we're helping the citta to become, or allowing the citta to become more subtle. Naturally that allows the breath to become more subtle, and effortlessly we will probably find that breathing through the nose, or nose breathing is happening, without us trying to manipulate that physically.

Okay, a couple of things, just to finish—two more things.

One is—so we talked last night about insight ways of looking that unfabricate and that potentially move through the jhanic stages in their process of unfabricating. However, I don't think in that practice the primary point or the primary aim is to necessarily learn a degree of skill that controls an insight way of looking to the degree that I can stop the elevator exactly where I want, at an exact jhāna. That's a, you know, that's a good skill. But it's not the most important thing there.

What's much more important—this is important to understand—what's much more important is that in that process of playing with insight ways of looking, we understand the principle of lessening fabrication. We understand the principle of unfabricating to whatever degree. Through this insight way of looking, there's less clinging. And because there's less clinging, there's more letting go, which is just saying the same thing. And because of that, because of dependent arising, there's less fabrication. And so the experience opens up, refines out in these different ways.

So understanding that principle of lessening fabrication through insight ways of looking is really, really important. Understanding how to fabricate less. And thirdly, understanding what exactly is involved in that subtle clinging.

So I use this word clinging in a very stretchy way. It means all the way from the most gross to the most subtle aspects of the relationship of the citta with phenomenal experience that we wouldn't usually think of as clinging. Really, really subtle. So that in the end, even avidyā—in the Mahāyāna, even avijjā, even ignorance—is a kind of clinging. Even believing, looking at something and the unconscious belief that it inherently exists, which is what most human beings do most of the time, most of their lives, with most of phenomenal experience. Just that unconscious, unnoticed, very common belief and assumption in the inherent existence of whatever is in perception and consciousness at any time. We could call that avijjā, but in the Mahāyāna they also call it clinging. It's a very subtle level of clinging, and I use clinging in that sense too.

So understanding the principle of lessening fabrication through insight ways of looking. Secondly, how do I fabricate less? How are we actually using these insight ways of looking and getting familiar with them and developing the art and skill of them? And thirdly, what exactly is going on here? What exactly is involved in subtle clinging? What subtle clinging is being let go of here? And what avijjā is being let go of here?

So avijjā also has a whole range of aspects, but also levels to it, from very, very gross—of course, complete, deluded thinking, etc.—to very, very subtle, and clinging as well. So what exactly is involved in subtle clinging, subtle avijjā? That's what we're talking about.

And lastly, the fourth thing, to understand the implications of all that, the implications of the way less clinging, less avijjā fabricates—results in less fabrication right then in the moment, in the moment of looking, in the moment of relating, a way of looking.

In other words, understanding dependent arising and emptiness as we touched on to some extent in the retreat.

So all that—those understandings, those four understandings—are much more the point than being able to control and manipulate the jhanas, thinking "I'll be able to go exactly to this jhana and not overstep it to the next jhana" when I unfabricate through a certain insight way of looking. As always, the insight is more important than the somatic experience.

Now, I want to read you a fairly long note from someone on retreat. This is quite important, and for those of you familiar with soul-making, it's very important. For those who are not yet familiar with soul-making dharma but who may one day be, it may well be crucial. It's a bit involved and lengthy, but I feel it's really essential. It also expands our sense of how we might approach jhana practice, especially when we have some soul-making dharma and practice background.

This person wrote: "This has been a dukkha-ful retreat for me—lots of dukkha, so much pain and struggle around desire and sustaining intention and effort." These were precisely the kinds of challenges we were addressing and trying to open up and inquire into several times during the retreat.

She continues: "Your teaching on desire and soul-making the last few nights finally prompted me to try to go into the dukkha last night, to hold and sense it with soul, and to see what images of the path and self on the path might arise. There were several beautiful and meaningful images that came from sensing the dukkha like this, and it felt like they began to clarify what I want from practice, and to give non-pathologizing place to some long-standing and painful patterns in my life. I won't go into this now."

"What I want to say is that later on last night, there was a lot of frustration around, and I felt some confidence from the above-mentioned experience about going in through the dukkha. So as skillfully as possible, I let the frustration rip, naming all the smallnesses and solidities in myself that I'm utterly sick of, tuning to the power rather than the poison of this emotion or energy." We talked about this as well during the retreat. "I didn't sense self-judgment in it, just clarity and fire." This is really important.

"Out of this, a sense of space opened. And in that space, as I was breathing, I became aware of a very subtle sense of the energy body breathing with me. This was the language that came, and it had soul resonances. My sense of the energy body was that they were creatively and definitely other than me." Rather than "I am the energy body" or "it's part of me," the sense was that they were creatively and definitely other. In soul-making practice, we sometimes speak of this as twoness.

"They were taking up a space somewhat larger than my physical body, though overlapping with it, and I had a strong sense of their autonomy and intelligence. I've not really worked with energy body as image, rather than as the terrain in which image and sensitivity to image arise. But I've heard you speak to this possibility, so I really tried to lean into it, using the nodes of the lattice to tune and sense."

"What opened was a gorgeous sense of twoness with the energy body, and a sense that they were taking me under their wing, teaching me how to be in right relationship with them. I would say that my relationship with piti on this retreat and in general has been pretty dysfunctional—tight with self and grasping and aversion. When piti arose in this experience with the energy body last night, though, it felt like they were giving it to me. They were saying 'Here, try feeling this,' and holding it for me while I worked and played, taking the pressure off and coaching me to try different things."

"I found I could stay with intensities and subtleties I hadn't been able to stay with before, because now they were being given to me as gift by this beautiful, unfathomable other. It was freeing and energizing and humbling. So I'd be interested to hear any thoughts you have, and specifically around allowing or inviting a sense of imaginal other into the base practice."

"In some ways what unfolded wasn't all that different from the energy-body-based practices you outlined on this retreat, but there was a strong sense of being in tuneness with mysterious otherness that ignited and aligned my desire, intention and effort, where they've been quite confused or limp through much of this retreat. I still feel very far from jhana, but I feel like I've begun to see the possibility of writing something in relation to why and how I practice."

She added a postscript: "Actually, a couple more thoughts around intention. My intention in working with frustration was for soul-making rather than samadhi. It was a surprise to me when the piti arose. And even when it did, I'd say the intention continued to be predominantly for soul-making, for the beauty of that dimensional relationship with the energy body. In subsequent sittings, with the intention for samadhi, I've tried to invite that imaginal sense of the energy body, but they haven't come. So perhaps it's that this soulful experience with the energy body now becomes part of the fantasy operating in the background of samadhi practice"—this was one of the options I had mentioned, where we work with an image and then it goes down into the background as a fantasy to help support things—"or I can choose to pick it up more intentionally in soul-making practice?"

I wrote a quick note back suggesting she choose the second option: to pick it up more intentionally as soul-making practice with the intention for soul-making, not for samadhi. Something had happened here for this practitioner...

So here for good reason, some difficulty, some knots had developed over time around intention and desire and goal—those themes we had been dwelling on and returning to several times in the retreat. There was so much importance, so much need to give careful attention to these questions, to inquire into them, to find right relationship with desire, intention, goal, aim, direction. A kind of long-standing history of dukkha and entanglement and difficulty existed there.

So actually, my sense was that here, much more helpfully, she should stay with the soul-making. Look, something extremely important and extremely beautiful had just happened—a real gift, a real grace that she could feel. Something that was perhaps the beginning of a much more profound and long-lasting healing.

If she thought she was on a jhana retreat, wanting to catch up with the others or whatever it might be, and rushed too quickly back to the samadhi intention, something wouldn't be allowed to ripen. To me, it sounded like it needed longer in that soul-making intention. That's what had opened things up. It was delivering something beautiful—the piti and the gorgeousness and so forth. Something was being healed. Something was also being ensouled: the dukkha was being ensouled, the energy body was being ensouled. Lots of things were happening that were really profoundly important, maybe more important than whether she attained such-and-such jhana right now, or even in the next month.

So that was my brief encouragement back to her. I really think that's important. I got a short response saying, "Thank you, wonderful, I'm so ready to put down the intention for samadhi." I don't know if I was hearing it right, but I was a little concerned getting that note.

There's a difference in making a choice. We've talked about how intention is really the primary thing that drives this or that practice, whether we're navigating a fork in the road between insight ways of looking and samadhi, or soul-making and samadhi, or whatever it is. The intention is really important for a number of reasons.

But there's a difference between an intention coming out of aversion and fed-upness, and an intention coming out of love and desire and a sense of grace and wanting something. Wanting soul-making is different than just really not wanting to be anymore with a certain intention for samadhi.

I didn't get a chance to find out or respond since it was right at the end of the retreat, but what I want to say right now is: be careful about these kinds of choices. Where there's been a habit of aversion or making choices out of aversion, or getting so fed up with a certain situation that we feel a lot of aversion and frustration, then the intention is coming out of that. An intention coming from aversion will have a different effect than an intention coming out of love for something, or eros for something, or responding to an invitation of an erotic-imaginal beloved other.

This is really, really important. I would guess that they will unfold differently. One could say, "Well, it's the same move—I'm choosing the soul-making intention over the samadhi intention"—but the dominant intention is slightly different. One is eros, and one is aversion. That probably will make a difference. I don't know if it was the case with this person, but the point bears making generally, because it applies very widely.

This is all part of getting wise to desire and eros and this whole territory. These meta questions are so important—how we respond to them, how we hold them, and how we choose in relationship to them.

So that's all I wanted to add as a sort of postscript to the whole retreat. I hope some of that has been helpful or will be helpful at some point.

Actually, one last thing I forgot. Someone was asking about resources, and I had mentioned from the beginning of the retreat and emphasized the ability of jhanas—our practice of jhanas—to really form and open up for us a profound resource of well-being in our life, stressing their potential function for us as deep resources.

So just to elaborate on this a little bit and draw out some of the other things I've been saying, to make something clear here that this person is asking: if one only experiences a jhana once or twice or a few times, it might be that for some period after those jhanic experiences, if they're strong, there is a relatively short-lived sense of resource, of happiness, of well-being, of energy. The kind of unshakability that might come with that, even from just feeling so happy.

But the danger, as I think of it—

The danger, as I've alluded to already on the retreat, is that with only experiencing jhāna a few times, it eventually fades and disappears. It may then become, through memory, an object of attachment and duality—comparing what we experience now with those jhānic experiences. Rather than providing anything as a resource, this actually fosters suffering through the duality and attachment to memory.

Much more significant is when we're able to frequently practice and experience jhānic states—perhaps daily or a couple of times a day, whatever our busy lives allow. Maybe not even every day, but regularly enough that it functions as a more constant source, like a well that isn't going dry or a spring. There's a sense of replenishment it brings, of rejuvenation, of energy being restored.

This deep emotional well-being—of different flavors and kinds depending on what jhāna we're experiencing—allows us to stay steady and meet difficulties. It supports us in sustaining our creative projects, our work, even when there are challenges. It helps us maintain our service work, activism, or whatever we're engaged in through the ups and downs, through the knocks, through the slog. Sometimes this might be work that's not well paid financially, where we receive no recognition or encouragement, where no one else seems to notice. But this regular dipping in, drinking from these wells, these beautiful springs of cool, clear water, will definitely provide resource in our lives.

There's a second way I want to emphasize—it's implicit in what I've said during the retreat, but I really want to draw it out clearly. Long-term, repeated immersion and exposure to jhānic states—let's say second jhāna and above—will open and deepen our sense of what a human being is, what we are as human beings, and what other human beings are. It opens and deepens the very sense of the dimensionality of human beings.

Our sense of our own being becomes dimensional. As I said near the beginning of the retreat, the jhānas become almost like dimensions of human beings. They're also dimensions of being more generally, or cosmic being, especially as we go deeper into the jhānas. This opening and deepening of dimensionality encompasses not just our own being, but also that of the cosmos.

In addition to functioning as the resource I just described, this opening up of dimensionality means that even if, for some reason later in life, the jhānas are not accessible—perhaps due to certain life situations where we're unable to practice, severe illness, or medicine with difficult side effects that prevent clarity of mind, concentration, or mental energy—they still function as a resource.

Something has been seen and sensed and known by the being, by the citta, so that even after years, when the jhānas become inaccessible, they continue to serve us. One senses and knows something about one's own being, about human being, and about the cosmos. This knowledge, this sense of things, remains present even when one can't directly touch or see it.

It's imprinted on the psyche, on the citta, on the heart and mind so profoundly that it has opened up, changed, and dimensionalized our sense of things. One knows it's true, even when one can no longer access it directly. This knowledge acts as long-term support for the citta, for the soul, including when circumstances may be very, very challenging.

So there are two levels of how jhānas can function as a profound and helpful resource for our lives—for meeting life, opening to life, and serving what we want to serve in life.

CHAPTER 224

Going Forwards

Rob Burbea · 49 min

> In this concluding talk from a jhāna retreat, Rob Burbea provides essential guidance for maintaining and developing practice after returning home. He emphasizes the importance of appreciating one's efforts independent of perceived results, and offers practical advice for transitioning from retreat while caring for the sensitive, open heart that develops through this practice.
>
> Burbea introduces the concept of structured practice periods - dedicating weeks or months to exploring specific practices like jhāna, mettā, or insight meditation with creativity and playfulness. He discusses various "practice streams" including samādhi, brahmavihāras, emptiness practice, and soul-making dharma, explaining how different approaches can work together as complementary elements of a comprehensive path.
>
> A significant portion addresses misconceptions about jhāna practice, clarifying that celibacy, special diets, or retreat conditions are not necessary - rather, what matters is non-entanglement with hindrances. Burbea explores the deeper themes that emerged during retreat: our relationship with desire, the importance of conceptual frameworks in practice, and how patterns around goals and intentions mirror life itself. He concludes with reflections on practicing in groups, the necessity of clarity about intentions, and a beautiful dedication of merit for all beings.

Thank you.

So hopefully you could get a sense of what you've put into the time here and to your practice, and hopefully you could get a sense of really appreciating that. It's really, really important to have that sense of appreciation, almost independent of how you assess the results from the perspective of the mind state right now. The mind state, the hindrances, not hindrances, and we judge this or that, how it's going, how I am, how my practice is, etc. Success, failure—but just independent of that to really be able to appreciate the efforts and the dedication and the consistency.

So I know certainly, as Robert said before he left and Kirsten before she went on retreat and Sari and I, we really, really appreciate what you've put into your practice, the efforts you've made, your willingness to work and play, your love of exploration, all that. And I hope that you have got a little taste, a little sense of the beauty of this kind of practice and a little sense perhaps of its possibilities, the possibilities here and the kind of art and magic that can be involved. I think I know at least some of you have that sense.

So I hope you got a little taste of the loveliness, and I know that for everyone it will have been difficult and it has been difficult and challenging in lots of different ways at times. And that's also part of what we need to appreciate in ourselves, our willingness to just keep showing up and keep working and playing when it's difficult in all these different ways.

We've talked about the difficulties that come when we have a desire or desires, an aim, a goal, a direction. The difficulties that come when we want to stay steady with a certain intention over not just an hour, but over days and weeks and then years or whatever. The inner critic, the propensity in our culture for self-measurement, self-judgment—this is all part of the difficult terrain that we have to somehow navigate, somehow relate to wisely with these kinds of practices. So really, thank you for all of that. It involves a lot. It's a big deal.

Transitioning out of the retreat—you know, you've all done lots of retreats before. It's a little bit different this retreat. It's different than, say, some retreats where you really close the senses and you're really looking, really narrowing down to a microscopic attention. Usually the transition from that kind of retreat is quite jarring, can be quite jarring, needs a lot of care, especially if you've been really slowing down.

But here, because we've had this emphasis on more openness of awareness, more inclusion of appreciation in the senses, that kind of trauma of sudden sense stimulation is usually not such an issue on this retreat. It shouldn't be such an issue. What may be more asking for a little more care is the heart.

Sometimes, again, in this context, the heart becomes very open, very sensitive in lovely ways. And so that needs some care as you move, take your journeys home, wherever you're going, as you encounter friends and family again, as you move through the coming days. Do we know how to take care of our heart? What does that really mean? That's a huge subject. What does it mean to take care of the sensitive heart?

Actually, I don't know—how was breakfast for you? Were some of you a bit buzzing after that? Maybe, maybe not. Yeah, depends again on what kind of retreat, but that's quite a lot of sense stimulation, suddenly talking and the room full of people talking, probably a lot of energy gathered over three weeks, quite loud. So what does that kind of buzz need if there is such a thing?

And in terms of caring for the heart, when you go wherever you're going, caring for the heart, caring for your relationships, the relationships with the people in your life and your loved ones, which means also caring about what you share or how you share or when you share and with whom.

So you might be super excited about what you've uncovered, discovered, or you might just want to vent after the retreat or whatever it is, but who am I sharing with? And is it the right moment? Are they in the right space? Am I in the right space? Why am I sharing? What am I looking for here?

Of course, sharing is really, really important. But sometimes we, like everything, we need to be attuned. Because if it's not the right time for this person, or they're not really a person who's actually that interested, or I'm wanting something, and I'm not fully conscious that I'm wanting something from the sharing, and I'm not clear that I'm with the other person—this is what I want. When I share, I would like you to listen this way, or I would like this kind of interest or that kind of interest or whatever it is.

That's also, you know, to care for that, which means to enter into that with awareness, responsiveness, attunement. This is also really, really important in terms of caring for the heart.

Why am I sharing? What am I looking for here? Sharing is profoundly important, but like all things, we need attunement. If the timing isn't right for the other person, or they're not genuinely interested, or if I'm seeking something through the sharing without being fully conscious of that desire, then I'm not truly present with them. When I share, I may unconsciously want the listener to respond in a particular way, to show certain kinds of interest. To care for this tendency means entering into it with awareness, responsiveness, and attunement. This too is essential for caring for the heart.

So hopefully everyone is returning to a full and engaged life of practice, both informally and formally, in terms of daily practice. This is primarily what I want to address now.

I find that most people flourish when they have periods in their life dedicated to exploring a specific practice or element of practice. Just as we've done here with jhanas, creating our playground—this approach applies to any practice. You might return home and decide to focus on metta practice, or any other dharma door. The key is establishing a delineated period—a week, a month, six weeks, three months—where you're intentionally exploring this practice in your daily sitting, perhaps also in informal practice off the cushion. You have a playground.

After that period concludes, you review. If you're learning significantly and want to continue, you commit to another week or month. If it was beneficial but you're ready for something else, you establish another period with a different focus. Again, the intention remains steady and there's a playground—a learning playground.

While not universal, I believe people learn and develop much more effectively this way. Within that playground, creativity, experimentation, and playfulness are essential. You need to actually play in practice. With steady intention and the playground established, you can have fun, trying this and that, experimenting with different approaches—often very small, subtle adjustments.

This principle applies to all practice. We've discussed it extensively regarding jhanas on this retreat, but it encompasses all practices. Often people find they only make real progress on retreat, while outside of retreat they're merely treading water, putting in time without genuine engagement, sometimes even falling apart. Usually this happens because they're not allowing themselves to play, not permitting creativity within their steady intention and playground. Naturally, practice becomes dry, lacking juice or creative, playful input.

We can conceive of different practice streams. Much arises in our lives—at home, work, and elsewhere—and sometimes we react with, "Oh, this has come up, now this has come up," simply trying to cope with whatever emerges. While there's a place for that responsive approach, we can also establish what we're actively exploring. When we're investigating a particular practice and circumstances arise at work or in relationships, our current practice focus suggests specific ways of working with what emerges. Rather than merely sitting for a prescribed time and then coping with life's challenges, the practice determines how we meet what arises.

Just as on this retreat we maintained certain preferences for working with emotions—preferences that would be reversed on a retreat focused specifically on emotions—the practice shapes how we engage with what comes up.

Consider different practice streams: the whole insight ways of looking approach, samadhi and jhana practice, soul-making dharma, brahmaviharas, emotions and emotional awareness, emotional skillfulness, the entire realm of psychology and psychological inquiry. One might take specific elements of right speech and dedicate periods to exploring the expression of difficult truths, of what's challenging for someone to hear. Or focus on exploring generosity for several weeks. The possibilities are vast—the four foundations of mindfulness or a single foundation, or for those returning to activist engagement, discovering how to make that practice within intensity and hecticness.

Within these different practice streams, we cultivate our various playgrounds. Even within jhana practice, we maintain different playgrounds. Within insight ways of looking, different playgrounds emerge.

Someone asked whether it's possible to explain what I've previously discussed regarding skillful fabrication.

Now we're talking about unfabricating and what's the relationship between those two, and then what's the relationship between those two and jhana practice and emptiness and soul making. I've talked about that elsewhere. It's complex, but it's really important to understand.

I think for now, what might be important is just to think in terms of these different streams of practice—where my playground is—and listening and reading in collaboration with whatever my playground is. In time I begin to understand more the conceptual frameworks of each practice and how each relates to the other. Then we can have a big mandala of different practices that fits together very coherently to make something beautiful.

So it might be periods of jhana practice, for example, and you might feel after this retreat, "Oh, that's what I want to do." It doesn't have to be. If you choose insight ways of looking, if you pick up on this idea and want to choose something like insight ways of looking, then it's really good to do samadhi practice or brahmavihara practice in combination with or to balance out the insight ways of looking.

How much, what the ratio is—whether it's fifty-fifty or even eighty-twenty or twenty-eighty—you can experiment with that. But it also doesn't need to be in order. Like I said, it doesn't have to be "first I do my samadhi and calm my mind down and get my focus and then I do my insight."

I'm feeling wretched and restless and agitated and pissed off and confused. I could do my samadhi, or I could bring an insight way of looking to that. If it's working—because there's the release of clinging there—it should calm things down and then open things up, and then I can go to my samadhi. So don't get caught up in this whole idea that there's an order: "First I prepare my mind with concentration and then I do my insight." It really doesn't need to work that way.

If you're choosing different themes, there's the possibility of working together, making groups, connecting with each other and having themed groups where you practice together with a certain theme for a while—like an element of right speech or generosity. You go out and play with something in the week with generosity. You come back and compare notes and really see the power of that. You learn from each other. And of course, there may be groups where there is a teacher.

One of the things I hope before I die is that I will be able to make it clear in these different streams of practice who's a qualified teacher in this stream of practice or that stream of practice. I've only made very little headway with that, but I'm really hoping that will be possible. So you can know where to go if you want to explore this practice or that practice.

In the meantime, there is already an emptiness group running online that meets every two weeks. Sari is teaching with Nathan, and Juha will be one of the teachers once he returns from his three-month retreat, along with Susie Keeley and Yahel, who's a teacher in Israel. It exists and is very lovely from what I've heard. For people who want to explore emptiness, you can learn a lot there and share together and benefit from that. Nathan will put up some information for that on the board afterwards.

Just in terms of jhana practice, the arising of jhana or the arising of samadhi depends on a lot of conditions. A lot of conditions need to come together. It's very possible off retreat. So it's not something that needs to be confined to retreat. If you find it's confined to retreat, then the question is: why is it confined to retreat? It's dependent on conditions.

Someone asked me, "Do I have to avoid orgasm in order to practice jhana?" Absolutely not. Where does this idea come from? Or "I have to avoid sex" or "I have to have a special diet" or something like that. What is it we have to not have? Entanglement—entanglement in the hindrances. It's not even that we need to not have the hindrance; it's entanglement in the hindrances.

When the Buddha says "withdrawn" or "in seclusion from the hindrances," it means withdrawn from entanglement, not entangled in whatever is going on in my life. That's the condition, more than anything else. So it's not that "I've got a busy job" or "relationships are tricky at the moment." It's how much the heart and mind are entangled. That's what makes the difference.

So it's certainly not true that one has to be celibate or not have sex or only practice Taoist non-ejaculatory orgasms or whatever it is.

There is that teaching out there, and it has its place. But sometimes people who are drawn to those approaches can become a little limited in their view.

Whether an orgasm brings energy or depletes energy depends on numerous factors. As lay practitioners, if sexuality is part of your life, you need to explore this territory for yourself. Whether sex and orgasm depletes energy or actually enhances it depends on elements like the quality of love present, the depth of soul connection, the degree of openness. These factors are far more significant regarding energy than the simple fact of orgasm, and much more relevant to jhanic availability.

Similarly with diet—you can get caught up in rigid ideas here too. We each need to discover what works for us individually. I speak as someone who has wrestled with a somewhat tormented digestive system for thirty-five years. Find out what works for you. Don't simply buy into theories wholesale. Don't avoid being within 150 meters of a clove of garlic just because some teaching suggests it. Discover if it's actually true for you.

Sometimes we encounter concepts from Ayurveda about sattvic foods—the pure, harmonious category. Don't develop what I call "sattvic neurosis" around all this. Experiment, play, maintain creativity and willingness to explore in practice, and also around the periphery of practice with elements like diet. This approach is really, really important. You can discover a tremendous amount on your own about all these aspects.

If all goes well, the recordings from this retreat should become available at some point. I hope they will prove very helpful—helpful now, as soon as you access them, and helpful for years to come. There is a tremendous amount of information contained within them. You may not realize it, but it's probably nearly impossible to absorb all that information just during these three weeks on your first listening. Many of the questions you would naturally have were already addressed, already given. It's simply too much information to process at once. So it's there, and it should prove helpful, I hope.

In terms of samadhi practice, don't forget about techniques like the counting with the breath that we explored right at the opening. It takes some time to become comfortable with it, but for certain people it can be a really potent practice, genuinely useful. It might feel quite awkward initially with the long breath and the counting, but something like that is truly worth developing. So consider all the tools that might be available to you.

One of the beautiful aspects of jhana practice—especially when we approach it with this emphasis on marinating and mastery—is that you could go away and not attend any retreats for a year, then return to retreat practice. It's rather like placing a bookmark in a book and leaving it on a shelf for a year; when you open the book again, the bookmark remains in the same place. Your playground, your edge of exploration, stays pretty much in the same location. This happens when I've practiced in the way we've emphasized, with mastery and marinating, staying with states rather than rushing through them.

This is truly a lovely quality. In other words, you don't need to feel rushed or maintain a somewhat tight attitude of "I need to keep up my jhana practice, otherwise next time I go on retreat, it won't be there." It doesn't need to be like that. There exists this kind of mysterious bookmark magic as well.

But I also hope that you've begun to recognize how important it is to engage with larger questions—meta-questions about desire, for example. What is your relationship with desire? What happens for you around desire? What gets included in your desire, and what exactly are your desires? These meta-questions about desire and about conceptual frameworks—I hope you begin to realize that these inquiries are important, and that these questions themselves become part of your practice. The exploring of relationship with desire, the exploring of relationship with conceptual frameworks, the exploring of conceptual frameworks themselves.

Even understanding that conceptual frameworks are important to understand—that recognition alone is something really major, truly significant. Without a coherent conceptual framework, dramatic experiences can simply be "wow" moments that don't actually liberate very much or prove very transformative. They're not as helpful or opening as they could be. It's the conceptual framework that gives power to the experience.

Without an appropriate conceptual framework, or with one that isn't quite coherent or seems incongruent—doesn't really fit together with itself or doesn't align with how you're practicing—this can create confusion or a kind of myopia in practice. You become mesmerized by individual experiences, but they don't reach out and spread their transformative effect throughout your life.

Even more problematically, this can lead to a narrowing of what practice becomes. Some people have been doing the same practice for twenty years. Why?

Because there's no conceptual framework. They're not quite sure how that practice fits in with the rest of the Dharma or other practices. So the whole Dharma can shrink and the whole sense of what practice is can shrink.

So I really hope that you feel that you've learned not just about samādhi and jhānas and that sort of thing, but also about desire and your patterns with desire and having goals and aim and a direction and staying steady with intention. All that stuff mirrors our life.

Whatever we've bumped into here around desire, around feeling confined in a certain intention—I want to do this, I want to do that—feeling restless within it, whatever patterns around that, whatever problems we experience when we set a goal or an aim or a fear of doing so, all that on retreat just mirrors life. The same thing.

Inner critic, the difficulty to sustain singleness of intention, the wobbling, the ambivalence. Am I in the right place? Am I doing the right thing? I should be somewhere else. The doubt, the hindrances, becoming papañca and then becoming so convincing. This is life stuff. It's not just retreat stuff, meditative stuff. It's life stuff.

Feeling imprisoned in a form, in an intention, in a group, in a relationship—this is life stuff, all of that. So I hope that because we've talked about this, we kept returning to this, I hope that you can really see this. These elements are really important meta-elements in relation to practice, but of course, in relation to our life as well. As I said several times, they may end up being much more important than whether I attain this or that jhāna—how I am with these things, what I learn with these things.

There are all kinds of streams of practice, and within that, there are different playgrounds that one might have. As I said, there are groups, and sometimes we learn better with each other. So we might find a group where there's a teacher or teachers, and that's great, but also peer groups, working together, as I mentioned before.

I was thinking about this—I'm not sure if jhāna practice would work so well as a peer group. Maybe it would. I'm not sure. But my sense is it might be a little more tricky with people being in different places or progressing at very different rates. Again, because of lots of different conditions. But it might. Something to find out.

Something like emptiness or studying emptiness or soulmaking, for example, may work much better in terms of saṅgha groups together, study groups, practice groups together, peer groups together. And it might be that jhāna practice is more of a solitary endeavor. I don't know. But if you want to experiment, find out.

Actually, it's interesting with regard to groups because I've stressed so much about the necessity of clarity with regard to what's the precise mix of my desires—so for my practice, for my life, for this retreat, or for a group that I go to, that I form or I'm part of. What exactly am I wanting? What are the confluences of my desires and my intentions?

So on a soulmaking retreat, for example, many of you have been on soulmaking retreats—there's lots of dyad practice or triad practice, relational practice in the retreat, lots of sharing of images and experiences, lots of intimacy that way, lots of relational practice. But then very easily, it might be that one feels very touched by that sharing and by that intimacy. And without realizing it, goes and forms a soulmaking group—let's form a soulmaking group together. Actually my desire is really for the sharing and the saṅgha, primarily, and less for the soulmaking.

What I really want is that sharing, which is a fantastic desire. It's a really important desire. I want connection, I want intimacy with other practitioners, I want that sharing. But if I've set up or am going to a soulmaking group and actually without realizing it—and without the others realizing it—I'm actually wanting saṅgha primarily and soulmaking maybe is just secondary, then because of the importance of what I actually desire, because of the determinative effect of what I actually desire in the mix, the soulmaking will not blossom so well because I'm actually coming at it wanting something else. Do you understand?

So groups can fall apart. I've seen groups trying to set up, trying to set up, not really happening, not really happening. People are not clear about what they're going for.
